Though suffering from an incurable form of quar-tan fever, he waged war to the last and died during the siege of Ragaba. On his deathbed he advised his queen to cast herself upon the mercy of the Pharisees: a wise counsel as the event proved, for she was permitted to retain the crown and to place her son Hyrcanus in the high-priestly office. Thus she ruled for nine years (78-69 BC). On her death, her son Aristobulus, whom she had kept from public affairs and who espoused the cause of the Sadducees, aspired to the crown. Another internecine war resulted, in which Aristobulus was victorious. Hyrcanus agreed, for a large financial consideration, to leave public affairs entirely alone. The Herodian family, which owed everything to the Maccabees (Ant, XIV, i, 3), now appears on the scene. Antipater, a friend of Hyrcanus, induced him to escape to Aretas, king of Arabia, at Petra, with whom he made an alliance. In the ensuing war, Aristobulus was conquered, shut up in Jerus and compelled to invoke the aid of the Romans, with whose assistance the Arabs were repelled (Ant, XIV, ii, 3). In this same year Pompey came to Damascus, where he found himself between three fires, for not only the two brothers, but a large hagiocratic party of Pharisees as well clamored for a hearing. This last party refused both Aristobulus and Hyrcanus as rulers. Through the machinations of Antipater, Pompey sided with Hyrcanus, upon which Aristobulus prepared for war. Pompey promptly marched on Jerus and the irresolute Aristobulus met him with promises of subjection and presents. When his followers however refused to carry out these promises, Aristobulus was imprisoned and Pompey at once invested Jerus, which was taken by assault on the passover of 63 BC, after a siege of three months. Pompey entered the holiest place of the temple, thus forever estranging the Pharisaic party from Rome. But he did not spoil the temple, and appointed Hyrcanus high priest. This event marks the collapse of the Maccabaeian power. What follows are only the throes of death. Aristobulus, and his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, were taken to Rome as prisoners. On the way Alexander escaped and renewed the fruitless struggle in Judaea, only to be at once crushed by the Rom general Gabinius. A little later both Aristobulus and Antigonus also escaped. Returning to the homeland, the former, like his son, fought a brief and valiant but fruitless campaign and was returned captive to Rome, where he died by poison, on the eve of beginning service under the Rom standards, 49 BC. Alexander was executed at Antioch by Pompey. Of all the Maccabaeian princes thus only Antigonus and Hyrcanus remained. The Idumaeian power was now about to supplant the Maccabaeian. Herod the son of Antipater sided, as his father had done, with Hyrcanus against Antigonus. The factional disturbances at Rome and throughout the empire permitted of the enactment of the last stage of the Asmonean drama, in the final contest of Hyrcanus and Antigonus. Herod was in Judaea with Hyrcanus, when Antigonus with the Parthian hordes overran the country, caused Herod precipitately to evacuate Pal, and after capturing Jerus in 40 BC, sent his uncle Hyrcanus as a captive to the East, after having cropped off his ears, to incapacitate him forever for the high-priestly office (Ant, XIV, xiii, 10). Herod now obtained the aid of the Romans and permission to reconquer Judaea. In a furious campaign, marked by the most shocking barbarities, he occupied the greater part of the country, and finally in 37 BC succeeded in taking Jerus. Antigonus surrendered but was executed at Antioch by Antony, at the instigation of Herod (Ant, XIV, xvi, 4). The fate of the remnants of the Maccabaeian stem, at the hands of Herod, may be found by consulting the article under MACCABEES.

ASNAH, as'na (אֲשָׁנָה, 'asnah, "thornbush"): One of the Nethinim, who returned with Zerubabel from the exile (Ezr 2 50).

ASNAPPER, as-nap'ér. See OSNAPPER.

ASOCHIS, a-sô'kis, PLAIN OF. See CANA OF GALILEE.

ASOM, ā'som (Ἀσὸμ, H, Asóm)=Hashum (Ezr 10 33): The sons of A. put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 33).

ASP (אֲסָפ, pethen [Dt 32 33; Job 20 14.16; Isa 11 8]; ἄσπις, aspis [Rom 3 13]): Any poisonous snake, or even poisonous snakes in general, would satisfy the context in all the passages cited. Pethen is also tr^d ADDER (q.v.) in Ps 58 4; 91 13. Most authors have supposed the Egyp cobra (Naia haje, L.) to be the snake meant, but while this is widely distributed throughout Africa, its occurrence in Southern Pal seems to rest solely on the authority of Canon Tristram, who did not collect it. There are other poisonous snakes in Pal, any one of which would satisfy the requirements of these passages. See SERPENT. While the aspis of classical Gr lit. may well have been the Egyp cobra, it is to be noted that Vipera aspis, L., is confined to central and western Europe.

ALFRED ELY DAY

ASPALATHUS, as-pal'a-thus (ἀσπάλθος, aspálathos): An aromatic plant mentioned in Ecclus 24 15 AV, where "wisdom" says, "I gave a sweet smell like cinnamon and aspalathus," etc. It would appear, from a reference in Pliny, to have been a prickly shrub, the wood of which was scented, but nothing certain is known about it.

ASPATHA, as-pá'tha (אֲסָפְתָּה, 'aspāthā'): One of the ten sons of Haman (Est 9 7) (Pers aspadāta, "given by a sacred horse," acc. to Thesaurus, Add. 71, after Pott and Benfey).

ASPHALT, as'falt. See SLIME.

ASPHAR, as'fār, THE POOL (λάκκος Ἀσφάρ, lákκος Asphár): When Jonathan and Simon fled from Bacchides they encamped by this pool in the wilderness of Tekoa (1 Macc 9 33; Ant, XIII, i, 2). It is probably identical with Ez-Za'ferāneh, a ruined site with an ancient cistern, to the S. of Tekoa, and E. of Halhul. Bir Selhub about 6 miles S.W. of Ain Jidy is favored by some (EB, s.v.), the hills around it being known as Šafra, in which there may be a survival of the old name.

ASPHARASUS, as-far'a-sus (Ἀσφάρασος, Asphárasos=Mispar [Ezr 2 2; Mispereth, Neh 7 7]): A leader of the captives, who returned with Zerubabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 8).

ASRIEL, as'ri-el (אַסְרִיֶּל, 'asrī'ēl, "Vow of God"?): A man of Manasseh (Nu 26 31; Josh 17 2). The form Asrielites, i.e. family of Asriel, occurs in Nu 26 31. According to 1 Ch 7 14, Asriel was born to Manasseh by an Aramitess concubine. AV has "Ashnel."

ASS, as (חֲמֹר or חֶמֶר, ḥāmōr, cf Arab. ḥamār, apparently connected with Arab. root 'ahmar, "red," but referred by some to root hamal, "to carry"; also, but less commonly, both in Heb and in Arab., אֶתְרוֹן, 'āthōn, Arab. 'atan, used in Arab. only of the females; פֶּרֶה, pereh, or פֶּרֶה, pere', and עֶרֶד, 'ārādh, or עֶרֶד, 'ārādh, Arab. 'ard, "wild ass," and also עֵיר, 'ayir, Arab. 'aīr, "a young" or "wild ass"): The name 'ārādh (Job 39 5) is rare; ὄνος, ónos (Mt 21 2).

(1) Ḥāmōr is derived from the root which means, in all probability, "to carry a burden" (see Fürst, Handwörterbuch, חֶמֶר ii), or "heap up."

(2) Meaning "up." While no analogies are contained in the OT this root occurs in New Heb. The Aram. חֶמֶר, ḥamēr, means "to make a ruin-heap" (from which the noun ḥāmōr, "a heap," used in Jgs 15 16 in a play of words:

Asses at a Mill.

"With the jawbone of an ass, heaps upon heaps, with the jawbone of an ass have I smitten a thousand men"). The root may also mean "to be red." In this case the nominal form ḥāmōr may have been derived from the reddish-brown skin of a certain type of the ass.

(2) 'Āthōn, Assyrian 'atānu and Aram. אֶתְרוֹן, 'atānā, is derived from אָתָה, 'āthā, "to come," "go," etc (Fürst suggests that it may be derived from אֶתְרוֹן, 'āthan, Aram. עֶדֶן, 'āthan, "to be slender," "docile," etc); אֶתְרוֹנוֹת חֲמֹר, 'āthōnōth ḥāmōrōth, "red-white asses" (Jgs 5 10) designates a better breed.

(3) 'Ayir, Arab. 'airu ("male ass") used of the young and vigorous animal, is derived from the root עֵיר, "to go away," "escape through swiftness" (Hommel, Namen der Säugethiere, 121-23). This name is used as a parallel to אֶתְרוֹן, 'āthōn (Gen 49 11) and as a compound of עֵיר, 'ayir pere' (Job 11 12), "a wild ass's colt."

(4) Pere', "wild ass," is derived from the root which means "to run," suggestive of the animal's swiftness.

(5) 'Ārādh, is, in all probability, an Aram. loan-word for the Heb pere'. The Tg uses עֶרְדָּה, 'ārādhā and עֶרְדָּה, 'ārādhā.

From the references to these various names in the OT it is clear that (1) ḥāmōr was used for riding purposes: (a) by men (2 S 16 2; 17 23; 19 26; 1 K 2 40; 13 13.23.24.27);

(b) by women (Ex 4 20; Josh 15 13; Jgs 1 14; 1 S 25 20.23.42; cf 2 Ch 28 15). צֶמֶד, ḥāmōrīm, "a pair of asses" was used for riding as well as for burdens (Jgs 19 3.10.19.21, etc). (2) It was also used in tillage (Isa 32 20). In this connection the law prohibits the use of an ass in plowing with an ox (Dt 22 10). The she-ass ('āthōn) was used as a beast of burden (Gen 45 23) and for riding (Jgs 5 10; Nu 22 21.22; 2 K 4 24). The 'ayir is also referred to as used in riding (Jgs 10 4), carrying (Isa 30 6) and tilling (ver 24).

Besides the use of the ass in agriculture and riding it was employed in the caravans of commerce, and sent even upon long expeditions

4. As a Domestic Animal through the desert. The ass is and always has been one of the most common domestic animals. It is a much more important animal in Bible lands than in England and America. The humblest peasant owned his own ass. It is associated throughout the Bible with peaceful pursuits (Gen 42 26 f; 22 3; 1 S 16 20; 2 S 19 26; Neh 13 15), whereas the horse is referred to in connection with war and armies. Reference is also made to the use of the flesh of the ass in time of famine (2 K 6 25). The origin of the ass like that of most domestic animals is lost in antiquity and it cannot be confidently stated from what species of wild ass it was derived. There are three races of wild asses in Asia, one of which is found in Syria, but they may all be referred to one species, Equus hemionus. The African species is E. asinus, and good authorities consider our domestic asses to have descended from this, and to have been introduced at an early period into the entire Orient. The Sulaib Arabs of the Syrian desert, who have no horses, have a famous breed of swift and hardy grey asses which they assert they cross at intervals with the wild asses of the desert. It is not unlikely that domestic asses like dogs are the result of crosses with more than one wild species.

As a domestic animal it preceded the horse, which was first introduced into Egypt by the Hyksos about 1800 BC. See HORSE.

(1) חֲמֹר גָּרֵם, ḥāmōr gārem, "an ass of strong bones," is used metaphorically of Issachar (Gen 49 14); בֶּשֶׂר חֲמֹר, bēsar ḥāmōr, "the is applied to ignominious treatment of a corpse (Jer 22 19); ḥāmōr is used as a symbol of peace and humility (2 S 19 26). Zechariah speaks of the future Messiah as "lowly, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt the foal of an ass" (Zec 9 9; cf Mt 21 5.7).

(2) Pere' is used as a symbol of wildness (Hos 8 9), and פֶּרֶה אָדָם, pere' ādhām, "a wild ass of a man" (Gen 16 12), referring to Ishmael, designates a free nomad. In Job the name pere' is applied to the desert dwellers (Job 24 5). Jeremiah employs this name as a symbol of lust. He compares Israel's love of idolatry to the lust of the wild ass (Jer 2 24).

The ass ('āthōn) figures prominently in the Baalam story (Nu 22; 2 Pet 2 16. See Gray, ICC, "Numbers," ad loc.). It is interesting

6. Wider Use in Literature to note that Apion charged the Jews that they "placed an ass's head in their holy place," affirming that "this was discovered when Antiochus Epiphanes spoiled our temple, and found that ass's head there made of gold, and worth a great deal of money." Jos, refuting this absurdity, states that the Rom conquerors of Judaea found nothing in the temple "but what was agreeable to the strictest piety." He goes on to say: "Apion ought to have had a regard to these facts. . . . As for us Jews, we ascribe no honor or power to asses, as do the Egyptians to crocodiles and asps. . . . Asses are the same with us which they are with other wise men; viz. creatures that bear the burdens that we lay upon them" (Cap, II, 7).

ASSALIMOTH, a-sal'i-moth. See SALIMOTH (Apoc).

ASSAMIAS, a-sa-mī'as (B, Ἀσάμιās, Assamias; A, Ἀσάμιās, Asamias; AV Assanias; cf Hashabiah [Ezr 8 24]): A. (chief priest) returned with Ezra to Jerus. He was one of twelve who had charge of the silver, gold and the temple-vessels (1 Esd 8 54).

ASSAPHIOTH, a-sā'fī-oth (A, Ἀσαφίωθ, Asaphiōth; B, Ἀσαφείωθ, Assaphēiōth; AV Azaphion): The head of a family, which returned with Zerubabel from captivity, called also the servants of Solomon (1 Esd 5 35). Probably the same as Has-sophereth of Ezr 2 55 and Sophereth of Neh 7 57.

ASSARION, as-ā'ri-on. See FARTHING.

ASSASSINATION, a-sas-i-nā'shun: The language of Scripture distinguishes less clearly than the modern juridical between assas-

1. Meaning sination and murder. "Murderer" = of the Term רֹצֵחַ, rōṣe'ah (Nu 35 16-19.21.30.31; 2 K 6 32; Job 24 14); הֹרֵג, hōregh, from הָרַג, hāragh = "to slay," "kill," AV tr "murderer" in Hos 9 13; but "slayer" in Ezk 21 11. Where the RV renders "slayers," we find רָצַח, rāṣah, in Nu 35 11.25-28; Dt 4 42; 19 3.4.6; Josh 20 3.5.6; 21 13.21.27.32.38, irrespective of whether wilful, deliberate killing is spoken of, or hasty or merely accidental; and נָקָה, nākhāh = "to strike," "wound," "kill," "slay," in Nu 35 24. The prohibition against killing is all-inclusive, even to suicide, placing the ban not only on deliberate, purposeful slaying (Ex 21 12.14.18), but on all endangering of life through negligence (Dt 22 8) or recklessness (Lev 19 14) or hatred, anger and revengefulness (Lev 19 17 ff).

The Mosaic law presupposes the punishment of all killing of human beings on the ground of Gen 9 6, and repeatedly reiterates it

2. Punish- (Ex 21 12.14 ff; Lev 24 17.21; Nu ment of 35 33; Dt 19 11 ff), the reason assigned being that man is made in the image of God; hence to slay a man is paramount to lifting the hand against the Creator. And while the degrees of guilt are not indicated by the language, they are closely distinguished by the punishments prescribed. Not only notorious enmity against the slain and deliberate lying-in-wait on the part of the murderer (Ex 21 13; Nu 35 20 ff; Dt 19 4.11), but also the nature of the instrument was taken into account to determine the nature of the crime (Nu 35 16 ff). See CRIMES.

ASSASSINS, a-sas'inz (σικάριοι, sicarioi; AV murderers): Jos (BJ, II, xiii, 3, xvii) relates that "there sprang up in Jerus a class of robbers called Sicarii, who slew men in the daytime, and in the midst of the city. This they did chiefly when they mingled with the populace at the festivals, and, hiding short daggers in their garments, stabbed with them those that were their enemies. The first to be assassinated by them was Jonathan the high priest, and after him many were slain daily" (see also Ant, XX, viii, 6, ix). The name is derived from Lat sica, "a dagger." The sicarioi were implacable in their hatred to Rome and to those Jews who were suspected of leaning toward Rome. They took a leading part in the Jewish rebellion and in the disturbance previous to it, and also in the faction quarrels during the war. After the war they continued their nefarious practices in Egypt and Cyrene whither they had fled.

Lysias mistook Paul for 'the Egyptian who . . . led out into the wilderness the 4,000 men of the sicarioi' (Acts 21 38). S. F. HUNTER

ASSAULT, a-sôlt' (צָרַח, ṣār; ὁρμή, hormē): The Heb verbal form is used of pressing forward a siege (see SIEGE), but also of a hostile attack upon a person then tr^d "assault" (Est 8 11). The Gr word hormē used of an attack upon persons in Acts 14 5 (AV) is rendered "onset" in RV. The word "assault" remains in Acts 17 5, of attacking the house of Jason in Thessalonica, where the verb is ephistānai, "to come suddenly upon."

ASSAY, a-sā' (נָסָה, yā'al; נָסָה, nāṣāh; πειράζειν, peirāzein; πειράσθαι, peirāsthai; πείραν λαμβάνειν, peiran lambánein): The Heb and Gr words which are rendered in AV "assay" are so rendered in RV, and the use of it is extended in RV in two additional cases. The Heb word yā'al (1 S 17 39) is used of David clad in Saul's armor, who "assayed," that is, "tried unsuccessfully," to go and attack Goliath in it, for "he had not proved it," where nāṣāh is the vb. In Dt 4 34 and Job 4 2 nāṣāh is rendered "assay," in the sense of "attempt," "venture." In Acts 16 7 St. Paul is said to have "assayed," that is, "attempted" (but was hindered), to go into Bithynia, and now in Acts 24 6 St. Paul is charged with having "assayed," that is, "having had the audacity," to profane the temple, where peirazein is the vb. used in both cases. In Acts 9 26, and now in RV Acts 26 21, "assay," renders the vb: peirasthai, "to attempt," in both cases unsuccessfully. In He 11 29 it translates two Gr words peiran lambánein "to make an attempt unsuccessfully." T. NICOL ASSEMBLIES, a-sem'bliz, MASTERS OF (בְּלִי בְּאֵלֵי הַשְּׁפִיטָה, ba'ālē 'āsuppōth, Ecd 12 11): ARV'm "collectors of sentences," thus Kimhi, Grotius and others. This has been variously interpreted. Tyler translates "editors of collections." Kleinert renders "protectors of the treasure-chambers," 'āsuppōth being considered equivalent to the 'āsuppim of 1 Ch 26 15.17; Neh 12 25 (see ASUPPIM). The proverbs are like nails guarding the sacred storehouse, the book closing with this warning against touching the collection (cf Rev 22 18.19). Delitzsch translates "like fastened nails which are put together in collections." "As ba'ālē brith (Gen 14 13) signifies 'the confederates,' ba'ālē sh'bhū'āh (Neh 6 18) 'the sworn,' and the frequently occurring ba'ālē hā-'ir 'the citizens': so ba'ālē 'āsuppōth means, the possessors of assemblies and of the assembled themselves, or the possessors of collections and of things collected. Thus ba'ālē 'āsuppōth will be a designation of the 'words of the wise' (as in shālṭshām, "choice men" = choice proverbs, Prov 22 20, in a certain measure personified), as of those which form or constitute collections and which stand together in order and rank" (Ecd, ET, 434).

On the whole it is better to interpret the phrase "persons skilled in collections" of wise sayings, grouped in a compact whole (cf Wright, Ecdl, 102).

ASSEMBLY, a-sem'bli (קָהָל, kāhal; ἐκκλησία, ekklesia): The common term for a meeting of the people called together by a crier. It has reference therefore to any gathering of the people called for any purpose whatsoever (Ex 12 6; Ps 22 16 AV; 89 7 AV; Acts 19 32.41). The solemn assemblies of the Jews were their feasts or religious gatherings of any kind (Isa 1 13). The word panēguris, "a general festal assembly" (Heb 12 23), is transferred from the congregation of the people of Israel to the Christian church of which the congregation of Israel was a figure. In the same passage, ekklesia has the sense of calling, summoning. In classical Gr ekklesia was the name for the body of free citizens summoned by a herald. In this sense the church calls all the world to become identified with it. It denotes the whole body of believers, all who are called. Or it may refer to a particular congregation or local church (synagōgē, "synagogue" Jas 2 2 RVm). See CALLED; CHURCH; CONGREGATION. JACOB W. KAPP

ASSEMBLY, SOLEMN. See CONGREGATION; FEASTS.

ASSENT, a-sent': Twice used in AV as equivalent to "voice," and to "consent," and displaced in both instances in the RV by the lit. rendering of the Heb peh, "mouth" (2 Ch 18 12); and the Gr suntithēmi, "agree to," i.e. "affirm" (Acts 24 9).

ASSESSOR, a-ses'er: Lit. one who sits by another, an assistant; among the ancients esp. an assistant to the king (cf "The assessor of his throne," Dryden, Milton's P.L., Bk vi), or to the judge (see Dryden, Virgil's Aeneid, vi.583). Later it came to mean one who assesses people or property for purposes of taxation.

(1) Royal officials in Israel have the general title sārīm, "princes," and this general title included the officer who was "over the tribute," who seems to have had charge of the assessment, as well as the collection of taxes. In the days of the later monarchy "the governor of the royal household," "the royal steward and high chamberlain," seems to have held some such important position (Isa 22 15; 36 3.22).

(2) The early kings do not seem to have subjected the people to heavy taxes, but we find much in the prophets about the injustice and extortion practised by these officials on the poor of the land (cf Am 2 6.7; Isa 5 8; Jer 5 28; Mic 3 11). Special taxes seem to have been imposed to meet emergencies (cf 2 K 23 35), but it is not clear that anything of the nature of a regular land tax, or property tax, existed in early times; though something of the kind may be referred to in the reward promised by Saul to the slayer of Goliath (1 S 17 25) and the tenth mentioned in 1 S 8 15-17. The kings of Judah, it would seem, made free use of the temple treasures.

(3) Later the Rom government "farmed out" the taxes of the provinces. The publicans, or tax-gatherers of the Gospels, seem to have been agents of the imperial procurator of Judaea, instead of direct agents of the great Rom financial companies, who ordinarily let out the business of the collection of the taxes to officers of their own.

During the Empire there was ample imperial machinery provided for the regular collection of the taxes, and the emperor appointed a procurator in each province whose business it was to supervise the collection of revenue. Some Jews found the business profitable, but these were objects of detestation to their countrymen. See PUBLICAN.

ASSHUR, ash'oor, ASSUR, as'oor. See ASSYRIA. GEO. B. EAGER

ASSHURIM, a-shōō'rim (אֲשֻׁרִים, 'ashshūrīm): Mentioned among the sons of Dedan, son of Jokshan, son of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25 3).

ASSIDAEANS, as-i-dē'ans. See HASIDAEANS (Apoc).

ASSIDUOUS, a-sid'ū-us: Occurs only in Wisd 8 18 RV, "In assiduous communing with her is understanding," i.e. "in continued exercise of fellowship." The idea expressed in the adj. is contained in the prepositional prefix, sūn of the original sugumnastia, giving the vb. intensive force.

ASSIGN, a-sin' (נָתַן, nāthan, "to give," or "grant," i.e. apportion): Used (Josh 20 8) of Moses setting apart Bezer as one of the three cities of refuge on the E. of the Jordan (cf Dt 4 41-43); also of Joab's stationing Uriah in a place of mortal peril in battle (2 S 11 16).

ASSIR, as'er (אֲסִיר, 'aṣṣīr, "captive"):

(1) A Levite of the family of Korah (Ex 6 24; 1 Ch 6 22).

(2) A son of Ebiasaph and grandson of Assir. Samuel was descended from him (1 Ch 6 23).

(3) A son of Jeconiah, king of Judah, according to AV and RVm and ARVm. It is a question whether the Assir of this passage (1 Ch 3 17) is not a common adj. modifying Jeconiah. The ARV and RV render it "the captive." It is to be noticed, however, that there is no definite art. in the Heb.

ASSOCIATE, a-sō'shi-āt: Only in Isa 8 9 AV, where the Heb רֵעִי, rō'ī, is variously interpreted, according to differences of opinion as to the vb. whence it comes. RV "make an uproar"; RVm "break"; Vulg "Congregamini"; LXX γνῶτε, gnōte ("know ye"); Luther: seid boese ("be wicked").

ASSOS, as'os (Ἄσσος, Ássos): An ancient city of Mysia in the Rom province of Asia, at which, according to Acts 20 13, Paul and Luke rested while on their way from Troas to Mitylene. Standing upon a conical-shaped rock on the southern coast of the Troad, it occupied one of the finest sites in Asia. The rock is about 700 ft. high; its sides are covered with terraces, both natural and artificial, and so steep is it that Stratoricus wrote of it: "If you wish to hasten your death, try and climb Assos." The view from the summit is extensive and magnificent.

The city, which is very ancient, is said to have been founded by the Aeolians, and to have always been singularly Gr. As early as the 5th cent. BC it struck its own coins, and its coinage system continued until 235 AD. One of its early rulers or tyrants was Hermeas, a eunuch, once a slave, who gave his niece in marriage to Aristotle. There the great Gr philosopher lived three years, from 348 to 345 BC. During the time of the kings of Pergamus, the city bore the name of Apollonia. To the Byzantines it was known as Machramion, and at present the town, which has dwindled in importance under Turkish rule, is called Bekhram, a Turkish corruption of the Byzantine name.

The ruins of Assos are among the most imposing in Asia Minor, and yet they have long served as a quarry; from its public buildings the stones for the Constantinople docks were taken. The Turkish sultan Murad II presented the many beautiful bas-reliefs of the Doric temple of Athene to the French government, which are now preserved in the Louvre. The ruins were carefully explored and partially excavated in 1882-83 by Mr. Clarke for the Archaeological Institute of America, and the entire plan of the ancient city is clear. Upon the very summit of the hill stood the temple of Athene which is said to have been erected about 470 BC. Among its ruins Clarke found eight other bas-reliefs which are now in the Boston Museum and which possess a special interest because of their connection between the art of the Orient and of Greece. Upon the several natural terraces of the hill which have been enlarged by artificial means, stood the many public buildings, as the gymnasium, the public treasury, the baths, the market place and the theater, of which but little now remains. The city was surrounded by a double wall which in places is still well preserved. The inner wall of dressed stones laid without mortar, and filled with loose stones, is 8 ft. thick, and the larger outer wall was protected with towers at intervals of 60 ft. The ancient road leading to Troas was well paved. The harbor from which Paul sailed has now been filled up and is covered with gardens, but at its side is the modern harbor protected by an artificial mole, about which are clustered the few houses bearing the name of Bekhran. Upon the summit of the hill, by the ruins of the temple, are cisterns, a Turkish fortress and a Byzantine church which has been converted into a mosque. Without the city walls is a necropolis. Its many sarcophagi of all ages and sizes and shapes are made of the native trachyte stone which, so the ancients believed, possessed the quality of consuming the bodies buried in it. The stone is the famous "Lapis Assius," or the flesh-eating, hence the word sarcophagus. In former times wheat was raised extensively in the fields about Assos, but now valonia, or acorn cups, form the chief article for export. E. J. BANKS

ASSUAGE, a-swā'j' (AV Assuage): Lit. "sweeten," "soften down"; then, "mitigate," "abate"; used of "flood," Gen 8 1 ("subside"); of grief, Job 16 5.6 ("restrain"); also applied to any strong emotion; not used in the NT.

ASSURANCE, a-shōōr'ans: A term exceptionally rich in spiritual meaning. It signifies the joyous, unwavering confidence of an intelligent faith; the security of a fearless trust. The original words have to do with the heart of vital religion. בְּטָח, bāṭah, "trust"; יָמַן, 'āman, "to prop," "to support," hence to confide in, to trust. Jesus repeatedly used this word "amen" to express the trustworthiness and abiding certainty of his sayings. πίστις, pistis, "faith"; πληροφορία, plērōphoria, "full assurance." The confidence of faith is based, not on "works of righteousness which we have done" (cf Titus 3 4.5 AV) but on the high-priesthood and atoning sacrifice of Christ (He 10 21.22; cf ver 19, "boldness to enter . . . by the blood of Jesus," AV). Assurance is the soul's apprehension of its complete emancipation from the power of evil and from consequent judgment, through the atoning grace of Christ. It is the exact opposite of self-confidence, being a joyous appropriation and experience of the fulness of Christ—a glad sense of security, freedom and eternal life in Him. This doctrine is of immeasurable importance to the life of the church and of the individual believer, as a life of spiritual doubt and uncertainty contradicts the ideal of liberty in Christ Jesus which is the natural and necessary fruitage of "the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit . . . shed on us abundantly, through Jesus Christ our Saviour." Paul unhesitatingly said, "I know" (2 Tim 1 12)—a word which, oft-repeated in 1 Jn, furnishes the groundwork of glad assurance that runs through the entire epistle. For the classic passage on "full assurance" see Col 2 1-10.

LITERATURE

Assyria, a Gr name formed from Asshur (אַשּׁוּר, 'ashshūr; Ἀσσοῦρ, Assoûr; Assy Assur): The primitive capital of the country.

I. Geography.—The origin of the city (now Kala'at Shergat), which was built on the western bank of the Tigris between the Upper and Lower Zab, went back to pre-Sem times, and the meaning of the name was forgotten (see Gen 2 14, where the Hiddekel or Tigris is said to flow on the eastern side of Asshur). To the N. of the junction of the Tigris and Upper Zab, and opposite the modern Mossul, was a shrine of the goddess Istar, around which grew up the town of Nina, Ninua or Nineveh (now Kouyunjik and Nebi Yunus). Another early sanctuary of Istar was at Urbillu, Arbailu or Arbela, E. of the Upper Zab. N. of Nineveh was Dur-Sargina (now Khorsabad) where Sargon built his palace (720 BC). All this district was embraced in the kingdom of Assyria which extended from Babylonia northward to the Kurdish mountains and at times included the country westward to the Euphrates and the Khabur.

II. Early History.—The whole region was known to the early Babylonians as Subartu. Its possession was disputed between Sem Amurru or AMORITES (q.v.) and a non-Sem people from the N. called Mitannians. The earlier high priests of Assur known to us bear Mitannian names. About 2500 BC the country was occupied by Bab Semites, who brought with them the religion, law, customs, script and Sem language of Babylonia (Gen 10 11.12, where we should read "He went forth to Asshur"; see Mic 5 6). The foundation of Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir (Assyr Rebt-Ali, "the suburbs of the city"), Calah and Resen (Assyr Res-eni, "head of the spring") is ascribed to them. The triangle formed by the Tigris and Zab, which inclosed these cities, was in later times included within the fortifications of the "great city" (Gen 10 12; Jon 3 3). Assyria is always distinguished from Babylonia in the OT, and not confounded with it as by Herodotus and other classical writers.

III. Climate and Productions.—Assyria, speaking generally, was a limestone plateau with a temperate climate, cold and wet in winter, but warm during the summer months. On the banks of the rivers there was abundant cultivation, besides pasture-land. The apple of the North grew by the side of the palm-tree of the South. Figs, olives, pomegranates, almonds, mulberries and vines were also cultivated as well as all kinds of grain. Cotton is mentioned by Sennacherib (King, PSBA, December, 1909). The forests were tenanted by lions, and the plains by wild bulls (rîmi, Heb ṣ'ēmîm), wild asses, wild goats and gazelles. Horses were imported from Cappadocia; ducks were kept, and mastiffs were employed in hunting.

IV. Population.—The dominant type was Sem, with full lips, somewhat hooked nose, high forehead, black hair and eyes, fresh complexion and abundance of beard. In character the Assyrians were cruel and ferocious in war, keen traders, stern disciplinarians, and where religion was concerned, intense and intolerant. Like the Ottoman Turks they formed a military state, at the head of which was the king, who was both leader in war and chief priest, and which offered a striking contrast to the theocratic state of the Babylonians. It seems probable that every male was liable to conscription, and under the Second Empire, if not earlier, there was a large standing army, part of which consisted of mercenaries and recruits from the subject races. One result of this was the necessity for constant war in order to occupy the soldiery and satisfy their demands with captured booty; and the result, as in the Northern Kingdom of Israel, was military revolution, with the seizure of the throne by the successful general. As might be expected, education was confined to the upper classes, more especially to the priests and scribes.

V. Trade and Law.—As far back as the age of Abraham, when Assyria was still a dependency of Babylonia, trade was carried on with Cappadocia and an Assyrian colony of merchants settled at Kara Eyuk near Kaisariyeh. Down the Euphrates came the silver, copper and bronze of Asia Minor, together with horses. Cedar wood was brought from Mount Amanus, and there was already trade, through Syria, with the Mediterranean. Nineveh itself was probably founded in the interests of the trade with the North. In later days commercial reasons had much to do with the efforts of the Assyrian kings to conquer eastern Asia Minor and the Mediterranean coast of Syria and Pal: under the diplomacy (cf 2 K 18 26), and commercial documents written in cuneiform were provided with Aram. dockets. As in Babylonia, land and houses were leased and sold, money was lent at interest, and the leading firms employed numerous damgari or commercial agents.

Assyrian law was, in general, derived from Babylonia and much of it was connected with trade. The code of Khammu-rabi (CH) or AMRAPHEL (q.v.) underlay it, and the same system of judicial procedure, with pleading before judges, the hearing of witnesses, and an appeal to the king, prevailed in both countries.

VI. Art.—Unlike Babylonia, Assyria abounded in stone; the brick buildings of Babylonia, accordingly, were replaced by stone, and the painted or tiled walls by sculptured slabs. In the bas-reliefs discovered at Nineveh three periods of artistic progress may be traced. Under Assur-nazir-pal the sculpture is bold and vigorous, but the work is immature and the perspective faulty. From the beginning of the Second Empire to the reign of Esar-haddon the bas-reliefs often remind us of embroidery in stone. Attempts are made to imitate the rich detail and delicate finish of the ivory carvings; the background is filled in with a profusion of subjects, and there is a marked realism in the delineation of them. The third period is that of Assur-bani-pal, when the overcrowding is avoided by once more leaving the background bare, while the animal and vegetable forms are distinguished by a certain softness, if not effeminacy of tone. Sculpture in the round, however, lagged far behind that in relief, and the statuary of Assyria is very inferior to that of Babylonia. It is only the human-headed bulls and winged lions that can be called successful: they were set on either side of a gate to prevent the entrance of evil spirits, and their majestic proportions were calculated to strike the observer with awe (cf the description of the four cherubim in Ezk 1).

In bronze work the Assyrians excelled, much of the work being cast. But in general it was hammered, and the scenes hammered in relief on the bronze gates discovered by Mr. Rassam at Balawât near Nineveh are among the best examples of ancient oriental metallurgy at present known. Gold and silver were also worked into artistic forms; iron was reserved for more utilitarian purposes. The beautiful ivory carvings found at Nineveh were probably the work of foreign artificers, but gems and seal cylinders were engraved by native artists in imitation of those of Babylonia, and the Babylonian art of painting and glazing tiles was also practised. The terra-cotta figures which can be assigned to the Assyrian period are poor. Glass was also manufactured.

VII. Mechanics.—The Assyrians were skilled in the transport of large blocks of stone, whether sculptured or otherwise. They understood the use of the lever, the pulley and the roller, and they had invented various engines of war for demolishing or undermining the walls of a city or for pro-

Bronze Panel from Palace Gate at Balawât.

Second Empire no pains were spared to obtain possession of the Phoen cities and divert their commerce into Assyrian hands. Hence the importance of the capture of the Hittite stronghold, Carchemish, by Sargon in 717 BC, as it commanded the road to Syria and the passage across the Euphrates. Nineveh had at that time already become a great resort of merchants, among whom the Sem Aramaeans were the most numerous. Aram., accordingly, became the language of trade, and then of tecting the assailants. A crystal lens, turned on the lathe, has been found at Kouyunjik: it must have been useful to the scribes, the cuneiform characters inscribed on the tablets being frequently very minute. Water was raised from the river by means of a shaduf.

VIII. Furniture, Pottery and Embroidery.—

The furniture even of the palace was scanty, consisting mainly of couches, chairs, stools, tables, rugs and curtains. The chairs and couches were frequently of an artistic shape, and were provided with feet in the form of the legs of an ox. All kinds of vases, bowls and dishes were made of earthenware, but they were rarely decorated. Clothes, curtains and rugs, on the other hand, were richly dyed and embroidered, and were manufactured from wool and flax, and (in the age of the Second Empire) from cotton. The rug, of which the Pers rug is the modern representative, was a Bab invention.

IX. Language, Literature and Science.—The Assyrian language was Sem, and differed only dialectically from Sem Bab. In course of time, however, differences grew up between the spoken language and the language of lit., which had incorporated many Sumerian words, and retained grammatical terminations that the vernacular had lost, though these differences were never very great.

Assyrian lit., moreover, was mainly derived from Babylonia. Assur-bani-pal employed agents to ransack the libraries of Babylonia and send their contents to Nineveh, where his library was filled with scribes who busied themselves in copying and editing ancient texts. Commentaries were often written upon these, and grammars, vocabularies and interlinear translations were compiled to enable the student to understand the extinct Sumerian, which had long been the Lat of Sem Babylonia. The writing material was clay, upon which the cuneiform characters were impressed with a stylus while it was still moist: the tablet was afterward baked in the sun or (in Assyria) in a kiln. The contents of the library of Nineveh were very various; religion, mythology, law, history, geography, zoology, philology, mathematics, astronomy, astrology and the pseudo-science of omens were all represented in it, as well as poetry and legendary romance. See NINEVEH, LIBRARY OF.

X. Government and Army.—Assyria was a military kingdom which, like the Northern Kingdom of Israel, had established itself by a successful revolt from Babylonia. In contradistinction to Babylonia, which was a theocratic state, the king being subordinate to the priest, the Assyrian king was supreme. Whereas in Babylonia the temple was the chief public building, in Assyria the royal palace dominated everything, the temple being merely a royal chapel attached to the palace. The king, in fact, was the commander of an army, and this army was the Assyrian people. How far the whole male population was liable to conscription is still uncertain; but the fact that the wars of Assur-bani-pal so exhausted the fighting strength of the nation as to render it unable to resist the invaders from the North shows that the majority of the males must have been soldiers. Hence the constant wars partly to occupy the army and prevent revolts, partly for the sake of booty with which to pay it. Hence too, the military revolutions, which, as in the kingdom of Israel, resulted in changes of dynasty and the seizure of the throne by successful generals. The turtannu or commander-in-chief, who took the place of the king when the latter was unable or unwilling to lead his forces, ranked next to the sovereign. From the reign of Tiglath-pileser IV onward, however, the autocracy was tempered by a centralized bureaucracy, and in the provinces a civil governor was appointed by the side of the military commander. Among the high officials at court were the rab-saki or "vizier," and the rab-sa-risi or "controller," the rabshāris (RAB-SARIS [q.v.]) of the OT.

The army consisted of cavalry, infantry, bowmen and slingers, as well as of a corps of charioteers.

After the rise of the Second Empire the cavalry were increased at the expense of the chariotry, and were provided with saddles and boots, while the unarmed groom who had run by the side of the horse became a mounted archer. Sennacherib further clothed the horseman in a coat of mail. The infantry were about ten times as numerous as the cavalry, and under Sargon were divided into bowmen and spearmen, the bowmen again being subdivided into heavy-armed and light-armed, the latter being apparently of foreign origin. Sennacherib introduced a corps of slingers, clad in helmet and cuirass, leather drawers and boots. He also deprived the heavy-armed bowmen of the long robes they used to wear, and established a body of pioneers with double-headed axes, helmets and buskins. Shields were also worn by all classes of soldiers, and the army carried with it standards, tents, battering-rams and baggage-carts. The royal sleeping-tent was accompanied by tents for cooking and dining. No pains, in fact, were spared to make the army both in equipment and discipline an irresistible engine of war. The terror it excited in western Asia is therefore easily intelligible (Isa 10 5-14; Nah 2 11-13; 3 1-4).

XI. Religion.—The state religion of Assyria was derived from BABYLONIA (q.v.) and in its main outlines is Bab. But it differed from the religion of Babylonia in two important respects: (1) the king, and not the high priest, was supreme, and (2) at the head of it was the national god Asur or Assur, whose high priest and representative was the king. Asur was originally Asir, "the leader" in war, who is accordingly depicted as a warrior-god armed with a bow and who in the age when solar worship became general in Babylonia was identified with the sun-god. But the similarity of the name caused him to be also identified with the city of Asur, where he was worshipped, at a time when the cities of northern Babylonia came to be deified, probably under Hittite influence. Later still, the scribes explained his name as a corruption of that of the primeval cosmogonic deity An-sar, the upper firmament, which in the neo-Bab age was pronounced Assôr. The combination of the attributes of the warrior-god, who was the peculiar god of the commander of the army, with the deified city to which the army belonged, caused Assur to become the national deity of a military nation in a way of which no Bab divinity was capable. The army were "the troops of Assur," the enemies were "the enemies of Assur" who required that they should acknowledge his supremacy or be destroyed. Assur was not only supreme over the other gods, he was also, in fact, unlike them, without father or wife. Originally, it is true, his feminine counterpart, Asirtu, the ASHERAH (q.v.) of the OT, had stood at his side, and later literary pedants endeavored to find a wife for him in Belit, "the Lady," or Istar, or some other Bab goddess, but the attempts remained purely literary. When Nineveh took the place of Assur as the capital of the kingdom, Istar, around whose sanctuary Nineveh had grown up, began to share with him some of the honor of worship, though her position continued to be secondary to the end. This was also the case with the war-god Nin-ip, called Mas in Assyria, whose cult was specially patronized by the Assyrian kings. See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF.

XII. Excavations.—Rich, who had first visited Mossul in 1811, examined the mounds opposite in 1820 and concluded that they represented the site of Nineveh. The few antiquities he discovered were contained in a single case in the British Museum, but the results of his researches were not published until 1836. In 1843–45 the Frenchman Botta disinterred the palace of Sargon at Khorsabad, 15 miles N. of Nineveh, while at Nimrud (Calah) and Kouyunjik (Nineveh) Layard (1845–51) brought to light the ruins of the great Assyrian palaces and the library of Assur-bani-pal. His work was continued by Rassam (1851–54). Nothing more was done until 1873–75 when George Smith resumed excavations on the site of Assur-bani-pal's library; this was followed in 1877–79 by the excavations of Rassam, who discovered among other things the bronze gates of Balawât. At present a German expedition under Andrae is working at Kala'at Shergat (Assur) where the English excavators had already found the cylinder-inscription of Tiglath-pileser I (see SHERGAT).

XIII. Chronology.—The Assyrians reckoned time by means of limmi, certain officials appointed every New Year's day, after whom their year of office was named. The lists of limmi or "Eponyms" which have come down to us form the basis of Assyrian chronology. Portions of a "synchronous" history of Assyria and Babylonia have also been discovered, as well as fragments of two "Babylonian Chronicles," written from a Bab point of view. The "Eponym" lists carry back an exact dating of time to the beginning of the 10th cent. BC. Before that period Sennacherib states that Tiglath-pileser I reigned 418 years before himself. Tiglath-pileser, moreover, tells us that Samas-Ramman son of Isme-Dagon had built a temple at Assur 641 years earlier, while Shalmaneser I places Samas-Ramman 580 years before his own reign and Erisu 159 years before Samas-Ramman, though Esar-haddon gives the dates differently. Apart from the native documents, the only trustworthy sources for the chronology (as for the history) of Assyria are the OT records. In return the "Eponym" lists have enabled us to correct the chronology of the Books of Kings (q.v.).

XIV. History.—Assyrian history begins with the high priests (patesis) of Assur. The earliest known to us are Auspia and Kikia,

1. Early Period who bear Mitannian names. The early Sem rulers, however, were subject to Babylonia, and under Khammurabi (AMRAPHEL) Assyria was still a Bab province. According to Esar-haddon the kingdom was founded by Bel-bani son of Adasi, who first made himself independent; Hadad-nirari, however, ascribes its foundation to Zuli. Assyrian merchants and soldiers had already made their way as far as Cappadocia, from whence copper and silver were brought to Assyria, and an Assyrian colony was established at Kara Eyuk near Kaisariyeh, where the Assyrian mode of reckoning time by means of limmi was in use. In the age of Am Tab (1400 BC) Assur-uballid was king of Assyria. He corresponded with the Egypt Pharaoh and married his daughter to the Bab king, thereby providing for himself a pretext for interfering in the affairs of Babylonia. The result was that his son-in-law was murdered, and Assur-uballid sent troops to Babylonia who put the murderers to death and placed the grandson of the Assyrian king on the Bab throne. Babylonia had fallen into decay and been forced to protect herself from the rising power of Assyria by forming an alliance with Mitanni (Mesopotamia) and Egypt, and subsequently, when Mitanni had been absorbed by the Hittites, by practically becoming dependent on the Hittite king. Shalmaneser I (1300 BC), accordingly, devoted himself to crippling the Hittite power and cutting it off from communication with Babylonia. Campaign after campaign was undertaken against the Syrian and more eastern provinces of the Hittite empire, Malatiyeh was destroyed, and Carchemish threatened. Shalmaneser's son and successor Tukulti-Mas entered into the fruits of his father's labors. The Hittites had been rendered powerless by an invasion of the northern barbarians, and the Assyrian king was thus left free to crush Babylonia. Babylon was taken by storm, and for seven years Tukulti-Mas was master of all the lands watered by the Tigris and Euphrates. The image of Merodach was carried to Assur as a sign that the scepter had passed from Babylon to the parvenu Assyria. A successful revolt, however, finally drove the Assyrian conqueror back to his own country, and when he was murdered soon afterward by his own son, the Babylonians saw in the deed a punishment inflicted by the god of Babylon.

A few years later the Assyrian king Bel-kudur-uzur lost his life in battle against the Babylonians, and a new dynasty appears to have mounted the Assyrian throne. About 1120 BC the Assyrian king was Tiglath-pileser I, whose successful wars extended the Assyrian empire as far westward as Cappadocia. In one of his campaigns he made his way to the Mediterranean, and received presents from the king of Egypt, which included a crocodile. At Assur he planted a botanical garden stocked with trees from the conquered provinces. After his death the Assyrian power declined; Pitru (Pethor, Nu 22 5) fell into the hands of the Aramaeans and the road to the Mediterranean was blocked. A revival came under Assur-nazir-pal III (884–860 BC) who rebuilt CALAH (q.v.) and established the seat of the government at Nineveh, where he erected a palace. Various campaigns were carried on in the direction of Armenia and Comagene, the brutalities executed upon the enemy being described in detail by their conqueror. He then turned westward, and after receiving homage from the Hittite king of Carchemish, laid the Phoenicians under tribute. The road to the West was thus again secured for the merchants of Assyria. Assurnazir-pal was succeeded by his son Shalmaneser II (859-825 BC), who, instead of contenting himself, like his father, with mere raids for the sake of booty, endeavored to organize and administer the countries which his armies had subdued. The famous bronze gates of Balawât were erected by him in commemoration of his victories. In his reign the Israelites and Syrians of Damascus first came into direct relation with the Assyrians. In 854 BC

he attacked Hamath and at Qarqar defeated an army which included 1,200 chariots, 1,200 cavalry and 20,000 infantry from Ben-hadad of Damascus, 2,000 chariots, and 10,000 infantry from "Ahab of Israel," besides considerable contingents from Ammon, Arvad, Arabia and elsewhere. In 842 BC Shalmaneser penetrated to Damascus where Hazael, the successor of Ben-hadad, who had already been defeated in the open field, was closely besieged. The surrounding country was ravaged, and "Jehu son of Omri" hastened to offer tribute to the conqueror. The scene is represented on the Black Obelisk found at Nimrud and now in the British Museum. Shalmaneser's campaigns were not confined to the West. He overran Armenia, where the kingdom of Van had just been established, made his way to Tarsus in Cilicia, took possession of the mines of silver, salt and alabaster in the Taurus mountains among the Tabal or Tubal, and obliged the Bab king to acknowledge his supremacy. In his later days, when too old to take the field himself, his armies were led by the turtannu or commander-in-chief, and a rebellion, headed by his son Assur-danin-pal (Sardanapalus) broke out at home, where Nineveh and Assur were jealous of the preference shown for Calah. Nineveh, however, was captured and the revolt suppressed after two years' duration by another son, Samas-Ramman IV, who shortly afterward, on his father's death, succeeded to the throne (824-812 BC). His chief campaigns were directed against Media. His son Hadad-nirari III (811-783 BC) was the next king, whose mother was Sammu-ramat (Semiramis). He claims to have reduced to subjection the whole of Syria, including Phoenicia, Edom and Philistia, and to have taken Mari'a, king of Damascus, prisoner in his capital city. After this, however, Assyria once more fell into a state of decay, from which it was delivered by the successful revolt of a military officer Pulu (Pul), who put an end to the old line of kings and took the name of Tiglath-pileser IV (745-727 BC).

Tiglath-pileser founded the second Assyrian empire, and made Assyria the dominant power in western Asia. The army was reorganized and made irresistible, and a new administrative system was introduced, the empire being centralized at Nineveh and governed by a bureaucracy at the head of which was the king. Tiglath-pileser's policy was twofold: to weld western Asia into a single empire, held together by military force and fiscal laws, and to secure the trade of the world for the merchants of Nineveh. These objects were steadily kept in view throughout the reigns of Tiglath-pileser and his successors. For the history of his reign, see TIGLATH-PILESER. In 738 BC Tiglath-pileser put an end to the independent existence of the kingdom of Hamath, Menahem of Samaria becoming his tributary, and in 733 BC he commenced a campaign against Rezin of Damascus which ended in the fall of Damascus, the city being placed under an Assyrian governor. At the same time the land of Naphtali was annexed to Assyria, and Yahu-khazi (Ahaz) of Judah became an Assyrian vassal, while in 731 BC, after the murder of Pekah, Hoshea was appointed king of Israel (cf 2 K 15-17). In 728 BC Tiglath-pileser was solemnly crowned at Babylon and the following year he died. His successor was another military adventurer, Shalmaneser IV (727-722 BC), whose original name was Ululâ. While engaged in the siege of Samaria Shalmaneser died or was murdered, and the throne was seized by another general who took the name of Sargon (722-705 BC). Sargon, for whose history see SARGON, captured Samaria in 722 BC, carrying 27,290 of its inhabitants into captivity. A large part of his reign was spent in combating a great confederation of the northern nations (Armenia, Mannâ, etc) against Assyria. Carchemish, the Hittite capital, was captured in 717 BC, a revolt of the states in southern Pal was suppressed in 711 BC and Merodach-Baladan, the Chaldaean, who had possessed himself of Babylonia in 722 BC, was driven back to the marshlands at the head of the Pers Gulf. In 705 BC Sargon was murdered, and succeeded by his son SENNACHERIB (q.v.). Sennacherib (705-681 BC) had neither the military skill nor the administrative abilities of his father. His campaign against Hezekiah of Judah in 701 BC was a failure; so, also, was his policy in Babylonia which was in a constant state of revolt against his rule, and which ended in his razing the sacred city of Babylon to the ground in 689 BC. Nine years previously his troops had been called upon to suppress a revolt in Cilicia, where a battle was fought with the Greeks.

His son Esar-haddon, who succeeded him (681-669 BC) after his murder by two other sons on the 20th Tebet (cf 2 K 19 37), was as distinguished a general and administrator as his father had been the reverse. For his history see ESAR-HADDON. Under him the Second Empire reached the acme of its power and prosperity. Babylon was rebuilt and made the second capital of the empire, Pal became an obedient province, and Egypt was conquered (674 and

671 BC), while an invasion of the Cimmerians (Gomer) was repelled, and campaigns were made into the heart of both Media and Arabia. Esar-haddon died while on his way to repress a revolt in Egypt, and his son Assur-bani-pal succeeded him in the empire (669-626 BC), while another son Samas-sum-ukin was appointed viceroy of Babylonia. Assur-bani-pal was a munificent patron of learning, and the library of Nineveh owed most of its treasures to him, but extravagant luxury had now invaded the court, and the king conducted his wars through his generals, while he himself remained at home. The great palace at Kouyunjik (Nineveh) was built by him. Egypt demanded his first attention. Tirhakah the Ethiopian who had headed its revolt was driven back to his own country, and for a time there was peace. Then under Tandamane, Tirhakah's successor, Egypt revolted again. This time the Assyrian punishment was merciless. Thebes—"No-amon" (Nah 3 8)—was destroyed, its booty carried away and two obelisks transported to Nineveh as trophies of victory. Meanwhile Tyre, which had rebelled, was forced to sue for peace, and ambassadors arrived from Gyges of Lydia asking for help against the Cimmerians. Elam still remained independent and endeavored to stir up disaffection in Babylonia. Against his will, therefore, Assur-bani-pal was obliged to interfere in the internal affairs of that country, with the result that the Elamites were finally overthrown in a battle on the Eulaeus beneath the walls of Susa, and the conquered land divided between two vassal kings. Then suddenly a revolt broke out throughout the greater part of the Assyrian empire, headed by Assur-bani-pal's brother, the viceroy of Babylonia. For a time the issue was doubtful. Egypt recovered its independence under Psammetichus, the founder of the XXVIth Dynasty (660 BC) who had received help from Lydia, but Babylonia was reconquered and Babylon after a long siege was starved out, Samas-sum-ukin burning himself in the ruins of his palace. Elam remained to be dealt with, and an Assyrian army made its way to Susa, which was leveled to the ground, the shrines of its gods profaned and the bones of its ancient kings torn from their graves. Then came the turn of northern Arabia, where the rebel sheikhs were compelled to submit. But the struggle had exhausted Assyria; its exchequer was empty, and its fighting population killed. When the Cimmerians descended upon the empire shortly afterward, it was no longer in a condition to resist them. Under Assur-etil-ilāni, the son and successor of Assur-bani-pal, Calah was taken and sacked, and two reigns later, Sin-sar-iskun, the last king of Assyria, fell fighting against the Scythians (606 BC). Nineveh was utterly destroyed, never again to be inhabited, and northern Babylonia passed into the hands of Nabopolassar, the viceroy of Babylon, who had joined the northern invaders. Assur, the old capital of the country, was still standing in the age of Cyrus, but it had become a small provincial town; as for Nineveh and Calah, their very sites were forgotten.

ASSYRIANS, a-sir'i-ans (אַשּׁוּרִי, 'ashshūr): The inhabitants of Assyria. In Heb the name of the people is the same as that of the country. See ASSYRIA.

ASTAD, as'tad: The reading of the Eng. versions of 1 Esd 5 13 for the name which appears as Azgad in Ezr 2 12 and Neh 7 17. In the different Gr copies of 1 Esd the name varies. See AZGAD; ASTATH.

ASTAROTH, as'ta-roth. See ASHTAROTH.

ASTARTE, as-tār'tē, ASTORETH. See ASHTAROTH.

ASTATH, as'tath (Ἀσθάθ, Astáth): The form given in 1 Esd 8 38 to the name which in Ezr 8 12 appears as Azgad. See AZGAD.

ASTONISHED, as-ton'isht, ASTONIED, as-ton'id (שָׁמֵמ, shāmēm, "astonished," the root idea being "silent," i.e. struck dumb with amazement; ἐκπλήσσομαι, ekplēssomai, "to be struck with astonishment," as if by a blow or a shock; ἐξίστημι, existēmi, "to amaze," "to throw into wonderment"; θαμβέομαι, thambéomai, "to astonish" to the point of fright): The state of being surprised, startled, stunned by some exceptional wonder, some overwhelming event or miracle, as e.g. Nebuchadnezzar's amazement at the miracle in the burning fiery furnace (Dnl 3 24) (וַיִּהְיֶה, 'wāh, "astonished"); of the passer-by at the desolation of Babylon (Jer 50 13). The personality, teaching and works of Jesus were so wonderful, Divine, supernatural, as to awaken emotions of surprise and awe never before known in the presence of man. The people "were astonished out of measure" at His doctrine (Mk 10 26 AV); "astonished with a great astonishment" at His raising the dead (Mk 5 42 AV). The gift of the Holy Ghost to the Gentiles was in like manner a source of astonishment to those Jews who believed through the power of Peter's preaching (Acts 10 45 AV). The miracle of regeneration today, which renews and transforms debased and fallen men into saints, makes the same impression on an observing world.

ASTONISHMENT, as-ton'ish-ment: Amazement; mental surprise, excitement, wonder; often the cause of the startled emotion, as in Dt 28 37: "Thou shalt become an astonishment." The chosen people, visited with calamities for idolatry would become a source of amazement to all nations (Jer 25 9.11.18); Solomon's lofty and beautiful temple would be "an astonishment" (2 Ch 7 21 AV). For original terms and fuller study see ASTONISHED.

ASTRAY, a-strā' (תָּרַח, tār'āh, "to wander," "to err"; πλανόμαι, plandōmai, "to go astray," each carrying the idea of being lost): With one exception (Ex 23 4 "his ass going astray") used metaphorically of moral wandering, going astray in paths of error and sin, like "sheep going astray" (1 Pet 2 25 AV; Isa 53 6; Ps 119 176). This wandering may be due (1) to inherent evil (Ps 58 3); (2) to false shepherds (Jer 50 6); contrast the beautiful and classic passage, Mt 18 12.13, the Son of man (ver 12) seeketh that which is gone astray. No word more vividly portrays sin as a straying, a separation from God. To be morally "astray" is to be "lost."

LITERATURE

I. The Desire to Forecast the Future.—The desire to penetrate the future and influence its events has shown itself in all lands and ages. But it is clear that a knowledge of the future does not lie within the scope of man's natural powers; "divination" therefore has always been an attempt to gain the help of beings possessing knowledge and power transcending those of man. The answer of the Chaldeans to King Nebuchadnezzar when he demanded that they should tell his dream was a reasonable one: "There is not a man upon the earth that can show the king's matter: . . . there is no other that can show it before the king, except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh" (Dnl 2 10.11). "Divination," therefore, in all its forms is but an aspect of polytheism.

It was for the twofold reason that the arts of divination were abominable in themselves, and gave to their votaries no knowledge of the will of God, that such arts were forbidden in the Law (Dt 18 9-15). Israel was to be perfect with God and He would reveal to them His will perfectly through that prophet like unto Moses whom He would send. Keil and Delitzsch in commenting on this passage well remark: "Moses groups together all the words which the language contained for the different modes of exploring the future and discovering the will of God, for the purpose of forbidding every description of soothsaying, and places the prohibition of Moloch-worship at the head, to show the inward connection between soothsaying and idolatry, possibly because februation, or passing children through the fire in the worship of Moloch, was more intimately connected with soothsaying and magic than any other description of idolatry" (Commentary on the Pentateuch, III, 393).

1. Methods of Soothsaying augury" (m'ōnēn) is of uncertain etymology, but the rabbins connect it with 'ayin, "an eye"; literally therefore one who ogle, or who bewitches with the evil eye. "An enchanter" (m'naḥēsh), sometimes supposed to be a snake-charmer, is probably one who fascinates like a snake; in other words a mesmerist or hypnotist. The word occurs in connection with Joseph's divining-cup, and such cups were employed both in Babylon and Egypt, and their use was akin to the more modern crystal-gazing, the hypnotic state being induced by prolonged staring, as in the fascination ascribed to serpents. On this account, snakes were sometimes figured upon such cups. Thus in Talm we read: "If one finds vessels with delineations of the sun, the moon, or of a serpent upon them, let him cast them into the salt sea" ('Abhōdhāh-Zārāh, fol 42, col. 2). "A sorcerer" (m'khashshēph) is one who mutters incantations or speaks in ventriloquial whispers, as if under the influence of the spirits of the dead. "A charmer" (hōbhēr ḥebher), is one who inflicts a spell by weaving magical knots. "A consulter with a familiar spirit" ('ōbh), denotes one who is possessed of a python or soothsaying demon. Such were the woman of Endor whom Saul consulted on the eve of the battle of Gilboa (1 S 28) and the pythoness of Philippi out of whom St. Paul cast the spirit (Acts 16 16-18). The word ('ōbh) means "bottle" and either indicates that the medium was the receptacle of the spirit or is a relic of the old tradition that genii (*jinn*s) might be enslaved and imprisoned in bottles by means of magical incantations.

"A wizard" (yidh'ōnē) means a wise man, "a knowing one." The word in OT is always used in connection with 'ōbh, and denotes a man who could interpret the ravings of the medium. "A necromancer" (dōrēsh 'el ha-mēlḥim) is one who calls up the spirits of the dead and has intercourse with them. "Consulting the teraphim" (Ezk 21 21) may have been a form of consulting the dead, if, as is probable, the teraphim were ancestral images, raised by superstition to the rank of household gods. The manner of consultation we do not know; but as an illustration of the use of the image of a dead person, we may remember that a modern medium will often ask for a portrait of a deceased relative for the alleged purpose of entering into communication with the departed spirit.

It will be seen that these forms of soothsaying are allied to the arts which in modern times bear the names of hypnotism and mediumship. They are more briefly referred to in Isa 8 19, "When they shall say unto you, Seek unto them that have familiar spirits and unto the wizards, that chirp and that mutter: should not a people seek unto their God? on behalf of the living should they seek unto the dead?" Here again mediumship and spiritism are connected with the ventriloquial whispers and mutterings, which are supposed to be characteristic of the utterances of the dead.

But the first term in the catalogue, "one that useth divination" (kešem) is of wider application.

It signifies a "divider" and refers to the 2. Divination practice which men have followed in an infinite variety of ways for trying to get light upon the future by resorting to what seems to them the arbitrament of chance. The results of a battle and of the fall of dice are alike unknown beforehand. But the second can be tested, and men assume that the result of the first will correspond to the second. Any chance will serve; the shuffling of a pack of cards; the flight of birds; the arrangement of dregs in a cup; nothing is too trivial for the purpose. The allotment of a particular interpretation to a particular sign was of course purely arbitrary, but the method could be applied in an infinite number of ways, every one of which could be worked out to an extent only limited by the limits of the misdirected ingenuity of man. Two such forms of "divination," that is of "dividing," are mentioned by Ezekiel in his description of the king of Babylon: "The king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination [kešem]: he shook the arrows to and fro, he consulted the teraphim, he looked in the liver" (Ezk 21 21). The arrows were either marked to represent certain courses of action, and one was drawn out or shaken out, or else they were thrown promiscuously up into the air, and the augury was deduced from the way in which they fell.

"Looking in the liver" is one of the most venerable forms of divination. Here again it was a question of "division." Each of the various

3. "Looking in the Liver" parts of the liver, its lobes, the gall bladder, the ducts and so forth, had a special significance allotted to it, the theory, apparently, being that the god to whom the animal was sacrificed revealed his will by the way in which he molded the organ which was supposed to be the seat of the victim's life.

It will be noted that no explicit mention is made of astrology in this catalogue of the modes of soothsaying. But astrology was, as will be shown, closely connected with Moloch-worship, and was most directly a form of "divination," that is of division. Morris Jastrow the Younger indeed considers that astrology rose from hepatoscopy, and points out that the common designation for "planet" amongst the Babylonians is a compound ideograph, the two elements of which signify "sheep" and "dead." He considers that the sacrificial sheep was offered to the deity specially for the purpose of securing an omen. Hence when the planets were used as omens, this name of "slain sheep" was naturally applied to them, even as "augury," divination by the flight of birds, came to represent amongst the Romans all kinds of divination. "On the famous bronze model of a liver found near Piacenza and which dating from about the 3d cent. BC was used as an object-lesson for instruction in hepatoscopy, precisely as the clay model of a liver dating from the Hammurabi period was used in a Bab temple school, we find the edge of the liver divided into sixteen regions with names of the deities inhabiting them corresponding to divisions of the heavens in which the gods have their seats, while on the reverse side there is a line dividing the liver into 'day' and 'night.' Professor Korte, in a study of this remarkable object, summing up the results of many years of research, explains this by showing that the liver was regarded as a microcosm reflecting the macrocosm, or, in other words, the liver of the sacrificial animal from being originally a reflection of the soul or mind of the god to whom the animal was offered, was brought into connection with the observation of the heavenly bodies revealing the intention of the gods acting in concert" (Morris Jastrow, Jr., "Hepatoscopy and Astrology in Babylonia and Assyria," in Proc. Amer. Phil. Soc., 665-66).

Three well-marked classes of astrology, that is to say of divination by the heavenly bodies, are mentioned in Isa 47 13, as being practised in Babylon. "Let now the astrologers, the star-gazers, the monthly prognosticators, stand up, and save thee."

The astrologers are the "dividers of the heavens" (hōbhārē shāmāyīm); that is to say the significance of any stellar conjunction was made to depend upon the division of the heavens in which it occurred. The earliest of such divisions appears to have been

4. Astrologers into the four quarters, N., S., E., W., and astrological tablets of this character have been discovered in considerable numbers. Thus tablet W.A.I. III, 56, 1, gives a table of eclipses for each day of the month Tammuz up to the middle of the month, and the significance of the eclipse is connected with the quarter in which it was seen. On the first day the eclipse is associated with the S., on the second with the N., on the third with the E., and on the fourth with the W. (Sayce, Astronomy and Astrology of the Babylonians, 222). Tablets of this description are very instructive since they prove that those who drew up such lists of omens had not even a rudimentary knowledge of astronomy. For the Bab months were intended to be natural months, yet at this time it was not realized that an eclipse of the sun could only take place when the moon was invisible, that is to say about the 28th or 29th day of the month, if the calendar was correct. Further, it was not realized that neither sun nor moon can ever be in the N. in the latitude of Babylon. Such tables of omens then were not derived, as has sometimes been supposed, from a striking event having occurred near the time of an observed eclipse, but they must have been drawn up on an entirely arbitrary plan.

The same principle of "division" was applied to the moon itself for the purpose of drawing omens from its eclipses. Thus in R. C. Thompson's Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nineveh and Babylon we read in No. 268, "The omens of all lands. The right of the moon is Akkad, the left Elam, the top Aharru, the bottom Subartu."

The constellations of the zodiac also had omens allotted to them in a similar manner.

The astrologers mentioned in the Book of Dnl (ashshāphīm) were not "dividers of the heavens," but mutterers of incantations. The star-gazers or seers of the stars or constellations (hōzim ba-kōkhābīm) may be illustrated from two of Thompson's Reports. No. 216, "Saturn has appeared in Leo. When Leo is obscured, for three years lions and jackals . . . and kill men"; and No. 239, "When Mars (apin) approaches Scorpio the prince will die by a scorpion's sting and his son after him will take the throne." It may be remarked that as the planet Saturn takes three years to pass through the constellation Leo, the ravages of lions are predicted to last for that time.

At a later date we find a complete system of astrology based upon the constellations of the zodiac which happen to be rising at the moment when the stars were consulted. Examples of this form of divination are found in the works of Zeuchros of Babylon, who flourished about the beginning of our era. By his day the system had received a considerable development. Twelve signs did not give much scope for prediction, so each sign had been divided into three equal portions or "decans"; each decan therefore corresponding nearly to the part of the ecliptic which the sun would pass through in a decade or "week" of 10 days of the Egyptians. A yet further complexity was brought about by associating each one of the 36 decans with one of the 36 extra-zodiacal constellations, and a further variety was obtained by associating each zodiacal constellation with its sunanatēllon, or constellation rising with it; that is, at the same time; or with its paranatēllon, or constellation rising beside it; that is, a constellation on the same meridian. At what time these particular forms of augury by the constellations came into use we do not know, but the division into the decans is distinctly alluded to in the 5th tablet of the Bab Creation Epic: "4. For the twelve months he [Marduk] fixed three stars."

The monthly prognosticators were the men who knew the omens of the new moon (mōdhī'im l'-hōdh-āshīm). At one time the error of the calendar was made the basis of prediction. This is seen in the great astrological work based on the omens drawn up for Sargon of Agadé, and entitled from its opening phrase Enuma anu Bel, "When the heaven god Bel" (the "Illumination of Bel"), as, for instance, "The moon as on the 1st day is seen in its appearance on the 27th day; evil is fixed for the land of Elam"; and "The moon as on the 1st day is seen on the 28th day: evil is fixed for the land of the Ahurru." Other omens were drawn from the position of the horns of the new moon when first seen; the right horn being assigned to the king and the left to his enemies, as in Thompson's Reports, No. 25: "When at the moon's appearance its right horn is high [lit. "long"] and its left horn is low [lit. "short"] the king's hand will conquer land other than this." The "monthly prognosticators" had not learned that the right-hand horn is always the higher and that the amount of its elevation depends on the time of the year, or they kept the knowledge to themselves.

II. Worship of the Heavenly Bodies.—As we should naturally expect, the earliest astrological tablets relate chiefly to omens dependent upon the two great lights, the sun and moon. There is no evidence at present available to fix the date when the planets were first recognized as distinct from the fixed stars. Probably this discovery was intimately connected with the formation of the constellations; it cannot have been long delayed after it. Certainly planet-worship, and as connected with it, planetary divination, prevailed in the Euphrates valley at a very early period.

One planet is certainly mentioned in OT, and we may safely infer that the other four were known, since this particular planet is the

1. Chiun least conspicuous both in brightness and in motion, and was therefore probably the last to be discovered. The reference to Saturn occurs in Am 5 25,26: "Did ye bring unto me sacrifices and offerings in the wilderness forty years, O house of Israel? Yea, ye have borne the tabernacle of your king [AV Moloch] and the shrine of [AV Chiun] your images, the star of your god, which ye made to yourselves." This passage was quoted from LXX by St. Stephen in his defence, "And they made a calf in those days, and brought a sacrifice unto the idol, and rejoiced in the works of their hands. But God turned, and gave them up to serve the host of heaven; as it is written in the book of the prophets,

"Did ye offer unto me slain beasts and sacrifices
Forty years in the wilderness, O house of Israel?
And ye took up the tabernacle of Moloch,
And the star of the god Rephan,
The figures which ye made to worship them"
(Acts 7 41-43).

The difference between the names Chiun and Rephan, is due either to Rephan being a local Egypt name for the planet Saturn, and therefore used by the LXX as its equivalent, or to an actual error of transcription in the text from which they were translating: the initial of the word being taken as rēsh when it should have been kāph, r instead of k. The word should therefore be transliterated Kaiwan, which was the name of the planet Saturn amongst the ancient Arabs and Syrians, while kaimanu, "constant" or "regular," was its name with the Assyrians. The ERV in Am 5 26 adopts the reading of the AVm, "Siccuth your king," Moloch meaning king; but the authority of the LXX and the parallelism of the text and its general line of thought support the reading given by some of the ancient versions and followed by the AV.

The difficulty of the passage is that both Amos and St. Stephen appear to represent the worship of

2. Saturn the golden calf as identical with the worship of Moloch and of the planet or Moloch Saturn; yet though Kaiwan is only mentioned here, the nature of the reference would imply that this deity was one familiar both to speaker and hearers. The difficulty vanishes at once, if the plain statement of St. Stephen be accepted, that when God permitted Israel to "go after the stubbornness of their heart, that they might walk in their own counsels" (Ps 81 12) He "gave them up to serve the host of heaven." The worship of the golden calf was star worship; it was the solar bull, the constellation Taurus, in which the sun was at the time of the spring equinox, that was thus represented. The golden calf was therefore analogous to the familiar symbol of the Mithraic cult, the bull slain by Mithra, Sol Invictus, if indeed the latter did not take its origin from this apostasy of Israel. See CALF, GOLDEN.

And Moloch the king, the idol of the Ammonites and Phoenicians, was intimately connected both with the solar bull and the planet Saturn. According to the rabbins, his statue was of brass, with a human body but the head of an ox. On the Carthaginian worship of Moloch or Saturn, Diodorus (book xx, ch i) writes: "Among the Carthaginians there was a brazen statue of Saturn putting forth the palms of his hands bending in such a manner toward the earth, as that the boy who was laid upon them, in order to be sacrificed, should slip off, and so fall down headlong into a deep fiery furnace. Hence it is probable that Euripides took what he fabulously relates concerning the sacrifice in Taurus, where he introduces Iphigenia asking Orestes this question: 'But what sepulchre will me dead receive, shall the gulf of sacred fire me have?' The ancient fable likewise that is common among all the Grecians, that Saturn devoured his own children, seems to be confirmed by this law among the Carthaginians." The parallelism of the text therefore is very complete. The Israelites professed to be carrying the tabernacle of Jeh upon which rested the Shekinah glory; but in spirit they were carrying the tabernacle of the cruelest and most malignant of all the deities of the heathen, and the light in which they were rejoicing was the star of the planet assigned to that deity.

Moloch then was the sun as king, and especially the sun as he entered upon what might be considered his peculiar kingdom, the zodiac from Taurus to Serpens and Scorpio, the period of the six summer months. The connection of the sun with Saturn may seem to us somewhat forced, but we have the most direct testimony that such a connection was believed in by the Babylonians. In Thompson's Reports, obv. of No. 176 reads: "When the sun stands in the place of the moon, the king of the land will be secure on his throne. When the sun stands above or below the moon, the foundation of the throne will be secure." The "sun" in this inscription clearly cannot be the actual sun, and it is explained on the reverse as being "the star of the sun," the planet Saturn. No. 176 rev. reads: "Last night Saturn drew near to the moon. Saturn is the star of the sun. This is the interpretation: it is lucky for the king. The sun is the king's star." The connection between the sun and Saturn probably arose from both being taken as symbols of Time. The return of the sun to the beginning of the zodiac marked the completion of the year. Saturn, the slowest moving of all the heavenly bodies, accomplished its revolution through the signs of the zodiac in about 30 years, a complete generation of men. Saturn therefore was in a peculiar sense the symbol of Time, and because of Time, of Destiny.

The connection between the worship of the golden calves, of the heavenly host and of Moloch, and of these with divination and en-

3. Mazzā- chantments, is brought out very lōth clearly in the judgment which the writer of the Book of K pronounces upon the apostate ten tribes: "They forsook all the commandments of Jehovah their God, and made them molten images, even two calves, and made an Asherah, and worshipped all the host of heaven, and served Baal. And they caused their sons and their daughters to pass through the fire, and used divination and enchantments" (2 K 17 16,17). The sin of apostate Judah was akin to the sin of apostate Israel. In the reformation of Josiah, he put down the idolatrous priests that "burned incense unto Baal, to the sun, and to the moon, and to the planets [mazzālōth], and to all the host of heaven" (2 K 23 5). He also destroyed the 'āshērāh and he "defiled Topheth . . . that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech" (ver 10). "Moreover them that had familiar spirits, and the wizards, and the teraphim, and the idols, and all the abominations that were seen in the land of Judah and in Jerus, did Josiah put away" (ver 24). The idolatries to which the Israelites of both kingdoms were especially prone were those of the heavenly bodies, and inextricably woven with them was the passion for employing those heavenly bodies as omens, and in consequence for every kind of divination and witchcraft.

The word tr⁴ "planets" in 2 K 23 5 is mazzālōth, closely akin to the mazzārōth of Job 38 32. This rendering probably reproduces correctly the meaning of the original. R. C. Thompson in his introduction to the Reports writes (xxvii): "The places where the gods stood in the zodiac were called manzālī, a word which means literally 'stations,' and we are probably right in assuming that it is the equivalent of the mazzālōth mentioned in 2 K 23 5. The use of the word in late Heb is, however, somewhat more vague, for mazzāl, though literally meaning a constellation of the zodiac, is also applied to any or every star, and in the B'rē'shīth Rabbā', ex, it is said 'One mazzāl completeth its circuit in thirty days, another completeth it in thirty years.'" The two bodies referred to are evidently the moon with its lunation of about 30 days, and Saturn with its revolution of about 30 years; these being the two planets with the shortest and longest periods respectively. By a natural metonymy, mazzālōth, the complete circuit of the zodiac, came also to mean mazzālōth, the bodies that performed that circuit, just as in the present day we speak of a railway, which means literally the "permanent way," when we really mean the trains that travel upon it.

The references in OT to the planets other than Saturn are not so clear. In Isa 65 11 two deities are apparently referred to: "Ye that forsake Jehovah, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for Fortune [Gad], and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny [Meni]; I will destine you to the sword, and ye shall all bow down to the slaughter." It is clear that Gad and Meni are the titles of two closely associated deities, and Gesenius identifies them with Jupiter and Venus, the Greater and Lesser Good Fortunes of the astrologers. But as I have suggested in the Astronomy of the Bible (133, 217), if any of the heavenly bodies are here intended (which cannot as yet be considered certain), it is more probable that they are the two beautiful star-clusters that stand on the head and the shoulder of the Bull at the old commencement of the zodiac, as if they marked the gateway of the year—the Hyades and Pleiades. Both groups were considered traditionally as composed of seven stars; and the two names Gadh (the Hyades) and M'nī (the Pleiades) taken together give the meaning of the "Fortunate Number," i.e. seven. The lectisternia—the spreading the table and mingling the wine to Gadh and M'nī—at the beginning of the year to secure good fortune throughout its course, were therefore held about the time of the Passover, as if in parody, if indeed they were not a desecration of it: heathen rites added to one of the most solemn services of Jeh.

The planet Venus is more distinctly referred to in Isa 14 12: "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning!" (AV).

5. Venus The word here rendered Lucifer, that is, "light-bearer," is the word hēlēl corresponding to the Assyrian mustelil, "the shining star," an epithet to which the planet Venus has a preëminent claim.

Mars and Mercury, the two remaining planets, are not mentioned as such in OT, but the deities connected with them, Nergal=Mars (2 K 17 30) and Nebo=Mercury (Isa 46 1), both occur.

III. Systems of Astrology.—In astrology the planets were regarded as being 7 in number, but the idea that the number 7 derived

1. Names its sacredness from this fact is an invention of the true state of the case.

Week-Days It was that 7 being regarded as a sacred number, the number of the planets was artificially made to correspond by including in the same class as the five wandering stars, bodies that differed so widely from them in appearance as the sun and moon. So artificial a classification cannot have been primitive, and it is significant that in Gen 1 14 the sun and moon are presented as being (as indeed they appear to be) of an altogether different order from the rest of the heavenly bodies. Yet there is one feature that they have in common with the five planets: all move among the stars within the band of the zodiac; each of the seven makes the circuit of the mazzālōth.

We owe the names of the days of the week to this astrological conception of the planets as being 7 in number, and some writers (e.g. R. A. Proctor in his Myths and Marvels of Astronomy, 43–47) have supposed that the week of 7 days owed its origin to this astrological conception and that the 7th day—Saturn's Day—became the Sabbath, the Day of Rest, because Saturn was the planet of ill-omen and it was then unlucky to undertake any work. The way in which the allotment of the planets to the days of the week was arrived at was the following. The Gr astronomers and mathematicians concluded that the planet Saturn was the most distant from the earth and that the others followed in the descending order of Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, Mercury, Moon. In the progress of astrology there came a time when it was found necessary to assign a planet to every hour so as to increase the number of omens it could afford. Starting then with Saturn as presiding over the first hour of the first day, each planet was used three times over on that day, and three planets were used a fourth time. The sun, the fourth planet, took therefore the first hour of the second day, and gave it its name, so that Sunday followed Saturday. In like manner the third day became the moon's day, and so on with the other planets which followed in the order Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, Venus, and again Saturn. This idea of the relative distances of the planets was that arrived at by the astronomers of Alexandria, and was necessarily subsequent to the reduction of the planetary motions to a mathematical system by Eudoxus and his successors. The division of the day implied was one of 24 hours, not of 12; the Egypt division, not the Bab. But the Egypt week was one of 10 days, the 7-day week was Sem, and the week implied in the system is the free week, running on continuously, the Jewish week, not the Bab. For the Babylonians, though they paid some attention to the 7th day, began their reckoning afresh at the beginning of each month. This particular astrological system therefore owed its origin to four distinct nationalities. The conception of the influence of the planets was Bab; the mathematical working out of the order of the planets was exclusively Gr; the division of the day into 24 hours was Egypt; the free continuous 7-day week was particularly Jewish. These four influences were brought together in Alexandria not very long before the Christian era. Here therefore and at this time, this particular system of astrology took its origin.

This form of astrology was readily adopted by the Jews in their degenerate days, as we find from references in Talm. Thus Rabbi Chanena said to his disciples, "Go and tell Ben Laive, the planetary influence does not depend upon days but hours. He that is born under the influence of the sun (no matter on what day) will have a beaming face"; and so the rabbi went through the whole list of the planets (Shabbāth, fol 156, col. 1). The above was spoken as a criticism of Rabbi Shimon Ben Laive who had written, "Whoever is born on the first day of the week will be either a thoroughly good or a thoroughly bad man; because light and darkness was created on that day"; and the rabbi spoke similarly for the other days. We get a relic of this superstition in our nursery rhyme, "Monday's child is full of grace; Tuesday's child is fair of face," etc.; and some present-day astrologers still use the system for their forecasts. It will of course be noted that the system takes no account of the actual positions of the heavenly bodies; the moon does not shine more or less on Monday than on any other day.

It was from Alexandrian astrology that modern astrology immediately derived its form; but the original source of all astrology in the ancient world lay in the system of planetary idolatry prevalent in the Euphrates valley, and in the fact that this idolatry was practised chiefly for the purpose of divination. At one time it was supposed that a real astronomy was cultivated at an early time in Babylonia, but Jastrow, Kugler and others have shown that this idea is without basis. The former writes, "The fact however is significant that, with perhaps some exceptions, we have in the library of Ashurbanipal representing to a large extent copies from older originals, no text that can properly be called astronomical. . . . It is certainly significant that the astronomical tablets so far found belong to the latest period, and in fact to the age following on the fall of the Bab empire. According to Kugler the oldest dated genuinely astronomical tablet belongs to the 7th year of Cambyses, i.e. 522 BC" ("Hepatoscopy and Astrology in Babylonia and Assyria," in Proc. Amer. Phil. Soc., 667).

The conquests of Alexander the Great brought into close connection with each other the Bab and Gr systems of thought, and Bab astrology was introduced to the Greeks by Berossus the Chaldaean priest. In Gr hands, astrology was changed from its character of an oriental religion into the appearance of a science. In Babylonia the stars had been consulted for the benefit of the king as representing the state; amongst the Greeks, with their strong individualistic tendency, the fortunes of the individual became the most frequent subject of inquiry, and the idea was originated of determining the character and fortune of a man from the position of the stars at his birth—genethliology—a phase of astrology which never existed in the Euphrates valley. This extension rendered it necessary to increase greatly the complexities of the omens, and the progress which the Greeks had made in mathematics supplied them with the means of doing so. Thus came into existence that complex and symmetrical system of divination of which we have the earliest complete exposition in the writings of Claudius Ptolemy about 130 AD; a system which, though modified in details, is in effect that in use today.

Since this mathematical astrology did not come into existence until about the commencement of the Christian era, it is clear that there could not be any reference to its particular form in the OT. We may probably see one reference in the NT (Acts 19 19). Of the converts at Ephesus it is written, "Not a few of them that practised magical arts brought their books together and burned them in the sight of all; and they counted the price of them, and found it 50,000 pieces of silver." Books of magical incantations and prescriptions were certainly included, but it is also likely that the almanacs, tables and formulae, essential to the astrologer for the exercise of his art, were also in the number. It was of course impossible then, as now, for the convert to Christianity to consult astrologers or to practise astrological divination. Partly because it was an absurdity, for the divisions of the heavens upon which the predictions are based, are purely imaginary; the "signs" of the zodiac, and the "houses" have nothing whatsoever corresponding to them in Nature; such division is exactly that denounced by the prophets of old as kešem, "divination." Next, and of more importance, it ascribes to mere creatures, the planets or the spirits supposed to preside over them, the powers that belong to God alone; it was and is essentially idolatrous. As one of the chief living astrologers puts it, "The TRUE astrologer believes that the sun is the body of the Logos of this solar system, 'in Him we live and move and have our being.' The planets are his angels, being modifications in the consciousness of the Logos" (Knowledge, XXIII, 228). Astrology is indeed referred to in the OT, with other forms of divination, and the idolatry inherent in them, but they are only mentioned in terms of the most utter reprobation. The Jews alone of all the nations of antiquity were taught by their religion neither to resort to such arts nor to be afraid of the omens deduced from them. Isaiah knew the Lord to be He that "frustrateth the signs of the liars, and maketh diviners mad" (Isa 44 25), and Jeremiah declared, "Thus saith Jehovah, Learn not the way of the nations, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the nations are dismayed at them" (Jer 10 2). And what held good for the Jews of old holds good for us today. Above all, astrology is an attempt to ascertain the will of God by other means than those which He has appointed—His Son, who is the Way and the Truth and the Life, and His Holy Scriptures in which we learn of Him, and which are able to make us "wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim 3 15).

LITERATURE

The keynote of the Heb writers respecting the heavenly bodies is sounded in Ps 8:

"When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers,
The moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;
What is man, that thou art mindful of him?
And the son of man, that thou visitest him?
For thou hast made him but little lower than God,
And crownest him with glory and honor.
Thou makest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands;
Thou hast put all things under his feet" (Ps 8 3-6).

The heavenly bodies were inexpressibly glorious, and they were all the handiwork of Jeh—without power or vitality of their own—and man, not by any inherent virtue, but by the will and grace of God, was superior to them in importance. Thus there was a great gulf fixed between the superstitions of the heathen who worshipped the sun, moon and stars as gods, and the faith of the pious Hebrew who regarded them as things made and moved by the will of one only God. And it followed from this difference that the Hebrew, beyond all nations of like antiquity, was filled with a keen delight in natural objects and phenomena, and was attentively observant of them.

1. The Heavenly Bodies.—To the sacred writers, the ordinances of heaven taught the lesson of Order—great, magnificent and immutable. Day by day, the sun rose in the east, "as a bridegroom coming out of Heaven of his chamber" (Ps 19 5), and pursued unswervingly his appointed path across the sky, to his going down. Night by night, the stars, the "host of heaven," moved in their "highways" or "courses" (m'sillāh), and the words of Joel (2 7) respecting the Assyrian army might be applied to them. "They march every one on his ways, and they break not their ranks. Neither doth one thrust another; they march every one in his path." Some wheeled in northern circuits that were wholly seen; some swept in long courses from their rising in the E. to their setting in the W.; some scarcely lifted themselves above the southern horizon. Little wonder that this celestial army on the march, "the host of heaven," suggested to the Hebrews a comparison with the "angels," the unseen messengers of God who in their "thousands of thousands ministered unto him" (Dnl 7 10).

But, as the year revolved, the dial of stars in the N. shifted round; whilst of the other stars, those in the W. disappeared into the light of the setting sun, and new stars seemed to spring out of the dawning light. There was thus a yearly procession of the stars as well as a nightly one.

And to this "ordinance of the heaven" the Hebrews noted that there was an answer from the earth, for in unflinching correspondence came the succession of seasons, the revival of vegetation, the ripening of harvest and of fruits, the return of winter's cold. Of them God asked the question: "Knowest thou the ordinances of the heavens? Canst thou establish the dominion thereof in the earth?" (Job 38 33), and they recognized that to this question no answer could be given, for these ordinances of heaven were the sign and evidence of Almighty wisdom, power and unchangeableness. "Thus saith Jehovah, who giveth the sun for a light by day, and the ordinances of the moon and of the stars for a light by night . . . Jehovah of hosts is his name" (Jer 31 35).

We have no writings of the early Hebrews other than the books of the OT, and in them there is no record of any research into the mechanical explanation of the movements of the heavenly bodies. Nor should we expect to find in them a record of the research if such were made, since the purpose of Holy Scripture was, not to work out the relation of thing to thing—the inquiry to which modern science is devoted—but to reveal God to man. Therefore the lesson which is drawn from the observed ordinances of heaven is, not that the earth rotates on its axis or revolves round the sun, but that God is faithful to His purpose for mankind. "Thus saith Jehovah: If my covenant of day and night stand not, if I have not appointed the ordinances of heaven and earth; then will I also cast away the seed of Jacob, and of David my servant" (Jer 33 25, 26). And "the glory of God" which "the heavens declare" is not only His almighty power, but the image which the order and perfection of the heavenly movements supply of the law which He has revealed unto man. The "speech" that they "utter," the "knowledge" that they "show" is: "The law of Jehovah is perfect, restoring the soul" (Ps 19 7).

(1) The names for the sun.—Four words are trad^d "sun" in the OT:

(a) 'Or simply means "light" and is usually rendered thus, but in one instance (Job 31 26), being in antithesis to "moon," it is

2. The Sun given as "sun," the great light-giver.

(b) Hammāh means "heat" and is used for the sun when this is in association with l'bhānāh or "snow-white" for the moon, as in Isa 24 23, "Then the snow-white [moon] shall be confounded, and the heat [sun] ashamed," the antithesis being drawn between the cold light of the silver moon and the fiery radiance of the glowing sun.

(c) Shemesh, the Sams of the Babylonians, is a primitive word, probably with the root meaning of "ministrant." This is the word most frequently used for the sun, and we find it used topographically as, for instance, in Beth-shemesh, "the house of the sun." Four places of this name are mentioned in the OT: one in Judah, a Levitical city, to which the two milch kine bearing the ark took their straight way from the country of the Philis; one on the border of Issachar; one in Naphtali, a fenced city; and one in Egypt, supposed to be the same as Heliopolis or On, the city of Asenath, wife of Joseph.

(d) Hereš means "blister" or "burning heat," from a root "to scratch" or "be rough," and is an unusual term for the sun, and its precise rendering is sometimes in doubt. Once it is trad^d as "itch," when it occurs amongst the evils threatened in the "cursings" that the six tribes uttered from Mount Ebal (Dt 28 27). Once it is certainly used of the sun itself when Job (9 7) said of God, He

"commandeth the sun [heres or heres], and it riseth not." Once it is certainly the name of a hill, for Mount Heres was near Aijalon, on the borders of Judah and Dan. In another passage, authorities differ in their rendering, for when Gideon overcame Zebah and Zalmunna (Jgs 8 13), he "returned from the battle," according to AV, "before the sun was up," but according to RV, "from the ascent of Heres." In yet another passage (Jgs 14 18), when the Philis answered Samson's riddle, both AV and RV tr heres as sun—"before the sun went down." We moreover get slight variants of the same word, joined with kir ("wall" or "fortress"), in Kir-Häreseth (2 K 3 25; Isa 16 7) and Kir-Heres (Isa 16 11; Jer 48 31.36). These are probably to be identified with the modern Kerak of Moab.

(2) City of the sun.—But the most interesting reference is found in Isa 19 18: "In that day there shall be five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jehovah of hosts; one shall be called The city of destruction." The word here rendered "destruction" is in Heb heres, which has that meaning, but Gesenius and other authorities would substitute for the initial letter, he, the letter, heth, which it so closely resembles, and so read it "The city of the sun." With this reading it was identified with On, that is, Heliopolis (the city of the sun), and on this belief Onias, the son of Onias the high priest, persuaded Ptolemy Philometor to allow him to build a temple to Jeh in that prefecture, 149 BC (Ant, XIII, iii, 1).

(3) The greater light-giver.—(e) Yet a fifth expression is used to denote the sun, and in one respect it is the most important and significant of all. In the creation narrative it is called the greater light or rather light-giver (mā'or): "And God made the two great light-givers; the greater light-giver to rule the day, and the lesser light-giver to rule the night: He made the stars also" (Gen 1 16). The extreme simplicity of this passage is most significant. In marked contrast to the Bab creation poem, which by its more complex astronomy reveals its later origin (see post, sec. II, 12, Mazzārōth), the sun and moon have no distinctive names assigned to them; there is no recognition of the grouping of the stars into constellations, none of any of the planets. The celestial bodies could not be referred to in a more simple manner. And this simplicity is marred by no myth; there is not the faintest trace of the deification of sun or moon or stars; there is no anthropomorphic treatment, no suggestion that they formed the vehicles for spirits. They are described as they were observed when they were first noticed by men, simply as "light-givers" of different brightness. It is the expression of man's earliest observation of the heavenly bodies, but it is real observation, free from any taint of savage phantasies; it marks the very first step in astronomy. No record, oral or written, has been preserved to us of a character more markedly primitive than this.

(4) Purpose of the sun.—Two purposes for the great heavenly bodies are indicated in Gen 1 14. 15. The sun and moon are appointed to give light and to measure time. These, from the human and practical point of view, are the two main services which they render to us.

Their purpose for measuring time by their movements will be taken up under another heading; but here it may be pointed out that when it is stated in the Book of Wisd (7 18) that King Solomon knew "the alternations of the solstices and the changes of seasons," the reference is to the whole cycle of changes from winter through summer back to winter again. From winter onward the places of sunrise and sunset move northward along the horizon until midsummer when for some days they show no change—the "solstice" is reached; then from midsummer onward the movement "turns" southward until midwinter, when again a "solstice" is reached, after which the places of sunrise and sunset again move northward. This changing place of sunrise is also referred to when God asked Job (38 12-14): Hast thou "caused the dayspring to know its place," and the passage goes on, "It [the earth] is changed as clay under the seal; and all things stand forth as a garment." As the shapeless clay takes form under the pressure of the seal, as the garment, shapeless while folded up, takes form when the wearer puts it on, so the earth, shapeless during the darkness, takes form and relief and color with the impress upon it of the dawning light. In the NT when St. James (1 17) speaks of "the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation [parallagē], neither shadow that is cast by turning [tropē]" he is using astronomical technical terms for these same apparent movements of the sun.

(5) The sun as a type.—But the apparent unchangeability of the sun makes it, as it were, a just measure of eternal duration (Ps 72 5.17). The penetration of its rays renders "under the sun" (Eccl 1 9) a fit expression for universality of place, and on the other hand the fierceness of its heat as experienced in Pal makes it equally suitable as a type of oppression and disaster, so the sun is said, in Scripture, to "smite" those oppressed by its heat (Ps 121 6).

But it was in its light-giving and ministering power that the Heb writers used the sun as a type to set forth the power and beneficence of God. Words are the symbols of ideas and it was only by this double symbolism that it was possible to express in intelligible human speech, and to make men partly apprehend some of the attributes of God. So we find in the Ps of pilgrimage (Ps 84 11) "Jehovah God is a sun and a shield"; Malachi (4 2) foretells that "the sun of righteousness shall arise with healing in its wings." But the old Heb writers were very guarded and careful in the symbolism they used, whether of word or illustration. Men in those days terribly perverted the benefits which they received through the sun, and made them the occasion and excuse for plunging into all kinds of nature worship and of abominable idolatries. It was not only clear thinking on the part of the sacred writers that made them refer all the benefits that came to them in the natural world direct to the action of God; it was a necessity for clean living. There is no bottom to the abyss in which men plunged when they "worshipped and served the creature rather than the Creator, who is blessed for ever" (Rom 1 25).

In NT times, though men were no less prone to evil, the fashion of that evil was changing. "The pillars of Beth-shemesh" were broken down (Jer 43 13), idolatry was beginning to fall into disrepute and men were led away rather by "the knowledge [gnōsis] which is falsely so called" (1 Tim 6 20). The apostles could therefore use symbolism from the natural world more freely, and so we find St. John speaking of Our Lord as "There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man, coming into the world" (Jn 1 9), and again, "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (1 Jn 1 5); and again, that the glory of the New Jerus shall be that "the city hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine upon it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the lamp thereof is the Lamb" (Rev 21 23); while the great modern discovery that nearly every form of terrestrial energy is derived ultimately from the energy of the sun's rays, gives a most striking appropriateness to the imagery of St. James that "Every good gift and perfect boon is from above, coming down from the Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning' (Jas 1 17 ERV).

(1) The names for the moon.—Three words are tr^d "moon" in the OT, not including cases where "month" has been rendered "moon."

3. The Moon for the sake of a more flowing sentence:

(a) Lēbhānāh, "white"; a poetic expression, used in connection with ham-māh, "heat," for the sun.

(b) Hōdhesh, "new moon," meaning "new," "fresh." As the Hebrews reckoned their months from the actual first appearance of the young crescent, hōdhesh is most frequently tr^d "month." Thus "In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month" (Gen 7 11), and in the great majority of cases, the word for month is hōdhesh, "new moon." In Isa 66 23, "from one new moon to another," should be lit. "from new moon to new moon." Once it is rendered "monthly" (Isa 47 13), when it is used to denote the astrologers who fixed the omens of the opening month. Hōdhesh, therefore, when tr^d "new moon" is not a designation of the actual heavenly body, but denotes the first day of the month. It is a term directly or indirectly connected with the calendar.

(c) Yārēah, probably "wandering," a very appropriate primitive term for the moon, since her motion among the stars from night to night is sufficiently rapid to have caught the attention of very early observers. Its use therefore as the proper name for the "lesser light" indicates that the systematic observation of the heavenly bodies had commenced, and that the motion of the moon, relative to the stars, had been recognized.

Yerah, "month," is twice tr^d "moon" (Dt 33 14; Isa 60 20), but without any great reason for the variation in either case.

(2) The lesser light-giver.—The direct references in Scripture to the moon as a light-giver are not numerous, but those that occur are significant of the great importance of moonlight in ancient times, when artificial lights were few, expensive and dim, and the lighting of streets and roads was unthought of. To shepherds, the moon was of especial assistance, and many of the people of Israel maintained the habits of their forefathers and led the shepherd's life long after the settlement of the nation in Pal. The return of the moonlit portion of the month was therefore an occasion for rejoicing and for solemn thanks to God, and the "new moon" as well as the Sabbath was a day of special offerings. On the other hand one of the judgments threatened against the enemies of God was that the light of the moon should be withheld. The threat made against Pharaoh is "I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give its light" (Ezk 32 7); and in the day of the Lord denounced against Babylon, "The sun shall be darkened in its going forth, and the moon shall not cause its light to shine" (Isa 13 10). But among the glories of the restoration of Israel it is promised that "the light of the moon [lēbhānāh] shall be as the light of the sun [hammāh]" (Isa 30 26).

(3) Phases of the moon.—There is no direct mention of the phases of the moon in Scripture; a remarkable fact, and one that illustrates the foolishness of attempting to prove the ignorance of the sacred writers by the argument from silence, since it is not conceivable that men at any time were ignorant of the fact that the moon changes her apparent shape and size. So far from the Hebrews being plunged in such a depth of more than savage ignorance, they based their whole calendar on the actual observation of the first appearance of the young crescent. In two passages in RV we find the expression "at the full moon," kešeh (Ps 81 3; Prov 7 20), but though this is what is intended, the literal meaning of the word is doubtful, and may be that given in AV, "at the day appointed." In another passage already quoted, there is a reference to the dark part of the month. "Thy sun shall no more go down, neither shall thy moon [yerah, "month"] withdraw itself"—the "withdrawn" part of the month being the time near new moon when the moon is nearly in conjunction with the sun and therefore invisible.

The periodical changes of the moon are its ordinances (Jer 31 35). It was also appointed for "seasons" (Ps 104 19), that is, for religious assemblies or feasts (mō'ādhim). Two of these were held at the full of the moon, the Passover and the Feast of Tabernacles; one at the new moon, the Feast of Trumpets; but the ordinary new moon did not rank among the great "appointed feasts" (mō'ādhim). As light-giver, assisting men in their labors with the flock and in the field and helping them on their journeys; as time-measurer, indicating the progress of the months and the seasons for the great religious festivals, the moon was to the pious Hebrew an evidence of the goodness and wisdom of God.

The "round tires like the moon," worn by the daughters of Zion (Isa 3 18 AV), and those on the camels of Zeba and Zalmunna (Jgs 8 21 AVm), were designated by the same Heb word, sahārōnīm, tr^d in the Vulg as lunulae, and were little round ornaments, probably round like crescents, not discs like the full moon.

Jericho possibly means "the city of the moon," and Jerah, "moon," was the name of one of the sons of Joktan.

(1) Solar and lunar eclipses.—The sun and moon were not only given "for days and years" (Gen 1 14), but also "for signs," and in no

4. Signs way do they better fulfil what was in the old time understood by this word than in their eclipses. Nothing in Nature is more impressive than a total eclipse of the sun; the mysterious darkness, the sudden cold, the shining forth of the weird corona, seen at no other time, affect even those who know its cause, and strike unspeakable terror in those who cannot foresee or understand it. In bygone ages an eclipse of the sun was counted an omen of disaster, indeed as itself the worst of disasters, by all nations except that one to whom the word of the prophet came: "Learn not the way of the nations, and be not dismayed at the signs of heaven; for the nations are dismayed at them" (Jer 10 2). To the Heb prophets, eclipses were "signs" of the power and authority of God who forbade them to be alarmed at portents which distressed the heathen.

The phenomena of both solar and lunar eclipses are briefly but unmistakably described by several of the prophets. Joel refers to them twice (2 10 and 31), the second time very definitely: "The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood," and this was quoted by St. Peter on the Day of Pentecost (Acts 2 19,20). St. John also says that when the sixth seal was opened "the sun became black as sackcloth of hair, and the whole moon became as blood" (Rev 6 12). When the new moon in its revolution or turning comes exactly between the earth and the sun, and its shadow—the "shadow that is cast by turning" of Jas 1 17—falls on the earth, the sun is completely hidden and its glowing disc is replaced by the dark body of the moon; "the sun is turned into darkness." When the shadow of the earth falls upon the full moon, and the only rays from the sun that reach it have passed through an immense thickness of our atmosphere and are therefore of a dull copper-red color like clotted blood, "the moon is turned into blood."

(2) The wings of the morning.—But a solar eclipse is not solely darkness and terror. Scarcely has the dark moon hidden the last thread of sunlight than a beautiful pearly halo, the corona, is seen surrounding the blackness. This corona changes its shape from one eclipse to another, but the simplest form is that of a bright ring with outstretched wings, and is characteristic of times when the sun has but few spots upon it. This form appears to have been the origin of the sacred symbol of the ring or disc with wings, so frequently figured on Egypt, Bab and Pers monuments. It is possible that these coronal "wings of the sun" may have been in the mind of the prophet Malachi when he wrote, "Unto you that fear my name shall the sun of righteousness arise with healing in its wings" (Mal 4 2). The metaphor "wings of the morning" of Ps 139 9 is however more probably due to the long streamers, the crepuscular rays, seen at dawn when the sun rises behind a low bank of clouds.

Total eclipses of the moon must frequently have been visible in Pal as in other countries, but only two or three total eclipses of the sun were visible there during OT history; that of 831 BC, August 15, was total in Judaea, and that of 824 BC, April 2, very nearly total. It has been suggested that two eclipses of the sun were predicted in the OT—that of Nineveh, 763 BC, June 15, in Am 8 9, and that of Thales, 585 BC, May 28, in Isa 13 10, but the suggestion has little to support it.

(1) The meaning of the word.—The sun and moon were appointed "to give light upon the earth," and "for signs," and "for days and years."

5. Seasons They were also appointed "for seasons" (mō'ādīm), i.e. "appointed assemblies." These seasons were not primarily such seasons as the progress of the year brings forth in the form of changes of weather or of the condition of vegetation; they were seasons for worship. The word mō'ēdh occurs some 219 times; in 149, it is trd "congregation," and in about 50 other instances by "solemn assembly" or some equivalent expression. Thus before ever man was created, God had provided for him times to worship and had appointed two great lights of heaven to serve as signals to call to it.

The appointed sacred seasons of the Jews form a most complete and symmetrical series, developing from times indicated by the sun alone to times indicated by the sun and moon together, and completed in times indicated by luni-solar cycles.

(2) Natural seasons for worship.—The sun alone indicated the hours for daily worship; at sunrise, when the day began, there was the morning sacrifice; at sunset, when the day closed, there was the evening sacrifice.

The moon indicated the time for monthly worship; when the slender crescent of the new moon was first seen in the western sky, special sacrifices were ordained with the blowing of trumpets over them.

The sun and moon together marked the times for the two great religious festivals of the year. At the beginning of the bright part of the year, when the moon was full in the first month of spring, the Passover, followed by the Feast of Unleavened Bread, was held. At the end of the bright part of the year, when the moon was full in the first month of autumn, the Feast of Tabernacles was held. These may all be termed natural seasons for worship, obviously marked out as appropriate. The beginning and close of the bright part of the day, and of the bright part of the year, and the beginning of the bright part of the month, have been observed by many nations.

(3) Hallowing of the seventh.—But that which was distinctive in the system of the Jewish festivals was the hallowing of the seventh: the seventh day, the seventh week, the seventh month, the seventh year were all specially marked out. The sun alone indicated the Sabbath by the application of the sacred number seven to the unit of time given by the day. For the period of seven days, the week was not dependent upon any phase of the moon's relation to the sun; it was not a quarter month, but a free week, running on independently of the month. The Jewish Sabbath therefore differed from the Bab, which was tied to the lunar month. The same principle was applied also to the year; every seventh year was set apart as a period of rest, the Sabbatic year.

Every seventh day, every seventh year, was thus observed. But for the week and month, the principle of hallowing the seventh came into operation only once in each year. The Feast of Pentecost, or as it was also called, the Feast of Weeks, was held at the close of the seventh week from the morrow after the Sabbath of Unleavened Bread; and the new moon of the seventh month was held as a special feast, the Feast of Trumpets, "a holy convocation. Ye shall do no servile work" (Lev 23 24,25). The other new moons of the year were not thus distinguished.

The weekly Sabbath, the Passover, Pentecost, and the Feasts of Trumpets and of Tabernacles, with one other day of solemnity, were in an especial sense, the mō'ādīm of the Lord.

The seventh day was especially the day of worship, and to correspond, the seventh month was especially the month of worship; and this, not only because it was ushered in with peculiar solemnity, and included one of the chief great feasts of the year, but because it furnished the culminating ceremony of the entire Jewish system, the great Day of Atonement, held on the tenth day of the month, and therefore on a day not marked directly by any phase of the moon. The Day of Atonement purged away the offences of the past year, and restored Israel to the full enjoyment of the Divine favor.

(4) The Jubilee a luni-solar cycle.—The Jewish month was a natural month, based upon the actual observation of the young crescent. The Jewish year was a natural year, that is, a solar tropical year, based upon actual observation of the ripening of the grain. But there is not an exact number of days in a lunar month, nor is there an exact number of months in a solar year; twelve lunar months falling short of the year, by eleven days; so that in three years the error would amount to more than a complete month, and to restore the balance a thirteenth month would have to be intercalated. As the months were determined from actual observation, and as observation would be interrupted from time to time by unfavorable weather, it was necessary to have some means for determining when intercalation would take place, irrespective of it. And this was provided by carrying the principle of hallowing the seventh, one stage farther. Not only was the seventh of the day, week, month and year distinguished, but the seventh week of years was marked by the blowing of the trumpet of Jubilee on the Day of Atonement. The Day of Atonement meant the restitution of Israel to the Divine favor; the blowing of the trumpet of Jubilee every forty-ninth year meant "the restitution of all things"; every Hebrew in servitude returned to freedom, all land, mortgaged or sold, returned to its original owner.

And this period of 49 solar years was astronomically a period of restitution, for the sun and moon returned nearly to their original positions relative to each other, since 49 solar years are 606 lunar months with an error of only 32 hours. So that though the Jubilee period is not a perfect lunar cycle, it was quite exact enough to guide the Jewish priests in drawing up their calendar in cases where the failure of observation had given rise to some doubt.

The beginning of each month was marked by the blowing of the two silver trumpets (hăṣōṣṣāh: Nu 10 2.10). The beginning of the civil, that is to say, of the agricultural year, was marked by a special blowing of trumpets (t'rū'āh), giving the name "Feast of Trumpets" to that new moon (Lev 23 24; Nu 29 1). And the beginning of a new cycle of 49 years was marked by the Jubilee, the loud trumpet (shōphār: Lev 25 9). Thus the cycle of the Jubilee made symmetrical, completed, and welded together all the mō'ādīm of the Lord—the two great lights were set "for seasons."

(5) The 19-year luni-solar cycle.—The cycle of the Jubilee was sufficient for the purposes of the religious calendar so long as the nation inhabited its own land, since from its small extent there would be no conflict of time reckoning and it would be easy to notify the appearance of the new moon from one end of the country to the other. But after the captivities, when the people were scattered from Gozan of the Medes to Syene on the Nile, it was necessary to devise some method by which the Jews, however far they had been dispersed, would be able to reckon for themselves as to when the moon was new for Jerus. We have lately learned from the discovery of a number of Aram. papyri at Syene that there was a colony of Jews there who used a calendar constructed, not from observation, but from calculation based upon a very exact luni-solar cycle (E. B. Nobel, "Ancient Jewish Calendar Dates in Aramaic Papyri," Monthly Notices of the Royal Astronomical Society, LXVIII, 334). This cycle, known to us by the name of its supposed discoverer, Meton, is one of 19 years, which is only two hours short of 235 complete months. As this Jewish cycle appears to have been founded after Nebuchadnezzar's destruction of Jerus by some of the refugees who fled into Egypt with Johanan the son of Kareah (Jer 40-44), this acquaintance with the Metonic cycle cannot have been due to Bab influence. Nor can it have been due to Egyp, since the Egyptians did not use or require any such cycle, their year being a solar one of 365 days. Indeed no other nation appears to have been aware of it until, a generation later, Meton, the Athenian, won immortal fame by announcing it. The evidence of these Syene papyri renders it probable that Meton did not himself discover the cycle but learned it from Jewish sources. Many of the Sem nations used, like the Jews, a natural month in conjunction with the natural year, but the Jews were the most likely to have discovered this cycle, since they alone had their worship centralized at a single shrine which became, in consequence, their standard observatory for their observation of the new moon. These observations, therefore, would all be comparable, and during the 400 years that the Temple stood, it must have been quite clear to them that the 19-year cycle not only gave them seven, the sacred number, of intercalated months, but brought the setting places of the new moons to the same points of the western horizon and in the same order.

It is clear from the evidence of these Syene papyri that the Jews, there, used the 19-year cycle both for fixing the day of the new moon, and in order to determine when a thirteenth month had to be intercalated, an illustration of the futility of "the argument from silence," for so far from there being any notice in Scripture of the use of a cycle for determining intercalation, there is no mention of intercalation at all.

(6) The Jewish ritual preëxilic.—Ever since this date of the Captivity, the 19-year cycle has been used by the Jews, and it gives to us the "Golden Number" which is employed in fixing the date of Easter in our own ecclesiastical calendar. Since the 19-year cycle has been in use ever since the Captivity, the 49-year cycle, the Jubilee, cannot have been an exilic or post-exilic innovation. In this fact we find the decision of the controversy which has so long divided critics as to whether the ritual legislation of the Jews dated from before or from after their captivity. We may take Kuenen as representing the more recent school: "Even the later prophets and historians, but more especially and emphatically those that lived before the Exile, were unacquainted with any ritual legislation, and specifically with that which has come down to us" (The Hexateuch, 273-74). "In determining its antiquity we must begin by considering its relation to Deuteronomy, to which it is evidently subsequent. . . . This comes out most clearly in the legislation concerning the feasts. Other indications though less unequivocal, plead for the same relationship. In the next place the legislation itself gives evidence of the date of its origin, and those data which justify a positive inference point to the Babylonian captivity. . . . It would follow that the 'legislation of sanctity' arose in the second half of the Bab captivity, presumably shortly before its close; and there is not a single valid objection to this date" (ib, 276). Kuenen was evidently unaware of the astronomical relations concerned in the ritual legislation, and was unable to anticipate the striking discoveries made from the Syene papyri. More recent knowledge has reversed the verdict which he pronounced so confidently. The traditional view, that the Heb ritual preceded the Captivity, was correct. For the Jubilee, with which the Day of Atonement was bound up, was both the culmination and the completion of the entire ritual, and, since the period of the Jubilee, as a luni-solar cycle, was preëxilic, the ritual, as a system, must have been preëxilic likewise.

(7) The luni-solar cycles of Daniel.—The seasons for which the sun and moon were appointed are mentioned in yet another connection. In the last vision given to Daniel the question was asked, "How long shall it be to the end of these wonders?" and it was answered, "It shall be for a time, times [dual], and a half; and when they have made an end of breaking in pieces the power of the holy people, all these things shall be finished" (Dnl 12 6.7). From the parallel passage in Dnl 7 25, where it is said of the fourth beast, "He shall think to change the times and the law; and they shall be given into his hand until a time ['iddān] and times [dual] and half a time," it is inferred that mō'ēdh in the first instance stands, like 'iddān in the second, for a year; or the period is equivalent to half a week nomical significance is clear: 840,057 days are precisely 2,300 solar years, or 28,447 lunar months, or 30,487 anomalistic months, the anomalistic month being the period in which the moon travels from perigee to perigee. It is the most perfect luni-solar cycle known, and restores the two great lights exactly to their former relationship. This fullest "season" indicated by the sun and moon is given as that for the cleansing of the sanctuary, for the bringing in, as it were, of the full and perfect Jubilee.

It is not possible at present to decide as to whether the Jews had learnt of this cycle and its significance from their astronomical observations. If so, they must have been far in advance in mathematical science of all other nations of antiquity.

of years. The parallel passages in Rev 11 2.3; 12 6.14; 13 5 have caused these years to be taken as conventional years of 360 days, each year being made up of 12 conventional months of 30 days, and on the year-day principle of interpretation, the entire period indicated would be one of 1,260 tropical years. This again is a luni-solar cycle, since 1,260 years contain 15,584 months correct to the nearest day. To the same prophet Daniel a further chronological vision was given, and a yet more perfect cycle indicated. In answer to the question, "How long shall be the vision concerning the continual burnt-offering, and the transgression that maketh desolate, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot?" the answer was returned, "Unto two thousand and three hundred evenings and mornings; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed" (Dnl 8 13.14). Whatever may be the prophetic significance of the passage its astro-

If not, then it must have been given to them by Divine revelation, and its astronomical significance has been left for modern science to reveal.

As with the sun and moon, the stars are regarded under the two aspects of light-givers and time-measurers; or, in other words, as marking the seasons.

6. The Stars

(1) Their number.—But two other ideas are also strongly dwelt upon; the stars and the heaven of which they form the "host" are used to express the superlatives of number and of height. "Look now toward heaven, and number the stars, if thou be able to number them" (Gen 15 5); "As the host of heaven cannot be numbered" (Jer 33 22) are a few of the passages in which the stars are used for limitless number. Those separately visible to the naked eye at any one time do not exceed 2,000 in number, but it was just as evident to the Hebrews of old, as it was to

Ptolemy, the astronomer of Alexandria, that beside the stars separately visible, there is a background, a patterned curtain of light, which indicates by its granular and mottled appearance that it is made up of countless myriads of stars, too faint to be individually detected, too close to be individually defined. The most striking feature of this curtain is the grand stellar stream that we call the Milky Way, but the mind easily recognizes that the minute points of light, composing its pattern, are as really stars as the great leaders of the constellations. Later astronomy has confirmed the testimony of the prophets that the stars are without number. The earliest star catalogue, that of Hipparchus, contained a little over one thousand stars; the great International Photographic Chart will miles; the brighter stars are on the average quite ten times as far; whilst of the distances of the untold millions of stars beyond, we have no gauge. For us, as for King Solomon, the "heaven" of the stars is "for height" (Prov 25 3), for a height that is beyond measure, giving us therefore the only fitting image for the immensity of God. So Zophar the Naamathite asked, "Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is high as heaven; what canst thou do?" And Eliphaz the Temanite reiterated the same thought, "Is not God in the height of heaven? And behold the height of the stars, how high they are!" (Job 11 7.8; 22 12). And the height of the heaven, that is to say, the distance of the stars, stands as a symbol, not only of God's infinitude, but of His faithfulness and of show the images of more than fifty millions, and there are photographs which show more than a hundred thousand stars on a single plate. The limit that has been reached is due only to the limited power of our telescopes or the limited time of exposure of the photographs, not to any limitation in the number of stars. To us today, as to the Psalmist of old, it is a token of the infinite power and knowledge of God that "He telleth the number of the stars; He giveth them all their names" (Ps 147 4 AV).

(2) Their distance.—As regards the height, that is to say, the distance of the stars, this is immeasurable except in a very few cases. By using as a base line the enormous diameter of the earth's orbit—186,000,000 miles—astronomers have been able to get a hint as to the distance of some 40 or 50 stars. Of these the nearest, Alpha Centauri, is distant about twenty-five millions of millions of

His mercy: "Thus saith Jehovah: If heaven above can be measured, and the foundations of the earth searched out beneath, then will I also cast off all the seed of Israel for all that they have done, saith Jehovah" (Jer 31 37). And the Psalmist sings, "For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him" (Ps 103 11 AV).

(3) Their brightness.—The stars are not all of equal brightness; a fact alluded to by St. Paul when he wrote that "one star differeth from another star in glory" (1 Cor 15 41). The ancient Greek astronomers divided the stars according to their brightness into six classes or magnitudes, to use the modern technical term, the average star in any particular magnitude giving about two and a half times as much light as the average star of the next magnitude.

Just as the number of the stars and their ordered movement led them to be considered as a mighty army, "the host of heaven," and as a type of that other celestial host, the holy angels, so the individual stars are taken as fitly setting forth, by their brightness and exalted position, spiritual powers and intelligences, whether these are the angels of God, as in Job 38 7, or rulers of churches, as in Rev 1 20. The same image is naturally applied in a yet higher sense to Christ Himself, who is the "star out of Jacob" (Nu 24 17), and "the bright, the morning star" (Rev 22 16; 2 Pet 1 19).

In ancient times there were two methods by which the progress of the year could be learned from observation of the heavens. The sun was "for seasons," and the change in its place of rising or of setting supplied the first method. The second method was supplied by the stars. For as the Heb shepherds, such as Jacob, Moses, David and Amos, kept watch over their flocks by night, they saw the silent procession of the stars through the hours of darkness, and knew without clock or timepiece how they were progressing. They noticed what stars were rising in the E., what stars were culminating in the S., what were setting in the W., and how the northern stars, always visible, like a great dial, were turning. But as the eastern horizon began to brighten toward the dawn, they would specially note what stars were the last to rise before their shining was drowned in the growing light of day. These, the last stars to appear in the E. before sunrise, were the "morning stars," the heralds of the sun. As morning followed morning, these morning stars would be seen earlier and earlier, and therefore for a longer time before they disappeared in the dawn, until some morning, other stars, unseen before, would shine out for a few moments, and thus supplant the stars seen earlier as the actual heralds of the sun. Such a first appearance of a star was termed by the Gr astronomers its "heliacal" rising, and the mention in Scripture of "morning stars," or "stars of the twilight" (Job 38 7; 3 9), shows that the Hebrews like the Greeks were familiar with this feature of the ordinances of heaven, and noted the progress of the year by observation of the apparent changes of the celestial host. One star would herald the beginning of spring, another the coming of winter; the time to plow, the time to sow, the time of the rains would all be indicated by successive "morning stars" as they appeared.

(1) Meteorites.—Meteors are not stars at all in the popular sense of the word, but are quite small bodies drawn into our atmosphere, and rendered luminous for a few moments by the friction of their rush through it. But as they have been shown not to be mere distempers of the air, as they were considered at one time, but bodies of a truly planetary nature, traveling round the sun in orbits as defined as that of the earth itself, the epithet is quite appropriate to them. They are astronomical and not merely terrestrial bodies. Meteors are most striking either when they are seen as solitary aerolites or when they fall in some great shower. The most celebrated shower which seemed to radiate from the constellation Leo—and hence called the Leonid—gave for centuries a magnificent spectacle every thirty-three years; the last great occasion having been on November 14, 1866. Those who saw that shower could appreciate the vivid description given by St. John when he wrote, "The stars of the heaven fell unto the earth, as a fig tree casteth her unripe figs when she is shaken of a great wind" (Rev 6 13), for the meteors fell like autumn leaves, driven by a great storm, as numerous and as fast. The prophet Isaiah also used a very similar figure (Isa 34 4).

(2) The star "Wormwood."—Such great meteoric showers are most impressive spectacles, but solitary meteors are sometimes hardly less striking. Bolides or aerolites, as such great solitary meteors are termed, are apparently of great size, and are sometimes so brilliant as to light up the sky even in broad daylight. Such a phenomenon is referred to by St. John in his description of the star Wormwood: "There fell from heaven a great star, burning as a torch" (Rev 8 10). Such aerolites are not entirely consumed in their passage through our atmosphere, but portions of them reach the ground, and in some cases large masses have been found intact. These are generally of a stony nature, but others are either almost pure iron or contain much of that metal. Such a meteoric stone was used as the pedestal of the image of the goddess Diana at Ephesus, and the "townclerk" of the city referred to this circumstance when he reminded the Ephesians that their city was "temple-keeper of the great Diana, and of the image which fell down from Jupiter" (Acts 19 35).

It has already been noted that the moon may perhaps have received its Heb name from the fact of its being a "wanderer" among the stars, but there is no direct and explicit reference in Scripture to other celestial "wanderers" except in Jude ver 13: "Wandering stars, for whom the blackness of darkness hath been reserved for ever." These astéres planétaires are not our "planets," but either meteors or comets, more probably the latter, as meteors are more appropriately described as "falling stars."

(1) Comets as a spiritual type.—But as comets and meteors are intimately connected with each other—meteors being in many cases the débris of comets—the simile applies to either. False professors of religion, unstable or apostate teachers, are utterly unlike the stars which shine forth in heaven for ever, but are fitly represented by comets, which are seen only for a few weeks or days, and then are entirely lost to sight, or by meteors, which flash out for a few moments, and are then totally extinguished.

All the great comets, all the comets that have been conspicuous to the naked eye, with the single exception of that named after Halley, have appeared but once within the period of human records and Halley's Comet only takes 80 days to traverse that part of its orbit which lies within the orbit of the earth; the rest of its period of revolution—76 years—is passed outside that boundary, and for 38 years at a time it remains outside the orbit of Neptune, more than 2,800,000,000 miles from the sun. The other great comets have only visited our neighborhood once within our experience.

(2) Comets referred to in Scripture?—The question has been raised whether the appearance of comets is ever referred to in Scripture. Jos, speaking of the signs which preceded the destruction of Jerus by Titus, says, "Thus there was a star resembling a sword which stood over the city, and a comet that continued a whole year" (BJ, VI, v, 3). The "star resembling a sword" was doubtless the return of Halley's Comet in 66 AD, and the phrase used by Jos has suggested that it was a stellar phenomenon that is referred to in 1 Ch 21 16: "The angel of Jehovah . . . between earth and heaven, having a drawn sword in his hand stretched out over Jerus." But this, and the corresponding suggestion as to the nature of the flaming sword that kept the way of the tree of life (Gen 3 24), are unsupported conjectures not worthy of attention. The astronomer Pingré thought that the first vision of Jeremiah of the "rod of an almond tree" and of a "boiling caldron" (Jer 1 11.13) had its physical basis in a return of Halley's Comet, and other commentators have thought that cometary appearances were described in the "pillars of smoke" of Joel 2 30; but none of these suggestions appear to have plausibility.

II. The Constellations.—The principal achievement of the science of astronomy in the cents. during which the books of the OT were written was the arrangement and naming of the constellations, and there can be no reasonable doubt that the same system was known to the Hebrews as that which has been handed down to us through the Gr astronomers. St. Paul certainly knew the Gr constellations, for in his sermon on Mars' Hill (Acts 17 28) he quoted from that poetical description of them which Aratus the great poet of Cilicia had written about 270 BC. But these constellations have a much greater antiquity than this, and it is probable that they were well known to Abraham before he left Ur of the Chaldees. It has been frequently shown (The Astronomy of the Bible, 158; Astronomy without a Telescope, 5) that these constellations themselves supply evidence that they were designed about 2700 BC. They thus antedated the time of Abraham by some cents., and since some of their most characteristic forms are found upon old Bab "boundary stones," it is clear that they were known in the country from whence he came out.

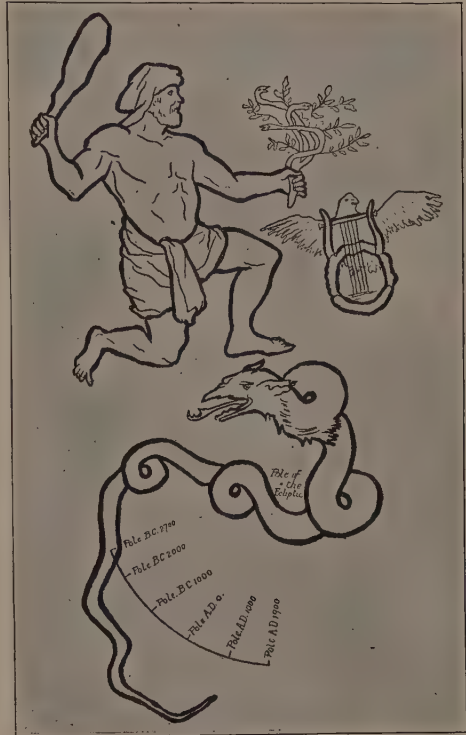

The direct references to these old constellation-forms in Scripture are not numerous. One of the clearest is in Job 26 13, where the Nāhāsh, "formed the crooked serpent" (AV) is used as the correlative of "garnished the heavens"; the great constellation of the writhing Dragon, placed at the crown of the heavens, being used, metaphorically, as an expression for all the constellations of the sky. For by its folds it encircles both the poles, that of the equator and that of the ecliptic.

The term bārīah, rendered "crooked" but better as in RVm as "fleeing," is applied by Isaiah to "Leviathan" (liwyāthān: Isa 27 1), properly a "wreathed" or writhing animal, twisted in folds, and hence also called by the prophet ākallāthōn, "crooked," "twisted," or "winding"; a very appropriate designation for Draco, the great polar Dragon. But the latter was not the only "crooked serpent" in the constellations; there were three others, two of which were placed with an astronomical significance not less precise than the coiling of Draco round the poles. Hydra, the Watersnake, marked out the original celestial equator for about one-third of its circumference, and Serpens, the Adder, lay partly along the celestial equator and then was twisted up the autumnal colure, and reached the zenith with its head.

The arrangement of the twelve signs of the zodiac to mark out the apparent yearly path of the sun, and of these three serpent-forms to hold their respective and significant positions in the heavens, shows that a real progress in astronomy had been made before the constellations were designed, and that their places were allotted to these figures on a definite astronomical plan.

A further purpose is shown by the relation of the three serpents to the neighboring figures, and it is clear that the history preserved in Gen 3 was known to the designers of the constellations, and that they wished to perpetuate its memory by means of the stellar frescoes. For the constellations, Scorpio, Ophiuchus and Serpens, show us a man strangling a snake and standing on a scorpion; the head of the latter he crushes with one foot, but his other foot is wounded by its reverted sting. When these three constellations were due S., that is to say, at midnight in spring-time, Hercules and Draco were due north, and presented the picture of a man kneeling on one knee, and pressing down with his other foot the head of the great northern serpent or dragon. During the winter midnight the zodiacal constellation on the meridian was the Virgin, figured as a woman holding an ear of corn in her hand, while beneath her the immense length of Hydra was stretched out upon its belly in the attitude of a snake when fleeing at full speed. These figures are evidently meant to set forth in picture that which is expressed in word in Gen 3 14, 15, "And Jehovah God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, cursed art thou above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: and I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed: he shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel."

Nor is this the only narrative in Genesis which finds a parallel in the constellations. Among the southern groups we find a ship Argo

4. The Bow that has grounded on a rock; and Set in the Cloud close to it stands a figure, Centaurus, who is apparently slaying an animal, Lupus, beside an Altar. The cloud of smoke arising from the Altar is represented by the Milky Way, and in the midst of the cloud there is set the Bow of the Archer, Sagittarius. Here there seems to be pictured the covenant made with Noah after he offered his sacrifice when he left the ark: "I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth" (Gen 9 13). Thus the constellations, designed several cents. before the time of Abraham, clearly express a knowledge, and appear designed to preserve a remembrance of the two first promises made by God to mankind as recorded in the early chapters of Gen.

Hydra and the Neighboring Constellations.

There is no need to assume, as some writers have done, that all the 48 primitive constellations were of Divine origin, or even that any of them were. If some of the early astronomers possessed in one form or another the histories that we have in Gen 3, 8 and 9, it would not be unnatural for them to attempt to preserve a memorial of them in the heavens by associating these figures with the stars.

It does not follow that all the old constellations have an analogous significance, or that if they have, we should now be able to detect it, and a great deal of ingenuity has been wasted in the attempt to convert the old 48 constellations into a sort of gospel in hieroglyphic. Interpretations of this order were current quite early in Christian times, for they are denounced at considerable length and in detail by St. Hippolytus in his Refutation of All the Heresies, cir 210 AD. Their revival in recent years is chiefly due to Mazzaroth, a series of papers by the late Miss Frances Rolleston in which fanciful etymologies were given to the Arab. names by which the principal stars are known. These names, for the most part, simply indicate the places which the stars were severally supposed to hold in the figures to which they were assigned, and Miss Rolleston's derivations for them are quite misleading and unfounded. Nevertheless her results have been blindly accepted by a number of writers.

Ophiuchus and the Neighboring Constellations.

The peculiar arrangement of the serpent forms in the constellations, and especially the position allotted to Hydra, extended along the equator with its head near the spring

5. The Dragon of Eclipse equinox and its tail near that of autumn, appears to have given rise to the terms "Dragon's Head" Ω , and "Dragon's Tail" Υ , for the nodes or points of intersection of the ecliptic (the apparent path of the sun) with the celestial equator, and hence for nodes in general. As eclipses of the sun and moon can only occur when those bodies are near the nodes of the moon's orbit, that is, near the Dragon's Head or Tail, the myth seems to have arisen that such eclipses were due to one or other of the two great lights being swallowed by a dragon, and a reference to this myth is found in Job 3 8: "Let them curse it that curse the day, who are ready [RVm skilful] to rouse up leviathan." The persons referred to are the magicians who pretended to be able by their incantations to cause an eclipse of the sun by bringing up the mythical dragon that was supposed to devour it. Astronomical nomenclature still retains a trace of these old expressions, for the time taken by the moon to pass from one node to the same node again is still called a "draconic month," a "month of the dragon."

If we realize that the Hebrews were quite familiar with the same constellation figures that we have inherited through the Greeks,

6. Joseph's several indirect allusions to them gain Dream an added meaning. Thus Joseph dreamed that "the sun and the moon and eleven stars made obeisance" to him (Gen 37 9). The twelve constellations of the zodiac are the twelve among which the sun and moon move, and thus constitute, as it were, their family. Eleven of them therefore represented eleven sons of Jacob, Joseph himself being of course the twelfth. There is some evidence that the time came when the suggestion of this dream was acted upon to the extent that some of the tribes adopted certain of the constellation figures by way of crest or armorial bearing. In Nu 2 it is stated that each of the four camps into which the host of Israel was divided had its own standard: "Neither the Mosaic law nor the OT generally gives us any intimation as to the form or character of the standard (degheh). According to rab-

7. The Standards of the Tribes binical tradition, the standard of Judah bore the figure of a lion, that of Reuben the likeness of a man, or of a man's head, that of Ephraim the figure of an ox, and that of Dan the figure of an eagle; so that the four living creatures united in the cherubic forms described by Ezekiel were represented upon these four standards" (Keil and Delitzsch, Commentary on the Pentateuch, III, 17). A variant of this tradition gives as the standard of Reuben, "unstable as water" (Gen 49 4 AV), a Man and a River, and of Dan, "Dan shall be a serpent in the way" (Gen 49 17), an Eagle and a Serpent. These four forms are also found in the constellations in the four quarters of the heavens. Aquarius, the man with a stream of water, and Leo were the original zodiacal constellations of the two solstices, Taurus was that of the spring equinox, and Aquila and Serpens were close to the autumnal equinox, the latter being actually upon the colure.

This distribution of the four cherubic forms in the four quarters of heaven gives a special significance to the invocation used by Hezekiah and the Psalmist, "Thou that dwellest between the cherubims" (Isa 37 16 AV; Ps 80 1 AV). The Shekinah glory rested indeed between the golden cherubim over the ark in the Holy of Holies, but "the Most High dwelleth not in houses made with hands" (Acts 7 48), and the same cherubic forms were pictured on the curtains of the heavens. "Behold, heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain thee" (1 K 8 27); "Thou dwellest between the cherubim," filling the infinite expanse of the stellar universe.

When Balaam saw "Israel dwelling according to their tribes; and the Spirit of God came upon him" (Nu 24 2), it was not unnatural that he should allude in his prophecy to the great standards which he would see floating above the camps, and three of the four appear to be indicated:

9. Balaam's the bull of Joseph—"He hath as it were the strength of the wild-ox"; the lion of Judah—"He lay down as a lion and as a great lion," AV; and Aquarius, the man pouring out a stream of water from a pitcher, the cognizance of Reuben—"Water shall flow from his buckets" (Nu 24 7.8.9).

In a similar way when the prophets refer to the enemies of Israel under the figure of dragons or reptiles, there seems occasionally an indirect reference to the serpents that represent the powers of evil in the pictures that have been associated with that the renderings given in RV are substantially correct.

The word Kīmāh occurs in three passages, in each case in conjunction with Kēšil (Am 5 8; Job 9 9; 38 31). It apparently means a "heap,"

10. Pleiades or "cluster," and is hence especially applicable to the beautiful little group of the Pleiades, the most conspicuous star cluster visible to the naked eye. There is the less uncertainty about this identification since "kima" is the term generally used in Syr lit. to denote the Pleiades.

Six stars can now easily be seen by any good sight, but very keen-sighted persons can detect more; thus Maestlin, the tutor of Kepler, mapped the star groups. Thus in Isa 27 1, ERV, it is prophesied that the Lord "shall punish leviathan the swift serpent, and leviathan the crooked serpent; and He shall slay the dragon that is in the sea"; the first allusion being appropriate to the attitude of Hydra, the second to Draco, the third to Cetus. Whilst the group of constellations, Andromeda, Cetus and Eridanus, the woman persecuted by a dragon that casts a river out of its mouth, a river which flowing down below the horizon appears to be swallowed up by the earth, would seem to have furnished St. John with some of the material for the imagery of Rev 12 in his great vision.

Besides references direct or indirect to the familiar constellation figures, four special astronomical terms occur in the Heb of the OT which have given rise to much discussion. These are Kīmāh, Kēšil, Mazzārōth and ʿAyish. The tradition of their significance had been lost before the LXX tr was made, but it may be taken as practically certain 11 before the invention of the telescope, and in recent times Carrington and Denning have counted 14 with the naked eye. Still, 6 is the number visible to most persons, though there is a curiously widespread and uniform tradition that they once "were seven who now are six," and seven is the number almost always assigned to them in literature. Hesiod calls them "the seven sisters, the Virgin stars," and Milton, "the seven Atlantic sisters," as representing the daughters of Atlas. Many of the Gr poets, however, regarded them as Peleiades, "rock pigeons," doves, flying from the hunter Orion; but whether they have been considered as representing doves or maidens, seven has still been their traditional number. Possibly one of the group has declined in brightness in the course of the cents.; Alcyone would seem to have increased in brightness, for though now the brightest, it is not one of the four that figure in Ptolemy's Catalogue, and if one has increased in brightness, others may have diminished. In the telescope many hundreds of stars are visible. The photographic plate has registered thousands and shows the principal stars as enveloped and threaded together by delicate streams of nebulous matter, the stars shining on these filamentous lines of light like pearls upon a string. This, the appearance of the Pleiades on the best modern photographs, would be strikingly appropriate to the rendering of Job 38 31, which has been adopted in the RV, "Canst thou bind the cluster [in "chain"] of the Pleiades?" and the question put to Job would be equivalent to asking him if it were his power that had brought together the Pleiades and bound them in so compact a cluster. This rendering which involves the reading "ma'ânaddôth" is supported by the LXX, and all the early versions, and hence by nearly all Orientalists. The reading in MT, "ma'âdhan-nôth," that is to say, "dainties" or "delights," and adopted in AV, where the word is paraphrased as "sweet influences," is however correct, as will be shown below.

The designation of the group as that of the seven stars gives a special significance to one of the details of the vision of St. John: "I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the candlesticks one like unto a son of man, . . . And He had in his right hand seven stars: . . . The seven stars are the angels of the seven churches: and the seven candlesticks are seven churches" (Rev 1 12.13.16.20). The seven stars in a single compact cluster shining as one, furnish an image of the church in its many diversities and its essential unity.

It may be well to correct here a certain widely diffused error. When it was discovered that the sun itself with all its attendant planets was traveling rapidly through space, the German astronomer Mädler hazarded the suggestion that the center of the sun's motion, the attracting body that governed it, might lie in the group of the Pleiades, and this suggestion has been quoted in many popular writings as if it were a demonstrated fact. It soon became evident that there was no sufficient ground for the suggestion, and the idea has been entirely abandoned by astronomers.

The word K'sîl as denominating a constellation occurs in the singular number in three passages, and in each it is placed in antithesis 11. Orion to Kîmâh. In a fourth passage (Isa 13 10) it occurs by itself and is in the plural. There is no doubt as to the significance of the word in its common use. In 70 cases it is tr^d either "fool" or "foolish." It does not signify a weak-minded person, so much as a violent, impious, self-confident one. As a star name, it is probably rightly considered to refer to the glorious constellation of Orion. According to an old tradition, the name of Nimrod, mentioned in Gen 10 10, as the founder of Babel, Erech, Accad and Calneh, was given by his courtiers to this most brilliant of all the constellations, one that by its form somewhat suggests a gigantic warrior armed for the fight. Until recently it was not found possible to identify the Nimrod of Scripture with any Bab monarch until Dr. T. G. Pinches suggested that "Nimrod" was a deliberate Heb transmutation of "Marduk," the name of the great Bab national hero, and chief deity of their pantheon. "The change was brought about by making the root triliteral, and the ending uk (ak) in Merodach-Baladan disappearing first, Marduk appeared as Marad. This was connected with the root māradh, 'to be rebellious,' and the word was still further mutilated, or rather deformed, by having a ni attached, assimilating it to a certain extent to the niph'al forms of the Heb vbs., and making a change altogether in conformity with the genius of the Heb language" (The Old Testament in the Light of the Historical Records of Assyria and Babylonia, 129-30). In the very brief reference to Nimrod in Gen 10 8.9, he is three times overemphatically termed gibbôr, "a mighty (one)" and this has been the name of this constellation among Syrians, Arabs and Jews for many centuries. Indeed the brightest star of the constellation, the one in the left knee, now generally known as Rigel, is still occasionally called Algebar, a corruption of Al Jabbar, though now one of the fainter stars near it more generally bears that name. The word K'sîl as applied to this constellation would parallel closely the etymology suggested for the name "Merodach," by its transformation into "Nimrod" as if it were derived from māradh, "to rebel." He who was to the Babylonians a deified hero, was to the Hebrews a rebel Titan, bound in chains among the stars that all might behold his punishment, and in this aspect the question, "Canst thou . . . loose the bands of Orion?" (Job 38 31) would be equivalent to asking "Canst thou bring down out of their places the stars that make up this figure and so, as it were, set the Titan free?"

In Isa 13 10, k'sîl occurs in the plur. k'sîlîm, "for the stars of heaven and the constellations thereof shall not give their light"; k'sîlîm being tr^d as "constellations" under the impression that Orion, the brightest of all the constellations, is here put for the constellations in general. This is no doubt correct, but the context shows that the meaning goes farther than this, and that the k'sîlîm who were to be darkened were the proud and arrogant tyrants like Nimrod or Merodach who would, if possible, climb up into heaven itself, even as Orion is represented in our star atlases as if trying to climb up into the zodiac—the home of the sun.

A further astronomical term which occurs in Job 38 32 is left untr^d in both AV and the RV, viz. the word Mazzārôth. It occurs 12. Maz-zārôth only once in the OT, but the similar word mazzālôth, tr^d "planets" in AV and RV, occurs in 2 K 23 5. For the latter see ASTROLOGY. In the fifth tablet of the Bab Epic of Creation, we read:

1. He [Marduk] made the station for the great gods;
2. The stars, their images, as the stars of the zodiac he fixed.
3. He ordained the year, and into sections [mizrâta] he divided it.
4. For the twelve months he fixed three stars.

Here in the third line, mizrâta, cognate with the Heb mazzārôth, means the sections or divisions of the year, corresponding to the signs of the zodiac mentioned in the second line.

Yet again when Job 9 9 is compared with Job 38 31.32, it is seen that the place of the word mazzārôth in the latter passage is held by the expression "the chambers of the south" (ḥadhrê thēmān) in the earlier. Mazzārôth therefore is equivalent to "the chambers of the south," and clearly signifies the twelve constellations of the zodiac through which the sun appears to pass in the course of the year, poetically likened to the "inns," the "chambers" or "tabernacles" in which the sun successively rests during the several monthly stages of his annual journey. The same idea was employed by the Arabs in their "mansions of the moon," its "lodging-houses" (menazil), which are 28 in number, since the moon takes 28 days to make the circuit of the heavens, just as the sun takes 12 months.

The word Mazzārôth therefore represents the twelve "signs" or, to speak more correctly, the twelve "constellations" of the zodiac. These two terms are often used indiscriminately, but there is a real difference between their significations. The constellations of the zodiac are the actual groupings of the stars, lying along the ecliptic, and are quite irregular in form and length. The signs have no connection with the actual stars but are imaginary divisions of the ecliptic, all exactly equal in length, and they are reckoned from that point in the heavens where the sun is at the moment that it is crossing the celestial equator in its northward motion in springtime. As this point, known to astronomers as "the first point of Aries," moves slowly amongst the stars, taking 25,800 years to complete a revolution of the heavens, the signs of the zodiac also move among the stars, and hence, though at one time each sign bore a rough and general correspondence to the constellation of the same name, the signs have been gradually drawn away from them. The constellations of the zodiac were designed about 2700 BC, but the signs—the equal divisions of the zodiac named from them—cannot have been adopted earlier than 700 BC, and were probably even later. For since Aries is the first of the signs, it is clear that it was the first of the constellations at the time when the equal division of the zodiac was effected, and 700 BC is the very earliest date that the constellation Aries can have been so regarded. Incidentally it may be remarked that the mention in the Bab story of creation of the allotment of three stars to each of the sections (Mizrata) of the year, shows that not only had the division of the zodiac into 12 equal signs been effected, but that a further step had been taken, namely, the division of each sign into 3 equal parts, later known amongst the Greeks as its "decans," corresponding roughly to the 36 decades of the Egypt calendar. Whatever, therefore, may have been the antiquity of the traditions embodied in it, the actual Bab poem quoted above, so far from being an early document, as it was at one time supposed to be, is probably almost as late as the destruction of Jerus by Nebuchadnezzar.

There are three constellations, natural groupings of the stars, the Pleiades and Orion and "Charles's Wain," which have always attracted men's attention, and we accordingly find them referred to in the earliest poems extant. Thus they are the three groups of the stars most frequently mentioned by Homer and Hesiod. The two first groups, the Pleiades and Orion, are, as we have seen, indicated by Kīmāh and K'ešil. We should therefore naturally expect that the third constellation which we find associated with these in the Book of Job should be none other than the seven bright stars in the N., the principal part of the Great Bear. The Heb name for this third constellation appears in two slightly different forms. It is 'ash in Job 9 9, and 'ayish in Job 38 32, and in the latter case it is connected with its "sons." The last star of Charles's Wain or the Plough, as the group is often called among ourselves, still bears the name Benetnasch, derived from the Arab. name Benet Na'sh, "the daughters of the Bier," by which the Arabs designated the three stars in the Plough-handle, while they called the four stars in the body of the Plough, Na'sh, "the bier" or "litter." Na'sh and its daughters so closely correspond to "ayish and its sons," that there can be no reasonable doubt that the same seven bright stars are intended; so that the rendering of RV, "Canst thou guide the Bear with her train?" correctly reproduces the original meaning. The Arcturus of the AV is derived from Vulg, where it is probably a mistake for Arctos, that is to say, Ursa Major, the Great Bear.

The antithesis which is presented in Job 38 32 now reveals itself. The Mazzārōth are the twelve constellations of the zodiac, and of these each one rules the night for about a month in its turn; they are each "led forth" in its "season." Each, in its turn, is the "chamber," "tabernacle" or "resting-place" of the sun, and they are appropriately called "chambers of the south," since it is especially in the southern sky that each is seen. In contrast to these are the northern constellations, those round the pole, of which the Great Bear or Charles's Wain is the brightest and best known. At the time of the origin of the constellations, this group was much nearer the pole of the heavens than at present, but now as then these stars are not "led forth," for they are visible at all hours and during every night; but they are "guided"; they move round the pole of the heavens in an unending circle, as if the wain or chariot were being guided by a skilful driver.

(1) The "Scatterers."—There is some probability that in Job 37 9 the same two regions of the heavens are alluded to: "Out of the chamber of the south cometh the storm, and cold out of the north." It will be observed that the complete expression, "chamber of the south," is not in the original, the translators having supplied "of the south" from analogy with Job 9 9. The sirocco comes then from the region held by the mazzāl, the "chamber," or constellation of the zodiac, then on the meridian. But the cold, the blizzard, comes from "the scatterers" (M'zārīm). Who or what are the scatterers, and why do they represent the north? The late Professor Schiaparelli suggested that by a slight difference in the pointing, the word might be read as mizrayim, "the two winnowing fans," and that this may well have been a native term for the stars which we now know as the two Bears, Ursa Major and Minor, emphatically the northern constellations; the names being given them from the natural grouping of their chief stars, just as they are known as the two "Dippers" in the United States, or the two "Ladles" in China (Astronomy in the Old Testament, 67-72).

(2) The ordinances of heaven.—The astronomical antithesis between Mazzārōth, the constellations of the zodiac ("led forth" each "in its season"), and 'Ayish, "the Bear with her train" ("guided" in its unceasing revolution round the pole), is so complete and astronomically appropriate, that there is reason to expect an antithesis as clear and as astronomically significant between the two clauses of the preceding verse. But the rendering of RV does not afford anything of the kind: "Canst thou bind the cluster of the Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" is simply equivalent to the question as to whether Job could fix these stars in their places in the sky; and for an inquiry so perfectly general, one constellation would be no more appropriate than another. The true rendering must certainly bring out some difference or at least distinction between the two constellations or the use that was made of them.

And in the third passage in which Kīmāh and K'ešil are mentioned together an important distinction is hinted at. The order in Am 5 8 suggests that the Pleiades corresponded in some way to daybreak, Orion to nightfall: "That maketh the Pleiades and Orion, and turneth the shadow of death into the morning, and maketh the day dark with night." Sunrise turns "the shadow of death into the morning," and in the progress of the seasons the analogous change on the higher scale is effected when Nature revives from the death of winter in the morning of the year, that is to say, at the return of spring. And at the time of the origin of the constellations the Pleiades were the harbingers of this change at their "cosmical" rising, that is to say, when they rose with the sun at daybreak they brought back the "delights" of spring-time.

Similarly sunset makes "the day dark with night," and in the progress of the seasons the analogous change on the higher scale is effected when the long nights and short days of winter set in the evening of the year, and all nature is bound as by iron bands, in cold and frost. And at the time of the origin of the constellations, the "acronychal" rising of Orion, i.e. its rising at nightfall, was the harbinger of this change; the rigor of winter formed "the bands of Orion."

These regular changes in the appearances and positions of the constellations constitute the ordinances of the heavens, ordinances which Job could neither alter for the worse by holding back the delights of springtime, or for the better by breaking the bonds of winter cold. But these ordinances were not confined in their effects to the heavens; their dominion was established on the earth, which answered by the revival of vegetation when the Pleiades, then nearly in conjunction with the sun, appeared for a short time before sunrise; and by the return of the constraints of cold and frost when Orion, in opposition to the sun, rode the sky the whole night long.

The completeness and beauty of the imagery will now be apparent.

The Pleiades stood for the East, since by their rising just before daybreak, they heralded the morning of the year and the "delights" of springtime.

Orion stood for the West, since his appearing just after nightfall heralded the evening of the year, and the bands of winter cold.

Mazzārōth, the twelve constellations of the zodiac, the "chambers of the south," each "led forth" from the underworld in its own "season," stood for the South.

And the "Bear with her train," "guided" in their unceasing course round the pole, stood for the circumpolar constellations in the North.

And the movements of them all in a perfect obedience to the law of God were the ordinances of heaven; whilst the dominion of them was seen to be established upon the earth in the constant succession of the seasons there in unfailing answer to the changes in the stars above.

These three verses give us a vivid picture of the work of primitive astronomy. The science was then in an early stage of development, but it was a real science, a science of observation, thoroughly sound so far as it had progressed, and showing high intelligence on the part of those who pursued it. We now know that the movement of "the Bear with her train," that is, the apparent rotation of the heavens round the pole, is due to the real rotation of the earth upon its axis; that the bringing out of "the Mazzārōth in their season," apparently due to the revolution of the sun round the earth, is due to the real revolution of the earth round the sun. But this knowledge which has enabled us to see where the actual movements lie has not brought us any nearer penetrating the mystery of those movements. What is the ultimate cause of the rotation of this vast globe, we know no more than the ancients knew what caused the heavens to rotate; what causes it to fly through space 18 miles in every second of time, we know no more than the ancients knew why the sun appeared to move among the stars. To us, as to them, it is the power of God, and the will of God.

It has been supposed by some scholars that the Book of Job was written during the Captivity in Babylon, but this supposition is untenable in view of the statement in 14. The Date of the Book of Job The Job's Apology that the worship of the heavenly bodies was "an iniquity to be punished by the judges" (Job 31 26-28).

This could not have been written by Jews in exile amongst the worshippers of Šamaš and Sin. But neither can this book have been written after the Return. The meaning of the three terms, 'Ayish, Kīmāh and K'sīl, had been lost before the LXX made the rendering of the Heb Scriptures into Gr, for in Am 5 8 they left Kīmāh and K'sīl untr^d, and they rendered 'Ayish and K'sīl differently in Job 9 9, and 38 31.32. Before the Captivity, Kīmāh and K'sīl were plainly in common use, since Amos uses them as if they were familiar to his hearers, and as he himself points out, he was not a man of learning but a simple herdsman. The obvious and sufficient explanation of the later ignorance respecting these three terms lies in the catastrophes of the Assyrian and Babylonian conquests. Not less significant of their complete loss of the old Heb astronomy is the alteration which the LXX made in the Heb text. The "delights of the Pleiades" had evidently no more meaning for them than they have had for the majority of modern Orientalists, and no doubt it seemed a plausible and legitimate emendation to write ma'ānaddōth, "chains," instead of ma'ādhanōth, "delights," so as to bring about a fancied parallelism with mōsh'khōth, the "bands" of Orion. But the alteration transforms a complete, beautiful and symmetrical figure, an epitome of the astronomical observation of the time, into a bald tautology. Those critics are therefore right who assign the Book of Job and the Isa 13 to the period before the Captivities, and the three names come to us as indications, not of a Bab science of astronomy, learned by the Jews during their exile, but of a Heb astronomy destroyed by the unspeakable disaster of the conquest.

III. Physiography.—It has generally been assumed that the Hebrews considered the earth to be a vast circular plain, arched over by a solid vault—"the firmament"—above which were stored, as if in cisterns, the "treasures" (Job 38 22) of the rain, snow and hail, and some writers have even attempted to express this supposed conception in diagrammatic form. One of the best of these attempts, reproduced below, is given by Schiaparelli, in his Astronomy in the OT.

But this assumption is in reality based more upon the ideas prevalent in Europe during the Dark Ages than upon any actual statements in the OT.

1. The Circle of the Earth The same word (hūgh) used in the OT to express the roundness of the heavens (Job 22 14) is also used when the circle of the earth is spoken of (Isa 40 22), and it is likewise applied to the deep (Prov 8 27). Now it is obvious that the heavens are spherical in appearance, and to an attentive observer it is clear that the surface of the sea is also rounded. There is therefore no sufficient warrant for the assumption that the Hebrews must have regarded the earth as flat.

(1) The earth a sphere.—Certain astronomical relations were recognized very early. The stars appear as if attached to a globe rotating round the earth once in 24 hours, and this appearance was clearly familiar to the author of the Book of Job, and indeed long before the time of Abraham, since the formation of the constellations could not have been effected without such recognition. But the spherical form of the heavens almost involves a similar form for the earth, and their apparent diurnal rotation certainly means that they are not rigidly connected with the earth, but surround it on all sides at some distance from it. The earth therefore must be freely suspended in space, and so the Book of Job describes it: "He stretcheth out the north over empty space, and hangeth the earth upon nothing" (Job 26 7).

SCHIAPARELLI'S HEBREW WORLD

The author's cut representing the Hebrew universe, with his accompanying explanations, is here reproduced.

HEAVEN, THE EARTH, AND THE ABYSSES
According to the writers of the Old Testament.—Schiaparelli

Explanatory Key:

ABC — the upper heaven; ADC — the curve of the abyss; AEC — the plane of the earth and sea; SRS — various parts of the sea, EEE — various parts of the earth; GHG — the profile of the firmament or lower heaven; KK — the storehouses of the winds; LL — the storehouses of the upper waters, of snow, and of hail, M — the space occupied by the air, within which the clouds move; NN — the waters of the great abyss; xxx — the fountains of the great abyss; PP — Sheol or limbo; Q — the lower part of the same, the Inferno properly so called.

From "The Earliest Cosmologies." By W. F. Warren.

(2) The north stretched over empty space.—Here the "north" signifies the northern circumpolar constellations and the writer recognized that they stretch out beyond the utmost confines of the earth; so that he was not under any impression that the heavens rested upon the earth, or were borne up by mountains. The celestial sphere surrounded the earth entirely, but at a distance from it; between the two there was "empty space." Some commentators have indeed claimed that Job 26 10, "He hath described a boundary upon the face of the waters, unto the confines of light and darkness," is equivalent to a statement that the circumference of the terrestrial plain extended to the place where sea and sky met. But no man of intelligence can, at any time, have supposed that the sea horizon marked the dividing line between day and night, and the meaning of the passage is correctly given in AV, "until the day and night come to an end"; in other words, the waters of the sea will be confined to their appointed place never again to overflow the earth so long as the succession of day and night shall continue (cf Gen 8 22; 9 15).

(3) The corners of the earth.—See EARTH, CORNERS OF.

'ereç, "the earth," is in general the surface of the earth, the dry land inhabited by man and beast.

Hence "the pillars" of the earth (Job 9 6) are the rocks that bear up that surface, for as has been shown, it was quite clear to the author of the Book of Job, and to the primitive astronomers, that our world was unsupported in space. For "Vault of the Earth" see EARTH, VAULT OF.

(1) The Hebrew conception.—Above the spherical earth was stretched out the "firmament" (rāḳiā') made on the second day of creation to "divide the waters from the waters" (Gen 1 6). To the Hebrews the "firmament" was the apparent void above, in which clouds float and the

3. The Firmament lights of heaven pursue their appointed paths. The word rāḳiā', by its etymology, suggests an expanse, something stretched, spread or beaten out, as when Isaiah (40 22) says that the Lord "stretcheth out the heavens as a curtain, and spreadeth them out as a tent to dwell in." But the Gr word sterēōma, by which the LXX rendered rāḳiā', gives the meaning of a firm and solid structure, and our translators have carried out this same idea in their Eng. rendering of "firmament."

(2) The Alexandrian conception.—In this however the LXX simply expressed the astronomical science of their day as accepted in Alexandria, where the doctrine of a succession of solid crystalline spheres, each carrying a planet, held currency. But in order to express the Heb idea, rāḳiā' should be rendered "expanse" or "space"; it corresponds to the "empty space" of Job 26 7. This "expanse" was appointed to divide "the waters which were under the expanse, from the waters which were above the expanse"; and it has been argued from this that the upper waters must have been regarded as being inclosed in a watertight reservoir, furnished with sluices or floodgates, which could be opened to allow the rain to fall.

Thus in the account of the Flood, "the windows of heaven" are said to have been opened. But,

'ārubbāh, "window," means a network, or lattice, a form which can never have been ascribed to a literal floodgate; of Heaven and in the other passages where "the windows of heaven" are mentioned the expression is obviously metaphorical (2 K 7 2.19; Isa 24 18; Mal 3 10).

Further the numerous other references to rain connect it with the clouds, as "I will also command the clouds that they rain no rain" (Isa 5 6), or in the Song of Deborah,

5. Rain "The clouds dropped water" (Jgs 5 4; see also Ps 77 17; 147 8; Prov 16 15; Eccl 12 2). The fantastic idea of solidly built cisterns in the sky furnished with sluices has no warrant in Scripture. So far from any such crude conception, there is a very clear and complete account of the atmospheric circulation. Elihu describes the process of evaporation, "For he draweth up the drops of water, which distil in rain from his vapor, which the skies pour down and drop upon man abundantly" (Job 36 27.28).

Jeremiah and the Psalmist repeat the description, "He causeth the vapors to ascend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings

6. Clouds for the rain, and bringeth forth the wind out of his treasures" (Jer 10 13). By the foreshortening that clouds undergo in the distance they inevitably appear to form chiefly on the horizon, "at the ends of the earth," whence they move upward toward the zenith.

Thus God "calleteth for the waters of the sea, and poureth them out upon the face of the earth" (Am 9 6); and thus "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the place whither the rivers go, thither they go again" (Eccl 1 7). Other references to the clouds in the Book of Job reveal not merely observation but acute reflection. "Dost thou know the balancings of the clouds, the wondrous works of him who is perfect in knowledge?" (Job 37 16) indicates a perception that the clouds float, each in its own place, at its own level, each perfectly balanced in the thin air.

(1) Meaning of the word.—T'hōm, "the deep," means moving water, and hence the ocean, which is represented as being essentially one, exactly as we now know it to be by actual exploration—"Let the waters under the heavens be gathered together unto one place" (Gen 1 9). And the earth

7. The Deep is stretched out "above the waters" (Ps 136 6; Ps 24 2). That is to say that the water surface lies lower than the land surface; and not only so, but, within the substance of the earth itself, there are subterranean waters which form a kind of ocean underground. This also is called in Ezk 31 4 the "deep," t'hôm; "The waters nourished it, the deep made it to grow." But in general t'hôm denotes the sea, as when Pharaoh's chosen captains were drowned in the Red Sea, "The deeps cover them" (Ex 15 5). Indeed the word appears to be onomatopoeic derived from the "moaning" or "humming" of the sea; whilst 'erec, the "earth," seems intended to represent the "rattle" of shingle, "the scream of a madden'd beach dragged down by the wave."

(2) The Bab dragon of Chaos.—In Gen 1, t'hôm denotes the primeval waters, and the resemblance of the word to Tiamat, the name of the Bab she-dragon of Chaos, has led some commentators to ascribe a Bab origin to this ch. It need hardly be pointed out that if this resemblance proves any connection between the Heb and Bab accounts of creation, it proves the Heb to be the original. The natural object, t'hôm, the sea, must have preceded the mythological personification of it.

ASTYAGES, as-ti'a-jēs ('Αστυάγης, Astúagēs; or Astyigas [in Ktesias], or Istuvigu, son of Cyaxares I, king of the Medes 585-550 BC, and predecessor of Cyrus (Bel ver 1): His wife was the daughter of Alyattes, king of Lydia. The daughter of Astyages (Mandane) married a Persian, Cambyses, and a son was born to them who later became Cyrus the Great. Astyages had given orders to expose the babe; but Harpagus, on whom the task had been imposed, gave the child to a herdsman, with instructions to kill him. When the boy, who had been brought up as his own by the herdsman, arrived at the age of twelve, Astyages discovered that he was the son of Mandane. The king in wrath then had the son of Harpagus killed and served to his father as food. The latter concealed his feelings of hatred and resentment, and bided his time; and when the young Cyrus had grown to manhood, he stirred up the grandson in insurrection against Astyages, who was defeated and taken prisoner (Herodotus i.127-30). When Astyages marched against the Persians, the Medes, under the command of Harpagus, deserted their king, and sided with the disappointed Persians; and Cyrus was crowned king. This account of Herodotus is confirmed by the Annalistic Tablet of Cyrus (RP, ser. ii, 159). The dethroned monarch was treated with kindness by his conqueror. According to Ktesias, a home was provided for him by Cyrus in Hyrcania.

Astyages was the last of the kings of the Manda (Media). An exceedingly shrewd man, Deioces by name, had founded the kingdom 150 years before (699-646). Phraortes was the second in line (646-624), and Cyaxares the third (624-584).

ASUNDER, a-sun'dér: This word occurs 22 times in AV, 13 in OT and 9 in the NT. It is found in combination with break (twice), burst, cleave (twice), depart, cut (six times), divide (three times), drive, part, pluck, put (twice), rend, saw. These are the tr of 9 Heb, and 4 Gr words.

Break asunder (1) (פָּרַץ, parpar): Job, in reply to Eliphaz, complains about God, "I was at ease, and he brake me asunder" (Job 16 12). (2)

Burst asunder (ἀσκαῶ, laskō): This was the fate of Judas (Acts 1 18).

Cleave asunder (1) (נִבְחָה, nibhka): The same root as of bik'ah, "a valley." "The ground cleave asunder" and swallowed up Dathan and Abiram with their households (Nu 16 31). (2) (פָּלַח, pillah): Job complains of God, "He cleaveth my reins asunder" (Job 16 13).

Cut asunder (1) (קָצַץ, kiççēç): The Lord "cut asunder the cords of the wicked" (Ps 129 4). The Heb word is used of cutting into wires or strips (Ex 39 3). (2) (גָּדַח, gādhā): "to cut off a branch or cut down a tree." "How is the hammer of the whole earth [Babylon] cut asunder!" (Jer 50 23). Zechariah "cut asunder" the staff "Beauty," signifying the breach of the covenant between Jeh and His people, and also the staff "Bands," signifying the breach of the brotherhood between Judah and Israel (Zec 11 10.14). (3) (διχοτομέω, dichotoméō): The fate of the Unfaithful Steward, lit. "cut in two"; RvM "severely scourge him" (Mt 24 51; Lk 12 46). See PUNISHMENTS.

Depart asunder (ἀποχωρίζομαι, apochōrizomai): Paul and Barnabas "departed asunder from one another" (Acts 15 39 AV); RV "parted asunder."

Divide asunder (1) (הִבְדִּיל, hibhdil): Usually to separate, to make a division between. Here the reference is to the offering of pigeons or turtle-doves (Lev 1 17; 5 8). (2) (μερισμός, merismós): From merizō, "to divide." The noun is abstract, "the act of dividing." The word of God pierces "even to the dividing of soul and spirit" (He 4 12).

Drive asunder (הִתִּיר, hittir): Lit. "to cause to tremble," then "to loosen." God "drove asunder the nations" (Hab 3 6).

Part asunder (הִפְרִיד, hiphridh): With prep. bēn, "between," "to separate." The chariot and horses of fire "parted asunder" Elijah and Elisha (2 K 2 11).

Pluck asunder (διασπάω, diaspāō): To bear asunder, to part forcibly. "Chains had been plucked asunder" by the demoniac of the Gerasenes (Mk 5 4 AV); RV "rent asunder."

Put asunder (χωρίζω, chōrizō): To sever one from another. See the words of Jesus on divorce (Mt 19 6; Mk 10 9).

Rend asunder (נִבְחָה, nibhka): The same Heb word as "cleave asunder." (1) "And No shall be rent asunder" (Ezk 30 16 AV); RV "broken up." (2) RV for AV "plucked asunder" (Mk 5 4).

Saw asunder (πρίζω, prizō or πρίω, priō): The fate of some on the roll of faith, "They were sawn asunder" (He 11 37). See also PUNISHMENTS.

S. F. HUNTER

ASUPPIM, a-sup'im, HOUSE OF ASUPPIM (בֵּית הָאֲשֻּׁפִּים, bēth hā-'āšuppim): AVm "gatherings"; RV "the storehouses." In Neh 12 25, AV renders the same word thresholds (AVm "treasures, assemblies"). A storehouse most probably at the southern gate of the temple (1 Ch 26 15.17; Neh 12 25).

ASUR, as'ur ('Ασοῦρ, Asoúr): RV for Assur in 1 Esd 5 31. Same as Harhur of Ezr 2 51.

ASYLUM, a-si'lum: The custom of fleeing to specially sacred places to obtain the protection of a deity is found all over the world (Post, Grundriss, II, 252 ff). In ancient Israel we meet with it in two forms—the asylum of the altar and the asylum of the cities of refuge. The altar at the House of God was a place to which persons in danger fled for protection (1 K 1 50; 2 28). It had horns and must not be confused with the altars of earth or stone that were used for lay sacrifices. See ALTAR; SANCTUARY. Ex 21 14 provides that a murderer is to be taken from the altar to be put to death. The law of the cities of refuge proceeds upon a somewhat different principle. Its objects are (1) to shield a homicide from the avenger of blood until trial, and (2) to provide a refuge for the manslayer who has not been guilty of murder. There is one reference to the institution in the history of the kingdom (2 S 14 14). For the legal and geographical information, see CITIES OF REFUGE; HOMICIDE.

HAROLD M. WIENER

ASYNCRITUS, a-sin'kri-tus (Ἀσύνκριτος, Asún-kritos, "incomparable"): An unknown Christian at Rome to whom St. Paul sent an affectionate salutation (Rom 16 14).

ATAD, ā'tad (אָתָד, 'āṭādh, "a thorn"). See ABEL-MIZRAIM.

ATAR, at'ar (Ἀτάρ, Atár; AV Jatal=Ater [Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45]): The sons of A. (porters) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 28).

ATARAH, at'a-rā, a-tā'ra (אֶתְרָה, 'āṭārāh, "crown"): One of Jerahmeel's wives and mother of Onam (1 Ch 2 26).

ATARGATIS, a-tār'ga-tis (Ἀταργάτις, Atargátis; RV wrongly ATERGATIS): Is stated in 2 Macc 12 26 to have been worshipped at Karnion, the Ashtaroth-Karnaim of the OT (cf Ant, XII, viii, 4). The name is found on coins of Membij as אֶתְרָתָה, 'atar-'atah, where 'Atar (i.e. Ashtoreth) is identified with the goddess 'Atah, whose name is sometimes written אֶתָּה, 'Atā. 'Atah or 'Ati was also worshipped at Palmyra, and (according to Melito) in Adiabene. The compound Atargatis, often corrupted by the Greeks into Derketo, had her chief temples at Membij (Hierapolis) and Ashkelon where she was represented with the body of a woman and the tail of a fish, fish being sacred to her. Herodotus made her the Aphrodite Urania of the Greeks. 'Ati may have been originally a Hittite goddess with whom the Assyrian Istar ('Atar) came afterward to be identified. A. H. SAYCE

ATAROTH, at'a-roth, a-tā'roth (אֶתְרוֹת, 'āṭārōth, "crowns," or "wreaths"; Ἀταρώθ, Atarōth):

(1) A city E. of the Jordan, apparently in the territory given to Reuben, but built, or fortified, by the children of Gad (Nu 32 3,34). It is named along with Dibon, which is identified with Dhibān. Eight miles N.E. by N. of Dibon, on the S. of Wādy Zerkā Ma'in, stands Jebel 'Attārūs, in which the ancient name is preserved. The city is doubtless represented by Khīrbet 'Attārūs, about 4 miles W. of the mountain.

(2) A place on the boundary between Ephraim and Benjamin, toward the W. (Josh 16 2). It seems to be the same as Ataroth-addar of ver 5 and 18 13. It is probably to be identified with the modern ed-Dāriyeh S. of nether Bethhoron, and about 12½ miles W. of Jerus.

(3) A place on the eastern frontier of Ephraim (Josh 16 7). This town has not been identified. Conder thinks it may be identified with et-Trūneh in the Jordan valley, or with Khīrbet et-Taiyereh.

ATAROTH-ADDAR, at'a-roth-ad'ār (אֶתְרוֹת אֲדָר, 'āṭrōth 'addār, "crowns of Addar"). See ATAROTH (2).

ATER, ā'tēr (אֶתֶר, 'āṭēr, "bound" [?]): (1) The ancestor of a family of 98 persons who returned from Bab captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 16; Neh 7 21). AV has "Ater of Hezekiah"; RV of 1 Esd 5 15 has "Ater of Ezekias," m, "Ater of Hezekiah." AV has "Aterezias."

(2) The head of a family of porters who returned from Babylon to Jerus (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45).

ATEREZAIAS, a-tēr-ē-zī'as (Ἀτέρ τῷ Ἑζεκία, Atēr tō Hezekia): Usually found in the abbreviated form Ater. Head of a Jewish family, which returned with Zerubbabel, under the decree of Cyrus. Mentioned (Ezr 2 16) as sprung from Hezekiah. Their number is given as 98. Mentioned again as found in the register of the genealogies of the first returned exiles by Nehemiah (7 21). Again among those who sealed "the sure covenant" (Neh 10 17). Also found in 1 Esd 5 15, where the name is given variously as Ater or Aterezias. The number of the family, given by Esdras, is 92.

ATERGATIS, a-tēr'ga-tis. See ATARGATIS.

ATETA, a-tē'ta (AV Teta; A, Ἀτητά, Atēṭá, B, om.): Head of a family of Levites; gate keepers who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 28); called Hatita in Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45.

ATHACH, ā'thak (אֶתָּח, 'āthākh, "lodging-place"): One of the cities of Judah to which David sent from Ziklag the spoil of the Amalekites (1 S 30 30). Its site is unknown. Driver, Budde, and Wellhausen identify it with Ether (Josh 15 42).

ATHAIAH, a-thā'ya (אֶתְיָה, 'āthāyāh="Jeh is helper"; Ἀθεά, Atheá, or Ἀθεαί, Atheaí): He is designated (Neh 11 4) as a descendant of Judah and the son of Uziah. After the return from Babylon, he dwelt in Jerus. In 1 Ch 9 4 his name is given as Uthai.

ATHALIAH, ath-a-lí'a (אֶתְלִיָּה, 'āthalyāh; meaning uncertain, perhaps, "whom Jeh has afflicted"; 2 K 8 26; 11; 2 Ch 22, 23):

(1) Daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, granddaughter of Omri, 6th king of Israel. In her childhood the political relations of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel had, after many years of strife, become friendly, and she was married to Jehoram, eldest son of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah (2 K 8 18). The marriage was one of political expediency, and is a blot on the memory of Jehoshaphat.

When Jehoram was 32 years of age, he succeeded to the throne, and Athaliah became queen of Judah.

She inherited her mother's strength of will, and like her developed a fanatical devotion to the cultus of the Zidonian Baal. Elijah's blow at the worship of Baal in Samaria shortly before her accession to power did nothing to mitigate her zeal. It probably intensified it. The first recorded act of Jehoram's reign is the murder of his six younger brothers; some princes of the realm, who were known to be favorable to the ancient faith of the nation, were also destroyed (2 Ch 21 4). There can be little doubt that these deeds of blood were supported, and perhaps instigated, by Athaliah, who was a much stronger character than her husband.

After eight years of royal life, Athaliah became a widow, and her son, Ahaziah, then 22 years of age (2 K 8 26; not 42 as in 2 Ch 22 2), ascended his father's throne. As queen-mother, Athaliah was now supreme in the councils of the nation, as well as in the royal palace. Within a single year, the young king fell (see JEHU), and the only persons who stood between Athaliah and the

3. Murder throne were her grandchildren. It is in such moments that ambition, fired by fanaticism, sees its opportunity, and the massacre of the royal seed was determined on. This was carried out:

but one of them, Jehoash, a babe, escaped by the intervention of his aunt, Jehosheba (1 K 11 2; 2 Ch 22 11).

The palace being cleared of its royal occupants, Athaliah had herself proclaimed sovereign. No

4. Her other woman, before or since, sat upon the throne of David, and it is a Usurpation proof of her energy and ability that, in spite of her sex, she was able to keep it for six years. From 2 Ch 24 7 we gather that a portion of the temple of Jehu was pulled down, and the material used in the structure of a temple of Baal.

The high priest at this time was Jehoiada, who had married the daughter of Athaliah, Jehosheba (2 Ch 22 11). His promotion to the

5. The primacy led to the undoing of the Counter- usurper, as Jehoiada proved staunchly, Revolution if secretly, true to the religion of Jehu.

For six years he and his wife concealed in their apartments, near the temple, the young child of Ahaziah. In the seventh year a counter-revolution was planned. The details are given with unusual fulness in K and Ch, the writings of which supplement one another. Thus, when the Chronicler wrote, it had become safe to give the names of five captains who led the military rising (2 Ch 23 1). With the Book of K before him, it was not necessary to do more than extract from the ancient records such particulars as had not hitherto appeared. This it is which has chiefly given rise to the charge of variations in the two narratives. See JEHOASH.

At the time of her deposition, Athaliah was resident in the royal palace. When roused to a sense of danger

6. Her by the acclamations which greeted the Death coronation ceremony, she made an attempt to stay the revolt by rushing into the temple court, alone; her guards, according to Jos, having been prevented from following her (Ant, IX, vii, 3). A glance sufficed. It showed her the lad standing on a raised platform before the temple, holding the Book of the Law in his hand, and with the crown upon his brow. Rending her robe and shouting, "Treason! Treason!" she fled. Some were for cutting her down as she did so, but this was objected to as defiling the temple with human blood. She was, therefore, allowed to reach the door of the palace in flight. Here she fell, smitten by the avenging guards.

Athaliah's usurpation lasted for six years (2 K 11 3; 12 1; 2 Ch 22 12). Her 1st year synchronizes with the 1st of Jehu in Israel, and may be placed 846 BC (some put later). See CHRONOLOGY OF OT. The statement of 2 K 12 1 is here understood in the sense that Jehoash began his public reign in the 7th year of Jehu, and that he reigned 40 years counting from the time of his father's death. A modern parallel is the dating of all official records and legal documents of the time of Charles II of England from the death of Charles I.

The only other reference to Athaliah is that above alluded to in 2 Ch 24 7, where she is spoken of as "that wicked woman."

(2) A Benjamite who dwelt in Jerus (1 Ch 8 26.28).

(3) Father of Jeshaiiah, who returned with Ezra (8 7); called Gotholias in Apoc (1 Esd 8 33).

W. SHAW CALDECOTT

ATHANASIAN, ath-a-nā'zhan, CREED. See CREED.

ATHARIAS, ath-a-rī'as. See ATTHARIAS.

ATHARIM, ath'a-rim (אַתָּרִים, 'āthārīm): RV "The way of Atharim"; AV "The way of the spies." RV regards Atharim as a place (so LXX). AV follows Syr and Tg, rendering Atharim as if Tarim = spies. Dillmann translates "the caravan path," connecting it with Arab. athar, "a track or footprint." Here the king of Arad fought against Israel, taking some captives (Nu 21 1). See HORMAH.

ATHEISM, ā'thē-iz'm (ἄθεος, átheos, "without God" [Eph 2 12]): Ordinarily this word is interpreted to mean a denial of the existence of God, a disbelief in God, the opposite of theism. But it seems better that we should consider it under four heads, in order to obtain a clear idea of the different meanings in which it has been used.

(1) The classical.—In this sense it does not mean a denial of the existence of a Divine Being, but the denial of the existence or reality of the god of a particular nation. Thus the Christians were repeatedly charged with atheism, because of their disbelief in the gods of heathenism. It was not charged that they did not believe in any god, but that they denied the existence and reality of the gods worshipped, and before whom the nation hitherto had bowed. This was considered so great a crime, so dangerous a thing to the nation, that it was felt to be a just cause for most cruel and determined persecutions. Socrates' teaching cast a shadow on the reality of the existence of the gods, and this charge was brought against him by his contemporaries. Cicero also uses the word in this sense in his charge against Diagoras of Athens. Indeed, such use of it is common in all classical literature.

(2) Philosophic.—It is not meant that the various philosophic systems to which this term is applied actually deny the existence of a Divine Being or of a First Cause, but that they are atheistic in their teaching, and tend to unsettle the faith of mankind in the existence of God. There is indeed a belief in a first cause, in force, in motion, in a certain aggregation of materials producing life, but the Divine Being as taught by theism is absolutely denied. This is true of the Idealism of Fichte, of the Ideal Pantheism of Spinoza, the Natural Pantheism of Schelling, and similar forms of thought. In applying the word atheism to the teaching here given, theism does not intend to assail them as wholly without a belief in a Divine Being; but it affirms that God is a person, a self-conscious Being, not merely a first cause or force. To deny this fundamental affirmation of theism is to make the teaching atheistic, a denial of that which is essential to theism (He 11 3).

(3) Dogmatic.—It absolutely denies the existence of God. It has often been held that this is, in fact, impossible. Cousin has said, "It is impossible, because the existence of God is implied in every assertion." It is true, however, that in all ages there have been persons who declared themselves absolute atheists. Esp. is this true of the 18th cent.—a period of widespread skepticism—when not a few, particularly in France, professed themselves atheists. In many cases, however, it resulted from a loose use of the word, careless definition, and sometimes from the spirit of boastfulness.

(4) Practical atheism.—It has nothing at all to do with belief. Indeed it accepts the affirmations of theism. It has reference wholly to the mode of life. It is to live as though there was no God.

It takes the form often of complete indifference to the claims of the Divine Being or again of outbroken and defiant wickedness (Ps 14 1). That this form of atheism is widely prevalent is well known. It is accompanied in many cases with some form of unbelief or prejudice or false opinion of the church or Christianity. Dogmatic atheism is no longer a menace or even a hindrance to the progress of Christianity, but practical atheism is widespread in its influence and a dangerous element in our modern life (cf Isa 31 1; Jer 2 13,17,18; 18 13-15). Whatever the form, whether it be that of religious agnosticism, denying that we can know that God exists, or critical atheism, denying that the evidence to prove His existence is sufficient, or dogmatic, or practical atheism, it is always a system of negation and as such tears down and destroys. It destroys the faith upon which all human relations are built. Since there is no God there is no right nor wrong, and human action is neither good nor bad, but convenient or inconvenient. It

Being who is responsive to and can satisfy the cry of the heart (He 11 6). In his Bampton Lectures Reville has said on this subject: "It would be irrational in the last degree to lay down the existence of such a need and such a tendency, and yet believe that the need corresponds to nothing, that the tendency has no goal."

(3) It fails to account for the evidence of design in the universe. See COSMOLOGY.

(4) It fails to account for the existence of man and the world in general. Here is the universe: how did it come to be? Here is man: how is he to be accounted for? To these and like questions, atheism and atheistic philosophy have no adequate answer to give. See also COSMOLOGY; CREATION; GOD.

leaves human society without a basis for order and human government without foundation (Rom 1 10-32). All is hopeless, all is wretchedness, all is tending to the grave and the grave ends all.

Arguments against atheism may be summarized as follows: (1) It is contrary to reason. History has shown again and again how impossible it is to bring the mind to rest in this doctrine. Although Buddhism is atheistic in its teaching, idolatry is widespread in the lands where it prevails. While the Positive Philosophy of Auguste Comte was based on a denial of the existence of God, his attempt to found the new religion of humanity with rites and ceremonies of worship reveals how the longing for worship cannot be suppressed. It is a revelation of the fact so often seen in the history of human thought, that the mind cannot rest in the tenets of atheism.

(2) It is contrary to human experience. All history testifies that there are deep religious instincts within the human breast. To regard these as deceptive and unreasonable would itself be utterly unreasonable and unscientific. But the fact of such spiritual longing implies also that there is a

A demand was made on Simon Maccabaeus to give up all the places he had taken or pay 1,000 talents in silver. Simon declined to pay more than 100 talents, and Athenobius returned to Antiochus from his fruitless mission (1 Macc 15 28-36).

ATHENS, ath'enz ('Αθήναι, Athēnai): In antiquity the celebrated metropolis of Attica, now the capital of Greece. Two long walls, 250 ft. apart, connected the city with the harbor (Peiraeus). In Acts 17 we are told what Paul did during his single sojourn in this famous city. He came up from the sea by the new road (N. of the ancient) along which were altars of unknown gods, entered the city from the W., and passed by the Ceramicus (burial-ground), which can be seen to this day, the "Theseum," the best preserved of all Gr temples, and on to the Agora (Market-Place), just N. of the Acropolis, a steep hill, 200 ft. high, in the center of the city. Cimon began and Pericles completed the work of transforming this citadel into a sanctuary for the patron goddess of the city. The magnificent gateway (Propylaea), of which the Athenians were justly proud, was built by Mnesicles (437-432 BC). A monumental bronze statue by Phidias stood on the left, as one emerged on the plateau, and the mighty Parthenon a little farther on, to the right. In this temple was the famous gold and ivory statue of Athena. The eastern pediment contained sculptures representing the birth of the goddess (Elgin Marbles, now in the British Museum), the western depicting her contest with Poseidon for supremacy over Attica. This, the most celebrated edifice, architecturally, in all history, was partially destroyed by the Venetians in 1687. Other temples on the Acropolis are the Erechtheum and the "Wingless Victory." In the city the streets were exceedingly narrow and crooked. The wider avenues were called πλατεῖαι (πλατεῖαι), whence Eng. "place," Spanish "plaza." The roofs of the houses were flat. In and around the Agora were many porticoes (stoaí). In the Stoa Poecile ("Painted Portico"), whose walls were covered with historical paintings, Paul met with the successors of Zeno, the Stoics, with whom he disputed daily. In this vicinity also was the Senate Chamber for the Council of Five Hundred, and the Court of the Areopagus, whither Socrates came in 399 BC to face his accusers, and where Paul, five cents. later, preached to the Athenians the unknown God. In this neighborhood also were the Tower of the Winds and the water-clock, which must have attracted Paul's attention, as they attract our attention today.

The apostle disputed in the synagogue with the Jews (Acts 17 17), and a slab found at the foot of Mount Hymettus (a range to the E. of the city, 3,000 ft. high), with the inscription αὕτη ἡ πύλη τοῦ κυρίου, δίκαιον εἰσελεύσονται ἐν αὐτῇ (Ps 118 20), was once thought to indicate the site, but is now believed to date from the 3d or 4th cent. Slabs bearing Jewish inscriptions have been found in the city itself.

The population of Athens was at least a quarter of a million. The oldest inhabitants were Pelasgians. Cecrops, the first traditional king, came from Egypt in 1556 BC, and by marrying the daughter of Actaeon, obtained the sovereignty. The first king was Erechtheus. Theseus united the twelve communities of Attica and made Athens the capital. After the death of Codrus in 1068 BC, the governing power was intrusted to an archon who held office for life. In 753 the term of office was limited to ten years. In 683 nine archons were chosen for a term of one year. Draco's laws, "written in blood," were made in 620. Solon was chosen archon in 594 and gave the state a constitution. The tyrant Pisistratus was in control permanently from 541 to 527; his son Hipparchus was assassinated in 514. Clisthenes changed the constitution and introduced the practice of ostracism. In 490 the Athenians defeated the Persians at Marathon, and again in 480 at Salamis. In 476 Aristides organized the great Athenian Confederacy. After his death Conon became the leader of the conservative party; and when the general Cimon was killed, Pericles became the leader of the people. In 431 the Peloponnesian War broke out and continued till 404, when Athens succumbed to Sparta. An oligarchical government was set up with Critias and Theramenes at the head. War broke out again but peace was restored by the pact of Antalcidas (387 BC). In the Sacred War (357-355) Athens exhausted her strength. When Philip of Macedon began to interfere in Gr affairs, Athens could neither resolve on war measures (to which the oratory of Demosthenes incited her), nor make terms with Philip. Finally, she joined Thebes in making armed resistance, but in spite of her heroic efforts at Chaeronea, she suffered defeat (338). Philip was murdered in 336, and Alexander the Great became master. After the subjugation of Greece by the Romans, Athens was placed under the supervision of the governor of Macedonia, but was granted local independence in recognition of her great history. As the seat of Gr art and science, Athens played an important rôle even under Rom sway—she became the university city of the Rom world, and from her radiated spiritual light and intellectual energy to Tarsus, Antioch and Alexandria. Philo, the Jew, declares that the Athenians were ἑλληνῶν δευδερκέστατοι διάνοιαν ("keenest in intellect") and adds that Athens was to Greece what the pupil is to the eye, or reason to the soul. Although the city had lost her real independence, the people retained their old characteristics: they were still interested in art, literature and philosophy. Paul may possibly have attended the theater of Dionysus (under the S.E. cliff of the Acropolis) and witnessed a play of the Gr poets, such as Euripides or Menander. Many gifts were received from foreign monarchs by Athens. Attalus I of Pergamum endowed the Academy, Eumenes added a splendid Stoa to the theater and Antiochus Epiphanes began the Olympieum (15 columns of which are still standing), the massive sub-basement of which had been constructed by Pisistratus. Athens became a favorite residence for foreign writers who cultivated history, geography and literature. Horace, Brutus and Cassius sojourned in the city for some time. Jos declares that the Athenians were the most god-fearing of the Greeks (εὐσεβεστάτους τῶν ἑλληνῶν). Cf Livy xlv.27.

AT ONE (εἰς εἰρήνην, eis eirēnēn, "at one," "at peace"): "Set them at one again" (Acts 7 26), the reconciliation of persons at variance. From this adv. we have the words "atone" and "atonement."

ATONEMENT, a-tōn'ment: Translates כִּפָּר, kāphar; חָטָא, hātā'; רָצָח, rāṣāh, the last employed only of human relations (1 S 29 4); translates the following Gr stems hilas-, simple and compounded with various preps.; allag- in composition only, but with numerous preps. and even two at a time, e.g. Mt 5 24; lip- rarely (Dnl 9 24).

1. Terms Employed.—The root meanings of the Heb words, taking them in the order cited above, are, to "cover," hence expiate, con-

1. Heb and Gr Words done, cancel, placate; to "offer," or "receive a sin offering," hence make atonement, appease, propitiate; "effect reconciliation," i.e. by some conduct, or course of action. Of the Gr words the meanings, in order, are "to be," or "cause to be, friendly"; "to render other," hence to restore; "to leave" and with prep. to leave off, i.e. enmity, or evil, etc; "to render holy," "to set apart for"; hence of the Deity, to appropriate or accept for Himself.

It is obvious that the Eng. word, Atonement, does not correspond etymologically with any Heb or Gr word which it translates. Furthermore, the Gr words in both LXX and NT do not correspond exactly to the Heb words; especially is it true that the root idea of the most frequently employed Heb word, "cover," is not found in any of the Gr words employed. These remarks apply to both vbs. and substs. The Eng. word is derived from the phrase "at one," and signifies, etymologically, harmony of relationship or unity of life, etc. It is a rare instance of an AS theological term; and like all purely Eng. terms employed in theology, takes its meaning, not from its origin, but from the theological content of the thinking of the Continental and Lat-speaking Schoolmen who employed such Eng. terms as seemed most nearly to convey to the hearers and readers their ideas. Not only was no effort made to convey the original Heb and Gr meanings by means of Eng. words, but no effort was made toward uniformity in tr of Heb and Gr words by their Eng. equivalents.

It is at once clear that no mere word-study can determine the Bible teaching concerning atonement.

3. Not to Be Settled by Lexicon Merely Even when first employed for expressing Heb and Christian thought, these terms, like all other religious terms, already had a content that had grown up with their use, and it is by no means easy to tell how far heathen conceptions might be imported into our theology by a rigidly etymological study of terms employed. In any case such a study could only yield a dictionary of terms, whereas what we seek is a body of teaching, a circle of ideas, whatever words and phrases, or combinations of words and phrases, have been employed to express the teaching.

There is even greater danger of making the study of the Atonement a study in dogmatic theology.

4. Not Chiefly a Study in Theology The frequent employment of the expression "the Atonement" shows this tendency. The work of Christ in reconciling the world to God has occupied so central a place in Christian dogmatics that the very term atonement has come to have a theological rather than a practical atmosphere, and it is by no means easy for the student, or even for the seeker after the saving relation with God, to pass beyond the accumulated interpretation of the Atonement and learn of atonement.

The history of the explanation of the Atonement and the terms of preaching atonement cannot, of course, be ignored. Nor can the original meaning of the terms employed and the manner of their use be neglected. There are significant features in the use of terms, and we have to take account of the history of interpretation. Only we must not bind ourselves nor the word of God in such forms.

(1) The most frequently employed Heb word, kāphar, is found in the Prophets only in the priestly section (Ezk 45 15.20; Dnl 9 24) where EV has "make reconciliation," m, "purge away." Furthermore it is not found in Dt, which is the prophetic book of the Pent (Hex). This indicates that it is an essentially priestly conception. The same term is frequently tr'd by "reconcile," construed as equivalent to "make atonement" (Lev 6 30; 8 15; 16 20; 1 S 29 4; Ezk 45 15.20; Dnl 9 24). In this latter sense it connects itself with hātā'. In 2 Ch 29 24 both words are used: the priests make a sin offering (hātā') to effect an atonement (kāphar). But the first word is frequently used by metonymy to include, at least suggestively, the end in view, the reconciliation; and, on the other hand, the latter word is so used as to involve, also, doing that by which atonement is realized.

(2) Of the Gr words employed hiláskesthai means "to make propitious" (He 2 17; Lev 6 30; 16 20; Ezk 45 20); alláttein, used however only in composition with preps., means "to render other," "to restore" to another (former?) condition of harmony (cf Mt 5 24="to be reconciled" to a fellow-man as a condition of making an acceptable sacrifice to God).

(3) In the Eng. NT the word "atonement" is found only at Rom 5 11 and the ARV changes this to "reconciliation." While in strict etymology this word need signify only the active or conscious exercise of unity of life or harmony of relations, the causative idea probably belongs to the original use of the term, as it certainly is present in all current Christian use of the term. As employed in Christian theology, both practical and technical, the term includes with more or less distinctness: (a) the fact of union with God, and this always looked upon as (b) a broken union to be restored or an ideal union to be realized, (c) the procuring cause of atonement, variously defined, (d) the crucial act wherein the union is effected, the work of God and the response of the soul in which the union becomes actual. Inasmuch as the reconciliation between man and God is always conceived of as effected through Jesus Christ (2 Cor 5 18-21) the expression, "the Atonement of Christ," is one of the most frequent in Christian theology. Questions and controversies have turned mainly on the procuring cause of atonement, (c) above, and at this point have arisen the various "theories of the Atonement."

II. Bible Teaching concerning Atonement in General.—The Atonement of Christ must be interpreted in connection with the conception of atonement in general in the Scriptures. This idea of atonement is, moreover, part of the general circle of fundamental ideas of the religion of Jeh and Jesus. Theories of the Atonement root themselves in conceptions of the nature and character of God, His holiness, love, grace, mercy, etc; of man, his nature, disposition and capacities; of sin and guilt.

The basal conception for the Bible doctrine of atonement is the assumption that God and man are ideally one in life and interests, so far as man's true life and interest may be conceived as corresponding with those of God. Hence it is everywhere assumed that God and man should be in all respects in harmonious relations, at-one. Such is the ideal picture of Adam and Eve

1. Primary Assumption of Unity of God and Man in Eden. Such is the assumption in the parable of the Prodigal Son; man ought to be at home with God, at peace in the Father's house (Lk 15). Such also is the ideal of Jesus as seen esp. in Jn 14-17; cf particularly

17 21 ff; cf also Eph 2 11-22; 1 Cor 15 28. This is quite possibly the underlying idea of all those offerings in which the priests—God's representatives—and the people joined in eating at a common meal parts of what had been presented to God. The prohibition of the use of blood in food or drink is grounded on the statement that the life is in the blood (Lev 17 10f) or is the blood (Gen 9 4; Dt 12 23). Blood was used in the consecration of tabernacle, temple, vessels, altars, priests; all things and persons set apart for Jeh. Then blood was required in offerings made to atone for sin and uncleanness. The reason for all this is not easy to see; but if we seek an explanation that will account for all the facts on a single principle, shall we not find it in the idea that in the life-principle of the blood God's own life was present? Through this life from God all living beings shared God's life. The blood passing out of any living being must therefore return to God and not be consumed. In sprinkling blood, the life-element, or certainly the life-symbol, over persons and things set apart for God they were, so to say, visibly taken up into the life of God, and His life extending over them made them essentially of His own person. Finally the blood of sacrifices was the returning to God of the life of the man for whom the beasts stood. And this blood was not burned with the dead sacrifice but poured out beside the holy altar. The now dead sin offering was burned, but the blood, the life, returned to God. In peace-offerings of various sorts there was the common meal in which the common life was typified.

In the claim of the first-fruits of all crops, of all flocks and of all increase, God emphasized the common life in production; asserted His claim to the total life of His people and their products. God claimed the lives of all as belonging essentially to Himself and a man must recognize this by paying a ransom price (Ex 30 12). This did not purchase for the man a right to his own life in separation from God, for it was in no sense an equivalent in value to the man's time. It the rather committed the man to living the common life with God, without which recognition the man was not fit to live at all. And the use of this recognition-money by the priests in the temple was regarded as placing the man who paid his money in a sort of continuous worshipful service in the tabernacle (or temple) itself (Ex 30 11-16).

In both OT and NT the assumption of unity between God and man stands over against the contrasted fact that there is a radical breach in this unity. This breach is recognized in all God's relations to men; and even when healed it is always subject to new failures which must be provided for, by the daily oblations in the OT, by the continuous intercession of the Christ (He 7 25; 9 24) in the NT. Even when there is no conscious breach, man is taught to recognize that it may exist and he must avail himself of the appointed means for its healing, e.g. daily sacrifices. This breach is universally attributed to some behavior on man's part. This may be moral or ceremonial uncleanness on man's part. He may have broken with God fundamentally in character or conduct and so by committing sin have incurred guilt; or he may have neglected the fitting recognition that his life is in common with God and so by his disregard have incurred uncleanness. After the first breach between God and man it is always necessary that man shall approach God on the assumption that this breach needs healing, and so always come with an offering. In human nature the sin breach is rooted and universal (Rom 3 9-19; 5 12-14).

Numerous and various means were employed for expressing this essential unity of life, for restoring it since it was broken off in sin, and

3. Means for maintaining it. These means for Express- were primarily spiritual and ethical ing, Restor- but made extensive use of material ing and substances, physical acts and sym- Maintaining bolical ceremonials; and these tended always to obscure and supplant the spiritual and ethical qualities which it was their function to exhibit. The prophet came to the rescue of the spiritual and ethical and reached his highest insight and function in the doctrine of the Suffering Servant of Jeh through whom God was to be united with a redeemed race (cf among many passages, Isa 49 1-7; 66 18 ff; Ps 22 27 ff).

Atonement is conceived in both OT and NT as partly personal and partly social, extending to the universal conception. The acts and attitudes by which it is procured, restored and maintained are partly those of the individual alone (Ps 51), partly those in which the individual secures the assistance of the priest or the priestly body, and partly such as the priest performs for the whole people on his own account. This involves the distinction that in Israel atonement was both personal and social, as also were both sin and uncleanness. Atonement was made for the group by the priest without specific participation by the people although they were, originally at least, to take cognizance of the fact and at the time. At all the great feasts, especially upon the DAY OF ATONEMENT (q.v.) the whole group was receptively to take conscious part in the work of atonement (Nu 29 7-11).

The various sacrifices and offerings by means of which atonement was effected in the life and worship of Israel will be found to be discussed under the proper words and are to be spoken of here only summarily. The series of offerings, guilt-, burnt-, sin-, peace-offerings, reveal a sense of the breach with God, a conviction of the sin making the breach and an ethical appreciation of the holiness of God entirely unique among religions of ancient or modern times, and this fact must never be overlooked in interpreting the NT Christian doctrine of the Atonement. In the OT there are sins and sinful circumstances for which no atonement is possible. Many passages, indeed, almost seem to provide against atonement for any voluntary wrongdoing (e.g. Lev 4 2.13.22.27; 5 14 ff). This is, no doubt, an extreme interpretation, out of harmony with the general spirit of the OT, but it does show how seriously sin ought to be taken under the OT régime. No atonement for murder could make possible the residence of the murderer again in that section of the land where the murder was done (Nu 35 33), although the land was not by the murder rendered unfit for occupation by others. When Israel sinned in making the golden calf, God refused to accept any atonement (Ex 32 20 ff) until there had been a great loss of life from among the sinners. No repentance could find atonement for the refusal to follow Jeh's lead at Kadesh-barnea (Nu 14 20-25), and complete atonement was effected only when all the unbelieving generation had died in the wilderness (Nu 26 65; 32 10 ff); i.e. no atonement was possible, but the people died in that sin, outside the Land of Promise, although the sin was not allowed to cut off finally from Jeh (Nu 14 29 f).

Permanent uncleanness or confirmed disease of an unclean sort caused permanent separation from the temple and the people of Jeh (e.g. Lev 7 20 f), and every uncleanness must be properly removed (Lev 5 2b; 17 15; 22 2-8; Dt 23 10 f). A house in which an unclean disease was found must be cleansed—have atonement made for it (Lev 14 53), and in extreme cases must be utterly destroyed (Lev 14 43 ff).

After childbirth (Lev 12 7 f) and in all cases of hemorrhage (cf Lev 15 30) atonement must be effected by prescribed offerings, a loss, diminution, or pollution of blood, wherein is the life, having been suffered. All this elaborate application of the principle of atonement shows the comprehensiveness with which it was sought by the religious teachers to impress the people with the unity of all life in the perfectly holy and majestic God whom they were called upon to serve. Not only must the priests be clean who bear the vessels of the Lord (Isa 52 11), but all the people must be clean also from all defilement of flesh and spirit, seeking perfect holiness in the fear of their God (cf 2 Cor 7 1).

III. The Atonement of Jesus Christ.—All the symbols, doctrine and examples of atonement in the OT among the Hebrews find their counterpart, fulfilment and complete explanation in the new covenant in the blood of Jesus Christ (Mt 26 28; He 12 24). By interpreting the inner spirit of the sacrificial system, by insisting on the unity and holiness of God, by passionate pleas for purity in the people, and especially by teaching the principle of vicarious suffering for sin, the Prophets laid the foundation in thought-forms and in religious atmosphere for such a doctrine of atonement as is presented in the life and teaching of Jesus and as is unfolded in the teaching of His apostles.

The personal, parabolic sufferings of Hosea, the remarkable elaboration of the redemption of a spiritual Israel through a Suffering Servant of Jeh and the extension of that redemption to all mankind as presented in Isa 40-66, and the same element in such psalms as Ps 22, constitute a key to the understanding of the work of the Christ that unifies the entire revelation of God's righteousness in passing over human sins (Rom 3 24 f). Yet it is remarkable that such a conception of the way of atonement was as far as possible from the general and average Jewish mind when Jesus came. In no sense can the NT doctrine of the Atonement be said to be the product of the thought and spirit of the times.

However much theologians may disagree as to the rationale of the Atonement, there is, as there can be, no question that Jesus and all

2. The One Clear Fact His interpreters in the NT represent the Atonement between God and men as somehow accomplished through Jesus Christ. It is also an agreed fact in exegesis that Jesus and His apostles understood His death to be radically connected with this Atonement.

(1) Jesus Himself teaches that He has come to reveal the Father (Jn 14 9), to recover the lost (Lk 19 10), to give life to men (Jn 6 33; 10 10), to disclose and establish the kingdom of heaven (or of God), gathering a few faithful followers through whom His work will be perpetuated (Jn 17 2 ff; Mt 16 13 ff); that salvation, personal and social, is dependent upon His person (Jn 6 53 ff; 14 6). He cannot give full teaching concerning His death but He does clearly connect His sufferings with the salvation He seeks to give. He shows in Lk 4 16 ff and 22 37 that He understands Isa 52-53 as realized in Himself; He is giving Himself (and His blood) a ransom for men (Mt 20 28; 26 26 ff; cf 1 Cor 11 23 ff). He was not a mere martyr but gave Himself up willingly, and voluntarily (Jn 10 17 f; Gal 2 20), in accordance with the purpose of God (Acts 2 23), as the Redeemer of the world, and expected that by His lifting up all men would be drawn to Him (Jn 12 31-33). It is possible to explain the attention which the Evangelists give to the death of Jesus only by supposing that they are reflecting the importance which they recall Jesus Himself to have attached to His death.

(2) All the NT writers agree in making Jesus the center of their idea of the way of salvation and that His death is an essential element in His saving power. This they do by combining OT teaching with the facts of the life and death of the Lord, confirming their conclusion by appeal to the Resurrection. Paul represents himself as holding the common doctrine of Christianity at the time, and from the beginning, when in 1 Cor 15 3 f he sums up his teaching that salvation is secured through the death and resurrection of Jesus according to the Scriptures. Elsewhere (Eph 2 16.18; 1 Tim 2 5; cf Acts 4 12) in all his writings he emphasizes his belief that Jesus Christ is the one Mediator between God and man, by the blood of His cross (Col 1 20; 1 Cor 2 2), removing the sin barrier between God and men. Peter, during the life of Jesus so full of the current Jewish notion that God accepted the Jews de facto, in his later ministry makes Jesus in His death the one way to God (Acts 4 12; 1 Pet 1 2.18.19; 2 21.24; 3 18).

John has this element so prominent in his Gospel that radical critical opinion questions its authorship partly on that account, while the epistles of Jn and the Revelation are, on the same ground, attributed to later Gr thought (cf 1 Jn 1 7; 2 2; 3 5; 4 10; Rev 1 5; 5 9). The Epistle to the He finds in Jesus the fulfilment and extension of all the sacrificial system of Judaism and holds that the shedding of blood seems essential to the very idea of remission of sins (9 22; cf 2 17; 7 26 f; 9 24-28).

When we come to systematize the teaching concerning the Atonement we find, as in all doctrine, that definite system is not offered us in the NT, but all system, if it is to have any value for Christianity, must find its materials and principles in the NT. Proceeding in this way some features may be stated positively and finally, while others must be presented interrogatively, recognizing that interpretations may differ.

(1) An initial consideration is that the Atonement originates with God who "was in Christ reconciling the world unto himself" (2 Cor 5 19), and whose love gave Jesus to redeem sinful men (Jn 3 16; Rom 5 8, etc). In all atonement in OT and NT the initiative is of God who not only devises and reveals the way to reconciliation, but by means of angels, prophets, priests and ultimately His only begotten Son applies the means of atonement and persuades men to accept the proffered reconciliation. Nothing in the speculation concerning the Atonement can be more false to its true nature than making a breach between God and His Christ in their attitude toward sinful men.

(2) It follows that atonement is fundamental in the nature of God in His relations to men, and that redemption is in the heart of God's dealing in history. The "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world" (Rev 13 8 AV and ERV; cf 5 5-7) is the interpreter of the seven-sealed book of God's providence in history. In Jesus we behold the Lamb of God taking away the sin of the world (Jn 1 29).

(3) The question will arise in the analysis of the doctrine: How does the death of Christ save us? No specific answer has ever been generally satisfactory. We have numerous theories of the Atonement. We have already intimated that the answer to this question will depend upon our idea of the nature of God, the nature of sin, the content of salvation, the nature of man, and our idea of Satan and evil spirits. We ought at once to dismiss all merely quantitative and commercial conceptions of exchange of merit. There is no longer any question that the doctrines of imputation, both of Adam's sin and of Christ's righteousness, were overwrought and applied by the early theologians with a fatal exclusiveness, without warrant in the Word of God. On the other hand no theory can hold much weight that presupposes that sin is a thing of light consequence in the nature of man and in the economy of God. Unless one is prepared to resist unto blood striving against sin (He 12 2-4), he cannot know the meaning of the Christ. Again, it may be said that the notion that the death of Christ is to be considered apart from His life, eternal and incarnate life, as the atoning work, is far too narrow to express the teaching of the Bible and far too shallow to meet the demands of an ethical conscience.

It would serve clearness if we reminded ourselves that the question of how in the Atonement may involve various elements. We may inquire: (a) for the ground on which God may righteously receive the sinner; (b) for the means by which God places the restoration within the reach of the sinner; (c) for the influence by which the sinner is persuaded to accept the reconciliation; (d) for the attitude or exercise of the sinner toward God in Christ wherein he actually enters the state of restored union with God. The various theories have seemed to be exclusive, or at least mutually antagonistic, largely because they have taken partial views of the whole subject and have emphasized some one feature of the whole content. All serious theories partly express the truth and all together are inadequate fully to declare how the Daystar from on high doth guide our feet into the way of peace (Lk 1 79).

(4) Another question over which the theologians have sorely vexed themselves and each other concerns the extent of the Atonement, whether it is available for all men or only for certain particular, elect ones. That controversy may now be passed by. It is no longer possible to read the Bible and suppose that God relates himself sympathetically with only a part of the race. All segregated passages of Scripture formerly employed in support of such a view have now taken their place in the progressive self-interpretation of God to men through Christ who is the propitiation for the sins of the whole world (1 Jn 2 2). No man cometh unto the Father but by Him (Jn 14 6); but whosoever does thus call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved (Joel 2 32; Acts 2 21). 1. The Legal Enactments.—In addition to the chief passage, Lev 16, which is treated under a separate head, we have the following:

1. Named In Ex 30 10 it is mentioned in the directions that are given for the construction of the altar of incense that Aaron, once a year, is to make an atonement on the horns of the altar, with the blood of the sin offering, which is used for the purpose of an atonement for sin.

In Lev 23 26-32 mention is made in the list of festivals of the Day of Atonement, on the 10th day of the 7th month. It is ordered that for this day there shall be a holy convocation at the sanctuary, a fast, an offering by fire, and rest from labor from the 9th day of the 7th month in the evening.

According to Lev 25 9 the year of jubilee begins with the Day of Atonement.

Nu 18 speaks of the duties and the rights of the priests and the Levites. In contrast with the latter, according to ver 7, Aaron and his sons are to perform the duties of the priesthood in all matters pertaining to the altar and of the service within the veil and shall render this service. We have here doubtless a comprehensive law for the entire priestly order, so that from this alone it cannot be determined that the service within the veil, by which reference is made to the ceremony of the Day of Atonement, has been reserved for the high priest alone, just as in Dt 10 8; 33 8 ff, everything that pertains to the whole tribe of Levi is found combined, without thereby the division into high priest, priests and Levites, being regarded as excluded (cf EZEKIEL, II, 2, (1), c).

Nu 29 7-11 contains in connection with the laws treating of sacrifices also the enactment, that on the 10th day of the 7th month there shall take place a holy convocation at the sanctuary, fasting and rest from labor. In addition to the sin offering, which is brought for the purpose of atonement for sin, and in addition to the regular burnt offerings and the accompanying meal offerings and drink offerings, burnt offerings also are to be brought, viz. one young bullock, one young ram, seven lambs of the first year (all without blemish); then meal offerings, viz. three-tenths (cf 28 12-14) of fine flour mingled with oil for each bullock; two-tenths for each ram; one-tenth for each lamb; then a sin offering, viz. one he-goat.

Ezekiel in his vision of the new temple, of the holy city and the holy country (chs 40-48), in 45 18 ff, gives a series of enactments for the festivals and the sacrifices. According to these, on the 1st day of the 1st month and on the 7th day of the 1st month (on the 1st day of the 7th month according to the LXX), the sanctuary is to be cleansed through a young bullock without blemish, the priest taking some of the blood of the sin offering and putting it on the posts of the temple, on the four corners of the altar and on the posts of the gate of the inner court; and this is to be done for the sake of those who perhaps have sinned through error or ignorance. Further, that sacrifice which is to be brought on the Passover by the princes for themselves and all the people of the land (cf 45 22) appears to present a clear analogy to Lev 16. As for the rest, Ezk 40-48 cannot without further consideration be put on the same level with the other legal enactments, but are to be regarded as an ideal scheme, the realization of which is conditioned on the entrance of the wonderful future (cf EZEKIEL).

(1) Contents, structure and position.—Lev 16 1-28 contains instructions given by Jeh to Moses for his brother Aaron (vs 1.2). (a) Vs 1-10 contain presuppositions, preparations and summary statements of the ceremonies on the Day of Atonement. According to vs 1.2 Aaron is not allowed to enter the holy place at any time whatever, lest he may die as did his sons with their unseemly fire offering (cf Lev 10 1 ff); vs 3-5 tell what is necessary for the ceremony: For himself four things: a young bullock as a sin offering (cf vs 6.11.14.15.27); a ram for burnt offering (cf ver 24); sacred garments, viz. a linen coat, linen breeches, linen girdle, linen mitre (cf vs 23.32); a bath. For the congregation: two he-goats as a sin offering (cf vs 7 ff.15-22.25.27.28.32.33), a ram as a burnt offering (cf ver 24). The passages in parentheses show how closely the succeeding parts of this account are connected with this introductory part, vs 1-10. In other parts of Lev also it is often found that the materials used for the sacrifices are mentioned first, before anything is said in detail of what is to be done with this material. Cf 8 1.2 with vs 6.7 ff.10.14.18.22.26 and 9 2-4 with vs 7.8 ff.12 ff.15-18. In ver 6 Aaron's sin-offering bullock is to be used as an atonement for himself; vs 7-10 refer to the two goats: they are to be placed at the door of the tent of meeting (ver 7); lots are to be cast upon them for Jeh and Azazel (ver 8); the first to be prepared as a sin offering for Jeh (ver 9); the second, in accordance with the law, to be sent into the desert (ver 10).

(b) Vs 11-24 describe the ceremony itself and give fuller directions as to how the different sacrificial materials mentioned under (a) are to be used by Aaron: vs 11-14 speak of the atonement for Aaron and his house; ver 11, of his sin-offering bullock to be killed; ver 12, of burning coal from the altar and two handfuls of sweet incense beaten small to be placed behind the veil; ver 13, of the cloud of incense to be made in the Holy of Holies, so that the top covering is hidden and Aaron is protected from the danger of death; ver 14, of some of the blood to be sprinkled once on the front of the top covering and seven times in front of it. Vs 15-19 prescribe the ceremony with the first sin-offering goat for the congregation: in vs 15.16a, the ceremony described in ver 14 is directed also to be carried out with the goat, as an atonement for the inner sanctuary, cleansing it from blemishes; in ver 16b the same thing is directed to be done in regard to the tabernacle of revelation, i.e. the holy place; in ver 17, no one is permitted to be present even in the holy place when these ceremonies take place; in vs 18.19, the altar too is directed to be cleansed by an atonement, some of the blood of both sin-offering animals being smeared on the horns and sprinkled seven times on the ground. Vs 20-22 prescribe the ceremony with the second sin-offering goat for the congregation: ver 20 directs it to be brought there; in ver 21 there takes place the transfer of guilt; Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the goat; shall confess all guilt over him; shall lay them upon the head of the goat; shall through a man send him into the desert; in ver 22a, the goat carries the guilt into an uninhabited land; in ver 22b, he is not to be let go until he is in the desert. Vs 23.24, the concluding act: in ver 23a, Aaron takes off his linen garments in the tent of meeting, and in ver 23b puts them down there; in ver 24a, he bathes in the holy place and again puts on his usual clothing; in ver 24b he brings the burnt offering for himself and his people. (The statement 'for himself and his people' at this place concludes the ritual as such.)

(c) Vs 25-28 are explanatory, with three additional directions. In ver 25, the fat of the sin offering is directed to be consumed into smoke on the altar; ver 26, he who has taken away the second goat must wash his clothes and bathe himself, and only then is he permitted to enter the camp; ver 27, the fat, flesh and dung of the sin-offering animal, and then the blood that was brought into the (inner) sanctuary, are to be burned outside of the camp; ver 28, he who has burned these must wash his clothes, and must bathe, and only after this can he enter the camp. (In this case vs 25 and 27 correspond, and also vs 26 and 28; and in addition vs 26, 27 and 28 are united by their reference to the camp.)

(d) Vs 29-34: Over against these sections (a)-(c) (vs 1-28), which contain the instructions for the high priest, we have a fourth (vs 29-34), which already through the address in the second person plur. and also by its contents is intended for the congregation. In vs 29-31, the demand is made of the congregation. As in Lev 23 26 ff; Nu 29 7 ff, a fast and absolute rest are prescribed for the 10th day of the 7th month as the Day of Atonement; in vs 32-34, a number of directions are given in a summary to the congregation on the basis of 16 1 ff, viz. ver 32, how the atonement is to take place: the priest who is anointed; he shall be consecrated; that he perform the service in his father's place; in his linen garments; ver 33 prescribes when and for whom the atonement is to take place: for the holy of holies; for the holy place; for the altar; for the order of priests and all the people; in ver 34, the one Day of Atonement in the year for all sins is declared to be an everlasting statute. The statement that Aaron (ver 2), according to Jeh's command, did as Moses directed aptly closes the whole chapter.

The number four appears to occupy a pre-dominating place in this chapter, as the bird's-eye view above already shows, and as this can be traced still further in the details of the accounts. But even if this significance of the number four in the division of the chapter is accidental, although this number appears almost as a matter of course, and in Ex 35 4-40 38, in Gen 12-25, in the story of Abraham, Lev 11-15, and Dt 12-26 naturally fall into four pericopes with four subdivisions, yet this chapter is, as far as contents are concerned, so closely connected, and so well organized as a whole, that all attempts to ascribe it to different sources, concerning which we shall speak immediately, must come to naught in view of this fact.

At this point we first of all draw attention to the fact that ch 16 has its well-established place in the whole of the Book of Lev (cf LEVITICUS). The whole book has as its purpose to regulate the dealings of the Israelites with their God, and it does this in such a way that the first part (chs 1-17) removes the hindrances that have been caused by sin. In this the ordinances with reference to the Day of Atonement (Lev 16), and with reference to the significance of the blood (Lev 17), constitute a natural acme and excellent conclusion, while this prepares for the positive sanctification, which is discussed in chs 18 ff. In 15 31 we find in addition a clear transition to the thoughts of Lev 16, for in this passage mention is made of the uncleanness of the Israelites, which contaminates the dwelling-place of Jeh that is in their midst.

(2) Modern attempts to disprove unity of chapter.—A large number of attempts have been made to destroy the unity of this chapter, which has been demonstrated in division (1) above. Thus Stade separates vs 3–10 as the original kernel from the explanatory and changing details that were added in vs 11–28. But we have already seen that vs 3–10 are the preparation for all that follows, so that these verses demand vs 11 ff as a necessary complement. Again Oort separates vs 1–4, 11b–14.16.18a.19.23.24a.25a.29a from the rest, by using the purification of the sanctuary and the atonement of the people as the measure for this separation; but above all it is proved by Ezk 45 18–20 that just these two thoughts are inseparably united. In recent times it has become the custom, following the leadership of Benzinger, to divide the text into three parts. Baentsch divides as follows: (a) 16 1–4.6.12 f.34b contain a single pericope, which on the basis of the fate of the sons of Aaron, described in ch 10, determines under what circumstances Aaron alone is permitted to enter the Holy of Holies; (b) vs 29–34a contain “an older, relatively simpler law in reference to the yearly day of penitence and atonement”; (c) vs 5.7–10.11.14–28 are a “later enlargement of this ritual, with a more complicated blood rite,” and above all with “the rite of the sin goat.” Of these three pieces only (a) is thought to belong to the original Priest Codex, as proved esp. by its reference back to ch 10; (b) is regarded as belonging to the secondary parts, because the day of repentance is not yet mentioned in Neh 8 ff; cf III, 1; at any rate the anointing of all the priests is there not yet presupposed (cf LEVITICUS); (c), however, is declared to be very late and its separate parts are regarded as having originated only after the others (thus recently also Bertholet). It is impossible here to enter into all the minor parts eliminated by the exegetes; and in the same way we do not intend in our examination to enter into all the incorrect views found in these criticisms. We confine ourselves to the chief matter. The very foundation of the criticism is wrong. What Aaron’s sons experienced according to Lev 10 could very easily have furnished a connecting link for that ritual which is introduced in vs 2 ff, but could never have furnished the occasion for the composition of the pericope described above (a); for Nadab and Abihu had not entered into the Holy of Holies at all. Just as little justifiable is the conclusion drawn from ch 10, that ch 16 originally followed immediately on ch 10. For who could possibly have conceived the thought of inserting chs 11–15 in an altogether unsuitable place between chs 10 and 16 and thus have split asunder a connection so transparent? In general, the different attempts to break the unity of this chapter show how subjective and arbitrary these attempts are. They are a characteristic example of the manner in which the Priest Codex is now being further divided (cf LEVITICUS). In general, sufficient material for the positive refutation of such attempts has been given above.

II. The Significance of the Day of Atonement.

—The significance of the day is expressed in the name “Day of Atonement” (Yôm ha-kippurim: Lev 23 27 f; 25 9) in the same manner as it is in the fast for Israel which was enjoined on the congregation as a sign of sorrow for their sins (this fasting being the only one enjoined by the law: Lev 16 29.31; 23 26 ff; Nu 29 7 ff), as also finally and chiefly in the entire ritual (Ex 30 10; Lev 23 28; Nu 29 11; Lev 16; cf also Ezk 45 18–20.22). Then, too, the atonement takes place for the sanctuary which has been defiled by the contamination of the Israelites (Ex 30 10; Lev 16 16–20.33; cf also Ezk 45 18–20). In particular, mention is made of the Holy of Holies (Lev 16 33, called Mikdash ha-kodesh; otherwise in Lev regularly ha-kodesh), then of the holy place (16 16b.20.33), and then of the altar (16 18.20.33). In the last-mentioned case it is a matter of discussion whether the altar of incense is meant, as is claimed by Jewish tradition, on the basis of Ex 30 10, or the altar of burnt offerings, for which reference could be made to the additional statements in Lev 16 18, to those of ver 16, and to the conclusion in ver 17. The altar of incense (Ex 30 10) would then be included in the atonement of the tent of meeting. The somewhat remarkable position of ver 17b would then at the same time find its motive in this, that, while vs 6 and 11b mention an atonement only for Aaron and his house, the atonement of the Holy of Holies and of the holy place in ver 17 is for Aaron, his house, and the whole congregation, while the atonement of the burnt-offering altar in the forecourt (vs 18) would be intended only for the sins of the congregation. The atonement, however, takes place for all the transgressions of the congregation since the last Day of Atonement (cf vs 21 f.30.34). In reference to the significance of what is done with the second goat of sin offering, cf vs 8 ff.20 ff, and AZAZEL, II, 1. In this way Delitzsch has correctly called the Day of Atonement “the Good Friday of the Old Testament.” How deeply the consciousness of sin must have been awakened, if the many otherwise commanded private and congregational sacrifices did not make such an institution superfluous, and if even the high priest himself stood before God as a sinner (vs 6.11 ff). On this day, with the exception of the mitre, he does not wear the insignia of his high-priestly office, but wears white garments, which in their simplicity correspond to the earnestness of the situation. The repetition of the bath, both in his case and in that of the other persons engaged in the ceremony (vs 4.24.26.28), was necessary, because the mere washing of the hands and feet (Ex 30 19 f) would not suffice on this occasion (cf Nu 19 7 ff.19.21). The flesh of the sin-offering animals was not permitted to be eaten but had to be burned (ver 27) because it was sacrificed also for Aaron’s sin, and its blood was carried not only into the holy place but also into the Holy of Holies (cf 16 27 with Lev 6 23; 4 11 f.21; Ex 29 14; Lev 8 17; 9 11; 10 19). And in comparison with the consciousness of sin that had been aroused, how great must on the other hand God’s grace appear, when once in each year a general remission of all the sins that had been forgiven was guaranteed.

“The Day of Atonement, the good Friday of the Old Testament”—these words express not only the highest significance of the day but also its limitations. As the tabernacle, the sacrificial system, the entire a Christian law, thus too the Day of Atonement Standpoint in particular contained only the shadow of future good things, but not these things themselves (He 10 1), and is “like in pattern to the true” (He 9 24). Christ Himself entered into the holy place, which was not made with hands, namely, into heaven itself, and has now appeared before God, by once for all giving Himself as a sacrifice for the removal of sin (He 9 23 ff). By this act the purpose of the OT sacrificial cultus and its highest development, viz. the Day of Atonement, understood in its typical significance, has been fulfilled, and at the same time surpassed and thereby abrogated (cf LEVITICUS). Accordingly, our hope, too, like an anchor (He 6 19), penetrates to the inner part of the veil in the higher sense of the term, i.e. to heaven.

III. On the History of the Day of Atonement.—

(1) The facts and the false conclusions.—The Day of

1. The Long Silence of History

Atonement is stated to have been instituted in the times of Moses (Lev 16 1); the ceremony takes place in the tabernacle (tent of meeting); the people are presupposed to be in the camp (vs 26 ff); Aaron is still the high priest.

Very remarkably there is but little evidence of the observance of this prominent day in the later history of Israel. Down to the time of the Exile there is found a deep silence on this subject. The days of atonement in Ezk 45 18 ff (cf under I, 1) differ in number and observance from that in Lev 16. According to Zec 3 9, God in the Messianic future will take away the guilt of the land in a single day; but this too presents no more than an analogy to the results of the Day of Atonement. On the other hand, there is no reference made to the day where we could expect it. Not only 2 Ch 7 7-9 in connection with the consecration of Solomon's temple, and Ezr 3 1-6, in the account of the reintroduction of the sacrificial services after the return from the Exile, are silent on the subject, which fact could possibly be explained in an easy manner; but also Neh 8 f. According to 8 2 f, Ezra begins on the 1st day of the 7th month in the year 444 BC to read from the law; on the 2d day of the 7th month remembrance is made of the ordinance treating of the feast of tabernacles, and on the 22d day of the 7th month (8 13 ff), this festival is observed; on the 24th day of the 7th month a day of penance is observed (9 1); but of the Day of Atonement coming in between ch 8 1 and ch 9 1, viz. on the 10th day of the 7th month, which would seem to make the day of penance superfluous, nothing is said. From these facts the Wellhausen school has drawn the conclusion, in accordance with its principles elsewhere observed, that all those legal enactments that have not in the history a sufficient evidence of having been observed, did not exist until the time when they have such historical evidence; that therefore the Day of Atonement did not originate until after the year 444 BC. It is claimed that the day originated in the two days of atonement mentioned in Ezk 45 18-20 (cf under I, 1); in the four national fast days of Zec 7 5, and 8 19, and in the day of penance of 444 BC, just mentioned, on the 24th day of the 7th month, which is said to have been repeated on the following New Year's day, the 10th day of the 7th month; and that by the sacred character of its observance it soon crowded the New Year day upon the 1st day of the 7th month (cf Lev 23 23 ff; Nu 29 1 ff; contrary to Lev 25 9 and Ezk 40 1). In this way it is thought that Lev 16 29 ff first originated, and that at a still later time the complicated blood ritual had been added (cf under I, 1, 2). But it is to be observed that in still later times there is found no more frequent mention of the Day of Atonement than in the earlier, although it is the custom of modern criticism to place a much larger bulk of Biblical lit. into this later period. It is only when we come to Jesus Sirach (Ecclus 50 5 ff) that the high priest Simon is praised, when he came forth from behind the veil; and this is certainly a reference to the Day of Atonement, although no further mention is made at this place of the ceremony as such. Then there is a further silence on the subject down to Philo and the Epistle to the He (6 19; 9 7.13 ff; 10 1 ff; cf under II, 2). It is probable too that the fasting mentioned in Acts 27 9 is based on the Day of Atonement. We have in this manner a characteristic example to show how carefully we must handle the argument from silence; if we do not want to arrive at uncomfortable results.

Since Lev 16 constitutes only one part of the Levitical legislation, the question as to the original and historical character of the day cannot be fully discussed at this place (see LEVITICUS). At so late a period, naturally all the data that would lead to an explanation of the origin of such a fundamental institution as the Day of Atonement are lacking. It is all the more impossible to separate Lev 16 from the other priestly ordinances, because the name of the lid of the ark of covenant (happöreth: Ex 25 17 ff; 26 34) stands in the clearest relation to the ceremony that takes place with this ark on the Day of Atonement. The impossibility of splitting up Lev 16 as is the manner of critics, or even as much as separating it from Lev 11-15, has been sufficiently demonstrated above (cf under I). Against the view which forces the Priest Codex down at least to the Exile and to claim the tabernacle as the product of imagination and as a copy of the temple of Solomon (see EXODUS), we have still the following to add: If the ark of the covenant was no longer in existence after the Exile and if, according to Jer 3 16, the Israelites no longer expected its restoration, then it would have been absolutely impossible in the ritual of the Day of Atonement to connect the most important ceremony of this ritual with this ark and on this to base the atonement. In the second temple, as is well known, the incense pan was placed on the "foundation stone" in the Holy of Holies, because there was no tabernacle. Against these facts the counter-arguments mentioned above cannot stand. Even those who deny the existence of the Day of Atonement do not lay much stress on 2 Ch 7 1-9 and Ezr 3 1-6; but Neh 8 ff also does not deserve mention, since in this place the emphasis lies on the purpose of showing how the congregation was to declare its adherence to the law, and how the Day of Repentance, which had been observed since the beginning of the history of Israel, was instituted to be observed on the 24th day of the 7th month for all sins (9 1 ff), and was not made superfluous by the celebration of the Day of Atonement on the 10th day of the 7th month, on which day only the sins of the last year were taken into consideration. But Ezekiel changed or ignored also other pre-exilic arrangements (cf EZEKIEL), so that he is no authority in deciding the question as to the earlier existence of the Day of Atonement. Finally, attention must be drawn to the fact that the Passover festival is mentioned in prophetic literature, in addition to the mere reference in Isa 30 29, only in Ezk 45 21; the ark of the covenant only in Jer 3 16; the Feast of Tabernacles only in Hos 12 9; Ezk 45 25; and that in its historical connection the Feast of Weeks is mentioned incidentally only in 2 Ch 8 13, and possibly in 1 K 9 25, and is not at all found in Ezk (cf 45 18 ff), although the existence of these institutions has for a very long time been called into question.

The Day of Atonement, in accordance with its purpose in later times, came more and more into the foreground and was called "the great fast" or "the great day," or merely "the day." Its ritual was further enlarged and the special parts mentioned in the law were fully explained, fixed and specialized. Cf esp. the tract "Yoma" in the Mish; and for the further elaborations and stories in poetry and prose on the basis of the Talm, see, e.g. Delitzsch's translation from Maim, Ha-yád ha-házakáh, in the supplement to his Commentary on the Epistle to the Hebrews, 1857. According to these accounts, e.g. the high priest had to be a married man. Already seven days before the beginning of the Day of Atonement he was ordered to leave his house and had to submit to a series of purifications and had to practise for the performance of the different purification ceremonies, some of which were difficult. The last night he was not allowed to sleep and had to spend his time in studying the sacred writings. On the Day of Atonement he took five baths and ten washings. Four times he enters the Holy of Holies (with the incense), with the blood of both sin offerings, and when he brings out the utensils used with the incense he makes three confessions of sins (for himself, for himself and his house, for Israel); 10 times in all he utters the name of Jeh; 43 times he sprinkles; in addition he must read certain sections of the Scriptures or repeat them from memory (cf also AZAZEL). When he returns home he celebrates a festival of rejoicing, because he has without harm been able to leave the sanctuary. In addition, he had performed severe physical work, and especially difficult was the manipulation of the incense. The modern estimate put on the Day of Atonement appears from the following citation of Wellhausen: "The rite and the sacrifice through the unfavorable circumstances of the times have disappeared; but it has retained the same sacred character. He who has not yet entirely broken with Judaism observes this day, no matter how indifferent he may be otherwise to old customs and festivals."

ATROTH-BETH-JOAB, at-roth-beth-jō'ab (עֲטְרוֹת בֵּית יוֹאָב, at'roth bēth yō'ābh, "crowns of the house of Joab"): AV "Ataroth," the house of Joab. Probably a family in Judah (1 Ch 2 54).

ATROTH-SHOPHAN, at'roth-shō'fan (עֲטְרוֹת שׁוֹפָן, at'roth shōphān; LXX γῆν σωφάν, gēn sōphān): A town built or fortified by the children of Gad E. of the Jordan (Nu 32 35), named next to Aroer. If it had been at Khirbet Attārūs or Jebel Attārūs (HDB and EB s.v.) Aroer would hardly have been named between them. AV reads Atroth, Shophan, understanding that two places are named. No identification is yet possible.

ATTAL, at'tā-l, at'ī (עֲטָי, 'attay, "timely"?)

(1) A son of Jarha, the Egyptian, by a daughter of Sheshan (1 Ch 2 35 f).

(2) A Gadite soldier who joined David's army at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 11).

(3) A son of Rehoboam and grandson of Solomon (2 Ch 11 20).

ATTAIN, a-tān': The rendering of קָנָה, kānāh = "buy," "get" (Prov 1 5); נָסַג, nāsagh = "reach," "a meal-offering . . . according as he is able" (Ezk 46 7m), "not attained unto the days" (Gen 47 9); יָכַל or יָכִיל, yākhōl = "be able," "overcome," "attain to innocency" (Hos 8 5); בָּרָא, bō' = "come," "follow" (2 S 23 19.23; 1 Ch 11 21.25); κατα-τῶ, katanidō = "arrive at" (Acts 27 12 AV; Phil 3 11); καταλαμβάνω, katalambānō = "take eagerly," "seize," "apprehend," "attained to righteousness" (Rom 9 30); φθάνω, phthānō = "have arrived at" (Rom 9 31 AV; Phil 3 16); λαμβάνω, lambānō = "take," "get a hold of," "catch," RV "already obtained" (Phil 3 12); παρακολουθέω, parakolouthēō = "follow," "trace out," "conform to" (1 Tim 4 6). Here RV corrects AV.

ATTALIA, at-a-li'a (Ἀτταλία, Attalia): A city on the southern coast of Asia Minor in ancient Pamphylia which, according to Acts 14 25, was visited by Paul and Barnabas on the way to Antioch during their first missionary journey. The city was founded by Attalus II Philadelphus (159-138 BC), hence its name Attalia, which during the Middle Ages was corrupted to Satalia; its modern name is Adalia. Attalia stood on a flat terrace of limestone, about 120 ft. high, near the point where the Catarrhactes River flowed into the sea. The river now, however, has practically disappeared, for the greater part of its water is turned into the fields for irrigation purposes. The early city did not enjoy the ecclesiastical importance of the neighboring city of Perga; but in 1084 when Perga declined, Attalia became a metropolis. In 1148 the troops of Louis IV sailed from there to Syria; in 1214 the Seljuks restored the city walls, and erected several public buildings. The city continued to be the chief port for ships from Syria and Egypt, and the point of entry to the interior until modern times, when the harbor at Mersine was reopened; it has now become a place of little importance.

The town possesses considerable which is of archaeological interest. The outer harbor was protected by ancient walls and towers now in ruins; its entrance was closed with a chain. The inner harbor was but a recess in the cliff. The city was surrounded by two walls which were constructed at various times from material taken from the ruins of the ancient city; the outer wall was protected by a moat. The modern town, lying partly within and partly without the walls is thus divided into quarters. In the southern quarter live the Christians; in the northern the Moslems. Among other objects of archaeological interest still to be seen may be mentioned the inscribed arched gateway of Hadrian and the aqueduct. Rich gardens now surround the town; the chief exports are grain, cotton, licorice root and valonia or acorn-cups.

ATTALUS, at'a-lus: King of Pergamum, mentioned in 1 Macc 15 22 among the kings to whom was sent an edict (Ant, XIV, viii, 5) from Rome forbidding the persecution of the Jews. See ATTALIA.

ATTEND, a-tend', ATTENDANCE, a-tend'ans:

(1) "To incline," "listen," "regard" (קָשַׁב, kāshabh; Ps 17 1 etc); then, in AV, "observe," but in RV, more frequently, "give heed" (προσέχειν νοῦν, proséchein nóin), as in 1 Tim 4 13. (2) "To be with," "take care of," "wait upon" (Est 4 5; He 7 13; Rom 13 6); lit. "give unremitting care to," as in 1 Cor 7 35 (Luther: "serve the Lord constantly and without hindrance").

ATTENT, a-tent' (archaic; 2 Ch 6 40), ATTENTIVE, a-tent'iv: Expresses the direction of thought and interest toward some one point. Same Heb word as "attend," and is used particularly in prayers (Ps 130 2; Neh 1 6). "Very attentive" (Lk 19 48) is a paraphrase for what is lit. rendered in RV, "the people all hung upon him, listening" (ἐξεκρέμετο, exekrémelo).

ATTHARATES, a-thar'a-tēz: A title assigned to Nehemiah, probably by a later editor (Neh 8 9). The LXX omits the title; the Vulg gives "Athersatha"; AV reads "Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha." Tirshatha is the Pers title for a local or provincial governor (Neh 8 9=1 Esd 9 49). See TIRSHATHA.

ATTHARIAS, a-tha-rī'as, ATHARIAS: 1 Esd 5 40=Ezr 2 63. See TIRSHATHA.

ATTIRE, a-tīr', DYED ATTIRE: "Can a virgin forget her ornaments, or a bride her attire?" asks the prophet Jeremiah in hot remonstrance against Israel's unfaithfulness. "Yet," saith Jeh, "my people have forgotten me" (2 32). "And I saw that she was defiled," cries Ezekiel against Jerus; "she saw men . . . girded with girdles upon their loins, with flowing turbans [AV exceeding in dyed attire] upon their heads, . . . after the likeness of the Babylonians in Chaldea, . . . and . . . she doted upon them . . ." (Ezk 23 13-16). "And, behold, there met him," says the author of Prov (7 10) in his description of the "strange woman," that "lieth in wait at every street corner," "a woman with the attire of a harlot, and wily of heart," whose "house is the way to Sheol" (ver 27). These passages show how diversely and elastically the term "attire" was used among the Hebrews. The numerous synonyms for "dress," "attire," "apparel," "clothes," "raiment," "garment," etc, found in EVV, reflect a similar wealth of nomenclature in the original Heb and Gr; but the lack of exactness and consistency in the renderings of translators makes the identification of the various articles of dress referred to very difficult, sometimes impossible. See DRESS.

ATTITUDES, at'i-tūds: Customs change slowly in Bible lands. This becomes clear by a comparison of the many references found in the Bible and other literatures of the Orient with existing circumstances and conditions. The same fact is attested by the pictures illustrating daily life upon the monuments of Assyria, Babylonia and Egypt in the countries between the Nile and the Tigris. Many of these, dating back to the second or third millennium before our era, prove conclusively that the same practices and usages as are now common among the inhabitants of those lands were in vogue in the days of Hammurabi and the early rulers of Egypt. This is esp. true of matters pertaining to the worship of the gods, and of the attitudes or positions assumed in homage and respect to monarchs and those in authority.

The many references found in the Bible to these same usages prove that the Hebrews too had much in common with the nations around them, not only in creed, but also in the mode of worship, as well as in general everyday etiquette. This is not strange, at least among the Sem peoples, for there is more or less agreement, even among all nations, ancient and modern, in the attitude of the worshipper in temple and high place.

Kissing the Hand.

The outward tokens of respect and honor shown by Orientals to their superiors, above all to monarchs, may seem exaggerated. But when we consider that the king was God's viceregent upon the earth or over a certain country, and in some sense Divine, worthy even of adoration, it is not strange that almost equal homage should be paid him as the gods themselves. The higher the person was in power, the greater the honor and respect shown him. It is natural, therefore, that God, the Lord of Lords, and the King of Kings should be the recipient of the highest reverence and adoration.

There are several Heb words used to describe the various attitudes assumed by those who worshipped Jeh and heathen gods; these same words are constantly employed in speaking of the homage or respect paid to rulers and persons in authority. The most common terms are those rendered "to stand," "to bow," "to kneel" and "prostrate oneself" or "fall on the face." It is not always easy to differentiate between them, for often one passes imperceptibly into the other. No doubt several attitudes were assumed by the worshipper or suppliant while offering a prayer or petition. The intensity, the ardor or earnestness with which such a petition or prayer was presented would naturally have much to do with the words and posture of the petitioner, though the same expression might be employed to designate his posture or attitude. Thus "to fall on the face" might be done in many different ways. The Moslems observe a regular course of nine or more different postures in their worship. These are more or less faithfully observed by the faithful everywhere. It is almost certain that the Hebrews in common with other Orientals observed and went through almost every one of these attitudes as they presented themselves in prayer to Jeh. We shall call attention to just four postures: (1) standing, (2) bowing, (3) kneeling, and (4) falling on the face or prostration.

This was one of the very common postures in prayer to God, esp. in public worship. It is still customary to stand either erect or

1. Standing with slightly bowed head while offering the public prayers in the synagogue. This is likewise the common practice of a large number of Christians in this and other lands, and no doubt such a posture is sanctioned by the example of the early church and primitive Christians, who, in turn, adopted the usages of the Jewish church. The same practice was in vogue among the Persians, Egyptians and Babylonians and other ancient people as is evidenced by their sculptures and paintings. The famous stela of Hammurabi shows this great king in a standing position as he receives the famous Code from the sun-god. There are numerous Bab and Assy seals on which are pictured a priest in a standing position before the throne of Sin or Shamash. In this attitude with uplifted hands, he is sometimes accompanied by the person in whose behalf prayers are made. A beautiful rock sculpture at Ibriz, S.E. of Eregli in Lycania, shows us a king or satrap in a standing position, worshipping a local Baal. Rev. E. J. Davies, the discoverer of this Hittite monument, in describing it, makes this remark, which we cannot refrain from inserting, inasmuch as it gives another proof of the unchangeable East. He says: "He [the god] wears boots turned up in front, and bound round the leg above the ankle by thongs and a piece of leather reaching half-way up the shin, exactly as it is worn to this day by the peasants of the plain of Cilicia round Adana." King Solomon, during at least a portion of his prayer at the dedication of the temple, stood before the altar with his hands stretched out toward heaven (1 K 8 22). Numerous allusions to prayer in the NT prove that standing was the common posture (Mt 6 5; Mk 11 25; Lk 18 11).

What has been said about standing while praying to God is true also of the attitude of the petitioner when paying homage or making an entreaty to man. The Assyrian and Babylonian monuments are full of evidence on this point; we shall give only one illustration: One of the sculptures describing the siege of Lachish by Sennacherib represents the monarch as seated upon his throne while the conquered stand or kneel before him. Joseph stood before Pharaoh (Gen 41 46). Solomon's advisers stood before him (2 Ch 10 6) and so did those of Rehoboam (ver 8). The same attitude was assumed by suppliants in the Persian court (Est 5 2; 8 4). The same is true of Babylonia (Dnl 1 19; 2 2).

Though standing seems to have been the usual attitude, it is quite certain that kneeling was common at all times.

2. Kneeling The monuments afford abundant proof for this statement; so too the many references in the Bible. Solomon not only stood before the altar on the occasion of dedicating his famous temple, but he also knelt (1 K 8 54; 2 Ch 6 13). Jos, describing this ceremony, says that the king at the conclusion of his prayer prostrated himself on the ground and in this posture continued worshipping for a long time. Ezra fell upon his knees as he addressed Jeh in prayer (Ezr 9 5). Daniel, too, knelt upon his knees and prayed three times a day (Dnl 6 10). The same practice was observed by the apostles and the early church; for we read that Stephen (Acts 7 60), Peter (9 40), Paul (20 36) and others (21 5) assumed this posture as they prayed.

As already stated, it is not always easy to determine the exact posture of those described as kneeling or bowing, for this varied

3. Bowing with the temperament of the suppliant and the intensity of his prayer or supplication. Eleazer when sent to select a wife for his master, Isaac, bowed before Jeh (Gen 24 26). The Hebrews on leaving Egypt were commanded to bow to Jeh (Ex 11 8; 12 27.28). The injunction of the Psalmist shows the prevalence of this posture in prayer: "O come, let us worship and bow down" (Ps 95 6). Isaiah refers to the same when he says: "Every knee shall bow" to God

Kneeling.

Bowing.

Touching the Forehead; Touching the Breast; Folding the Arms; Placing Hands on Knees.

(Isa 45 23). St. Paul too bowed his knees to the Father (Eph 3 14). The same practice obtained among the heathen nations as they worshipped their gods or idols. Naaman bowed before Rimmon, his god. The numerous prohibitions in the Heb Scriptures against bowing down at the shrines of the nations around Israel prove the prevalence of this method of adoration. Indeed, one of the ten commandments is directed explicitly against bowing to or worshipping idols (Ex 20 5). The same prohibition was often repeated, as by Joshua (23 7) and the author of 2 K (17 35). Unfortunately Israel did transgress in this very thing, for while still in the Wilderness they bowed down to the gods of Moab (Nu 25 2) and again after their settlement in Canaan (Jgs 2 12). Amaziah bowed down to the gods of Edom (2 Ch 25 14).

Like deference was also shown to angels or supernatural beings. Thus Abraham bows to the three angels as they appear to him at Mamre Supplication: "Falling at the Feet."

(Gen 18 2). And so did Lot at Sodom (19 1). Joshua fell on his face before the prince of the host of Jeh (Josh 5 14). This attitude was a common one to Ezekiel as he saw his wonderful visions (Ezk 1 28; 3 23, and often). Daniel when he saw Gabriel in a vision was affrighted and fell upon his face (Dnl 8 17). The three disciples had the same experience on the Mount of Transfiguration (Mt 17 6).

Monarchs and persons of superior rank were the recipients of like honors and marks of respect. Joseph's brothers bowed as they came into his presence, thinking that he was an Egyptian of high rank (Gen 43 28). Bathsheba bowed to King David when she entered his presence in the interest of their son Solomon (1 K 1 16.31). But such deference was not shown to monarchs only, for Jacob and his household bowed seven times to the irate Esau (Gen 33 3 ff). Abigail fell on her face before David as he was marching to avenge himself upon Nabal, her husband (1 S 25 23). David too when he went to meet Jonathan fell on his face to the ground and bowed himself three times (1 S 20 41). The Shunammite woman, as she came to entreat Elisha for the life of her boy, bowed before the prophet (2 K 4 37). The same custom prevailed not only among the Persians, as is evident from the Book of Esther and the monuments at Persepolis, but also in Babylonia, Assyria and other countries.

This was but an intenser way of showing one's regard or of emphasizing a petition. It was the token of abject subjection or the

4. Prostration—deepest reverence. Abraham, when

Jeh appeared to him and promised him a son, with profoundest gratitude and greatest joy fell prostrate on his face (Gen 17 3). Moses and Aaron were often found in this posture (Nu 14 5; 16 4.45; 20 6). Elijah, eccentric in many ways, cast himself upon the earth and placed his face between his knees (cf 1 K 18 42). Job fell on the ground and worshipped Jeh (Job 1 20). Such homage was often shown to our Saviour (Mk 5 22; Jn 11 32), not because men realized that He was God in the flesh, but simply as a mark of respect for a great teacher and miracle-worker. It is to be noticed that our Saviour never refused such homage, but accepted it as pertinent and proper. Did He not realize that honor and worship Divine belonged to Him, He would have refused them just as Peter did when Cornelius fell down at his feet and worshipped him (Acts 10 25) or as the angel in Rev 19 10, who said to John, prostrate at his feet, "See thou do it not: I am a fellow servant," etc. See ADORATION, III. W. W. DAVIES

ATTUS, at'us (1 Esd 8 29=Ezr 8 2). See HAT-TUSH.

AUDIENCE, ô'di-ens: Tr^d from the Heb אָזְנָה, 'ôzen, "ear." In Gen 23 10 f "in the audience of" is equal to "in the presence of," or "while they listened." Cf Ex 24 7; 1 S 25 24 (RV "in thine ears"); 1 Ch 28 8; Neh 13 1. In the NT the expression "to give audience" (Acts 22 22; 13 16, RV "hearken"; 15 12, RV "they hearkened") is tr^d from the Gr ἀκούω, akouô, "to hear" or derivatives, and means "to listen," "to pay attention." In AV Lk 7 1 (RV "in the ears of") and AV 20 45 (RV "in the hearing of") the usage is similar to that of the OT.

AUGIA, ô'ji-a (Αὐγία, Augia): The wife of Jaddus, whose sons were removed from priesthood because their names were not found in the register, their ancestors having "usurped the office of the priesthood" (1 Esd 5 38). Omitted in Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

AUGURS' OAK, ô'gurs' ôk: If we tr the Heb vb. 'ônên, "to practise augury" (see AUGURY) we should in Jgs 9 37 for "the oak of Meonenim" render "the augurs' oak" as in RVm, for the last word is simply the part. of the same vb. and means "one who practises augury," though there is some doubt as to the exact connotation of the word. See under DIVINATION. Both the EVV make this noun the name of a place; but no such place is known and the derivation and form of the word are clear and certain. We have a similar phrase similarly misunderstood by our translators in Gen 12 6 where the "oak of Moreh" should be "the oak" (or "terebinth"?) "of the diviner" or "augur," for môreh is also a part.= "one who teaches" or "directs." Probably the same tree is meant, since in each case the neighborhood is that of Shechem. The worship of trees, or rather the deity supposed to make them his home, has prevailed very widely. See W. R. Smith, *Rel. Sem.*², 195; cf Jgs 4 5; 2 S 5 24 and "the oak of Zeus at Dodona." In Jgs 9 6 we read of a "maççêbhâh, oak tree": the tree with an altar on which sacrifices were offered. The oak trees of Gen 12 6 and of Jgs 9 37, if two distinct trees are meant, would be trees which the Canaanites had been in the habit of consulting: hence the name.

AUGURY, ô'gû-ri, ô'gur-i: This word occurs in the RV in Lev 19 26; Dt 18 10, 14; 2 K 21 6, and the || 2 Ch 33 6. In all these cases the vb. "practise augury" is in the AV "to observe times." The vb. thus tr^d is אָרָא, 'ônên, which means probably to utter a low croaking sound as was done in divining. See DIVINATION.

I. Definition.—The derivation of "augur" is doubtful, but that it means strictly to divine from the flight of birds is suggested by its likeliest etymology (avis, gur) and esp. from the fact that in early Lat the augur was called auspex (= avi spex). But both words came to be applied to all forms of divining from omens.

II. Augury among the Romans.—The Rom augur was a government official, paid to guide the councils of the nation in times of peace and of war. The principal signs from which these augurs deduced their omens were these: (1) celestial signs, chiefly lightning and thunder, the direction of the former (right to left a good sign, and vice versa); (2) signs from the flight, cries and feeding of birds; (3) signs from the movements and audible sounds of animals, including serpents; (4) signs from the examination of the entrails of animals; (5) belomancy, or divination by arrows; (6) sortilege, or divination by lot. Among the Romans as among other nations (Babylonians, etc), a sacrifice was offered before omens were taken, so as to propitiate the gods.

III. Augury among the Greeks.—Almost the only kind of divination practised or even known among the Romans was that by signs or omens, though Cicero (de Div. i. 1 f) notices another kind which may be called divining by direct inspiration from the gods. It is this higher and more spiritual mode of divining that obtained most largely among the Greeks, whose chief word for diviner (mantis) implies this. Yet the lower kind of divination known as augury was to some extent practised among the Greeks.

IV. Augury among the Hebrews.—In general it may be said that the religion of Israel set itself steadfastly and consistently against augury; a very remarkable fact when one remembers how rife it was among the surrounding peoples—Arabs, Assyrians, Babylonians, Egyptians, etc. Surely there is in this evidence of special Divine guidance, for those ancient Hebrews are not fit to be compared with the Babylonians or Egyptians or Romans for achievements in art and general secular literature. For the attitude of the OT toward augury see the passages enumerated in the opening of this article. Several kinds of augury are mentioned in the OT, and in some cases without explicit condemnation.

Belomancy was a method of divination by arrows, a number of which were marked in certain ways, then mixed and drawn at random. We have a reference to this in Hos 4 12: "My people ask counsel from their wood [lit. "tree"] and their staff [i.e. "arrow"] tells them [their oracles]"; and also in Ezk 21 21: "For the king of Babylon . . . used divination, shaking the arrows to and fro." The first passage shows that belomancy was practised by Israelites though the prophet condemned it. The second is interesting as showing how the Babylonian used his arrows. It is to be noticed that the prophet Ezekiel records the incident without making any comment on it, favorable or otherwise. He would, however, had he spoken, almost certainly have condemned it. Mohammed forbade this use of arrows as "an abomination of Satan's work" (Koran, Sur. 5 92).

Hydromancy, or divination by water, was practised by Joseph (Gen 44 3-5) without any censure on the part of the writer. There were among the Romans and other ancient nations, as among modern Arabs, etc, many modes of divining by means of water. Generally a piece of silver or gold or a precious stone was thrown into a vessel containing water: the resulting movements of the water and the figures formed were interpreted according to certain fixed signs. See August., de Civ. Dei, vii. 31; Strabo xvi. 11. 39; Iamblichus, de Myst., iii. 4.

Of sortilege, or divination by lot, we have instances in Lev 16 8; Mt 27 35; 1 Ch 25 8; Jon 1 2 ff; Acts 1 26, etc. The Urim and Thum-

3. Sortilege mim was simply a case of sortilege, though in this case, as in the cases enumerated above, God was supposed to control the result. A proper tr of 1 S 14 41 f, based on a text corrected according to the LXX of Lucian, is the following: "And Saul said, O Lord the God of Israel, why hast thou not answered thy servant this day? If the iniquity be in me or in Jonathan my son, give Urim; and if thou sayest thus, The iniquity is in the people, give Thummim." It seems almost certain that these words refer to two balls put into the high priest's ephod and drawn by him at random, the one divining one answer, and the other the contrary.

We meet with several other signs. The prophet Elisha directs King Joash to throw two arrows through the window in order to find out whether the king will be victorious or not (2 K 13 14-19). If Gideon's fleece were wet and the ground dry this was to be a sign of coming victory over the Midianites. There is nothing in the narrative disapproving of the course taken (Jgs 6 36-40). In 1 S 14 8 ff Jonathan is represented as deciding whether or not he is to attack the Philis by the words he will hear them speak. See further Gen 24 12-19; 2 K 20 9.

Dreams are very commonly mentioned in the Bible as a means of forecasting the future. See Gen 20 3.6 f (Abimelech); 31 10-13 (Jacob); 37 5; 40 3 ff (Joseph), and also Jgs 7 13; 1 K 3 5 f; Mt 1 20; 2 12 ff; 27 19, etc. The part of the Pent ascribed by Wellhausen, etc, to E abounds with accounts of such significant dreams.

That omens were taken from the heavenly bodies by the Babylonians, and other ancient nations is matter of definite knowledge, but it is never countenanced in the OT. Indeed the only explicit reference to it in the Heb Scriptures occurs in Isa 47 13 where the Exilic author mockingly urges Babylon to turn to her astrologers that they may save her from her threatened doom.

Several cuneiform inscriptions give lists of celestial omens by which Bab augurs prognosticated the future. In Mt 2 the wise men received their first intimation of the birth of the child Jesus from a bright star which they saw in the East.

V. Higher Character of Heb Prophecy.—Though OT prophecy in its lowest forms has features in common with heathen divination, it stands on an infinitely higher level. The prophet speaks under a strong impulse and from a sense of duty. The heathen diviner plied his calling for money. The Gr mantis worked himself into a state of frenzy, thought to imply inspiration, by music and certain drugs. The prophet believed himself directly guided by God. See ASTROLOGY, 1; DIVINATION.

LITERATURE.—T. Witton Davies, Magic, Divination and Demonology among the Hebrews, 1898, 72 ff; arts. on "Divination" in HDB (Jevons); EB (T. Witton Davies), and on "Augury" in Jew Enc (Blau), valuable as giving the rabbinical side as well.

AUGUSTAN, ð-gus'tan (AUGUSTUS') BAND. See ARMY, ROMAN.

AUGUSTUS, ð-gus'tus (Αὐγουστος, Aúgoustos):

(1) The first Rom emperor, and noteworthy in Bible history as the emperor in whose reign the Incarnation took place (Lk 2 1). His original name was Caius Octavius Caepias and he was born in 63 BC, the year of Cicero's consulship. He was the grand-nephew of Julius Caesar, his mother Atia having been the daughter of Julia, Caesar's younger sister. He was only 19 years of age when Caesar was murdered in the Senate house (44 BC), but with a true instinct of statesmanship he steered his course through the intrigues and dangers of the closing years of the republic, and after the battle of Actium was left without a rival. Some difficulty was experienced in finding a name that would exactly define the position of the new ruler of the state. He himself declined the names of rex and dictator, and in 27 BC he was by the decree of the Senate styled Augustus. The epithet implied respect and veneration beyond what is bestowed on human things:

"Sancta vocant augusta patres: augusta vocantur Templa sacerdotum rite dicata manu."
—Ovid Fasti l. 609; cf Dion Cass., 5316

The Greeks rendered the word by Σεβαστός, Sebastós, lit. "reverend" (Acts 25 21.25). The name was connected by the Romans with augur—"one consecrated by religion"—and also with the vb. augere. In this way it came to form one of the German imperial titles "Mehrer des Reichs" (extender of the empire). The length of the reign of A., extending as it did over 44 years from the battle of Actium (31 BC) to his death (14 AD), doubtless contributed much to the settlement and consolidation of the new régime after the troublous times of the civil wars.

Coin of Augustus.

It is chiefly through the connection of Judaea and Palestine with the Rom Empire that Augustus comes in contact with early Christianity, or rather with the political and religious life of the Jewish people at the time of the birth of Christ: "Now it came to pass in those days, there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled" (Lk 2 1). During the reign of Herod the Great the government of Palestine was conducted practically without interference from Rome except, of course, as regarded the exaction of the tribute; but on the death of that astute and capable ruler (4 BC) none of his three sons among whom his kingdom was divided showed the capacity of their father. In the year 6 AD the intervention of Augustus was invited by the Jews themselves to provide a remedy for the incapacity of their ruler, Archelaus, who was deposed by the emperor from the rule of Judaea; at the same time, while Caesarea was still the center of the Rom administration, a small Rom garrison was stationed permanently in Jerus. The city, however, was left to the control of the Jewish Sanhedrin with complete judicial and executive authority except that the death sentence required confirmation by the Rom procurator. There is no reason to believe that Augustus entertained any specially favorable appreciation of Judaism, but from policy he showed himself favorable to the Jews in Pal and did everything to keep them from feeling the pressure of the Rom yoke. To the Jews of the eastern Diaspora he allowed great privileges. It has even been held that his aim was to render them pro-Rom, as a counterpoise in some degree to the pronounced Hellenism of the East; but in the West autonomous bodies of Jews were never allowed (see Mommsen, Provinces of the Rom Empire, ch 11).

AUL, ðl. See AWL.

AUNT, änt (אֲוִתָּה, dōdhāh, "loving"): A father's sister (Ex 6 20); an uncle's wife (Lev 18 14; 20 20). See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

AURANITIS, ð-ran-i'tis: Used by Jos for HAURAN (q.v.).

AUSTERE, ðs-tēr' (αὐστηρός, austērós, "harsh," "rough"): Twice used by Christ in the parable of the Pounds (Lk 19 21.22), and of special significance as illustrating the false conception of God cherished by the sinful and disobedient. The fear resident in a guilty conscience sees only sternness and severity in God's perfect righteousness. The word may be made an eminent study in the psychology of an evil heart. Wrongdoing eclipses the soul's vision of God's love and pictures His righteousness as harsh, unfeeling, partial, unjust, forbidding. The awfulness of sin may thus be seen in its power so to pervert the soul as to make goodness seem evil, justice unjust, and even love unlovely. Cf "hard" (σκληρός, sklēros, "dried up," "harsh") in the parable of the Talents (Mt 25 24). DWIGHT M. PRATT

AUTHOR, ὁ·θῆρ: This word is used to translate two Gr words: (1) αἰτιος, aitios, lit. "cause," hence "author." He 5 9, He "became the author of eternal salvation." (2) ἀρχηγός, archēgōs = lit. "chief leader," "prince," "captain"; then author, originator. It is rendered "author" in the following passages: (a) He 12 2, "looking unto Jesus, the author [AV, RV] and finisher [RV "perfecter"] of our faith." But here it seems better to take archēgos in its primary sense, "leader" (RVm "captain"), rather than in its secondary sense "author." The meaning is, not that He is the originator of faith in us, but that He Himself is the pioneer in the life of faith. He is first in the company of the faithful (cf references to His "faithfulness," 2 17; 3 2.5.6), far surpassing in His fidelity even the OT saints mentioned in ch 11; and therefore we are to look to Him as our perfect pattern of faith. Faith has not only Christ for its object, but Christ for its supreme example. So Bengel, Bleek, B. Weiss, Alford, A. B. Davidson, Grimm-Thayer. Others, however, take the word in the sense of "author." (b) He 2 10, "to make the author [AV "captain"] of their salvation perfect through sufferings." Here the idea of Christ as originator or author of our salvation is present (cf the passage He 5 9, where however a different word is used; see above). But here again the original meaning of "leader" is not to be lost sight of. He, being the first possessor of salvation, becomes the author of it for others. "The idea that the Son goes before the saved in the same path ought perhaps to be retained" (Davidson). Cf He 6 20, where Jesus is said to be our "forerunner." (c) Acts 3 15, AVm and RVm have "author," where text has "prince." Here again it is possible that the two ideas are present. D. MIALl EDWARDS

I. General Idea.—The term is of manifold and ambiguous meaning. The various ideas of authority fall into two main classes: as external or public tribunal or standard, which therefore in the nature of the case can only apply to the outward expressions of religion; and as immanent principle which governs the most secret movements of the soul's life.

(1) External.—A characteristic instance of the former idea of authority is found in A. J. Balfour's Foundations of Belief: "Authority as I have been using the term is in all cases contrasted with reason, and stands for that group of non-rational causes, moral, social and educational, which produces its results by psychic processes other than reasoning" (p. 232, 8th ed). The bulk of men's important beliefs are produced and authorized by "custom, education, public opinion, the contagious convictions of countrymen, family, party or church" (p. 226). Authority and reason are "rival claimants" (p. 243). "Authority as such is, from the nature of the case, dumb in the presence of argument" (p. 234). Newman makes a kindred distinction between authority in revealed religion and conscience in natural religion, although he does not assign as wide a sphere to authority, and he allows to conscience a kind of authority. "The supremacy of conscience is the essence of natural religion, the supremacy of apostle or pope or church or bishop is the essence of revealed; and when such external authority is taken away, the mind falls back again of necessity upon that inward guide which it possessed even before revelation was vouchsafed" (Development of Doctrine, 86, ed 1878). From a very different standpoint the same antithesis appears in the very title of Sabatier's book, The Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit. He knows both kinds of authority. "The authority of material force, of custom, tradition, the code, more and more yields place to the inward authority of conscience and reason, and in the same measure becomes transformed for the subject into a true autonomy" (p. xxxiii, ET).

(2) Internal.—Martineau distinguishes the two types of authority to reject the former and accept the latter. "The mere resort to testimony for information beyond our province does not fill the meaning of 'authority'; which we never acknowledge till that which speaks to us from another and a higher strikes home and wakes the echoes in ourselves, and is thereby instantly transferred from external attestation to self-evidence. And this response it is which makes the moral intuitions, started by outward appeal, reflected back by inward veneration, more than egoistic phenomena, and turning them into correspondence between the universal and the individual mind, invests them with true authority" (Seat of Authority, Preface, ed 1890).

Confusion would disappear if the fact were recognized that for different persons, and even for the same persons at different times, authority means different things. For a child his father's or his teacher's word is a decree of absolute authority. He accepts its truth and recognizes his obligation to allow it to determine his conduct. But when reason awakes in him, he may doubt their knowledge or wisdom, and he will seek other guides or authorities. So it is in religious development. Some repudiate authorities that others acknowledge. But no one has a monopoly of the term or concept, and no one may justly say to Dr. Martineau or anybody else that "he has no right to speak of 'authority' at all."

All religion involves a certain attitude of thought and will toward God and the Universe. The feeling element is also present, but that is ignored in the theories of external authority. All religion then involves certain ideas or beliefs about God, and conduct corresponding to them, but ideas may be true or false, and conduct right or wrong. Men need to know what is true, that they may do that which is right. They need some test or standard or court of appeal which distinguishes and enforces the truth; forbids the wrong and commands the right. As in all government there is a legislative and an executive function, the one issuing out of the other, so in every kind of religious authority recognized as such, men require that it should tell them what ideas they ought to believe and what deeds to perform.

In this general sense authority is recognized in every realm of life, even beyond that which is usually called religious life. Science builds up its system in conformity with natural phenomena. Art has its ideals of beauty. Politics seeks to realize some idea of the state. Metaphysics reconstructs the universe in conformity with some principle of truth or reality.

"If we are . . . to attach any definite intelligible meaning to the distinction between things as they really are, and things as they merely appear to be, we must clearly have some universal criterion or test by which the distinction may be made. This criterion must be in the first place infallible; that is, must be such that we cannot doubt its validity without falling into a contradiction in our thought. . . . Freedom from contradiction is a characteristic that belongs to everything that is real . . . and we may therefore use it as a test or criterion of reality" (Taylor, Elements of Metaphysics, 18-19). A more skeptical philosopher writes: "That the truth itself is one and whole and complete, and that all thinking and all experience moves within its recognition, and subject to its manifest authority, this I have never doubted" (Joachim, The Nature of Truth, 178). It is only a thoroughgoing skeptic that could dispense with authority, a "Pyrrho," who holds suspense of judgment to be the only right attitude of mind, and he, to be logical, must also suspend all action and cease to be. There can be no question, therefore, except in total nescience, as to the fact of authority in general; and the problem to decide is, "What is the authority in religion?" It is a problem involved in the difficulties of all ultimate problems, and all argument about it is apt to move in a circle. For the ultimate must bear witness of its own ultimacy, the absolute of its own absoluteness, and authority of its own sovereignty. If there were a court of appeal or a standard of reference to which anything called ultimate, absolute and supreme, could apply for its credentials, it would therefore become relative and subordinate to that other criterion. There is a sense in which Mr. Balfour's saying is true, "that authority is dumb in the presence of argument."

No process of mediate reasoning can establish it, for no premise can be found from which it issues as a conclusion. It judges all things, but is judged of none. It is its own witness and judge. All that reason can say about it is the dictum of Parmenides: "it is."

In this sense, there can be no question again among religious people, that the authority is God.

The one idea involves the other. He alone is self-existent and supreme, who is what He is of His own right.

If God exists, He is the ultimate criterion and power of truth and reality. All truth inheres in Him and issues from Him. The problem of authority thus becomes one with the proof and definition of God. These questions lie beyond the purpose of the present article (see art. God). Their solution is assumed in this discussion of authority, although different theories of authority no doubt involve different ideas of God. External theories generally involve what is called a deistic conception of God. Spiritualistic theories of authority correspond to theistic views of God. If He is immanent as well as transcendent, He speaks directly to men, and has no need of intermediaries. Pantheism results in a naturalistic theory of truth. The mind of God is the law of Nature. But pantheism in practice tends to become polytheism, and then to issue in a crude anarchy which is the denial of all authority and truth. But within Christendom the problem of authority lies between those who agree in believing in one God, who is personal, transcendent and to some extent immanent. The differences on these points are really consequences of differences of views as to His mode of self-communication. It is, therefore, a problem of epistemology rather than of ontology. The question is, in what way does God make known Himself, His mind and His authority to men generally? The purpose of this article is the exposition of the Biblical teaching of authority, with some attempt to place it in its true position in the life of the church.

II. The Biblical References.—Only for (1) rābhāh (Prov 29 2): "to be great" or "many."

"When the righteous are in authority, the people rejoice." So AV and RVm, but RV "When the righteous are increased" (so BDB). Toy in loc. remarks, "The Heb has: 'When the righteous increase,' the suggestion being that they then have control of affairs; the change of a letter gives the reading 'rule' which is required by the 'govern' of the second line." (2) tōkeph (Est 9 29): "Esther the queen . . . wrote with all authority to confirm this second letter of Purim" (RVm "strength" [so BDB]).

(1) Most frequently for exousia, exousiazō and katexousiazō: (a) of God's authority (Acts 1 7): as the potter's over clay (Rom 9 21, "a right"; Jude ver 25, "power"; Rev 16 9, "power"); (b) of Christ's teaching and works (Mt 7 29; 21 23.24.27=Mk 1 22.27; Mk 11 28.29.33=Lk 4 36; 20 2.8; Jn 5 27, authority to execute judgment. The same Gr word, tr^d "power" in AV but generally "authority" in RV or RVm, appears also in Mt 9 6.8, to forgive sins: 28 18; Mk 2 10; Lk 4 32; 5 24; Jn 10 18; 17 2; Rev 12 10); (c) of the disciples, as Christ's representatives and witnesses (Lk 9 1, the twelve; 2 Cor 10 8, Paul); also of their rights and privileges; (the same Gr word in Mt 10 1; Mk 3 15; 6 7; Lk 10 19=RV "authority"; Jn 1 12; Acts 8 19; 2 Cor 13 10; 2 Thess 3 9; He 13 10; Rev 2 26; 22 14=RV "right"); (d) of subordinate heavenly authorities or powers (1 Cor 15 24; 1 Pet 3 22; and the same Gr word in Eph 1 21; 3 10; 6 12; Col 1 16; 2 10.15; Rev 11 6; 14 18; 18 1); (e) of civil authority, as of king, magistrate or steward (Lk 7 8=Mt 8 9 [centurion]; Mk 13 34; Lk 19 17; 20 20; 22 25 =Mt 20 25=Mk 10 42; and Acts 9 14; 26 10.12 [of Saul]; and the same Gr word in Lk 12 11; 23 7; Jn 19 10.11; Acts 5 4; Rom 13 1.2.3; Tit 3 1; Rev 17 12.13); (f) of the powers of evil (Rev 13 2, "the beast that came out of the sea"; and the same Gr word in Lk 4 6; 12 5; 22 53; Acts 26 18; Eph 2 2; Col 1 13; Rev 6 8; 9 3.10.19; 13 4.5.7.12; 20 6). (g) of man's inward power of self-control (the same Gr word in 1 Cor 7 37; 8 9, "liberty"; 6 12; 7 4; 9 4.5.6.12.18, RV "right"; 11 10).

(2) For epitagē: commandment, authority to exhort and reprove the church (Tit 2 15).

(3) For huperochē: "for kings and all that are in high place" (RV 1 Tim 2 2).

(4) For authentēs: "I permit not a woman . . . to have dominion over a man" (RV 1 Tim 2 12).

(5) For dynastēs: "A eunuch of great authority" (Acts 8 27).

Of the words tr^d "authority," exousia alone expresses the idea of religious authority, whether of God, of Christ or of man. The other

Meaning The control of the state over its subjects, whether as supreme in the person of emperor or king, or as delegated to and exercised by proconsul, magistrate or soldier, and the control of a householder over his family and servants and property, exercised directly or indirectly through stewards, have some characteristics which also pertain to religious authority; and the differences, essential though they are, must be derived from the context and the circumstances of the case. In one passage indeed the civil type of authority is mentioned to be repudiated as something that should not obtain within the religious community (Mt 20 25-27=Mk 10 42-44=Lk 22 25.26). But although its principle and power are so entirely different in different realms, the fact of authority as determining religious thought, conduct and relations permeates the whole Bible, and is expressed by many terms and phrases besides those tr^d "authority."

III. Biblical Teaching.—A summary of the Biblical account of authority is given in He 1 1; "God, having of old time spoken unto the fathers in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in a Son [RVm]." Behind all persons and institutions stands God, who reveals His mind and exercises His sovereignty in many ways, through many persons and institutions, piecemeal and progressively, until His final revelation of His mind and will culminates in Jesus Christ.

(1) The earliest form of authority is patriarchal. The father of the family is at once its prophet,

1. OT priest and king. The consciousness of individuality was as yet weak. The Teaching unit of life was the family, and the father sums up the family in himself before God and stands to it as God. Such is the earliest picture of religious life found in the Bible. For whatever view may be taken of the historicity of Gen, there can be little doubt that the stories of the patriarchs represent an early stage of religious life, before the national or even the tribal consciousness had developed.

(2) When the tribal consciousness emerges, it is clad in a network of customs and traditions which had grown with it, and which governed the greater part of the life of the tribe. The father had now become the elder and judge who exercised authority over the larger family, the tribe. But also, men of commanding personality and influence appear, who change and refashion the tribal customs. They may be men of practical wisdom like Jethro, great warriors like Joshua, or emergency men like the judges. Moses stands apart, a prophet and reformer who knew that he bore a message from God to reform his people's religion, and gave Israel a knowledge of God and a covenant with God which set them forever apart from all other peoples. Other tribes might have a Jethro, a Joshua and a Jephtha, but Israel alone had its Moses. His authority has remained a large factor in the life of Israel to the present day and should hereafter be assumed as existing side by side with other authorities mentioned.

(3) In our earliest glimpses of Heb life in Canaan we find bands of seers or prophets associated with religion in Israel, as well as a disorganized priesthood which conducted the public worship of Jeh. These features were probably common to Israel and neighboring Sem tribes. Here again the individual person emerges who rises above custom and tradition, and exercises an individual authority direct from God over the lives of the people. Samuel, too, was a prophet, priest and king, but he regarded his function as so entirely ministerial, that God might be said to govern His people directly and personally, though He made known His will through the prophet.

(4) In the period of the kingship, religious authority became more organized, institutional and external. The occasional coöperation of the tribes developed into nationality, and the sporadic leadership of emergency chieftains gave way to the permanent rule of the king. Priests and prophets became organized and recognized guilds which acted together under the protection and influence of the king, along the lines of traditional morality and religion. The Heb church in its middle ages was an established church and thoroughly "Erastian." We know very little of the details of its organization, but it is clear that the religious orders as a rule offered little resistance to the corrupting influences of the court and of the surrounding heathenism.

(5) Opposition to corruption and advance to higher levels of religious life invariably originated outside the recognized religious authorities. God raised for Himself prophets such as Elijah, Amos, Isaiah and Jeremiah, who spoke out of the consciousness of an immediate vision or message or command from God. In turn they influenced the established religious authorities, as may be seen in the reformations of Hezekiah and Josiah. All that is distinctive in the religion of Israel, all revelation of God in the OT, proceeded from the inner experiences of the irregular prophets.

(6) In the Judaism of the post-exilic period, the disappearance of the kingship, and the cessation of prophecy produced new conditions which demanded a readaptation of religious authorities. The relative position of the priesthood was greatly enhanced. Its chiefs became princes of Jerus, and exercised all the powers of the theocracy that remained under foreign rule. And new developments emerged. The formation of the canon of the OT set up a body of writings which stood as a permanent and external standard of doctrine and worship. But the necessity was felt to interpret the Scriptures and to apply them to existing conditions. The place of the old prophetic guilds was taken by the new order of rabbis and scribes. Gradually they secured a share with the priests in the administration of the law. "In the last two pre-Christian cents. and throughout the Talmudic times, the scribes (šōph-rim), also called the wise (hākhamīm), who claimed to have received the true interpretation of the Law as 'the tradition of the Elders and Fathers' in direct line from Moses, the prophets, and the men of the great synagogue, . . . included people from all classes. They formed the court of justice in every town as well as the high court of justice, the Sanhedrin in Jerus" (Köhler in Jew Enc, II, 337). In the time of Christ, these courts were the recognized authorities in all matters of religion.

(1) Of Jesus Christ.—When He began to teach in Pal, all knowledge of God, and all exercise of His authority were mediated through the

2. NT priests and scribes, who however Teaching claimed the OT as their source.

Christ was neither the destroyer nor the creator of institutions. He never discussed the abstract right or capacity of the Jewish orders to be religious teachers. He enjoined obedience to their teaching (Mt 23 2.3). Still less did He question the authority of the OT. He came not to destroy, but to fulfil the law and the prophets (Mt 5 17). But He did two things which involved the assertion of a new and superior authority in Himself. He repudiated the scribes' interpretation of the law (Mt 23 13-16), and He declared that certain of the provisions of the Mosaic law itself were temporary and tentative, and to be replaced or supplemented by His own more adequate teaching (Mt 5 32.34.39.44; 19 8.9). In doing this, He was really fulfilling a line of thought which permeates the entire OT. All its writers disclaim finality and look forward to a fuller revelation of the mind of God in a day of Jeh or a new covenant or a Messiah. Jesus Christ regarded these expectations as being realized in Himself, and claimed to complete and fulfil the development which had run through the OT. As such, He claims finality in His teaching of the will of God, and absolute authority in the realm of religion and morals. (a) His teaching is with authority. His hearers contrast it with that of the scribes, who, with all the prestige of tradition and establishment, in comparison with Him, entirely lacked authority (Mt 7 29; Mk 1 22; Lk 4 32; Jn 7 46). (b) His authority as a teacher is closely associated with His works, especially as these revealed His authority over that world of evil spirits whose influence was felt in the mental disorders that afflicted people (Mk 1 27; Lk 4 36). (c) In His claim to forgive sins, sanctioned by works of healing, He seemed to exercise a Divine prerogative (Mt 9 6.8; Mk 2 10; Lk 5 24). It implied an infallible moral judgment, a power to dispense with the recognized laws of retribution and to remove guilt, which could only inhere in God. All these powers are asserted in another form in the statement that He is the final judge (Jn 5 27). (d) He therefore possesses authority over life and salvation. The Father gave Him authority over all flesh, "that whatsoever thou hast given him, to them he should give eternal life" (Jn 17 2 ARVm). This authority begins in His power over His own life to give it in sacrifice for men (Jn 10 18). By faith in Him and obedience to Him, men obtain salvation (Mt 10 32; 11 28-30). Their relation to Him determines their relation to God and to the kingdom of heaven (Mt 10 40; Lk 12 8). (e) When challenged by the chief priests and elders, the established religious authorities, to state by what authority He taught, He gives no categorical reply, but tells them the parable of the Vineyard. All the prophets and teachers that had come from God before Him were servants, but He is the Son (Mt 21 23-27.37; Mk 11 28-33; 12 6; Lk 20 2.8.13). The Fourth Gospel definitely founds His authority upon His sonship (5 19-27). Paul deduces it from His self-sacrifice (Phil 2 5-11). (f) In His ascended state, all authority in heaven and on earth is given unto Him (Mt 28 18). It is not only authority in the church, and in the moral kingdom, but in the universe. God has set Him "far above all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion, and every name that is named, not only in this world, but also in that which is to come" (Eph 1 21; cf Col 2 10; 1 Pet 3 22; 1 Cor 15 24; Rev 12 10). (g) His authority in the church as revealer of truth and Lord of spirits is not limited or completed within His earthly life. By His resurrection and exaltation He lives on in the church. "Where two or three are gathered . . . in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (Mt 18 20). "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Mt 28 20). Greater works than He did in the flesh will be done in the church, because of His exaltation: (Jn 14 12); and by His sending the Paraclete, "Comforter" (ARV) (Jn 14 16). The Paraclete, which is the Holy Spirit, will teach the disciples all things, and bring to their remembrance all that He said unto them (14 26). He has many things to tell them which in the days of His flesh they cannot receive, but the Spirit of truth shall guide them into all truth (16 12.13). And the Paraclete is neither separated nor distinct from Him in His exalted and permanent life (14 18.28). Herein is the authority of Christ made complete and permanent. His teaching, works and character, as facts outside of men, even while He lived, and still more when He was dead, could only partially and imperfectly rule their spirits. "Have I been so long time with you, and dost thou not know me, Philip?" In the day of the Spirit's revelation "ye shall know that I am in my Father" (Jn 14 9.20). Nor, again, did or could He define the truth as it applied to every contingency throughout all time, while He lived under the limitations of time and place. Such a revelation, if it could have been given, would have been quite useless, for men can only apprehend the truth progressively and in relation to the position they occupy in time and place. But by His permanent spiritual presence in the church, He enters into, inhabits and governs its whole life and determines for it what is true and right at every stage of its development. (See Forrest, Authority of Christ, 202-3.) To ask whence Christ derives or how He possesses the authority above described, is to raise the whole question of His metaphysical existence. Empirically, we see it issuing from two facts, which are essentially one—His filial consciousness and His moral perfection. These chiefly are the empirical facts which the church has sought to interpret and express in the metaphysical doctrine of the Incarnation. (See Forrest, op. cit.)

(2) Of the disciples.—The first disciples acknowledged Christ in all things as their Lord and Master; not the teaching they had heard, nor the example they had witnessed, but Christ in His permanent, living presence. They pray to Him to fill Judas' place among the Twelve (Acts 1 24.25). He gave the Spirit at Pentecost (2 33). In His name they perform their miracles (3 6; 9 34). With Him Saul meets on the way to Damascus (9 5; Gal 1 12). From Him they receive the teaching and commands which they deliver to the churches (1 Cor 11 23).

But they too exercised an authority which is derivative, secondary, and dependent upon Him. (a) While Jesus Christ yet lived He gave the Twelve, and again the Seventy, authority to cast out unclean spirits and to heal all manner of diseases, while they went about preaching (Mt 10 1; Mk 3 15; 6 7; Lk 9 1; 10 19). After His resurrection He gave them commission to bear witness for Him, to baptize and to teach all nations (Mt 28 18-20; Lk 24 48.49). Paul also traced his authority to preach directly to Jesus Christ (Gal 1 1. 12). From Him they received their endowment with the Holy Spirit for the work (Acts 1 5; 2 33). (b) Paul claimed for himself, and by inference, for the other apostles, authority to exercise discipline in the churches, "which the Lord gave for building you up" (2 Cor 10 8; 13 10). All the church's ministers exercise oversight and admonition over the churches (1 Thess 5 12; 2 Tim 4 2; 2 2). (c) The authority of sonship, and of participation in the tree of life belongs to all believers (Jn 1 12; Rev 22 14). (d) And in virtue of their faith they have authority over the nations (Rev 2 26; 20 4). Christ makes them to be kings (RV a kingdom) and priests (Rev 1 6), a royal priesthood (1 Pet 2 9).

In all this we are to see the authority of faith, of character, of men who are messengers of Christ because they are in living union with Him. It pertains to no office or institution, and exists only where Christ reigns in men, and therefore, through them.

(3) Of the church.—It is moral and personal and more concerned with life than with doctrine. Paul was the greatest teacher of the early church, but he claims no infallibility, promulgates no dogma, imposes no standard of orthodoxy beyond faith in Christ. He reasons, argues and persuades men to accept the gospel he had received of the Lord, but he knows no other authority than the truth as it is a living fact in Jesus Christ.

In the Pastoral Epistles we certainly read of a "sound doctrine" which should be taught and believed, but it has not crystallized into a creed, and the only condition of salvation laid down is living faith in Jesus Christ. See DOCTRINE.

The authority of the apostolic church, then, is in the first place that of individual men in whom Jesus Christ lives, a direct personal and individual authority. It is true that the individual can only live the Christian life, and therefore know the Christian truth, in a society, but that does not impair the individual and personal character of his witness. Yet as the church lives a collective life, there is a sense in which it may be said to bear a collective witness. Men are naturally more readily impressed by an idea held by the many. That is right in so far as the probability of the truth of a doctrine increases with the number of minds which approve it. That is the element of truth in the Catholic dictum quod ubique, quod semper, quod ab omnibus creditum est ("what is believed everywhere, always, and by all"). But the assent of the many does not constitute the truth of an idea or fact, nor enhance its authority. And there are levels of truth to which only few minds can attain, so that the assent of the many may be a presumption against the truth of an idea. And in the last resort, men do not accept ideas with mind and heart, because many believe them, but because of their inherent truth, their power to govern their minds. And the essential truth of a doctrine is no greater, whether one or a million accept it.

The apostolic church recognized this principle, for it never claimed for itself greater authority than that of a tutor to bring men to Christ, the one Lord. Peter, Paul, John, each knew Christ in a degree, and each spoke of Him as well as he could, but none of them claims to say all, or demands that his own teaching should absolutely rule men's minds; and the collective authority of the church can never rise higher than that of its best spirits.

(4) Of the Bible.—And the authority of the Bible as a whole is of the same nature as that of the church. It is a record of the experiences of men who knew God in various ways and degrees, but among them all there is only one Master. 'No one knows the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal Him.' In varying degrees obedience should be rendered to many men in the church and outside of it, as they satisfy the demands of reason and conscience, but in the last resort every soul by itself must find, choose and obey its own King. For Christians Christ alone is King, as He revealed Himself in His human personality, in the experience and history of the church, and ultimately in the personal experience of every believer. (For a different view see J. H. Leckie, Authority in Religion.)

IV. Outline History of Ecclesiastical Doctrine of Authority.

Different ideas, drawn from many sources, soon replaced NT principles of authority in the life and thought of the church. The Gr apologists as Logos and Fathers were generally dominated by the Platonic doctrine of the Logos, and thought of God as dwelling in man and communicating His mind to him by giving him a share of His own mind and reason. While they accepted the Scriptures and the traditions of the church as Divine teaching, they did not regard them as external and sovereign authorities, but rather as copies of the Divine reason which dwelt in every man, but in complete and perfect manner only in Jesus Christ.

Neo-Platonism followed, and it underlies much of the church teaching from Origen to Augustine. God as pure being could not make known His essence to men, and His Logos in all the forms of its manifestation tended to become a spoken word which God had sent forth from Himself, rather than the living indwelling of God with men. When the Logos ceased to be living, it tended to become external and stereotyped, and upon this basis grew up Gr orthodoxy. Men who knew but little of the living personal Word felt the need of defining and establishing the central truths of Christianity in fixed and permanent forms which should become the standard of all thinking. The inward witness of the Logos disappears, and the external authority of tradition and dogma as defined by the councils took its place. The bishops preserved the tradition and constituted the councils and thus became the organs of authority. The Scriptures were still venerated in words, but in fact subordinated to the episcopacy.

Aristotle's philosophy dominated the Middle Ages, or rather the pale ghost of Aristotle's system, the formal logic only. The forms of thought were mistaken for its essence. Truth consisted in logical consistency and systematic coherence. The dogmas of earlier ages were assumed as premises from

1. Appeal to Reason as Logos

2. Developed into Orthodox Dogma

3. Scholastic System which to deduce, by syllogistic inference, the whole structure of the church and its organs and sacraments, as the infallible representatives of God on earth.

Nominalism emptied the forms of thought of all reality and reared the ecclesiastical system upon negation. All the more necessary

4. Ecclesiastical Absolutism was it to affirm the absolute and unquestioned authority of the church, since it rested upon no reason or reality to which appeal could be made to justify its position and teaching. Thus the growth of absolutism in the church went pari passu with the disappearance of idealism, of any contact of the mind with reality, truth and God. Another way of saying this truth is that the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and of the living Christ suffered a total eclipse during the Middle Ages, while the authority of the church as the organ of revelation became absolute.

The Reformation was not consciously based upon any philosophic principles. It was the product of practical necessities. Men's spiritual needs drove them back to God, and they found Him in two sources, in the Bible, which was the record of His self-revelation through prophet, psalmist, apostle and preëminently through Jesus Christ, and in the accordant testimony of the Holy Spirit in their own hearts. But the underlying principles of this teaching were not articulated in a philosophy of knowledge and revelation for two centuries.

Therefore the second and third generations of Reformers, no longer possessed by the visions and convictions of Luther and Calvin, were thrown back upon the old scholastic philosophy which recognized no kinship of mind between God and man, and knew no direct communication between them. Hence it was necessary to find a new external authority, and this they discovered in the Bible which they made into a law of truth, as defined anew by ecclesiastical councils.

But the mystical side of the Reformers' teaching was not altogether lost, and a few obscure bodies of Christians continued to hold the doctrine of the inner light. Yet as the scholastic Protestants took only half—the objective half of the Reformers' teaching—the mystics only took the subjective half, and every man's imagination tended to become a law unto himself.

Kant did for philosophy what Luther had done for religion. He rejected its dogmas and external authorities in order to come back to its realities. He was the first philosopher of the Protestant principle. He sought to discover a direct relation between man's mind and reality. He did not fully succeed. The old dogma of the noumenon as something that lay completely beyond man's ken clung to him, and vitiated his system. But through man's moral nature, he found a way to the heart of reality and to God. His idealistic principles were developed by his successors into the modern idealism, upon which it has been possible to erect a theory of knowledge that brings man's mind into direct contact with God, and therefore, a theory of authority which represents God as directly the sovereign of the soul.

But the other side of Kant's philosophy, too, was developed into a theory of religious skepticism and external authority. Man's reason, he had taught, could not come into contact with reality, with the thing-in-itself, and therefore it could know nothing of God. This distrust of reason was made the basis of two different systems of external authority by Dean Mansel and Cardinal Newman. The skeptical element really descended from Locke and Hume, but men who would have disdained to learn their theology from Hume accepted Hume's principles from Kant, and built upon them, as a house upon sand, one, the authority of Anglicanism, and the other, the authority of Romanism.

Kant's skepticism also allied itself with elements of Luther's teaching and traveled a middle course in the school of Ritschl. While holding that man may have knowledge and experience of Divine things in Jesus Christ, who is of the practical value of God for religious experience, the Ritschlians scruple to affirm that it is a direct and actual knowledge of God as He is essentially. This they will neither deny nor affirm, but the refusal to affirm has for many minds the effect of denial, and it leads to a subjectivism which is not far removed from skepticism and the denial of all authority.

V. Classification of Theories.—The various theories of authority may be now classed as follows:

(1) Incipient Catholicism in the 2d and 3d centuries.—All ideas of a living and present revelation were suppressed as in the case of Mon-

1. External Theories tanism. Three more or less coordinate authorities were set up which determined for individual Christians what was Christian truth and conduct. The canon of the NT was gradually formed to define what writings, in addition to the OT taken over from the Jewish church, were inspired by the Holy Spirit and of Divine authority. The outline of a common creed or rule of faith grew up as the standard interpretation of Scripture. Above all was the episcopacy, which was supposed to preserve in unbroken tradition the unwritten teaching of the apostles. As the only living factor in this system of authority the last easily secured the predominant place. (See Harnack, History of Dogma, II, ch ii, ET.)

(2) General councils.—The authority of the episcopacy was organized into a permanent and general form in the councils, to whose decision obedience was demanded on pain of excommunication. The councils professed and believed that they were only defining the teaching that had always obtained in the church, and therefore invested themselves and their decisions with the authority of Christ.

(3) Romanism.—During the Middle Ages, the church of Rome concentrated in itself, that is, in its episcopacy, all the authority of tradition, bishops, councils and whatever else had held sway over the mind of the church. Scripture was ignored and the Bishop of Rome exercised the plenary authority of God over men's minds and lives. "Boniface VIII accepted in the Bull Unam sanctam (ecclesiam) of November 18, 1302, the Thomist doctrine of the papacy: 'We declare, say, define and pronounce that it is essential to salvation that every human creature should subject himself to the Roman Pontiff'" (Loofs, Dogmengeschichte, 307).

(4) Papal infallibility.—This theory culminated in 1870 in the formal declaration of the infallibility of the pope. "The Roman Pontiff, when he speaks ex cathedra . . . has that infallibility, with which the Divine Redeemer endowed His church, in defining a doctrine of faith or morals" (Vatican Council, 1870, Session 4, cap. 4). This authority of the pope extends over all questions of knowledge and conduct, of discipline and government in the whole church. The theory is based upon the doctrine of tradition, as laid down in the Council of Chalcedon. "The doctrine of Catholic teaching is, that the body of publicly revealed doctrine has received no ob-

9. Distrust of Reason But the other side of Kant's philosophy, too, was developed into a theory of religious skepticism and external authority. Man's reason, he had taught, could not come into contact with reality, with the thing-in-itself, and therefore it could know nothing of God. This distrust of reason was made jective increase since the days of the apostles," and "it is no change of doctrine when that which has always been held implicitly becomes the subject of an explicit declaration" (Hunter, Outlines of Dogmatic Theology, I, 159, 164). Newman and recent modernists, however, concede a development in the doctrines of the church, but on the basis of the traditional teaching derived from the apostles. But once a development is conceded, questions arise as to its principles and conditions, and the whole authority that rests upon them falls to the ground by the mere fact of an appeal from it to the principles that govern its development. The attempt to evade criticism by positing the miraculous preservation of the tradition from error involves a further appeal from the supposed authority to a hypothetical miracle for which there is no title of evidence. All the evidence is against it. The history of the church shows that it has been as liable to error, and as readily influenced by natural conditions, as any other human institution.

(5) Inerrancy of Scripture.—When Protestants sought an external authority, they posited the inerrancy and infallibility of the Bible, and the whole Christian faith was founded upon that dogma. "Holy Scripture is the judge, or rather the voice of the supreme and infallible judge, the Holy Spirit, and the norm to which an inferior judge should refer in deciding controversies of faith, and according to which alone he should give sentence" (Quenstedt, quoted in Hutterus Redivivus, 119, 10th ed). Protestants found it necessary to interpret Scripture, and to define doctrines in synods and councils, but their decisions had authority only because they were supposed to be expositions of Scripture, and in that sense, the expression of God's mind. They differed from the "Catholic" councils in that they claimed no authority of their own and repudiated any authority that might be derived from tradition or the ministerial office.

(6) Anglican appeal to antiquity.—In the Anglican church too, the Scriptures as infallible were the ultimate authority, but some kind of a coördinate authority was claimed for the priesthood as standing in the succession of the apostles, and for the church Fathers and councils of the first six cents. And the tendency has been to lay increasing emphasis on the latter factors, as criticism has undermined the literal and external authority of Scripture.

(7) Limitations of external authority.—All the above-mentioned theories contain an element of truth, and the authorities they posit have in their turns ruled the minds and lives of men; but none of them can be regarded as adequate and final expressions of the mind of God to man. (a) It is superfluous to demonstrate that they are not infallible; in spite of that they might still be all the authority that man can have or need. (b) They all rest on the assumption that God's self-revelation came to an end with the apostolic age. The Biblical theory admittedly does, and the tradition theories strictly interpreted are in exactly the same case. An authority resting upon a traditional teaching handed down faithfully from the apostles would differ in no essential respect from one resting upon the written words of the apostles. They would be equally limited, literal, external and mechanical. But problems of mind and conduct have arisen, which the apostles never contemplated, and which their teaching (whether preserved in written or oral tradition matters nothing) could not solve. (c) As a matter of fact no traditional teaching of the apostles supplementing their writings has ever been discovered or can be discovered. What has been put forward as such is in manifest contradiction to their writings. (d) The idea that there is a consensus of opinion among church Fathers is equally illusory. If there were, it would need to be proved that such opinion could have any binding authority in religion. (e) The Bible is not one body of truth all standing at the same level, and whatever view of its inspiration may be held, some further authority will be needed to discriminate between the lower and the higher in its teaching. (f) Above all, an authority which is merely external and objective is no authority at all to the mature religious life. Blind submission to any external authority, creed, church or book, is the condition of a slave, and in such case "our spiritual intelligence is not quickened and developed by communion with the infinite wisdom, but arrested and quelled. Only then, on the other hand, are we spiritually enfranchised when we receive a revelation as from God, not because we are awed or terrified or allured by our selfish interests into reception of it, but because our own minds and hearts respond to it, because we see and know it to be true" (J. Caird, University Sermons [1898], 204-5).

Theories of internal authority are in the nature of the case not so easily classified or defined as those of external; nor have they as yet filled so large a place in the public life of the church. But it would be a serious error to suppose that all the men who gave their adherence to systems of external authority lived in mere subjection to them. The history of mysticism in the church is the history of independent thought resting in a direct knowledge of God that transcended all external authority. Montanism and Gnosticism each in its own way appealed to an inner criterion of truth. All heresies involved some independent judgment, and appealed to authorities that were neither objective nor established. The Protestant Reformation was an open revolt against external authority, and although it resulted for a time in the substitution of another external authority, neither its original motive, nor its permanent force had any kinship with it. Luther's free criticism of the Bible, and Calvin's appeal to the testimony of the Holy Spirit as the final principle of its interpretation, are well known. No body of Protestants at present founds its faith on the mere letter of Scripture or creed. Inward authority has been conceived in many ways and expressed by many terms, such as the Logos (Gr apologists); the Paraclete (Montanus); ecstasy (Mystics); knowledge as opposed to faith or creed (Gnostics); the personal experience of faith (Luther); the testimony of the Holy Spirit (Calvin); the inner light (Quakers); individual experience (Pietists); practical reason (Kant); religious feeling (Schleiermacher); the historical Christ (Ritschl); conscience (Martineau); the living Christ (R. W. Dale); the consciousness of Christ (A. M. Fairbairn); the Christ of history and of experience (D. W. Forrest) and many more. The variety suggests at first the denial rather than the affirmation of authority, but it is only in such a variety that the principles of an adequate authority can be recognized.

The ultimate authority in religion is God as He reigns in men's hearts. But both the experience itself and the expression and interpretation of it vary with each individual. A religious authority to be real and effective must win the response of the human spirit, and in that personal relation of Spirit with spirit lie the conditions of variation. Yet human reason and conscience everywhere tend to acknowledge one standard, to recognize one ideal and to obey one Lord. Nothing can force such a uniformity but the inward fitness of one supreme revelation to the common demands of humanity. No agreement yet exists as to the possibility or reality of such a revelation. But wherever men lend themselves to the spiritual contact of Jesus Christ with their souls, without the intervention of human creeds or institutions, their conscience and reason approve His moral supremacy and their spirits recognize His intimate knowledge of the Father.

AUTHORIZED, á'-thor-iz'd, VERSION. See ENGLISH VERSIONS.

AVA, ā'va. See AVVA.

AVAIL, a-vāl' (אָוַל, shāwāl, "to be equal," hence "to be enough," "to avail"): Used in the sense of "satisfy" (Est 5 13). Queen Esther's exceptional favor availed not to satisfy Haman, because of his insane jealousy of his rival Mordecai. יִשְׁכּוּחַ, ischūō, "to be strong," tr^d also "prevail" (Rev 12 8); with a negative signifies incompetence, e.g. the impossibility of redemptive merit or power in an outward ceremony or act (Gal 5 6; 6 15 AV): "neither circumcision availeth anything," contrasted with the efficacy of faith "in Christ Jesus." Used also to express the efficacy of prayer (Jas 5 16).

AVARAN, av'a-ran: A surname of Eleazar, the third son of Mattathias (1 Macc 2 5). It is doubtfully conjectured that Eleazar received this surname from the episode related in 1 Macc 6 43-46; the word may mean "the piercer," referring to his stabbing of the elephant. Some connect it with הָוֵר, hūr, "to be white," and connect it with Eleazar's white complexion. The Syr reads "Chavran" and the Vulg "Abaron"; the LXX in 6 43 gives Sauarān which is an error for Eleázaros aīran; LXX V corrects to aīran.

AVEN, ā'ven (אָבֵן, 'āwen, "emptiness," "vanity"): Used in Ezk 30 17 for On or Heliopolis, in Egypt. See ON. As a term of contempt Hosea calls Beth-el "Beth-aven" (4 15; 10 5). So Amos speaks of some valley near Damascus as "the valley of Aven" (i.e. of the idol, 1 5), in which Baalbek (Heliopolis) was situated. The word is rendered "idol" in Isa 66 3.

Avenge.—The general idea connected with this word is that of inflicting punishment upon the wrongdoer. Since emphasis may be placed upon the deed itself, the wrongdoer, or the injured party, the vb. is found an intransitive (only Lev 19 18; see below), transitive (2 S 4 8 et al.); and also active (Dt 32 43), passive (Jer 5 9) and reflexive (Est 8 13). In 1 S 25 26 ff avenge is tr^d from אָשַׁח, yāsha, "to save" (RVm "thine own hand saving thee"), in Hos 1 4 from פָּקַד, pākad, "to visit," and in 2 S 18 19 ff from שָׁפַח, shāpha, "to judge," but the usual Heb word is נָקַם, nākam, or derivatives, "to avenge." The tr in RV differs in some places from AV: Nu 31 3 (RV "execute Jeh's vengeance"; cf 2 S 22 48; Ps 18 47; Lev 26 25); Lev 19 18 (RV "take vengeance"); Jgs 5 2 (RV "for that the leaders took the lead in Israel" from פָּרַע, pāra, "to be free, to lead"). In the NT avenge is tr^d from the Gr ἐκδικέω, ekdikéō, "to do justice," "to protect" (Lk 18 3 ff et al.) and AV Rev 18 20, κρίνω, krinō, "to judge" (RV "God hath judged your judgment").

Avenger.—I.e. the person who inflicts punishment upon the evil-doer for a wrong experienced by himself (from נָקַם, nākam, "to avenge"; Ps 8 2 et al.) or by someone else from גָּאֹל, gā'al, "to redeem"; Nu 35 12 ff et al.). In the NT avenger occurs only once; "the Lord is an avenger in all things" (1 Thess 4 6). It was the duty of the nearest relative to execute vengeance upon the murderer of his kin: he became the gō'el. With reference to the protective legislation and custom, see GOEL. Cf BLOOD; REVENGE, REVENGER.

A. L. BRESLICH

AVERSE, a-vûrs' (אַחֲשֵׁי, shūbh, "to turn back," "retreat"): Quiet, peaceful wanderers (Mic 2 8).

AVIM, av'im. See AVVIM.

AVIMS, av'imz (Dt 2 23). See AVVIM.

AVITES, ā'vits. See AVVIM.

AVITH, ā'vith (אֲוִיִּת, 'āvith): The royal city of Hadad king of Edom (Gen 36 35; 1 Ch 1 46). The LXX reads Γεθθαίμ, Getthaim. There is no clue to its identification.

AVOID, a-void': Archaic use in 1 S 18 11 for "escaped." In RV of NT only in 2 Cor 8 20 (σπελλόμενοι, stellómenoi with negative), lit. "arranging that not," etc, i.e. by anticipation providing that something should not occur. In AV for "turn away from," ἐκκλίnete, ekklínete: Rom 16 17; 1 Tim 6 20; "refuse," παραιτοῦ, paraitoú, 2 Tim 2 23; περιύστασθαι, perístasasthai, Tit 3 9.

AVOUCH, a-vouch': In EV only in Dt 26 17. 18, in the sense of "to confess," "avow," "publicly and solemnly declare." The Heb form is likewise unique (Hiph. of 'amar).

AVVA, av'a (אָוַוָּ, 'āvavā; AV Ava, ā'va): A province, the people of which Shalmaneser king of Assyria placed in the cities of Samaria in the room of the children of Israel taken into exile by him (2 K 17 24). It is probably the same as Ivva (2 K 18 34; 19 13; Isa 37 13), a province conquered by Assyria.

AVVIM, av'im, AVITES, ā'vits (אֲוִיִּם, 'āvvim; Ἐβαιοί, Hebraioi, also unaspirated; also used to represent the name of the Hivites): The early inhabitants of the southern extremity of Canaan afterward occupied by the Philis (Dt 2 23; cf Josh 13 3.4, AV "Avim," ā'vim). The Avvim of Josh 18 23 was a town of Benjamin, not a people. Gesenius supposes the name to mean "dwellers in the desert," but it was more probably the name of some pre-Sem tribe. The Avvim are described as living in Hāçerim or "encampments" and extending as far as the outskirts of Gaza.

AWAIT, a-wāt': Only in Acts 9 24 AV, in its now obsolete sense as a noun, "ambush": "their laying await was known of Saul." RV "their plot."

AWAKE, a-wāk' (אָקַץ, yākaç, "to waken"; עָרַר, 'ār, "to rouse up" from sleep; ἐγείρω, egeirō, "to arouse from sleep"): The ordinary terms for awaking from natural slumber: as of Jacob at Bethel (Gen 28 16); of Solomon at Gibeon (1 K 3 15); of Jesus in the storm-tossed boat (Lk 8 24). Used fig. with striking effect of awaking from mental, moral and spiritual sleep: as when Deborah calls upon herself to awake to the fervor and eloquence of poetry (Jgs 5 12); of Zion's awaking to moral vigor and beauty (Isa 52 1); of waking from spiritual death (Eph 5 14); from the grave in resurrection (Dnl 12 2). Poetically used of the rising north wind (Cant 4 16); of music (Ps 108 2); of the sword in battle (Zec 13 7); of a lover's affection (Cant 2 7); of God Himself responding to prayer (Ps 69 4). Also used of moral awaking, as from drunkenness: ἐκνήφω, eknēphō, "to become sober" (cf Joel 1 5).

DWIGHT M. PRATT

AWAY WITH: (1) "To endure," "to bear with" (Isa 1 13), "I cannot away with iniquity and the solemn meeting," i.e. endure the combination of wickedness and worship. In the Heb merely, "I am unable iniquity and the solemn meeting." (2) To destroy (αιρω, airō). Found in such expressions as Acts 22 22, "Away with such a fellow from the earth."

AWE, ô: Fear mingled with reverence and wonder, a state of mind inspired by something terrible or sublime. In AV and RV it occurs in Ps 4 4: "Stand in awe, and sin not" (where R^Vm has, "Be ye angry," so LXX; cf Eph 4 26); Ps 33 8; 119 161. In the following passages RV substitutes "stand in awe of" for AV "fear": Ps 22 23 (Gr phoboumenoi); Isa 29 23; 1 S 18 15; Mal 2 5; and in He 12 28 it substitutes "awe" for AV "reverence" (Gr deos, here only in NT). In all these passages, except 1 S 18 15 (Gr eulabeito, where it describes Saul's feeling toward David), the word stands for man's attitude of reverential fear toward God. This is the characteristic attitude of the pious soul toward God in the Scriptures, esp. in the OT. It arises from a consciousness of the infinite power, sublimity and holiness of God, which fills the mind with the "fear of the Lord," and a dread of violating His law. See FEAR.

D. MIALl EDWARDS

AWL, ôl (מרצע, marcēa): "Bore his ear through with an awl" (Ex 21 6; Dt 15 17). The ear was pierced as being the organ of hearing, thus signifying the servant's promise of obedience. See BORE.

Awls.

AX (AXE), AX-HEAD, aks'hed: Nine different Heb words have been rendered "ax":

(1) גרזן, garzen. This unquestionably was one of the larger chopping instruments, as the uses to which it was put would imply (Dt 19 5; 20 19; 1 K 6 7; Isa 10 15). The modern ax used by the woodchoppers in Syria has a shape much like the ancient stone and bronze axes, with the exception that it is fastened to the handle by passing the latter through a hole in the ax-head, whereas the Egypt sculptures show that their ax-heads were held to the handles by means of thongs. The so-called battle-ax found at Tell el-Hesi was probably fastened in this way. Syrian peasants are frequently seen carrying in their belts small hatchets the heads of which are shaped like a battle-ax and which are bound to the handles by thongs.

(2) מַעְצָר, ma'ăṣār, is used in Isa 44 12 (AV renders "tongs") and in Jer 10 3.

Assyrian Ax.

(3) קַרְדֹּם, kardōm, is used in Jgs 9 48; 1 S 13 20,21; Ps 74 5; Jer 46 22. The present Arab. word, kudām, which is the name for the native adze, is from the same origin. Ancient forms of the adze are shown in Figs. 4 and 7. The adze is the only chopping instrument of the Syrian carpenter. He uses it for many purposes, where a foreigner would use a saw or chisel or plane, and with a skill which the foreigner envies. Many students of Syrian life believe that the adze is a tool which has survived from the early Heb times.

Egyptian Ax.

(4) בַּרְזֶל, barzel (Dt 19 5; 2 K 6 5): The interest associated with this word is that it literally means "iron," although the context indicates that it means "ax." If the word iron was not used here to mean "metal," then iron axes were used by the children of Israel. If iron axes existed, however, they have long since disappeared as the result of corrosion, since the only ones discovered have been of stone, copper or bronze. See BRONZE.

(5) מַגְזֵרָה, maghzērāh (2 S 12 31) is lit. "a cutting instrument," and might be rendered, "a blade" or sickle.

Axes.

(6) מַגְזֵרָה, m'ghērāh (1 Ch 20 2), tr^d in this one passage as axes, but better tr^d "saws."

(7) הֶרֶבֶה, herebh (Ezk 26 9), rendered ax in this passage only. It is usually tr^d sword. It could also mean pickax.

(8) כַּשְׁשִׁיל, kashshil (Ps 74 6 AV), lit. "a feller," hence an ax.

(9) מַעֲבֵץ, mappēz (Jer 51 20), lit. "a smiter," hence a war club or battle-ax. The Gr word used in the NT is ἀξίνη, axinē (Mt 3 10; Lk 3 9).

AYIN, ā'yēn (עַיִן, 'ayin, "eye" or "fountain"): The 16th letter of the Heb alphabet, so named, probably, because the original form resembled the eye. 'Ayin (ע) is usually neglected in pronunciation, and the inverted comma (') is the sign most commonly employed to represent it in transliteration. The same sound is found in the Arab. and other Sem languages. The Arabs have two pronunciations, one a very strong guttural formed at the back of the palate, something like a rattled r or rg, the other similar in quality, only less harsh and guttural. The LXX reproduced 'ayin in some cases by gamma, g. The numerical value of this letter is 70. 'Ayin begins each verse of the 16th section of Ps 119 in the Heb. W. W. DAVIES

AZAEI, az'a-el (Ἀζαῖος, Azáios; cf Asahel [Ezr 10 15]): Father of Jonathan, one of two chief investigators of foreign marriages (1 Esd 9 14).

AZAEIUS, az-a-ē'lus (B, Ἀζαῖος, Azáios; A, Ἀζαῖ, Azái; omitted in Ezr 10): A., son of Ezra, put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 34).

AZAL, ā'zal. See AZEL.

AZALIAH, az-a-lī'a (אֶזְרִיָּהוּ, 'āzaryāhū, "Jeh has set aside"): A son of Meshullam and father of Shaphan the scribe, famous in connection with the discovery of the law in the reign of King Josiah (2 K 22 3).

AZANIAH, az-a-nī'a (אֶזְרִיָּהוּ, 'āzanyāh, "Jeh has given ear"): A son of Jeshua, a Levite who signed the covenant (Neh 10 9).

II. WHAT IS DONE IN CONNECTION WITH AZAZEL

1. The Significance of This Action

2. The Jewish Liturgy

I. The Meaning of the Word.—This word is found in connection with the ceremony of the Day of Atonement (q.v.). According to

1. The Lev 16 8, Aaron is to cast lots upon Passages the two goats which on the part of the
to Be Con- congregation are to serve as a sin sidered offering (ver 5), "one lot for Jeh, and the other lot for Azazel." In ver 10, after the first goat has been set apart as a sin offering for Jeh, we read: "But the goat, on which the lot fell for Azazel, shall be set alive before Jeh, to make atonement for him, to send him away for Azazel into the wilderness." In ver 26 we read: "And he that letteth go the goat for Azazel shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water." Before this, in vs 21 f mention had been made of what should be done with the goat. After the purification of the (inner) sanctuary, of the tent of meeting, and of the altar, the living goat is to be brought, "and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all . . . their sins; and he shall put them upon the head of the goat, and shall send him away by the hand of a man that is in readiness into the wilderness: and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a solitary land: and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness." But in this last mentioned and most important passage the term under consideration is not found.

(1) The etymology.—Some have derived the word from 'az+'azal (fortis abiens, "passing away in his strength" or from an intentional alteration of 'el+'azaz, robur Dei, "strength of God"; cf below the angel of the Book of Enoch); while others have regarded the word as a broken plur. of a subst. in the Arab. 'azalā, and tr it as "lonesomeness," "desert." Now there is an inclination to regard it as a reduplication from 'āzalzēl, derived from the root 'āzal. If we accept this view, although it is without certainty and an exact analogue cannot be found, we could conclude from the way in which this noun has been formed that we have before us not an abstract term (remotio, "removal," or abitus, "departure"), but a concrete noun, or an adj., longe remotus ("far removed") or porro abiens ("going far away").

(2) The explanation.—In vs 10.22.26, we would have an acceptable sense, if we regarded this word as expressive of a distinct locality in the wilderness (cf JEWISH TRADITION, II, 2). But this interpretation is impossible, since the law in Lev 16 was given during the wanderings in the wilderness and accordingly presupposed a constant change in the encampment, even if this should be regarded only as the historical background. By the use of the same preposition l' in connection with Jeh and Azazel, it seems natural to regard the expressions as entirely || and to think of some personal being. Some interpret this word as referring to a demon of the wilderness (cf Ps 106 37; Dt 32 17; Lev 17 7; 2 Ch 11 15; Isa 13 21; 34 14; Mt 12 43 ff; Lk 11 24 ff; Rev 18 2) and explain the term as "one who has separated himself from God," or "he who has separated himself," or "he who misleads others." But a demon of this kind could not possibly be placed in contrast to Jeh in this way; and as in the Book of En 6 6; 8 1 ff; 9 6; 10 4 ff; 13 1 ff; 69 2 one of the most prominent of the fallen angels who taught mankind the arts of war and luxury, revealed secrets to them, and is now bound in the wilderness, and is there preserved for the final judgment, because he was mainly responsible for the presence of evil in the world, is called Azael (also Azazel, or Azazel), it is highly probable that this name was taken from Lev 16. In later times the word Azazel was by many Jews and also by Christian theologians, such as Origen, regarded as that Satan himself who had fallen away from God. In this interpretation the contrast found in ver 8, in case it is to be regarded as a full parallelism, would be perfectly correct. But it must be acknowledged that in Holy Scripture, Satan is nowhere called by the name of Azazel, and just as little is the wilderness regarded as his permanent place of abode. Against these last two interpretations we must also recall that in the most significant passage, viz. vs 20 ff, the term Azazel is not found at all. The same is true in the case of the ceremony in connection with the purification of leprous people and houses (Lev 14 7 ff. 49 ff), which throughout suggests Lev 16. In this place we have also the sevenfold sprinkling (cf 14 16 with Lev 16 14 f); and in addition two animals, in this case birds, are used, of which the one is to be slain for the purpose of sprinkling the blood, but the other, after it has been dipped into the blood of the one that has been slain, is to be allowed to fly away. In this way the essential thought in Lev 16 as also in Lev 14 seems to be the removal of the animal in either case, and it is accordingly advisable to interpret Azazel adjectively, i.e. to forego finding a complete parallelism in ver 8, and to regard the preposition in connection with Jeh as used differently from its use with Azazel, and to translate as follows: "And Aaron shall cast lots over both goats, the one lot [i.e. for the one goat] for Jeh, and one lot for the goat that is destined to go far away." On the preposition l' used with the second Azazel in ver 10 of Ex 21 2. With this interpretation a certain hardness yet remains for our linguistic sense, because we cannot find a good tr for the adj. But in favor of this interpretation and against the personal interpretation we can appeal also to the feeling of the LXX translators who translate apopompaios, diestalménos, and also to that of Aquilos, who translates trágos apoluómenos, apoleluménos, kekrateiōménos, and of Symmachus who translates aperchómenos, aphieménos. (The general idea expressed by all these words is "removal," "sending away," "releasing" or "dismissal.") It is true that the LXX in one place translates eis tēn apópompēn, which however could be also an abstract circumlocution for a conception that, though used elsewhere, is yet awkward. In the Vulg we have caper emissarius and Luther says "der ledige Bock," which are probably based on a wrong etymology, since 'ez signifies only a goat or perhaps this word "Bock" is here only supplied from the connection, and that quite correctly, so that Luther and the Vulg can also be cited in favor of our interpretation.

II. What Is Done in Connection with Azazel.

Both goats, according to ver 5, are to be regarded as a single sin-sacrifice, even should

1. The we interpret Azazel as demon or Significance Satan, and we are accordingly not at of This all to understand that a sacrifice was Action brought to these beings. This too is made impossible by the whole tenor of the OT in general, as of Lev 16 in particular, so that in ver 8 the two members introduced by the preposition l' would not at all be beings of exactly the same importance. Both goats, so to say, represent two sides of the same thing. The second is necessary to make clear what the first one, which has been slain, can no longer represent, namely, the removal of the sin, and accordingly has quite often aptly been called the hircus redivivus. But what is to be represented finds its expression in the ceremony described in vs 20 f. Whatever may be the significance of the laying on of hands in other connections, whether the emphasis is placed more on the disposal or on the appropriation of the property, at this place it certainly is only a symbol of the transfer of guilt, which is confessed over the goat and is then carried into the wilderness by the goat upon which it has been laid. In order to make this transfer all the more impressive, both the hands are here brought into action, while e.g. in Lev 14 only one hand is used. The fact that the goat is accompanied by somebody and that it is to be taken to an uninhabited place is to indicate the absolute impossibility of its return, i.e. the guilt has been absolutely forgiven and erased, a deep thought made objectively evident in a transparent manner and independently of the explanation of Azazel, which is even yet not altogether certain. In the personal interpretation, we could have, in addition to the idea of the removal of the guilt, also a second idea, namely, that Azazel can do no harm to Israel, but must be content with his claim to a goat which takes Israel's place.

The actions in connection with Azazel, as was also the case with the Day of Atonement, were interpreted more fully by the Talm and the traditions based on it (cf ATONEMENT, DAY OF, III, 2). The lots could be made of different materials; in later times they were made of gold.

The manner of casting the lots was described in full. The goat that was to be sent into the wilderness was designated by a black mark on the head, the other by one on the neck. On the way from Jerus to the wilderness, huts were erected. From a distance it was possible to see how the goat was hurled backward from a certain cliff, called Bêth-Hadûd (Bêth-hudêdân, 12 miles E. of Jerus). By means of signals made with garments, news was at once sent to Jerus when the wilderness had been reached.

AZAZIAH, az-a-zî'a (אַזַּזִּיָּהוּ, 'ázazyāhū, "Yahwe is strong," or "strengthens"):

(1) A Levite musician who participated in the services held on the return of the ark to Jerus (1 Ch 15 21). His name is omitted from the list in ver 18.

(2) Father of Hoshea, who was the leader of Ephraim at the time that David enumerated the people (1 Ch 27 20).

(3) A Levite who had charge of the offerings brought to the temple in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 13).

AZBASARETH, az-bas'a-reth: The name of an Assyrian king. AV form "Azbasareth" comes from the Vulg. See ASBASARETH.

AZBUK, az'buk (אַזְבֻּק, 'āzbūk): The father of a certain Nehemiah—not the great governor of the same name, though a contemporary (Neh 3 16).

AZEKAH, a-zē'ka (אַזְקָה, 'āzēkāh): A town of some importance in the Shephelah of Judah mentioned (Josh 15 35) next to Socoh. In Josh 10 10 the defeated kings of the Amorites are described as flying before Joshua "by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon . . . to Azekah, and unto Makkedah" and (ver 11) as the host fled "Jeh cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Azekah, and they died." In 1 S 17 1 it is recorded that before David's combat with Goliath, the Philis "gathered together at Socoh, which belongeth to Judah, and encamped between Socoh and Azekah, in Ephes-dammim." In 2 Ch 11 9 it is mentioned as one of the frontier cities which Rehoboam fortified and in Jer 34 7 it is one of the two fortified cities remaining to Judah in the Shephelah which Nebuchadnezzar was besieging. "Azekah and the towns [m, "daughters"] thereof" is mentioned among the cities reoccupied by Jews returning after the Exile (Neh 11 30). In all the three last references the place is mentioned along with Lachish.

All the data suit Tell Zakarēyah on the N. side of the Vale of Elah (Wādī es-Sunt) and some 3 miles N.W. of Socoh (Kh. Shuweikeh). This site, which was partially excavated by the Palestine Exploration Fund, is one of great natural strength. "The hill stands almost isolated, rising abruptly for almost 350 ft. above the Vale of Elah; . . . to the W. the fall is also very great, while to the S. the tell is joined by a neck of land (about 100 ft. below the summit) to a hill behind." The summit is about 350 yds. by 150 yds., and is much larger than Tell el-Hesi (Lachish) (Bliss). Excavations showed that it was a very ancient site which had been powerfully fortified, and the rock under the city was excavated in a series of very extraordinary underground chambers which could be used as places of refuge. The site suits the narrative of Joshua's battle very well, as there is a long-used high route running N. to S. from the neighborhood of Ajalon. Its position as a frontier fortress is comparable with that of Lachish: the name Zakarēyah, seems to be a survival of Azekah.

AZEL, ā'zel (אֶזֶל, 'āzēl, "noble"):

(1) A descendant of King Saul, through Jonathan (1 Ch 8 37 f; 9 43 f).

(2) Azel, ā'zel, AV Azal (אֶזֶל, 'āzēl; 'Ασαήλ, Asaēl; Zec 14 5): A place not far from Jerus. There may be an echo of the name in that of Wādī Yasūl, to the right of 'Ain el-Lōz, in Wādī en-Nār.

AZEM, ā'zem: AV form for Ezem (thus RV) (Josh 15 29; 19 3).

AZEPHURITH, az-ē-fū'rith. See ARSIPHURITH.

AZETAS, a-zē'tas (Αἰητάς, Azēlās): The head of a family accompanying Zerubbabel out of captivity (1 Esd 5 15). Neither Ezra nor Nehemiah gives this name in his list.

AZGAD, az'gad (אֶזְגָּד, 'azgādh, "strong is Gad"): In the list of those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel are mentioned "the children of Azgad" (1,222, Ezr 2 12; 2,322, Neh 7 17). 110 males with their chief returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 12). Azgad was among the leaders who signed the Covenant after Nehemiah (Neh 10 15).

AZIEL, a-zī'ē-I: An ancestor of Ezra (2 Esd 1 2). Cf Azariah (Ezr 7 3) and Ozias (1 Esd 8 2; AV Ezias).

AZIEL, ā'zi-el (אֶזִּיאֵל, 'āzī'ēl, "God is power"; cf HPN, 210, 309): A Levite singer who played the psalteries (1 Ch 15 20); cf Jaaziel (1 Ch 15 18).

AZIZA, a-zī'za (אֶזִּיזָא, 'āzīzā, "the powerful"): A. had taken a foreign wife (Ezr 10 27): cf Zardeus (1 Esd 9 28 RV).

AZMAVETH, az-mā'veth (אֶזְמַוֶּת, 'azmāweth): (1) One of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 31; 1 Ch 11 33).

(2) A descendant of Jonathan, the son of Saul (1 Ch 8 36; 9 42).

(3) Father of two warriors who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 3).

(4) The name of one set over David's treasures (1 Ch 27 25). Some identify him with (1) and (3).

AZMAVETH, az-mā'veth (אַזְמַוֶּתַּח, 'azmāweth; 'Ασμάωθ or 'Αζμάωθ, Asmōth or Azmōth, "strong one of death"; Ezk 2 24): Is probably identical with el-Hizmā, a village a little to the N. of 'Anātā (Anathoth). It corresponds to Beth-azmaveth (Neh 7 28).

AZMON, az'mon (אַזְמוֹן, 'ačmōn; 'Ασεμόνα, Asemōna, "strong"): On the S.W. border of Israel (Nu 34 4.5; Josh 15 4). Trumbull identifies it with 'Ain el-Qaseimeh, N.W. of Kadesh Barnea (Kad. Bar., 117, 289 f).

AZNOTH-TABOR, az'noth-tā'bor (אַזְנוֹת תְּבוֹר, 'aznōth tābhōr, "peaks of Tabor"): A place in western Naphtali, evidently in the vicinity of Mt. Tabor (Josh 19 34). The exact locality is not known.

AZOR, ā'zor (Ἀζόρ, Azōr, "help"?) : An ancestor of Jesus Christ (Mt 1 13 f).

AZOTUS, a-zō'tus. See ASHDOD (1 Mace 9 15; Acts 8 40).

AZRIEL, az'ri-el (אַזְרִיֶּל, 'azrī'el, "God's help"):

(1) One of the leading men of the half-tribe of Manasseh, E. of the Jordan, who with others of his tribe was carried captive by the king of Assyria (1 Ch 5 24 ff).

(2) The father of Jerimoth of the tribe of Naphtali in the reign of King David (1 Ch 27 19).

(3) The father of Seraiah, one of the officers sent by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch (Jer 36 26).

AZRIKAM, az-rī'kam (אַזְרִיקָם, 'azrīkām, "my help has arisen"):

(1) A descendant of King David through Zerubabel (1 Ch 3 23).

(2) A prince of Judah in the time of Ahaz. He was slain by Zichri, an Ephraimite soldier (2 Ch 28 7).

(3) One of Azel's sons, a Benjamite, descended from King Saul (1 Ch 8 38; 9 44).

(4) A Levite of the house of Merari and a resident of Jerus (1 Ch 9 14; Neh 11 15).

AZUBAH, a-zū'ba (עֲזוּבָה, 'āzūbhāh, "desolation"):

(1) A wife of Caleb, by whom she had three sons (1 Ch 2 18 f).

(2) The daughter of Shilhi and mother of King Jehoshaphat (1 K 22 42; 2 Ch 20 31).

AZUR, ā'zur. See AZZUR.

AZZAH, az'a (אֶזְזָה, 'azzāh, "strong"): AV form (Dt 2 23; 1 K 4 24; Jer 25 20) for RV "Gaza."

AZZAN, az'an (אֶזְזָן, 'azzān, "strong" or "thorn"): Father of Paltiel of the tribe of Issachar. One of the commissioners selected to divide the land between the tribes (Nu 34 26).

AZZUR, az'ur (אֶזְזֹר, 'azzūr, "helpful"):

(1) The father of Hananiah, a false prophet of Gibeon in the days of Zedekiah (Jer 28 1 ff).

(2) One of those who, with Nehemiah, sealed the covenant on the return from Babylon (Neh 10 17).

(3) The father of Jaazaniah, "one of" the princes of the people who gave wicked counsel to the city of Jerus (Ezk 11 1 f). AV has "Azur" for (1) and (3), but the Heb form of (3) is אֶזְרָר, 'azur.

Baal (בַּעַל, bā'al; Βάαλ, Báal, or Βαάλ, Baál): The Bab Belu or Bel, "Lord," was the title of the supreme god among the Canaanites.

I. Name and Character of Baal.—In Babylonia it was the title specially applied to Merodach of Babylon, which in time came to be used in place of his actual name. As the word in Heb also means "possessor," it has been supposed to have originally signified, when used in a religious sense, the god of a particular piece of land or soil. Of this; however, there is no proof, and the sense of "possessor" is derived from that of "lord." The Bab Bel-Merodach was a Sun-god, and so too was the Can Baal whose full title was Baal-Shemaim, "lord of heaven." The Phoen writer Sanchuniathon (Philo Byblius, Fragmenta II) accordingly says that the children of the first generation of mankind "in time of drought stretched forth their hands to heaven toward the sun; for they regarded him as the sole Lord of heaven, and called him Beel-samēn, which means 'Lord of Heaven' in the Phoen language and is equivalent to Zeus in Gr." Baal-Shemaim had a temple at Umm el-Awāmid between Acre and Tyre, and his name is found in inscriptions from the Phoen colonies of Sardinia and Carthage.

II. Attributes of Baal.—As the Sun-god, Baal was worshipped under two aspects, beneficent and destructive. On the one hand he gave light and warmth to his worshippers; on the other hand the fierce heats of summer destroyed the vegetation he had himself brought into being. Hence human victims were sacrificed to him in order to appease his anger in time of plague or other trouble, the victim being usually the first-born of the sacrificer and being burnt alive. In the OT this is euphemistically termed "passing" the victim "through the fire" (2 K 16 3; 21 6). The forms under which Baal was worshipped were necessarily as numerous as the communities which worshipped him. Each locality had its own Baal or divine "Lord" who frequently took his name from the city or place to which he belonged. Hence there was a Baal-Zur, "Baal of Tyre"; Baal-hermon, "Baal of Hermon" (Jgs 3 3); Baal-Lebanon, "Baal of Lebanon"; Baal-Tarz, "Baal of Tarsus." At other times the title was attached to the name of an individual god; thus we have Bel-Merodach, "the Lord Merodach" (or "Bel is Merodach") at Babylon, Baal-Melkarth at Tyre, Baal-gad (Josh 11 17) in the north of Palestine. Occasionally the second element was a noun as in Baal-Shemaim, "lord of heaven," Baal-zebub (2 K 1 2), "Lord of flies," Baal-Hammān, usually interpreted "Lord of heat," but more probably "Lord of the sunpillar," the tutelary deity of Carthage. All these various forms of the Sun-god were collectively known as the Baalim or "Baal" who took their place by the side of the female Ash-taroḥ and Asherim. At Carthage the female consort of Baal was termed Penē-Baal, "the face" or "reflection of Baal."

III. Baal-Worship.—In the earlier days of Heb history the title Baal, or "Lord," was applied to the national God of Israel, a usage which was revived in later times, and is familiar to us in the AV. Hence both Jonathan and David had sons called Merib-baal (1 Ch 8 34; 9 40) and Beeliada (1 Ch 14 7). After the time of Ahab, however, the name became associated with the worship and rites of the Phoen deity introduced into Samaria by Jezebel, and its idolatrous associations accordingly caused it to fall into disrepute. Hosea (2 16) declares that henceforth the God of Israel should no longer be called Baal, "my Baal," and personal names like Esh-baal (1 Ch 8 33; 9 39), and Beeliada into which it entered were changed in form, Baal being turned into bōsheth which in Heb at any rate conveyed the sense of "shame."

IV. Temples, etc.—Temples of Baal at Samaria and Jerus are mentioned in 1 K 16 32; 2 K 11 18; where they had been erected at the time when the Ahab dynasty endeavored to fuse Israelites and Jews and Phoenicians into a single people under the same national Phoen god. Altars on which incense was burned to Baal were set up in all the streets of Jerus according to Jeremiah (11 13), apparently on the flat roofs of the houses (Jer 32 29); and the temple of Baal contained an image of the god in the shape of a pillar or Bethel (2 K 10 26, 27). In the reign of Ahab, Baal was served in Israel by 450 priests (1 K 18 19), as well as by prophets (2 K 10 19), and his worshippers wore special vestments when his ritual was performed (2 K 10 22). The ordinary offering made to the god consisted of incense (Jer 7 9) and burnt sacrifices; on extraordinary occasions the victim was human (Jer 19 5). At times the priests worked themselves into a state of ecstasy, and dancing round the altar slashed themselves with knives (1 K 18 26, 28), like certain dervish orders in modern Islam.

V. Use of the Name.—In accordance with its signification the name of Baal is generally used with the definite art.; in the LXX this often takes the feminine form, αἰσχύνη (aîschúnē) "shame" being intended to be read. We find the same usage in Rom 11 4. The feminine counterpart of Baal was Baalah or Baalath which is found in a good many of the local names (see Baethgen, Beiträge zur semitischen Religionsgeschichte, 1888).

VI. Forms of Baal.—Baal-berith (בְּרִית בַּעַל, ba'al b'ērith; Βααλβερῖθ, Baalberith), "Covenant-Baal," was worshipped at Shechem after the death of Gideon (Jgs 8 33; 9 4). In Jgs 9 46 the name is replaced by El-berith, "Covenant-god." The covenant was that made by the god with his worshippers, less probably between the Israelites and the native Canaanites.

Baal-gad (גַּד בַּעַל, ba'al gādh; Βαλαγάδα, Balagāda), "Baal [lord] of good luck" (or "Baal is Gad") was the god of a town called after his name in the north of Pal, which has often been identified with Baalbek. The god is termed simply Gad in Isa 65 11 RVm; where he is associated with Meni, the Assy Manu (AV "troop" and "number").

Baal-hamon (הַמֶּן בַּעַל, ba'al hāmōn; Βαλαμών, Beelamōn) is known only from the fact that Solomon had a garden at a place

3. Baal-hamon of that name (Cant 8 11). The name is usually explained to mean "Baal of the multitude," but the cuneiform tablets of the Tell el-Amarna age found in Pal show that the Egypt god Amon was worshipped in Canaan and identified there with the native Baal. We are therefore justified in reading the name Baal-Amon, a parallel to the Bab Bel-Merodach. The name has no connection with that of the Carthaginian deity Baal-hammān.

Baal-hermon (הֶרְמוֹן בַּעַל, ba'al hērmon; Βαλαερμών, Balaermōn) is found in the name of "the mountain of Baal-hermon" (Jgs 3 3; cf

4. Baal-hermon 1 Ch 5 23), which also bore the names of Hermon, Sirion and Shenir (Saniru in the Assy inscriptions), the second name being applied to it by the Phoenicians and the third by the Amorites (Dt 3 9). Baal-hermon will consequently be a formation similar to Baal-Lebanon in an inscription from Cyprus; according to the Phoen writer Sanchuniathon (Philo Byblius, Fragmenta II) the third generation of men "begat sons of surprising size and stature, whose names were given to the mountains of which they had obtained possession."

Baal-peor (פְּעוֹר בַּעַל, ba'al p'e'or; Βαελφεγώρ, Beelphegōr) was god of the Moabite mountains, who took his name from Mount Peor

5. Baal-peor (Nu 23 28), the modern Fa'ūr, and was probably a form of Chemosh (Jerome, Comm., Isa 15). The sensual rites with which he was worshipped (Nu 25 1-3) indicate his connection with the Phoen Baal.

Baal-zebub (זְבֻב בַּעַל, ba'al z'bhūbh; Βααλμύια Θεός, Baalmyia Theós ("Baal the fly god") was worshipped at Ekron where he had a famous oracle (2 K 1 2, 3, 16). The name is generally tr'd "the Lord of flies," the Sun-god being associated with the flies which swarm in Pal during the earlier summer months. It is met with in Assy inscriptions. In the NT the name assumes the form of Beelzebul (Βελζεβούλ), in AV BEELZEBUB (q.v.).

A. H. SAYCE

BAAL, bā'al (בַּעַל, ba'al, "lord," "master," "possessor"):

(1) A descendant of Reuben, Jacob's first-born son, and the father of Beerah, prince of the Reubenites, "whom Tiglath-pileser (1 Ch 5 5, 6) king of Assyria carried away captive."

(2) The fourth of ten sons of Jeiel (AV "Jehiel"), father and founder of Gibeon. His mother was Maacah; his brother Kish father of Saul (1 Ch 8 29 f; 9 35, 36, 39; cf 1 S 14 50 f). These passages identify Jeiel and Abiel as the father of Kish and thus of Baal. For study of confusions in the genealogical record, in 1 Ch 9 36, 39, see NER; KISH; ABIEL; JEIEL.

(3) In composition often the name of a man and not of the heathen god, e.g. Baal-hanan, a king of Edom (Gen 36 38; 1 Ch 1 49); also a royal prefect of the same name (1 Ch 27 28). Gesenius thinks that Baal in compound words rarely refers to the god by that name. See BAAL (deity).

(4) A city of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4 33). See BAALATH-BEER. DWIGHT M. PRATT

BAAL (בַּעַל, ba'al; Βάαλ, Báal): 1 Ch 4 33. See BAALATH-BEER.

BAALAH, bā'a-la (בַּעֲלָה, ba'ālāh; "possessor," "mistress"): Three occurrences of this name:

(1) = KIRIATH-JEARIM (q.v.) (Josh 15 9.10; 1 Ch 13 6).

(2) A city in the Negeb of Judah (Josh 15 29). In Josh 19 3 Balah and in 1 Ch 4 29 Bilhah; perhaps also Bealoth of Josh 15 24. The site is unknown; but see PEF, III, 26.

(3) Mount Baalah (Josh 15 11), a mountain ridge between Shikeron (Ekron) and Jabneel unless, as seems probable, the suggestion of M. Clermont-Ganneau (Rev. Crit., 1897, 902) is correct that for הַר, har (= "mount"), we should read נַחַר, nāḥār ("river"). In this case the border in question would be the Nahr rubin. Here there is an annual feast held—attended by all classes and famous all over Syria—which appears to be a real survival of "Baal worship."

(1) A town on the border of Dan (Josh 19 44) associated with Eltekeh and Gibbethon—possibly Bela'in.

(2) ("Mistress-ship"): A store city of Solomon, mentioned with Beth-horon (1 K 9 18; 2 Ch 8 6) and possibly the same as (1).

BAALATH-BEER, bā'a-lath-bē'er (בַּעֲלָת בְּעַר, ba'ālāth b'e'er, "lady [mistress] of the well"; Josh 19 8 [in 1 Ch 4 33, Baal]): In Josh this place is designated "Ramah of the South," i.e. of the Negeb, while in 1 S 30 27 it is described as Ramoth of the Negeb. It must have been a prominent hill (rāmāh = "height") in the far south of the Negeb and near a well (b'e'er). The site is unknown though Conder suggests that the shrine Kubbet el Baul may retain the old name.

BAALBEK, bāl'bek, bāl-bek'. See AVEN; ON.

BAAL-BERITH, bā-al-bē'rith (בַּעַל בְּרִית, ba'al b'rith = "Baal of the Covenant"): An idol worshipped by the Shechemites after Gideon's death (Jgs 8 33), as protector and guardian of engagements. His temple is also referred to in Jgs 9 4. See BAAL (1).

BAALE-JUDAH, bā'al-ē-jōō'da. See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

BAAL-GAD, bā'al-gad (בַּעַל גַּד, ba'al gād; Βαλαγάδα, Balagadā, Βαλαγάδ, Balgād): Joshua in his conquest reached as far north as Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon, under Mount Hermon (Josh 11 17). This definitely locates it in the valley between the Lebanons, to the W. or N.W. of Hermon. It must not be confused with Baal-hermon. Conder thinks it may be represented by 'Ain Jedeideh.

BAAL-HAMON, bā-al-hā'mon. See BAAL (1).

BAAL-HANAN, bā-al-hā'nān (בַּעַל חֲנָן, ba'al ḥānān, "the Lord is gracious"):

(1) A king of Edom (Gen 36 38 f; 1 Ch 1 49 f).

(2) A gardener in the service of David (1 Ch 27 28).

BAAL-HAZOR, bā-al-hā'zor (בַּעַל חֲצֹר, ba'al ḥāzōr; Βαλασώρ, Bailasōr, Βελασώρ, Bel-la-sōr): A place on the property of Absalom where his sheep-shearers were gathered, beside Ephraim (2 S 13 23). The sheep-shearing was evidently the occasion of a festival which was attended by Absalom's brethren. Here he compassed the death of Amnon in revenge for the outrage upon his sister. The place may be identified with Tell 'Aṣūr, a mountain which rises 3,318 ft. above the sea, 4 miles N.E. of Bethel.

BAAL-HERMON, bā'al-hūr'mon (בַּעַל הֶרְמוֹן, ba'al ḥermōn; Βαῶλ Ἑρμών, Baāl Ḥermōn): Baal-gad under Mount Hermon is described as "toward the sunrising" in Josh 13 5. If Mount Lebanon proper is here intended the reading may be taken as correct. But in Jgs 3 3 Baal-gad is replaced by Baal-hermon. One or the other must be due to a scribal error. The Baal-hermon of 1 Ch 5 23 lay somewhere E. of the Jordan, near to Mount Hermon. It may possibly be identical with Bāniās.

BAALI, bā'a-lī (בַּעֲלִי, ba'ālī, "my master"): Baal, a common name for all heathen gods, had in common practice been used also of Jeh. Hosea (2 16.17) demands that Jeh be no longer called Ba'ālī ("my Baal" = "my lord") but Ishī ("my husband"), and we find that later the Israelites abandoned the use of Ba'al for Jeh.

BAALIS, bā'a-liš (בַּעֲלִישׁ, ba'liš, perhaps for Baalim, "gods"; LXX Βελισά, Beleisá, Βελισά, Belisá, Βααλῖς, Baalīs; Ant., X, ix, 3, Βαάλῖμος, Baālīmos): King of the children of Ammon, the instigator of the murder of Gedaliah (Jer 40 14). Cf Ant., X, ix, 3.

BAAL-MEON, bā'al-mē'on (בַּעַל מְעֹן, ba'al m'e'on; Βεελμεών, Beelmeōn): A town built by the children of Reuben along with Nebo, "their names being changed" (Nu 32 38), identical with Beon of ver 3. As Beth-baal-meon it was given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13 17). Mesha names it as fortified by him (MS, I. 9). It appears in Jer 48 23 as Beth-meon, one of the cities of Moab. Onom speaks of it as a large village near the hot springs, i.e. Callirrhoe, in Wādī Zerḳā Ma'in, 9 miles from Heshbon. This points to the ruined site of Ma'in, about 4 miles S.W. of Madaba. The ruins now visible however are not older than Rom times.

BAAL-PERAZIM, bā-al-pē-rā'zīm, bā-al-per'a-zīm (בַּעַל פְּרָצִים, ba'al p'rāzīm; Βααλ'φαρασείν, Baal'pharaseín, Baal'pharasetn, "the lord of breakings through"): The spot in or near the Valley of Rephaim where David obtained a signal victory over the Philis; it was higher than Jerus for David asked, "Shall I go up against the Philis?" (2 S 5 20; 1 Ch 14 11). The exact site is unknown, but if the Vale of Rephaim is el Beka'a, the open valley between Jerus and Mar Elias, then Baal-perazim would probably be the mountains to the E. near what is called the "Mount of Evil Counsel" (see JERUSALEM). The Mount Perazim of Isa 28 21 would appear to be the same spot.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BAALSAMUS, bā'al'sa-mus (Βαάλσαμος, Baál-samos; AV Balasamus): B. stood at the right side of Ezra, when the law was read to the people (1 Esd 9 43). Cf Maaseiah (Neh 8 7).

BAAL-SHALISHAH, bā-al-shal'i-sha, ba-al-shalē'sha (בַּעַל שְׁלִישָׁה, ba'al shālīshāh; Βαρθσαρισά, Baithsarísá): Whence a man came to Gilgal with first-fruits (2 K 4 42) was probably not far from the latter place. According to the Talm (Sanh. 12a) the fruits of the earth nowhere ripened so quickly.

It is called by Eusebius Baithsarith (Jerome "Bethsalisa"), and located 15 miles N. of Diospolis (Lydda). Khirbet Sirisā almost exactly fits this description. Gilgal (Jiljūlieh) lies in the plain about 4½ miles to the N.W. Khirbet Kefr Thilth, 3½ miles farther north, has also been suggested. The Arab. Thilth exactly corresponds to the Heb Shāl-shāh.
W. EWING

BAAL-TAMAR, bā-al-tā'mar (בַּעַל תְּמָר, ba'al tāmār; Βαάλ Θαμάρ, Baal Thamār, "Baal of the palm tree"): Evidently a seat of heathen worship (Jgs 20 33) between Bethel and Gibeah (cf vs 18.31). The place was known to Eusebius (Onom s.v.), but all trace of the name is now lost. Conder suggests that it may be connected with the palm tree of Deborah (Jgs 4 5) which was between Bethel and Ramah (HDB, s.v.).

BAALZEBUB, bā-al-zē'bub (בַּעַל זְבוּב, ba'al zē'būbh = "Lord of flies"; Βαάλ-μυῖαν, Baal-muiān): A deity worshipped by the Philis at Ekron (2 K 1 2. 3.6.16). All that can be gathered from this one reference to him in ancient lit. is that he had some fame as a god that gave oracles. Ahaziah, son of Ahab, and king of Israel, went to consult him whether he should recover of his sickness, and was therefore rebuked by Elijah, who declared that his death would be the result of this insult to Jeh. Why he was called "lord of flies," or whether his real name has not been corrupted and lost are matters of conjecture. See BAAL (1).

BAAL-ZEPHON, bā-al-zē'fon (בַּעַל צִפּוֹן, ba'al zē'phōn; Βεελσεφφών, Beelsepphōn; Ex 14 2. 9; Nu 33 7): The name means "Lord of the North," and the place was opposite the Heb camp, which was between Migdol and the sea. It may have been the shrine of a Sem deity, but the position is unknown (see Exonv). Goodwin (see Brugsch, Hist. Egt., II, 363) found the name Baali-Zapuna as that of a god mentioned in an Egypt papyrus in the British Museum.

BAANA, bā'a-na (OT and Apoc; Βαανά, Baaná; בְּעָנָא, ba'ānā, "son of oppression"):

(1, 2) Two commissariat-officers in the service of Solomon (1 K 4 12; 4 16; AV "Baanah").

(3) Father of Zadok, the builder (Neh 3 4).

(4) A leader who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 8). Cf Baanah (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7; 10 27).

BAANAH, bā'a-na (בְּעָנָה, ba'ānāh, "son of oppression"):

(1) Captain in the army of Ish-bosheth (2 S 4 2 ff).

(2) Father of Heleb, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 29; 1 Ch 11 30).

(3) Returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus; a leader and one who sealed the covenant (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7; 10 27). See BAANA (4).

BAANI, bā'a-nī (A, Βαανί, Baani; B, Βαανί, Baani; AV Maani = Bani [Ezr 10 34]): The descendants of B. put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 34).

BAANIAS, bā-a-nī'as. See BANNEAS (Apoc).

BAARA, bā'a-ra (בְּעָרָא, ba'ārā, "the burning one"): A wife of the Benjamite Shaharaim (1 Ch 8 8).

BAASEIAH, bā-a-sī'a, bā-a-sē'ya (בַּעֲשִׂיָּה, ba'āsēyāh, "the Lord is bold"): Perhaps for בַּעֲשִׂיָּה, ba'āsēyāh, after the Gr Maasat, B, Maasat, "the work of the Lord." Cf HPN, 293. An ancestor of Asaph, the musician (1 Ch 6 40).

BAASHA, bā'a-sha (בַּעֲשָׂא, ba'shā, "boldness"): King of Israel. B., son of Ahijah, and of common birth (1 K 16 2), usurped the throne of Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, killed Nadab and exterminated the house of Jeroboam. He carried on a long warfare with Asa, the king of Judah (cf Jer 41 9), began to build Ramah, but was prevented from completing this work by Ben-hadad, the king of Syria. He is told by the prophet Jehu that because of his sinful reign the fate of his house would be like that of Jeroboam. B. reigned 24 years. His son Elah who succeeded him and all the members of his family were murdered by the usurper Zimri (1 K 16 16 ff; 16 1 ff; 2 Ch 16 1 ff). The fate of his house is referred to in 1 K 21 22; 2 K 9 9. Cf ASA; ELAH; ZIMRI.

BABBLER, bab'lār (בַּבְּלָר, ba'al ha-lāshōn; AV of Eccl 10 11 lit. "master of the tongue"; RV CHARMER; λαπιστής, lapistēs, AV of Ecclus 20 7; RV BRAGGART; σπερμολόγος, spermologos; AV and RV of Acts 17 18): The latter Gr word is used of birds, such as the crow, that live by picking up small seeds (spérma, "a seed," légein, "to gather"), and of men, for "hangers on" and "parasites" who obtained their living by picking up odds and ends off merchants' carts in harbors and markets. It carries the "suggestion of picking up refuse and scraps, and in lit. of plagiarism without the capacity to use correctly" (Ramsay). The Athenian philosophers in calling Paul a spermologos, or "ignorant plagiarist," meant that he retailed odds and ends of knowledge which he had picked up from others, without possessing himself any system of thought or skill of language—without culture. In fact it was a fairly correct description of the Athenian philosophers themselves in Paul's day.

BABBLING, bab'ling (בִּבְלִי, sī'h; RV COMPLAINING): The consequence of tarrying long at the wine (Prov 23 29 AV); λαλία, lalia, RV "talk" (Ecclus 19 6; 20 5 AV); κενόφωνία, kenophōnia, lit. "making an empty sound" (1 Tim 6 20; 2 Tim 2 16 AV and RV).

(1) בֶּרֶךְ, na'ar; παῖς, país) of a male infant 3 months old (Ex 2 6) tr^d elsewhere "boy" or "lad."

(2) עוֹלָל, olāl, בְּעָלִילִים, ta'ālūlīm) in the general sense of "child" (Ps 8 2; 17 14; Isa 3 4).

(3) βρέφος, bréphos) an unborn or newborn child (AV and RV of Lk 1 41.44; 2 12.16; 1 Pet 2 2 and RV of Lk 18 15 [AV "infants"]; Acts 7 19 [AV "young children"] and 2 Tim 3 15 [AV "child"]).

(4) νήπιος, nēpios = Lat infans) "a child that cannot speak." (AV and RV of Mt 11 25; 21 16; Lk 10 21; Rom 2 20; 1 Cor 3 1; He 5 13) the same word is tr^d "child," plur. "children" (in AV and RV of 1 Cor 13 11; Gal 4 1.3; Eph 4 14) the vb. nēpiázete is tr^d in AV "be ye children" and in RV "be ye babes" (1 Cor 14 20). Nēpios is used metaphorically of those who are like children, of simple and single minds, as opposed to the "wise and understanding" (Mt 11 25=Lk 10 21; cf 1 Cor 14 20). "Babes in Christ" are men of little spiritual growth, carnal as opposed to spiritual (1 Cor 3 1; cf He 5 13; Eph 4 14). Nēpios is also used of a child as a minor or infant in the eye of the law (Gal 4 1.3).

BABEL, bā'bel, BABYLON, bab'i-lon (Topographical): Babylon was the Gr name of the city written in the cuneiform script of the Babylonians, bab-ili, which means in Sem, "the gate of god." The Hebrews called the country, as well as the city, Bābhel. This name they considered came from the root, bālal, "to confound" (Gen 11 9). The name in Sumerian ideographs was written Din-tir, which means "life of the forest," and yet ancient etymologists explained it as meaning "place of the seat of life" (shubat balāte). Ka-dingirra, which also means "gate of god," was another form of the name in Sumerian. It was also called Su-anna (which is of uncertain meaning) and Uru-azagga, "the holy city."

Herodotus, the Gr historian, has given us a picture of Babylon in his day. He says that the city was a great square, 42 miles in circuit. Ctesias makes it 56 miles. This, he writes, was surrounded by a moat or rampart 300 ft. high, and 75 ft. broad. The earliest mention of Babylon is in the time of Sargon I, about 2700 BC. That monarch laid the foundations of the temple of Anunit, and also those of the temple of Amal. In the time of Dungi we learn that the place was sacked. The city evidently played a very unimportant part in the political history of Babylonia of the early period, for besides these references it is almost unknown until the time of Hammurabi, when its rise brought about a new epoch in the history of Babylonia. The seat of power was then transferred permanently from the southern states. This resulted in the closing of the political history of the Sumerians. The organization of the empire by Hammurabi, with Babylon as its capital, placed it in a position from which it was never dislodged during the remaining history of Babylonia.

The mounds covering the ancient city have frequently been explored, but systematic excavations of the city were not undertaken until 1899, when Koldewey, the German excavator, began to uncover its ancient ruins in a methodical manner. In spite of what ancient writers say, certain scholars maintain that they grossly exaggerated the size of the city, which was comparatively small, especially when considered in connection with large cities of the present era.

In the northern part of the city there was situated what is called the North Palace on the east side of the Euphrates, which passed through the city. A little distance below this point the Arakhtu canal left the Euphrates, and passing through the southern wall rejoined the river. There was also a Middle and Southern Palace. Near the latter was located the Ishtar gate. The temple E-makh was close to the east side of the gate. Other canals in the city were called Merodach and Libilkhegala. In the southern portion of the city was located the famous temple E-sag-ila. This fane was called by the Gr historian, "the temple of Belus." Marduk or Merodach (as written in the OT), the patron deity of the city, received from Enlil, as Hammurabi informs us, after he had driven the Elamites out of Babylonia, the title bēl matāte, "lord of lands," not the name which Enlil of Nippur had possessed. In the past there has been a confusion. The ideogram Enlil or Ellil had been incorrectly read Bel. This necessitated speaking of the old Bel and the young Bel. Beyond being called bēl, "lord," as all other gods were called, Enlil's name was not Bel. Marduk is the Bel of the OT, as well as the god called Bel in the Assyrian and Babylonian inscriptions.

The temple area included an outer, central and inner court. The shrine of Ishtar and Zamama occupied the central court, and the zigurrat the inner court. In the temple proper, the shrine Ekua was located, in which stood the golden image of Marduk. This, the ancient writers say, was 40 ft. high. On the topmost stage there was a shrine dedicated to Marduk. It is assumed that it was 50 ft. long by 70 ft. broad and 50 ft. in height.

Nabopolassar rebuilt the temple and its tower. Nebuchadnezzar enlarged and embellished the sanctuary. He raised the tower so that "its head was in the heavens," an expression found in the story of the Tower of Babel in Gen, as well as in many of the building inscriptions. See LOTB, 121 ff, and the art. on BABEL, TOWER OF.

One of the chief works of Nebuchadnezzar was the building of Aiburshabu, the famous procession street of the city, which extended from the Ishtar gate to E-sag-ila. It was a great and magnificent causeway, built higher than the houses. Walls lined it on either side, which were decorated with glazed tiles, portraying lions, life size in relief. The pavement was laid with blocks of stone brought from the mountains. This procession street figured prominently on the New Year's festival day, when the procession of the gods took place.

A knowledge of the work Nebuchadnezzar did serves as a fitting commentary to the passage in Dnl 4 30: "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built?" He had made the city one of the wonders of the world.

The two sieges by Darius Hystaspes and the one by Xerxes destroyed much of the beauty of the city. Alexander desired to make it again a great center and to build an immense fortress in the city; but in the midst of this undertaking he was murdered, while living in the palace of Nebuchadrezzar. The temple, though frequently destroyed, was in existence in the time of the Seleucids, but the city had long since ceased to be of any importance. See also BABYLONIA.

The name of the great capital of ancient Babylonia, the Shinar of Gen 10 10; 14 1, other names of the city being Tin-dir, "seat of life," Ê (ki), probably an abbreviation of Êridu (ki) "the good city" the City (=Paradise), Babylonia having seemingly been regarded as the Garden of Eden (PSBA, June 1911, p. 161); and Šu-anna, "the high-handed" (meaning, apparently, "high-walled," "hand" and "defense" being interchangeable terms). It is possible that these various names are due to the incorporation of outlying districts as Babylon grew in size.

According to Gen 10 9, the founder of Babylon was Nimrod, but among the Babylonians, it was Merodach who built the city, together

2. Probable Date of Its Foundation with Erech and Niffer (Calneh) and its their renowned temples. The date of its foundation is unknown, but it certainly went back to primitive times, and Babylon may even have equaled Niffer in antiquity (the American explorers of that site have estimated that its lowest strata of habitations go back to 8,000 years BC). Babylon's late assumption of the position of capital of the country would therefore be due to its rulers not having attained power and influence at an earlier period. Having once acquired that position, however, it retained it to the end, and its great god, Merodach, became the head of the Bab pantheon—partly through the influence of Babylon as capital, partly because the city was the center of his worship, and the place of the great Tower of Babel, concerning which many wonderful things were said. See BABEL, TOWER OF; CONFUSION OF TONGUES.

According to Herodotus, the city, which lay in a great plain, was square in its plan and measured 120 furlongs (stadia) each way—480

3. Its Walls and Gates in all. Each side was therefore about 14 miles long, making a circuit of nearly 56 miles, and an area of nearly 196 sq. miles. As the space inclosed is so great, and traces of the walls would seem to be wanting, these figures may be regarded as open to question. Around the city, Herodotus says, there was a deep and broad moat full of water, and then came a wall 50 royal cubits thick and 200 cubits high, pierced by 100 gateways with brazen gates and lintels. Reckoning the cubit at 18½ in., this would mean that Babylon's walls were no less than 311 ft. high; and regarding the royal cubit as being equal to 21 in., their thickness would be something like 87 ft. Notwithstanding that Babylon has been the quarry of the neighboring builders for two millenniums, it is surprising that such extensive masses of brickwork should have disappeared without leaving at least a few recognizable traces.

The city was built on both sides of the Euphrates, and at the point where the wall met the river there

4. Its Position, Divisions, Streets and Temple was a return-wall running along its banks, forming a rampart. The houses of Babylon were of 3 and 4 stories. The roads which ran through the city were straight, and apparently intersected each other at right angles, like the great cities of America. The river-end of each of the streets leading to the river was guarded by a brazen gate. Within the great outer wall was another, not much weaker, but inclosing a smaller space. Each division of the city contained a great building, the one being the king's palace, strongly fortified around, and the other the temple of Zeus Belos—an erection with brazen gates measuring two furlongs each way. Within this sacred precinct was a solid tower measuring a furlong each way, and surmounted by other towers to the number of eight. An ascent ran around these towers, with a stopping-place about the middle where the visitor might rest. Upon the topmost tower a large cell was built, wherein was a couch and a golden table. No image was placed in the cell, and no one passed the night there, except a woman of the people, chosen by the god. In another cell below was a golden image of Zeus sitting, his seat and footstool being likewise of gold, with, near by, a large golden table. The total weight of the precious metal here was 800 talents. Upon a small golden altar outside the cell young sucklings only were sacrificed, and upon another (not of gold) full-grown animals were offered.

The hydraulic works of Babylon are attributed by Herodotus to two queens, Semiramis and Nitocris. The former made banks of

5. The Works of Semiramis and Nitocris earth on the plain which were worth seeing, preventing the river from flooding the plain like a sea. The second, Nitocris, altered the channel of the river in such a way that it flowed three times in its course to the village Andericca, and the traveler by water therefore took three days to pass this spot. She also raised the banks of the river, and dug a great lake above Babylon. The place which was dug out she made into a swamp, the object being to retard the course of the river. The many bends and the swamp were on the shortest route to Media, to prevent the Medes from having dealings with her kingdom and learning of her affairs. Other works were a bridge across the Euphrates, and a tomb for herself over the most frequented gate of the city.

Both Herodotus and Ctesias were eyewitnesses of the glory of Babylon, though only at the period when it had begun to wane. It is exceedingly probable, however, that their accounts will be superseded in the end, by those of the people who best knew the city, namely, the inhabitants of Babylon itself.

According to Ctesias, the circuit of the city was not 480, but 360 furlongs—the number of the days in the Bab year—and somewhat under

6. Ctesias' Description of the Palaces and Their Decorated Walls 42 miles. The E. and W. districts were joined by a bridge 5 furlongs or 1,080 yards long, and 30 ft. broad. At each end of the bridge was a royal palace, that on the eastern bank being the more magnificent of the two. This palace was defended by three walls, the outermost being 60 furlongs or 7 miles in circuit; the second, a circular wall, 40 furlongs ($4\frac{1}{2}$ miles), and the third 20 furlongs ($2\frac{1}{2}$ miles). The height of the middle wall was 300 ft., and that of its towers 420 ft., but this was exceeded by the height of the inmost wall. Ctesias states that the walls of the second and third inclosures were of colored brick, showing hunting-scenes—the chase of the leopard and the lion, with male and female figures, which he regarded as Ninus and Semiramis. The other palace (that on the W. bank) was smaller and less ornate, and was inclosed only by a single wall 30 furlongs ($3\frac{1}{2}$ miles) in circuit. This also had representations of hunting-scenes and bronze statues of Ninus, Semiramis and Jupiter-Belus (Bel-Merodach). Besides the bridge, he states that there was also a tunnel under the river. He seems to speak of the temple of Belus (see BABEL, TOWER OF) as being surmounted by three statues—Bel (Bel-Merodach), 40 ft. high, his mother Rhea (Dawkina, the Dauké of Damascus), and Bel-Merodach's spouse

7. The Temple of Belus and the Hanging Gardens

Juno or Beltis (Zēr-panitum). The celebrated Hanging Gardens he seems to describe as a square of which each side measured 400 ft., rising in terraces, the topmost of which was planted with trees of various kinds. If this was the case, it must have resembled a temple-tower covered with verdure. The Assyrian sculptures, however, indicate something different (see sec. 27).

With regard to the size of the city as given by other authorities, Pliny copies Herodotus, and makes its circuit 480 furlongs (Nat. Hist. vi.26); Strabo (xvii.i. sec. 5), 385; Q. Curtius (v.i. sec. 26), 368; Clitarchus (apud Diod. Sic. ii.7), 365. Though the difference between the highest and the lowest is considerable, it is only what might be expected from independent estimates, for it is doubtful whether any of them are based on actual measurements. Diodorus (ii.9, end) states that but a small part of the inclosure was inhabited in his time (he was a contemporary of Caesar and Augustus), but the abandonment of the city must then have been practically completed, and the greater part given over, as he states, to cultivation—even, perhaps, within the space inclosed by the remains of walls today. It is noteworthy that Q. Curtius says (v.i. sec. 27) that as much as nine-tenths consisted, even during Babylon's most prosperous period, of gardens, parks, paradises, fields and orchards; and this the later contract-tablets confirm. Though there is no confirmation of the height of the walls as given by these different authorities, the name given to the city, Šu-anna, "the high walled" (see above), indicated that it was renowned for the height of its defensive structures.

8. Other Descriptions

Among the native accounts of the city, that of Nebuchadrezzar is the best and most instructive.

From this record it would seem that there were two principal defensive structures, Imgur-Enlil and Nēmitti-Enlil—"Enlil has been gracious" and "Enlil's foundation" respectively. The

9. Nebuchadrezzar's Account construction of these, which protected the inner city only, on the eastern and western sides of the Euphrates, he attributes to his father Nabonidus, as well as the digging of the moat, with the two "strong walls" on its banks, and the embankment of the Arahtu canal. He had also lined the Euphrates with quays or embankments—probably the structures to which the Gr writers refer—but he had not finished the work. Within Babylon itself he made a roadway from Du-azaga, the place where the fates were declared, to Aa-ibur-šabū, Babylon's festival-street, which lay by the gate of Beltis or Maḥ, for the great New-Year's festival of Merodach and the gods.

Nebuchadrezzar, after his accession, completed the two great walls, lined the ditches with brick, and increased the thickness of the two walls which his father had built. He also built a wall, traces of which are apparently extant, on the W. side of Babylon (he apparently refers to what may be called the "city," in contradistinction to "greater Babylon"), and raised the level of Aa-ibur-šabū from the "holy gate" to the gate of Nanā; together with the gateways (in consequence of the higher level of the pathway) through which it passed. The gates themselves were constructed of cedar overlaid with copper (bronze), most likely in the same manner as the gates of Imgur-Bél (Balawat) in Assyria (reign of Shalmaneser II, cir 850 BC). Probably none of Babylon's gates were of solid bronze, notwithstanding the statements of Herodotus; but the thresholds were wholly of that metal, stone being very rare, and perhaps less durable. These gates were guarded by images of bulls and giant serpents or composite dragons of the same metal. Nebuchadrezzar also built a wall on the E. bank of the river, 4,000 cubits distant, "high like a mountain," to prevent the approach of an enemy. This wall also had cedar gates covered with copper. An additional defense made by him was an enormous lake, "like unto the broad sea to cross," which was kept in by embankments.

had lived, and wherein, in all probability, Nebuchadrezzar had passed his younger days, had suffered from the floods when the river was high. The foundations of this extensive edifice, which extended from the wall called Imgur-Enlil to Libil-hégala, the eastern canal, and from the banks of the Euphrates to Aa-ibur-šabū, the festival-street, were thoroughly repaired with burnt brick and bitumen, and the doorways, which had become too low in consequence of the raising of that street, were raised to a suitable height. He caused the whole to tower aloft, as he has it, "mountainlike" (suggesting a building more than one story high). The roof of this palace was built of cedar, and the doors were of the same wood covered with bronze. Their thresholds, as in other cases, were bronze, and the interior of the palace was decorated with gold, silver, precious stones and other costly material.

Four hundred and ninety cubits from Nēmitti-Enlil lay, as the king says, the principal wall, Imgur-Enlil, and in order to guarantee the former against attack, he built two strong embankments, and an outer wall "like a mountain," with a great building between which served both as a fortress and a palace, and attached to the old palace built by his father. According

12. Quick Building to Nebuchadrezzar's account, which is confirmed by Berosus (as quoted by Jos and Eusebius), all this work was completed in 15 days. The decorations were like those of the other palace, and blocks of alabaster, brought, apparently, from Assyria, strengthened the battlements. Other defences surrounded this stronghold.

Among the temples which Nebuchadrezzar restored or rebuilt may be mentioned Ê-kua, the shrine of Merodach within Ê-sagila (the temple of Belus); the sanctuary called Du-azaga, the place of fate, where, on every New-Year's festival, on the 8th and 9th of Nisan, "the king of the gods of heaven and earth" was placed, and the future of the Bab monarch and his people declared. Every whit as important as Ê-sagila, however, was the restoration of Ê-temen-an-ki, called "the Tower of Babylon" (see BABEL, TOWER OF), within the city; and connected, as will be seen from the plan, with that structure. Among the numerous temples of Babylon which he rebuilt or restored were Ê-mah, for the goddess Nin-mah, near the Istar-gate; the white limestone temple for Sin, the Moon-god; Ê-ditur-kalama, "the house of the judge of the land," for Šamaš, the Sun-god; Ê-sa-tila for Gula, the goddess of healing; Ê-hursag-ella, "the house of the holy mountain," etc.

The amount of work accomplished by this king, who, when walking on the roof of his palace, lifted up with pride, exclaimed "Is not this great Babylon, which I have built?" (Dnl 4 30), was, according to his own records and the Gr writers, enormous, and the claim he made fully justified. But if he boasts of the work he did, he is just in attributing much to his father Nabopolassar; though in connection with this it is to be noted that his ascribing the building of the walls of Babylon to his father is not to be taken literally—in all probability he only restored them, though he may have added supplementary defences, as Nebuchadrezzar himself did.

Besides Nebuchadrezzar's inscriptions, various other texts give details concerning the topography of Babylon, among them being the

15. Details Concerning the City contract-tablets, which mention various districts or quarters of the city, such as Tê which is within Babylon; the city of Sula which is within Babylon; the new city which is within Babylon, upon the new canal. Within the city were also several Huṣṣêtu—perhaps "farms," such as Huṣṣêtu ša Iddina-Marduk, "Iddina-Marduk's farm," etc. The various gates are also referred to, such as the gate of Šamaš, the city-gate of Uraš, and the gate of Zagaga, which seems to have lain in "the province of Babylon," and had a field in front of it, as had also the gate of Enlil. According to an Assyrian and a Bab list of gates, the streets bore names connected with those of the gates to which they led. Thus the street of the gate of Zagaga, one of the gods of war, was called "the street of Zagaga, who expels his enemies"; that of the gate of Merodach was "the street of Merodach, shepherd of his land"; while the street of Istar's gate was "the street of Istar, patron of her people." The city-gates named after Enlil, Addu (Hadad or Rimmon), Šamaš, the Sun-god, Sin the Moon-god, etc, had streets similarly indicated. Certain of the streets of Babylon

16. Details Concerning Babylon from Other Sources are also referred to on the contract-tablets, and such descriptive indications as "the broad street which is at the southern gate of the temple Ê-tur-kalama" seem to show that they were not in all cases systematically named. If the streets of Babylon were really, as Herodotus states, straight, and arranged at right angles, this was probably outside the walls of the ancient (inner) city, and most likely due to some wise Bab king or ruler. Details of the streets have been obtained at the point called Merkes (sec. 22) and elsewhere, and seem to show that the Babylonians liked the rooms of their houses to be square. Such streets as slanted were therefore full of rectangles, and must have presented a quite peculiar appearance.

It is this inner city which has most attracted the attention of explorers, both English and German, and it is on its site that the latter have carried on their systematic excavations. Indeed, it is probable that the houses of the most numerous class of the people—artisans, merchants, workmen, etc—lay outside the walls to which the Bab royal inscriptions refer. It may be supposed that the houses in this district were mainly low buildings of unbaked clay (of which, indeed, portions of the temples and palaces were built), and these would naturally disappear more easily than if they had been built of baked brick. Even when baked, however, the brick-built ruins of Babylonia and Assyria have a tendency to disappear, owing to the value which bricks, both baked and unbaked, have for the erection of new houses in the neighborhood. Concerning the extent of the exterior city much doubt naturally exists, but it may well have covered the tract attributed to it (see sec. 3, above). Nineveh, at the time of its prosperity, also had enormous suburbs (see NINEVEH).

The ruins of Babylon lie between 80 and 90 kilometers (50 miles or less) from Bagdad. The first thing seen on approaching them is the broad high ridge of Babil, which marks the site of the ruins of the Northern Palace. After some time, the ruins of the ancient walls are reached. They are still several yards high, and slope down gently to the plain. Starting to the N. of Babil, the wall stretches for about 875 yds. due E., and then runs southwards for another 930 yds., taking at that point a course to the S.E. for about 2 miles 160 yds. (3,300 meters). A wide gap occurs here, after which it runs to the S.W., and is lost in the open fields at the end of about 1½ miles (2 kilometers). "That this is the old city-wall," says Weissbach, "there can be no doubt, and the name Sur, 'city-wall,' given it by the Palace. After some time, the ruins of the ancient walls are reached. They are still several yards high, and slope down gently to the plain. Starting to the N. of Babil, the wall stretches for about 875 yds. due E., and then runs southwards for another 930 yds., taking at that point a course to the S.E. for about 2 miles 160 yds. "That this is the old city-wall," says Weissbach, "there can be no doubt, and the name Sur, 'city-wall,' given it by the Arabs, proves that they have fully recognized its nature." At the northern end it exists in its original extent, the plain out of which it rises being the old bed of the Euphrates, which, in the course of the cents., has become filled up by the desert-sand. At the period of Babylon's glory, the river had a much straighter course than at present, but it reoccupies its old bed about 600 meters (656 yds.) S. of Babil, leaving it afterward to make a sharp bend to the W. From the point where the city wall first becomes recognizable on the N. to its apparent southernmost extremity is about 3 miles.

On the W. side of the river the traces of the wall are much less, the two angles, with the parts adjoining them, being all that is recognizable. Beginning on the N. where the Euphrates has reached its mid-point in its course through the city, it runs westward about 547 yds.

19. The Western Walls

(500 meters) W.S.W., and then, bending almost at a right angle S.S.E., turns E. again toward the Euphrates, but is lost in the plain before reaching the river. The distance of the two angles from each other is about 1 mile, 208 yds. (1,800 meters), and its distance from the Euphrates is at most $\frac{2}{3}$ of a mile (1 kilometer). The western portion of the city therefore formed a rectangle with an area of about 1.8 miles, and the eastern quarter, with the projection on the N., $6\frac{1}{4}$ square miles. According to Fried. Delitzsch, the size of Babylon was about the same as Munich or Dresden. This, of course, is an estimate from the extant remains—as has been indicated above, there was probably a large suburban extension beyond the walls, which would account for the enormous size attributed to the city by the ancients.

Among the Arabs, the northern ruin is called Babil, though it is only the remains of a palace. Its present height is 30 meters (98 ft., 5 in.), and its rectangular outline is still easily recognizable. Its sides face the cardinal points, the longest being those of the N. and S. This building, which measures 100 meters (109 yds.), was well protected by the city wall on the N. and E., the Euphrates protecting it on the W. Continuing to the S., the path at present leads through orchards and palm-groves, beyond which is a rugged tract evidently containing the remains of ancient structures, probably of inconsiderable height. After further palm-groves, an enormous ruin is encountered, steep on the E. and S., sloping on the N. and W. This is the Qasr (Qasr), also called Emjellibeh (Mujellibah), "the overturned," identical with the great palace of Nabopolassar and his son Nebuchadnezzar, referred to so prominently by the latter king in his records. Its longest side skirts the old Euphrates bed, and measures 300 meters (328 yds.). Its surface is very uneven, projections of 15 meters (over 49 ft.) alternating with deep depressions. On the N.W. side enormous walls of exceedingly hard yellow brick still tower to a considerable height. S. of this the plain, broken only by a few inconsiderable mounds, extends for a distance of half a kilometer ($\frac{1}{2}$ mile), and terminates on the S. with another enormous ruin-mound, called Ishan Amran ibn 'Ali. It measures 600 meters (656 yds.) from N. to S., and 400 (437 yds.) from E. to W., its average height being 25 meters (82 ft.). About the middle, and close to each other, are two Moslem domed tombs, the first called Ibrahim al-Khalil ("Abraham the Friend" [of God]—probably a late addition to the name of another Abraham than the Patriarch), and the other Amran ibn 'Ali, from which the ruin receives its modern name.

Near the S. termination of the plain on which the village of Jim-jimeh lies, there is a square depression several yards deep, measuring nearly 100 meters (over 100 yds.) each way. In the middle of this depression, the sides of which do not quite face the cardinal points, there rises, to a height of about 13 ft., a platform of sun-dried brick about 60 meters (197 ft.) each way, its sides being parallel with the outer boundary of the depression. This depression, at present called Sahan, "the dish," is partly filled with foundation-water. Centered in its southern side is a rectangular hollowing-out similarly formed, about 50 meters (164 ft.) long, extending toward the ruin called Amran.

E. of the Qasr and Emjellibeh are several mounds bearing the name of Ehmerch, so called from the principal mound on the S.E., named

Ishan al-Oheimar, "the red ruin," from the color of its bricks. Close to the S.E. corner of the Qasr lies the ruin called Merkes, "the central-point," and to the S. of that again is a long and irregularly shaped mound bearing the name of

22. The Central and Southern Ruins

Ishan al-Aswad, "the black ruin." From this enumeration of the principal remains on the site of Babylon, it will be easily seen that public buildings in this, the most ancient quarter of the city, were exceedingly numerous. Indeed, the district was regarded as being of such importance that the surrounding walls were not thought altogether sufficient to protect it, so another seemingly isolated rampart, on the E., was built, running N. and S., as an additional protection.

The remains on the western side of the river are insignificant, the changed course of the river being in all probability responsible for the destruction of at least some of the buildings.

There is much work to be done before a really complete reconstruction of the oldest quarter of thing may be said about the sights to be seen when taking a walk through the more interesting portion, which, as we know from Herodotus' narrative, could be visited by strangers, though it is possible that permission had to be obtained beforehand. Entering by the Uraš-gate, some distance to the E. of the Euphrates, one found oneself in Aa-ibur-šabû, the Festival-street, which was a continuation of the royal roadway without the inner wall, coming from the S. This street ran alongside the Arahtu canal, on its western bank. After a time, one had the small temple of Ninip on the right (on the other side of the canal), and E-sagila, the great temple of Belus, on the left. This celebrated shrine was dedicated to Merodach and other deities associated with him, notably his spouse Zēr-panītu (= Juno), and Nebo, "the teacher," probably as the one who inculcated Merodach's faith. The shrine of Merodach therein, which was called E-kua, is said by Nebuchadrezzar to have been magnificently decorated, and into the temple itself that king had caused to be brought many costly gifts, acquired by him in the lands over which he had dominion. Connected with E-sagila on the N.W. by a causeway and probably a staircase, was the great temple-tower E-temen-an-ki, which, as is indicated above, is not now represented by a tower, but by a depression, the bricks having been employed, it is said, to repair the Hindiyeḥ canal. This great building was a striking monument of the city, and must have been visible for a considerable distance, its height being something over 300 ft. The stages of which it was composed are thought to have been colored like those of the similar tower laid bare by the French excavations at Khorsabad (Dār-Sarru-ukīn) in Assyria. Causeways or streets united this building with Aa-ibur-šabû, the festival-street along which the traveler is supposed to be proceeding. Continuing to the N., the visitor crossed a canal at right angles, named Lībil-ḥēgallī, "may he [the god] bring fertility," and found himself immediately opposite the royal palace—the extensive building now known as the Qasr. According to Weissbach, its area occupied no less than 4½ hectares (rather more than 11 acres) and it was divided, as we know from the inscriptions of Nebuchadrezzar, into two parts, connected by a corridor. The building was richly decorated, as the Babylonians understood such things, the interior walls being lined with enameled brick and other material.

Passing along the eastern side of the palace, the visitor came to the Istar-gate—a massive doorway faced with enameled brick in Nebuchadrezzar's time, and decorated with colored enameled reliefs of the lion, the bull and the dragon of Babylon. On the right of this gateway was to be seen the temple of the goddess Nin-mah, Merodach's spouse—a temple of sun-dried brick with traces of white coloring. It was a celebrated shrine of the Babylonians, in the usual architectural style with recessed buttresses, but modest from our modern point of view. Nin-mah was the goddess of reproduction, who, under the name of Aruru, had aided Merodach to create mankind, hence the honor in which she was held by the Babylonians.

The Istar-gate was apparently a part of the more ancient fortifications of Babylon, but which portion of the primitive city it enclosed is doubtful. In the time of Nebuchad-

24. The Istar-Gate and the "Middle-Palace" rezzar it pierced the continuation, as it were, of the wall on the western bank of the river. Passing through this gateway, the visitor saw, on the W., the "middle-palace," an enormous structure, built by Nebuchadrezzar, as he boasts, in 15 days—a statement which seems somewhat of an exaggeration, when we come to consider the massiveness of the walls, some of which have a thickness of several yards. He describes this as having been "a fortress" (dāru), "mountainlike" (šadaniš), and on its summit he built an abode for himself—a "great palace," which was joined with his father's palace on the S. of the intervening wall. It is possibly this latter which was built in 15 days—not the whole structure, including the fortress. It was raised "high as the forests," and decorated with cedar and all kinds of costly woods, its doors being of palm, cedar, cypress, ebony(?) and ivory, framed in silver and gold, and plated with copper. The thresholds and hinges of its gates were bronze, and the cornice round its top was in (an imitation of) lapis-lazuli. It was a house for men to admire; and it is not improbable that this was the palace upon which he was regarded as having been walking when he referred to "great Babylon," which he had built.

But the street Aa-ibur-šabû, along which the visitor is conceived to be walking, was also a highly decorated causeway, fitted for the

25. The Festival-Street pathway of the great gods. Its width varied from 11 to 22 yds., and it was paved with regularly hewn and fitted natural stones—limestone and a brownish-red stone with white veins—while its walls were provided with a covering of brick enameled in various colors with representations of lions, some of them in relief. The inscriptions which it bore were white on a rich dark-blue ground, also enameled. There were various other streets in Babylon, but these have still to be identified.

At the end of the Procession-street, and at right angle to it, was the Merodach canal, which com-

In close connection with this was the Temple of Offerings (Bīt nikē) or festival-house (Bīt ākiti). Concerning these places more information is needed, but it would seem that, before Nebuchadrezzar's time, the Chamber of Fates was simply decorated with silver—he, however, made it glorious with pure gold. It is at this point that the Procession-street is at its widest. The position of the Temple of Offerings is at present uncertain.

27. The Northern Palace and the Gardens called Babil. This was likewise built by Nebuchadrezzar, but it may be doubted whether it was really founded by him.

The presence of traces of wells here made Hormuzd Rassam think that this was probably the site of the Hanging Gardens, but further exploration is needed to decide the point, though it may be regarded as not unlikely that this identification is correct. In that case it would represent the palace shown in the Assyrian saloon at the British Museum—a building apparently protected by three walls, and adorned with columns resting on the backs of lions in an attitude of walking. On the adjoining slab is a representation of a small building—also with columns—on a hill. A figure of a king sculptured on a stele is seen on the left, with an altar in front of it, showing that divine honors were paid to him. The hill is thickly wooded with trees which may be olives, poplars, etc., and on the right is a series of arches on which other trees are planted. Irrigation channels stretch in a long stream to the left and in shorter streams to the right. As this belongs to the time of Aššur-bani-āpli, about 650 BC, and refers to that king's operations against his brother Šamaš-šum-ukīn, the king of Babylon, it is clear that something similar to the Hanging Gardens existed before the time of Nebuchadnezzar, and therefore, if it was his queen who had them made, before the time of their reputed founder. This would be the point first reached by the Assyrian army when advancing to the attack. Such a park as is represented here with its hills and streams, and thickly planted trees, must have made the palace in the vicinity the pleasantest, in all probability, in all Babylonia, and excited the admiration of every one who visited the sights of the city.

The architectural history of the city of Babylon has still to be written, but something is already known about it, especially its central point of interest, the great temple 28. Historical References to Babylonian Buildings E-sagila, wherein Merodach was worshipped. The 5th year of Sumu-la-ila was known as that in which the great fortress of Babylon was built; and his 22d was that in which a throne of gold and silver was completed and made for Merodach's supreme abode (paramaša). Later on Abil-Sin, in his 17th year, made a throne(?) for Šamaš of Babylon; and Hammu-rabi, in his 3rd, 12th and 14th years, also made thrones for the gods—Nannar of Babylon (the Moon-god), Zēr-panītu^m, Merodach's consort, and Ištar of Babylon. Samsu-iluna, his son, in his 6th year, placed a "praying statue" in E-sagila before Merodach, followed, in his 8th, by the dedication of some bright-shining object (mace?) of gold and silver, to the god; and on that occasion it is stated that he made E-sagila to shine like the stars of heaven. Passing over many other references to kings who adorned the temples of the city, the work done there by Agukakrime (cir 1480 BC) may be mentioned. This ruler, who belonged to the Kassite dynasty, not only brought back the images of Merodach and Zēr-panītu^m to their temple, but also restored the building and its shrine, and made rich offerings thereto. Later on, after the destruction of the city by Sennacherib, his son Esarhaddon, and his grandsons Šamaš-šum-ukīn, king of Babylon, and Aššur-bani-āpli, king of Assyria, all took part in the restoration of Babylon's temples and palaces. The work of Nabopolassar and Nebuchadnezzar has already been referred to. In 330 BC (reign of Alexander the Great), an attempt was made, by the tithes of the pious, to clear away the rubbish around E-sangil (E-sagila), but to all appearance no real restorations were made—or, at least, the stage at which they could have been put in hand was not reached. In the year 269 BC Antiochus Soter claims, like Nebuchadnezzar and other Bab lings, to have restored the temples E-sagila and E-zida (the latter at Borsippa). Though in late times the temples were more or less dilapidated, the services to all appearance continued to be performed, and may even have gone on until well in the Christian era, Bab religion and philosophy being still held in honor as late as the 4th cent. The downfall of Babylon as a city began with the founding of Seleucia on the Tigris, in the reign of Seleucus Nicator (after 312 BC). The inhabitants of Babylon soon began to migrate to this new site, and the ruined houses and walls of the old capital ultimately became the haunts of robbers and outlaws. It is said that the walls were demolished by later (Seleucid) kings on that account, and it is not improbable that, with the walls, any houses which may have remained habitable were cleared away. Fortunately, the palaces restored by Nebuchadnezzar were too firmly built to be easily demolished, hence their preservation to the present day.

BABEL, TOWER OF: This expression does not occur in the OT, but is used popularly for the tower (מִגְדֹּל, mighdöl) built by the inhabitants of the world who, traveling in the East, built a city on the Plain of Shinar, with a tower "whose top may reach unto heaven"—an expression which is regarded as meaning "a very high tower."

There was a great difference, however, between a Can mighdöl or watchtower, and the great Tower at Babylon. The watchtower was simply a high structure, probably without any special shape or form, which depended upon the will of the architect and the nature of the ground upon which it was erected. The Tower of Babel or Babylon, however, was a structure peculiar to Babylonia and Assyria. According to all accounts, and judging from the ruins of the various erections extant in those countries, Bab towers were always rectangular, built in stages, and provided with an inclined ascent continued along each side to the top. As religious ceremonies were performed thereon, they were generally surmounted by a chapel in which sacred objects or images were kept.

These erections had, with the Babylonians, a special name: zigurrātu, meaning, apparently, "peak," or the highest point of a mountain, this word being applied to the mountain-height upon which Ut-napištim, the Bab Noah, offered sacrifices on coming forth from the ark (or ship) when the waters of the great Flood had sufficiently subsided. It has also been thought that they were used as observatories when the Babylonians studied the starry heavens. This is probable, but as these structures were of no great height, it is possible that, in the clear atmosphere of the Bab plains, there was no real necessity to go above the surface of the earth when making their observations.

There has been much difference of opinion as to the geographical position of the Tower of Babel. Most writers upon the subject, following the tradition handed down by the Jews and Arabs, have identified it with the great Temple of Nebo in the city of Borsippa, now called the Birs-Nimroud (explained as a corruption of Birj Nimroud, "Tower of Nimrod"). This building, however, notwithstanding its importance, was to all appearance never regarded by the Babylonians as the Tower of Babel, for the very good reason that it was not situated in Babylon, but in Borsippa, which, though called, in later times, "the second Babylon," was naturally not the original city of that name. The erection regarded by the Babylonians as the great Tower of their ancient city was Ē-temen-ana-ki, "the Temple of the foundation of heaven and earth," called by Nabopolassar and Nebuchadrezzar ziggurat Bābili, "the Tower of Babylon"—the world-renowned fane dedicated to Merodach and his consort Zēr-panītu, Babylon's chief deities.

This structure was situated in the southern portion of the city, not far from the right bank of the Euphrates, and according to Weissbach, is now represented by a depression within which is the original rectangular core of unbaked brick. From its shape, the Arabs have made this site Sahan, "the dish." These remains of the great temple-tower of Babylon, within the memory of men not so very old, towered, even in its ruined state, high above the surrounding plain. The burnt bricks of the ancient Babylonians, however, who "had brick for stone, and slime [bitumen] for mortar" (11 3 m), are still good and have a commercial value, so they were all cleared out, with whatever precious material in the way of antiquities they may have contained, to repair, it is said, the banks of the Hindiyeh Canal. Certain records in the shape of conical "cylinders," however, came into the market, and were acquired by the museums of Europe and America. As these refer to the restoration of the building by Nabopolassar, and the part taken by his sons Nebuchadrezzar and Nabû-šum-lišir in the ceremonies attending the rebuilding, it is very probable that they formed part of the spoils acquired.

Ē-temen-ana-ki, to give the Bab (Sumerian) name, consisted of six stages built upon a platform, and provided with a sanctuary at the top. A tablet seemingly giving a detailed description of this building was for a time in the hands of the late George Smith in the year 1876. Unfortunately he had not time to give a tr of the document, or to publish the text, but his detailed account of it (Athenaeum, February 12, 1876) is exceedingly interesting.

First there was the outer court called the "grand court," measuring, according to G. Smith's estimate, 1,156 ft. by 900 ft., and a smaller one, called "the court of Ištar and Zagaga," 1,056 ft. by 450 ft. Round the court were six gates admitting to the temples: (1) the grand gate; (2) the gate of the rising sun (east); (3) the great gate; (4) the gate of the colossi; (5) the gate of the canal; and (6) the gate of the tower-view.

After this came a space or platform apparently walled—a ki-gallu square in form, and measuring 3 ku each way. Its size is doubtful, as the value of the ku is unknown. The sides of this inclosure faced the cardinal points. In its walls were four gates, one on each side, and named from the points toward which they looked. Within this inclosure stood a large building measuring 10 gar (Smith: 200 ft.) each way. Unfortunately, the name of this erection was damaged, so that its nature and use are uncertain.

Round the base of the Tower were small temples or chapels dedicated to the various gods of the Babylonians. On the E. were 16 shrines, the principal of them being dedicated to Nebo and Tašmētu, his spouse; on the N. were two temples dedicated to Ēa (Aê) and Nusku respectively; on the S. was a single temple to the two great gods, Anu and Bel (Enlil?). It was on the W., however, that the principal buildings lay—a double house with a court between the wings 35 cubits (Smith: 58 ft.) wide. These two wings were not alike in dimensions, the erection on one side being 100 cubits by 20 (166 ft. by 34 ft.) and on the other 100 cubits by 65 (166 ft. by 108 ft.). In these western chambers stood the couch of the god, and the golden throne mentioned by Herodotus, with other objects of great value. The couch was stated to have measured 9 cubits by 4 (15 ft. by 6 ft. 8 in.).

Building Inscription of Nabopolassar.
(Giving an account of his restoration of the Tower of Babel.)

In the center of these groups of buildings stood the great Tower in stages, called by the Babylonians "the Tower of Babel" (ziggurat Bābili).

8. The Tower in Its First Stage The stages decreased from the lowest upward, but each was square in plan. The first or foundation-stage was 15 gar each way by 5½ gar high (300 ft. by 110 ft. high), and seems to have been decorated with the usual double recesses which are a characteristic of Assy-Bab architecture.

The second stage was 13 gar square and 3 gar high (260 ft. by 60 ft.). A term was applied to it which G. Smith did not understand, but he notes that it probably had sloping sides. The stages from the 3d to the 5th were all of equal height, namely, 1 gar (20 ft.), and were respectively 10 gar (200 ft.), 8½ gar (170 ft.) and 7 gar (140 ft.) square. The dimensions of the 6th stage were omitted, but may be restored in accordance with the others, namely, 5½ gar sq. (110 ft.) by 1 gar (20 ft.) high.

On this was raised what Smith calls the 7th stage, namely, the upper temple or sanctuary of the god Bel-Merodach, 4 gar long, 3½ gar broad and 2½ gar high (80, 60 and 50 ft. respectively). He does not mention the statue of the god, but it may be supposed that it was set up in this topmost erection. The total height of the tower above its foundation was therefore 15 gar (300 ft.), the same as the breadth of its base. It cannot be said that it was by any means a beautiful erection, but there was probably some symbolism in its measurements, and in appearance it probably resembled (except the decoration) the temple-tower of Calah as restored in the frontispiece to Layard's Monuments of Nineveh, 1st series, in which a step-pyramid with a similarly high basement-stage is shown.

With this detailed description, which is quite what would be expected in a Bab account of such a celebrated fane, the description in 11. Herodotus (i.181 ff) agrees. He states that it was a temple square in form, two furlongs (1,213 ft.) each way, in the midst of which was built a solid tower a furlong square (nearly 607 ft.). This, however, must have been the platform, which, with the six stages and the chapel on the top, would make up the total of eight stages of which Herodotus speaks. The ascent by which the top was reached he describes as running "outside round about all the towers"—wording which suggests, though not necessarily, that it was spiral—i.e. one had to walk round the structure 7 times to reach the top. Representations on Bab boundary-stones suggest that this view would be correct, though a symmetrical arrangement of inclined paths might have been constructed which would have greatly improved the design. At the middle of the ascent, Herodotus says, there was a stopping-place with seats to rest upon, which rather favors this idea. At the top of the last tower there was a large cell, and in the cell a large couch was laid, well covered; and by it a golden table. There was no image there, nor did any human being spend the night there, except only a woman of the natives of the place chosen by the god, "as say the Chaldeans who are the priests of this god." These men told Herodotus that the god often came to the cell, and rested upon the couch, "but," he adds, "I do not believe them." After mentioning parallels to this at Egea Thebes and Patara in Lycia, he goes on to speak of another cell below (that referred to in G. Smith's tablet) wherein was a great image of Zeus (Bel-Merodach) sitting, with a footstool and a large table, all of gold, and weighing no less than 800 talents. Outside of this cell was an altar to the god, made of gold; and also another altar, whereon full-grown animals were sacrificed, the golden altar being for sucklings only. The Chaldeans also told him that there was, in the precincts of the building, a statue 12 cubits high, and of solid gold. Darius Hystaspis desired to take possession of this valuable object, but did not venture. His son Xerxes, however, was not so considerate of the feelings of the people and the priesthood, for he also killed the priest when he forbade him to meddle with it.

The Bible record does not state who the people were who journeyed in the East and built the city and the Tower. The indefinite "they" might be taken to mean whatever people were there at the time the record was written, and probably presupposes that the reader would certainly know. As the Tower of Babel bears, in the native inscriptions, a Sumero-Akkadian name, it may be supposed that the builders referred to belonged to that race. It is noteworthy that nothing is said in Gen concerning the stoppage of the erection, though they ceased to build the city. Bochart records a Jewish tradition which makes the tower to have been split through to its foundation by fire which fell from heaven—suggested probably by the condition of the tower at "the second Babylon," i.e. the Birs Nimroud. Another tradition, recorded by Eusebius (Prep. Evang., ix; Chronicon, 13; Syn-cel. Chron., 44) makes it to have been blown down by the winds; "but when it approached the heavens, the winds assisted the gods, and overturned the work upon its contrivers: and the gods introduced a diversity of tongues among men, who, until that time, had all spoken the same language." The place where they built the Tower was called Babylon, on account of the confusion of languages.

Here we have again the statement as 14. The in Gen that the meaning of Babel is Meaning "confusion." This, as is well known, of "Babel" is based upon the purely Heb etymological law, which makes balal, "to confuse," or "mingle," assume a reduplicate form; but as far as the cuneiform inscriptions, which are now very numerous, give us information, Babel, from balālu, "to mingle" (the root in question), was an impossibility. But on the Bab side, that the rendering of the name as Bāb-ili (-ilāni), "gate of god" ("of the gods") was a folk-etymology, is undoubted, notwithstanding that the Sumero-Akkadian form Ka-dingira, with the same meaning, is far from rare. It is noteworthy, however, that one of the forms used by Nebuchadrezzar is Bab-īlam, with the mimmation or "emming," which is a characteristic of the Bab language; moreover, a place-name Babalam also occurs, which may be a still earlier, and perhaps the original, form. Notwithstanding that one would like to see in Babalam, "the place of bringing together," and in Babīlam, "the bringer together," the termination -am would seem to be an insurmountable difficulty.

That the building of the city would have been stopped when the confusion of tongues took place is natural—the departure of the greater part of the inhabitants made this inevitable. When the population increased again, the building of the city was continued, with the result that 15. The part of the inhabitants made this Ultimate inevitable. When the population increased again, the building of the city was continued, with the result that Destruction creased again, the building of the city was continued, with the result that of the was continued, with the result that Tower Babylon ultimately became the greatest city of the then known world. The Tower, notwithstanding what had been said as to its destruction, remained, and when, as happened from time to time, its condition became ruinous, some energetic Bab king would restore it. Alexander and Philip of Macedon began clearing away the rubbish to rebuild the great temple of Belus (Bel-Merodach) connected with it and there is hardly any doubt that the Tower would have been restored likewise, but the untimely death of the former, and the deficient mental caliber of the latter for the ruling of a great empire, put an end to the work. The Tower therefore remained unrepaired—"The tower was exceedingly tall. The third part of it sank down into the ground, a second third was burned down, and the remaining third was standing until the time of the destruction of Babylon" (Rabbi Yēhānān, Sanhedhrin, 109, 1).

Concerning the reputed intention of the builders of the Tower, to carry it as high as the heavens, that, notwithstanding the Talm and other writings, may be dismissed at once. The intention was to build a very high tower, and that is all that is implied by the words employed. That the Babylonians would have liked their tower to reach heaven may be conceded, and the idea may be taken as symbolical of Babylon's pride, the more especially as they regarded it as "the house of the foundation of heaven and earth." Though at present brought lower than the other temple-towers of Babylonia, its renown remains as one of the great glories of that renowned capital. Dedicated as it was to the gods whom they worshipped, and chiefly to the glory of Merodach, the representative of Bab monotheism, the Babylonians' descendants, the native Christians, have no reason to remember this erection of their forefathers with shame, but rather with pride. The rallying-point of nations, Babylon, while it existed, was always a great commercial center, and many are the languages which have resounded in the Tower's vicinity. The confusion of tongues led to the Jewish fiction that the air of Babylon and Borsippa caused forgetfulness, and was therefore injurious to students of the Law, causing them to forget it as the builders of the Tower had of old forgotten their speech (Rashi, Sanhedrin, 109, 1). This, however, did not prevent the rabbis of Babylon from being more celebrated than those of the Holy Land, and even of Jerus itself. See also ASTRONOMY.

BABI, bā'bi (A, Βαβί, Babí; B, Βαίρ, Baíēr) = Bebai (Ezr 8 11). The descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerus (1 Esd 8 37).

BABYLON IN THE NT: Babylon (Βαβυλῶν, Babulôn), is used in NT in at least two different senses:

In Mt 1 11.12.17; Acts 7 43 the old Mesop city is plainly meant. These all refer to the captivity in Babylon and do not demand any further discussion.

1. Mesopotamian Babylon All the references to Babylon in Rev are evidently symbolic. Some of the most important passages are 14 8; 16 19; 17 5; 18 2.10.21. In 17 5 Babylon is designated as mustérion. This undoubtedly indicates that the name is to be understood.

2. Symbolic Sense A few interpreters have believed that Jerus was the city that was designated as Babylon, but most scholars hold that Rome was the city that was meant. That interpretation goes back at least to the time of Tertullian (Adv. Marc., iii.13). This interpretation was adopted by Jerome and Augustine and has been commonly accepted by the church. There are some striking facts which point to Rome as the city that is designated as Babylon.

(1) The characteristics ascribed to this Babylon apply to Rome rather than to any other city of that age: (a) as ruling over the kings of the earth (17 18); (b) as sitting on seven mountains (17 9); (c) as the center of the world's merchandise (18 3.11-13); (d) as the corrupter of the nations (17 2; 18 3; 19 2); (e) as the persecutor of the saints (17 6).

(2) Rome is designated as Babylon in the Sibylline Oracles (5 143), and this is perhaps an early Jewish portion of the book. The comparison of Rome to Babylon is common in Jewish apocalyptic literature (see 2 Esd and the Apoc Bar).

(3) Rome was regarded by both Jews and Christians as being antagonistic to the kingdom of God, and its downfall was confidently expected. This conception is in accord with the predicted downfall of Babylon (Rev 14 8; 18 2.10-21). As Babylon had been the oppressor of Israel, it was natural that this new power, which was oppressing the people of God, should be designated as Babylon.

In 5 13 Babylon is designated as the place from which 1 Pet was written. Down to the time of the Reformation this was generally understood to mean Rome, and two cursives added "en Roma." Since the Reformation, many scholars have followed Erasmus and Calvin and have urged that the Mesop Babylon is meant. Three theories should be noted:

(1) That the Egypt Babylon, or Old Cairo, is meant. Strabo (XVII, 807) who wrote as late as 18 AD, says the Egypt Babylon was a strong fortress, founded by certain refugees from the Mesop

Babylon. But during the 1st cent. this was not much more than a military station, and it is quite improbable that Peter would have gone there. There is no tradition that connects Peter in any way with Egypt.

(2) That the statement is to be taken lit. and that the Mesop Babylon is meant. Many good scholars hold to this view, and among these are Weiss and Thayer, but there is no evidence that Peter was ever in Babylon, or that there was even a church there during the 1st cent. Mark and Silvanus are associated with Peter in the letter and there is no tradition that connects either of them with Babylon. According to Jos (Ant., XVIII, ix, 5-9), the Jews at this time had largely been driven out of Babylon and were confined to neighboring towns, and it seems improbable that Peter would have made that his missionary field.

(3) That Rome was the city that was designated as Babylon. The Apocalypse would indicate that the churches would understand the symbolic reference, and it seems to have been so understood until the time of the Reformation. The denial of this position was in line with the effort to refute Peter's supposed connection with the Rom church. Ancient tradition, however, makes it seem quite probable that Peter did make a visit to Rome (see Lightfoot, Clement, II, 493 ff).

Internal evidence helps to substantiate the theory that Rome was the place from which the letter was written. Mark sends greetings (1 Pet 5 13), and we know he had been summoned to Rome by the apostle Paul (2 Tim 4 11). The whole passage, "She that is in Babylon, elect together with you, saluteth you," seems to be fig., and that being true, it is natural that Babylon should have been used instead of Rome. The character of the letter as a whole would point to Rome as the place of writing. Ramsay thinks this book is impregnated with Rom thought beyond any other book in the Bible (see The Church in the Rom Empire, 286).

Babylonia is a plain which is made up of the alluvial deposits of the mountainous regions in the North, where the Tigris and Euphrates have their source. The land is bounded on the N. by Assyria and Mesopotamia; on the E. by Elam, separated by the mountains of Elam; on the S. by the sea marshes, and the country Kaidu (Chaldaeae); and on the W. by the Syrian desert. Some of the cities of the lower country were seaport towns in the early period, but now are far inland. This land-making process continues even at the present time at the rate of about 70 ft. a year.

This plain, in the days when Babylonia flourished, sustained a dense population. It was covered with a network of canals, skilfully planned and regulated, which brought prosperity to the land, because of the wonderful fertility of the soil. The neglect of these canals and doubtless, also, the change of climate, have resulted in altered conditions in the country. It has become a cheerless waste. During some months of the year, when the inundations take place, large portions of the land are partially covered with swamps and marshes. At other times it looks like a desolate plain.

Throughout the land there are seen, at the present time, ruin-hills or mounds of accumulation of debris, which mark the site of ancient cities.

1. Mounds Some of these cities were destroyed in a very early era, and were never rebuilt. Others were occupied for millenniums, and their history extends far into the Christian era. The antiquities generally found in the upper stratum of the mounds which were occupied up to so late a period, show that they were generally inhabited by the Jews, who lived there after the Babylonians had disappeared.

The excavations conducted at various sites have resulted in the discovery, besides antiquities of almost every character, of hundreds of thousands of inscriptions on clay and stone, but principally on the former material. At Tello more than 60,000 tablets were found, belonging largely to the administrative archives of the temple of the 3d millennium BC. At Nippur about 50,000 inscriptions were found, many of these also belonging to temple archives. But about 20,000 tablets and fragments found in that city came from the library of the school of the priests, which had been written in the 3d millennium BC. At Sippar, fully 30,000 tablets were found, many being of the same general character, also representing a library. At Delehem and Djokha, temple archives of the same period as those found at Tello have come to light in great numbers, through the illicit diggings of Arabs. Babylon, Borsippa, Kish, Erech and many other cities have yielded to the explorer and the Arab diggers inscribed documents of every period of Bab history, and embracing almost every kind of lit., so that the museums and libraries of America and Europe have stored up unread inscriptions numbering hundreds of thousands. Many also ancient history of the Babylonians will be reconstructed by the help of these original sources. Lengthy family genealogies will be known, as indeed in some instances is now the case, as well as the Bab contemporaries of Ezekiel, Abraham and all the other Bib. characters.

The Gr name of Babylonia which is in use at the present time is derived from the name of the city of Babylon, the capital and chief city

3. Names of the land from the time of the First Dynasty of Babylon, about 2000 BC (see BABYLON). The name of the land in the very earliest period which is represented by antiquities, and even inscribed objects, is not known. But in a comparatively early age the northern part is called Uri, and the southern part, Engi or En-gira. The second part of the latter name is perhaps the same as in Su-gir, which is thought to be the origin of the OT Shinar. Su-gir and Su-mer are names of the same country. And inasmuch as Mer and Gir were names of the same west Sem deity, who played an important rôle in the early history of Babylonia, it is not improbable that the element Su is also to be identified with the ancient name of Mesopotamia. Su is also in Su-bartu, the name of the country to the N. This name is also written Su-Gir.

Subsequent to 2000 BC the ideograms read in Sumerian, Uri and Engi, were pronounced in Sem-Bab, Accad and Sumer. The former received its name from the capital of the kingdom Accad, one of the cities mentioned in Gen 10 10. The title, "king of Accad and Sumer" was used by rulers as late as the 1st millennium BC.

The name by which the land is known in the 2d millennium BC is Kar-Duniash, the exact derivation of which is in doubt. Kar means "garden, land" in Sem and Sumerian; and Duniash being preceded by the determinative for deity, has been regarded as a name of a Cassite god. A more recently advanced explanation is that Duniash is equivalent to Bêl-matâti, which means "lord of are in the possession of private individuals. After the work of excavating Babylonia has been completed and the inscriptions deciphered, many of the pre-Christian cents. in Bab history will be better known than some of those of our Christian era. The lands." The meaning of the name, as stated, must be regarded as undetermined.

In the time of the late Assyrian empire a nation in the extreme southern part of the land, called by the Greeks Chaldaea, which is derived from the name Kaidu, came into existence. In the Assyrian historical inscriptions the land is usually called Bit-Yakin. This people seems to have issued from Aram. Under Nabopolassar they ruled Babylonia for a time. The Neo-Babylonian Dynasty, founded by Nabopolassar, is supposed to be Chaldaean in origin, in consequence of which the whole land in the Greek period was called Chaldaea.

The home of the Semites has been placed in different parts of the ancient world. A number of scholars look to Arabia and others

6. Home of the Semites to Africa for their original habitation, although their theories generally are not based upon much archaeological evidence. Unquestionably, the previous, if not the original home of the Semite Babylonians, is to be found in the land of the Amorites, that is in Syria. In the earliest known period of Babylonian history, which apparently belongs to the age not very far removed from the time when the Semites entered Babylonia, Amurru was an important factor in the affairs of

FRAGMENTS OF INSCRIBED VASES OF THE EARLY SUMERIAN PERIOD.

Two distinct races are found occupying the land when we obtain the first glimpses of its history.

The northern part is occupied by the Semites, who are closely allied to the Amorites, Aramaeans and Arabs; and the southern part by a non-Semite people called Sumerians. Their cultures had been originally distinct, but when they first become known to us there has taken place such an amalgamation that it is only by the knowledge of other Semite cultures that it is possible to make even a partial differentiation of what was Sem-Bab and what was Sumerian. The Semites, it would almost seem, entered the land after the Sumerians had established themselves, but this can only be regarded as a conjecture.

4. Semites Although the earliest Sumerian settlement belongs to a remote period, few traces of the pre-historic Sumerian have been found. The archaeological remains indicate that this non-Semite race is not indigenous to the land, and that when they came

5. Sumerians into the country they had already attained to a fair degree of culture. But there is no evidence, as yet, in what part of the ancient world the elements of their culture were evolved, although various attempts have been made by scholars to locate their original home.

the nations, and it was a land which the world conquerors of Babylonia, both Sumerian and Semite, endeavored to subjugate. This points to the fact that the culture of Amurru was then already old. Egyptian inscriptions fully substantiate this. We look to the land of the Amorites as the home of the Semite Babylonians, because of the important part played by the chief god of that land Amurru or Uru, in the Babylonian religion and nomenclature. In fact nearly all of the original names of the Semite Babylonian sun-deities are derived from the names and epithets of the great Sun-god of the Amorites and Aramaeans (see Amurru, 108 ff). These and many other considerations point to Amurru, or the land of the Amorites, as the previous home of the Semites who migrated into Babylonia and who eventually became masters of the land.

The original settlements in Babylonia, as stated above, belong to a prehistoric time, but throughout the history of the land fresh Semite migrations have been recognized. In the

7. Immigrations Isin and First Dynasty of Babylonia, Amorites or Canaanites seem to flood the country. In the 2d millennium a foreign people known as Cassites ruled Babylonia for nearly six centuries. The nomenclature of the period shows that many Hittites and Mittanians as well as Cassites lived in Babylonia. In the 1st millennium the thousands of names that appear in the contract lit. indicate a veritable Babel of races: Egyptians, Elamites, Persians, Medes, Tabalites, Hittites, Cassites, Ammorites, Edomites, notably Hebrews, are among the peoples that occupied the land. The deportation of the Israelites by the Assyrian kings and of the Jews by the Bab. kings, find confirmation besides the historical inscriptions in the names of Hebrews living in Babylonia in the corresponding periods.

The languages of Babylonia are Sem and Sumerian. The latter is an agglutinative tongue like the Turkish, and belongs to that great unclassifiable group of languages, called for the sake of convenience, Turanian. It has not been shown, as yet, to be allied to any other known language.

The Sem language known as the Bab., with which the Assyrian is practically identical, is of the common Sem stock. After the Semites entered the land, their language was greatly influenced by the Sumerian tongue. The Semites being originally dependent upon the Sumerian scribes, with whom the script had originated, considered in connection with the fact that the highly developed culture of the Sumerians greatly influenced that of the Semites, brought about the peculiar amalgamation known as Bab. The language is, however, distinctively Sem, but it has a very large percentage of Sumerian loan-words. Not knowing the cognate tongues of the Sumerian, and having a poor understanding of the pronunciation of that language, it is impossible to ascertain, on the other hand, how much the Sumerian language was influenced by the Sem.

In the late period another Sem tongue was used extensively in the land. It was not because of the position occupied by the Aramaeans in the political history of western Asia, that their language became the lingua franca of the 1st millennium BC. It must have been on account of the widespread migrations of the people. In the time of Sennacherib it seems to have been used as the diplomatic language in Assyria as well as among the Hebrews, as the episode in 2 K 18 26 would show. Then we recall the story of Belshazzar, and the edicts of the late period referred to in the OT, which were in Aram. (Ezr 4 7, etc.). In Assyria and Babylonia, many contract tablets have been found with Aram. reference notes written upon them, showing that this was the language of those who held the documents. The Hebrews after the exile used Aramaic. This would seem to point to Babylonia as the place where they learned the language. The Bab. language and the cuneiform script continued to be used until the 3d or 2d cent. BC, and perhaps even later, but it seems that the Aram. had generally supplanted it, except as the literary and legal language. In short the tongue of the common people or the spoken language in all probability in the late period was Aramaic.

The cuneiform writing upon clay was used both by the Sumerians and the Semites. Whether this script had its origin in the land, or in the earlier home of the Sumerians, remains a question. It is now known that the Elamites had their own system of writing as early as that of the earliest found in Babylonia; and perhaps it will be found that other ancient peoples, who are at the present unknown to us, also used the cuneiform script. A writing similar to the Bab. was in use at an early time in Cappadocia. The Hittites and other peoples of that region also employed it. The origin of the use of clay as a writing material, therefore, is shrouded in mystery, but as stated above, the system used by the Semites in Babylonia was developed from the Sumerian.

The script is not alphabetic, but ideographic and phonetic, in that respect similar to the Chinese. There are over 500 characters, each one of which has from one to many values. The combination of two or more characters also has many values. The compilation of the values of the different signs used in various periods by both the Sumerians and Assyrians numbers at the present about 25,000, and the number will probably reach 30,000.

The architecture of Babylonia is influenced by the fact that the building material, in this alluvial plain, had to be of brick, which was largely sun-dried, although in certain prosperous eras there is much evidence of kiln-dried bricks having been used. The baked brick used in the earliest period was the smallest ever employed, being about the size of the ordinary brick used at the present time. The size of the bricks in the era prior to the 3d millennium varied from this to about 6×10×3 in. At Nippur, Sargon and his son Naram-Sin used a brick, the largest found, about 20 in. square, and about 4 in. in thickness. Following the operations of these kings at Nippur is the work of Ur-Engur, who used a brick about 14 in. square and nearly 4 in. in thickness. This size had been used at Tello prior to Sargon's time, and was thereafter generally employed. It remained the standard size of brick throughout the succeeding cents. of Bab. history. Adobes, of which the greater portion of the buildings were constructed, were usually double the thickness of kiln-dried bricks. The pillar made of bricks, as well as the pilaster constructed of the same material, seems to have come into use at a very early age, as is shown by the excavations at Tello.

A large number of Bab. builders had the brick makers employ brick stamps which gave their names and frequently their titles, besides the name of the temple for which the bricks were intended. These enable the excavator to determine who the builders or restorers were of the buildings uncovered. Naturally, in a building like the temple of Enlil at Nippur, inscribed bricks of many builders covering a period of over 2,000 years were found. These by the help of building inscriptions, which have been found, enable scholars to rewrite considerable of the history of certain Bab. temples. The walls of the city were also built of clay bricks, principally adobes. The walls usually were of very great thickness.

Clay was also employed extensively in the manufacture of images, weights, drains, playthings, such as animals, baby rattles, etc., and of inscriptions of every kind. Pottery, with the exception of the blue glaze employed in the late period, was usually plain, although some traces of painted pottery have been found. Although every particle of stone found in Babylonia was carried into the country, either by man or by inundations, still in certain periods it was used freely for statues, steles, votive objects, and in all periods for door sockets, weights and seal cylinders. Building operations in stone are scarcely known in Babylonia until perhaps the time of the greatest of all ancient builders, Nebuchadrezzar II, who laid a pavement in the causeway of Babylon, Aa-ibur-sabu, with blocks of stone from a mountain quarry. See BABYLON.

The sculpture of the Sumerians, although in most instances the hardest of materials was used, is one of the great achievements of their civilization. Enough examples have been found to trace the development of their art from comparatively rude reliefs of the archaic period to the finished sculpture of Gudea's time, 3d millennium BC, when it reached a high degree of excellence. The work of the sculpture of this age shows spirit and originality in many respects unique. In the earliest period the Babylonians attempted the round, giving frequently the main figures in full face. The perfection of detail, in their efforts to render true to life, makes their modeling very superior in the history of art. The Sumerian seems to have been able to overcome difficulties of technique which later sculptors systematically avoided.

Practically every Babylonian had his own personal seal. He used it as the signature is used at the present time or rather as the little stamp upon which is engraved the name of the individual at the present time, in the Orient, to make an impression upon the letter which was written for him by a public scribe. Thousands of these ancient seals have been found. They were cut out of all kinds of stone and metal. The style in the early period was usually cylindrical, with a hole passing lengthwise through them. In the late period the signet was commonly used. Many of these gems were exquisitely cut by lapidists of rare ability. Some of the very best work of this art belongs to the 3d millennium BC. The boldness in outline, and the action displayed are often remarkable. The most delicate saws, drills and other tools must have been employed by the early lapidist. Some of his early work is scarcely surpassed in the present age.

The gold and silver smiths of the early age have left us some beautiful examples of their art and skill. A notable one is the silver vase of Entemena of Lagash, mounted on a bronze pedestal, which stands on four feet. There is a votive inscription engraved about its neck. The bowl is divided into two compartments. On the upper are engraved seven heifers, and on the lower four eagles with extended wings, in some respects related to the totem or the coat of arms of Lagash. While attention to detail is too pronounced, yet the whole is well rendered and indicates remarkable skill, no less striking than the well-known work of their Egypt contemporaries. Bronze was also used extensively for works of art and utensils. Some remarkable specimens of this craft have been found at Tello.

In studying the magnificent remains of their art, one is thoroughly impressed with the skill displayed, and with the fact that there must have been a long period of development prior to the age to which these works belong, before such creations could have been possible. Although much of the craftsman's work is crude, there is considerable in the sculpture and engraving that is well worthy of study. And in studying these remains one is also impressed with the fact that they were produced in an alluvial plain.

Statue of Gudea from Tello.

The literature in a narrow sense is almost entirely confined to the epics, which are of a religious character, and the psalms, hymns, incantations, omens, etc. These are the chief remains of their culture. See

12. Literature

BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, RELIGION OF. In a general sense almost every kind of lit. is found among the hundreds of thousands of clay tablets unearthed in Babylonia. The inscribed votive objects are of all kinds and descriptions. The stone vase taken in booty was dedicated to the deity of the conqueror. The beautiful piece of lapis lazuli, agate, cornelian, etc., obtained, was inscribed and devoted in the same way. Slabs, tablets and cones of all shapes and sizes, were inscribed with the king's name and titles, giving the different cities over which he ruled and referring esp. to the work that he had accomplished for his deity. From the decipherment of these votive objects much valuable data are gathered for the reconstruction of the ancient history of the land.

The same is true of what are known as building inscriptions, in which accounts of the operations of the kings in restoring and enlarging temples, shrines, walls and other city works are given. Canal digging and dredging, and such works by which the people benefited, are frequently mentioned in these inscriptions.

Epistolary literature, for example, the royal letters of Hammurabi, the diplomatic correspondence found in Egypt (see TELL EL-AMARNA) or the royal letters from the Library of Ashurbanipal (see ASHURBANIPAL), as well as the private correspondence of the people, furnishes valuable historical and philological data.

The thousands of tablets found in the school libraries of Sippar and Nippur, as well as of the library of Ashurbanipal, among which are all kinds of inscriptions used in the schools of the priests and scribes, have furnished a great deal of material for the Assyrian dictionary, and have thrown much light upon the grammar of the language. The legal lit. is of the greatest importance for an understanding of the social conditions of the people. It is also valuable for comparative purposes in studying the codes of other peoples. See CODE OF HAMMURABI.

The commercial or legal transactions, dated in all periods, from the earliest times until the latest, also throw important light upon the social conditions of the people. Many thousands of these documents have been found, by the help of which the very life that pulsed in the streets of Babylonia is restored.

The administrative documents from the temple archives also have their value, in that they furnish important data as regards the maintenance of the temples and other institutions; and incidentally much light on the nationality and religion of the people, whose names appear in great numbers upon them. The records are receipts of taxes or rents from districts close by the temples, and of commercial transactions conducted with this revenue. A

Fisher, the architect of the Nippur expedition (see LOTB, 183). Professor Scheil, in publishing his results, has also given a plan of the school he discovered, and a full description of its arrangements, as well as the pedagogical methods that had been employed in that institution of learning. This has also been attempted by others, but in a less scientific manner. One of the striking features of these libraries is the use of the large reference cylinders, quadrangular, pentagonal and hexagonal in shape. There was a hole cut lengthwise through them for the purpose of mounting them like revolving stands. These libraries, doubtless, contained all the works the Babylonians possessed on law, science, literature and religion. There are lexical lists, paradigm tablets, lists of names, of places, countries, temples, rivers, officers, stones, gods, etc. Sufficient tablets have been deciphered to determine their general character. Also hundreds of exercise tablets have been found, showing the progress made by pupils in writing, in mathematics, in grammar, and in other branches of learning. Some tablets appear to have been written after dictation. Doubtless, the excavators found the large portion of these archives consists of the salary payments of storehouse officials and priests. There seems to have been a host of tradesmen and functionaries in connection with the temple. Besides the priest, elder, seer, seeress, sorcerer, sorceress, singer, etc., there were the farmer, weaver, miller, carpenter, smith, butcher, baker, porter, overseer, scribe, measurer, watchman, etc. These documents give us an insight into Bab system of bookkeeping, and show how carefully the administrative affairs of the temple were conducted. In fact the temple was provided for and maintained along lines quite similar to many of our modern institutions.

The discovery of the Library of Ashurbanipal at Nineveh speaks volumes for the culture of Assyria, but that culture was largely borrowed waste heaps of the school, where these tablets had been thrown for the purpose of working them over again as raw material, for new exercises. The school libraries must have been large. Considering for instance that the ideographic and phonetic values of the cuneiform signs in use numbered perhaps 30,000, even the syllabaries which were required to contain these different values must have been many in number, and esp. as tablets, unlike books made of paper, have only two sides to them. And when we take into consideration all the different kinds of lit. which have been found, we must realize that these libraries were immense, and numbered many thousands of tablets.

13. Libraries from the Babylonians. Much that this library contained had been secured from Bab libraries by the scribes employed by Ashurbanipal. In every important center there doubtless existed schools and libraries in connection with the temples. At Nippur, in 1890, Dr. J. P. Peters found such a library, but unfortunately, although he termed it such, his Assyriologists did not recognize that one of the greatest discoveries of antiquity had been made. It remained for Dr. J. H. Haynes, a decade later, to discover another portion of this library, which he regarded as such, because of the large number of tablets which he uncovered. Père Scheil, prior to Dr. Haynes's discovery, had the good fortune while at Sippar to discover a part of the school and library of that important center. Since Professor Scheil's excavations, Arabs have unearthed many inscriptions of this library, which have found their way to museums and into the hands of private individuals.

The plan of the Nippur Library, unearthed by Dr. Haynes, has been published by Mr. C. S.

In modern times the meaning of names given children is rarely considered; in fact, in many instances the name has suffered so 14. Personal Names much through changes that it is difficult to ascertain its original meaning.

Then also, at present, in order to avoid confusion the child is given two or more names. It was not so with the ancient Babylonian. Originally the giving of a name was connected with some special circumstance, and though this was not always the case throughout the history of Babylonia, the correct form of the name was always preserved.

The name may have been an expression of their religious faith. It may have told of the joy experienced at the birth of an heir. It may even betray the suffering that was involved at the birth of the child, or the life that the parents had lived. In short, the names afford us an intimate glimpse into the everyday life of the people.

The average Bab name is theophorous, and indicates one of the deities worshipped by the family, and often the city. For example, it is suggestive that persons with names compounded with Enlil and Ninib hailed from Nippur. Knowing the deities of the surrounding people we have also important evidence in determining the origin of peoples in Babylonia having foreign names. For example, if a name is composed of the Hittite deity Teshup, or the Amorite deity Amurru, or the Aramaean god Dagan, or the Egypt god Esi (Isis), foreign influence is naturally looked for from the countries represented. Quite frequently the names of foreign deities are compounded with Bab elements, often resulting from mixed marriages.

Clay Tablet with Seal Impression.

Theophorous names are composed of two, three, four and even five elements. Those having two or three elements predominate. Two-element names have a deity plus a verbal form or a subst.; or vice versa: for example, Nabu-na'id (Nabonidus), "Nebo is exalted," or Shulman-asharedu (Shalmaneser), "Shalman is foremost." Many different combinations are found in three-element names which are composed of the name of the deity, a subst., a verbal form, a pronominal suffix, or some other form of speech, in any of the three positions. Explanations of a few of the familiar Bib. names follow: Sin-akhe-erba (Sennacherib), "Sin has increased the brothers"; Marduk-apal-iddin (Merodach-baladan), "Marduk has given a son"; Ashur-akh-iddin (Esarhaddon), "Ashur has given a brother"; Ashur-bani-apal, "Ashur is creating a son"; Nabu-kudurri-usur (Nebuchadnezzar), "O Nebo, protect the boundary"; Amel-Marduk (Evil-Merodach), "Man of Marduk"; Bel-shar-usur (Belshazzar), "O Bel, protect the king." Some Bab names mentioned in the Bible are really of foreign origin, for example, Amraphel and Sargon. Amraphel originally is west Semitic and is written Hammurabi (pronounced Hammu-rabi, the first letter being the Semitic heth). Sargon was perhaps originally Aramaean, and is composed of the elements shar and the god Gan. When written in cuneiform it was written Shargani, and later Shar-rukin, being tr^d "the true king." Many names in use were not theophorous; for example, such personal names as Ululā, "the month Ulul"; names of animals, as Kalbā, "dog," gentile names, as Akkadai, "the Akkadian," names of crafts, as Pahāru, "potter," etc.

The lit. abounds in hypocoristica. One element of a name was used for the sake of shortness, to which usually a hypocoristica suffix was added, like Mardukā (Mordecai). That is, the ending a or ai was added to one of the elements of a longer name.

The written history of Babylonia at the present begins from about 4200 BC. But instead of finding things crude and aboriginal in this, the earliest period, the remains discovered show that the people had attained to a high level of culture. Back of that which is known there must lie a long period of development. This is attested in many ways; for instance, the earliest writing found is so far removed from the original hieroglyphs that it is only possible to ascertain what the original pictures were by knowing the values which the signs possessed. The same conclusion is ascertained by a study of the art and literature. Naturally, as mentioned above, it is not impossible that this development took place in a previous home of the inhabitants.

The history of early Babylonia is at present a conflict of the kings and patesis (priest-kings) of the different city-kingsdoms, for supremacy over each other, as well as over the surrounding peoples. The principal states that figure in the early history are: Kish, Lagash, Nippur, Akkad, Umma, Erech, Ur and Opis. At the present time more is known of Lagash, because the excavations conducted at that site were more extensive than at others. This makes much of our knowledge of the history of the land center about that city. And yet it should be stated that the hegemony of Lagash lasted for a long period, and the kingdom will ultimately occupy a prominent position when the final history of the land is written. Nippur, where considerable work was also done, was not the seat of rulers, but the sacred city of the god Enlil, to whom the kings of other cities generally did obeisance. Following is a list of known rulers of the different city-kingsdoms.

El-Ohemir, identified as the ancient city of Kish, not far from Babylon, is one of the oldest Sem centers of the land. No systematic excavations have been conducted 16. Kish at this site, but besides the inscriptions which the Arabs have unearthed, several of the rulers are known to us through votive inscriptions discovered at Nippur and elsewhere. The rulers of Kish are: Utug p. (patesi), cir 4200 BC; Mesilim k. (king), cir 4000 BC; Lugal-tarsi k.; Enbi-Ishtar k.; Manishtusu k., cir 2650 BC; Urumush k., cir 2600; Manana k.; Sumu-ditana k. and Tanium k.

The excavations by the French under De Sarsez and Cross at Tello, the ancient city Lagash, have yielded more inscriptions of ancient

17. Lagash Bab rulers than those at any other site. Lagash was destroyed about 2000 BC, and only partially rebuilt in the post-Bab period. The known rulers are: Lugal-shag-Engur patesi, cir 4000 BC, contemporary with Mesilim k. of Kish; *Badu k.; *En-khegal k.; Ur-Nina k.; Akurgal p.; Eannatum p. and k.; Enannatum I p.; Entemena p.; Enannatum II p.; Enetarzi p.; Enlitarzi p.; Lugal-anda p.; Uru-kagina k., contemporary with Lugal-zaggisi, k. of Uruk; Engilsa p., contemporary with Manishtusu k. of Kish; Lugul-ushungal p., contemporary with Sargon of Accad; Ur-Babbar p., contemporary with Naram-Sin of Accad; Ur-E p.; Lugal-bur p.; Basha-Kama p.; Ur-Mama p.; Ug-me p.; Ur-Bau p.; Gudea p.; Nammakhini p.; Ur-gar p.; Ka-azag p.; Galu-Bau p.; Galu-Gula p.; Ur-Ninsun p.; Ur-Ningirsu p.; contemporary with Ur-Engur k. of Ur-abba p.; *Galu-kazal p.; *Galu-andul p.; *Ut-Lama I p.; *Alla, *Ur-Lama II p.; contemporary with Dungi k. of Ur; Arad-Nannar p. Unfortunately, with the exception of about one-third of these rulers, the exact order is yet to be ascertained. (Asterisk denotes unidentified forms.)

The mounds of Bismaya which have been identified as Adab were partially excavated by Dr.

18. Adab Edgar J. Banks, for the University of Chicago. Its remains indicate that it is one of the oldest cities discovered. A ruler named Esar, cir 4200 BC, is known from a number of inscriptions, as well as a magnificent statue of the king, discovered by Dr. Banks.

The large group of mounds covering an area, the circumference of which is three miles, called in ancient times Nippur, but now Noufar, 19. Nippur was excavated as mentioned above by Drs. Peters and Haynes for the University of Pennsylvania. While a great number of Bab kings and patesis are represented by inscriptions discovered at Nippur, practically all had their seats of government at other places, it being the sacred city.

The mounds at the present called Warka, but representing ancient Erech (Gen 10 10), covering an area whose circumference is 6 miles, 20. Erech have been tentatively examined by Loftus and other explorers. Many inscriptions have also been unearthed by the Arabs at this site. The rulers of this city known to us are: Ilu-(m)a-ilu, Lugal-zaggisi k., contemporary with Uru-kagina of Lagash; Lugal-kigubnidudu k.; Lugal-kisalsi k.; Sin-gashid k., cir 2200 BC, and Sin-gamil k.

Senkereh known in the OT as Ellasar (Gen 14 1), and in the inscriptions as Larsa, has been explored by Loftus and others. The known 21. Larsa rulers of the city are: Gungunu k., contemporary of Ur-Ninib k. of Isin; Sumu-ilu; Nur-Adad; Sin-iddinam; Eri-Aku (Bib. Arioch) cir 2000 BC, son of Kudur-Mabug k. of Elam, and Rim-Sin (or Rim-Aku), his brother.

The present Fara, which in ancient times was called Shuruppak, was partially excavated by the

22. Shurup-pak Germans under Koldewey, Andraea, and Noeldeke. It is also a very ancient city. It yielded little to the spade of the excavator. It is close by Abu-Hatab, and known as the place where the scenes of the Bab Deluge story occurred. Two rulers known from the inscriptions found there are Dada and Haladda, belonging to a comparatively early period.

The site now known as Abu-Hatab is the ancient Kisurra. It was partially excavated by the Germans. It flourished as a city in the 23. Kisurra 3d millennium BC. The two rulers of this city that are known are Idinilu p., and Itur-Shamash p. (?).

The site now called Jokha lying to the N.W. of Lagash is an ancient Sumerian city known as Umma.

The site has been explored by Dr. 24. Umma Peters and others, but more recently surveyed by Andraea and Noeldeke.

It proved to be a city destroyed in the early period. Arabs have lately found thousands of documents belonging to the ancient archives of the city. Some of the rulers known are: Ush p., Enakalli and Urumma p., contemporaries of Enannatum I of Lagash; Ili p., appointed by Entemena p., of Lagash; Kur-Shesh p., time of Manishtusu; *Galu-Babbar p.; Ur-nesu p., contemporary of Dungi k., of Ur.

The city mentioned in Gen 10 10 as Accad, one of Nimrod's cities, has not been explored, but is well known by the inscriptions of Sar-

25. Accad gon and his son Naram-Sin as well as omen-texts of later eras. Sargon was a usurper. He was born in concealment, and sent adrift in an ark of bulrushes like Moses. He was rescued and brought up by Akki, a farmer. He assumed the title "king of the city" (Shar-ali), or "king of Uri" (Shar Uri). Later he conquered the entire country, and became the "king of Accad and Sumer." In his latter years he extended his conquests to Elam, Amurru and Subartu, and earned for himself the title "king of the Four Quarters," which his son Naram-Sin inherited. The latter followed up the successes of his father and marched into Magan, in the Sinaitic peninsula.

Naram-Sin, as well as his father, was a great builder. Evidences of their operations are seen in many cities. Naram-Sin was succeeded by Bingani, who apparently lost the title "king of the Four Quarters," being only called "king of the City, or Uri."

The exact site of the city of Opis is still in doubt, but the city is represented by the

26. Opis ruler Zuzu k., who was defeated by Eannatum p., of Lagash.

The city Basime also remains unidentified, but is represented by Ibalum p., a contemporary of Manishtusu k., of Kish, and son of Ilu-

27. Basime rabi, apparently another patesi of that city.

A site not far from Nippur, called Delehem or Drehem, which was explored by Dr. Peters, has recently yielded thousands of tablets

28. Drehem from the Temple archives dated in the reigns of kings in the Ur Dynasty.

The extensive group of mounds lying on the west side of the Euphrates, called Mugayyar, and generally known as Ur of the Chaldees, is

29. Urumma the ancient Urumma. It was explored by Taylor and others, and proved to have been an important capital from the middle of the 3d millennium BC. The dynasty which had made the city its capital is known through inscriptions discovered there and at Tello, Nippur, Drehem and Djokha. Thousands of inscriptions dated in what is commonly called the Ur Dynasty have been published. The dynasty was founded by Ur-Engur, who is conspicuous for his building operations at Nippur and other cities. A dynastic tablet of a much later period, the provenience of which is in doubt, gives the rulers of this dynasty founded about 2400 BC, and the number of years that they reigned.

The same tablet gives also the following list of the rulers of Isin. Ishbi-Urra, the founder, lived about 2283 BC.

About the time the Nisin Dynasty came to a close, and while the Larsa Dynasty was ruling, the 30. First First Dynasty of Babylon was established. Following is a list of 11 rulers of this dynasty who ruled 300 years:

I. FIRST DYNASTY OF BABYLON

Sumu-abum, 14 years
Sumu-la-el, 36 years

Sabium (son), 14 years
 Abil-Sin (son), 18 years
 Sin-muballit (son), 20 years
 Hammu-rabi (son), 43 years
 Samsu-iluna (son), 38 years
 Abi-eshuh (son), 28 years
 Ammi-Ditana (son), 37 years
 Ammi-Zaduga (son), 21 years
 Samsu-Ditana (son), 32 years

The First Dynasty of Babylon came into prominence in the reign of Sin-muballit who captured Nisin. Eri-Aku of the Larsa Dynasty shortly afterward took the city. When Hammurabi came to the throne he was subject to Eri-Aku (Bib. Arioch) of Larsa, the son of the Elamite king, Kudur-Mabug. The latter informs us that he was suzerain of Amurru (Pal and Syria), which makes intelligible the statement in Gen 14, that the kings of Canaan were subject to the king of Elam, whose name was Chedorlaomer (Kudur-Lagamar). In his 31st year, Hammurabi, who is the Amraphel of Gen 14 1, succeeded in throwing off the Elamite yoke, and not only established his independence but also became the complete master of Babylonia by driving out the Elamites.

In the region of the Pers Gulf, south of Babylonia, ruled a dynasty partly contemporaneously with the First Dynasty, extending over the reigns of about five of the last kings, and over several of the Cassite Dynasty, known as the Sealand Dynasty. The annalist records for the latter the following list of 11 kings who ruled 368 years:

II. SEALAND DYNASTY

Ilima-ilu, 60 years
 Itti-ili-nibi, 55 years
 Damqi-ilishu, 36 years
 Ishkibal, 15 years
 Shushshi (brother), 27 years
 Gulkishar, 55 years
 Pesh-gal-daramash (son), 50 years
 Adara-kalama (son), 28 years
 Ekur-ul-anna, 26 years
 Melamma-kurkura, 7 years
 Ea-gamil, 9 years

The First Dynasty of Babylon came to an end through an invasion of the Hittites. They plundered Babylon and perhaps ruled that city for a number of years. A new dynasty was then established about 1750 BC by a foreign people known as Cassites. There were 36 kings in this dynasty ruling 576 years and 9 months. Unfortunately the tablet containing the list is fragmentary.

The region from which these Cassites came has not yet been determined, although it seems to be the district N.E. of Assyria. Gan-

33. Cassite Rule dash, the first king, seems to have enjoyed the all-embracing title, "King of the Four Quarters of the World."

Little is known of the other rulers until Agum II, who claims the rule of the Cassites, Accad, Babel, Padan, Alman and Guti. In his inscriptions he records the conquest of Khani in Asia Minor, and the fact that he brought back to Babylon the statues of Marduk and Zarpant, which had been carried off by the Hittites. The Cassite rule, while extending over many cents., was not very prosperous. At Nippur the excavations showed active operations on the part of a few kings in restoring the temple and doing obeisance to Enlil. The rulers seemed to have conformed to the religion of the land, for few foreign elements have been recognized as having been introduced into it during this era. The many Cassite names found in the inscriptions would indicate an influx from a Cassite quarter of no small proportion. And yet it should be noted that, in the same era, Hittite and Mittanean influence, as is shown by the nomenclature, is as great as the Cassite. It was during this period that Assyria rose to power and influence, and was soon to become the master of the Mesopotamian region.

The most famous king of this dynasty, in fact of this era, was Nebuchadrezzar I, who reestablished firmly the rule of Babylon. He carried on a successful expedition into Elam as well as into Amurru where he fought against the Hittite. He also conquered the Lulubites. But in contest for supremacy with Assyria Ashur-resh-ishi triumphed, and he was forced to retreat ingloriously to Babylon. His successors failed to withstand the Assyrians, esp. under Tiglath-pileser I, and were allowed to rule only by sufferance. The Babylonians had lost their prestige; the Assyrians had become the dominant people of the land. Few rulers of the dynasty which followed are known except by name. The dynasties with one exception were of short duration.

X. BABYLONIAN DYNASTY

Following is a partial list of the 22 kings who ruled until the destruction of Babylon by Sennacherib, when the Assyrian kings assumed direct control. Ashurbanipal, however, introduced a new policy and viceroys were appointed.

Shamash-shum-ukin; 668-648 BC
Kandalanu; 648-626 BC
Ashur-etil-ilani-ukin; 626-
Nabopolassar; 626-

During the time of Sennacherib, Merodach-baladan the Chaldaean became a great obstacle to Assyria's maintaining its supremacy over Babylonia. Three times he gained possession of Babylon, and twice had himself proclaimed king. For thirty years he plotted against Assyria. What is learned from the inscriptions concerning him furnishes an interesting commentary on the sending of the embassy, in 704 BC, to Hezekiah (2 K 20 12; Isa 39 1) in order to induce him to revolt against Assyria, which he knew would help his own cause. Finally Sennacherib, in 690, after he had experienced much trouble by the repeated uprisings of the Babylonians, and the aspirations of Merodach-baladan, endeavored to obliterate Babylon from the map. His son and successor Esarhaddon, however, tried to make Babylon again happy and prosperous. One of his first acts was to send back to Babylon the statue of Bel-Merodach. He rebuilt the city, and also restored other Babylonian temples, for instance, that of Enlil at Nippur. The Babylonians solemnly declared him king. Ashurbanipal, his son and successor, followed his policy. The evidence of his operations at Nippur is everywhere seen in the shape of stamped, kiln-dried bricks.

Before Esarhaddon died, he had planned that Babylonia should become independent and be ruled by his son, Shamash-shum-ukin, while Assyria he handed down to Ashurbanipal. But when the latter came to the throne, Assyria permitted the former only to be appointed viceroy of Babylon. It seems also that even some portions of Babylonia were ruled directly by Ashurbanipal.

After fifteen years Shamash-shum-ukin rebelled and attempted to establish his independence, but Sennacherib besieged Babylon and took it, when Shamash-shum-ukin destroyed himself. Kandalanu was then appointed viceroy, and ruled over part of the country. Nabopolassar was the last viceroy appointed by Assyria. At last the time had arrived for the Babylonians to come again unto their own. Nabopolassar who perhaps was a Chaldaean by origin, made an alliance with the Umman Manda. This he strengthened by the marriage of his son Nebuchadrezzar to the daughter of Astyages, the king. Nineveh finally fell before the Umman Manda hordes, and was razed to the ground. This people took possession of Northern Assyria. The Armenian vassal states, and Southern Assyria, as well as the title to Pal, Syria and Egypt, fell to Babylonia.

Nabopolassar having established himself king of Babylon became the founder of the neo-Babylonian empire. He was succeeded by his son, Nebuchadrezzar II, who like Hammurabi and Sargon is among the greatest known characters in Bab history. He is the Bib. Nebuchadrezzar who carried the Jews into captivity. There are a number of lengthy records of Nebuchadrezzar concerning the buildings he erected, as well as of other public acts, but unfortunately only a fragment of a historical inscription referring to him has been found. The building inscriptions portray him as the great builder he is represented to be in the OT (see BABYLON). He made Babylon the mistress of the civilized world.

Evil-Merodach, his son and successor, is also mentioned in the OT. Two short reigns followed when the ruling dynasty was overthrown and Nabonidus was placed upon the throne. The king, who delighted in exploring and restoring ancient temples, placed his son at the head of the army. Nabonidus desiring to centralize the religion of Babylonia, brought to Babylon many of the images of deities from other cities. This greatly displeased the people, and excited a strong feeling against him. The priesthood was alienated, and the military party was displeased with him, for in his antiquarian pursuits he left the defence of the empire to others. So when Cyrus, king of Anshan and ruler of Persia, entered the country, he had little difficulty in defeating the Babylonians in a battle at Opis. Sippar immediately surrendered to the invader, and the gates of Babylon were thrown open to his army under Gobryas, his general. Nabonidus was imprisoned. Three months later Cyrus entered Babylon; Belshazzar, who doubtless had set up his throne after his father had been deposed, was slain a week later on the night of the eleventh of Marchesvan. This scene may have occurred in the palace built by Nebuchadrezzar. This event, told by the chronicler, is a remarkable verification of the interesting story related of Belshazzar in Dnl. The title used by the kings who follow the Bab Dynasty is "King of Babylon and King of Countries."

Several of the Pers rulers figured prominently in the OT narratives. Cyrus in a cylinder inscription, which is preserved in a fragmentary form, endeavors to justify himself in the eyes of the people. He claims that the god Marduk raised him up to take the place of Nabonidus, and to defend the religion of the people. He tries to show how considerate he was by returning to their respective cities the gods that had been removed from their shrines; and esp. by liberating foreign peoples held in bondage. While he does not mention what exiles were allowed to return to their native homes, the OT informs us that the Jews were among those delivered. And the returning of the images to their respective places is also an interesting commentary on Ezr 1 7, in which we are told that the Jews were allowed to take with them their sacred vessels. The spirit manifested in the proclamation for the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 1 14) seems also to have been in accordance with his policy on ascending the Bab throne. A year before his death he associated with himself Cambyses his son, another character mentioned in the OT. He gave him the title "King of Babylon," but retained for himself "King of Countries." A usurper Smerdis, the Magian, called Barzia in the inscriptions, assumed the throne of Babylonia, but Darius Hystaspes, who was an Aryan and Zoroastrian in religion, finally killed Smerdis and made himself king of Babylon. But before he was acknowledged king he had to reconquer the Babylonians. By so doing the ancient tradition that Bel of Babylon conferred the legitimate right to rule that part of the world ceased to be acknowledged. Under Nidinta-Bel, who assumed the name Nebuchadrezzar III, the Babylonians regained their independence, but it was of short duration, lasting less than a year.

LITERATURE

I. Definition.—The religion of Babylonia and Assyria is that system of belief in higher things with which the peoples of the Tigris and Euphrates valley strove to put themselves into relations, in order to live their lives. The discoveries of the past cent. have supplied us with a mass of information concerning this faith from which we have been able to secure a greater knowledge of it than of any other ancient oriental religion, except that of Israel. Yet the information which is thus come into our hands is embarrassing because of its very richness, and it will doubtless be a long time before it is possible to speak with certainty concerning many of the problems which now confront us. Progress in the interpretation of the literature is however so rapid that we may now give a much more intelligible account of this religion than could have been secured even so recently as five years ago.

For purposes of convenience, the religion of Babylonia and Assyria may be grouped into three great periods.

(1) The first of these periods extends from the earliest times, about 3500 BC, down to the union of the Bab states under Hammurabi; about 2000 BC.

(2) The second period extends to the rise of the Chaldaean empire under Nabopolassar, 625 BC, and

(3) The third period embraces the brief history of this Chaldaean or neo-Bab empire under Cyrus, 538 BC.

The Assyrian religion belongs to the second period, though it extends even into the third period, for Nineveh did not fall until 607 BC.

II. The Sources.—The primary sources of our knowledge of this religion are to be found in the distinctively religious texts, such as hymns, prayers, priestly rituals and liturgies, and in the vast mass of magical and incantation literature. The major part of this religious lit. which has come down to us dates from the reign of Ashurbanipal (668-625 BC) though much of it is quite clearly either copied from or based upon much older material. If, however, we relied for our picture of the Bab and Assyrian religion exclusively upon these religious texts, we should secure a distorted and in some places an indefinite view. We must add to these in order to perfect the picture practically the whole of the lit. of these two peoples.

The inscriptions upon which the kings handed down to posterity an account of their great deeds contain lists of gods whom they invoked, and these must be taken into consideration. The laws also have in large measure a religious basis, and the business inscriptions frequently invoke deities at the end. The records of the astronomers, the state despatches of kings, the reports of general officers from the field, the handbooks of medicine, all these and many other divisions of a vast lit. contribute each its share of religious material. Furthermore, as the religion was not only the faith of the king, but also the faith of the state itself, the progress of the commonwealth to greater power oftentimes carried some local god into a new relationship to other gods, or the decadence of the commonwealth deprived a god of some of his powers or attributes, so that even the distinctively political inscriptions have importance in helping us to reconstruct the ancient literature.

III. The History.—The origin of the Bab religion is hid from our eyes in those ancient days of which we know little and can never hope to know much.

Babylonian Idols.

In the earliest documents which have come down to us written in the Sumerian language, there are found Sem words or constructions or both. It seems now to be definitely determined that a Sumerian people whose origin is unknown inhabited Babylonia before the coming of the Semites, whose original home was in Arabia. Of the Sumerian faith before a union was formed with the Semites, we know very little indeed. But we may perhaps safely say that among that ancient people, beneath the belief in gods there lay deep in their consciousness the belief in animism. They thought that every object, animate or inanimate, had a zi or spirit. The word seems originally to have meant life. Life manifests itself to us as motion; everything which moves has life. The power of motion separates the animate from the inanimate. All that moves possesses life, the motionless is lifeless or dead.

Besides this belief in animism, the early Sumerians seem to have believed in ghosts that were related to the world of the dead as the zi was related to the world of the living. The lil or ghost was a night demon of baleful influence upon men, and only to be cast out by many incantations. The lil was attended by a serving-maid (ardat lil, "maid of night") which in the later Sem development was transformed into the feminine lilitu. It is most curious and interesting that this ghost demon of the Sumerians lived on through all the history of the Bab religion, and is mentioned even in one of the OT prophets (Isa 34 14; Heb Lilith, tr^d "night monster"). The origin of the Sem religion brought by the ancient Sem people and united with this Sumerian faith is also lost in the past.

It seems to be quite clear that the gods and the religious ideas which these Semites brought with them from the desert had very little if any importance for the religion which they afterward professed in Babylonia. Some of the names of their gods and images of these they very probably brought with them, but the important thing, it must always be remembered, about the gods is not the names but the attributes which were ascribed to them, and these must have been completely changed during the long history which follows their first contact with the Sumerians. From the Sumerians there flowed a great stream of religious ideas, subject indeed to modifications from time to time down the succeeding cents. In our study of the pantheon we shall see from time to time how the gods changed their places and how the ideas concerning them were modified by political and other movements. In the very earliest times, besides these ideas of spirits and ghosts, we find also numbers of local gods. Every center of human habitation had its special patron deity and this deity is always associated with some great natural phenomenon. It was natural that the sun and moon should be made prominent among these gods, but other natural objects and forces were personified and deified, streams, stones and many others.

Our chief source of information concerning the gods of the first period of religious development before the days of Hammurabi is found in the historical inscriptions of the early kings and rulers. Many of these describe offerings of temples and treasures made to the gods, and all of them are religious in tone and filled with ascriptions of praise to the gods. From these early texts Professor Jastrow has extricated the names of the following deities, gods and goddesses. I reproduce his list as the best yet made, but keep in mind that some of the readings are doubtful and some were certainly otherwise read by the Babylonians or Sumerians, though we do not now know how they ought to be read. The progress of Assyri research is continually providing corrected readings for words hitherto known to us only in ideograms. It is quite to be expected that many of these strange, not to say grotesque, names will some day prove to be quite simple, and easy to utter: En-lil (El-lil, Bel) Belit, Nin-khar-sag, Nin-gir-su, who also appears as Dun-gur, Bau, Ga-tum-dug, Nin-din-dug, Ea, Nin-a-gal, Gal-dim-zu-ab, Nin-ki, Damgal-nun-na, Nergal, Shamash, A or Malkatu, the wife of Shamash, Nannar, or Sin, Nin-Urum, Innanna, Nana, Anunit, Nina, Ishtar, Anu, Nindar-a, Gal-alim, Nin-shakh, Dun-shagga, Lugal-banda, with a consort Nin-sun, Dumu-zi-zu-ab, Dumu-zi, Lugal-Erim, Nin-e-gal and Ningal, Nin-gish-zi-da, Dun-pa-uddu, Nin-mar, Pa-sag, Nidaba, Ku(?)anna, Shid, Nin-agid-kha-du, Nin-shul-li, En-gubarra, Im-mi-khu(?), Ur-du-zi, Kadi, Nu-ku-sir-da, Ma-ma, Za-ma-ma, Za-za-ru, Impa-ud-du, Ur-e-nun-ta-ud-du-a, Khi-gir-nunna, Khi-shagga, Gur-mu, Zar-mu, Dagan, Damu, Lama, Nesu, Nun-gal, An-makh, Nin-si-na, Nin-asu. In this list great gods and goddesses and all kinds of minor deities are gathered together, and the list looks and sounds hopeless. But these are local deities, and some of them are mere duplications. Nearly every place in early times would have a sun-god or a moon-god or both, and in the political development of the country the moon-god of the conquering city displaced or absorbed the moon-god of the conquered. When we have eliminated these gods, who have practically disappeared, there remains a comparatively small number of gods who outrank all the others.

In the room of some of these gods that disappeared, others, esp. in Assyria, found places. There was, however, a strong tendency to diminish the number of the gods. They are in early days mentioned by the score, but as time goes on many of these vanish away and only the few remain. As Jastrow has pointed out, Shalmaneser II (859-825 BC) had only eleven gods in his pantheon: Ashur, Anu, Bel, Ea, Sin, Shamash, Ninib, Nergal, Worshipping Heavenly Bodies (from a Cylinder of White Agate).

Nusku, Belit and Ishtar. Sennacherib (704-681 BC) usually mentions only eight, namely, Ashur, Sin, Shamash, Bel (that is, Marduk), Nabu, Nergal, Ishtar of Nineveh and Ishtar of Arbela. But we must not lay much emphasis upon the smallness of this number, for in his building inscriptions at the end he invokes twenty-five deities, and even though some of these are duplicates of other gods, as Jastrow correctly explains, nevertheless the entire list is considerably increased over the eight above mentioned. In the late Bab period the worship seems chiefly devoted to Marduk, Nabu, Sin, Shamash and Ishtar. Often there seem little faint indications of a further step forward. Some of the hymns addressed to Shamash seem almost upon the verge of exalting him in such a way as to exclude the other deities, but the step is never taken. The Babylonians, with all their wonderful gifts, were never able to conceive of one god, of one god alone, of one god whose very existence makes logically impossible the existence of any other deity. Monotheism transcends the spiritual grasp of the Bab mind.

Amid all this company of gods, amid all these speculations and combinations, we must keep our minds clear, and fasten our eyes upon the one significant fact that stands out above all others. It is that the Babylonians were not able to rise above polytheism; that beyond them, far beyond them, lay that great series of thoughts about God that ascribe to him aloneness, to which we may add the great spiritual ideas which today may roughly be grouped under ethical monotheism. Here and there great thinkers in Babylonia grasped after higher ideas, and were able only to attain to a sort of pantheism of a speculative kind. A personal god, righteous and holy, who loved righteousness and hated sin, this was not given to them to conceive.

The character of the gods changed indeed as the people who revered them changed. The Babylonians who built vast temples and composed many inscriptions emphasizing the works of peace rather than of war, naturally conceived their deities in a manner different from the Assyrians whose powers were chiefly devoted to conquests in war, but neither the Babylonians nor the Assyrians arose to any such heights as distinguish the Heb book of Psalms. As the influence of the Babylonians and Assyrians waned, their gods declined in power, and none of them survived the onrush of Gr civilization in the period of Alexander.

IV. The Pantheon.—The chief gods of the Bab and Assy pantheon may now be characterized in turn.

In the earliest times known to us the greatest of the gods is the god of Nippur whose name in the Sumerian texts is Enlil or Ellil. In the Sem pantheon of later times he was identified with the god Bel, and it is as Bel he has been chiefly known. During the whole of the first epoch of Bab history up to the period of Hammurabi, he is the Lord of the World and the King of the Land. He was originally the hero of the Flood story, but in the form in which it has come down to us Marduk of Babylon has deprived him of these honors. In Nippur was his chief temple, called E-kur or "mountain house." It was built and rebuilt by the kings of Babylonia again and again from the days of Sargon I (3800 BC) onward, and no less than twenty kings are known to us who pride themselves on their work of rebuilding this one temple. He is saluted as "the Great Lord, the command of whose mouth cannot be altered and whose grace is steadfast." He would seem, judging from the name of his temple and from some of his attributes, to have been originally a god of the mountains where he must have had his original dwelling-place.

The name of the god Anu was interpreted as meaning heaven, corresponding to the Sumerian word ana, "heaven," and he came thus to be regarded as the god of heaven as over against Enlil who was the god of earth, and Ea who was the god of the waters. Anu appears first among the great gods in an inscription of Lugalsaggi, and in somewhat later times he made his way to the top of the earliest triad which consists of Anu, Enlil and Ea. His chief seat of worship was Uruk, but in the Assy period he was associated with the god Adad in a temple in the city of Asshur. In the myths and epics he fills an important rôle as the disposer of all events, but he cannot be thought of as quite equal in rank with Enlil in spite of his position in the heavens. Antu or Anatu is mentioned as the wife of Anu, but hers is a colorless figure, and she may probably be regarded as little else than a grammatical invention owing to the desire of the Semites to associate the feminine with the masculine in their languages.

The reading of the name of the god Ea still remains uncertain.

3. Ea It may perhaps have been Ae, as the Gr Aos would seem to indicate. His chief city of worship was Eridu, which in the earliest period was situated on the Pers Gulf, near the mouths of the Euphrates and the Tigris. His temple was there called E-absu, which means "house of the deeps," interpreted also as "house of wisdom."

He must have been a god of great importance in early times, but was left behind by the growing influence of Ellil and in a later period retained honor chiefly because he was assumed to be the father of the god Marduk, and so was revered by the people of the city of Babylon. As the lord of wisdom he filled a great rôle in exorcisms down to the very last, and was believed to be the god who was most ready to respond to human need in direful circumstances. Ea's wife is called Damkina.

Sin was the city god of Uru (Ur of the Chaldaean in the OT). He was originally a local god who came early to a lofty position in the canon because he seems always to have been identified with the moon, and in Babylon the moon was always of more importance than the sun because of its use in the calendar. His temple was called E-kishshirgal, i.e. "house of light." His worship was widespread, for at a very early date he had a shrine at Harran in Mesopotamia. His wife is called Ningal, the Great Lady, the Queen, and his name probably appears in Mt. Sinai. He is addressed in hymns of great beauty and was regarded as a most kindly god.

The Sun-god, Shamash, ranks next after Sin in the second or later triad, and there can be no doubt that he was from the beginning associated with the sun in the heavens. His seats of worship were Larsa in southern Babylonia and Sippar in northern Babylonia, in both of which his temple was called E-bab-bar, "shining house." He also is honored in magnificent hymns in which he is saluted as the enemy and the avenger of evil, but as the benignant furtherer of all good, esp. of that which concerns the races of men. All legislation is ascribed to him as the supreme judge in heaven. To him the Babylonians also ascribe similar powers in war to those which the Egyptians accorded to Re. From some of the texts one might have supposed that he would have come to the top of the triad, but this appears not to have been the case, and his influence extended rather in the direction of influencing minor local deities who were judged to be characterized by attributes similar to those ascribed to him in the greater hymns.

The origin and the meaning of the name of the goddess Ishtar are still disputed, but of her rank there can be no doubt. In the very earliest inscriptions known to us she does not seem to have been associated with the planet Venus as she is in later times. She seems rather to have been a goddess of fruitfulness and of love, and in her temple at Uruk temple-prostitution was a feature. In the mythological lit. she occupies a high place as the goddess of war and of the chase. Because of this later identification she became the chief goddess of the warlike Assyrians. Little by little she absorbed all the other goddesses and her name became the general word for goddess. Her chief seats of worship were Uruk in southern Babylonia, where she was worshipped in earliest times under the name of Nana, and Akkad in northern Babylonia, where she was called Anunitu, and Nineveh and Arbela in Assyria. Some of the hymns addressed to her are among the noblest products of Bab and Assyrian religion and reach a considerable ethical position. This development of a sexual goddess into a goddess who severely judged the sins of men is one of the strangest phenomena in the history of this religion.

Marduk (in the OT Merodach) is the city-god of Babylon where his temple was called E-sagila ("lofty house") and its tower E-teme- nanki ("house of the foundation of heaven and earth"). His wife is Sarpaitu, and, as we have already seen, his father was Ea, and in later days Nabu was considered his son. The city of Babylon in the earliest period was insignificant in importance compared with Nippur and Eridu, and this city-god could not therefore lay claim to a position comparable with the gods of these cities, but after Hammurabi had made Babylon the chief city of all Babylonia its god rapidly increased in importance until he absorbed the attributes of the earlier gods and displaced them in the great myths. The speculative philosophers of the neo-Bab period went so far as to identify all the earlier gods with him, elevating his worship into a sort of henotheism. His proper name in the later periods was gradually displaced by the appellative Belu "lord," so that finally he was commonly spoken of as Bel, and his consort was called Belit. He shares with Ishtar and Shamash the honor of having some of the finest hymns, which have come down to us, sung to his name.

Nabu (in the OT Nebo) was the city-god of Borsippa. His name is clearly Sem, and means "speaker" or "announcer." In earlier times he seems to have been a more important god than Marduk and was worshipped as the god of vegetation. His temple in Borsippa bore the name E-zida ("perpetual house") with the tower E-uriminanki ("house of the seven rulers of heaven and earth"). In later times he was identified with the planet Mercury.

Nergal, the city-god of Kutu (in the OT Cuthah), was the god of the underworld and his wife Eresh-kigal was the sovereign lady of the under-world. He was also the god of plague and of fever, and in later days was associated with the planet Mars, though scholars who are attached to the astral theory

Nebo.

(see below) think that he was identified at an earlier date with Saturn. For this view no certain proof has yet been produced.

Unfortunately the correct pronunciation of the name of the god Ninib has not yet been secured.

He seems originally to have been a god of vegetation, but in the later philosophical period was associated with the planet Saturn, called Kaimanu (Kewan, Chiun, Am 5 26 AV, ERV). As a god of vegetation he becomes also a god of healing and his wife Gula was the chief patroness of physicians. He comes also to be regarded as a mighty hero in war, and, in this capacity generally, he fills a great rôle in the Assyrian religion.

Ramman is the god of storms and thunder among the Babylonians and in the Assyrian pantheon he is usually called Adad. This form of the 11. Ramman name is doubtless connected with the Aram. god Hadad. In the Sumerian period his name seems to have been Ishkur. His wife is called Shala.

The name Tammuz is derived from the Sumerian Dumuzi-zuab ("real child of the water depths").

He is a god of vegetation which is revived by the rains of the spring. 12. Tammuz Tammuz never became one of the great gods of the pantheon, but his popularity far exceeded that of the many gods who were regarded as greater than he. His worship is associated with that of Ishtar whose paramour he was, and the beautiful story of the descent of Ishtar to Hades was written to describe Ishtar's pursuit of him to the depths of the under-world seeking to bring him up again. His disappearance in the under-world is associated with the disappearance of vegetation under the midsummer heat which revives again when the rain comes and the god appears once more on the earth. The cult of Tammuz survived the decay of Bab and Assyrian civilization and made its way into the western world. It was similar in some respects to that of Osiris in Egypt, but was not so beautiful or so humane.

The supreme god of Assyria, Asshur, was originally the local god of the city which bears the same name. During the whole of Assyrian

13. Asshur history his chief rôle is as the god of war, but the speculative philosophers of Assyria absorbed into him many of the characteristics of Ellil and Marduk, going even so far as to ascribe to him the chief place in the conflict with the sea monster Tiamat in the creation epoch.

V. Hymns and Prayers.—The religious lit. of the Babylonians and Assyrians culminated in a great series of hymns to the gods. These have come down to us from almost all periods of the religious history of the people. Some of them go back to the days of the old city-kingsdoms and others were composed during the reign of Nabonidus when the fall of Babylon at the hands of Cyrus was imminent. The greatest number of those that have come down to us are dedicated to Shamash, the Sun-god, but many of the finest, as we have already seen, were composed in honor of Sin, the Moon-god. None of these reached monotheism. All are polytheistic, with perhaps tendencies in the direction of pantheism or henotheism. This incapacity to reach monotheism may have been partially due to the influence of the local city whose tendency was always to hold tightly to the honor of the local god. Babylonia might struggle never so hard to lift Marduk to high and still higher position, but in spite of all its efforts he remains to the very end of the days only one god among many. And even the greatest of the Bab. kings, Nebuchadrezzar and Nabonidus, continued to pay honor to Shamash in Sippar, whose temple they continually rebuilt and adorned with ever greater magnificence. Better than any description of the hymns is a specimen adequately to show their quality. Here are some lines taken from an ancient Sumerian hymn to the Moon-god which had been copied and preserved with an Assyrian in the library of Ashurbanipal:

O Lord, chief of the gods, who alone art exalted on earth and in heaven.

Father Nannar, Lord, Anshar, chief of the gods,

Father Nannar, Lord, great Anu, chief of the gods,

Father Nannar, Lord, Sin, chief of the gods,

Father Nannar, Lord of Ur, chief of the gods,

Father Nannar, Lord of E-gish-shir-gal, chief of the gods, Father Nannar, Lord of the veil, brilliant one, chief of the gods.

Father Nannar, whose rule is perfect, chief of the gods, Father Nannar, who does march in great majesty, chief of the gods.

O strong, young bull, with strong horns, perfect in muscles, with beard of lapis lazuli color, full of glory and perfection,

Self-created, full of developed fruit, beautiful to look upon, in whose being one cannot sufficiently sate himself;

Mother womb, begetter of all things, who has taken up his exalted habitation among living creatures;

O merciful, gracious father, in whose hand rests the life of the whole world.

O Lord, thy divinity is full of awe, like the far-off heaven and the broad ocean.

O creator of the land, founder of sanctuaries, proclaimer of their names.

O father, begetter of gods and men, who dost build dwellings and establish offerings,

Who dost call to lordship, dost bestow the scepter, determinest destinies for far-off days.

Much of this is full of fine religious feeling, and the exaltation of Sin sounds as though the poet could scarcely acknowledge any other god, but the proof that other gods were invoked in the same terms and by the same kings is plentiful.

Some of these hymns are connected with magical and incantation lit., for they serve to introduce passages which are intended to drive away evil demons. A very few of them on the other hand rise to very lofty conceptions in which the god is praised as a judge of righteousness. A few lines from the greatest of all the hymns addressed to Shamash, the Sun-god, will make this plain:

COLUMN II

Who plans evil—his horn thou dost destroy,
40 Whoever in fixing boundaries annuls rights.
The unjust judge thou restrainest with force.
Whoever accepts a bribe, who does not judge justly—on him thou imposest sin.
But he who does not accept a bribe, who has a care for the oppressed,
To him Shamash is gracious, his life he prolongs.
45 The judge who renders a just decision
Shall end in a palace, the place of princes shall be his dwelling.

COLUMN III

The seed of those who act unjustly shall not flourish.
What their mouth declares in thy presence
Thou shalt burn it up, what they purpose wilt thou annul.
15 Thou knowest their transgressions: the declaration of the wicked thou dost cast aside.
Everyone, wherever he may be, is in thy care.
Thou directest their judgments, the imprisoned dost thou liberate.
Thou hearest, O Shamash, petition, prayer, and appeal.
Humility, prostration, petitioning, and reverence.
20 With loud voice the unfortunate one cries to thee.
The weak, the exhausted, the oppressed, the lowly,
Mother, wife, maid appeal to thee.
He who is removed from his family, he that dwelleth far from his city.

There is in this hymn no suggestion of magic or sorcery. We cannot but feel how close this poet came to an appreciation of the Sun-god as a judge of men on an ethical basis. How near he was to passing through the vale into a larger religious life!

The prayers are on the whole upon a lower plane, though some of them, notably those of Nebuchad- rezzar, reach lofty conceptions. The following may serve as a sufficient example:

O eternal ruler, lord of all being, grant that the name of the king that thou lovest, whose name thou hast proclaimed, may flourish as seems pleasing to thee. Lead him in the right way. I am the prince that obeys thee, the creature of thy hand. Thou hast created me, and hast intrusted to me dominion over mankind. According to thy mercy, O Lord, which thou bestowest upon all, may thy supreme rule be merciful! The worship of thy divinity implant in my heart! Grant me what seems good to thee, for thou art he that hast fashioned my life.

VI. Magic.—Next in importance to the gods in the Bab religion are the demons who had the power to afflict men with manifold diseases of body or mind. A large part of the religion seems to have been given up to an agonized struggle against these demons, and the gods were everywhere approached by prayer to assist men against these demons. An immense mass of incantations, supposed to have the power of driving the demons out, has come down to us. The use of these incantations lay chiefly in the hands of the priests who attached great importance to specific words or sets of words. The test of time was supposed to have shown that certain words were efficacious in certain instances. If in any case the result was not secured, it could only be ascribed to the use of the wrong formula; hence there grew up a great desire to preserve exactly the words which in some cases had brought healing. Later these incantations were gathered into groups or rituals classified according to purpose or use. Of the rituals which have come down to us, the following are the most important:

Maqlu, i.e. "burning," so called because there are in it many symbolic burnings of images or witches. This series is used in the

1. Maqlu delivering of sufferers from witches or sorcerers.

Shurpu is another word for burning, and this series also deals much in symbolic burnings and for the same purposes as the former.

2. Shurpu In these incantations we make the acquaintance of a large number of strange demons such as the rabisu, a demon that springs unawares on its victims; the labartu, which attacks women and children; and the lilu and the liliku, to which reference has been made before, and the utuku, a strong demon.

These incantations are for the most part a wretched jargon without meaning, and a sad commentary on the low position occupied by the religion which has attained such noble heights as that represented in the hymns and prayers. It is strange that the higher forms of religion were not able to drive out the lower, but these incantations continued to be carefully copied and used down to the very end of the Bab commonwealth.

VII. The Last Things.—In Babylonia, the great question of all the ages—"If a man die shall he live again?"—was asked and an attempt made to answer it. The answer was usually sad and depressing. After death the souls of men were supposed to continue in existence. It can hardly be called life. The place to which they have gone is called the "land of no return." There they lived in dark rooms amid the dust and the bats covered with a garment of feathers, and under the dominion of Nergal and Ereshkigal. When the soul arrived among the dead he had to pass judgment before the judges of the dead, the Annunaki, but little has been preserved for us concerning the manner of this judgment. There seems to have been at times an idea that it might be possible for the dead to return again to life, for in this underworld there was the water of life, which was used when the god Tammuz returned again to earth. The Babylonians seem not to have attached so much importance to this after-existence as did the Egyptians, but they did practice burial and not cremation, and placed often with the dead articles which might be used in his future existence. In earlier times the dead were buried in their own houses, and among the rich this custom seems to have prevailed until the very latest times. For others the custom of burying in an acropolis was adopted, and near the city of Kutha was an acropolis which was especially famous. In the future world there seem to have been distinctions made among the dead. Those who fell in battle seem to have had special favor. They received fresh water to drink, while those who had no posterity to put offerings at their graves suffered sore and many deprivations. It is to be hoped that later discoveries of religious texts may shed more light upon this phase of the religion which is still obscure.

VIII. Myths and Epics.—In ancient religions the myth fills a very important place, serving many of the functions of dogma in modern religions. These myths have come down to us associated usually with epics, or made a part of ancient stories which belong to the library of Ashurbanipal. Most of them have been copied from earlier Bab originals, which go back in origin to the wonderful period of intellectual and political development which began with Hammurabi. The most interesting of those which have been preserved for us are the story of Adapa and the story of Gilgames. This same divine being Adapa, son of Ea, was employed in Ea's temple at Eridu supplying the ritual bread and water. One day, while fishing in the sea, the south wind swept sharply upon him, overturned his boat, and he fell into the sea, the "house of the fishes." Angered by his misfortune, he broke the wings of the south wind, and for seven days it was unable to bring the comfort of the sea coolness over the hot land. And Anu said:

"Why has the south wind for seven days not blown over the land?"

His messenger Ilabrat answered him:

"My Lord,

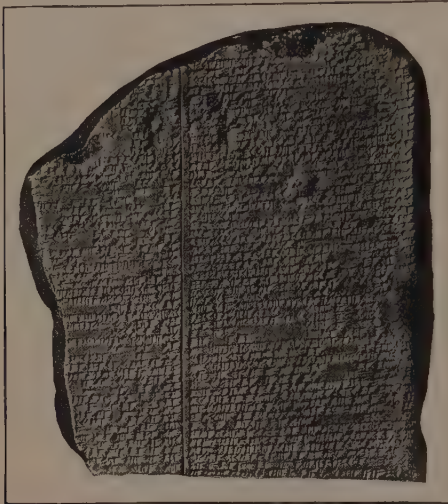

Adapa, the son of Ea, hath broken the wing of The south wind."

Then Anu ordered the culprit brought before him, and before he departed to this ordeal Ea gave him instructions. He is to go up to the gatekeepers of heaven, Tammuz and Gish-zida, clad in mourning garb to excite their sympathy. When they ask why he is thus attired he is to tell them that his mourning is for two gods of earth who have disappeared (that is, themselves), and then they will intercede for him. Furthermore, he is cautioned not to eat the food or drink the water that will be set before him, for Ea fears that food and water of death will be set before him to destroy him. But exactly the opposite happened. Tammuz and Gish-zida prevailed in pleading, and Anu said: "Bring for him food of life that he may eat it." They brought him food of life, but he did not eat. They brought him water of life, but he did not drink. They brought him a garment; he put it on. They brought him oil; he anointed himself with it.

Adapa had obeyed Ea literally, and by so doing had missed the priceless boon of immortality. Some of the motives in this beautiful myth are similar to those found in Gen. Food of life seems to belong to the same category as the tree of life in Gen. The Bab doctrine was that man, though of Divine origin, did not share in the Divine attribute of immortality. In the Gen story Adam lost immortality because he desired to become like God. Adapa, on the other hand, was already endowed with knowledge and wisdom and failed of immor-talities, not because he was disobedient like Adam, but because he was obedient to Ea his creator. The legend would seem to be the Bab attempt to explain death.

The greatest of all the Bab epics is the story of Gilgames, for in it the greatest of the myths seem to pour into one great stream of epic. It was written upon twelve big tablets in the library of Ashurbanipal, some of which have been badly broken. It was, however, copied from earlier tablets which go back to the First Dynasty of Babylon. The whole story is interesting and important, but its greatest significance lies in the eleventh tablet which contains a description of the great flood and is curiously parallel to the Flood story in the Book of Gen.

The Deluge Tablet.

IX. The Astral Theory of the Universe.—We have now passed in review the main features of the Bab and Assyr religion. We have come all the way from a primitive animism to a higher organized polytheism with much theological speculation ending in a hope for existence after death, and we must now ask whether there is any great organizing idea which will bring all this religion and speculation into one great comprehensive system. A theory has been propounded which owes its exposition generally to Professor Hugo Winckler of the University of Berlin, who in a series of volumes and pamphlets has attempted to prove that the whole of the serious thinking and writing in the realm of religion among both the Babylonians and Assyrians rests down upon a Weltanschauung, a theory of the universe. This theory of Winckler's has found acceptance and propagation at the hands of Dr. Alfred Jeremias, and portions of it have been accepted by other scholars. The doctrine is extremely complicated and even those who accept it in part decline it in other parts and the exposition of it is difficult. In the form which it takes in the writings of Winckler and Jeremias, it has been still further complicated quite recently by sundry alterations which make it still more difficult. Most of these can only be regarded as efforts to shield the theory from criticisms which have been successful in pointing out its weakness.

According to Winckler and Jeremias, the Babylonians conceived of the cosmos as divided primarily into a heavenly and an earthly world, each of which is further subdivided into three parts. The heavenly world consists of (1) the northern ocean;

(2) the zodiac; (3) the heavenly ocean; while the earthly world consists of (1) the heaven, i.e. the air above the earth; (2) the earth itself; (3) the waters beneath the earth. These great subdivisions were ruled by the gods Anu in the heaven above, Bel in the earth and air, and Ea in the waters beneath. More important than these is the zodiac, the twelve heavenly figures which span the heavens and through which the moon passes every month, the sun once a year, and the five great planets which are visible to the naked eye have their courses. These moving stars serve as the interpreters of the Divine will while the fixed stars, so says Jeremias, are related thereto as the commentary written on the margin of the Book of Rev. The rulers of the zodiac are Sin, Shamash and Ishtar, and according to the law of correspondence, the Divine power manifested in them is identical with the power of Anu, Bel and Ea. The zodiac represents the world-cycle in the year, and also in the world-year, one of these gods may represent the total Divine power which reveals itself in the cycle. By the side of these three, Sin, Shamash and Ishtar, which represent respectively the moon, sun and Venus, there are arranged Marduk which is Jupiter, Nabu which is Mercury, Ninib which is Mars, and Nergal which is Saturn, these being the planets known to the ancients. Now upon these foundations, according to Winckler, and his school, the ancient priests of Babylonia built a closely knit and carefully thought-out world-system of an astral character, and this world-system forms the kernel of the ancient and oriental conception of the universe. This conception of the universe as a double-sided principle is of tremendous importance. First, the heavenly world with its three divisions corresponds exactly to the earthly world with its three divisions. Everything on earth corresponds to its counterpart in heaven. The heavens are a mirror of earth, and in them the gods reveal their will and purpose. Everything which has happened is only an earthly copy of the heavenly original. It is still written in the heavens above and still to be read there. All the myths and all the legends, not only of Babylonia, but of all the rest of the ancient world, are to be interpreted in accordance with this theory; nothing even in history is to be understood otherwise. "An oriental history without consideration of the world era is unthinkable. The stars rule the changes of the times" (Jeremias). The consequences of this theory are so overpowering that it is difficult to deal with it in fairness to its authors and in justice to the enormous labor and knowledge which they have put upon it.

It is impossible within the reasonable limits which are here imposed to discuss the theory in detail, and for our purpose it will be sufficient to say that to the great majority of modern scholars who have carefully considered it in its details it seems to lack evidence sufficient to support so enormous a structure. That an astrological structure similar at least to this actually did arise in the Hellenistic period is not here disputed. The sole dispute is as to the antiquity of it. Now it does not appear that Winckler and Jeremias have been able to produce proof, first, that the Babylonians had enough knowledge of astronomy before the 7th cent. BC to have constructed such a system; and in the second place, there is no evidence that all the Bab gods had an astral character in the earlier period. On the contrary, there seems, as we have already attempted to show in the discussion of the pantheon, to be good reason to believe that many of the deities had no relation whatever to the stars in early times, but were rather gods of vegetation or of water or of other natural forces visible in earthly manifestations. The theory indeed may be said to have broken down by its own weight, for Winckler and Jeremias attempted to show that this theory of the universe spread to Israel, to the Greeks and to the Romans, and that it affords the only satisfactory explanation of the religion and of the history of the entire ancient world. An attempt has been made similar to previous abortive efforts to unlock all the doors of the ancient past with one key (see an interesting example cited in Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria, 224-25). Instead of gaining adherence in recent times, the theory would appear to have lost, and even those who have given a tentative adherence to its claims, cautiously qualify the extent of their submission.

X. The Relations with the Religion of Israel.—No question concerning the religion of Babylonia and Assyria is of so great interest and importance to students of the Bible as the question of the relation between this religion and the faith of Jeh, as professed by Israel. It seems now to be clearly demonstrated that the religion of Israel has borrowed various literary materials from its more ancient neighbor. The stories of creation and of the flood, both of them, as far as the literary contents are concerned, certainly rest upon Bab originals. This dependence has, however, been exaggerated by some scholars into an attempt to demonstrate that Israel took these materials bodily, whereas the close shifting and comparison to which they have been subjected in the past few years would seem to demonstrate beyond peradventure that Israel stamped whatever she borrowed with her own genius and wove an entirely new fabric. Israel used these ancient narratives as a vehicle for a higher and purer religious faith. The material was borrowed, the spirit belonged to Israel, and the spirit was Divine. Words and literary materials were secured from Babylonia, but the religious and spiritual came from Israel and from Israel's God. The word Sabbath is Bab indeed, but the great social and religious institution which it represents in Israel is not Bab but distinctively Heb. The Divine name Yahweh appears among other peoples, passes over into Babylonia and afterward is used by Israel, but the spiritual God who bears the name in Israel is no Bab or Kenite deity. The Babylonians, during all their history and in all their speculations, never conceived a god like unto Him. He belongs to the Hebrews alone.

The gods of Babylonia are connected, as we have seen, with primitive animism or they are merely local deities. The God of Israel, on the other hand, is a God revealed in history. He brought Israel out of Egypt. He is continually made known to His people through the prophets as a God revealed in history. His religion is not developed out of Bab polytheism which existed as polytheism in the earliest periods and endured as polytheism unto the end. The religion of Israel, on the other hand, though some of its material origins are humble, moved steadily onward and upward until the great monotheistic idea found universal acceptance in Israel. The religions of Philistia and Phoenicia, Moab, and of Edom, were subject to the same play of influences from Babylonia and Egypt, but no larger faith developed out of them. In Israel alone ethical monotheism arose, and ethical monotheism has no roots in Babylonia. The study of the religion of Babylonia is indeed of the highest importance for the understanding of Israel's faith, but it is of less importance than some modern scholars have attempted to demonstrate.

BABYLONIAN CAPTIVITY. See CAPTIVITY.

BABYLONIANS, bab-i-lō'ni-anz: The inhabitants of BABYLONIA (q.v.). They were among the colonists planted in Samaria by the Assyrians (Ezr 4 9). "The likeness of the Babylonians in Chaldea" (Ezk 23 15) refers to the pictures which were common on the walls of Bab palaces, and the reports of them being heard in Jerus, or copies of them seen there, awakened the nation's desire for these unknown lovers, which Judah had ample occasion to repent of (vs 17, 23; cf 2 K 24).

BABYLONISH GARMENT, bab-i-lō'nish gār'ment: In AV, Josh 7 21, for BABYLONISH MANTLE, which see.

BABYLONISH MANTLE, man't'l (AV Babylonish Garment): One of the articles taken by Achan from the spoil of Jericho (Josh 7 21). In the Heb "a mantle of Shinar." Entirely gratuitous is the suggested correction of Shinar to sē'ār, making "a hairy mantle." The Gr has psitēn poiklēn, which Jos apparently understood to mean "a royal garment all woven out of gold" (Ant, V, i, 10). The Vulg calls it a "scarlet pallium," and some of the rabbinical traditions make it a purple robe. Such classical writers as Pliny and Martial speak of the weaving of embroidered stuffs as a famous industry of Babylonia. Many tablets that have been deciphered indicate that the industry was indeed widely extended, that its costly products were of great variety and that some of them were exported to distant markets; in fine, that the account in Joshua is characterized by great verisimilitude.

BACA, bā'ka (בָּכָה, bākhā'): In AV in Ps 84 6, where RV has "the valley of Weeping," with a marginal variant which is best put in the form, "the valley of the balsam-trees." The word is elsewhere used only in the duplicated account of one of David's battles (2 S 5 23, 24; 1 Ch 14 14, 15). There the tr is "the mulberry trees," with "the balsam-trees" in the margin in RV. Conjecturally the word is, by variant spelling, of the stem which denotes weeping; the tree is called "weeper" from some habit of the trickling of its gum or of the moisture on it; the valley of weeping is not a geographical locality, but a picturesque expression for the experiences of those whose strength is in Jeh, and who through His grace find their sorrows changed into blessings.

BACCHIDES, bak'i-dēz (Βακχίδης, Bakchidēs): B., ruler over Mesopotamia and a faithful friend of both Antiochus Epiphanes and Demetrius Soter, established at the request of the latter the rulership over Judaea for Alcimus, who, desiring to become high priest, had made false accusations against Judas Maccabee (1 Macc 7 8 ff; Ant, XII, x, 2). B. is sent the second time to Judaea after the Syrian general Nicanor was killed near Adasa and Judas Maccabee had gained control of the government (1 Macc 9 1 ff; Ant, XII, x). B. after an unsuccessful battle near Bethbasi was forced to make peace with Jonathan, the brother of Judas Maccabee (1 Macc 9 58 ff; Ant, XIII, i). In 1 Macc 10 12 and 2 Macc 8 30 reference is made to the strongholds B. built during his 2d campaign against Jerus (1 Macc 9 50). Cf ALCIMUS; BETHBASI; JONATHAN MACCABEE; JUDAS MACCABEE; ADASA; NICANOR.

BACCHURUS, bak-kū'rus (Βακχοῦρος, Bakchoûros): One of the "holy singers" who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 24). Omitted in Ezr 10.

BACCHUS, bak'us (Διόνυσος, Diônusos; later Βάκχος, the Feast of Bacchus; Διονύσια, Dionúsia): The god of wine. His worship had extended over the whole Gr and Rom world cents. before the Christian era, and had degenerated into an orgy of drunkenness and unnamable immoralities, possibly under the influence of oriental Baal worship, such as the Heb prophets condemned. It has been surmised that Dionysus was originally not a Gr, but an oriental deity. His worship had been introduced into Egypt, perhaps by the Ptolemies, and Ptolemy Philopator (222-204 BC) had branded the Jews there with his emblem, the sign of the ivy. When Antiochus Epiphanes made his assault upon Jerus in the year 168 BC, he determined to extirpate the worship of Jeh, which he recognized as the strength of the Jewish resistance, and to replace it by Gr religion. All worship of Jeh and the observance of Jewish rites, such as the Sabbath and circumcision, were prohibited. Heathen worship was set up all over Judaea, and in the temple at Jerus on the altar of burnt offering an altar to Jupiter was erected, "the abomination that maketh desolate" (Dnl 11 31), and a swine was sacrificed upon it (see ABOMINATION OF DESOLATION). The immoral practices associated with heathen worship in those days established themselves in the temple. When this feast of Bacchus (Dionysus) with all its revelry came round, the Jews were compelled to go in procession in honor of Bacchus (Dionysus), wearing wreaths of ivy, the emblem of the god (2 Macc 6 7). Some years later, when the worship of Jeh had been restored, Nicanor the general of Demetrius I, in conducting the war against Judas Maccabaeus, threatened the priests that, unless they delivered Judas up as a prisoner, "he would raze the temple of God even with the ground, break down the altar, and erect there a temple unto Bacchus (Dionysus) for all to see" (2 Macc 14 33). See DIONYSIA.

BACENOR, ba-sē'nor (Βακηνωρ, Bakēnōr): An officer in the army of Judas Maccabee engaged in war against Gorgias, governor of Idumaea (2 Macc 12 35). Cf Ant, XII, viii, 6.

BACHRITE, bak'rīt. See BECHER.

BACK, BACK PARTS:

(1) (אָהַר, 'ahar, "back side" as in AV): "He led the flock to the back of the wilderness" (Ex 3 1), i.e. "to the pasture-lands on the other side of the desert from the Midianite encampments."

(2) (אָהֹר, 'āhōr, "hinder part," "the West"): Used of God in an anthropomorphic sense ("Thou shalt see my back," Ex 33 23) to signify "the afterglow of the Divine radiance," the faint reflection of God's essential glory. See also Isa 38 17 and cf 1 K 14 9 and Neh 9 26.

(3) (ὀπισθεν, ōpisthen, "back side"): "A book written within and on the back" (Rev 5 1), "but the back of a book is not the same as the reverse side of a roll. St. John was struck, not only with the fact that the roll was sealed, but also with the amount of writing it contained" (HDB, I, 231). Cf Ezk 2 10.
M. O. EVANS

BACKBITE, bak'bīt (רָגַל, rāghal; δολώ, dolō): To slander the absent, like a dog biting behind the back, where one cannot see; to go about as a talebearer. "He that backbiteth [RV slandereth] not with his tongue" (Ps 15 3).

Backbiters, bak'bīt-ēr'z (Gr κατάλαλοι, katálatloi): Men who speak against. Vulg "detractors" (Rom 1 30).

Backbiting, bak'bīt-ing (רָטַף, sether): Adj. "a backbiting tongue"; lit. "a tongue of secrecy" (Prov 25 23). καταλαλία, katalalía: subst. "a speaking against" (2 Cor 12 20; Wisd 1 11); "evil speaking" (1 Pet 2 1). γλῶσσα τρίτη, glōssa trítē: "a backbiting tongue" (AV of Ecclus 28 14.15); more lit. tr'd in RV "a third person's tongue."

BACKSIDE, bak'sīd'. See BACK.

BACKSLIDE, bak'slīd' (מְשֻׁבְּהָ, m'shūbhā; Hos 11 7; 14 4 and often in Hos and Jer, שׁוֹבֵב, shōbhābh; שׁוֹבֵב, shōbhēbh, in Jer, 4 times: all meaning "turning back or away," "apostate," "rebellious." שָׂרָר, sārār, in Hos 4 16 = "stubborn," "rebellious"; RV "stubborn"): In all places the word is used of Israel forsaking Jeh, and with a reference to the covenant relation between Jeh and the nation, conceived as a marriage tie which Israel had violated. Jeh was Israel's husband, and by her idolatries with other gods she had proved unfaithful (Jer 3 8.14; 14 7; Hos 14 4). It may be questioned whether Israel was guilty so much of apostasy and defection, as of failure to grow with the growing revelation of God. The prophets saw that their contemporaries fell far short of their own ideal, but they did not realize how far their predecessors also had fallen short of the rising prophetic standard in ideal and action. See APOSTASY.

Backslider, bak'slīd'ēr (סֹגֵר, sūgh lēbh): "The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways" (Prov 14 14). But RV "backslider" conveys the wrong impression of an apostate. The Heb expression here implies simply non-adherence to the right, "The bad man reaps the fruits of his act" (Toy, Prov, in loc.).
T. REES

BADGER, baj'ēr (תַּחַשׁ or תַּחֲשָׁ, tahash or tāhash): The word tahash occurs in the descriptions of the tabernacle in Ex 25, 26, 35, 36 and 39, in the directions for moving the tabernacle as given in Nu 4, and in only one other passage, Ezk 16 10, where Jerus is spoken of as a maiden clothed and adorned by her Lord. In nearly all these passages the word tahash occurs with 'ōr, "skin," rendered: AV "badgers' skins," RV "sealskin," RVm "porpoise-skin," LXX dērmata huakinthina. In all the passages cited in Ex and Nu these skins are mentioned as being used for coverings of the tabernacle; in Ezk 16 10, for shoes or sandals. The LXX rendering would mean purple or blue skins, which however is not favored by Talmudic writers or by modern grammarians, who incline to believe that tahash is the name of an animal. The rendering, "badger," is favored by the Talmudic writers and by the possible etymological connection of the word with the Lat taxus and the German Dachs. The main objection seems to be that badgers' skins would probably not have been easily available to the Israelites. The badger, Meles taxus, while fairly abundant in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, does not seem to occur in Sinai or Egypt.

A seal, Monachus albiwater (Arab. fukmeh), the porpoise, Phocoena communis, and the common dolphin, Delphinus delphis, are all found in the Mediterranean. The dugong, Halicore dugong, inhabits the Indian Ocean and adjoining waters from the Red Sea to Australia. The Arab. tukhas or dukhas is near to tahash and is applied to the dolphin, which is also called delfin. It may be used also for the porpoise or even the seal, and is said by Tristram and others to be applied to the dugong. The statement of Gesenius (Boston, 1850, s.v. "tahash") that the Arabs of Sinai wear sandals of dugong skin is confirmed by recent travelers, and is of interest with reference to Ezk 16 10, "I . . . shod thee with badgers' skin" (AV). The dugong is a marine animal from 5 to 9 ft. in length, frequenting the shore and feeding upon seaweed. It belongs to the order Sirenia. While outwardly resembling Cetacea (whales and porpoises), the Sirenia are really more allied to the Ungulata, or hoofed animals. The dugong of the Indian Ocean and the manatee of the Atlantic and of certain rivers of Africa and South America, are the only living representatives of the Sirenia. A third species, the sea-cow of Behring Sea, became extinct in the 18th cent. The seal and porpoise of the RV, the dolphin, and the dugong are all of about the same size and all inhabit the seas bordering on Egypt and Sinai, so that all are possible candidates for identification with the tahash. Of the four, recent opinion seems most to favor the dugong.

Mr. S. M. Perlmann has suggested (Zoölogist, ser. 4, XII, 256, 1908) that the okapi is the animal indicated by tahash.

Gesenius (Leipzig, 1905) cites Bondi (Aegyptiaca, i. ff) who adduces the Egypt root *th*s and makes the expression 'ör tahash mean "soft-dressed skin." This suits the context in every passage and is a very promising explanation. ALFRED ELY DAY

BAEAN, bē'an (βῆαν Ba'ān, βῆαν Ba'ān; AV Bean; 1 Macc 5 4): A tribe mentioned only because of its malignant hatred of the Jews. Its aggressive hostility against their religion and the rebuilding of their sanctuary duplicated the conspiracy of Sanballat and his confederates against the restoration of Jerusalem and the temple in the days of Nehemiah (cf Neh 4 7.8). Utterly exterminated by Judas Maccabaeus who burned alive, in towers, many of the imprisoned people. See MAON.

BAG: Bags of various kinds are mentioned in the Eng. Bible, but often in a way to obscure rather than to bring out the original.

(1) "Bag" is used for a Heb word which means a shepherd's "bag," rendered "wallet" in RV. This "bag" of the shepherd or "haversack" of the traveler was of a size sufficient for one or more days' provisions. It was made of the skin of animals, ordinarily undressed, as most of the other "bags" of ancient times were, and was carried slung across the shoulder. This is the "scrip for the journey" (πῆρα, pēra) mentioned in Mt 10 10 and || (AV). ("Scrip" is OE, now obsolete.) A unique word appears in 1 S 17 40.49 which had to be explained even to Heb readers by the gloss, "the shepherd's bag," but which is likewise rendered "wallet" by the ARV.

(2) "Bag" translates also a word (βαλλάντιον, ballantion) which stands for the more finished leather pouch, or satchel which served as a "purse" (see Christ's words, Lk 10 4 AV: "Carry neither purse, nor scrip," and 12 33 AV: "Provide yourselves bags which wax not old"). The word rendered "purse" in Mt 10 9: "Get you no gold, nor silver, nor brass in your purses"; Mk 6 8: "No money in their purse," is a different word entirely (ζώνη, zōnē), the true rendering of which is "girdle" (RVm). The oriental "girdle," though sometimes of crude leather, or woven camel's hair (see GIRDLE), was often of fine material and elegant workmanship, and was either made hollow so as to carry money, or when of silk or cloth, worn in folds, when the money was carried in the folds.

(3) The small "merchant's bag" often knotted in a handkerchief for carrying the weights, such as is mentioned in Dt 25 13: "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small," was another variety. This too was used as a "purse," as in the case of the proposed common purse of the wicked mentioned in Prov 1 14: "We will all have one purse," and sometimes carried in the girdle (cf Isa 46 6).

Bag: Scrip.

(4) Then there was the "bag" (פָּרֹר, ḥrōr, rendered "bundle" in Gen 42 35) which was the favorite receptacle for valuables, jewels, as well as money, used fig. with fine effect in 1 S 25 29: "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life" = "life's jewel-case" (see 2 K 12 10 where the money of the temple was said to be put up "tied up" in bags). This was a "bag" that could be tied with a string: "Behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack," and (cf Prov 7 20) "He hath taken a bag of money with him" (cf Hag 1 6: "earneth wages to put it into a bag with holes").

A seal was sometimes put on the knot, which occasions the figure of speech used in Job (14 16.17), "Dost thou not watch over my sin? My transgression is sealed up in a bag," i.e. it is securely kept and reckoned against me (cf also 1 S 9 7; 21 5 where the Heb כֵּלִי, kelī, is rendered by "vessels" and stands for receptacles for carrying food, not necessarily bags).

(5) Another Heb word פָּרֹר, ḥārūt; Arab. ḥarīṭat, is used, on the one hand, for a "bag" large enough to hold a talent of silver (see 2 K 5 23, "bound two talents of silver in two bags"), and on the other, for a dainty lady's satchel, such as is found in Isa 3 22 (wrongly rendered "crispings pins" in AV). This is the most adequate Heb word for a large bag.

(6) The "bag" which Judas carried (see Jn 12 6 AV, "He was a thief and had the bag"; cf 13 29) was in reality the small "box" (RVm) originally used for holding the mouthpieces of wind instruments (Kennedy, in 1-vol HDB). The Heb אֲרֹזָה, 'argāz, found only here) of 1 S 6 8, rendered "coffer" in EV and τῆς γλοσσόκομον, glossókomon, by Jos, appears to stand for a small "chest" used to hold the gold figures sent by the Philis as a guilt offering. It is from a word that means "to wag," "to move to and fro"; of the similar word in Arab. meaning a bag filled with stones hung at the side of the camel to "preserve" equilibrium (Gesenius). But the same word Jos uses is found in modern Gr and means "purse" or "bag" (Hatch). Later to "carry the bag" came to mean to be treasurer. GEO. B. EAGER

(1) כֵּלִי, kelī, "the impedimenta of an army": "David left his b. in the hand of the keeper of the b." (1 S 17 22); "at Michmash hé layeth up his b." (Isa 10 28). ARV gives b. for "stuff" at 1 S 10 22; 25 13; 30 24.

(2) ἀποσκευή, aposkeuē: "Beside the b." (Jth 7 2), "a great ado and much b." (1 Macc 9 35.39),

"the women and the children and also the b." (AV "and other b."; 2 Macc 12 21).

(3) (ἀποσκευάζομαι, aposekudzomai, "to make ready for leaving," "to pack up baggage"): "We took up [made ready RVm] our b." (Acts 21 15, AV "carriages"), i.e. what they could carry=Eng. "luggage"; but others understand the term of the loading of the baggage animals. M. O. EVANS

BAGO, bā'gō (A, Βαγό, Bagó; B, Bavaí, Banaí=Bigvai [Ezr 8 14]): The descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerus (1 Esd 8 40).

BAGOAS, ba-gō'as (Βαγώας, Bagōas): The eunuch in charge of the household of Holofernes whom the latter engaged to bring Judith to his palace (Jth 12 11 ff; 13 1.3; 14 14). Cf JUDITH.

BAGOI, bag'ō-i (A, Βαγοί, Bagoi; B, Βοσαί, Bosaí=Bigvai [Ezr 2 14; Neh 7 19]): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 14).

BAHARUMITE, ba-hā'rum-it, BARHUMITE, bār-hū'mit (1 Ch 11 33; 2 S 23 31): A native of BAHURIM (q.v.).

BAHURIM, ba-hū'rim (בְּחֻרִים, bahurīm; Βαουρεῖμ, Baoureīm, usually, but there are variants): A place in the territory of Benjamin which lay on an old road from Jerus to Jericho followed by David in his flight from Absalom (2 S 15 32-16 5 ff). It ran over the Mount of Olives and down the slopes to the E. The Talm identifies it with Alemath, the modern Almūt, about a mile beyond 'Anāṭā, going from Jerus. If this identification is correct, Wādī Fārah may be the brook of water (2 S 17 20). Here Paltiel was parted from his wife Michal by Abner (2 S 3 16). It was the home of Shimei, who ran along a ridge of the hill cursing and throwing stones at the fugitive king (2 S 16 5; 1 K 2 8). In Bahurim Jonathan and Ahimaaz, the messengers of David, were concealed in a well by a loyal woman (2 S 17 18 ff). Azmaveth, one of David's heroes, was a native of Bahurim. In 2 S 23 31 we should read, as in 1 Ch 11 33, Barahumite. W. EWING

BAITERUS, bā-i'tēr-us (Βαιτηρούς, Bailērouis; AV Meterus): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (1 Esd 5 17). Omitted in Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

BAJITH, bā'jith. See BAYITH.

BAKBAKKAR, bak-bak'ar (בַּקְבָּקָר, bakbakkar, "investigator"): A Levite (1 Ch 9 15).

BAKBUK, bak'buk (בִּקְבֻק, bakbūk, "bottle" perhaps onomatopoeical, referring to the clucking noise created by the pouring out of the contents of a bottle=Acub [1 Esd 5 31]): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (Ezr 2 51; Neh 7 53).

BAKBUKIAH, bak-bū-kī'a (בִּקְבֻקִּיָּה, bakbukyāh, "the Lord pours out"):

(1) A Levite who "dwelt in Jerus" after the return from Babylon (Neh 11 17).

(2) A Levite who returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (Neh 12 9).

(3) A Levite and porter keeping "the watch at the store-houses of the gates" (Neh 12 25).

BAKEMEATS, bāk'mēts: Only in Gen 40 17 AV and ERV. "All manner of baked food for Pharaoh" ARV. Any kind of meat baked or cooked. See BREAD; FOOD.

BAKING, bāk'ing. See BREAD.

BAKING PAN. See BREAD; PAN.

BALAAM, bā'lam (בִּלְעָם, bil'am, "devourer"): The son of Beor, from a city in Mesopotamia called Pethor, a man possessing the gift of prophecy, whose remarkable history may be found in Nu 22 2-24 25; cf 31 8.16; Dt 23 4; Josh 13 22; 24 9; Neh 13 2; Mic 6 5; 2 Pet 2 15; Jude ver 11; Rev 2 14.

When the children of Israel pitched their tents in the plains of Moab, the Moabites entered into some sort of an alliance with the

1. History Midianites. At the instigation of Balak, at that time king of the Moabites, the elders of the two nations were sent to Balaam to induce him, by means of a bribe, to pronounce a curse on the advancing hosts of the Israelites. But in compliance with God's command B. refused to go with the elders. Quite different was the result of a second request enhanced by the higher rank of the messengers and by the more alluring promises on the part of Balak. Not only did God permit B. to go with the men, but he actually commanded him to do so, cautioning him, however, to act according to further instructions. While on his way to Balak, this injunction was strongly impressed on the mind of B. by the strange behavior of his ass and by his encounter with the Angel of the Lord.

Accompanied by Balak who had gone out to meet the prophet, B. came to Kiriath-huzoth. On the next morning he was brought up "into the high places of Baal" commanding a partial view of the camp of the Israelites. But instead of a curse he pronounced a blessing. From there he was taken to the top of Peor, yet this change of places and external views did not alter the tendency of B.'s parables; in fact, his spirit even soared to greater heights and from his lips fell glowing words of praise and admiration, of benediction and glorious prophecy. This, of course, fully convinced Balak that all further endeavors to persuade the seer to comply with his wishes would be in vain, and the two parted.

Nothing else is said of B., until we reach Nu 31. Here in ver 8 we are told of his violent death at the hands of the Israelites, and in ver 16 we learn of his shameful counsel which brought disgrace and disaster into the ranks of the chosen people.

Now, there are a number of interesting problems connected with this remarkable story. We shall try to solve at least some of the more important ones.

2. Problems (1) Was B. a prophet of Jeh? For an answer we must look to Nu 22-24. Nowhere is he called a prophet. He is introduced as the son of Beor and as a man reputed to be of great personal power (cf Nu 22 6b). The cause of this is to be found in the fact that he had intercourse of some kind with God (cf Nu 22 9.20; 22 22-35; 23 4; 23 16). Furthermore, it is interesting to note how B. was enabled to deliver his parables. First it is said: "And Jeh put a word in B.'s mouth" (Nu 23 5; cf ver 16), a procedure seemingly rather mechanical, while nothing of the kind is mentioned in Nu 24. Instead we meet with the remarkable sentence: "And when B. saw that it pleased Jeh to bless Israel, he went not, as at the other times, to meet with enchantments . . ." (Nu 24 1), and then: "the Spirit of God came upon him" (ver 2b). All this is very noteworthy and highly instructive, esp. if we compare with it vs 3 RVm and 4: "The man whose eye is opened saith; he saith, who heareth the words of God, who seeth the vision of the Almighty," etc. The inference is plain enough: B. knew the Lord, the Jeh of the Israelites, but his knowledge was dimmed and corrupted by heathen conceptions. He knew enough of God to obey Him, yet for a long time he hoped to win Him over to his own selfish plan (cf 23 4). Through liberal sacrifices he expected to influence God's actions. Bearing this in mind, we see the import of Nu 24 1. After fruitless efforts to cajole God into an attitude favorable to his hidden purpose, he for a time became a prophet of the Lord, yielding to the ennobling influences of His spirit. Here was a chance for his better nature to assert itself permanently and to triumph over the dark forces of paganism. Did he improve this opportunity? He did not (cf Nu 31 8,16).

(2) Is the B. of Nu 22-24 identical with the person of the same name mentioned in Nu 31? Quite a number of scholars deny it, or, to be more accurate, there are according to their theory two accounts of B.: the one in Nu 22-24 being favorable to his character, and the other in Nu 31 being quite the reverse. It is claimed the two accounts could only be made to agree by modifying or eliminating Nu 24 25. Now, we believe that Nu 31 16 actually does modify the report of B.'s return contained in Nu 24 25. The children of Israel slew B. with the sword (Nu 31 8). Why? Because of his counsel of ver 16. We maintain that the author of 24 25 had this fact in mind when he wrote the 1st ver of Nu 25: "And . . . the people began to play the harlot," etc. Thus, he closely connects the report of B.'s return with the narrative contained in Nu 25. Therefore we regard Nu 31 8,16 as supplementary to Nu 22-24. But here is another question:

(3) Is the narrative in Nu 22-24 the result of combining different traditions? In a general way, we may answer this question in the affirmative, and only in a general way we can distinguish between two main sources of tradition. But we maintain that they are not contradictory to each other, but supplementary.

(4) What about the talking of the ass and the marvelous prophecies of B.? We would suggest the following explanation. By influencing the soul of B., God caused him to interpret correctly the inarticulate sounds of the animal. God's acting on the soul and through it on the intellect and on the hearts of men—this truth must be also applied to B.'s wonderful prophetic words. They are called m'shalim or sayings of a prophet, a diviner.

In the 1st of these "parables" (Nu 23 7-10) he briefly states his reasons for pronouncing a blessing; in the 2d (vs 18-24) he again emphasizes the fact that he cannot do otherwise than bless the Israelites, and then he proceeds to pronounce the blessing at some greater length. In the 3d (Nu 24 3-9) he describes the glorious state of the people, its development and irresistible power. In the last four parables (vs 15-24) he partly reveals the future of Israel and other nations: they are all to be destroyed, Israel's fate being included in the allusion to Eber. Now, at last, B. is back again in his own sphere denouncing others and predicting awful disasters. (On the "star out of Jacob," ver 17, see ASTRONOMY, ii, 9; STAR OF THE MAGI.)

This may furnish us a clue to his character. It, indeed, remains "instructively composite." A

3. B.'s Character a soothsayer who might have become a prophet of the Lord; a man who loved the wages of unrighteousness, and yet a man who in one supreme moment of his life surrendered himself to God's holy Spirit; a person cumbered with superstition, covetousness and even wickedness, and yet capable of performing the highest service in the kingdom of God: such is the character of B., the remarkable OT type and, in a sense, the prototype of Judas Iscariot.

In 2 Pet 2 15 B.'s example is used as a means to illustrate the pernicious influence of insincere Christian teachers. The author might

4. B. as a Type have alluded to B. in the passage immediately preceding 2 Pet 2 15 because of his abominable counsel.

This is done in Rev 2 14. Here, of course, B. is the type of a teacher of the church who attempts to advance the cause of God by advocating an unholy alliance with the ungodly and worldly, and so conforming the life of the church to the spirit of the flesh.

BALADAN, bal'a-dan (בַּלְדָּן, bal'ādhan, "He [i.e. Merodach] has given a son"): Baladan is said in 2 K 20 12 and Isa 39 1 to have been the father of Berodach (Merodach)-Baladan, king of Babylon. Some have thought that the Bib. writer was wrong here, inasmuch as it is said in the inscriptions of Sargon (Annals, 228, 315; Pr., 122), that Merodach-Baladan was the son of Yakin. It is evident, however, from the analogy of Jehu, who is called by the Assyrian kings the son of Omri, that Yakin is to be looked upon as the founder of the dynasty or kingdom, rather than as the father of Merodach-Baladan. The Bith Yakin, over which Merodach-Baladan is said to have been king, corresponds exactly to the phrase Bith Khumria, or House of Omri, over which Jehu is said to have ruled. There is no reason, then, for supposing that there is an error in either case. There is, however, good reason for believing that the Merodach-Baladan of the Book of Kings was the son of another king of the same name. That only the latter part of the father's name is here mentioned may be compared with the Shalman of Hos 10 14 for the more fully written Shalmaneser of 2 K 17 3; and with the Jareb of Hos 5 13 and 10 6, probably for Sennacherib. Such abbreviation of proper names was usual among the Assyrians and Babylonians. See Tallquist, Namenbuch, xiv-xix.

BALAH, bā'la (בָּלָה, bālāh; Βωλά, Bōlā): A place, unidentified, in the territory of Simeon (Josh 19 3), called Bilhah in 1 Ch 4 29. It may be identical with Baalah in Judah (Josh 15 29).

BALAK, bā'lak (בָּלָק, bālāk, "devastator" or "one who lays waste"): Mentioned in connection with the story of Balaam (Nu 22-24; cf Josh 24 9; Jgs 11 25; Mic 6 5; Rev 2 14). He was the king of Moab who hired Balaam to pronounce a curse on the Israelites. See BALAAM.

BALAMON, bal'a-mon (Βαλαμών, Balamōn; AV Balamo): In the field between Balamon and Dothaim Manasses, the husband of Judith, was buried (Jth 8 3). Cf Baal-hamon (Cant 8 11).

BALANCE, bal'ans: The Eng. word "balance" is from the Lat bilanx="having two scales" (bi="two" and lanx="plate," or "scale"). It is used to render three Heb words: (1) מִזְנֵימַיִם, mō'znayim (Lev 19 36; Job 6 2; Ps 62 9; Prov 11 1; Isa 40 12,15; Jer 32 10, etc); (2) קָנֶה, kāneh (Isa 46 6), and (3) פֶּלֶס, peles (Prov 16 11). It is found in the sing., e.g. "a just balance" (Prov 16 11); "a pair of balances" (Rev 6 5, etc), as well as in the plur., e.g. "just balances" (Lev 19 36), "weighed in the balances" (Dnl 5 27, etc).

Balance (from Egyptian Tomb).

(1) The "balances" of the ancient Hebrews differed little, if at all, from those used by the Egyptians (Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt 1. Balances [1878], II, 246 f). They consisted, among the probably, of a horizontal bar, either pivoted on a perpendicular rod (see Hebrews; Erman, Aegypten, I, 615 for similar the Parts, Egypt balances), or suspended from a cord and held in the hand, the more primitive form. At the ends of the bar were pans, or hooks, from which the things to be weighed were suspended, sometimes in bags.

Assyrian Balance (from Sculptures at Khorsabad).

A good description of the more developed and final form is this: A beam with its fulcrum in the middle and its arms precisely equal. From the ends of the arms were suspended two scales, the one to receive the object to be weighed, the other the counterpoise, or weight.

(2) The weights were of stone at first and are so named in Dt 25 13 AVm. A pair of scales (AV "a pair of balances") is used in Rev 6 5 by a figure of speech for the balance as a whole; only once is the beam so used, in Isa 46 6, lit. "weigh silver in the beam." Abraham, we are told (Gen 23 16), "weighed the silver."

The basis and fountain-head of all systems of weights and measurements is to be traced, it is now thought, to Babylonia; but the primitive instruments and systems were of Bab

2. Probably subject to many modifications as they entered other regions and passed into the derivative systems. The Rom "balance" is the same as our steelyard (vulgarly called "stillyards"). Cf the Chinese, Danish, etc.

Though the "balances" in ancient times were rudely constructed, the weighing could be done quite accurately, as may be seen in

3. The use of equally primitive balances in the East today. But the system was liable to fraud. A "false balance" might be lit. one so constructed that the arms were of unequal length, when the longer arm would be intended, of course, for the article to be weighed. The system was liable, however, to various other subtle abuses then as now; hence the importance in God's sight of "true weights" and a "just balance" is enforced again and again (see Lev 19 36; Prov 11 1; 16 11; 20 23; Am 8 5; Mic 6 11, etc).

"A false balance is an abomination to Jehovah" (Prov 11 1; cf 20 23), and "a just balance and scales are Jehovah's" (Prov 16 11). Hos (12 4. "Wicked 7) condemns "the balances of deceit" in Balances" the hand of the wicked; Am (8 5 AV) Condemned cries out upon "falsifying the balances by deceit," and Mic (6 11) denounces "wicked balances." Indeed, the righteousness of a just balance and true weights, and the iniquity of false ones are everywhere emphasized by the law-makers, prophets and moral teachers of Israel, and the preacher or teacher who would expose and denounce such things in God's name today need be at no loss for texts and precedents. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BALANCINGS, bal'ans-ins: "The balancings of the clouds" (Job 37 16), the manner in which they are poised and supported in the air, alike with their mysterious spreadings and motions, challenge the strongest intellect to explain.

BALASAMUS, ba-las'a-mus. See BAALSAMUS.

BALD LOCUST, bôld lô'kust. See LOCUST.

BALDNESS, bôld'ness (קִרְחָה, korhâh): The reference in the Bible to baldness is not to the natural loss of hair, but to baldness produced by shaving the head. This was practised as a mark of mourning for the dead (Lev 21 5; Isa 15 2; 22 12); as the result of any disaster (Am 8 10; Mic 1 16). The custom arose from the fact that the hair was regarded as a special ornament. It was the custom of the people of the land, and the Israelites were strictly forbidden to practise it (Lev 21 5; Deut 14 1). These are striking passages with reference to the knowledge the Israelites had concerning the future life. This is saying to them what Paul said to the Thessalonians (1 Thess 4 13). To call one a "bald head" was an epithet of contempt, and was sometimes applied to persons who were not naturally bald. It was the epithet applied by certain infidel young men to Elisha (2 K 2 23.24). In a fig. sense it is used to express the barrenness of the country (Jer 47 5). See HAIR; SHAVE.

JACOB W. KAPP

BALL, bôl (בֹּל, dûr): A rare Heb word used in this sense only in Isa 22 18, and correctly rendered in ARV "He will surely wind thee round and round, and toss thee like a ball into a large country." De Or, Böttcher, Jastrow, following Talm, regard the noun as kaddûr, but perhaps incorrectly. See also GAMES.

BALM, bām (בַּיִשׁ, ḥē-rē, ḥōrē; LXX ῥητίνη, rhētīnē): The name of an odoriferous resin said to be brought from Gilead by Ishmaelite Arabs on their way to Egypt (Gen 37 25). It is trad "balm" in AV and RV, but is called "mastic," RVm. In Gen 43 11 it is one of the gifts sent by Jacob to Joseph, and in Ezk 27 17 it is named as one of the exports from Judaea to Tyre. The prophet Jeremiah refers fig. to its medicinal properties as an application to wounds and as a sedative (8 22; 46 11; 51 8). The name is derived from a root signifying "to leak," and is applied to it as being an exudation. There is a sticky, honey-like gum resin prepared at the present day at Jericho, extracted from the Balanites Aegyptiaca grown in the Ghôr, and sold to travelers in small tin boxes as "Balm of Gilead," but it is improbable that this is the real ḥōrē and it has no medicinal value. The material to which the classic authors applied the name is that known as Mecca balsam, which is still imported into Egypt from Arabia, as it was in early times. This is the exudation from the Balsamodendron opobalsamum, a native of southern Arabia and Abyssinia. The tree is small, ragged-looking and with a yellowish bark like that of a plane tree, and the exudation is said to be gathered from its smaller branches. At the present day it grows nowhere in Pal. Dr. Post and other botanists have sought for it on the Ghôr and in Gilead, and have not found it, and there is no trace of it in the neighborhood of Jericho, which Pliny says is its only habitat. Strabo describes it as growing by the Sea of Galilee, as well as at Jericho, but both these and other ancient writers give inconsistent and incorrect descriptions of the tree evidently at second hand. We learn from Theophrastus that many of the spices of the farther East reached the Mediterranean shore through Pal, being brought by Arab caravans which would traverse the indefinitely bounded tract E. of Jordan to which the name Gilead is given, and it was probably thus that the balm received its local name. Mecca balsam is an orange-yellow, treacly fluid, mildly irritating to the skin, possibly a weak local stimulant and antiseptic, but of very little remedial value.

ALEX. MACALISTER

BALM OF GILEAD: The people of Jericho today prepare for the benefit of pilgrims a "Balm of Gilead" from the zakkûm (Balanites Aegyptiaca), but this has no serious claims to be the balm of antiquity. If we are to look beyond the borders of modern Pal we may credit the tradition which claims that Mecca balsam, a product of Balsamodendron Gileadense and B. opobalsamum, was the true "balm," and Post (HDB, I, 236) produces evidence to show that these plants were once grown in the Jordan valley. Yet another suggestion, made by Lagarde, is that the ḥōrē=στίφαξ, and if so then "balm" would be the inspissated juice of the Storax-tree (Styrax officinalis), a common inhabitant of Gilead. See also BALM.

BALNUUS, bal-nū'us (A, Βαλνοῦς, Balnoûs; B, Βαλνοῦς, Balnoûs=Binnui [Ezr 10 30]): B. put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 31).

BALSAM, bôl'sam (בָּשֵׂם, bāsām, בֶּשֶׂם, besem; ἡδύσμα, hēdīsmata; θυμιάματα, thumiāmata): Is usually "spices" but in RVm (Cant 5 1.13; 6 2) is rendered as "balsam." It was an ingredient in the anointing oil of the priests (Ex 25 6; 35 28). The Queen of Sheba brought it as a present to Solomon (1 K 10 2) in large quantity (ver 10) and of a finer quality (2 Ch 9 9) than that brought as a regular tribute by other visitors (1 K 10 25). In the later monarchy Hezekiah had a treasure of this perfume (2 Ch 32 27) which he displayed to his Bab visitors (Isa 39 2); and after the captivity the priests kept a store of it in the temple (1 Ch 9 30). According to Ezekiel the Syrians imported it from Sheba (27 22). There is a tradition preserved in Jos (Ant, VIII, vi, 6) that the Queen of Sheba brought roots of the plant to Solomon, who grew them in a garden of spices at Jericho, probably derived from the references to such a garden in Cant 5 1.13; 6 2. This may be the source of the statements of Strabo, Trogus and Pliny quoted above (see BALM). It was probably the same substance as the BALM described above, but from the reference in Ex 30 7; 35 8, it may have been used as a generic name for fragrant resins. The root from which the word is derived signifies "to be fragrant," and fragrant balsams or resins are known in modern Arab. as bahasān. The trees called in 2 S 5 23.24 (RVm) "balsam-trees" were certainly not those which yielded this substance, for there are none in the Sh'pēhlāh, but there are both mulberry trees and terebinths in the district between Rephaim and Gezer. When used as a perfume the name bāsām seems to have been adopted, but as a medicinal remedy it is called ḥōrē.

BALTASAR, bal-tā'sar (Βαλτασάρ, Baltasār; AV Balthasar):

(1) The Gr of Heb, בִּלְטַשְׁצָר, bēlt'sha'ṣṣar, or בִּלְטַשְׁצָר, bēlt'sha'ṣṣar, perhaps corresponding to Balāt-sar-ušur, "protect the life of the king," the Bab cognomen of Daniel. Cf Belteshazzar (Dnl 1 7; 2 26; 4 8 ff, et al.).

(2) B. is also the Gr of the Heb בִּלְשַׁצָּר, bēl-sha'ṣṣar, or בִּלְשַׁצָּר, bēl'sha'ṣṣar, the name of the last king of Babylon (corresponding to the Bab Bēl-sar-ušur; KAT, III, 396; Syr Blitshazzar; Vulg Baltassar). Cf Bar 1 11 and Belshazzar (Dnl 5 1 ff; 7 1; 8 1).

(3) The name of one of the Magi who according to the legend visited Jesus at Bethlehem: Melchior from Nubia, Balthasar from Godolia, Caspar from Tharsis.

BAMAH, bā'mā, bā'mā (בָּמָה, bāmāh, "high place"): The word appears in Ezk 20 29 where reference is made to former "high-place worship," the prophet speaking with contempt of such manner of worship. Ewald suggests a play of words, בָּא, bā, "come," and בָּמָה, māh, "what," "what [māh] is the high place [bā-māh] whereunto ye come [bā]?" It is possible that reference is made to a prominent high place like the one at Gibeon (cf 1 K 3 4; 1 Ch 16 39; 21 29; 2 Ch 1 3) for which the name "Bamah" was retained after the reform mentioned by the prophet.

BAMOTH, bā'moth, BAMOTH-BAAL, bā'moth-bā'al (בָּמוֹת בַּעַל, bāmōth-ba'al, "high places of Baal"): Bamoth is referred to in Nu 21 19.20, as a station in the journeyings of Israel N. of the Arnon. It is probably the same place as the Balam-baal of Nu 22 41 (RVm), whither Balak, king of Moab, conducted Balaam to view and to curse Israel. Bamoth-baal is named in Josh 13 17 as one of the cities given to Reuben. Mesha, on the M S, speaks of having "rebuilt" Beth-bamoth.

BAN (A, Bán, Bán; B, Baiván, Bainán; 1 Esd 5 37 = Tobiah [Ezr 2 60; Neh 7 62]; some MSS of the LXX read Bová, Boud): The descendants of B. were not able to trace their ancestry to show "how they were of Israel."

BANAIAS, ban-á-yás (Bavalas, Banaias; 1 Esd 9 35 = Benaiah [Ezr 10 43]): B. put away his "strange wife."

BAND: The Eng. word has two generic meanings, each shading off into several specific meanings: (1) that which holds together, binds or encircles: a bond; (2) a company of men. The second sense may philologically and logically have been derived from the first, men being held together by social ties. Both meanings appear in OT and NT representing various Heb and Gr words.

(1) A band (a) (אֶשְׂרָה, 'ešûr): a flaxen rope (Jgs 15 14); a band of iron and brass (Dnl 4 15.23); metaphorically of a false woman's hands (Ecl 7 26).

(b) (חֶבֶל, hebel): "The bands of the wicked have robbed me" (AV of Ps 119 61), where "bands" = "troops" by mistr; RV "The cords of the wicked have wrapped me round"; plur. hobhlím = "bands" = the name of the prophet's symbolic staff representing the brotherhood between Judah and Israel (Zec 11 7.14). (c) (עֲבֹת, 'abhôth): "I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love" (Hos 11 4; cf Ezk 3 25; 4 8; Job 39 10).

(d) (שֶׁפָּה, sāphāh): the edge of the round opening in the robe of the ephod with a band (RV "binding") round about the hole of it (only in Ex 39 23).

(e) (חַרְצֻבּוֹת, harṣūbbôth): bands (RV "bonds") of wickedness (Isa 58 6); bands (=pains) in death (Ps 73 4); RVm ("pangs," Cheyne, "torments").

(f) (מֹשֶׁת, mōšēh): the cross bar of oxen's yoke, holding them together (Lev 26 13; Ezk 34 27 AV; RV "bars"). (g) (מֹשֶׁר, mōšer): a fetter: "Who hath loosed the bonds of the swift ass?" (Job 39 5; Ps 2 3; 107 14; Isa 28 22; 52 2; Jer 2 20; all in AV and RV). The same Heb word (in Ps 116 16; Jer 5 5; 27 2; 30 8; Nah 1 13) is tr^d "bonds" in AV, and in ERV of Ps 116 16, and Nah 1 13, but "bands" in ERV of Jer 5 5; 27 2; 30 8; ARV has "bonds" throughout. See BOND.

(h) (מֹשֶׁת־חֹת, mōshēkhôth): "Canst thou . . . loose the bands of Orion?" (only in Job 38 31).

(i) (δεσμός, desmós, σύνδεσμος, sündesmos): a fetter: that which binds together: of the chains of a lunatic or prisoner (Lk 8 29; Acts 16 26; 22 30 AV), metaphorically of the mystic union of Christ and the church (Col 2 19). These words are often tr^d by "bond" in AV and RV. (j) (ζευκτηρία, zeuktēria): the rudder's bands (only in Acts 27 40).

(2) A company of men (a) (בְּרִיד, brîd): a band of soldiers (2 S 4 2; 1 K 11 24 AV; 2 K 6 23; 13 20.21; 24 2; 1 Ch 7 4; 12 18.21; 2 Ch 22 1). So RV (except in 1 K 11 24, "troop"). (b) (רֹשׁ, rō'sh): "head" = "division": "The Chaldeans made three bands" (Job 1 17); 1 Ch 12 23 RV translates "heads." (c) (חַיִּיל, hayil): "a band of men" RV the "host" (only in 1 S 10 26). (d) (אֶנְיֹת, 'ēnōt): "the wings of an army," only in Ezk armies of the King of Judah (12 14; 17 21); of Gomer and of Togarmah (38 6); of Gog (RV "hordes") (38 9.22; 39 4). (e) (מַחֲנֶה, maḥāneh): "camp": only in Gen 32 7.10; RV "companies."

(f) (חֲבָצֵץ, hōḇṣeṣ): of locusts dividing into companies or swarms (Prov 30 27). (g) (σπεῖρα, speira): usually a "cohort" (see RVm) of Rom soldiers; the tenth part of a legion, about 600 men: (Mt 27 27; Mk 15 16; Acts 10 1; 21 31; 27 1). A smaller detachment of soldiers (Jn 18 3.12; cf 2 Macc 8 23; Jth 14 11). (h) (ποιεῖν συστροφὴν, poiēin sustrophēn): "to make a conspiracy": "The Jews banded together" (Acts 23 12). T. REES

(3) The Augustan Band (σπεῖρα Σεβαστῆς, speira Sebastē) to which Julius, the Rom centurion who had charge of St. Paul as a prisoner on his voyage to Rome, belonged, was a cohort apparently stationed at Caesarea at the time (Acts 27 1). Schürer (GJV, I³, 461 f) is of opinion that it was one of five cohorts mentioned by Jos, recruited in Samaria and called Sebastenes from the Gr name of the city of Samaria (Sebaste). This particular cohort had in all likelihood for its full name Cohors Augusta Sebastenorum, Augusta being an honorific title of which examples are found in the case of auxiliary troops. Sir William Ramsay, following Mommsen (St. Paul the Traveller, 315, 348), thinks it denotes a body of legionary centurions, selected from legions serving abroad, who were employed by the emperor on confidential business between the provinces and Rome, the title Augustan being conferred upon them as a mark of favor and distinction. The grounds on which the views of Mommsen and Ramsay rest are questioned by Professor Zahn (Introduction to the NT, I, 551 ff), and more evidence is needed to establish them. See ARMY (ROMAN).

(4) The Italian Band (σπεῖρα Ἰταλική, speira Italikē) was a cohort composed of volunteer Rom citizens born in Italy and stationed at Caesarea at this time (Acts 10 1). Schürer maintains that there could have been no Rom cohort there at this time, although he accepts the testimony of inscriptions to the presence of an Italian cohort at a later time. He accordingly rejects the story of Cornelius, holding that the author of the Acts has given in this narrative conditions belonging to a later time (GJV, I³, 462 f). In reply to Schürer, Blass asks why one of the five cohorts mentioned by Jos may not have been composed of Rom citizens living at Caesarea or Sebaste, and bearing this name (Blass, Acta Apostolorum, 124). From a recently discovered inscription, Sir W. M. Ramsay has ascertained that there was an Italian cohort stationed in Syria in 69 AD, which heightens the probability of one actually being found in Caesarea at 41-44 AD, and he shows that even if his cohort was at the time on duty elsewhere a centurion like Cornelius might well have been at Caesarea at the time mentioned (Expositor, 5th ser., IV, V, with Schürer's rejoinder). The subject of detached service in the provinces of the Rom Empire is admittedly obscure, but nothing emerges in this discussion to cast doubt upon the historical character of St. Luke's narrative. See ARMY (ROMAN).

(1) A Gadite, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 36).

(2) A Levite whose son was appointed for service in the tabernacle at David's time (1 Ch 6 46).

(3) A Judahite whose son lived in Jerus after the captivity (1 Ch 9 4).

(4) The descendants of B. (called Binnui, Neh 7 15) returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 10) and had taken "strange wives" (Ezr 10 29).

(5) B. who had taken a "strange wife" (Ezr 10 38) mentioned with his brothers, the sons of B. who also had taken "strange wives" (Ezr 10 34).

(6) Son of B., a Levite and builder (Neh 3 17).
(7) B., who instructed the people at Ezra's time (Neh 8 7).

(8) Three Levites mentioned in connection with the temple worship at Ezra's time (Neh 9 4.5).

(9) A Levite who sealed the covenant with Neh (Neh 10 13).

BANIAS, ba-nī'as (B, Bavias, Banias; A, Bavī, Banī; AV Banid [1 Esd 8 36]): An ancestor of Salimoth. The descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerus. The name is omitted (Ezr 8 10), perhaps due to the oversight of a copyist or a mistaken reading of בָּנִי, b'nē, "sons of," for בְּנֵי, b'nī.

(2) (גִּדְהָה, gādhāh, "cuttings"): Always of banks overflowed (Josh 3 15; 4 18; Isa 8 7), as also

(3) (גִּדְיָה, gidhyāh, 1 Ch 12 15).

(4) (סִלְלָה, sōl'lāh, "mound," "rampart"): "Cast up a b. against the city" (2 S 20 15, ERV "mount," ARV "mound"; cf 2 K 19 32; Isa 37 33). "Banks of sweet herbs" (Cant 5 13); "the marginal rendering is the right one, 'towers of perfumes,' i.e. plants with fragrant leaves and flowers trained on trellis-work" (Speaker's Comm. in loc.).

(5) (χάραξ, chāraz, "a stake," "entrenchment"): "Thine enemies shall cast up a bank about thee" (Lk 19 43 AV "trench"). It is probably a military term and stands for a "palisade" (so RVm), i.e. probably an embankment of stakes strengthened with branches and earth, with a ditch behind it, used by the besiegers as a protection against arrows or attacking parties (Lat vallum), such, no doubt, as was employed by Titus in the siege of Jerus, 70 AD (Jos, BJ, V, vi, 2).

(6) BANK, BANKING (q.v.). M. O. EVANS

BANK, BANKING: "Banking" in the full modern sense, of taking money on deposit and lending it out on interest, is of comparatively recent origin. A few

1. Introductory

"banks of deposit" were founded in Italy in the Middle Ages, but the earliest "banks of issue," of the modern sort, were those of Amsterdam (1609) and Hamburg (1619), beginning in the 17th cent. The law of Moses forbade Israelites to charge each other interest (Ex 22 25; Lev 25 35.37; Dt 23 19), but let them lend on interest to Gentiles (Dt 23 20), though this law was often evaded or disregarded (Neh 5 10.12). Banks and banking, however, are found in operation in the Gr cities; "money-changers," sitting at their tables (trápezai) in the market place, both changed coins and took money on deposit, giving high interest; and banking of a sort, in its incipient stages, existed among the ancient Hebrews. But the Phoenicians are now thought to have been the inventors of the money-changing, money-lending system which is found in more or less modified and developed forms among ancient peoples and in full development and operation in the palmy days of the Rom Empire. In the Gr-Rom period, without doubt, bankers both received money on deposit, paying interest, and let it out at a higher rate, or employed it in trade, as the publicani at Rome did, in farming the revenues of a province (Plumptre).

(1) The Heb money-changer, like his modern Syrian counterpart, the sarāf (see PEFS, 1904, 49 ff, where the complexity of exchange in Pal today is graphically described), changed the large coins current into those of smaller denominations, e.g. Hebrews giving denarii for tetradrachms, or silver for gold, or copper for silver.

(2) But no mean part of his business was the exchanging of foreign money, and even the money of the country of a non-Phoen standard, for shekels and half-shekels on this standard, the latter being accepted only in payment of the temple dues (see MONEY). The "money-changers" of Mt 21 12, as the Gr signifies, were men who made small change. Such men may be seen in Jerus now with various coins piled in slender pillars on a table (cf epi trápezan, Lk 19 23), ready to be used in changing money for a premium into such forms, or denominations, as would be more current or more convenient for immediate use.

(3) "Usury" in EV is simply OE for what we today call "interest," i.e. the sum paid for the use of money, Lat usura; and "interest" should take the place of it in all passages in the OT and NT, where it has such significance.

The Gr word rendered (tókos), "usury" in the NT (see Lk 19 23 f) means lit. "what is born of money," "what money brings forth or produces." "Usury" has come to mean "exorbitant interest," but did not mean this at the time of AV, 1611.

(1) In Christ's time, and immediately following, there was great need for money-changers and money-changing, esp. on the part of

3. Banking foreign Jews whom custom forbade in NT to put any but Jewish coins into the Times temple treasury (see Mk 12 41). It was mainly for the convenience of these Jews of the Dispersion, and because it was in order to a sacred use, that the people thought it proper to allow the money-changers to set up their tables in the outer court of the temple (see Mt 21 12 ff).

Bank: Money Changer.

(2) The language of Mt 25 27, "Thou oughtest to have put my money to the bankers," etc, would seem to indicate the recognition by Christ of the custom and propriety of lending out money on interest (cf 19 23). The "exchangers" here are "bankers" (cf Mt 25 27). The Gr (trápezitai) is from a word for "bank" or "bench" (trápeza), i.e. the "table" or "counter" on which the money used to be received and paid out. These "bankers" were clearly of a higher class than the "small-change men" of Mt 21 12, etc (cf "changers of money," Jn 2 14, and "changers," Jn 2 15 EV). Christ upbraids the "slothful servant" because he had not given his pound to "the bank" (or "banker," epi trapezan, lit. "on a banker's table"), who, it is implied, would have kept it safe and paid interest for it (Lk 19 23 f). It is noteworthy that the "ten minae" of ver 24 are those acquired by "the good servant" from the "one" which was first lent him. So these wealthier bankers even then in a way received money on deposit for investment and paid interest on it, after the fashion of the Greeks.

(1) In Christ's parable (Lk 19 23 ff) "the bank" (lit. "a bank," "table") is taken by some to mean "the synagogue," by others to mean "the church" (Lange, LJ, II, 1, 414); i.e. it is thought that Christ meant to teach that the organized body, "synagogue" or "church," might use the gifts or powers of an adherent or disciple, when he himself could not exercise them (cf DCG, art. "Bank").

(2) Then some have thought that Christ was here pointing to prayer as a substitute for good works, when the disciple was unable to do such. Such views seem far-fetched and unnecessary (cf Bruce, Parabolic Teaching of Christ, 209 f).

(3) The "money-changers," then as now, had ever to be on guard against false money, which gives point to the oft-quoted extra-scriptural saying (agraphon) of Jesus to His disciples: "Be ye expert money-changers" (Gr ginēsthai trapezitai dōkimoi; see Origen, in Joan, XIX), which was taken (Clem., Hom., III, 61) to mean, "Be skilful in distinguishing true doctrine from false" (HDB, 1-vol.).

BANNAIA, ba-nā'ya. See SABANNEUS.

BANNAS, ban'as (Bávvas, Bánnos; AV Banuas): A name occurring in the list of those who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 26). Bannas and Sudias are represented by Hoodaviah in the lists of Ezra and Nehemiah.

BANNEAS, ban-ē'as (Bavvalas, Bannaías; AV Baanias [1 Esd 9 26]=Benaiah [Ezr 10 25]): B. put away his "strange wife."

BANNER, ban'ēr (ENSIGN, STANDARD): The Eng. word "banner" is from banderia, Low Lat., meaning a banner (cf bandum, Lat., which meant first a "band," an organized military troop, and then a "flag"). It has come to mean a flag, or standard, carried at the head of a military band or body, to indicate the line of march, or the rallying point, and it is now applied, in its more extended significance, to royal, national, or ecclesiastical "banners" also. We find it applied sometimes to a streamer on the end of a lance, such as is used by the Arab sheik today. "B." occurs in the following significant OT passages: (1) in the sing., "Lift ye up a b.

upon the high mountain" (Isa 13 2 AV); "a b. to them that fear thee" (Ps 60 4); and (2) in the plur., "In the name of our God we will set up our b." (Ps 20 5); "terrible as an army with b." (Cant 6 4).

The Hebrews, it would seem, like the Assyrians, the Egyptians, and other ancient nations, had military ensigns. As bearing upon this question, a very significant passage is that found in Nu 2 2: "The children of Israel shall encamp every man by his own standard, with the ensigns of their fathers' houses." "Standard-bearer" in Isa 10 18 AV, "They shall be as when a standard-bearer fainteth," is not a case in point, but is to be rendered as in RVm, "as when a sick man pineth away."

Egyptian Standards.

In this noted passage a distinction seems intentionally made (another view is held by some) between "the ensigns of their fathers' houses" (lit. "signs"; cf Ps 74 4, where the reference is thought by some today to be to the standards of Antiochus' army), and "the standards" of the four great divisions of the Heb tribes in the wilderness (cf the "banner" of Cant 2 4 and 6 4).

2. A Distinction The word nēs, AV and RV "standard" is by no means clear. The word nēs, here tr^d "standard," seems to have meant at first a pole set up on an eminence as a signal for mustering troops (cf "mast" Isa 30 17 ERVm). But it occurs frequently in the prophets both in this lit. and original sense, and in the fig. or derived sense of a rallying point for God's people (see Isa 5 26; 11 10; Jer 4 21 and elsewhere). Here the rendering in EV alternates between "ensign" and "banner" (see HDB, 1-vol, art. "Banner").

BANNUS, ban'us (Bavvoús, Bannoús [1 Esd 9 34]=Bani or Binnui [Ezr 10 29,30]): The sons of B. put away their "strange wives."

BANQUET, ban'kwet: (1) "Banquet" and "banqueting" in AV always include and stand for wine-drinking, not simply "feast" or "feasting" in our sense. Thus (Cant 2 4), "He brought me to the banqueting-house" is lit. "the house of wine," and Est 7 2 has in the Heb "a banquet of wine." In the NT we see a reflection of the same fact in 1 Pet 4 3 AV, "We walked in excess of wine, banquetings" (Gr "drinkings"; RV "carousings"). Cf Amos 6 7 AV, "The banquet of them that stretched themselves," where the reference seems to be to reclining at wine-drinkings. See MEALS.

1. The Ancient Hebrew Customs The Heb of Job 1 4 (עֵשֶׂי מִשְׁתֶּה), AV tr "make a banquet," may refer to a social feast of a less objectionable sort (cf 41 6 AV), though the Heb מִשְׁתֶּה="to drink" יָרַד="wine," was used as synonymous with "banquet." See SYMPOSIUM.

The Heb of Job 1 4 (עֵשֶׂי מִשְׁתֶּה), AV tr "make a banquet," may refer to a social feast of a less objectionable sort (cf 41 6 AV), though the Heb מִשְׁתֶּה="to drink" יָרַד="wine," was used as synonymous with "banquet." See SYMPOSIUM.

Music, dancing and merriment usually attended all such festivities. Certainly the ancient Hebrews, like other peoples of the ancient East, were very fond of social feasting, and in Christ's day had acquired, from contact with Greeks and Romans, luxurious and bibulous habits, that often carried them to excess in their social feasts.

Among the Greeks the word for "feast" (dochē) is from déchomai "to receive" (cf our Eng. usage, "to receive" and "reception"). This word dochē is used with poieîn "to make," to signify "to make" or "give a feast." Cf Lk 5 29 where Levi "made a feast."

(1) In view of existing customs and abuses, Christ taught His followers when they gave a banquet to invite the poor, etc (Lk 14 13), rather than, as the fashion of the day called for, to bid the rich and influential. Much in the NT that has to do with banquets and banquetings will be obscure to us of the West if we do not keep in mind the many marked differences of custom between the East and the West.

(2) "Banquets" were usually given in the house of the host to specially invited guests (Lk 14 15; Jn 2 2), but much more freedom was accorded to the uninvited than we of the West are accustomed to, as one finds to be true everywhere in the East today. The custom of reclining at meals (see MEALS; TRICLINIUM, etc) was everywhere in vogue among the well-to-do in Christ's day, even in the case of the ordinary meals, the guest leaning upon the left arm and eating with the aid of the right (cf Mt 26 20m "reclining," and 1 Cor 11 20, "the Lord's supper").

(3) "Banquets" were considered normal parts of weddings as they are now throughout the East. Jesus and His disciples were bidden to one at Cana in Galilee, and accepted the invitation (Jn 2 2 ff), and wine-drinking was a part of the feast. The "banquet" Levi gave was in Christ's honor (Lk 5 29). There were numbers present and marked gradations in the places at table (Mt 23 6; Mk 12 39; Lk 14 7; 20 46). Guests were invited in advance, and then, as time-pieces were scarce, specially notified when the feast was ready, which helps to explain Christ's words (Mt 22 4), "All things are ready: come to the marriage" (cf Lk 14 17; Est 5 8; 6 14).

(4) Matthew tells us (23 6) that the Pharisees "love the chief place ["uppermost rooms" AV] at feasts."

In Mt 22 3,4 "made a marriage feast," is rendered by some simply "a feast," because Gr gamos, "marriage," was used by LXX to translate the Heb for "feast" in Est 1 5. But, as this is the only known example of such a use of gamos, it is better to take it here in the lit. sense of "marriage feast," as would seem to be required by the words "for his son" (Messiah). The Gr is plur. (gamous) to indicate the several parts or stages of the feast (Button, 23; cf Eng. "nuptials").

The "ruler of the feast" (architriklinos, Jn 2 8,9), was usually one of the guests, and his business was to see that wine was provided, superintend the drinking, etc (cf Lk 22 27).

(1) In Mt 22 4, "I have made ready my dinner," "dinner" in Gr is ariston (cf Lk 11 38). "Supper" (Gr deipnon) is found in Mt 23 6 and often in the NT. Both words are found in Lk 14 12. The question arises, What was the distinction? Thus much may be said in answer: The ariston (EV "dinner") was a meal usually taken about the middle of the forenoon, with variations of earlier or later; the deipnon (EV "supper"), the one taken at the close of the day, often after dark. In Ant, V, iv, 2 Jos supposes Eglon's guards (Jgs 3 24) were negligent about noon, "both because of the heat and because their attention was turned to dinner" (ariston). So the "dinner" (ariston) was sometimes as late as noon. Yet Jn (21 12,15) shows, on the other hand, that the ariston was on some occasions taken shortly after dawn.

(2) Another question raised is this, Were the ancient Jews accustomed to have two or three meals a day? Vambéry, quoted by Morison, gives a saying of the Turks that is in point: "There are only two meals a day, the smaller at 10 or 11 o'clock in the morning, the second and larger after sunset." There seems no evidence to sustain the view, maintained by Grimm and entertained by others, that the Jews of Christ's day were accustomed to take a separate and slight meal on rising, as the later Greeks and some of the later Romans did. There is certainly no clear evidence that the Jews of that day had more than two meals a day (see DB, art. "Meals").

(3) The marriage feast of Mt 22 3 f was an ariston, somewhat like an Eng. "wedding-breakfast"; but that in Lk 14 16 f was a deipnon, which was as usual delayed till after dark (ver 17). Perhaps the ariston in this case was preliminary, while the marriage with its accompanying deipnon was after dark; such things are not unheard of today (cf Mt 26 20 and 1 Cor 11 20, "the Lord's deipnon").

III. THE PRESENT OBLIGATION

LITERATURE

This art. is not a discussion of the whole subject, but is merely a presentation of the Baptist interpretation of the ordinance. The origin and history of the ordinance, as a whole, do not come within the range of the present treatment.

I. Meaning of Baptism.—The vb. used in the NT is βαπτίζω (baptizō). The subst. baptisma and baptismos occur, though the latter is not used in the NT of the ordinance of baptism except by implication (He 6 2, "the teaching of baptisms") where the reference is to the distinction between the Christian ordinance and the Jewish ceremonial ablutions. Some documents have it also in Col 2 12 (cf He 9 10, "divers washings") for a reference purely to the Jewish purifications (cf the dispute about purifying in Jn 3 25). The verb baptizō appears in this sense in Lk 11 38m where the Pharisee marveled that Jesus "had not first bathed himself before breakfast" (noon-day meal). The Mosaic regulations required the bath of the whole body (Lev 15 16) for certain uncleannesses. Tertullian (de Baptismo, XV) says that the Jew required almost daily washing. Herodotus (ii.47) says that if an Egyptian "touches a swine in passing with his clothes, he goes to the river and dips himself [báptō] from it" (quoted by Broadus in Comm. on Matthew, 333). See also the Jewish scrupulosity illustrated in Sir 34 25 and Jth 12 7 where baptizō occurs. The same thing appears in the correct text in Mk 7 4, "And when they come from the market-place, except they bathe themselves, they eat not." Here baptizō is the true text. The use of rhantizō ("sprinkle") is due to the difficulty felt by copyists not familiar with Jewish customs.

1. Terminology—The ordinance of baptism except by implication (He 6 2, "the teaching of baptisms") where the reference is to the distinction between the Christian ordinance and the Jewish ceremonial ablutions. Some documents have it also in Col 2 12 (cf He 9 10, "divers washings") for a reference purely to the Jewish purifications (cf the dispute about purifying in Jn 3 25). The verb baptizō appears in this sense in Lk 11 38m where the Pharisee marveled that Jesus "had not first bathed himself before breakfast" (noon-day meal). The Mosaic regulations required the bath of the whole body (Lev 15 16) for certain uncleannesses. Tertullian (de Baptismo, XV) says that the Jew required almost daily washing. Herodotus (ii.47) says that if an Egyptian "touches a swine in passing with his clothes, he goes to the river and dips himself [báptō] from it" (quoted by Broadus in Comm. on Matthew, 333). See also the Jewish scrupulosity illustrated in Sir 34 25 and Jth 12 7 where baptizō occurs. The same thing appears in the correct text in Mk 7 4, "And when they come from the market-place, except they bathe themselves, they eat not." Here baptizō is the true text. The use of rhantizō ("sprinkle") is due to the difficulty felt by copyists not familiar with Jewish customs.

See also the omission of "couches" in the same verse. The couches were "pallets" and could easily be dipped into water. It is noteworthy that here rhantizō is used in contrast with baptizō, showing that baptizō did not mean sprinkle. The term baptismós occurs in Jos (Ant., XVIII, v, 2) in connection with John's baptism (cf also Irenaeus 686 B about Christ's baptism). In general, however, baptisma is the subst. found for the ordinance. The vb. baptizō is in reality a frequentative or intensive of baptō ("dip"). Examples occur where that idea is still appropriate, as in 2 K 5 14 (LXX) where Naaman is said to have "dipped himself seven times in the Jordan" (ebaptisato). The notion of repetition may occur also in Jos (Ant., XV, iii, 3) in connection with the death of Aristobulus, brother of Mariamne, for Herod's friends "dipped him as he was swimming, and plunged him under water, in the dark of the evening." But in general the term baptizō, as is common with such forms in the late Gr, is simply equivalent to baptō (cf Lk 16 24) and means "dip," "immerse," just as rhantizō, like rhainō, means simply "sprinkle."

If baptizō never occurred in connection with a disputed ordinance, there would be no controversy on the meaning of the word. There are, indeed, fig. or metaphorical uses of the word as of other words, but the fig. is that of immersion, like our "immersed in cares," "plunged in grief," etc. It remains to consider whether the use of the word for a ceremony or ordinance has changed its significance in the NT as compared with ancient Gr.

It may be remarked that no Baptist has written a lexicon of the Gr language, and yet the standard lexicons, like that of Liddell and Scott, uniformly give the meaning of baptizō as "dip," "immerse." They do not give "pour" or "sprinkle," nor has anyone ever adduced an instance where this verb means "pour" or "sprinkle." The presumption is therefore in favor of "dip" in the NT.

Before we turn directly to the discussion of the ceremonial usage, a word is called for in regard to Jewish proselyte baptism. It is still

2. Proselyte Baptism a matter of dispute whether this initiatory rite was in existence at the time of John the Baptist or not.

Schürer argues ably, if not conclusively, for the idea that this proselyte baptism was in use long before the first mention of it in the 2d cent. (cf The Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, Div ii, II, 319 ff; also Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus, Appendix, xii, Baptism of Proselytes). It matters nothing at all to the Baptist contention what is true in this regard. It would not be strange if a bath was required for a Gentile who became a Jew, when the Jews themselves required such frequent ceremonial ablutions. But what was the Jewish initiatory rite called proselyte baptism? Lightfoot (Horae Hebraicae, Mt 3 7) gives the law for the baptism of proselytes: "As soon as he grows whole of the wound of circumcision, they bring him to Baptism, and being placed in the water they again instruct him in some weightier and in some lighter commands of the Law. Which being heard, he plunges himself and comes up, and, behold, he is an Israelite in all things." To this quotation Marcus Dods (Presbyterian) HDB adds: "To use Pauline language, his old man is dead and buried in the water, and he rises from this cleansing grave a new man. The full significance of the rite would have been lost had immersion not been practised." Lightfoot says further: "Every person baptized must dip his whole body, now stripped and made naked, at one dipping. And whosoever in the Law washing of the body or garments is mentioned, it means nothing else than the washing of the whole body." Edersheim (op.

cit.) says: "Women were attended by those of their own sex, the rabbis standing at the door outside." Jewish proselyte baptism, an initiatory ceremonial rite, harmonizes exactly with the current meaning of baptizō already seen. There was no peculiar "sacred" sense that changed "dip" to "sprinkle."

The Gr language has had a continuous history, and baptizō is used today in Greece for baptism. As is well known, not only in Greece, but all over Russia, wherever the Gr church prevails, immersion is the unbroken and universal practice. The Greeks may surely be credited with knowledge of the meaning of their own language. The substitution of pouring or sprinkling for immersion, as the Christian ordinance of baptism, was late and gradual and finally triumphed in the West because of the decree of the Council of Trent. But the Baptist position is that this substitution was unwarranted and subverts the real significance of the ordinance. The Gr church does practice trine immersion, one immersion for each person of the Trinity, an old practice (cf ter mergilamur, Tertullian ii.79 A), but not the Scriptural usage. A word will be needed later concerning the method by which pouring crept in beside immersion in the 2d and later cents. Before we turn directly to the NT use of baptizō it is well to quote from the Greek Lexicon of the Roman and Byzantine Periods by Professor E. A. Sophocles, himself a native Greek. He says (p. 297): "There is no evidence that Luke and Paul and the other writers of the NT put upon this verb meanings not recognized by the Greeks." We expect therefore to find in the NT "dip," as the meaning of this word in the ceremonial sense of an initiatory Christian rite. Thayer's Lexicon likewise defines the word in this ceremonial Christian use to mean "an immersion in water, performed as a sign of the removal of sin."

Baptists could very well afford to rest the matter right here. There is no need to call for the testimony of a single Baptist scholar on this subject. The world of scholarship has rendered its decision with impartiality and force on the side of the Baptists in this matter. A few recent deliverances will suffice. Dr. Alfred Plummer (Church of England) in his new Commentary on Matthew (p. 28) says that the office of John the Baptist was "to bind them to a new life, symbolized by immersion in water." Swete (Church of England) in his Commentary on Mark (p. 7) speaks of "the added thought of immersion, which gives vividness to the scene." The early Gr ecclesiastical writers show that immersion was employed (cf Barnabas, XI, 11): "We go down into the water full of sins and filth, and we come up bearing fruit in the heart." For numerous ecclesiastical examples see Sophocles' Lexicon.

But the NT itself makes the whole matter perfectly plain. The uniform meaning of "dip" for

4. NT Usage baptizō and the use of the river Jordan as the place for baptizing by John the Baptist makes inevitable the notion of immersion unless there is some direct contradictory testimony. It is a matter that should be lifted above verbal quibbling or any effort to disprove the obvious facts. The simple narrative in Mt 3 6 is that "they were baptized of him in the river Jordan." In Mk 1 9.10 the baptism is sharpened a bit in the use of eis and ek. Jesus "was baptized of John in [eis] the Jordan. And straightway coming up out of [ek] the water, he saw." So in Acts 8 38 we read: "They both went down into [eis] the water, both Philip and the eunuch; and he baptized him. And when they came up out of [ek] the water, the Spirit . . . caught away Philip." If one could still be in doubt about the matter, Paul sets it at rest by the symbolism used in Rom 6 4, "We were buried therefore with him through baptism into death: that like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of the Father, so we also might walk in newness of life." The submergence and emergence of immersion thus, according to Paul, symbolize the death and burial to sin on the one hand and the resurrection to the new life in Christ on the other. Sanday and Headlam (Church of England) put it thus in their Comm. on Romans (p. 153): "It expresses symbolically a series of acts corresponding to the redeeming acts of Christ. Immersion=Death. Submersion=Burial (the ratification of death). Emergence=Resurrection." In Col 2 12 Paul again says: "having been buried with him in baptism, wherein ye were also raised with him through faith in the working of God, who raised him from the dead." The same image is here presented. Lightfoot (Church of England) on Colossians (p. 182) says: "Baptism is the grave of the old man, and the birth of the new. As he sinks beneath the baptismal waters, the believer buries there all his corrupt affections and past sins; as he emerges thence, he rises regenerate, quickened to new hopes and new life."

There is nothing in the NT to offset this obvious and inevitable interpretation. There are some things which are brought up, but they vanish on examination. The use of "with" after baptize in the English tr is appealed to as disproving immersion. It is enough to reply that the Committee of the American Standard Revision, which had no Baptist member at the final revision, substituted "in" for "with." Thus: "I indeed baptize you in water unto repentance" (Mt 3 11; cf also Mk 1 8). The use of both "with" and "in" in Lk 3 16 is a needless sticking for the use of the Gr en with the locative case. In Mk 1 8 en is absent in the best MSS, and yet the American Revisers correctly render "in." In Acts 1 5 they seek to draw the distinction between the mere locative and en and the locative. As a matter of fact the locative case alone is amply sufficient in Gr without en for the notion of "in." Thus in Jn 21 8 the tr is: "But the other disciples came in the little boat." There is no en in the Gr, but "the boat" is simply in the locative case. If it be argued that we have the instrumental case (cf the instrumental case of en as in Rev 6 8, "kill with sword"), the answer is that the way to use water as an instrument in dipping is to put the subject in the water, as the natural way to use the boat (Jn 21 8) as an instrument is to get into it. The presence or absence of en with baptizō is wholly immaterial. In either case "dip" is the meaning of the vb. The objection that three thousand people could not have been immersed in Jerus on the day of Pentecost is superficial. Jerus was abundantly supplied with pools. There were 120 disciples on hand, most of whom were probably men (cf the 70 sent out before by Jesus). It is not at all necessary to suppose that the 12 (Matthias was now one of them) apostles did all the baptizing. But even so, that would be only 250 apiece. I myself have baptized 42 candidates in a half-hour in a creek where there would be no delay. It would at most be only a matter of four or five hours for each of the twelve. Among the Telugus this record has been far exceeded. It is sometimes objected that Paul could not have immersed the jailer in the prison; but the answer is that Luke does not say so. Indeed Luke implies just the opposite: "And he took [took along in the Gr, para] them the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes; and was baptized." He took Paul and Silas along with him and found a place for the baptism, probably, somewhere on the prison grounds. There is absolutely nothing in the NT to controvert the unvarying significance of baptizō.

Appeal has been made to the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles, which may belong to the first half of the 2d cent. Here for the first

5. The time pouring is distinctly admitted as "Didache"

Because of this remarkable passage it is argued by some that, though immersion was the normal and regular baptism, yet alongside of it, pouring was allowed, and that in reality it was a matter of indifference which was used even in the 1st cent. But that is not the true interpretation of the facts in the case. The passage deserves to be quoted in full and is here given in the tr of Philip Schaff (Presbyterian) in his edition of the Did (pp. 184 ff): "Now concerning baptism, baptize thus: Having first taught all these things, baptize ye into [eis] the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, in living water. And if thou hast not living water, baptize into other water; and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm [water]. But if thou hast neither, pour water thrice upon the head in [eis] the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." There is thus no doubt that early in the 2d cent. some Christians felt that baptism was so important that, when the real baptism (immersion) could not be performed because of lack of water, pouring might be used in its place. This is absolutely all that can be deduced from this passage. It is to be noted that for pouring another word (ekchéō) is used, clearly showing that baptizō does not mean "to pour." The very exception filed proves the Baptist contention concerning baptizō. Now in the NT baptizō is the word used for baptism. Ekchéō is never so used. Harnack in a letter to Rev. C. E. W. Dobbs, Madison, Ind. (published in The Independent for February 9, 1885), under date of January 16, 1885 says: "(1) Baptizein undoubtedly signifies immersion (eintauchen). (2) No proof can be found that it signifies anything else in the NT and in the most ancient Christian literature. The suggestion regarding 'a sacred sense' is out of the question." This is the whole point of the Baptists admirably stated by Adolph Harnack. There is no thought of denying that pouring early in the 2d cent. came to be used in place of immersion in certain extreme cases. The meaning of baptizō is not affected a particle by this fact. The question remains as to why this use of pouring in extreme cases grew up. The answer is that it was due to a mistaken and exaggerated estimate put upon the value of baptism as essential to salvation. Those who died without baptism were felt by some to be lost. Thus arose "clinic" baptisms.

perversion of the symbolism of baptism grew both pouring as an ordinance and infant baptism. If baptism is necessary to salvation or the means of regeneration, then the sick, the dying, infants, must be baptized, or at any rate something must be done for them if the real baptism (immersion) cannot be performed because of extreme illness or want of water. The Baptist contention is to protest against the perversion of the significance of baptism as the ruin of the symbol. Baptism, as taught in the NT, is the picture of death and burial to sin and resurrection to new life, a picture of what has already taken place in the heart, not the means by which spiritual change is wrought. It is a privilege and duty, not a necessity. It is a picture that is lost when something else is substituted in its place. See BAPTISMAL REGENERATION.

II. The Subjects of Baptism.—It is significant that even the Teaching of the Twelve Apostles with its exaggerated notion of the importance of baptism does not allow baptism of infants. It says: "Having first taught all these things." Instruction precedes baptism. That is a distinct denial of infant baptism. The uniform practice in the NT is that baptism follows confession. The people "confessing their sins" were baptized by John (Mt 3 6). It is frankly admitted by Paedobaptist scholars that the NT gives no warrant for infant baptism. Thus Jacobus (Congregationalist) in the Standard BD says: "We have no record in the NT of the baptism of infants." Scott (Presbyterian) in the 1-vol HDB says: "The NT contains no explicit reference to the baptism of infants or young children." Plummer (Church of England), HDB, says: "The recipients of Christian baptism were required to repent and believe." Marcus Dods (Presbyterian), DCG, says: "A rite wherein by immersion in water the participant symbolizes and signalizes his transition from an impure to a pure life, his death to a past he abandons, and his new birth to a future he desires." It would be hard to state the Baptist interpretation in better terms. Thus no room is found in the NT for infant baptism which would symbolize what the infant did not experience or would be understood to cause the regeneration in the child, a form of sacramentalism repugnant to the NT teaching as understood by Baptists. The dominant Baptist note is the soul's personal relation to God apart from ordinance, church or priest. The infant who dies unbaptized is saved without baptism. The baptized individual, child (for children are often baptized by Baptists, children who show signs of conversion) or man, is converted before his baptism. The baptism is the symbol of the change already wrought. So clear is this to the Baptist that he bears continual protest against that perversion of this beautiful ordinance by those who treat it as a means of salvation or who make it meaningless when performed before conversion. Baptism is a preacher of the spiritual life. The Baptist contention is for a regenerated church membership, placing the kingdom before the local church. Membership in the kingdom precedes membership in the church. The passages quoted from the NT in support of the notion of infant baptism are wholly irrelevant, as, for instance, in Acts 2 39 where there is no such idea as baptism of infants. So in 1 Cor 7 14, where note husband and wife. The point is that the marriage relation is sanctified and the children are legitimate, though husband or wife be heathen. The marriage relation is to be maintained. It is begging the question to assume the presence of infants in the various household baptisms in Acts. In the case of the family of Cornelius they all spake with tongues and magnified God (Acts 10 46). The jailer's household "rejoiced greatly" (Acts 16 34). We do not even know that Lydia was married. Her household may have been merely her employés in her business. The NT presents no exceptions in this matter.

III. The Present Obligation.—The Baptists make one more point concerning baptism. It is that, since Jesus himself submitted to it and enjoined it upon His disciples, the ordinance is of perpetual obligation. The arguments for the late ecclesiastical origin of Mt 28 19 are not convincing. If it seem strange that Jesus should mention the three persons of the Trinity in connection with the command to baptize, one should remember that the Father and the Spirit were both manifested to Him at His baptism. It was not a mere ceremonial ablution like the Jewish rites. It was the public and formal avowal of fealty to God, and the names of the Trinity properly occur. The new heart is wrought by the Holy Spirit. Reconciliation with the Father is wrought on the basis of the work of the Son, who has manifested the Father's love in His life and death for sin. The fact that in the Acts in the examples of baptism only the name of Jesus occurs does not show that this was the exact formula used. It may be a mere historical summary of the essential fact. The name of Jesus stood for the other two persons of the Trinity. On the other hand the command of Jesus may not have been regarded as a formula for baptism; while in no sense sacramental or redemptive, it is yet obligatory and of perpetual significance. It is not to be dropped as one of the Jewish excrescences on Christianity. The form itself is necessary to the significance of the rite. Hence Baptists hold that immersion alone is to be practised, since immersion alone was commanded by Jesus and practised in the NT times. Immersion alone sets forth the death to sin, and burial in the grave the resurrection to new life in Christ. Baptism as taught in the NT is "a mould of doctrine," a preacher of the heart of the gospel. Baptists deny the right of disciples of Jesus to break that mould. The point of a symbol is the form in which it is cast. To change the form radically is to destroy the symbolism. Baptists insist on the maintenance of primitive NT baptism because it alone is baptism, it alone proclaims the death and resurrection of Jesus, the spiritual death and resurrection of the believer, the ultimate resurrection of the believer from the grave. The disciple is not above his Lord, and has no right to destroy this rich and powerful picture for the sake of personal convenience, nor because he is willing to do something else which Jesus did not enjoin and which has no association with Him. The long years of perversion do not justify this wrong to the memory of Jesus, but all the more call upon modern disciples to follow the example of Jesus who himself fulfilled righteousness by going into the waters of the Jordan and receiving immersion at the hands of John the Baptist.

LITERATURE

Baptism (Βάπτισμα, baptisma, Βαπτισμός, baptismós, Βαπτίζειν, baptizein) has been from the earliest times the initiatory rite signifying the recognition of entrance into or of presence within the Christian church. We find the earliest mention of the ceremony in the Epistle to the Gal (3 27), written about 20 years after the death of Jesus. There and in 1 Cor (1 13; 12 13) St. Paul takes for granted that everyone who becomes a Christian (himself included) must be baptized. The rite seems also to have existed among the discipleship of Jesus before His death. We are told (Jn 4 1.2) that, although Jesus Himself did not baptize, His disciples did, and that their baptisms were more numerous than those of John.

I. Scriptural Names for the Rite.—The words commonly used in the NT to denote the rite are the verb baptizō, and the nouns baptisma and baptismos; but none are employed in this sense alone. The vb. is used to denote the ceremonial purification of the Jews before eating, by pouring water on the hands (Lk 11 38; Mk 7 4); to signify the sufferings of Christ (Mk 10 38.39; Lk 12 50); and to indicate the sacrament of baptism. It is the intensive form of báptein, "to dip," and takes a wider meaning. The passages Lk 11 38 and Mk 7 4 show conclusively that the word does not invariably signify to immerse the whole body. Some have held that baptismos invariably means ceremonial purification, and that baptisma is reserved for the Christian rite; but the distinction can hardly be maintained. The former certainly means ceremonial purification in Mk 7 4, and in 7 8 (AV); but it probably means the rite of baptism in He 6 2. Exegetes find other terms applied to Christian baptism. It is called 'the Water' in Acts 10 47: "Can any man forbid 'the Water,' that these should not be baptized?"; the laver of the water in Eph 5 26 RVm (where baptism is compared to the bridal bath taken by the bride before she was handed over to the bridegroom); and perhaps the laver of regeneration in Tit 3 5 RVm (cf 1 Cor 6 11), and illumination in He 6 4; 10 32.

II. Pre-Christian Baptism.—Converts in the early cents., whether Jews or Gentiles, could not have found this initiatory rite, in which they expressed their new-born

1. The Baptism of Proselytes faith, utterly unfamiliar. Water is the element naturally used for cleansing the body and its symbolical use entered into almost every cult; and into none more completely than the Jewish, whose ceremonial washings were proverbial. Besides those the Jew had what would seem to the convert a counterpart of the Christian rite in the baptism of proselytes by which Gentiles entered the circle of Judaism. For the Jews required three things of strangers who declared themselves to be converts to the Law of Moses: circumcision, baptism, and to offer sacrifice if they were men: the two latter if they were women. It is somewhat singular that no baptism of proselytes is forthcoming until about the beginning of the 3d cent.; and yet no competent scholar doubts its existence. Schürer is full of contempt for those who insist on the argument from silence. Its presence enables us to see both how Jews accepted readily the baptism of John and to understand the point of objectors who questioned his right to insist that all Jews had to be purified ere they could be ready for the Messianic kingdom, although he was neither the Messiah nor a special prophet (Jn 1 19-23).

The baptism of John stood midway between the Jewish baptism of proselytes and Christian baptism.

2. The Baptism of John It differed from the former because it was more than a symbol of ceremonial purification; it was a baptism of repentance, a confession of sin, and of the need of moral cleansing, and was a symbol of forgiveness and of moral purity.

All men, Jews who were ceremonially pure and Gentiles who were not, had to submit to this baptism of repentance and pardon. It differed from the latter because it only symbolized preparation to receive the salvation, the kingdom of God which John heralded, and did not imply entrance into that kingdom itself. Those who had received it, as well as those who had not, had to enter the Christian community by the door of Christian baptism (Acts 19 3-6). The Jewish custom of baptizing, whether displayed in their frequent ceremonial washings, in the baptism of proselytes or in the baptism of John, made Christian baptism a familiar and even expected rite to Jewish converts in the 1st cent.

Baptism, as an initiatory rite, was no less familiar to gentile converts who had no acquaintance with the Jewish religion.

3. Baptism in the Pagan Mysteries The ceremonial washings of the priests of pagan religions have been often adduced as something which might familiarize gentile converts with the rite which introduced them into the Christian community, but they were not initiations. A more exact parallel is easily found. It is often forgotten that in the earlier cents. when Christianity was slowly making its way in the pagan world pagan piety had deserted the official religions and taken refuge within the Mysteries, and that these Mysteries represented the popular pagan religions of the times. They were all private cults into which men and women were received one by one, and that by rites of initiation which each had to pass through personally. When admitted the converts became members of coteries, large or small, of like-minded persons, who had become initiated because their souls craved something which they believed they would receive in and through the rites of the cult. These initiations were secret, jealously guarded from the knowledge of all outsiders; still enough is known about them for us to be sure that among them baptism took an important place (Apuleius Metamorphoses xi). The rite was therefore as familiar to pagan as to Jewish converts, and it was no unexpected requirement for the convert to know that baptism was the doorway into the church of Christ. These heathen baptisms, like the baptism of proselytes, were for the most part simply ceremonial purifications; for while it is true that both in the cult of the Mysteries and beyond it a mode of purifying after great crimes was baptizing in flowing water (Eurip. Iph. in Tauri 167) or in the sea, yet it would appear that only ceremonial purification was thought of. Nor were ceremonial rites involving the use of water confined to the paganism of the early cents. Such a ceremony denoted the reception of the newly born child into pagan Scandinavian households. The father decided whether the infant was to be reared or exposed to perish. If he resolved to preserve the babe, water was poured over it and a name was given to it.

III. Christian Baptism.—In the administration of the rite of Christian baptism three things have to be looked at: the act of baptizing;

1. The Administration of the Rite those who are entitled to perform it; the recipients or those entitled to receive it. A complete act of baptizing involves three things: what has been called the materia sacramenti; the method of its use; and the forma sacramenti, the baptismal formula or form of words accompanying the use of the water. The materia sacramenti is water and for this reason baptism is called the Water Sacrament. The oldest ecclesiastical manual of discipline which has descended to us, the Didache, says that the water to be preferred is "living," i.e. running water, water in a stream or river, or fresh flowing from a fountain; "But if thou hast not living water, baptize in other water; and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm" (c. 7). In those directions the prescriptions of the ceremonial for the Jewish baptism of proselytes are closely followed. The earlier canons of the church permit any kind of water, fresh or salt, provided only it be true and natural water (aqua vera et naturalis).

(1) Immersion.—The use of the water is called ablutio. According to the rules of by far the largest portion of the Christian church the mode of water may be used in any one of three ways: immersion, where the recipient enters bodily into the water, and where, during the action, the head is plunged either once or three times beneath the surface; affusion, where water was poured upon the head of the recipient who stood either in water or on dry ground; and aspersion where water was sprinkled on the head or on the face. It has frequently been argued that the word baptizein invariably means "to dip" or immerse, and that therefore Christian baptism must have been performed originally by immersion only, and that the two other forms of affusion and aspersion or sprinkling are invalid—that there can be no real baptism unless the method of immersion be used. But the word which invariably means "to dip" is not baptizein but baptēin. Baptizein has a wider signification; and its use to denote the Jewish ceremonial of pouring water on the hands (Lk 11 38; Mk 7 4), as has already been said, proves conclusively that it is impossible to conclude from the word itself that immersion is the only valid method of performing the rite. It may be admitted at once that immersion, where the whole body including the head is plunged into a pool of pure water, gives a more vivid picture of the cleansing of the soul from sin; and that complete surrounding with water suits better the metaphors of burial in Rom 6 4 and Col 2 12, and of being surrounded by cloud in 1 Cor 10 2.

(2) Affusion.—On the other hand affusion is certainly a more vivid picture of the bestowal of the Holy Spirit which is equally symbolized in baptism. No definite information is given of the mode in which baptism was administered in apostolic times. Such phrases as "coming up out of the water," "went down into the water" (Mk 1 10; Acts 8 38) are as applicable to affusion as to immersion. The earliest account of the mode of baptizing occurs in the Didache (c. 7), where it is said: "Now concerning Baptism, thus baptize ye: having first uttered all these things, baptize in the name of the Father, and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost, in living water. But if thou hast not living water, baptize in other water; and if thou canst not in cold, then in warm. But if thou hast neither, pour water upon the head thrice in the name of Father, and Son, and Holy Ghost." This seems to say that to baptize by immersion was the practice recommended for general use, but that the mode of affusion was also valid and enjoined on occasions. What is here prescribed in the Didache seems to have been the practice usually followed in the early cents. of the Christian church. Immersion was in common use: but affusion was also widely practised: and both were esteemed usual and valid forms of baptizing. When immersion was used then the head of the recipient was plunged thrice beneath the surface at the mention of each name of the Trinity; when the mode was by affusion the same reference to the Trinity was kept by pouring water thrice upon the head. The two usages which were recognized and prescribed by the beginning of the 2d cent. may have been in use throughout the apostolic period although definite information is lacking. When we remember the various pools in Jerus. and their use for ceremonial washings it is not impossible to suppose that the 3,000 who were baptized on the day of Pentecost may have been immersed, but, when the furnishing and conditions of Palestinian houses and of oriental jails are taken into account, it is difficult to conceive that at the baptisms of Cornelius and of the jailer, the ceremony was performed otherwise than by affusion. It is a somewhat curious fact that if the evidence from written texts, whether ancient canons or writings of the earlier Fathers, be studied by themselves, the natural conclusion would seem to be that immersion was the almost universal form of administering the rite; but if the witness of the earliest pictorial representation be collected, then we must infer that affusion was the usual method and that immersion was exceptional; for the pictorial representations, almost without exception, display baptism performed by affusion, i.e. the recipient is seen standing in water while the minister pours water on the head. It may therefore be inferred that evidence for the almost universal practice of immersion, drawn from the fact that baptisms took place in river pools (it is more than probable that when we find the names of local saints given to pools in rivers, those places were their favorite places of administering the rite), or from the large size of almost all early mediaeval baptisteries, is by no means so conclusive as many have supposed, such places being equally applicable to affusion. It is also interesting to remember that when most of the Anabaptists of the 16th cent. insisted on adult baptism (re-baptism was their name for it) immersion was not the method practised by them. During the great baptismal scene in the market-place of the city of Münster the ordinance was performed by the ministers pouring three cans of water on the heads of the recipients. They baptized by affusion and not by immersion. This was also the practice among the Mennonites or earliest Baptists. This double mode of administering the sacrament—by immersion or by affusion—prevailed in the churches of the first twelve cents., and it was not until the 13th that the practice of aspersio or sprinkling was almost universally employed.

(3) Aspersio.—The third method of administering baptism, viz. by aspersio or sprinkling, has a different history from the other two. It was in the early cents. exclusively reserved for sick and infirm persons too weak to be submitted to immersion or affusion. There is evidence to show that those who received the rite in this form were somewhat despised; for the nicknames clínici and grabatorii were, unworthily Cyprian declares, bestowed on them by neighbors. The question was even raised in the middle of the 3d cent., whether baptism by aspersio was a valid baptism and Cyprian was asked for his opinion on the matter. His answer is contained in his lxxvth epistle (lxi Hartel's ed.). There he contends that the ordinance administered this way is perfectly valid, and quotes in support of his opinion various OT texts which assert the purifying effects of water sprinkled (Ezk 36 25,26; Nu 8 5-7; 19 8,9,12,13). It is not the amount of the water or the method of its application which can cleanse from sin: "Whence it appears that the sprinkling also of water prevails equally with the washing of salvation . . . and that where the faith of the giver and receiver is sound, all things hold and may be consummated and perfected by the majesty of God and by the truth of faith." His opinion prevailed. Aspersio was recognized as a valid, though exceptional, form of baptism. But it was long of commending itself to ministers and people, and did not attain to almost general use until the 13th cent.

The idea that baptism is valid when practised in the one method only of immersion can scarcely be looked on as anything else than a ritualistic idea.

The Scripture nowhere describes or limits the qualifications of those who are entitled to perform

3. Who the rite of baptism. We find apostles, wandering preachers (Acts 8 38), a private member of a small and persecuted community (Acts 9 18) performing the rite. So in the subapostolic church we find the same liberty of practice. Clement of Alexandria tells us that the services of Christian women were necessary for the work of Christian missions, for they alone could have access to the gynaeceum and carry the message of the gospel there (Strom., III, 6). Such women missionaries did not hesitate to baptize. Whatever credit may be given to the Acts of Paul and Thekla, it is at least historical that Thekla did exist, that she was converted by Paul, that she worked as a missionary and that she baptized her converts. Speaking generally it may be said that as a sacrament has always been looked upon as the recognition of presence within the Christian church, it is an act of the church and not of the individual believer; and therefore no one is entitled to perform the act who is not in some way a representative of the Christian community—the representative character ought to be maintained somehow. As soon as the community had taken regular and organized form the act of baptism was suitably performed by those who, as office-bearers, naturally represented the community. It was recognized that the pastor or bishop (for these terms were synonymous until the 4th cent. at least) ought to preside at the administration of the sacrament; but in the early church the power of delegation was recognized and practised, and elders and deacons presided at this and even at the Eucharist. What has been called lay-baptism is not forbidden in the NT and has the sanction of the early church. When superstitious views of baptism entered largely into the church and it was held that no unbaptized child could be saved, the practice arose of encouraging the baptism of all weakling infants by nurses. The Reformed church protested against this and was at pains to repudiate the superstitious thought of any mechanical efficacy in the rite by deprecating its exercise by any save approved and ordained ministers of the church. Still, while condemning lay-baptism as irregular, it may be questioned whether they would assert any administration of the rite to be invalid, provided only it had been performed with devout faith on the part of giver and receiver.

The recipients of Christian baptism are all those who make a presumably sincere profession

4. Who of repentance of sin and of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour; together with the children of such believing parents. The requirements are set forth in the accounts given us of the performance of the rite in the NT, in which we see how the apostles obeyed the commands of their Master. Jesus had ordered them to "make disciples of all the nations, baptizing them into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit" (Mt 28 19)—to "preach the gospel to the whole creation. He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that disbelieveth shall be condemned" (Mk 16 15, 16). The apostle Peter said to the inquirers on the Day of Pentecost, "Repent ye, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ unto the remission of your sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit"; and 3,000 were added to the church through the initiatory rite of baptism. The Samaritans, who believed on Jesus through the preaching of Philip, were admitted to the Christian community through baptism; though in this case one of the baptized, Simon Magus, after his reception, was found to be still in "the bond of iniquity" (Acts 8 12, 23). The jailer and all his, Lydia and her household, at Philippi, were baptized by St. Paul on his and her profession of faith on Jesus, the Saviour. There is no evidence in any of the accounts we have of apostolic baptisms that any prolonged course of instruction was thought to be necessary; nothing of classes for catechumens such as we find in the early church by the close of the 2d cent., or in modern missionary enterprise. We find no mention of baptismal creeds, declarative or interrogative, in the NT accounts of baptisms. The profession of faith in the Lord Jesus, the Saviour, made by the head of the family appears, so far as the NT records afford us information, to have been sufficient to secure the baptism of the "household"—a word which in these days included both servants and children.

(1) Baptism of infants.—This brings us to the much-debated question whether infants are to be recognized as lawful recipients of Christian baptism. The NT Scriptures do not in so many words either forbid or command the baptism of children. The question is in this respect on all fours with the change of the holy day from the seventh to the first day of the week. No positive command authorizes the universal usage with regard to the Christian Sabbath day; that the change is authorized must be settled by a weighing of evidence. So it is with the case of infant baptism. It is neither commanded nor forbidden in so many words; and the question cannot be decided on such a basis. The strongest argument against the baptizing of infants lies in the thought that the conditions of the rite are repentance and faith; that these must be exercised by individuals, each one for himself and for herself; and that infants are incapable either of repentance or of faith of this kind. The argument seems weak in its second statement; it is more dogmatic than historical; and will be referred to later when the doctrine lying at the basis of the rite is examined. On the other hand a great deal of evidence supports the view that the baptism of infants, if not commanded, was at least permitted and practised within the apostolic church. St. Paul connects baptism with circumcision and implies that under the gospel the former takes the place of the latter (Col 2 12); and as children were circumcised on the 8th day after birth, the inference follows naturally that children were also to be baptized. In the OT, promises to parents included their children. In his sermon on the Day of Pentecost St. Peter declares to his hearers that the gospel promise is "to you and to your children" and connects this with the invitation to baptism (Acts 2 38, 39). It is also noteworthy that children shared in the Jewish baptism of proselytes. Then we find in the NT narratives of baptisms that "households" were baptized—of Lydia (Acts 16 15), of the jailer at Philippi (Acts 16 32), of Stephanas (1 Cor 1 16). It is never said that the children of the household were exempted from the sacred rite. One has only to remember the position of the head of the household in that ancient world, to recollect how the household was thought to be embodied in its head, to see how the repentance and faith of the head of the household was looked upon as including those of all the members, not merely children but servants, to feel that had the children been excluded from sharing in the rite the exclusion would have seemed such an unusual thing that it would have at least been mentioned and explained. Our Lord expressly made very young children the types of those who entered into His kingdom (Mk 10 14-16); and St. Paul so unites parents with children in the faith of Christ that he does not hesitate to call the children of the believing husband or wife "holy," and to imply that the children had passed from a state of "uncleanness" to a state of "holiness" through the faith of a parent. All these things seem to point to the fact that the rite which was the door of entrance into the visible community of the followers of Jesus was shared in by the children of believing parents. Besides evidence for the baptism of children goes back to the earliest times of the sub-apostolic church. Irenaeus was the disciple of Polycarp, who had been the disciple of St. John, and it is difficult to draw any other conclusion from his statements than that he believed that the baptism of infants had been an established practice in the church long before his days (Adv. Haer., II, 22; cf 39). The witness of Tertullian is specially interesting; for he himself plainly thinks that adult baptism is to be preferred to the baptism of infants. He makes it plain that the custom of baptizing infants existed in his days, and we may be sure from the character and the learning of the man, that had he been able to affirm that infant-baptism had been a recent innovation and had not been a long-established usage descending from apostolic times, he would certainly have had no hesitation in using what would have seemed to him a very convincing way of dealing with his opponents. Tertullian's testimony comes from the end of the 2d cent. or the beginning of the 3d. Origen, the most learned Christian writer during the first three cents. and who comes a little later than Tertullian, in his 14th Homily on St. Luke bears witness to the fact that the baptism of infants was usual. He argues that original sin belongs to children because the church baptizes them. At the same time it is plain from a variety of evidence too long to cite that the baptism of infants was not a universal practice in the early church. The church of the early cents. was a mission church. It drew large numbers of its members from heathendom. In every mission church the baptism of adults will naturally take the foremost place and be most in evidence. But it is clear that many Christians were of the opinion of Tertullian and believed that baptism ought not to be administered to children but should be confined to adults. Nor was this a theory only; it was a continuous practice handed down from one generation to another in some Christian families. In the 4th cent. few Christian leaders took a more important place than Basil the Great and his brother Gregory of Nyssa. They belonged to a family who had been Christians for some generations; yet neither of the brothers was baptized until after his personal conversion, which does not appear to have come until they had attained the years of manhood. The whole evidence seems to show that in the early church, down to the end of the 4th cent. at least, infant and adult baptism were open questions and that the two practices existed side by side with each other without disturbing the unity of the churches. In the later Pelagian controversy it became evident that the theory and practice of infant baptism had been able to assert itself and that the ordinance was always administered to children of members of the church.

(2) Baptism for the dead.—St. Paul refers to a custom of "baptizing for the dead" (1 Cor 15 29). What this "vicarious baptism" or "baptism for the dead" was it is impossible to say, even whether it was practised within the primitive Christian church. The passage is a very difficult one and has called forth a very large number of explanations, which are mere guesses. Paul neither commends it nor disapproves of it; he simply mentions its existence and uses the fact as an argument for the resurrection. See BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD.

IV. The Formula of Baptism.—The Formula of Christian baptism, in the mode which prevailed, is given in Mt 28 19: "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." But it is curious that the words are not given in any description of Christian baptism until the time of Justin Martyr: and there they are not repeated exactly but in a slightly extended and explanatory form. He says that Christians "receive the washing with water in the name of God, the Ruler and Father of the universe, and of our Saviour, Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit" (1 Apol., 61). In every account of the performance of the rite in apostolic times a much shorter formula is in use. The 3,000 believers were baptized on the Day of Pentecost "in the name of Jesus" (Acts 2 38); and the same formula was used at the baptism of Cornelius and those that were with him (Acts 10 48). Indeed it would appear to have been the usual one, from St. Paul's question to the Corinthians: "Were ye baptized into the name of Paul?" (1 Cor 1 13). The Samaritans were baptized "into the name of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 8 16); and the same formula (a common one in acts of devotion) was used in the case of the disciples at Ephesus. In some instances it is recorded that before baptism the converts were asked to make some confession of their faith, which took the form of declaring that Jesus was the Lord or that Jesus Christ was the Son of God. It may be inferred from a phrase in 1 Pet 3 21 that a formal interrogation was made, and that the answer was an acknowledgment that Jesus Christ was Lord. Scholars have exercised a great deal of ingenuity in trying to explain how, with what appear to be the very words of Jesus given in the Gospel of Mt, another and much shorter formula seems to have been used throughout the apostolic church. Some have imagined that the shorter formula was that used in baptizing disciples during the lifetime of Our Lord (Jn 4 1.2), and that the apostles having become accustomed to it continued to use it during their lives. Others declare that the phrases "in the name of Jesus Christ" or "of the Lord Jesus" are not meant to give the formula of baptism, but simply to denote that the rite was Christian. Others think that the full formula was always used and that the narratives in the Book of Acts and in the Pauline Epistles are merely brief summaries of what took place—an idea rather difficult to believe in the absence of any single reference to the longer formula. Others, again, insist that baptism in the name of one of the persons of the Trinity implies baptism in the name of the Three. While others declare that St. Matthew does not give the very words of Jesus but puts in His mouth what was the common formula used at the date and in the district where the First Gospel was written. Whatever explanation be given it is plain that the longer formula became universal or almost universal in the sub-apostolic church. Justin Martyr has been already quoted. Tertullian, nearly half a century later, declares expressly that the "law of baptism has been imposed and the formula prescribed" in Mt 28 19 (De Bapt., 13); and he adds in his Adversus Praxeum (c. 26): "And it is not once only, but thrice, that we are immersed into the Three Persons, at each several mention of Their names." The evidence to show that the formula given by St. Matthew became the established usage is overwhelming; but it is more than likely that the use of the shorter formula did not altogether die out, or, if it did, that it was revived. The historian Socrates informs us that some of the more extreme Arians "corrupted" baptism by using the name of Christ only in the formula; while injunctions to use the longer formula and punishments, including deposition, threatened to those who presumed to employ the shorter which meet us in collections of ecclesiastical canons (Apos. Canons, 43, 50), prove that the practice of using the shorter formula existed in the 5th and 6th cents., at all events in the East.

V. The Doctrine of Baptism.—The sacraments, and baptism as one of them, are always described to be (1) signs representing as in a picture or figure spiritual benefits (1 Pet 3 21), and also (2) as seals or personal tokens and attestations confirmatory of solemn promises of spiritual benefits. Hence the sacrament is said to have two parts: "the one an outward and sensible sign, used according to Christ's appointment; the other an inward and spiritual grace thereby signified." It is held, moreover, that when the rite of baptism has been duly and devoutly performed with faith on the part of both giver and receiver, the spiritual benefits do follow the performance of the rite. The question therefore arises: What are the spiritual and evangelical blessings portrayed and solemnly promised in baptism? In the New Testament we find that baptism is intimately connected with the following: with remission of sins, as in Acts 22 16 ("Arise, and be baptized, and wash away thy sins"), and in He 10 22; with regeneration or the new birth, as in Tit 3 6 and Jn 3 5 (this idea also entered into the baptism of proselytes and even into the thought of baptism in the Mysteries; neophytes were taught that in the water they died to their old life and began a new one [Apuleius Meta. xi]); with ingrafting into Christ, with union with Him, as in Gal 3 27—and union in definite ways, in His death, His burial and His resurrection, as in Rom 6 3-6; with entering into a new relationship with God, that of sonship, as in Gal 3 26, 27; with the bestowal of the Holy Spirit, as in 1 Cor 12 13; with belonging to the church, as in Acts 2 41; with the gift of salvation, as in Mk (?) 16 16; Jn 3 5. From these and similar passages theologians conclude that baptism is a sign and seal of our ingrafting into Christ and of our union with Him, of remission of sins, regeneration, adoption and life eternal; that the water in baptism represents and signifies both the blood of Christ, which takes away all our sins, and also the sanctifying influence of the Holy Spirit against the dominion of sin and the corruption of our human nature; and that baptizing with water signifies the cleansing from sin by the blood and for the merit of Christ, together with the mortification of sin and rising from sin to newness of life by virtue of the death and resurrection of Christ. Or to put it more simply: Baptism teaches that all who are out of Christ are unclean by reason of sin and need to be cleansed. It signifies that just as washing with water cleanses the body so God in Christ cleanses the soul from sin by the Holy Spirit and that we are to see in this cleansing not merely pardon but also an actual freeing of the soul from the pollution and power of sin and therefore the beginnings of a new life. The sacrament also shows us that the cleansing is reached only through connection with the death of Christ, and further that through the new life begun in us we become in a special way united to Christ and enter into a new and filial relationship with God. Probably all Christians, reformed and unreformed, will agree in the above statement of the doctrinal meaning in the rite of baptism; and also that when the sacrament is rightly used the inward and spiritual grace promised is present along with the outward and visible signs. But Romanists and Protestants differ about what is meant by the right use of the sacrament. They separate on the question of its efficacy. The former understand by the right use simply the correct performance of the rite and the placing no obstacle in the way of the flow of efficacy. The latter insist that there can be no right use of the sacrament unless the recipient exercises faith, that without faith the sacrament is not efficacious and the inward and spiritual blessings do not accompany the external and visible signs. Whatever minor differences divide Protestant evangelical churches on this sacrament they are all agreed upon this, that where there is no faith there can be no regeneration. Here emerges doctrinally the difference between those who give and who refuse to give the sacrament to infants.

The latter taking their stand on the fundamental doctrine of all evangelical Christians that faith is necessary to make any sacrament efficacious, and assuming that the effect of an ordinance is always tied to the precise time of its administration, insist that only adults can perform such a conscious, intelligent, and individually independent act of faith, as they believe all Protestants insist on scriptural grounds to be necessary in the right use of a sacrament. Therefore they refuse to baptize infants and young children.

The great majority of evangelical Protestants practise infant baptism and do not think, due explanations being given, that it in any way conflicts with the idea that faith is necessary to the efficacy of the sacrament. The Baptist position appears to them to conflict with much of the teaching of the NT. It implies that all who are brought up in the faith of Christ and within the Christian family still lack, when they come to years of discretion, that great change of heart and life which is symbolized in baptism, and can only receive it by a conscious, intelligent and thoroughly independent act of faith. This seems in accordance neither with Scripture nor with human nature. We are told that a child may be full of the Holy Ghost from his mother's womb (Lk 1 15); that little children are in the kingdom of Christ (Mt 19 14); that children of believing parents are holy (1 Cor 7 14). Is there nothing in the fact that in the NT as in the OT the promise is "to you and your children"? Besides, the argument of those who oppose the baptism of infants, if logically carried out, leads to consequences which few of them would accept. Faith is as essential to salvation, on all evangelical theology, as it is for the right use of the sacrament; and every one of the arguments brought against the baptism of infants is equally applicable to the denial of their salvation. Nor can the Baptist position be said to be true to the facts of ordinary human nature. Faith, in its evangelical sense of fiducia or trust, is not such an abrupt thing as they make it. Their demand for such a conscious, intelligent, strictly individualist act of faith sets aside some of the deepest facts of human nature. No one, young or old, is entirely self-dependent; nor are our thoughts and trust always or even frequently entirely independent and free from the unconscious influences of others. We are interwoven together in society; and what is true generally reveals itself still more strongly in the intimate relations of the family. Is it possible in all cases to trace the creative effects of the subtle imperceptible influences which surround children, or to say when the slowly dawning intelligence is first able to apprehend enough to trust in half-conscious ways? It is but a shallow view of human nature which sets all such considerations on the one side and insists on regarding nothing but isolated acts of knowledge or of faith. With all those thoughts in their minds, the great majority of evangelical churches admit and enjoin the baptism of infants. They believe that the children of believing parents are "born within the church and have interest in the covenant of grace and a right to its seal." They explain that the efficacy of a sacrament is not rigidly tied to the exact time of administration, and can be appropriated whenever faith is kindled and is able to rest on the external sign, and that the spiritual blessings signified in the rite can be appropriated again and again with each fresh kindling of faith. They declare that no one can tell how soon the dawning intelligence may be awakened to the act of appropriation. Therefore these churches instruct their ministers in dispensing the sacrament to lay vows on parents that they will train up the infants baptized "in the knowledge and fear of the Lord," and will teach them the great blessings promised to them in and through the sacrament and teach them to appropriate these blessings for themselves. They further enjoin their ministers to admonish all who may witness a baptismal service to look back on their own baptism in order that their faith may be stirred afresh to appropriate for themselves the blessings which accompany the proper use of the rite.

LITERATURE.—The literature on the subject of baptism is very extensive. It may be sufficient to select the following: J. S. Candlish, The Sacraments, 10th thousand, 1900; J. C. W. Augusti, Denkwürdigkeiten aus d. christ. Archäologie, V, 1820; Höfling, Das Sakrament der Taufe, 1846-48; J. B. Mozley, Review of the Baptismal Controversy, 2d ed., 1895; W. I. The Term.—The word "baptism" is the Anglicized form of the Gr baptisma, or baptismós.

These Gr words are verbal nouns derived from baptizō, which, again, is the intensive form of the vb. báptō.

"Baptismos denotes the action of baptizing (the baptizing), baptisma the result of the action (the baptism)" (Cremer). This distinction differs from, but is not necessarily contrary to, that of Plummer, who infers from Mk 7 4 and He 9 10 that baptismos usually means lustrations or ceremonial washings, and from Rom 6 4; Eph 4 5; 1 Pet 3 21 that baptisma denotes baptism proper (HDB).

The Gr words from which our Eng. "baptism" has been formed are used by Gr writers, in classical antiquity, in the LXX and in the

2. The NT, with a great latitude of meaning. It is not possible to exhaust their meaning by any single Eng. term.

The action which the Gr words express may be performed by plunging, drenching, staining, dipping, sprinkling. The nouns baptisma and baptismos do not occur in the LXX; the verb baptizō occurs only in four places, and in two of them in a fig. sense (2 K 5 14; Jth 12 7; Isa 21 4; Ecclus 31 (34) 25). Wherever these words occur in the NT, the context or, in the case of quotations, a comparison with the OT will in many instances suggest which of the various renderings noted above should be adopted (cf Mk 7 4; He 9 10 with Nu 19 18, 19; 8 7; Ex 24 4-6; Acts 2 16, 17, 41 with Joel 2 28). But there are passages in which the particular form of the act of baptizing remains in doubt. "The assertion that the command to baptize is a command to immerse is utterly unauthorized" (Hodge).

In the majority of Bib. instances the vbs. and nouns denoting baptism are used in a lit. sense, and signify the application of water to an

3. The Ap- object or a person for a certain purpose. The ceremonial washings of the Jews, the baptism of proselytes to the Jewish faith, common in the days of Christ, the baptism of John and of the disciples of Christ prior to the Day of Pentecost, and the Christian sacrament of baptism, are literal baptisms (baptismus fluminis, "baptism of the river," i.e. water). But Scripture speaks also of fig. baptisms, without water (Mt 20 22; Mk 10 38; Lk 12 50—the sufferings which overwhelmed Christ and His followers, especially the martyrs—baptismus sanguinis, "baptism of blood"; Mt 3 11; Mk 1 8; Lk 3 16; Acts 1 5; 11 16—the outpouring of the miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost, which was a characteristic phenomenon of primitive Christianity—baptismus flaminis, "baptism of wind, breeze," i.e. "spirit"). Some even take Mt 21 25; Mk 11 30; Acts 18 25; 1 Cor 10 2 in a synecdochical sense, for doctrine of faith, baptism being a prominent feature of that doctrine (baptismus luminis, "baptism of light").

Scripture occasionally alludes to Christian baptism without employing the regular term. Thus in Tit 3 5, and Eph 5 26 we have

4. Equiva- the term loutrón, "washing," instead lent Terms of baptisma. From this term the Lat church derived its lavacrum (Eng. "laver") as a designation of baptism. In He 10 22 we have the verbs rhantizō and louō, "sprinkle" and "wash"; in Eph 5 26 the verb katharizō, "cleanse"; in 1 Cor 6 11 the verb apolouō, "wash," are evidently synonyms of baptizō, and the act has been so denominated from its prime effect.

II. The Ordinance.—Christian baptism, as now practised, is a sacred ordinance of evangelical grace, solemnly appointed by the risen

1. The Teaching of Christ, prior to His entering into the state of glory by His ascension, and Scripture designed to be a means, until His second coming, for admitting men to discipleship with Him. Mt 28 18-20 and its parallel Mk 16 15, 16 are the principal texts of Scripture on which the church in all ages has based every essential point of her teaching regarding this ordinance. The host of other baptismal texts of Scripture expand and illustrate the contents of these two texts. We have in these texts:

(1) An authoritative (Mt 28 19) command, issued in plain terms: "Make disciples . . . baptizing." This command declares (a) speciem actus, i.e. it indicates with sufficient clearness, by the use of the term "baptize," the external element to be employed, viz. water, and the form of the action to be performed by means of water, viz. any dipping, or pouring, or sprinkling, since the word "baptize" signifies any of these modes. On the strength of this command Luther held: "Baptism is not simple water only, but it is the water comprehended in God's command"; and the Westminster Shorter Catechism (Ques. 94) calls baptism "a washing with water." Water is distinctly mentioned as the baptismal element in Acts 8 38; 10 47; Eph 5 26; He 10 22. "There is no mention of any other element" (Plummer). The phraseology of Eph 5 26, "the washing of water with the word," shows that not the external element alone, nor the physical action of applying the water, constitutes baptism; but "the word" must be added to the element and the action, in order that there may be a baptism. (Detrahe verbum, et quid est aqua nisi aqua? Accedit verbum ad elementum, et fit sacramentum. "Remove the word and what is water but water? The word is added to the element and it becomes a sacrament" Augustine). "Without the Word of God the water is simple water, and no baptism" (Luther). The command prescribes (b) exercitium actus, i.e. it enjoins a continued exercise of this function of the messengers of Christ for all time.

(2) A clear declaration of the object in view.—The participle "baptizing" qualifies the imperative "make disciples," and expresses that, what the imperative states as the end, is to be attained by what the participle names as a means to that end. The participle "baptizing," again, is qualified by "teaching" (ver 20). The second participle is not connected by "and" with the first, hence, is subordinate to the first (Meyer). Discipleship is to be obtained by baptizing-teaching. There is no rigid law regarding the order and sequence of these actions laid down in these words; they merely state that Christ desires His disciples to be both baptized and fully informed as to His teaching.

(3) A definite promise: salvation (Mk 16 16), i.e. complete and final deliverance from all evil, the securing of "the end of faith" (1 Pet 1 9). This is a comprehensive statement, as in 1 Pet 3 21, of the blessing of baptism. Scripture also states, in detail, particular baptismal blessings: (a) Regeneration, Tit 3 5; Jn 3 3.5. Despite Calvin and others, the overwhelming consensus of interpreters still agrees with the ancient church and with Luther in explaining both these texts of baptism. (b) Remission of sins, or justification (Acts 2 38; 22 16; 1 Cor 6 11; Eph 5 26; He 10 22). This blessing, no doubt, is also intended in 1 Pet 3 21, where eperôtēma has been rendered "answer" by the AV while the RV renders "interrogation." The word denotes a legal claim, which a person has a right to set up (see Cremer s.v. and Rom 8 1). (c) The establishment of a spiritual union with Christ, and a new relationship with God (Gal 3 26.27; Rom 6 3.4; Col 2 12). In this connection the prepositions with which baptizein in the NT connects may be noted. Baptizein eis, "to baptize into," always denotes the relation into which the party baptized is placed. The only exception is Mk 1 9. Baptizein en, or epi, "to baptize in" (Acts 10 48; 2 38), denotes the basis on which the new relation into which the baptized enters, is made to rest (Cremer). (d) The sanctifying gifts of the Holy Spirit (1 Cor 12 13; Tit 3 5). All these blessings Scripture declares to be effects of baptism (Wirkung der Taufe, Riehm, Handwörterb.). "Baptism is called 'washing of regeneration,' not merely because it symbolizes it, or pledges a man to it, but also, and chiefly, because it effects it" (Holtzmann, Luther, Pfeleiderer, Weiss). "Regeneration, or being begotten of God, does not mean merely a new capacity for change in the direction of goodness, but an actual change. The legal washings were actual external purifications. Baptism is actual internal purification" (Plummer). To these modern authorities Luther can be added. He says: "Baptism worketh forgiveness of sin, delivers from death and the devil, and gives eternal salvation to all who believe, as the words and promises of God declare" (Smaller Catech.). In Tit 3 5 AV the force of the preposition diá, "by," deserves to be noted: it declares baptism to be the regenerating, renewing, justifying, glorying medium to the heirs of eternal life. The baptismal promise is supported, not only in a general way, by the veracity and sincerity of the Speaker, who is the Divine Truth incarnate, but also in a special way, by the Author's appeal to His sovereign majesty (Mt 28 18), and by the significant assurance of His personal ("I" = egō), is emphatic: Meyer's presence with the disciples in their afore-mentioned activity (Mt 28 20; cf Mk 16 20).

(4) A plain indication of the scope: "all nations," "the whole creation" (pásē tē ktisei to be understood as in Col 1 23="all men"). Baptism is of universal application; it is a cosmopolitan ordinance before which differences such as of nationality, race, age, sex, social or civil status, are leveled (cf Col 3 11 with 1 Cor 12 13). Accordingly, Christ orders baptism to be practised "always" (lit. "all days"), "even unto the end of the world," i.e. unto the consummation of the present age, until the Second Advent of the Lord. For, throughout this period Christ promises His coöperative presence with the efforts of His disciples to make disciples.

(5) A prescribed formula for administering the ordinance: "into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." The belief in the Trinity is fundamental to Christianity; accordingly, the sacred rite by which men are initiated into the Christian religion justly emphasizes this belief. The three Persons are mentioned as distinct from one another, but the baptismal command is issued upon their joint and coequal authority ("in the name," not "names"), thus indicating the Unity in Trinity. This ancient baptismal formula represents "the Father as the Originator, the Son as the Mediator, the Holy Ghost as the Realization, and the vital and vitalizing blessing of the promise and fulfilment," which is extended to men in this ordinance (Cremer).

After the Lord had entered into His glory, we find that in the era of the apostles and in the primitive Christian church baptism is the established and universally acknowledged rite by which persons are admitted to communion with the church of the Ordinance (Acts 2 38.41; 8 12 f. 36.38; 9 18; 10 47 f.; 16 15.33; 18 8; 22 16; Rom 6 3; 1 Cor 12 13; Gal 3 27). Even in cases where an outpouring of the special gifts of the Holy Spirit had already taken place, baptism is still administered (Acts 10 44 f.; 11 15 f). "Thus, baptism occupied among the Gentile converts to Christianity, and later among all Christians, the same position as circumcision in the Old Covenant (Col 2 11 f.; Gal 5 2). It is, essentially, part of the foundation on which the unity of the Christian society rested from the beginning (Eph 4 5; 1 Cor 12 13; Gal 3 27 f)" (Riehm, Handwörterb.).

In 1 Cor 10 1.2 the apostle states that the Israelites "were all baptized unto Moses in the cloud and in the sea." Farrar attempts

3. Types the following solution of this type: of Baptism "The passing under the cloud (Ex 14 19) and through the sea, constituting as it did their deliverance from bondage into freedom, their death to Egypt, and their birth to a new covenant, was a general type or dim shadow of Christian baptism (compare our collect, 'figuring thereby Thy holy baptism'). But the typology is quite incidental; it is the moral lesson which is paramount. 'Unto Moses'; rather, into. By this 'baptism' they accepted Moses as their Heavensent guide and teacher" (Pulpit Comm.). In 1 Pet 3 21 the apostle calls baptism the antitypon of the Deluge. Delitzsch (on He 9 24) suggests that túpos and antitupon in Gr represent the original figure and a copy made therefrom, or a prophetic foretype and its later accomplishment. The point of comparison is the saving power of water in either instance. Water saved Noah and his family by floating the ark which sheltered them, and by removing from them the disobedient generation which had sorely tried their faith, as it had tried God's patience. In like manner the water of baptism bears up the ark of the Christian church and saves its believing members, by separating them from their filthy and doomed fellow-men.

III. Difficulties.—Feine (*PER*³, XIX, 396 f) and Kattenbusch (Sch-Herz, I, 435 f) argue that the

1. Are Mt 28 vs 18–20 and Mk 16 vs 15, 16 Genuine? Trinitarian formula in Mt 28 19 is spurious, and that the text in Mk 16 vs 15, 16 belongs to a section which was added to this Gospel at a later time. The former claim had first been advanced by Conybeare, but later research by Riggenbach has established the genuineness of the Trinitarian formula in Mt. Feine still maintains his doubts, however, on subjective grounds. As to the concluding section in Mk (16 9–20), Jerome is the first to call attention to its omission in most Gr MSS to which he had access. But Jerome himself acknowledged ver 14 as genuine. Gregory of Nyssa reports that, while this section is missing in some MSS, in the more accurate ones many MSS contain it. No doctrinal scruple can arise on account of this section; for it contains nothing that is contrary to the doctrine of Scripture in other places on the same subject; and it has always been treated as genuine by the Christian church. The question is a purely historical one (see Bengel, Apparatus Criticus, 170 f).

No record of such use can be discovered in the Acts or the epistles of the apostles. The baptisms recorded in the NT after the Day of

2. Was the Trinitarian Formula Used in NT Times? Pentecost are administered "in the name of Jesus Christ" (Acts 2 38), "into the name of the Lord Jesus" (8 16), "into Christ" (Rom 6 3; Gal 3 27). This difficulty was considered by the Fathers; Ambrose says: Quod verbo tacitum fuerat, expressum est fide, "What had not been expressed in word, was expressed by faith." On close inspection the difficulty is found to rest on the assumption that the above are records of baptismal formulas used on those occasions. The fact is that these records contain no baptismal formula at all, but "merely state that such persons were baptized as acknowledged Jesus to be the Lord and the Christ" (Plummer). The same can be said of any person baptized in our day with the Trinitarian formula. That this formula was the established usage in the Christian church is proven by records of baptisms in Justin (Apol., I, 61) and Tertullian (Adv. Prax., XXVI).

Baptism was practised among the Jews prior to the solemn inauguration of this ordinance by the risen Christ. The ceremonial washings of the Jews are classed with the transient forms of the Levitical worship (He 9 9, 10), which had not been intended to endure except "until a time of reformation." They were removed when Christian baptism was erected into an abiding ordinance of the church of God (Col 2 11–13). It is erroneous to say that those ancient washings developed into Christian baptism. A shadow does not develop into a substance. Nor do we find the origin of Christian baptism in the baptism of proselytes, which seems to have been a Jewish church custom in the days of Christ. Though the rite of baptism was not unknown to the Jews, still the baptism of John startled them (Jn 1 25). Such passages as Isa 4 4 (1 16); Ezk 36 25; 37 23; Zec 13 1 had, no doubt, led them to expect a rite of purification in the days of the Messiah, which would supersede their Levitical purification. The delegation which they sent to John was to determine the Messianic character of John and his preaching and baptizing. Johannic baptism has been a fruitful theme of debate. The question does not affect the personal faith of any Christian at the present time; for there is no person living who has received Johannic baptism (Chemnitz). The entire subject and certain features of it, as the incident recorded Acts 19 1–7, will continue to be debated. It is best to fix in our minds a few essential facts, which will enable us to put the Scriptural estimate on the baptism of John. John had received a Divine commission to preach and baptize (Lk 3 2; Jn 1 33; Mt 21 25). He baptized with water (Jn 3 23). His baptism was honored by a wonderful manifestation of the holy Trinity (Mt 3 16, 17), and by the Redeemer, in His capacity as the Representative of sinful mankind, the sin-bearing Lamb of God, accepting baptism at John's hand (Mt 3 13 ff; Jn 1 29 ff). It was of the necessity of receiving John's baptism that Christ spoke to Nicodemus (Jn 3 3 ff). The Pharisees invited their eternal ruin by refusing John's baptism (Lk 7 30); for John's baptism was to shield them from the wrath to come (Mt 3 7); it was for the remission of sin (Mk 1 4); it was a washing of regeneration (Jn 3 5). When Jesus began His public ministry, He took up the preaching and baptism of John, and His disciples practised it with such success that John rejoiced (Jn 3 22, 25–36; 4 1, 2). All this evidence fairly compels the belief that there was no essential difference between the baptism of John and the baptism instituted by Christ; that what the risen Christ did in Mt 28 18–20 was merely to elevate a rite that had previously been adopted by an order "from above" to a permanent institution of His church, and to proclaim its universal application. The contrast which John himself declares between his baptism and that of Christ is not a contrast between two baptisms with water. The baptism of Christ, which John foretells, is a baptism with the Holy Ghost and with fire, the Pentecostal baptism. But for the general purpose of begetting men unto a new life, sanctifying and saving them, the Spirit was also bestowed through John's baptism (Jn 3 5).

The command in Mt 28 19; Mk 16 16 is all-embracing; so is the statement concerning the necessity of baptism in Jn 3 5. After reading these statements, one feels inclined, not to ask, Should infants be baptized? but Why should they not be baptized? The onus probandi rests on those who reject infant baptism. The desire to have their infants baptized must have been manifested on the day when the first three thousand were baptized at Jerus, assuming that they were all adults. The old covenant had provided for their children; was the new to be inferior to the old in this respect? (See Plummer in HDB.) The baptism of entire households is presumptive evidence that children and infants were baptized in apostolic times (Acts 16 15, 33; 18 8; 1 Cor 1 16). The arguments against infant baptism imply defective views on the subject of original sin and the efficacy of baptism. Infant faith—for, faith is as necessary to the infant as to the adult—may baffle our attempts at explanation and definition; but God who extends His promises also to children (Acts 2 39), who established His covenant even with beasts (Gen 9 16, 17); Christ who blessed also little children (Mk

3. Was Christian Baptism Really a New Ordinance?

10 13 ff), and spoke of them as believers (Mt 18 6), certainly does not consider the regeneration of a child or infant a greater task than that of an adult (cf Mt 18 3.4).

Paul did baptize Crispus, Gaius and Stephanas with his household. These baptisms he performed at Corinth alone; we have no record

5. Why Did of his baptisms at other places. What Paul not Paul declares in 1 Cor 1 14-17 is, Baptize? that by his baptizing he could not have become the cause of the divisions in the Corinthian congregation, because he had baptized only a few persons at Corinth, and, moreover, he had not baptized in his own name, hence had attached no one to his person. The statement, "Christ sent me not to baptize," is made after the Sem idiom, and means: "not so much to baptize as to preach" (Farrar in Pulpit Comm.). If they are taken in any other sense, it is impossible to protect Paul against the charge that he did something that he was not authorized to do, when he baptized Crispus, etc.

1 Cor 15 29 is sometimes taken to mean that the early Christians practised baptism by proxy.

6. What Is Christianity, it is held, they desired the Baptism to convey the benefits of their faith for the to their departed friends who had died Dead? in paganism, by having themselves baptized "in their behalf," perhaps on their graves. We have no evidence from history that such a practice prevailed in the early Christian churches. Nor does the text suggest it. The Gr preposition hupér expresses also the motive that may prompt a person to a certain action. In this case the motive was suggested by the dead, viz. by the dead in so far as they shall rise. The context shows this to be the meaning: If a person has sought baptism in view of the fact that the dead are to rise to be judged, his baptism is valueless, if the dead do not rise. See BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD.

BAPTISMAL REGENERATION, bap-tiz'mal rē-jen-ēr-ā'shun: As indicated in the general arts. on BAPTISM and SACRAMENT, the doctrine ordinarily held by Presbyterians, Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists, and also by Low-Church Episcopalians, differs from that of the Roman and Greek churches, and of High-Church Anglicans, in its rejection of the idea that baptism is the instrumental cause of regeneration, and that the grace of regeneration is effectually conveyed through the administration of that rite wherever duly performed. The teaching of Scripture on this subject is held to be that salvation is immediately dependent on faith, which, as a fruit of the operation of the Spirit of God in the soul, already, in its reception of Christ, implies the regenerating action of that Spirit, and is itself one evidence of it. To faith in Christ is attached the promise of forgiveness, and of all other blessings. Baptism is administered to those who already possess (at least profess) this faith, and symbolizes the dying to sin and rising to righteousness implicit in the act of faith (Rom 6). It is the symbol of a cleansing from sin and renewal by God's Spirit, but not the agency effecting that renewal, even instrumentally. Baptism is not, indeed, to be regarded as a bare symbol. It may be expected that its believing reception will be accompanied by fresh measures of grace, strengthening and fitting for the new life. This, however, as the life is already there, has nothing to do with the idea of baptism as an opus operatum, working a spiritual change in virtue of its mere administration. In Scripture the agency with which regeneration is specially connected is the Divine "word"

(cf 1 Pet 1 23). Without living faith, in those capable of its exercise, the outward rite can avail nothing. The supposed "regeneration" may be received—in multitudes of instances is received—without the least apparent change in heart or life.

The above, naturally, applies to adults; the case of children, born and growing up within the Christian community, is on a different footing. Those who recognize the right of such to baptism hold that in the normal Christian development children of believing parents should be the subjects of Divine grace from the commencement (Eph 6 4); they therefore properly receive the initiatory rite of the Christian church. The faith of the parent, in presenting his child for baptism, lays hold on God's promise to be a God to him and to his children; and he is entitled to hope for that which baptism pledges to him. But this, again, has no relation to the idea of regeneration through baptism.

JAMES ORR

ANGLICAN (HIGH-CHURCH) DOCTRINE

Regeneration, the initial gift of life in Christ, is, in the church's normal system, associated with the sacrament of baptism. The basis for this teaching and practice of the church is found primarily in Our Lord's discourse to Nicodemus (Jn 3 1-8) wherein the new birth is associated not only with the quickening Spirit but with the element of water. The Saviour's words, lit. tr^d, are as follows: "Except one be born [out] of water and Spirit (ex hū-datos kai pneūmatos genndomai), he cannot enter into the kingdom of God." (That it is the impersonal aspect of the Divine Spirit, i.e. as equivalent to "spiritual life" which is here presented, is indicated by the absence of the art. in the Gr of ver 5.) Entrance into the kingdom of God implies entrance into the church as the outward and visible embodiment of that kingdom. Our Lord, in the passage above cited, does not limit the possibility or the need of "new birth" to those who have arrived at adult age, or "years of discretion," but uses the general pronoun tis, tis, "anyone." The Anglican church does not, however, teach that baptism is unconditionally necessary, but only that it is "generally" necessary to salvation (cf the language of the Church Catechism with the qualification mentioned in the Prayer-Book "Office for the Baptism of Those of Riper Years," "Whereby ye may perceive the great necessity of this Sacrament, where it may be had"). It is not taught that the grace of God is absolutely or unconditionally bound to the external means, but only that these sacramental agencies are the ordinary and normal channels of Divine grace.

The typical form of baptism is that appropriate to the initiation of adults into the Christian body. Justin Martyr in his First Apology (ch lxi) no doubt testifies to what was the general view of Christians in the 2d cent. (cir 150 AD): "As many as are persuaded and believe that the things taught and said by us are true, and, moreover, take upon them to live accordingly, are taught to pray and ask of God with fasting for forgiveness of their former sins; . . . and then they are brought to a place of water, and there regenerated after the same manner with ourselves; for they are washed in the name of God, the Father and Lord of the universe, and of our Saviour Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Spirit." For the due administration of this sacrament, personal faith and repentance on the part of the candidate are prerequisite conditions. However, "the baptism of young children" (i.e. of infants) "is in any wise to be retained in the Church, as most agreeable to the institution of Christ" (XXXIX Articles, Art. XXVII, sub fin.). In the service "For the Baptism of Infants," repentance and faith are promised for the children by their "sureties" (ordinarily known as "sponsors" or "godparents"), "which promise, when they come to age [the children] themselves are bound to perform."

The person, whether adult or infant, receives in his baptism a real forgiveness; a washing away of all sins, whether original or actual. He also receives, at least in germ, the beginnings of new life in Christ; which life, however, must be developed and brought to perfection through his personal coöperation with the grace of God. But regeneration, as such, is not conversion; it is not even faith or love, strictly speaking. These latter, while they are conditions, or effects, or evidences of regeneration, are not regeneration itself, which is purely the work of God, operating by His creative power, through the Holy Ghost. The moral test of the existence of spiritual life is the presence in heart and conduct of the love of God and of obedience to His commandments (see 1 Jn passim).

It may be added that the bestowment of the gifts of spiritual strength—of the manifold graces and of the fulness of the Holy Spirit—is primarily associated with the laying on of hands (confirmation) rather than with baptism proper; the rite of confirmation was, however, originally connected with the baptismal service, as an adjunct to it. The newly-made Christian is not to rest content with the initial gift of life; he is bound to strive forward unto perfection. Confirmation is, in a sense, the completion of baptism. "The doctrine of laying on of hands" is accordingly connected with "the doctrine of baptisms," and both are reckoned by the author of the Epistle to the He as among "the first principles of Christ" (He 6 1.2 AV).

WILLIAM SAMUEL BISHOP

LUTHERAN DOCTRINE

Regeneration is here taken in its strict meaning to denote that internal spiritual change, not of the substance, but of the qualities, of the intellect and will of natural man, by which blindness, darkness in regard to spiritual matters, esp. the gospel, is removed from the former, and spiritual bondage, impotency, death from the latter (2 Cor 3 5; Acts 26 18; Phil 2 13), and the heart of the sinner is made to savingly know and appropriate the Lord Jesus Christ and the merits of His atoning sacrifice, as its only hope for a God-pleasing life here in time and a life in glory hereafter. Regeneration in the strict sense signifies the first spiritual movements and impulses in man, the beginning of his thinking Divine thoughts, cherishing holy desires and willing God-like volitions. But it does not signify the radical extinction of sin in man; for evil concupiscence remains also in the regenerate as a hostile element to the new life (Rom 7 23-25; Gal 5 16.17). Peccatum tollitur in baptismo, non ut non sit, sed ut non obsit—Augustine. "Sin is removed in baptism, not that it may not be, but that it may not hurt." Reduced to its lowest terms, regeneration in the strict sense may be defined as the kindling of saving faith in the heart of the sinner; for according to 1 Jn 5 1, "whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is begotten of God." Such terms as new creation (2 Cor 5 17; Gal 6 15 m), spiritual quickening, or vivification (Eph 2 5; Rom 6 11), spiritual resurrection (Eph 2 6; Col

3 1), are true synonyms of regeneration in the strict sense. In the point of time justification coincides with regeneration in the strict sense; for it is by faith, too, that the sinner is justified. But these two spiritual events must not be confounded; for justification affects, not the internal conditions of the sinner's heart, but his legal standing with God the righteous Judge. Regeneration is called baptismal regeneration in so far as it occurs in the event and as an effect of the application of the Christian baptism. See BAPTISM (I), 1, 6.

The two leading texts of Scripture which declare in plain terms that baptism is a means for effecting regeneration in the strict sense are 2. Scriptural Basis Jn 3 5 and Tit 3 5. But this doctrine is implied in Acts 2 38; Eph 5 26; Gal 3 27; 1 Pet 3 21. In Jn 3 Doctrine 7 it is immaterial whether anōthen gennēthēnai is rendered "to be born from above," or "to be born a second time." For the second birth is never of the flesh (Jn 1 13; 3 4.5); hence, is always of divine origin, "from above." It is ascribed to the agency of the entire Trinity: the Father (Jas 1 18; 1 Pet 1 3); the Son (Jn 1 12); and the Spirit (Tit 3 5). But by appropriation it is generally attributed to the Spirit alone, whose particular function is that of Quickener (see Cremer, Bibl.-theol. Wörterb., 9th ed, s.v. "pneuma," 894 f). Baptism is an instrument by which the Holy Spirit effects regeneration. "Water and the Spirit" (Jn 3 5) is a paraphrastic description of baptism: "water," inasmuch as the man is baptized therewith (1 Jn 5 7.8; Eph 5 26) for the forgiveness of sin (Acts 2 33; 22 16; 1 Cor 6 11), and "Spirit," inasmuch as the Holy Ghost is given to the person baptized in order to his spiritual renewal and sanctification; "both together—the former as causa medians, the latter as causa efficiens—constitute the objective and causative element out of which (cf 1 13) the birth from above is produced [ek]" (Meyer). In Tit 3 5 "the expression tó loutroû palingenesias, lit. 'bath of regeneration,' has been very arbitrarily interpreted by some expositors, some taking loutron as a fig. name for the regeneration itself, or for the praedicationis evangelii, 'preaching of the gospel' or for the Holy Spirit, or for the abundant imparting of the Spirit. From Eph 5 26 it is clear that it can mean nothing else than baptism; cf too, He 10 22; 1 Cor 6 11; Acts 22 16." Of this laver of regeneration Paul says that through it (diá), i.e. by its instrumentality, men are saved. Meyer is right when, correcting a former view of his, he states: "According to the context, Paul calls baptism the bath of the new birth, not meaning that it pledges us to the new birth ('to complete the process of moral purification, of expiation and sanctification,' Matthies), nor that it is a visible image of the new birth (De Wette), for neither in the one sense nor in the other could it be regarded as a means of saving. Paul uses that name for it as the bath by means of which God actually brings about the new birth." The application of baptism and the operation of the Spirit must be viewed as one undivided action. Thus the offense of Spurgeon, Weiss and others at "regeneration by water-baptism" can be removed. Baptism does not produce salutary effects ex opere operato, i.e. by the mere external performance of the baptismal action. No instrument with which Divine grace works does. Even the preaching of the gospel is void of saving results if not "mixed with faith" (He 4 2 AV). Luther correctly describes the working of baptism thus: "How can water do such great things? It is not the water indeed that does them, but the Word of God which is in and with the water (God's giving hand), and faith which trusts such word of God in the water (man's receiving hand)." But this faith, which is required for a salutary use of the gospel and baptism, is wrought by these as instruments which the Holy Spirit employs to produce faith; not by imparting to them a magical power but by uniting His Divine power with them (Rom 10 17; 2 Cor 4 6; Eph 5 26).

The comprehensive statements in Jn 3 6; Eph 2 3 ("by nature") show that infants are in need of being regenerated, and Mt 18 3,6,

4. Infants that they are capable of faith. It is and Adults not more difficult for the Holy Spirit to work faith in infants by baptism, than in adults by the preaching of the gospel. And infant faith, though it may baffle our attempts at exact definition, is nevertheless honored in Scripture with the word which denotes genuine faith, πίστεύειν, i.e. trustfully relying on Christ (Mt 18 6; cf 2 Tim 3 15; 1 5). In the case of adults who have received faith through hearing and reading the gospel (Jas 1 18; 1 Pet 1 23; 1 Cor 4 15), baptism is still "the washing of regeneration," because it is a seal to them of the righteousness which these people have previously obtained by believing the gospel (Rom 4 11-13; Gal 3 7); and it reminds them of, and enables them to discharge, their daily duty of putting away the old and putting on the new man (Eph 4 22,24), just as the Word is still the regenerating word of truth (Jas 1 18) though it be preached to persons who are regenerated a long time ago. Accordingly, Luther rightly extends the regenerating and renewing influences of baptism throughout the life of a Christian, when he says "Baptizing with water signifies that the old Adam in us should, by daily contrition and repentance, be drowned and die, with all sins and evil lusts; and, again, a new man should come forth and arise, who shall live before God in righteousness and purity forever" (Smaller Catech.).

W. H. T. DAU

BAPTISM FOR THE DEAD (βαπτίζομαι ὑπὲρ τῶν νεκρῶν, baptizomai hypér tōn nekron): Some of the Corinthian Christians denied the

1. Paul's Argument resurrection of the dead, and Paul advances three arguments to convince them that the dead will be raised: (1) "If there is no resurrection of the dead, neither hath Christ been raised," but Christ is raised (1 Cor 15 13,20). (2) If the dead are not raised, why are men being baptized for the dead (ib 15 29)? (3) Why should the apostle himself wage his spiritual warfare (ib 15 30)? The first argument rests upon the central fact of Christianity, and the other two are appeals to the consistency of the Corinthians, and of Paul himself. Whatever "baptism for the dead" meant, it was, in Paul's opinion, as real, valid and legitimate a premise from which to conclude that the dead would rise as his own sufferings. The natural meaning of the words is obvious. Men in Corinth, and possibly elsewhere, were being continually baptized on behalf of others who were at the time dead, with a view to benefiting them in the resurrection, but if there be no resurrection, what shall they thus accomplish, and why do they do it? "The only legitimate reference is to a practice . . . of survivors allowing themselves to be baptized on behalf of (believing?) friends who had died without baptism" (Alford in loc.).

Tertullian believed that Paul referred to a custom of vicarious baptism (Res., 48c; Adv. Marc., 5.10).

2. Patristic Evidence There is evidence that the early church knew such a practice. Epiphanius mentions a tradition that the custom obtained among the Cerinthians (Haer., 28 6). And Chrysostom states that it prevailed among the Marcionites.

But commentators have offered between thirty and forty other interpretations, more or less strained, of the passage. (For a summary of different views see T. C. Edwards and Stanley, Comms., ad loc.) Two of the most reasonable

3. Modern Views views from recent commentators are: "What shall they do who receive baptism on account of the dead? i.e. with a view to the resurrection of the dead?" and therefore to sharing in it themselves (Canon Evans, Speaker's Comm., ad loc.); "that the death of Christians led to the conversion of survivors, who in the first instance 'for the sake of the dead' (their beloved dead), and in the hope of reunion, turn to Christ" (Findlay, Expositor's Greek Test., ad loc.). Both ideas may be true, but they are simply imported into this passage, and the latter also is quite irrelevant to the argument and makes Paul identify conversion with baptism.

But why is all this ingenuity expended to evade the natural meaning? Because (1) such a custom

4. The Difficulty would be a superstition involving the principle of opus operatum; and (2) Paul could not share or even tolerate a contemporary idea which is now regarded as superstition. To reply (with Alford) that Paul does not approve the custom will not serve the purpose, for he would scarcely base so great an argument, even as an argumentum ad hominem, on a practice which he regarded as wholly false and superstitious. The retort of those who denied the resurrection would be too obvious. But why should it be necessary to suppose that Paul rose above all the limitations of his age? The idea that symbolic acts had a vicarious significance had sunk deeply into the Jewish mind, and it would not be surprising if it took more than twenty years for the leaven of the gospel to work all the Jew out of Paul. At least it serves the apostle's credit ill to make his argument meaningless or absurd in order to save him from sharing at all in the inadequate conceptions of his age. He made for himself no claim of infallibility. T. REES

BAPTISM OF FIRE (ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ καὶ πυρὶ, en pneūmati hagīō kai puri): This expression is used in Mt 3 11. The copulative καὶ requires that the baptism "in the Holy Ghost and in fire," should be regarded as one and the same thing. It does violence to the construction, therefore, to make this statement refer to the fire of judgment. The difficulty has always been in associating fire with the person of the Holy Ghost. But in the connection of fire with the work or influence of the Holy Ghost the difficulty disappears. The thought of John is that the Saviour would give them the Divine Sanctifier as purifying water to wash away their sins and as a refining fire to consume their dross; to kindle in their hearts the holy flame of Divine love and zeal; to illuminate their souls with heavenly wisdom. The statement, therefore, in this verse indicates the manner in which Christ will admit them to discipleship and prepare them for His service. See BAPTISM; FIRE. JACOB W. KAPP

BAPTISM OF THE HOLY SPIRIT: The expression "baptism of the Holy Spirit" is based on a number of predictions found in our four Gospels and in connection with these the record of their fulfilment in the Book of Acts. The passages in the Gospels are as follows: Mt 3 11: "I indeed baptize you in water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire." The last clause is αὐτὸς ὑμᾶς βαπτίσει ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ kal pnyl=autós humás baptisei en pneúmati hagíō kal puri. In Mk 1 8 and Lk 3 16 we have the declaration in a slightly modified form; and in Jn 1 33 John the Baptist declares that the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at the baptism of the latter marked out Jesus as "he that baptizeth in the Holy Spirit." Again in Jn 7 37,38 we read: "Now on the last day, the great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink. He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, from within him shall flow rivers of living water." Then the evangelist adds in ver 39: "But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." These are the specific references in the four Gospels to the baptisms of the Holy Spirit. In Acts we find direct reference by Luke to the promised baptism in the Holy Spirit. In 1 5 Jesus, just before the ascension, contrasts John's baptism in water with the baptism in the Holy Spirit which the disciples are to receive "not many days hence," and in ver 8 power in witnessing for Jesus is predicted as the result of the baptism in the Holy Spirit. On the evening of the resurrection day Jesus appeared to the disciples and "he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Spirit" (Jn 20 22). This was probably not a wholly symbolic act but an actual communication to the disciples, in some measure, of the gift of the Spirit, preliminary to the later complete bestowal.

We observe next the fulfilment of these predictions as recorded in Acts. The gift of the Holy Spirit on the Day of Pentecost and the miraculous manifestations which followed are clearly the chief historical fulfilment of the prediction of the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Among the manifestations of the coming of the Spirit at Pentecost were first those which were physical, such as "a sound as of the rushing of a mighty wind, and it filled all the house where they were sitting" (Acts 2 2), and the appearance of "tongues parting asunder, like as of fire; and it sat upon each one of them" (Acts 2 3). Secondly, there were spiritual results: "And they were all filled with the Holy Spirit, and began to speak with other tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance" (Acts 2 4). In vs 16 ff Peter declares that this bestowment of the Holy Spirit is in fulfilment of the prediction made by the prophet Joel and he cites the words in 2 28 ff of Joel's prophecy.

There is one other important passage in Acts in which reference is made to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. While Peter was speaking to Cornelius (Acts 10 44) the Holy Spirit fell on all that heard the word and they of the circumcision who were with Peter "were amazed" "because that on the Gentiles also was poured out the gift of the Holy Spirit." When giving the brethren at Jerus an account of his visit to Cornelius, Peter declares that this event which he had witnessed was a baptism of the Holy Spirit (Acts 11 16): "And I remembered the word of the Lord, how he said, John indeed baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized in the Holy Spirit."

We consider next the significance of the baptism of the Holy Spirit from various points of view.

(1) From the point of view of OT teaching as to the gift of the Spirit.—The prophecy of Joel quoted by Peter indicates something extraordinary in the gift of the Spirit at Pentecost.

2. Significance of Baptism of the Holy Spirit

In the OT usually the Spirit was bestowed upon individuals; here the gift is to the group of disciples, the church. Here the gift is permanently bestowed, while in the OT it was usually transient and for a special purpose. Here again the Spirit comes in fulness as contrasted with the partial bestowment in OT times.

(2) From the point of view of the ascended Christ.—In Lk 24 49 Jesus commands the disciples to tarry in the city "until ye be clothed with power from on high," and in Jn 15 26 He speaks of the Comforter "whom I will send unto you from the Father," "he shall bear witness of me"; and in Jn 16 13 Jesus declares that the Spirit when He comes shall guide the disciples into all truth, and He shall show them things to come. In this verse the Spirit is called the Spirit of truth. It was fitting that the Spirit who was to interpret truth and guide into all truth should come in fulness after, rather than before, the completion of the life-task of the Messiah. The historical manifestation of Divine truth as thus completed made necessary the gift of the Spirit in fulness. Christ Himself was the giver of the Spirit. The Spirit now takes the place of the ascended Christ, or rather takes the things of Christ and shows them to the disciples. The baptism of the Spirit at Pentecost thus becomes the great historic event signaling the beginning of a new era in the kingdom of God in which the whole movement is lifted to the spiritual plane, and the task of evangelizing the world is formally begun.

(3) The significance of the baptism of the Spirit from the point of view of the disciples.—It can scarcely be said with truth that Pentecost was the birthday of the church. Jesus had spoken of His church during His earthly ministry. The spiritual relation to Christ which constitutes the basis of the church existed prior to the baptism of the Holy Spirit. But that baptism established the church in several ways. First in unity. The external bond of unity now gives place to an inner spiritual bond of profound significance. Secondly, the church now becomes conscious of a spiritual mission, and theocratic ideals of the kingdom disappear. Thirdly, the church is now endued with power for its work. Among the gifts bestowed were the gift of prophecy in the large sense of speaking for God, and the gift of tongues which enabled disciples to speak in foreign tongues. The account in the second ch of Acts admits of no other construction. There was also bestowed power in witnessing for Christ. This was indeed one of the most prominent blessings named in connection with the promise of the baptism of the Spirit. The power of working miracles was also bestowed (Acts 3 4 ff; 5 12 ff). Later in the epistles of Paul much emphasis is given to the Spirit as the sanctifying agency in the hearts of believers. In Acts the word of the Spirit is chiefly Messianic, that is, the Spirit's activity is all seen in relation to the extension of the Messianic kingdom. The occasion for the outpouring of the Spirit is Pentecost when men from all nations are assembled in Jerus. The symbolic representation of tongues of fire is suggestive of preaching, and the glossolalia, or speaking with tongues which followed, so that men of various nations heard the gospel in their own languages, indicates that the baptism of the Spirit had a very special relation to the task of world-wide evangelization for the bringing in of the kingdom of God.

The question is often raised whether or not the baptism of the Holy Spirit occurred once for all or is repeated in subsequent baptisms. The evidence seems to point to the former view to the extent at least of being limited to outpourings which took place in connection with events recorded in the early chapters of the Book of Acts.

The following considerations favor this view:

3. Finality of the Baptism of the Holy Spirit

(1) In the first ch of Acts Jesus predicts, according to Luke's account, that the baptism of the Holy Spirit would take place, "not many days hence" (Acts 1 5). This would seem to point to a definite and specific event rather than to a continuous process.

(2) Again, Peter's citation in Acts 2 17-21 of Joel's prophecy shows that in Peter's mind the event which his hearers were then witnessing was the definite fulfilment of the words of Joel.

(3) Notice in the third place that only one other event in the NT is described as the baptism of the Holy Spirit, and for special reasons this may be regarded as the completion of the Pentecostal baptism. The passage is that contained in Acts 10 1-11 18 in which the record is given of the following events: (a) miraculous vision given to Peter on the housetop (10 11-16) indicating that the things about to occur are of unique importance; (b) the speaking with tongues (10 45,46); (c) Peter declares to the brethren at Jerus that the Holy Ghost fell on the Gentiles in this instance of Cornelius and his household "as on us at the beginning" (11 15); (d) Peter also declares that this was a fulfilment of the promise of the baptism of the Holy Spirit (11 16,17); (e) the Jewish Christians who heard Peter's account of the matter acknowledged this as proof that God had also extended the privileges of the gospel to the Gentiles (11 18). The baptism of the Holy Spirit bestowed upon Cornelius and his household is thus directly linked with the first outpouring at Pentecost, and as the event which signalized the opening of the door of the gospel formally to Gentiles it is in complete harmony with the missionary significance of the first great Pentecostal outpouring. It was a turning point or crisis in the Messianic kingdom and seems designed to complete the Pentecostal gift by showing that Gentiles as well as Jews are to be embraced in all the privileges of the new dispensation.

(4) We observe again that nowhere in the epistles do we find a repetition of the baptism of the Spirit. This would be remarkable if it had been understood by the writers of the epistles that the baptism of the Spirit was frequently to be repeated. There is no evidence outside the Book of Acts that the baptism of the Spirit ever occurred in the later NT times. In 1 Cor 12 13 Paul says, "For in one Spirit were we all baptized into one body . . . and were all made to drink of one Spirit." But here the reference is not to the baptism of the Spirit, but rather to a baptism into the church which is the body of Christ. We conclude, therefore, that the Pentecostal baptism taken in conjunction with the baptism of the Spirit in the case of Cornelius completes the baptism of the Holy Spirit according to the NT teaching. The baptism of the Spirit as thus bestowed was, however, the definite gift of the Spirit in His fulness for every form of spiritual blessing necessary in the progress of the kingdom and as the permanent and abiding gift of God to His people. In all subsequent NT writings there is the assumption of this presence of the Spirit and of His availability for all believers. The various commands and exhortations of the epistles are based on the assumption that the baptism of the Spirit has already taken place, and that, according to the prediction of Jesus to the disciples, the Spirit was to abide with them forever (Jn 14 16). We should not therefore confound other forms of expression found in the NT with the baptism of the Holy Spirit. When Christians are enjoined to "walk by the Spirit" (Gal 5 16) and "be filled with the Spirit" (Eph 5 18), or when the Spirit is described as an anointing (χρίσμα = chrisma) as in 1 Jn 2 20-27, and as the "earnest of our inheritance" (ἀρραβών = arrabōn), as in Eph 1

14, and when various other similar expressions are employed in the epistles of the NT, we are not to understand the baptism of the Holy Spirit. These expressions indicate aspects of the Spirit's work in believers or of the believer's appropriation of the gifts and blessings of the Spirit rather than the historical baptism of the Spirit.

Three final points require brief attention, viz. the relation of the baptism of the Spirit to the baptism in water, and to the baptism in fire, and to the laying on of hands.

4. Relation of Baptism of the Spirit to Other Baptisms (1) We note that the baptism in fire is coupled with the baptism in the Spirit in Mt 3 11 and in Lk 3 16. These passages give the word of John the Baptist. John speaks of the coming One who "shall baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire" (Lk 3 16). This baptism in fire is often taken as being parallel and synonymous with the baptism in the Spirit. The context however in both Mt and Lk seems to favor another meaning. Jesus' Messianic work will be both cleansing and destructive. The "you" addressed by John included the people generally and might naturally embrace both classes, those whose attitude to Jesus would be believing and those who would refuse to believe. His action as Messiah would affect all men. Some He would regenerate and purify through the Holy Ghost. Others He would destroy through the fire of punishment. This view is favored by the context in both gospels. In both the destructive energy of Christ is coupled with His saving power in other terms which admit of no doubt. The wheat He gathers into the garner and the chaff He burns with unquenchable fire.

(2) The baptism of the Holy Spirit was not meant to supersede water baptism. This is clear from the whole of the history in the Book of Acts, where water baptism is uniformly administered to converts after the Pentecostal baptism of the Spirit, as well as from the numerous references to water baptisms in the epistles. The evidence here is so abundant that it is unnecessary to develop it in detail. See Rom 6 3; 1 Cor 1 14-17; 10 2; 12 13; 15 29; Gal 3 27; Eph 4 5; Col 2 12; 1 Pet 3 21.

(3) In Acts 8 17 and 19 6 the Holy Spirit is bestowed in connection with the laying on of the hands of apostles, but these are not to be regarded as instances of the baptism of the Spirit in the strict sense, but rather as instances of the reception by believers of the Spirit which had already been bestowed in fulness at Pentecost.

BAPTISM, INFANT. See BAPTISM (I), (II); (II), III, 3, v; (III), III, 3.

BAPTIST, bap'tist. See JOHN THE BAPTIST.

BAR, bār (prefix): Aram. for the Heb בָּר, bār, "son." Cf Aram. sections of Ezr and Dnl. In the OT the word is found three times in Prov 31 2 and once in Syr Ps 2 12 (Hier. translates "pure"). In the NT "Bar" is frequently employed as prefix to names of persons. Cf Barabbas; Bar-Jesus; Bar-Jonah; Barnabas; Barsabbas; Bartholomew; Bartimaeus. See BEN.

BAR, bār (subst.):

(1) בַּר, beṛ = "a bolt" (Ex 26 26-29; 35 11; 36 31-34; 39 33; 40 18; Nu 3 36; 4 31; Dt 3 5; Jgs 16 3; 1 S 23 7; 1 K 4 13; 2 Ch 8 5; 14 7; Neh 3 3,6,13-15; Job 38 10 "bars and doors"; for the sea (the bank or shore of the sea); Ps 107 16; 147 13 "the bars of thy gates": the walls of the city were now rebuilt and its gates only closed and barred by night [see Neh 7 3]; Prov 18 19, "bars of a castle"; Isa 45 2; Jer 49 31; 51 30; Lam 2 9; Ezk 38 11): meaning "a rock in the sea" (Jon 2 6).

(2) מִלָּה, mōl = "a staff," "stick," "pole" (Nu 4 10.12m); "strong fortification and great impediment" (Isa 45 2; Am 1 5, "the bolt of Damascus"): no need here to render prince, as some do [G. A. Smith in loc.].

(3) בַּד, badh = "staff," "part of body," "strength" (Job 17 16, "bars of Sheol": the gates of the world of the dead; cf Isa 38 10; some read, "Will the bars of Sheol fall?").

(4) מִסְכֵּל, mēṣil = "something hammered out, a (forged) bar" (Job 40 18). See DOOR; GATE; HOUSE. FRANK E. HIRSCH

BARABBAS, ba-rab'as (Βαραββᾶς, Barabbās): For Aram. Bar-abba = lit. "son of the father," i.e. of the master or teacher. Abba in the time of Jesus was perhaps a title of honor (Mt 23 9), but became later a proper name. The variant Barabban found in the Harclean Syr would mean "son of the rabbi or teacher." Origen knew and does not absolutely condemn a reading of Mt 27 16.17, which gave the name "Jesus Barabbas," but although it is also found in a few cursives and in the Aram. and the Jerus Syr VSS in this place only, it is probably due to a scribe's error in transcription (WH, App., 19-20). If the name was simply Barabbas or Barrabban, it may still have meant that the man was a rabbi's son, or it may have been a purely conventional proper name, signifying nothing. He was the criminal chosen by the Jerus mob, at the instigation of the priests, in preference to Jesus Christ, for Pilate to release on the feast of Passover (Mk 15 15; Mt 27 20.21; Lk 23 18; Jn 18 40). Mt calls him "a notable [i.e. notorious] prisoner" (27 16). Mk says that he was "bound with them that had made insurrection, men who in the insurrection had committed murder" (15 7). Luke states that he was cast into prison "for a certain insurrection made in the city, and for murder" (23 19; cf Acts 3 14). John calls him a "robber" or "brigand" (18 40). Nothing further is known of him, nor of the insurrection in which he took part. Luke's statement that he was a murderer is probably a deduction from Mark's more circumstantial statement, that he was only one of a gang, who in a rising had committed murder. Whether robbery was the motive of his crime, as Jn suggests, or whether he was "a man who had raised a revolt against the Rom power" (Gould) cannot be decided. But it seems equally improbable that the priests (the pro-Rom party) would urge the release of a political prisoner and that Pilate would grant it, esp. when the former were urging, and the latter could not resist, the execution of Jesus on a political charge (Lk 23 2). The insurrection may have been a notorious case of brigandage. To say that the Jews would not be interested in the release of such a prisoner, is to forget the history of mobs. The custom referred to of releasing a prisoner on the Passover is otherwise unknown. "What Mt [and Jn] represents as brought about by Pilate, Mk makes to appear as if it were suggested by the people themselves. An unessential variation" (Meyer). For a view of the incident as semi-legendary growth, see Schmiedel in EB. See also Allen, Matthew, and Gould, Mark, ad loc., and art. "Barabbas" by Plummer in HDB.

BARACHEL, bar'a-kel (בִּרְכָּאֵל, bārakh'el, "God blesses"): B., the Buzite, of the family of Ram, was the father of Elihu, who was the last one to reason with Job (Job 32 2.6). Cf Buz; RAM.

BARACHIAH, bar-a-ki'a (Βαραχίας, Barachias; AV Barachias; Mt 23 35): Father of Zachariah who was murdered between the sanctuary and the altar. It is possible that reference is made to Zechariah, the son of Jehoiada (2 Ch 24 20 ff), whom Matthew by mistake calls "Z., the son of B." Lk 11 51 omits the name of the father of Z. (cf Zahn's Kommentar, 649, note).

BARACHIAS, bar-a-ki'as. See BARACHIAH.

BARAK, bā'rak (בָּרַק, bārāk, "lightning flash"): The name occurs in Sabaean ברקס, in Palmyrene ברק, and in Punic Barcas, as surname of Hamilcar; and as Divine name in Assyrian Ramman-Birku and Gibil-Birku (Del. Assyrian, HWB, 187). Barak was the son of Abinoam of Kedesh, a refuge city in Mt. Naphtali. He was summoned by the prophetess Deborah to lead his countrymen to war against the Canaanites under the leadership of Sisera. From the celebrated ode of Deborah we gather that Israel suffered at the hand of the enemy; the caravan roads were in danger, traffic almost ceased; the cultivated country was plundered (Jgs 5 6.7). The fighting men in Israel were disarmed, a shield was not to be seen nor a spear among forty thousand men (ver 8). The prophetess raised the signal of struggle for independence. Soon Barak came to her aid. With an army of 10,000 men—according to Jgs 4 10 they were all drawn from Zebulun and Naphtali, whereas Jgs 5 13-18 adds Benjamin, Machir and Issachar to the list of faithful tribes—Barak, accompanied by Deborah, rushed to the summit of Mt. Tabor. This location was very favorable to the rudely armed Israelites in warding off the danger of the well-armed enemy. The wooded slopes protected them against the chariots of the Canaanites. In addition they were within striking distance should the enemy expose himself on the march. Under the heavy rainfall the alluvial plain became a morass, in which the heavy-armed troops found it impossible to move. Soon the little stream Kishon was filled with chariots, horses and Canaanites. Sisera abandoned his chariot and fled on foot. Barak pursued him and found him murdered by Jael in her tent. This completed the victory. See BEDAN; Moore, "Judges," ad loc.

SAMUEL COHEN

BARBARIAN, bār-bā'ri-an, BARBAROUS, bār-ba-rus (βάρβαρος, bárbaros): A word probably formed by imitation of the unintelligible sounds of foreign speech, and hence in the mouth of a Greek it meant anything that was not Gr, language, people or customs. With the spread of Gr language and culture, it came to be used generally for all that was non-Gr. Philo and Jos sometimes called their own nation "barbarians," and so did Rom writers up to the Augustan age, when they adopted Gr culture, and reckoned themselves with the Greeks as the only cultured people in the world. Therefore Greek and barbarian meant the whole human race (Rom 1 14).

In Col 3 11, "barbarian, Scythian" is not a classification or antithesis but a "climax" (Abbott) = "barbarians, even Scythians, the lowest type of barbarians." In Christ, all racial distinctions, even the most pronounced, disappear.

In 1 Cor 14 11 Paul uses the term in its more primitive sense of one speaking a foreign, and therefore, an unintelligible language: "If then I know not the meaning of the voice, I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian, and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me." The speaking with tongues would not be a means of communication. The excited inarticulate ejaculations of the Corinthian revivalists were worse than useless unless someone had the gift of articulating in intelligible language the force of feeling that produced them (dūnamis tēs phōnēs, lit. "the power of the sound").

In Acts 28 2.4 (in AV of ver 2 "barbarous people"=barbarians) the writer, perhaps from the Gr-Rom standpoint, calls the inhabitants of Melita barbarians, as being descendants of the old Phoen settlers, or possibly in the more general sense of "strangers." For the later sense of "brutal," "cruel," "savage," see 2 Macc 2 21; 4 25; 15 2.

BARBER, bār'bēr:

(1) The Eng. word "barber" is from Lat barba, "beard"—a man who shaves the beard. Dressing and trimming the hair came to be added to his work. "Barber" is found only once EV, in Ezk 5 1, "Take thee a sharp sword; as a barber's razor shalt thou take it unto thee, and shalt cause it to pass upon thy head and upon thy beard" (cf Hāghigha' 4b, Shab, § 6).

An Oriental Barber.

(2) In Gen 41 14 we probably have a case of conformity to Egyp, rather than Palestinian custom, where Joseph "shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh." It is known that Egyptians of the higher classes shaved the beard regularly and completely (as the Hittites, Elamites and early Babylonians seem to have done), except that fashion allowed, as an exception to the rule, a small tuft, or "goatee," under the chin.

(3) We learn from various Scriptural allusions, as well as from other sources (cf W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, 296 ff), that the business of the oriental barber included, besides ceremonial shaving, the trimming and polling of the hair and the beard. Cf 2 S 19 24 where it appears that the moustache (Heb sāphām; AV "beard") received regular trimming; and 1 S 21 14, where the neglect of the beard is set down as a sign of madness.

That men wore wigs and false beards in ancient days, the latter showing the rank of the wearer, appears from Herod. ii.36; iii.12; and Wilkinson, Anc. Egypt, II, 324, etc. Jos, Vita, II, gives one case where false hair appears to have been used as an intentional disguise. See also Polyb. iii.78.

(4) The business of the barber (see Ezk 5 1, "as a barber's razor shalt thou take it unto thee, and shalt cause it to pass upon thy head and upon thy beard"), outside of ceremonial shaving, may have consisted in trimming and polling the beard and the hair of the head. Of other nations with whom Israel of old came in contact, the Hittites and Elamites, it is now known, shaved the beard completely, as the earliest Babylonians also seem to have done.

(5) The prohibition enjoined in the Mosaic law upon "the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok" (Ezk 44 15.20) forbidding either "shaving the head," or "suffering their locks to grow long," or shaving off the corners of their beard (Lev 21 5), was clearly, in a sense peculiar to the priests, etc: "They [the priests] shall only cut off," i.e. trim, not shave, "the hair of their heads" (Ezk 44 20b). But in the Apos Const, I, 3, insistence is laid upon the Bib. prohibition as applicable to all as regards the removal of the beard (cf Clement of Alex., Paed., III, ed Migne, I, 580 f). Jerome on Ezk 44 20 and some of the Jewish sages find the basis of this prohibition in the fact that God gave a beard to man to distinguish him from the woman—so, they reasoned, it is wrong thus to go against Nature (cf Bahya, on Lev 19 27).

(6) In the Pal of the Gr period, say in the 3d cent. BC, when there was a large infusion of Hellenic population and influence, clipping of the beard prevailed in some circles, being omitted only in times of mourning, etc. The common people, however, seem to have seen little distinction between clipping the beard and shaving. But see pictures of captive Jews with clipped beard in the British Museum.

BARCHUS, bār'kus (B, Βαρούς, Bachous; A, Βαρχούε, Barchoué; AV Charchus, from Aldine ed, Charkous; 1 Esd 5 32 = Barkos [Ezr 2 53; Neh 7 55]): The descendants of B. (temple-servants) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus.

BAREFOOT, bār'fōot: The word is found in the following passages: EV "He went barefoot" (2 S 15 30); "[Isaiah] did so, walking . . . barefoot" (Isa 20 2); and like the 1. Intro- . . . "barefoot" (Isa 20 2); and like the ductory Egyptians, "naked and barefoot" (Isa 20 3.4). It seems that David in his flight before Absalom "went barefoot," not to facilitate his flight, but to show his grief (2 S 15 30), and that Micah (1 8) makes "going barefoot" a sign of mourning (LXX "to be barefoot"; AV "stripped"). The nakedness and bare feet of the prophet Isaiah (20 2) may have been intended to symbolize and express sympathy for the forlorn condition of captives (cf Job 12 17.19, where AV and RV have "spoiled," but some authorities give as the true tr "barefoot").

Jastrow, in art. on "Tearing the Garments" (Jour. of the Am. Oriental Soc., XXI, 23-39) presents a view worth considering of going barefoot as a sign of mourning and then of grief in general (cf also Jew Enc., art. "Barefoot"). All these passages seem to imply the discomfort of going barefoot on long journeys, over stony roads or hot sands; but then, as now, in the Orient sandals seem to have been little worn ordinarily in and around the house. See SHOES.

The "shoes" of the ancients, as we know from many sources, were "sandals," i.e. simply soles, for the most part of rawhide, tied to the feet to protect them against the gravel, stones or thorns of the road. 2. An Shoes of the modern sort, as well as Ancient socks and stockings, were unknown. Oriental In ancient times it was certainly a Custom common custom in Bible lands to go about in and around one's house without sandals. The peasantry, indeed, like the fellaheen of today, being hardened to it, often went afield barefoot. But for a king, or a prophet, a priest or a worshipper, to go barefoot, was another matter, as it was also for a mourner, for one in great distress, to be found walking the streets of a city, or going any distance in bare feet. Here we come again to customs peculiar to the Orient, and of various significance. For instance, it was considered then, as it is now in the Moslem world, profane and shocking, nothing short of a desecration, to enter a sanctuary, or walk on "holy ground," with dust-covered shoes, or unwashed feet. Moses and Joshua were commanded to take off their shoes when on "holy ground" (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15). "No one was allowed to walk on the temple ground with shoes on, or with dust on his feet" (Ber., IX, 5; cf Jamblichus, Pythagoras, § 105). No one in the East today is allowed to enter any mosque with shoes on, or without first putting slippers furnished for the purpose over his shoes. As a rule, too, the feet must be cleansed by ablution in every such case, as well as hands and feet before each meal.

The priests of Israel, as would seem true of the priests in general among the ancients, wore no shoes when ministering (see Silvius 3. Priests Italicus, III, 28; cf Theodoret on on Duty Ex 3, questio 7; and Yer. Shet., 5, Went 48d). Anciently, certainly the priests Barefoot of Israel, when going upon the platform to serve before the ark, in Tabernacle or temple, as later in the synagogue to bless the congregation, went barefoot; though today, strange to say, such ministering priests among the Jews wear stockings, and are not supposed to be barefoot (Šōṭāh, 40a; RH, 316; Shulḥān 'Ārūkh, 'Orāḥ Ḥayyim, 128, 5; see Jew Enc., art. "Barefoot").

The reason or reasons for the removal of the shoes in such cases as the above, we are not at a loss to divine; but when it comes to the 4. Reasons removal of the shoes in times of mourning, etc., opinions differ. Some see for the in such customs a trace of ancestor- Ancient worship; others find simply a rever- Custom sion or return to primitive modes of life; while others still, in agreement with a widely prevalent Jewish view, suggest that it was adopted as a perfectly natural symbol of humility and simplicity of life, appropriate to occasions of grief, distress and deep solemnity of feeling.

The shoes are set aside now by many modern Jews on the Day of Atonement and on the Ninth of Ab.

BARHUMITE, bār-hū'mīt. See BAHARUMITE.

BARIAH, ba-rī'ah (בָּרִיָּה, bārīyah, "fugitive"): B. was a descendant of David in the line of Solomon (1 Ch 3 22).

BAR-JESUS, bār-jē'zus (Βαρισηους, Bariēsous): "A certain sorcerer [Gr magos], a false prophet, a Jew" whom Paul and Silas found at Paphos in Cyprus in the train of Sergius Paulus, the Rom proconsul (Acts 13 6ff). The proconsul was "a man of understanding" (lit. a prudent or sagacious man), of an inquiring mind, interested in the thought and magic of his times. This characteristic explains the presence of a magos among his staff and his desire to hear Barnabas and Saul. Bar-Jesus was the magician's Jewish name. Elymas is said to be the interpretation of his name (ver 8). It is the Gr transliteration of an Aram. or Arab. word equivalent to Gr magos. From Arab. 'alama, "to know" is derived 'alīm, "a wise" or "learned man." In Korān, Sur n. 106, Moses is called Sāḥir 'alīm, "wise magician." Elymas therefore means "sorcerer" (cf Simon "Magus").

The East was flooding the Rom Empire with its new and wonderful religious systems, which, culminating in neo-Platonism, were the great rivals of Christianity both in their cruder and in their more strictly religious forms. Superstition was extremely prevalent, and wonder-workers of all kinds, whether impostors or honest exponents of some new faith, found their task easy through the credulity of the public. Babylonia was the home of magic, for charms are found on the oldest tablets. "Magos" was originally applied to the priests of the Persians who overran Babylonia, but the title degenerated when it was assumed by baser persons for baser arts. Juvenal (vi.562, etc), Horace (Sat. i.2.1) and other Lat authors mention Chaldaean astrologers and impostors, probably Bab Jews. Many of the Magians, however, were the scientists of their day, the heirs of the science of Babylon and the lore of Persia, and not merely pretenders or conjurers (see MAGIC). It may have been as the representative of some oriental system, a compound of "science" and religion, that Bar-Jesus was attached to the train of Sergius Paulus.

Both Sergius and Elymas had heard about the teaching of the apostles, and this aroused the curiosity of Sergius and the fear of Elymas. When the apostles came, obedient to the command of the proconsul, their doctrine visibly produced on him a considerable impression. Fearing lest his position of influence and gain would be taken by the new teachers, Elymas "withstood them, seeking to turn aside the proconsul from the faith" (ver 8). Paul, inspired by the Holy Spirit, worked a wonder on the wonder-worker by striking him blind with his word, thus revealing to the proconsul that behind him was Divine power. Sergius Paulus believed, "being astonished at the teaching of the Lord" (ver 12).

BAR-JONAH, bār-jō'na (Βαρ-ιωνάς, Bar-iōnās): Simon Peter's patronymic (Mt 16 17). Bar is Aram. for "son" (cf Bar-timaeus, Bartholomew, etc), and corresponds to Heb bēn. Thus we are to understand that Peter's father's name was Jonah. But in Jn 1 42; 21 15-17, according to the best reading, his name is given as John (so RV, instead of AV Jona, Jonas). There are two hypotheses to account for this difference: (1) Iōnas (Jonah) in Mt 16 17 may be simply a contraction of Iōanēs (John); (2) Peter's father may have been known by two names, Jonah and John.

BARKOS, bār'kos (בָּרְקוֹס, barḳōs, "party-colored" [?]; cf HPN. 68. n. 2): The descendants of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (Ezr 2 53; Neh 7 55). Cf Barchus (1 Esd 5 32).

BARLEY, bār'li (שֵׁבֶרֶת, sē'ōrāh):

(1) In the Bible, as in modern times, barley was a characteristic product of Pal—"a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees," etc (Dt 8 8), the failure of whose crop was a national disaster (Joel 1 11). It was, and is, grown chiefly as provender for horses and asses (1 K 4 28), oats being practically unknown, but it was, as it now is, to some extent, the food of the poor in country districts (Ruth 2 17; 2 K 4 42; Jn 6 9,13). Probably this is the meaning of the dream of the Midianite concerning Gideon: "Behold, I dreamed a dream; and, lo, a cake of barley bread tumbled into the camp of Midian, and came unto the tent, and smote it so that it fell, and turned it upside down, so that the tent lay flat. And his fellow answered and said, This is nothing else save the sword of Gideon, the son of Joash, a man of Israel" (Jgs 7 13 f). Here the barley loaf is type of the peasant origin of Gideon's army and perhaps, too, of his own lowly condition.

Bringing Home the Barley Harvest.

Barley was (Ezk 4 9) one of the ingredients from which the prophet was to make bread and "eat it as barley cakes" after having baked it under repulsive conditions (ver 12), as a sign to the people. The false prophetesses (Ezk 13 19) are said to have profaned God among the people for "handfuls of barley and for pieces of bread."

Barley was also used in the ORDEAL OF JEALOUSY (s.v.). It was with five barley loaves and two fishes that Our Lord fed the five thousand (Jn 6 9,10).

(2) Several varieties of barley are grown in Pal. The Hordeum distichum or two-rowed barley is probably the nearest to the original stock, but Hordeum tetrastichum, with grains in four rows, and Hordeum hexastichum, with six rows, are also common and ancient; the last is found depicted upon Egypt monuments.

Barley is always sown in the autumn, after the "early rains," and the barley harvest, which for any given locality precedes the wheat harvest (Ex 9 31 f), begins near Jericho in April—or even March—but in the hill country of Pal is not concluded until the end of May or beginning of June.

The barley harvest was a well-marked season of the year (see TIME) and the barley-corn was a well-known measure of length. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BARN, bārn (מִגְרָרָה, mēghūrāh, "a granary," "fear," Hag 2 19; אָסָם, āṣām, "a storehouse," Prov 3 10; מִמְּגִרָרָה, mammēghūrāh, "a repository," Joel 1 17; ἀποθήκη, apothēkē, Mt 6 26; 13 30; Lk 12 18,24): A place for the storing of grain, usually a dry cistern in the ground, covered over with a thick layer of earth. "Grain is not stored in the East until it is threshed and winnowed. The apothēkē in Rom times was probably a building of some kind. But the immemorial usage of the East has been to conceal the grain, in carefully prepared pits or caves, which, being perfectly dry, will preserve it for years. It thus escaped, as far as possible, the attentions of the tax-gatherer as well as of the robber—not always easily distinguished in the East; cf Jer 41 8" (Temple Dictionary, 215).

BARNABAS, bār'na-bas (Βαρνάβας, Barnābas, "son of exhortation," or possibly "son of Nebo"): This name was applied to the associate of Paul, who was originally called Joses or Joseph (Acts 4 36), as a testimony to his eloquence. Its lit. meaning is "son of prophecy" (bar, "son"; n'bhū'āh, "prophecy"). Cf word for prophet in Gen 20 7; Dt 18 15,18, etc. This is interpreted in Acts 4 36 as "son of exhortation" RV, or "son of consolation" AV, expressing two sides of the Gr paraklēsis, that are not exclusive. The office of a prophet being more than to foretell, all these interpretations are admissible in estimating Barnabas as a preacher. "Deismann (Bibelstudien, 175-78) considers Barnabas the Jewish Grecized form of Barnebus, a personal Sem name recently discovered in Asia Minor inscriptions, and meaning "son of Nebo" (Standard BD in loc.).

He was a Levite from the island of Cyprus, and cousin, not "nephew" (AV), of the evangelist Mark, the word anēpsios (Col 4 10), being used in Nu 36 11, for "father's brothers' sons." When we first learn of him, he had removed to Jerus, and acquired property there. He sold "a field," and contributed its price to the support of the poorer members of the church (Acts 4 36 ff). In Acts 11 24 he is described as "a good man and full of the Holy Spirit" (cf Isa 11 2; 1 Cor 12 8,11) "and of faith," traits that gave him influence and leadership. Possibly on the ground of former acquaintanceship, interceding as Paul's sponsor and surety, he removed the distrust of the disciples at Jerus and secured the admission of the former persecutor into their fellowship. When the preaching of some of the countrymen of Barnabas had begun a movement toward Christianity among the Greeks at Antioch, Barnabas was sent from Jerus to give it encouragement and direction, and, after a personal visit, recognizing its importance and needs, sought out Paul at Tarsus, and brought him back as his associate. At the close of a year's successful work, Barnabas and Paul were sent to Jerus with contributions from the infant church for the famine sufferers in the older congregation (11 30). Ordained as missionaries on their return (13 3), and accompanied by John Mark, they proceeded upon what is ordinarily known as the "First Missionary Journey" of Paul (Acts 13 4,5). Its history belongs to Paul's life. Barnabas as well as Paul is designated "an apostle" (Acts 14 14). Up to Acts 13 43, the precedence is constantly ascribed to Barnabas; from that point, except in 14 14 and 15 12,25, we read "Paul and Barnabas," instead of "Barnabas and Saul." The latter becomes the chief spokesman. The people at Lystra named Paul, because of his fervid oratory, Mercurius, while the quiet dignity and reserved strength of Barnabas gave him the title of Jupiter (Acts 14 12). Barnabas escaped the violence which Paul suffered at Iconium (14 19).

Upon their return from this first missionary tour, they were sent, with other representatives of the church at Antioch, to confer with the apostles and elders of the church at Jerus concerning the obligation of circumcision and the ceremonial law in general under the NT—the synod of Jerus. A separation from Paul seems to begin with a temporary yielding of Barnabas in favor of the inconsistent course of Peter (Gal 2 13). This was followed by a more serious rupture concerning Mark. On the second journey, Paul proceeded alone, while Barnabas and Mark went to Cyprus. Luther and Calvin regard 2 Cor 8 18,19 as meaning Barnabas by “the brother whose praise is spread through all the churches,” and indicating, therefore, subsequent joint work. The incidental allusions in 1 Cor 9 6 and Gal 2 13 (“even Barnabas”) show at any rate Paul’s continued appreciation of his former associate. Like Paul, he accepted no support from those to whom he ministered.

Tertullian, followed in recent years by Grau and Zahn, regard him as the author of the Epistle to the He. The document published among patristic writings as the Epistle of Barnabas, and found in full in the Codex Sinaiticus, is universally assigned today to a later period. “The writer nowhere claims to be the apostle Barnabas; possibly its author was some unknown namesake of ‘the son of consolation’” (Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, 239 f). BARODIS, ba-rō’dīs (Βαρῳδῆς, Barōdeis, 1 Esd 5 34): The descendants of B. (sons of the servants of Solomon) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus. Omitted in Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

BARREL, bar’el: The word “barrel” in AV (see 1 K 17 12,14,16; 18 33: “The barrel of meal,” “fill four barrels with water,” etc) stands for the large earthenware jar (so ARV) used in the East for carrying water from the spring or well, and for storing grain, etc, according to a custom that still persists. It is elsewhere (EV) more fitly rendered “pitcher.” See HOUSE; PITCHER, etc.

BARREN, bar’en, BARRENNESS, bar’en-nes (צָרָה, ṣayāh; מְלֵחָה, m’lēhāh; שָׁחֹל, shākhōl; אֲכָר, ākār; στεῖρος, steiros; ἀργός, argós):

(1) Of land that bears no crop, either (a) because it is naturally poor and sterile: ṣayāh “dry” (Joel 2 20), m’lēhāh, “salt” (Job 39 6 AV), shākhōl, “miscarrying” (2 K 2 19,21), or (b) because it is, under God’s curse, turned into a m’lēhāh or salt desert, for the wickedness of the people that dwell therein (Ps 107 34 AV; cf Gen 3 17,18).

(2) Of females that bear no issue: ākār: Sarah (Gen 11 30); Rebekah (25 21); Rachel (29 31); Manoah’s wife (Jgs 13 2,3); Hannah (1 S 2 5); steiros: Elisabeth (Lk 1 7,36).

In Israel and among oriental peoples generally barrenness was a woman’s and a family’s greatest misfortune. The highest sanctions of religion and patriotism blessed the fruitful woman, because children were necessary for the perpetuation of the tribe and its religion. It is significant that the mothers of the Heb race, Sarah, Rebekah and Rachel, were by nature sterile, and therefore God’s special intervention shows His particular favor to Israel. Fruitfulness was God’s special blessing to His people (Ex 23 26; Dt 7 14; Ps 113 9). A complete family is an emblem of beauty (Cant 4 2; 6 6). Metaphorically, Israel, in her days of adversity, when her children were exiled, was barren, but in her restoration she shall rejoice in many children (Isa 54 1; Gal 4 27). The utter despair and terror of the destruction of Jerus could go no farther than that the barren should be called blessed (Lk 23 29).

(3) Argós is trd in AV “barren,” but in RV more accurately “idle” (2 Pet 1 8). T. REES

BARTACUS, bār’ta-kus (Βάρτακος, Bártakos; Jos Παβεζάκης, Rhabezákēs; Vulg Bezazes [1 Esd 4 29]): The father of Apame. He is called “the illustrious,” probably because of rank and merits. The family seems to be of Pers origin since the name Bartacus (Syr אַרְטַק in the form of Artachaeus is mentioned by Herod. (vii.22.117) as a person of rank in the Pers army of Xerxes and the name of his daughter Apame is identical with that of a Pers princess who married Seleucus I, Nicator, and became the mother of Antiochus I. Apamea, a city in Asia Minor founded by Seleucus I, is named in honor of his wife Apame. Cf APAME; ILLUSTRIOUS.

BARTHOLOMEW, bār-thol’ō-mū (Βαρθολομαῖος, Bartholomaíos, i.e. “son of Tolmai or Talmai”): One of the Twelve Apostles (Mt 10 3; Mk 3 18; Lk 6 14; Acts 1 13). There is no further reference to him in the NT. According to the “Genealogies of the Twelve Apostles” (Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 50) “Bartholomew was of the house of Naphtali. Now his name was formerly John, but Our Lord changed it because of John the son of Zebedee, His beloved.” A “Gospel of Bartholomew” is mentioned by Hieronymus (Comm. Proem ad Matth.), and Gelasius gives the tradition that Bartholomew brought the Heb gospel of St. Matthew to India. In the “Preaching of St. Bartholomew in the Oasis” (cf Budge, II, 90) he is referred to as preaching probably in the oasis of Al Bahnâsâ, and according to the “Preaching of St. Andrew and St. Bartholomew” he labored among the Parthians (Budge, II, 183). The “Martyrdom of St. Bartholomew” states that he was placed in a sack and cast into the sea.

From the 9th cent. onward, Bartholomew has generally been identified with Nathanael, but this view has not been conclusively established. See NATHANAEL. C. M. KERR

BARTIMAEUS, bār-ti-mē’us (Βαρτιμαῖος, Bar-tímaios): A hybrid word from Aram. bar=“son,” and Gr timaios=“honorable.” For the improbability of the derivation from bar-tim’ai=“son of the unclean,” and of the allegorical meaning=the Gentiles or spiritually blind, see Schmiedel in EB. In Mk (10 46–52) Bartimaeus is given as the name of a blind beggar, whose eyes Jesus Christ opened as He went out from Jericho on His last journey to Jerus. An almost identical account is given by Lk (18 35–43), except that the incident occurred “as he drew nigh unto Jericho,” and the name of the blind man is not given. Again, according to Mt (20 29–34), “as they went out from Jericho” (like Mk) two blind men (unlike Mk and Lk) receive their sight. It is not absolutely impossible that two or even three events are recorded, but so close is the similarity of the three accounts that it is highly improbable. Regarding them as referring to the same event, it is easy to understand how the discrepancies arose in the passage of the story from mouth to mouth. The main incident is clear enough, and on purely historical grounds, the miracle cannot be denied. The discrepancies themselves are evidence of the wide currency of the story before our Gospels assumed their present form. It is only a most mechanical theory of inspiration that would demand their harmonization.

BARUCH, bā'ruk, bâr'uk (בְּרֻךְ, bārūk; Βαρούχ, Baroûch, "blessed"):

(1) Son of Neriah and brother of Seraiah, King Zedekiah's chamberlain (Jer 51 59). He was the devoted friend (Jer 32 12), the amanuensis (36 4 ff. 32) and faithful attendant (36 10 ff; Jos, Ant, X, vi, 2) of the prophet Jeremiah. He seems to have been of noble family (see Ant, X, ix, 1; cf Jer 51 59; Bar 1 1). He was also according to Jos a man of unusual acquirements (Ant, X, ix, 1). He might have risen to a high position and seemed conscious of this, but under Jeremiah's influence (see Jer 45 5) he repressed his ambition, being content to throw in his lot with the great prophet whose secretary and companion he became. Jeremiah dictated his prophecies to Baruch, who read them to the people (Jer 36). The king (Jehoiakim) was greatly angered at these prophecies and had Baruch arrested and the roll burnt. Baruch however rewrote the prophet's oracles. In the final siege of Jerus Baruch stood by his master, witnessing the purchase by the latter of his ancestral estate in Anathoth (Jer 32). According to Jos (Ant, X, ix, 1) he continued to reside with Jeremiah at Mizpah after the fall of Jerus. Subsequent to the murder of Gedaliah, he was accused of having unduly influenced Jeremiah when the latter urged the people to remain in Judah—a fact which shows how great was the influence which Baruch was believed to have had over his master (Jer 43 3). He was carried with Jeremiah to Egypt (Jer 43 6; Ant, X, ix, 6), and thereafter our knowledge of him is merely legendary. According to a tradition preserved by Jerome (on Isa 30 6 f) he died in Egypt soon after reaching that country. Two other traditions say that he went, or by Nebuchadnezzar was carried, to Babylon after this king conquered Egypt. The high character of Baruch and the important part he played in the life and work of Jeremiah induced later generations still further to enhance his reputation, and a large number of spurious writings passed under his name, among them the following: (a) The APOCALYPSE OF BARUCH (q.v.); (b) the Book of Baruch; (c) the Rest of the Words of Baruch; (d) the gnostic Book of Baruch; (e) the Lat Book of Baruch, composed originally in Lat; (f) a Gr Apocalypse of Baruch belonging to the 2d cent. of our era; (g) another Book of Baruch belonging to the 4th or 5th cent.

(2) A son of Zabbai who aided Nehemiah in rebuilding the walls of Jerus (Neh 3 20).

(3) One of the priests who signed the covenant with Nehemiah (10 6).

(4) The son of Colhozeh, a descendant of Perez, the son of Judah (Neh 11 5).

BARUCH, APOCALYPSE OF. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

BARUCH, BOOK OF: One of the Apocryphal or Deutero-canonical books, standing between Jer and Lam in the LXX, but in the Vulg after these two books.

I. Name.—See under BARUCH for the meaning of the word and for the history of the best-known Bib. personage bearing the name. Though Jewish traditions link this book with Jeremiah's amanuensis and loyal friend as author, it is quite certain that it was not written or compiled for hundreds of years after the death of this Baruch. According to Jer 45 1 it was in the 4th year (604 BC) of the reign of Jehoiakim (608–597 BC) that Baruch wrote down Jeremiah's words in a book and read them in the ears of the nobles (EV "princes," but king's sons are not necessarily meant; Jer 36). The Book of Baruch belongs in its present form to the latter half of the 1st cent. of our era; yet some modern Roman Catholic scholars vigorously maintain that it is the work of Jeremiah's friend and secretary.

II. Contents.—This book and also the Epistle of Jeremy have closer affinities with the canonical Book of Jer than any other part of the Apoc. It is probably to this fact that they owe their name and also their position in the LXX and in the Vulg. The book is apparently made up of four separate parts by independent writers, brought together by an R, owing it is very likely to a mere accident—each being too small to occupy the space on one roll they were all four written on one and the same roll. The following is a brief analysis of the four portions of the book:

Historical Introduction, giving an account of the origin and purpose of the book (1 1–14). Vs

1 f tell us that Baruch wrote this book at Babylon "in the fifth month [not 'year' as LXX], in the seventh day of the month, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerus, and burnt it with fire" (see 2 K 25 8 ff). Fritzsche and others read: "In the fifth year, in the month Sivan [see ver 8], in the seventh day of the month," etc. Um gives the date of the feast Pentecost, and the supposition is that the party who made a pilgrimage to Jerus did so in order to observe that feast. According to vs 3–14, Baruch read his book to King Jehoiachin and his court by the (unidentified) river Sud. King and people on hearing the book fell to weeping, fasting and praying. As a result money was collected and sent, together with Baruch's book, to the high priest Jehoiakim,¹ to the priests and to the people at Jerus. The money is to be used in order to make it possible to carry on the services of the temple, and in particular that prayers may be offered in the temple for the king and his family and also for the superior lord King Nebuchadnezzar and his son Baltasar (= the Belshazzar of Dnl 5).

Confession and prayer (1 15–3 8) (1) of the Palestinian remnant (1 15–2 15). The speakers are resident in Judah not in Babylon (ver 15; cf 2 4), as J. T. Marshall and R. H. Charles rightly hold. This section follows throughout the arrangement and phraseology of a prayer contained in Dnl 9 7–15. It is quite impossible to think of Dnl as being based on Bar, for the writer of the former is far more original than the author or authors of Bar. But in the present section the original passage in Dnl is altered in a very significant way. Thus in Dnl (9 7) the writer describes those for whom he wrote as 'the men of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerus and all Israel[ites]: those near and those far off, in all the lands [countries] whither thou hast driven them on account of their unfaithfulness toward thee.' The italicized words are omitted from Bar 1 15, though the remaining part of Dnl 9 7 is added. Why this difference? It is evident, as Marshall has ably pointed out, that the R of the section intends to put the confession and prayer of 1 15–2 5 into the mouths of Jews who had not been removed into exile. Ewald (History, V, 208, 6) holds that Dnl 9 7–9 is dependent on Bar 1 15–2 17. The section may thus be analyzed:

(a) 1 15–22: Confession of the sins of the nation from the days of Moses down to the exile. The principle of solidarity (see Century Bible, "Psalms," II, 21, 195, 215) so governed the thoughts of the ancient Israelites that the iniquities of their forefathers were in effect their own.

(b) 2 1-5: God's righteous judgment on the nation in humbling and scattering them.

Confession and prayer (2) of the exiles in Babylon 2 16-3 8. That the words in this section are supposed to be uttered by Bab exiles appears from 2 13 f; 3 7 f and from the general character of the whole. This portion of the book is almost as dependent on older Scriptures as the foregoing. Three sources seem in particular to have been used.

(a) The Book of Jer has been freely drawn upon.

(b) Deuteronomic phrases occur frequently, esp. in the beginning and end. These are perhaps taken second-hand from Jer, a book well known to the author of these verses and deeply loved by him.

(c) Solomon's prayer as recorded in 1 K 8 is another quarry from which our author appears to have dug.

This section may be thus divided:

(a) 2 6-12: Confession, opening as the former (see 1 15) with words extracted from Dnl 9 7.

(b) 2 13-3 8: Prayer for restoration.

3 1-8 shows more independence than the rest, for the author at this point makes use of language not borrowed from any original known to us. As such these verses are important as a clue to the writer's position, views and character.

In 3 4 we have the petition: "Hear now the prayer of the dead Israelites," etc, words which as they stand involve the doctrine that the dead (Solomon, Daniel, etc) are still alive and make intercession to God on behalf of the living. But this teaching is in opposition to 2 17 which occurs in the same context. Without making any change in the Heb consonants we can and should read for "dead [mēthē] Israelites" "the men of [mēthē] Israel." The LXX confuses the same words in Isa 5 13.

The praise of "Wisdom," for neglecting which Israel is now in a strange land. God alone is the author of wisdom, and He bestows it not upon the great and mighty of this world, but upon His own chosen people, Wisdom who however have spurned the Divine gift and therefore lost it (3 9-4 4).

The passage, 3 10-13 (Israel's rejection of "Wisdom" the cause of her exile), goes badly with the context and looks much like an interpolation. The dominant idea in the section is that God has made Israel superior to all other nations by the gift of "wisdom," which is highly extolled. Besides standing apart from the context these four verses lack the rhythm which characterize the other verses. What is so cordially commended is described in three ways, each showing up a different facet, as do the eight synonyms for the Divine word in each of the 22 strophes in Ps 119 (see Century Bible, "Psalms," II, 254).

(1) It is called most frequently "Wisdom."

(2) In 4 1 it is described as the Commandments of God and as the Law or more correctly as authoritative instruction. The Heb word for this last (tōrah) bears in this connection, it is probable, the technical meaning of the Pent, a sense which it never has in the OT. Cf Dt 4 6, where the keeping of the commandments is said to be "wisdom" and understanding.

(1) The line of thought here resembles closely that pursued in Job 28, which modern scholars rightly regard as a later interpolation.

4. The Dependence of This Wisdom Section Wisdom, the most valuable of possessions, is beyond the unaided reach of man. God only can give it—that is what is taught in these parts of both Bar and Job with the question "Where shall wisdom be found?" (Job 28 12; cf Bar 3 14 f, where a similar question forms the basis of the greater portion of the section of Job 38 f). Wisdom is not here as in Prov hypostatized, and the same is true of Job 28. This in itself is a sign of early date, for the personifying of "wisdom" is a later development (cf Philo, John 1).

(2) The language in this section is modeled largely on that of Dt, perhaps however through Jer, which is also esp. after ch 10 Deuteronomic in thought and phraseology. See ante II, 2 (2 1b).

The most original part of this division of the book is where the writer enumerates the various classes of the world's great ones to whom God had not given "wisdom": princes of the heathen, wealthy men, silversmiths, merchants, theologians, philosophers, etc (3 16 ff). See Wisdom.

The general thought that pervades the section, 4 5-5 9, is words of cheer to Israel (i.e. Judah) in exile, but we have here really, according to Rothstein, a compilation edited so skilfully as to give it the appearance of a unity which is not real.

Earlier Bib. writings have throughout been largely drawn upon. Rothstein (Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen, etc, 213-15) divides the section in the following manner:

(1) 4 5-9a: Introductory section, giving the whole its keynote—"Be of good cheer," etc; 4 7 f follows Dt 32 15-18.

(2) 4 9b-29: A song, divisible into two parts.

(a) Personified Jerus deplores the calamities of Israel in exile (vs 9b-16).

(b) She urges her unfortunate children to give themselves to hope and prayer, amending their ways so that God may bring about their deliverance (vs 17-29).

(c) 4 30-5 9: A second song, beginning as the first with the words, "Be of good cheer," and having the same general aim, to comfort exiled and oppressed Israel.

In all three parts earlier Scriptures have been largely used, and in particular Deutero-Isaiah has had much influence upon the author. But there do not seem to the present writer reasons cogent enough for concluding, with Rothstein, that these three portions are by as many different writers. There is throughout the same recurring thought "Be of good cheer," and there is nothing in the style to suggest divergent authorship.

(3) The relation between 4 36-5 9 and Ps Sol 11. It was perhaps Ewald (Geschichte, IV, 498) who first pointed out the similarity of language and viewpoint between Bar 4 36-5 9 and Ps Sol 11, esp. 11 3-8. The only possible explanation is that which makes Bar 4 36 ff an imitation of Ps Sol 11. So Ewald (op. cit.); Ryle and James (Ps Sol, lxx, ii ff).

Ps Sol were written originally in Heb, and references to Pompey (d. 48 BC) and to the capture of Jerus (63 BC) show that this pseudopigraphical Psalter must have been written in the first half of the 1st cent. BC. Bar, as will be shown, is of much later date than this. Besides it is now almost certain that the part of Bar under discussion was written in Gr (see below, IV) and that it never had a Heb original. Now it is exceedingly unlikely that a writer of a Heb psalm would copy a Gr original, though the contrary supposition is a very likely one.

On the other hand A. Geiger (Psalt. Sol., XI, 137-39, 1811), followed by W. B. Stevenson (Temple Bible), and many others argue for the priority of Bar, using this as a reason for giving Bar an earlier date than is usually done. It is possible, of course, that the Pseudo-Solomon and the Pseudo-Baruch have been digging in the same quarry; and that the real original used by both is lost.

III. Language.—For our present purpose the book must be divided into two principal parts: (1) 1–3 8; (2) 3 9–5 9. There is general agreement among the best recent scholars from Ewald downward that the first portion of the book at least was written originally in Heb. (1) In the Syro-Hex. text there are margin notes to 1 17 and 2 3 to the effect that these verses are lacking in the Heb, i.e. in the original Heb text.

(2) There are many linguistic features in this first part which are best explained on the supposition that the Gr text is from a Heb original. In 2 25 the LXX EV apostolē at the end of the verse means "a sending of." The EV ("pestilence") renders a Heb word which, without the vowel signs (introduced late) is written alike for both meanings (db̄r). The mistake can be explained only on the assumption of a Heb original. Similarly the reading "dead Israelites" for "men of Israel" (=Israelites) in 3 4 arose through reading wrong vowels with the same consonants, which last were alone written until the 7th and 8th cents. of our era.

Frequently, as in Heb, sentences begin with Gr kaí ("and") which, without somewhat slavish copying of the Heb, would not be found. The construction called parataxis characterizes Heb; in good Gr we meet with hypotaxis.

The Heb way of expressing "where" is put lit. into the Gr of this book (2 4.13.29; 3 8). Many other Heb idioms, due, it is probable, to the translator's imitations of his original, occur: in "to speak in the ears of" (1 3); the word "man" (anthrōpos) in the sense "everyone" (2 3); "spoken by thy servants the prophets" is in Gr by "the hand of the servants," which is good Heb but bad Gr. Many other such examples could be added.

There is much less agreement among scholars as to the original language or languages of the second part of the book (3 9–5 9). That this part too was written in Heb, so that in that case the whole book appeared first in that language, is the position held and defended by Ewald (op. cit.), Kneucker (op. cit.), König (Ein), Rothstein (op. cit.) and Bissell (Lange). It is said by these writers that this second part of Bar equally with the first carries with it marks of being a tr from the Heb. But one may safely deny this statement. It must be admitted by anyone who has examined the text of the book that the most striking Hebraisms and the largest number of them occur in the first part of the book. Bissell writes quite fully and warmly in defense of the view that the whole book was at first written in Heb, but the Hebraisms which he cites are all with one solitary exception taken from the first part of the book. This one exception is in 4 15 where the Gr conjunction hōti is used for the relative hō, the Heb 'āsher having the meaning of both. There seems to be a Hebraism in 4 21: "He shall deliver thee from . . . the hand of your enemies," and there are probably others. But there are Hebraisms in Hellenistic Gr always—the present writer designates them "Hebraisms" or "Semiticisms" notwithstanding what Deismann, Thumb and Moulton say. In the first part of this book it is their overwhelming number and their striking character that tell so powerfully in favor of a Heb original.

(3) The following writers maintain that the second part of the book was written first of all in Gr: Fritzsche, Hilgenfeld, Reuss, Schürer, Gifford, Cornill and R. H. Charles, though they agree that the first part had a Heb original. This is probably the likeliest view, though much may be written in favor of a Heb original for the whole book and there is nothing quite decisively against it. J. Turner Marshall (HDB, I, 253) tries to prove that 3 9–4 4 was written first in Aram., the rest of the book (4 5–5 9) in Gr. But though he defends his case with great ability he does not appear to the present writer to have proved his thesis. Ewald (op. cit.), Hitzig (*Psalmen*², II, 119), Dillmann, Ruetschi, Fritzsche and Bissell were so greatly impressed by the close likeness between the Gr of Bar and that of the LXX of Jer, that they came to the conclusion that both books were tr^d by the same person. Subsequently Hitzig decided that Bar was not written until after 70 AD, and therefore abandoned his earlier opinion in favor of this one—that the translator of Bar was well acquainted with the LXX of Jer and was strongly influenced by it.

IV. Date or Dates.—It is important to distinguish between the date of the completion of the entire book in its present form and the dates of the several parts which in some or all cases may be much older than that of the whole as such.

1 1–14 was written after the completion of the book expressly to form a prologue or historical explanation of the circumstances under which the rest of the book came to be written. To superficial readers it could easily appear that the whole book was written by one man, but a careful examination shows that the book is a compilation. One may conclude that the introduction was the last part of the book to be composed and that therefore its date is that of the completion of the book. Reasons will be given (see below) for believing that 4 5–5 9 belongs to a time subsequent to the destruction of Jerus and its temple in 70 AD. This is still more true of this introduction intended as a foreword to the whole book.

The following points bear on the date of the section 1 15–3 8, assuming it to have one date:

(1) The generation of Israelites to which the writer belonged were suffering for the sins of their ancestors; see esp. 3 1–8.

(2) The second temple was in existence in the writer's day. 2 26 must (with the best scholars) be tr^d as follows: "And thou hast made the house over which thy name is called as it is this day," i.e. the temple—still in being—is shorn of its former glory. Moreover though Dnl 9 7–14 is largely quoted in 1 15–2 12, the prayer for the sanctuary and for Jerus in Dnl 9 16 is omitted, because the temple is not now in ruins.

(3) Though it is implied (see above II, 2, [1]) that there are Jews in Judah who have never left their land there are a large number in foreign lands, and nothing is said that they were servants of the Bab king.

(4) The dependence of 2 13–3 8 on Dt, Jer and 1 K 8 (Solomon's prayer) shows that this part of the book is later than these writings, i.e. later than say 550 BC. Cf 2 13 with Dt 28 62 and Jer 42 2.

(5) The fact that Dnl 9 7–14 has influenced Bar 1 15–2 12 proves that a date later than Dnl must be assumed for at least this portion of Bar. The temple is still standing, so that the book belongs somewhere between 165 BC, when Dnl was written, and 71 AD, when the temple was finally destroyed.

Ewald, Gifford and Marshall think that this section belongs to the period following the conquest of Jerus by Ptolemy I (320 BC). According to Ewald the author of 1 1–3 8 (regarded as by one hand) was a Jew living in Babylon or Persia. But Dnl had not in 320 BC been written. Fritzsche, Schrader, Keil, Toy and Charles assign the section to the Maccabean age—a quite likely date. On the other hand Hitzig, Kneucker and Schürer prefer a date subsequent to 70 AD. The last writer argues for the unity of this section, though he admits that the middle of ch 1 comports ill with its context.

It has been pointed out (see above, II, 3) that 3 10-13 does not belong to this section, being manifestly a later interpolation. The dependence of this Wisdom portion on Job 28 and on Dt implies a post-exilic date. The identification of Wisdom with the 3:9-4:4 Torah which is evidently a synonym for the Pent., argues a date at any rate not earlier than 300 BC. But how much later we have no means of ascertaining. The reasons adduced by Kneucker and Marshall for a date immediately before or soon after the fall of Jerus in 70 AD have not convinced the present writer.

The situation implied in these words may be thus set forth:

(1) A great calamity has happened to Jerus (4 9f). Nothing is said of Cheer proving that the whole land has shared the calamity, unless indeed this is implied in 4 5f.

(2) A large number of Jerusalemites have been transported (4 10).

(3) The nation that has sacked Jerus and carried away many of its inhabitants is "shameless," having "a strange language, neither reverencing old men nor pitying children" (4 15).

(4) The present home of the Jerusalemites is a great city (4 32-35), not the country.

Now the above details do not answer to any dates in the history of the nation except these two: (a) 586 BC, when the temple was destroyed by the Babylonians; (b) 71 AD, when the temple was finally destroyed by the Romans. But the date 586 BC is out of the question, and no modern scholar pleads for it. We must therefore assume for this portion of the book a date soon after 70 AD. In the time of Pompey, to which Graetz assigns the book, neither Jerus nor the temple was destroyed. Nor was there any destruction of either during the Maccabean war. In favor of this date is the dependence of 4 36 ff on Ps Sol 11 (see above, II, 5, [3]).

Rothstein (in Kautzsch) says that in this section there are at least three parts by as many different writers. Marshall argues for four independent parts. But if either of these views is correct the R has done his work exceedingly well, for the whole harmonizes well together.

Kneucker, author of the fullest Commentary, endeavors to prove that the original book consisted of 1 1f+3a (the heading) +3 9-5 9, and that it belongs to the reign of Domitian (81-96 AD). The confession and prayer in 1 15-3 8 were written, he says, somewhat earlier and certainly before 71 AD, and as a separate work, being inserted in the book by the scribe who wrote 1 4-14.

V. Versions.—The most important VSS are the following. It is assumed in the article that the Gr text of the book up to 3 8 is itself a tr from a Heb text now lost. The same remark may be true of the rest of the book or of a portion of it (see above, III).

There are two versions in this language: (1) The Vulg which is really the Old Lat, since Jerome's revision was confined to the Heb Scriptures, the Apoc being therefore omitted in this revision. This version is a very lit. one based on the Gr. It is therefore for that reason the more valuable as a witness to the Gr text. (2) There is a later Lat tr, apparently a revision of the former, for its Latinity is better; in some cases it adopts different readings and in a general way it has been edited so as to bring it into harmony with the Vatican uncial (B). This Lat version was published in Rome by J. Maria Caro (d. cir 1688) and was reprinted by Sabatier in parallel columns with the pre-Jeromian version noticed above (see Bibliotheca Casinensis, I, 1873).

There are also in this language two extant versions: (1) The Pesh, a very lit. tr, can be seen in the London (Walton's) Polyglot and (2) Syriac most conveniently in Lagarde's Libr. Apoc. Syr., the last being a more accurate reproduction. (2) The Hexap. Syr tr made by Paul, bishop of Telle, near the beginning of the 7th cent. AD. It has been published by Ceriani with critical apparatus in his beautiful photograph-lithographed edition of the Hexap. Syr Bible.

There is a very literal tr to be found in the London Polyglot, referred to above.

LITERATURE.—For editions of the Gr text see under APOCRYPHA. Of commentaries the fullest and best is that by Kneucker, Das Buch Baruch (1879), who gives an original German rendering based on a restored Heb original. Other valuable commentaries are those by Fritzsche (1851); Ewald, Die Propheten, etc (1868), III, 251-82 (Eng. tr); The Prophets of the OT, V, 108-37, by Reusch (1855); Zöckler (1891) and Rothstein (op. cit.); and in Eng., Bissell (in Lange's series edited by D. S. Schaff, 1880); and Gifford (Speaker's Comm., 1888). The S.P.C.K. has a handy and serviceable volume published in the series of popular commentaries on the OT. But this commentary, though published quite recently (my copy belongs to 1894, "nineteenth thousand"), needs strengthening on the side of its scholarship.

Arts. dealing with introduction occur in the various Bible Dictionaries (DB, Westcott and Ryle; HDB, J. T. Marshall, able and original; EB, Bevan, rather slight). To these must be added excellent arts. in Jew Enc (G. F. Moore), and EB (R. H. Charles).

BARZILLAI, bār-zil'ā-i, bār-zil'ī (בַּרְזַיִל, bārzilay; Βερζιλῆ, Berzellē, "man of iron" [BDB, but cf Cheyne, EB]):

(1) A Gileadite of Rogelim who brought provisions to David and his army to Mahanaim, in their flight from Absalom (2 S 17 27-29). When David was returning to Jerus after Absalom's defeat, B. conducted him over Jordan, but being an old man of 80 years of age, he declined David's invitation to come to live in the capital, and sent instead his son Chimham (2 S 19 31-39). David before his death charged Solomon to "show kindness unto the sons of B." (1 K 2 7). Cheyne in EB, without giving any reason, differentiates this B. from B. the Gileadite (Ezr 2 61=Neh 7 63). See (2) below.

(2) The father of a family of priests who in Ezra's time, after the return of the exiles, could not trace their genealogy. "Therefore were they deemed polluted and put from the priesthood." This B. had taken "a wife of the daughters of B. the Gileadite," and had adopted his wife's family name (Ezr 2 61, 62=Neh 7 63, 64). His original name is given as Jaddus (AV Addus) (1 Esd 5 38). (See ZORZELLEUS; RVm "Phaezeldaeus.")

(3) B. the Meholathite, whose son Adriel was married to Saul's daughter, either Michal (2 S 21 8) or Merab (1 S 18 19).

BASALOTH, bas'a-loth (A, Βααλόθ, Baalōth; B, Βασαλέμ, Basalēm; 1 Esd 5 31=Bazluth [Ezr 2 52] and Bazlith [Neh 7 54]): The descendants of B. (temple-servants) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus.

BASCAMA, bas'ka-ma (Βασκαμά, Baskamá [1 Macc 13 23]): A town located in the country of Gilead, where Tryphon slew Jonathan, the son of Absalom. Cf JONATHAN (Apoc).

BASE, bās:

(1) Subst. from Lat basis, Gr βάσις, básis, a foundation. (a) מְכֹנָה (mēkhōnāh): the fixed resting-place on which the lavers in Solomon's temple were set (1 K 7 27-43; 2 K 16 17; 25 13, 16; 2 Ch 4 14; Jer 27 19; 52 17, 20; cf Ezr 3 3; Zec 5 11 ARVm). (b) (בֵּן, kēn): pedestal in AV and RV (1 K 7 29, 31) and in RV only (Ex 30 18, 28; 31 9; 35 16; 38 8; 39 39; 40 11; Lev 8 11) of the base of the laver of the tabernacle (AV "foot"). (c) (יָרֵךְ, yārēkh): "base of candlestick" (RV of Ex 25 31; 37 17) AV "shaft." (d) (יֶסֶד, yēśōdh): RV "base of altar"; AV "bottom" (Ex 29 12; 38 8; Lev 4 7.18.25.30.34; 5 9; 8 15; 9 9). (e) (גֹּבַהּ, gabh): RV "elevation," i.e. basement of altar; AV "higher place" (Ezk 43 13).

(2) Adj. from Fr. bas—low, or Welsh bās—"shallow": of lowly birth or station, of voluntary humility and of moral depravity. (a) (שָׁפָל, shāphāl, שִׁפְלָה, shēphal): of David's self-humiliation (2 S 6 22): "a modest unambitious kingdom" (Ezk 17 14; 29 14.15 [BDB]; Dnl 4 17 [ARV "lowest"]); cf shēphēlāh—"lowland." (b) (קָלָה, kālāh): men of humble birth and station as opposed to the nobles (Isa 3 5). (c) (בְּלִי-שֵׁם, bēlī-shēm): "nameless," "of no account": "children of fools, yea, children of base men" (Job 30 8). (d) AV men, sons, daughters, children of Belial; lit. "worthless persons"; in ARV "base," except 1 S 1 16 "wicked woman"; also ERV of Dt 13 13, "base," which elsewhere retains AV rendering. (e) (ταπεινός, tapeinós): "lowly," "humble or abject" (2 Cor 10 1); RV, "lowly"; so Paul's enemies said he appeared when present in the church at Corinth. (f) (ἀγενής, agenēs): "of low birth," "of no account" (1 Cor 1 28): "base things of the world." (g) (ἀγοραῖος, agoraíos): "belonging to the market-place," loafers, worthless characters (Acts 17 5): "certain lewd fellows of the baser sort"; RV "certain vile fellows of the rabble."

BASEMATH, bas'ē-math, BASHEMATH, bash'-ē-math, BASMATH, bas'math (בַּשְׁמַת, bās'math, "fragrant"):

(1) Basemath, one of the wives of Esau, a daughter of Elon, the Hittite (Gen 26 34; AV Bashemath), probably identical with or a sister of Adah whom he also married (Gen 36 2). Cf ADĀH.

(2) Basemath (AV Bashemath), another wife of Esau, a daughter of Ishmael and a sister of Nebaioth (Gen 36 3.4.10.13.17). This wife is also called Mahalath (Gen 28 9), and is of the house of Abraham. Esau married her because his father was not pleased with his other wives who were daughters of Canaan. Cf MAHALĀTH.

(2) Basemath (AV Basmath), the daughter of Solomon, and wife of Ahimaaz, a commissariat-officer in the service of Solomon (1 K 4 15).

BASHAN, bā'shan (בְּשָׁן, ba-bāshān, "the Bashan"; בַּשָּׁאן, Basān): This name is probably the same in meaning as the cognate

1. Bound-aries Arab. bathneh, "soft, fertile land," or bathaniyeh (batanaea), "this land sown with wheat" ("wheatland").

It often occurs with the art., "the Bashan," to describe the kingdom of Og, the most northerly part of the land E. of the Jordan. It stretched from the border of Gilead in the S. to the slopes of Hermon in the N. Hermon itself is never definitely included in Bashan, although Og is said to have ruled in that mountain (Josh 12 5; 13 11). In Dt 3 10 Salecah and Edrei seem to indicate the E. and W. limits respectively. This would agree with Josh 12 5; 13 11, which seem to make Geshur and Maacath the western boundary of Bashan. If this were so, then these unconquered peoples literally "dwelt in the midst of Israel." On the other hand Dt 4 47 may mean that the Jordan formed the western boundary; while Dt 33 22 makes Bashan extend to the springs of the Jordan. If Golan lay in the district in which its name is still preserved (el Jaulān), this also brings it to the lip of the Jordan valley (Dt 4 43). "A mountain of summits," or "protuberances" (Ps 68 15.16: Heb), might describe the highlands of the Jaulan, with its many volcanic hills as seen from the W. "A mountain of God" however does not so well apply to this region. Perhaps we should, with Wetzstein (Das batanäische Giebelgebirge) take these phrases as descriptive of Jebel Haurān, now usually called Jebel ed-Druze, with its many striking summits. This range protected the province from encroachment by the sands of the wilderness from the E. On the S. Bashan marched with the desert steppe, el-Hamād, and Gilead. Of the western boundary as we have seen there can be no certainty. It is equally impossible to draw any definite line in the N.

Bashan thus included the fertile, wooded slopes of Jebel ed-Druze, the extraordinarily rich plain of el-Haurān (en-Nukrah—see HAURAN),

2. Charac-teristics the rocky tract of el-Lejā, the region now known as el-Jedūr, resembling the Haurān in character, but less cultivated; and, perhaps, the breezy uplands of el-Jaulān, with its splendid reaches of pasture land.

It was a land rich in great cities, as existing ruins sufficiently testify. It can hardly be doubted that many of these occupy sites of great antiquity. We may specially note Ashtaroth and Edrei, the cities of Og; Golan, the city of refuge, the site of which is still in doubt; and Salecah (Šalkhad), the fortress on the ridge of the mountain, marking the extreme eastern limit of Israel's possessions.

The famous oaks of Bashan (Isa 2 13; Ezk 27 6) have their modern representatives on the mountain slopes. It seems strange that in Scripture there is no notice of the wheat crops for which the country is in such repute today. Along with Carmel it stood for the fruitfulness of the land (Isa 33 9 etc); and their languishing was an evident mark of God's displeasure (Nah 1 4). The "bulls of Bashan" represent blatant and brutal strength (Ps 22 12, etc). It is long since the lion deserted the plateau (Dt 33 22); but the leopard is still not unknown among the mountains (Cant 4 8).

In pre-Israelite days Bashan was ruled by Og the Amorite. His defeat at Edrei marked the end of his kingdom (Nu 21 33 ff; Josh

3. History 13 11), and the land was given to the half tribe of Manasseh (Josh 13 30, etc). In the Syrian wars Bashan was lost to Israel (1 K 22 3 ff; 2 K 8 28; 10 32 f), but it was regained by Jeroboam II (2 K 14 25). It was incorporated in the Assy empire by Tiglath-pileser III (2 K 15 29). In the 2d cent. BC it was in the hands of the Nabataeans. It formed part of the kingdom of Herod the Great, and then belonged to that of Philip and Agrippa II. W. EWING

BASILISK, baz'i-lisk (בָּזִילִיִּשׁ, cephā', בָּזִילִיִּשׁ, cephā', "to hiss": Isa 11 8; 14 29; 59 5; Jer 8 17; Prov 23 32m. In Prov 23 32, AV has "adder," m "cockatrice"; in the other passages cited AV has "cockatrice," m "adder" [except Jer 8 17, no m]). The word is from βασιλῆσκος, basiliskos, "kinglet," from basileus, "king," and signifies a mythical reptile hatched by a serpent from a cock's egg. Its hissing drove away other serpents. Its look, and esp. its breath, was fatal. According to Pliny, it was named from a crown-like spot on its head. It has been identified with the equally mythical COCKATRICE (q.v.). In all the passages cited, it denotes a venomous serpent (see ADDER; SERPENTS), but it is impossible to tell what, if any, particular species is referred to. It must be borne in mind that while there are poisonous snakes in Pal, there are more which are not poisonous, and most of the latter, as well as some harmless lizards, are commonly regarded as deadly. Several of the harmless snakes have crown-like markings on their heads, and it is quite conceivable that the basilisk myth may have been founded upon one of these. ALFRED ELY DAY

BASIN, bā's'n, BASON: The ARV has "basin," the AV and RV "bason," the preferred spelling of the Eng. revisers. In the Appendix to the Revised OT the American Terms Used Revisers (§ viii) say, "The modern and Their spelling is preferred for the following Meaning words"; then follow among others "basin," for "bason"; but no similar statement appears in the Appendix to the Revised NT. The Heb word so rendered in EV is chiefly used for the large bowl of bronze (AV "brass") employed by the priests to receive the blood of the sacrificial victims (Ex 27 3; cf 29 16; 1 K 7 45, etc.). It is found only once in secular use (Am 6 6, "drink wine in bowls"), if the text there is correct; the LXX has it otherwise. See BOWL. The "basins" of Ex 12 22; 2 S 17 28 were probably of earthenware.

Washing before Eating.

While the priests' bowls were of bronze, similar bowls or basins of silver were presented by the princes of the congregation, according

2. Of Various Materials and Forms to Nu 7 13 ff; and those spoken of in 1 K 7 50 as destined for Solomon's temple were of gold (cf 1 Ch 28 17).

(1) The well-known eastern mode of washing the hands was and is by pouring water on the hands, not by dipping them in water, an act, of course, calling for the aid of an attendant. Elisha "poured water on the hands of Elijah" (2 K 3 11; see Kitto's note in *Pictorial Bible*², II, 330). A disciple came to be known as "one who poured water on the hands of another." Such was beyond question the prevailing custom among the ancient Hebrews, as it was, and is, among eastern peoples in general. They incline to look with disgust, if not with horror, upon our western practice of washing face and hands in water retained in a basin.

(2) The typical vessel of the East used in such ablutions has a long spout, not unlike our large coffee-pot (see Kitto, Pict. Bib., II, 331, note). While the EV unfortunately often suggests nothing like such pouring, the Heb expresses it, e.g. in 1 S 25 41, where we have the Qal of rāḥaṣ (רָחַץ); cf Kennedy in 1-vol HDB, and HDB, arts. "Bath," "Bathing." Kennedy shows that "affusion," "pouring on" of water, was meant in many cases where we read "bathe" or "wash" in EV. Lane (Mod. Egypt, ch v) says: "A servant brings him a basin and ewer (called ṭisht and ibreek) of tinned copper or brass. The first has a cover with holes, with a raised receptacle for the soap; and the water is poured upon the hands and passes through the ewer into the space below; so that when the basin is brought to a second person the water with which the former has washed is not seen."

(1) A wash-basin of a special sort was used by Jesus for washing the disciples' feet (see Jn 13 5).

The Gr is niptēr (νίπτειν), eita ballei 4. A Basin hūdōr eis tōn niptēra, tr^d RV, "then of a Unique he poureth water into the basin." Sort This word niptēr is not found elsewhere in the NT, nor in the LXX, nor, indeed, in Gk profane lit. But fortunately the general sense is here made plain by the context and by comparison of the cognate verbs niptein and nizein. It evidently denotes an article, not necessarily a vessel, specifically suited to the use of washing a part of the body, e.g. the hands or the feet, and hence is used with the art., "the basin," RV. It is doubtful, therefore, if "basin," or "bason," conveys a true idea of either the oriental article here meant or the scene portrayed. The fact that, according to the custom of the day, the position of the disciples here was reclining, precludes the possibility of the use of a "basin" of our sort, in the way we are accustomed to, i.e. for immersing the feet in the water, in whole or in part.

(2) So it is likely that the niptēr was a jug, or ewer, with a dish, saucer, or basin placed under it and combined with it to catch the dripping water. We know from other sources that such a vessel was kept in the Jewish house regularly for ordinary handwashings, etc (see Mt 15 2; Mk 7 3), and for ceremonial ablutions. Hence it would naturally be ready here in the upper room as a normal part of the preparation of the "goodman of the house" for his guests (AV Mk 14 14; Lk 22 12), and so it is distinguished by the Gr art. tōn. Jesus Himself used the niptēr, standing, doubtless, to impress upon His disciples the lessons of humility, self-abasement and loving service which He ever sought to impart and illustrate.

(3) Our conclusion, we may say with George Farmer in DCG, art. "Bason," is that niptēr was not simply one large basin, but the set of ewer and basin combined, such a set as was commonly kept in the Jewish house for the purpose of cleansing either the hands or the feet by means of affusion. The Arab. ṭisht, authorities tell us, is the exact rendering of niptēr, and it comes from a root which means "to pour," or "rain slightly." (See Anton Tien, reviser of the Arab. prayer-book, author of Arab. and Mod. Gr Grammars, etc, quoted in DCG, art. "Bason.")

BASKET, bas'ket: Four kinds of "baskets" come to view in the OT under the Heb names, dūdh, tene', ṣal and k'lūbh. There is little, however, in these names, or in the narratives where they are found, to indicate definitely what the differences of size and shape and use were. The Mish renders us some help in our uncertainty, giving numerous names and descriptions of "baskets" in use among the ancient Hebrews (see Kreugel, Das Hausgerät in der Mishnah, 39-45). They were variously made of willow, rush, palm-leaf, etc, and were used for various purposes, domestic and agricultural, for instance, in gathering and serving fruit, collecting alms in kind for the poor, etc. Some had handles, others lids, some both, others neither.

(1) Dūd was probably a generic term for various kinds of baskets. It was probably the "basket" in which the Israelites in Egypt carried

1. Meaning the clay for bricks (cf Ps 81 6, where of OT it is used as a symbol of Egypt bondage), and such as the Egyptians themselves used for that purpose (Wilk., Anc. Egypt, 1, 379), probably a large, shallow basket, made of wicker-work. It stood for a basket that was used in fruit-gathering (see Jer 24 1), but how it differed from Amos' "basket of summer fruit" (Am 8 1) we do not know. Dūd is used for the "pot" in which meat was boiled (1 S 2 14), showing probably that a pot-shaped "basket" was known by this name. Then it seems to have stood for a basket tapering toward the bottom like the calathus of the Romans. So we seem forced to conclude that the term was generic, not specific.

(2) The commonest basket in use in OT times was the šāl. It was the "basket" in which the court-baker of Egypt carried about his confectionery on his head (Gen 40 16). It was made in later times at least of peeled willows, or palm-leaves, and was sometimes at least large and flat like the canistrum of the Romans, and, like it, was used for carrying bread and other articles of food (Gen 40 16; Jgs 6 19). Meat for the meat offerings and the unleavened bread, were placed in it (Ex 29 3; Lev 8 2; Nu 6 15). It is expressly required that the unleavened cakes be placed and offered in such a "basket." While a "basket," it was dish-shaped, larger or smaller in size, it would seem, according to demand, and perhaps of finer texture than the dūd.

(3) The tēne' was a large, deep basket, in which grain and other products of garden or field were carried home and kept (Dt 28 5, 17), in which the first-fruits were preserved (Dt 26 2), and the tithes transported to the sanctuary (Dt 26 2 f). It has been thought probable that the habya, the basket of clay and straw of the Pal peasantry of today, is a sort of survival or counterpart of it. It has the general shape of a jar, and is used for storing and keeping wheat, barley, oats, etc. At the top is the mouth into which the grain is poured, and at the bottom is an orifice through which it can be taken out as needed, when the opening is again closed with a rag. The LXX translates tēne' by kártallos, which denotes a basket of the shape of an inverted cone.

(4) The term k'lubh, found in Am 8 1 for a "fruit-basket," is used in Jer 5 27 (AV and RV "cage") for a bird-cage. But it is not at all unreasonable to suppose that a coarsely woven basket with a cover would be used by a fowler to carry home his feathered captives.

In the NT interest centers in two kinds of "basket," distinguished by the evangelists in their accounts of the feeding of the 5,000

2. Meaning and of the 4,000, called in Gr kóphinos of NT and spuris (WH sphuris).

Terms (1) The kóphinos (Mt 14 20; Mk 6 43; Lk 9 17; Jn 6 13) may be confidently identified with the kūphā' of the Mish, which was provided with a cord for a handle by means of which it could be carried on the back with such provisions as the disciples on the occasions under consideration would naturally have with them (cf Kreugel, and Broadus, Comm. in loc.). The Jews of Juvenal's day carried such a specific "provision-basket" with them on their journeys regularly, and the Lat for it is a transliteration of this Gr word, cophinus (cf Juvenal iii.14, and Jastrow, Dict., art. "Basket"). Some idea of its size may be drawn from the fact that in CIG, 1625, 46, the word denotes a Boeotian measure of about two gallons.

(2) The sphuris or spuris (Mt 15 37; Mk 8 8) we may be sure, from its being used in letting Paul down from the wall at Damascus (Acts 9 25, etc), was considerably larger than the kóphinos and quite different in shape and uses. It might for distinction fitly be rendered "hamper," as Professor Kennedy suggests. Certainly neither the Gr nor ancient usage justifies any confusion.

(3) The sargānē (2 Cor 11 33) means anything plaited, or sometimes more specifically a fish-basket.

BASMATH, bas'math. See BASEMATH.

BASON, bā's'n. See BASIN.

BASSA, bas'a. See BASSAI.

BASSAI, bas'ā-i, bas'i (Bassai, Bassat, Bassā; AV Bassa; 1 Esd 5 16; Bezai [Ezr 2 17; Neh 7 23]): The sons of B. returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus.

BASTAI, bas'tā-i. See BASTHAI.

BASTARD, bas'tard (בַּסְטָרְד, mamzēr; νόθος, nóthos): In Dt 23 2 probably the offspring of an incestuous union, or of a marriage within the prohibited degrees of affinity (Lev 18 6-20; 20 10-21). He and his descendants to the tenth generation are excluded from the assembly of the Lord. (See Driver, ad loc.). Zechariah (9 6), after prophesying the overthrow of three Philistines, declares of the fourth: "And a bastard [RVm "a bastard race"] shall dwell in Ashdod," meaning probably that a "mixed population" (BDB) of aliens shall invade and settle in the capital of the Philis. In He (12 8) in its proper sense of "born out of wedlock," and therefore not admitted to the privileges of paternal care and responsibility as a legitimate son.

T. REES

BASTHAI, bas'thā-i, bas'thī (Basṯai, Basthai; AV Bastai; 1 Esd 5 31=Besai [Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 52]): The descendants of B. (temple-servants) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus.

BAT (בַּת, bat; Lev 11 19; Dt 14 18; Isa 2 20): Bats are the most widely distributed of mammals, reaching even the oceanic islands, and modern science has revealed the existence of an astonishing number of species, nearly twenty being recorded from Pal. These include both fruit-eating and insect-eating bats, the latter being the smaller.

Bats' Ears.

It has not always been realized that they are mammals, and so it is not surprising that they should be mentioned at the end of the list of unclean birds in Lev 11 19 and Dt 14 18. It may, however, be significant that they are at the end of the list and not in the middle of it. The fruit bats are a pest to horticulturists and often strip apricot and other trees before the fruit has ripened enough to be picked. On this account the fruit is often inclosed in bags, or the whole tree may be surrounded with a great sheet or net. They commonly pick the fruit and eat it on some distant perch beneath which the seeds and the ordure of these animals are scattered. The insect bats, as in other countries, flit about at dusk and through the night catching mosquitoes and larger insects, and so are distinctly beneficial.

The reference in Isa 2 20, "cast . . . idols . . . to the moles and to the bats" refers of course to these animals as inhabitants of dark and deserted places. As in the case of many animal names the etymology of bat is doubtful. Various derivations have been proposed but none can be regarded as satisfactory. The Arab. name, waṭwāt, throws no light on the question. ALFRED ELY DAY

BATANAEA, bat-a-nē'a: The name used in Gr times for BASHAN (q.v.), Jos, Life, II; Ant, XV, x, 1; XVII, ii, 1, "toparchy of Batanaea."

BATH (בַּת, bat): A liquid measure equal to about 9 gallons, Eng. measure. It seems to have been regarded as a standard for liquid measures (Ezk 45 10), as in the case of the molten sea and the lavers in Solomon's temple (1 K 7 26.38), and for measuring oil and wine (2 Ch 2 10; Ezr 7 22; Isa 5 10; Ezk 45 14). Its relation to the homer is given in Ezk 45 11.14). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BATH, bath, BATHING, bath'ing: Bathing in the ordinary, non-religious sense, public or private, is rarely met with in the Scriptures.

1. Ordinary We find, however, three exceptional Bathing and interesting cases: (1) that of Pharaoh's daughter, resorting to the Nile (Ex 2 5); (2) that of Bath-sheba, bathing on the house-top (2 S 11 2 RV); (3) the curious case mentioned in 1 K 22 38. (To wash with royal blood was supposed to be beneficial to the complexion.)

The dusty, limestone soil of Pal and the open foot-gear of the Orient on stockingless feet, called for frequent washing of the feet (Gen 24 32; 43 24; Jgs 19 24; 1 S 25 41; 2 S 11 8; Cant 5 3, etc), and bathing of the body for refreshment; but the chief concern of the writers of Scripture was with bathing of another sort. Indeed, something of the religious sense and aspect of bathing, in addition to that of bodily refreshment, seems to have entered into the ordinary use of water, as in the washing of the hands before meals, etc (see Gen 18 4; 19 2; Lk 7 44).

The streams and ponds, when available, were the usual resorts for bathing (Ex 2 5; 2 K 5 10, etc), but the water-supply of large cities,

2. Bathing stored up in great pools or large cisterns, was certainly available at times

Resorts to some degree for bathing (2 S 11 2);

though, as Benzinger says, no traces of bathrooms have been found in old Heb houses, even in royal palaces. In Babylon, it would seem from Sus 15, there were bathing pools in gardens, though this passage may refer simply to bathing in the open air. Certainly public baths as now known, or plunge-baths of the Gr type, were unknown among the Hebrews until they were brought in contact with the Gr civilization. Such baths first come into view during the Gr-Rom period, when they are found to be regularly included in the gymnasia, or "places of exercise" (1 Macc 1 14). Remains of them, of varying degrees of richness and architectural completeness, may be seen today in various parts of the East, those left of the cities of the Decapolis, esp. at Gerash and Amman, being excellent examples (cf also those at Pompeii). A remarkable series of bath-chambers has recently been discovered by Mr. R. A. S. Macalister at Gezer in Pal, in connection with a building supposed to be the palace built by Simon Maccabaeus. For an interesting account of it see PEFS, 1905, 294 f.

When we consider that in Pal six months of the year are rainless, and how scarce and pricelessly valuable water is during most of the year, and in many places all the year round; and when we recall how the Bedouin of today looks on the use of water for cleansing in such times and places of scarcity, viewing it as a wanton waste (see Benzinger, Heb. Arch., 108, note), the rigid requirement of it for so many ritual purposes by the Mosaic law is, to say the least, remarkable (see ABLUTION; CLEAN AND UNCLEAR, etc). Certainly there was a marked contrast between the Gr idea of bathing and that of the Hebrews and Asiatics in general, when they came in contact. But when Gr culture invaded Pal under Antiochus Epiphanes (cir 168 BC), it brought Gr ideas and Gr bathing establishments with it; and under Herod (40-44 BC) it was given the right of way and prevailed to no mean degree (see Anecdote of Gamaliel II in Schürer, HJP, II, i, 18, 53).

the Lake of Galilee, which have been a health resort from time immemorial. It is probably true, however, as some one has said, that in OT times and in NT times, the masses of the people had neither privacy nor inclination for bathing. GEO. B. EAGER

BATH KOL, bath'kol, bath kōl (בַּת קוֹל, bath kōl, "the daughter of the voice"): Originally signifying no more than "sound," "tone," "call," (e.g. water in pouring gives forth a "sound," bath kōl, while oil does not), sometimes also "echo." The expression acquired among the rabbis a special use, signifying the Divine voice, audible to man and unaccompanied by a visible Divine manifestation. Thus conceived, bath kōl is to be distinguished from God's speaking to Moses and the prophets; for at Sinai the voice of God was part of a larger theophany, while for the prophets it was the resultant inward demonstration of the Divine

VIEW (FROM THE NORTH) OF THE SERIES OF BATHS IN THE CASTLE AT GEZER (PEF).

But "bathing" in the Bible stands chiefly for ritual acts—purification from ceremonial uncleanness, from contact with the dead,

4. Cere- monial with defiled persons or things, with "holy things," i.e. things "devoted," Purification or "under the ban," etc (see CLEAN AND UNCLEAR, etc). The Heb of the OT does not sharply distinguish between bathing and partial washing—both are expressed by rāḥaṣ, and the RV rightly renders "wash" instead of "bathe" in some cases. Talmudic usage simply codified custom which had been long in vogue, according to Schürer. But Kennedy grants that the "bath" at last became, even for the laity, "an important factor in the religious life of Israel." We read of daily bathing by the Essenes (Jos, BJ, II, viii, 5). Then later we find John, the Baptizer, immersing, as the record clearly shows the apostles of Christ did also (Acts 8 38; Rom 6 3 f); cf Lk 11 38 where βαπτίζω, baptizō, in passive = "washed."

In Jn 5 2-7 we have an example of bathing for health. There are remains of ancient baths at Gadara and at Callirrhoe, E. of the Jordan, baths which were once celebrated as resorts for health-seekers. There are hot baths in full operation today, near Tiberias, on the southwestern shore of will, by whatever means effected, given to them to declare (see VOICE). It is further to be distinguished from all natural sounds and voices, even where these were interpreted as conveying Divine instruction. The conception appears for the first time in Dnl 4 28 (EV 31)—it is in the Aram. portion—where, however, kal = kōl, "voice" stands without berath = bath, "daughter": "A voice fell from heaven." Jos (Ant, XIII, x, 3) relates that John Hyrcanus (135-104 BC) heard a voice while offering a burnt sacrifice in the temple, which Jos expressly interprets as the voice of God (cf Bab Ṣotāh 33a and Jerus Ṣotāh 24b, where it is called bath kōl). In the NT mention of "a voice from heaven" occurs in the following passages: Mt 3 17; Mk 1 11; Lk 3 22 (at the baptism of Jesus); Mt 17 5; Mk 9 7; Lk 9 35 (at His transfiguration); Jn 12 28 (shortly before His passion); Acts 9 4; 22 7; 26 14 (conversion of Paul), and 10 13.15 (instruction of Peter concerning clean and unclean). In the period of the Tannaim (cir 100 BC-200 AD) the term bath kōl was in very frequent use and was understood to signify not the direct voice of God, which was held to be super-sensible, but the echo of the voice (the bath being somewhat arbitrarily taken to express the distinction). The rabbis held that bath kōl had been an occasional means of Divine communication throughout the whole history of Israel and that since the cessation of the prophetic gift it was the sole means of Divine revelation. It is noteworthy that the rabbinical conception of bath kōl sprang up in the period of the decline of OT prophecy and flourished in the period of extreme traditionalism. Where the gift of prophecy was clearly lacking—perhaps even because of this lack—there grew up an inordinate desire for special Divine manifestations. Often a voice from heaven was looked for to clear up matters of doubt and even to decide between conflicting interpretations of the law. So strong had this tendency become that Rabbi Joshua (cir 100 AD) felt it to be necessary to oppose it and to insist upon the supremacy and the sufficiency of the written law. It is clear that we have here to do with a conception of the nature and means of Divine revelation that is distinctly inferior to the Bib. view. For even in the Bib. passages where mention is made of the voice from heaven, all that is really essential to the revelation is already present, at least in principle, without the audible voice.

BATH-RABBIM, bath-rab'im, THE GATE OF (שַׁעַר בַּת־רַבִּימִים, sha'ar bath-rabbim; LXX ἐν πύλαις θυγατρὸς πολλῶν, en pälais thugatros pollōn, lit. “in the gates of the daughter of the many.” The gate of Heshbon near which were the pools compared to the Shulammite’s eyes (Cant 7 4). Guthe would translate “by the gate of the populous city.” Cheyne would amend the passage and read “Thine eyes are like Solomon’s pools,

By the wood of Beth-cerem,” and transfer the scene to the pools of Solomon, S. of Bethlehem (EB, s.v.). But this is surely very violent. One of the pools of Heshbon still survives, measuring 191 ft.×139 ft., and is 10 ft. deep. The walls however have been rent by earthquakes, and now no longer retain the water. W. EWING

BATH-SHEBA, bath-shē'ba, bath-shē'ba (בַּת־שֶׁבַע, bath-sheba), “the seventh daughter,” or “the daughter of an oath,” also called Bathshua [בַּת־שׁוּא, bath-shūa], “the daughter of opulence” [1 Ch 3 5]; the LXX however reads Bērsabēē everywhere; cf BATHSHUA; HPN, 65, 67, 77, 206 for Bath-sheba, and 67, 69, n. 3, for Bathshua: Bath-sheba was the daughter of Eliam (2 S 11 3) or Ammiel (1 Ch 3 5); both names have the same meaning. She was the beautiful wife of Uriah the Hittite, and because of her beauty was forced by David to commit adultery (2 S 11 2 ff; Ps 51). Her husband Uriah was treacherously killed by the order of David (2 S 11 6 ff). After the death of her husband David made her his wife and she lived with him in the palace (2 S 11 27). Four sons sprang from this marriage (2 S 5 14; 1 Ch 3 5), after the first child, the adulterine, had died (2 S 12 14 ff). With the help of the prophet Nathan she renders futile the usurpation of Adonijah and craftily secures the throne for her son Solomon (1 K 1 11 ff). Later Adonijah succeeds in deceiving Bath-sheba, but his plan is frustrated by the king (1 K 2 13 ff). According to Jewish tradition, Prov 31 is written by Solomon in memory of his mother. In the genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1 6) Bath-sheba is mentioned as the former wife of Uriah and the mother of Solomon by David. See ADONIJAH; AMMIEL; BATHSHUA; DAVID; ELIAM; NATHAN; SOLOMON.

BATHSHUA, bath-shū-a (בַּת־שׁוּא, bath-shūa), “the daughter of opulence” or “the daughter of Shua”; cf BATH-SHEBA; for derivation see HPN, 67, 69, n. 3):

(1) In Gen 38 2 and 1 Ch 2 3, where the name is trd “Shua’s daughter,” the wife of Judah.

(2) In 1 Ch 3 5, the daughter of Ammiel and wife of David. See BATH-SHEBA.

BATTERING-RAM, bat'er-ing-ram. See SIEGE.

BATTLE. See WAR.

BATTLE-AXE, bat'l-ax. See ARMOR, ARMS, III, 1; Ax (AXE).

BATTLE-BOW, bat'l-bō: Found in the striking Messianic prophecy: “The battle bow shall be cut off” (Zec 9 10). The prophet is predicting the peace that shall prevail when Zion’s king cometh, “just, and having salvation; lowly, and riding upon an ass, even upon a colt the foal of an ass.” The words convey their full significance only when read in the light of the context: “I will cut off the chariot from Ephraim, and the horse from Jerus; and the battle bow shall be cut off; and he shall speak peace unto the nations” (cf 10 4). The battle-bow was sometimes made of tough wood, sometimes of two straight horns joined together (Hom. Il. iv.105–11), and sometimes of bronze. In Ps 134 RV we find “bow of brass,” but it probably should be of “bronze” (קֶשֶׁת, hōsheth), a metal very different from our brass, which is a mixture of copper and zinc. The point of the passage in this connection (“He teacheth my hands to war; so that mine arms do bend a bow of bronze”), as well as of that in 2 K 9 24 (“And Jehu drew his bow with his full strength”) is that it required great strength to bend the battle-bow. See ARCHERY; ARMOR.

GEO. B. EAGER

BATTLEMENT, bat'l-ment. See FORTIFICATION; HOUSE.

BAVAI, bav'ā-i. See BAVVAI.

BAVVAI, bav'ā-i (בַּוְוַי, bawway; LXX A, Bevel, Benei; B, Bedel, Bedel; AV Bavai, “wisher” [?] [Neh 3 18]): Perhaps identical with or a brother of Binnui (Neh 3 24). See BINNUI. B., “the son of Henadad, the ruler of half the district of Keilah,” was of a Levitical family. He is mentioned as one of those who repaired the wall of Jerus after the return from Babylon (Neh 3 17 f).

BAY, bā. See COLORS.

BAY, bā (בַּי, lāshōn, lit. “tongue”; κόλπος, kōlpos): The word occurs in the sense of inlet of the sea in the OT only in Josh 15 2.5; 18 19, and in NT only in Acts 27 39 (of Malta, AV “creek”).

BAYITH, bā'yith (בַּיִת, bayith; AV Bajith, “house” [Isa 15 2]): A town in the country of Moab. The reading of RVm, “Bayith and Dibon are gone up to the high places to weep,” seems to be the proper rendering of this passage. Duhm et al., by changing the text, read either “house of” or “daughter of.” The construct of this word beth is frequently used in compound words. See BETH.

BAY TREE, bā'trē' (AV only; Ps 37 35; אֶזְרָה, 'ezrah): The word means "native," "indigenous," and RV trs "a green tree in its native soil."

BAZLITH, baz'lith, BAZLUTH, baz'luth (בַּצְלִית, baḥlith, Neh 7 54; בַּצְלִיחַ, baḥlūth, Ezr 2 52; Basaloth, 1 Esd 5 31, "asking"): The descendants of B. (temple-servants) returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus.

BDELLIUM, del'i-um (בְּדִלְיָה, b'dhōlah): The word occurs twice in the Pent: (1) in Gen 2 12, in conjunction with gold and onyx, as a product of the land of HAVILAH (q.v.), and (2) in Nu 11 7, where the manna is likened to this substance in appearance: "The appearance thereof as the appearance of bdellium." The latter comparison excludes the idea of b'dhōlah being a precious stone, and points to the identification of it with the fragrant resinous gum known to the Greeks as bdellion, several kinds being mentioned by Dioscorides and Pliny. It was a product of Arabia, India, Afghanistan, etc. JAMES ORR BEACH, bēch (αἰγιαλός, aigialós): The part of the shore washed by the tide on which the waves dash (Mt 13 248; Jn 21 4; Acts 21 5; 27 39.40).

BEACON, bē'k'n. The tr of the Heb תֹּרֶן, tōren, which usually means "mast" (cf Isa 33 23; Ezk 27 5), but in Isa 30 17 being used in parallelism with "ensign" the meaning may be "signal-staff" (Isa 30 17 ARVm "pole").

BEALIAH, bē-a-li'a (בְּעִלְיָה, b'e'alyāh, "Jehovah is Lord," cf HPN, 144, 287): B., formerly a friend of Saul, joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 5).

BEALOTH, bē'a-loth (בְּעִלְוֹת, b'e'ālōth; Βαλῶθ, Balōth): An unidentified city of Judah in the Negeb (Josh 15 24).

BEAM, bēm: The word is used to translate various OT terms:

(1) גֵּב, gēbh (1 K 6 9), צֶלַע, ṣēlā', "a rib" (1 K 7 3), קִירָה, kūrah (2 Ch 3 7; 34 11; Cant 1 17), all refer to constructional beams used in buildings for roofing and upper floors, main beams being carried on pillars generally of wood. The last term is used in 2 K 6 2.5 ("as one was felling a beam") of trees which were being cut into logs. A related form is קָרָה, kārah (used of the Creator, Ps 104 3; of building, Neh 2 8; 3 3.6). Yet another term, קָפִים, kāphīm, is used in Hab 2 11: "The stone shall cry out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber shall answer it"—a protest against sin made by inanimate things. The Douay version, in translating, "the timber that is between the joints of the building," suggests the use of bond timbers in buildings, similar to that used at one time in Eng. brickwork. It probably refers to its use in mud brick buildings, although bond timbers might also be used in badly built stone walls. The Arabs of the present day use steel joints to strengthen angles of buildings.

(2) Beam, in weaving, represents two words, אֶרֶג, 'eregh (Jgs 16 14, the beam of a loom to which Samson's hair was fastened; used in Job 7 6 of a weaver's shuttle), and מַנֹּר, mānōr (1 S 17 7; 2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 11 23; 20 5), of a spear-staff.

(3) In the NT Jesus uses the word δοκός, dokós, "a rafter," in bidding the censorious person first cast the "beam" out of his own eye before attempting to remove the "mote" from another's eye (Mt 7 3; Lk 6 41.42). See ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE.

ARCH. C. DICKIE

BEAN, bē'an. See BAEAN.

BEANS, bēnz (פֹּל, pōl; Arab. fūl): A very common product of Pal; a valuable and very ancient article of diet. The Bible references are probably to the Faba vulgaris (N.D. Leguminosae) or horsebean. This is sown in the autumn; is in full flower—filling the air with sweet perfume—in the early spring; and is harvested just after the barley and wheat. The bundles of black bean stalks, plucked up by the roots and piled up beside the newly winnowed barley, form a characteristic feature on many village threshing-floors. Beans are threshed and winnowed like the cereals. Beans are eaten entire, with the pod, in the unripe state, but to a greater extent the hard beans are cooked with oil and meat.

In Ezk 4 9, beans are mentioned with other articles as an unusual source of bread and in 2 S 17 28 David receives from certain staunch friends of his at Mahanaim a present, which included "beans, and lentils, and parched pulse."

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BEAR, bâr (דָּב or דִּב, dōbh; cf Arab. dubb): In 1 S 17 34-37, David tells Saul how as a shepherd boy he had overcome a lion and a bear. In 2 K 2 24 it is related that two she bears came out of the wood and tore forty-two of the children who had been mocking Elisha. All the other references to bears are fig.; cf 2 S 17 8; Prov 17 12; 28 15; Isa 11 7; 59 11; Lam 3 10; Dnl 7 5; Hos 13 8; Am 5 19; Rev 13 2. The Syrian bear, sometimes named as a distinct species, Ursus Syriacus, is better to be regarded as merely a local variety of the European and Asiatic brown bear, Ursus arctos. It still exists in small numbers in Lebanon and is fairly common in Anti-Lebanon and Hermon. It does not seem to occur now in Pal proper, but may well have done so in Bible times. It inhabits caves in the high and rugged mountains and issues mainly at night to feed on roots and vegetables. It is fond of the hummuṣ or chick-pea which is sometimes planted in the upland meadows, and the fields have to be well guarded. The fig. references to the bear take account of its ferocious nature, esp. in the case of the she bear robbed of her whelps (2 S 17 8; Prov 17 12; Hos 13 8). It is with this character of the bear in mind that Isaiah says, (11 7), "And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together." ALFRED ELY DAY

BEAR, bâr, THE (ARCTURUS). A great northern constellation. See ASTRONOMY, II, 13.

BEAR, bār (vb.), BORN, bōrn (נָסַח, yāladh): Occurs frequently in its lit. sense, alluding to motherhood (Gen 16 11; 17 17.19.21; 18 13; 22 23; 30 3; Lev 12 5; Jgs 13 3; 5 7; Ruth 1 12; 1 K 3 21; Jer 29 6); in the NT γεννάω, gennāō, in the same sense (Lk 1 13).

Figurative: It is often used with reference to the beginning of the spiritual life or regeneration (Jn 1 13; 3 3-8; 1 Jn 2 29; 3 9; 4 7; 5 1.4.18 AV). See REGENERATION.

BEAR, bār, BORNE, bōrn (נָסַח, nāsā; λαμβάνω, lambánō, ἀναφέρω, anaphérō, βαστάζω, bastázō): In EV the physical sense is familiar, of supporting or carrying any weight or burden. The tr of RV is to be preferred in Ps 75 3 ("have set up"); Lam 3 28 ("hath laid it upon him"); Zeph 1 11 ("were laden with silver"); Lk 18 7 ("he is longsuffering over them"); Jn 12 6 ("took away what was put therein"); Acts 27 15 ("could not face the wind").

Figurative: The words are used in the fig. sense of enduring or taking the consequences of, be it for oneself or as representative for others: one's own iniquity (Lev 5 17 and often); chastisement (Job 34 31); reproach (Ps 69 7; 89 50); or the sins of others (Isa 53 4.11.12; Mt 8 17; He 9 28; 1 Pet 2 24). In Isa 46 1-7 a striking contrast is presented between the idols of Babylon whom their worshippers had carried (borne) about and which would be borne away by the conquerors, and Jeh who had carried (borne) Israel from the beginning. "Jacob and Israel . . . borne by me from their birth . . . and I will bear; yea, I will carry." "They bear it upon the shoulder," etc. M. O. EVANS

BEARD, bērd:

(1) Western Semites in general, according to the monuments, wore full round beards, to which they evidently devoted great care. The nomads of the desert, in distinction from the settled Semites, wore a clipped and pointed beard (see Jer 9 26: "all that have the corners of their hair cut off, that dwell in the wilderness"; and cf 25 23; 49 32, etc).

(2) Long beards are found on Assy and Bab monuments and sculptures as a mark of the highest aristocracy (cf Egypt monuments, esp. representations by W. Max Müller, Asien und Europa, 140). It is not clear that it was ever so with the Jews. Yet it is significant that the Heb "elder" (zākēn) seems to have received his name from his long beard (cf *bene barbatu*s).

(3) The view of some that it was customary among the Hebrews to shave the upper lip is considered by the best authorities as without foundation. The mustache (Heb sāphām, "beard"), according to 2 S 19 24, received regular "trimming" (thus EV after the Vulg, but the Heb is generic, not specific: "He had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard").

(4) In one case (1 S 21 13.14) the neglect of the beard is set down as a sign of madness: "[He] let his spittle fall down upon his beard. Then said Achish, . . . Lo, ye see the man is mad."

(5) It was common Sem custom to cut both hair and beard as a token of grief or distress. Isaiah (15 2), describing the heathen who have "gone up to the high places to weep," says "Moab waileth over Nebo, and over Medeba; on all their heads is baldness, every beard is cut off." Jeremiah (41 5), describing the grief of the men of Samaria for their slain governor, Gedaliah, says, "There came men from . . . Samaria [his sorrowing subjects] even four score men, having their beards shaven and their clothes rent," etc. And Amos, in his prophecy of the vision of the "basket of summer fruit" (8 1 ff), makes Jeh say to His people: "I will turn your feasts into mourning; . . . I will bring sackcloth upon all loins, and baldness upon every head" (8 10). On the other hand it was even more significant of great distress or fear to leave the beard untrimmed, as did Mephibosheth, the son of Saul, when he went to meet King David, in the crisis of his guilty failure to go up with the king according to his expectation: "He had neither dressed his feet, nor trimmed his beard, nor washed his clothes, from the day the king departed until the day he came home in peace." (Cf 1 S 21 13.14; 2 S 19 24.)

(6) Absalom's hair was cut only once a year, it would seem (2 S 14 26; cf rules for priests, Levites, etc, Ezk 44 20). But men then generally wore their hair longer than is customary or seemly with us (cf Cant 5 2.11, "His locks are bushy, and black as a raven"). Later, in NT times, it was a disgrace for a man to wear long hair (1 Cor 11 6-15). To mutilate the beard of another was considered a great indignity (see 2 S 10 4; cf Isa 50 6, "plucked off the hair"). The shaving of the head of a captive slave-girl who was to be married to her captor marked her change of condition and prospects (Dt 21 12; W. R. Smith, Kinship, 209).

BEAST, bēst: This word occurs often in both Old and New Testaments and denotes generally a mammal (though sometimes a reptile) in distinction to a man, a bird or a fish. In this distinction the Eng. is fairly in accord with the Heb and Gr originals. The commonest Heb words b'hēmāh and hai have their counterpart in the Arab. as do three others less often used, b'ēr (Gen 46 17; Ex 22 5; Nu 20 8 AV), nephesh (Lev 24 18), and tebhah (Prov 9 2). B'hēmāh and Arab. bahimah are from a root signifying vagueness or dumbness and so denote primarily a dumb beast. Hai and Arab. haiwān are from the root hāyāh (Arab. haya), "to live," and denote primarily living creatures. B'ēr, "cattle," and its root-verb, bā'ar, "to graze," are identical with the Arab. ba'ir and ba'ara, but with a curious difference in meaning. Ba'ir is a common word for camel among the Bedawin and the root-verb, ba'ara, means "to drop dung," ba'rah being a common word for the dung of camels, goats, and sheep. Nephesh corresponds in every way with the Arab. nephis, "breath," "soul" or "self." Tebhah from tābhah, "to slaughter," is equivalent to the Arab. dhibh from dhabāh, with the same meaning. Both θηρίον, thērion ("wild beast"), and ζῷον, zōon ("living thing"), occur often in the Apocalypse. They are found also in a few other places, as mammals (He 13 11) or fig. (Tit 1 12). Thērion is used also of the viper which fastened on Paul's hand, and this has parallels in classical Gr. Beasts of burden and beasts used for food were and are an important form of property, hence κτήνος, klēnos ("possession"), the word used for the good Samaritan's beast (Lk 10 34) and for the beasts with which Lysias provided Paul for his journey to Caesarea (Acts 23 24).

BEATITUDES, bē-at'i-tūds: The word "beatitude" is not found in the Eng. Bible, but the Lat beatitudo, from which it is derived,

1. The Name 4 6 where, with reference to Ps 32 1.2, David is said to pronounce the "beatitude" of the man whose transgressions are forgiven. In the Lat church beatitudo was used not only as an abstract term denoting blessedness, but in the secondary, concrete sense of a particular declaration of blessedness and esp. of such a declaration coming from the lips of Jesus Christ. Beatitudes in this derivative meaning of the word occur frequently in the OT, particularly in the Pss (32 1.2; 41 1; 65 4, etc), and Jesus on various occasions threw His utterances into this form (Mt 11 6; 13 16; 16 17; 24 46, with the Lukan parallels; Jn 13 17; 20 29). But apart from individual sayings of this type the name Beatitudes, ever since the days of Ambrose, has been attached specifically to those words of blessing with which, according to both Mt and Lk, Jesus began that great discourse which is known as the Sermon on the Mount.

When we compare these Beatitudes as we find them in Mt 5 3-12 and Lk 6 20-23 (24-26), we are immediately struck by the resemblances and differences between them.

2. The Two Groups To the ordinary reader, most familiar with Mt's version, it is the differences that first present themselves; and he will be apt to account for the discrepancy of the two reports, as Augustine did, by assigning them to two distinct occasions in the Lord's ministry. A careful comparative study of the two narratives, however, with some attention to the introductory circumstances in each case, to the whole progress of the discourses themselves, and to the parabolic sayings with which they conclude, makes this view improbable, and points rather to the conclusion that what we have to do with is two varying versions given by the Evangelists of the material drawn from an underlying source consisting of Logia of Jesus. The differences, it must be admitted, are very marked. (a) Mt has 8 Beatitudes; Lk has 4, with 4 following Woes. (b) In Mt the sayings, except the last, are in the 3d per.; in Lk they are in the 2d. (c) In Mt the blessings, except the last, are attached to spiritual qualities; in Lk to external conditions of poverty and suffering. Assuming that both Evangelists derived their reports from some common Logian source, the question arises as to which of them has adhered more closely to the original. The question is difficult, and still gives rise to quite contrary opinions. One set of scholars decides in favor of Mt, and accounts for Lk's deviation from the Matthaean version by ascribing to him, on very insufficient grounds, an ascetic bias by which he was led to impart a materialistic tone to the utterances of Jesus. Another set inclines to the theory that Lk's version is the more literal of the two, while Mt's partakes of the nature of a paraphrase. In support of this second view it may be pointed out that Lk is usually more careful than Mt to place the sayings of Jesus in their original setting and to preserve them in their primitive form, and further that owing to the natural tendency of the sacred writers to expand and interpret rather than to abbreviate an inspired utterance, the shorter form of a saying is more likely to be the original one. It may be noted, further, that in Mt 5 11.12 the Beatitude takes the direct form, which suggests that this may have been the form Mt found in his source in the case of the others also. On the whole, then, probabilities appear to favor the view that Lk's version is the more literal one. It does not follow, however, that the difference between the two reports amounts to any real inconsistency. In Lk emphasis is laid on the fact that Jesus is addressing His disciples (6 20), so that it was not the poor as such whom He blessed, but His own disciples although they were poor. It was not poverty, hunger, sorrow or suffering in themselves to which He promised great rewards, but those experiences as coming to spiritual men and thus transformed into springs of spiritual blessing. And so when Mt, setting down the Lord's words with a view to their universal application rather than with reference to the particular circumstances in which they were uttered, changes "the poor" into "the poor in spirit," and those that "hunger" into those that "hunger and thirst after righteousness," he is giving the real purport of the words of Jesus and recording them in the form in which by all men and through all coming time they may be read without any chance of misunderstanding.

As regards the Beatitudes of the meek, the merciful, the pure in heart, the peacemakers, which are given by Mt only, they may have been spoken by Jesus at the same time as the rest and have been intended by Him in their association with the other four to fill out a conception of the ideal character of the members of the Kingdom of God. In view, however, of their omission from Luke's list, it is impossible to affirm this with certainty. That they are all authentic utterances of Jesus Himself there is no reason to doubt. But they may have been originally scattered through the discourse itself, each in its own proper place. Thus the Beatitude of the meek would go fitly with vs 38 ff, that of the merciful with 43 ff, that of the pure in heart with 27 ff, that of the peacemakers with 23 ff. Or they may even have been uttered on other occasions than that of the Sermon on the Mount and have been gathered together by Matthew and placed at the head of the Sermon as forming along with the other four a suitable introduction to Our Lord's great discourse on the laws and principles of the Kingdom of God.

With regard to the number of the Beatitudes in Matthew's fuller version, some have counted 7 only, making the list end with ver 9.

3. Number, Arrange-ment, Structure But though the blessing pronounced on the persecuted in vs 10-12 differs from the preceding Beatitudes, both in departing from the aphoristic form and in attaching the blessing to an outward condition and not to a disposition of the heart, the || in Lk (6 22 f) justifies the view that this also is to be added to the list, thus making 8 Beatitudes in all. On the arrangement of the group much has been written, most of it fanciful and unconvincing. The first four have been described as negative and passive, the second four as positive and active. The first four, again, have been represented as pertaining to the desire for salvation, the second four as relating to its actual possession. Some writers have endeavored to trace in the group as a whole the steadily ascending stages in the development of the Christian character. The truth in this last suggestion lies in the reminder it brings that the Beatitudes are not to be thought of as setting forth separate types of Christian character, but as enumerating qualities and experiences that are combined in the ideal character as conceived by Christ—and as exemplified, it may be added, in His own life and person.

In respect of their structure, the Beatitudes are all alike in associating the blessing with a promise—a promise which is sometimes represented as having an immediate realization (vs 3.10), but in most cases has a future or even (cf ver 12) an eschatological outlook. The declaration of blessedness, therefore, is based not only on the possession of the quality or experience described, but on the present or future rewards in which it issues. The poor in spirit are called blessed not merely because they are poor in spirit, but because the kingdom of heaven is theirs; the mourners because they shall be comforted; those that hunger and thirst after righteousness because they shall be filled; those who are persecuted because a great reward is laid up for them in heaven. The Beatitudes have often been criticized as holding up an ideal of which limitation, privation and self-renunciation are the essence, and which lacks those positive elements that are indispensable to any complete conception of blessedness. But when it is recognized that the blessing in every case rests on the associated promise, the criticism falls to the ground. Christ does demand of His followers a renunciation of many things that seem desirable to the natural heart, and a readiness to endure many other things from which men naturally shrink. But just as in His own case the great self-emptying was followed by the glorious exaltation (Phil 2 6 ff), so in the case of His disciples spiritual poverty and the bearing of the cross carry with them the inheritance of the earth and a great reward in heaven.

BEAUTIFUL, bū'ti-fōōl, GATE, gāt. See TEMPLE.

BEAUTY, bū'ti: The space allotted to this topic allows liberty only for the statement of two problems to students of the Bible. They should give distinct attention to the interblending of aesthetics with ethics in the Scripture. They should observe the extent and meaning of aesthetics in Nature.

That the Bible is an ethical book is evident. Righteousness in all the relations of man as a moral being is the key to its inspiration, the

1. Aesthetics in Scripture—guiding light to correct understanding of its utterance. But it is everywhere inspired and writ in an atmosphere of aesthetics. Study will bring out this fact from Gen to Rev. The first pair make their appearance in a garden where grew "every tree that is pleasant to the sight" (Gen 2 9), and the last vision for the race is an abode in a city whose gates are of pearl and streets of gold (Rev 21 21). Such is the imagery that from beginning to end is pictured as the home of ethics—the beautiful and the good—in the whole Scripture range. A few texts will set before us this kinship and then the Bible student can detect it as he reads.

"One thing have I asked of Jeh, that will I seek after:
That I may dwell in the house of Jeh all the days of my life.

To behold the beauty of Jeh,
And to inquire in his temple" (Ps 27 4).

"For all the gods of the peoples are idols;
But Jeh made the heavens.
Honor and majesty are before him:
Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary" (Ps 96 5.6).

If we catch the spirit set forth in such and similar Psalms, we can use it as a magnetic needle to detect its like wherever we shall read: and we shall find that like in abundance. It is only necessary to turn to the directions given for making the Ark of the Covenant and its encircling tabernacle, and the decorations of the priests that were to minister in the worship of Jeh in the ceremonies described, as given in Ex 25 ff, to see that every resource of Israel was brought to bear to render ark and tabernacle and their service beautiful. One will find in a concordance half a column of references under the word "Ark" and a column and a half under the word "Tabernacle." By looking up these references one can realize how much care was spent to give and preserve to these aids to worship the attractiveness of beauty.

In 1 Ch 15 and 16 we have an account of David's bringing in the Ark of the Covenant into his own city to rest in a tent he had provided for it. On this occasion a demonstration was made with all the aesthetics of which the music of that day was capable. "And David spake to the chief of the Levites to appoint their brethren the singers, with instruments of music, psalteries and harps and cymbals, sounding aloud and lifting up the voice with joy." And David himself gave to the celebration the aesthetics of one of the noblest of his psalms (1 Ch 16 8–36).

It is almost idle to refer to Solomon and his temple (1 K 6 ff; 2 Ch 3 ff). It is a common understanding that the civilization of Solomon's day was drawn upon to its utmost in every department of aesthetics, in the building of that house for Jeh and in the appointments for the worship there to be conducted. Beauty of form and color and harmony of sound were then and there integrated—made one—with worship in holiness. The propriety of that association has been seen and felt through the ages.

There is beauty in speech. It is a fact that the supreme classics in the lit. of the tongues of two of the dominant nations of the earth, the Eng. and the German, are trs of the Bible. There is no explanation of such fact except that the original justified the trs. You can read indifferently from one tr to the other and catch the same aesthetic gleam. Nobility and poetry of thought lay in what was to be trd. Here is proof that cannot be gainsaid that the Scripture authors sought the aid of aesthetics as garb for the ethics they taught. So they wrote in poetry. So they used allegory, illustration, figure, metaphor that would charm and hold. The parables of Jesus are examples of this method of clothing thought. They do their ethical work because they have swept into it figure and imagery from familiar aesthetic perceptions. "The sower went forth to sow" (Mt 13 3). That is a glad sight—always has been and always will be. That is why a picture of "The Sower" hangs on the walls of a Christian home. Just the painting—and every beholder remembers the parable and cannot forget its ethics. The intensity of thought concentrated upon ethics in the NT has drawn away attention from the partnership between these two principles in religion. But it is there, and we shall see it when once we look for it.

It is something to which we do not wake up till late in life—to wit, the illimitableness of the provision in Nature for beauty. Common consent awards beauty to the rainbow. Reflect that every drop of water in the ocean, or in the

2. Aesthetics in Nature hydrated rocks, or in the vapor floating over Saturn, has in it the possibility of rainbow coloring. In fact all matter has color of which the rainbow is only specimen. Any element incandescent has a spectrum partially coincident with that of water and ranging above and below it in the infinite capacity it has to start ether undulations. As apparently the larger part of the matter of the universe is incandescent, we can see that the field for expression in color is infinite. No one but the infinite God can see it all.

If we come down to this plain, plodding earth, cultivation of aesthetic sense will bring out beauty everywhere, from the grandeur of mountain scenery to aesthetic curves and colors revealed only by the microscope. We say the butterfly is beautiful. But the larva from which it is derived often carries as much beauty in mottling of color and of the fineness of finish of spine and mandible. Looking across the scale in this way the evidence of theism from beauty itself becomes convincing. Beauty becomes a messenger of and from God—as Iris was to the Greek and the rainbow to the Hebrew (Eccl 3 11).

This from Amiel's Journal Intime, I, 233, sets forth the radical, inexpressible position of beauty in Nature and in philosophy thereof correctly interpretative: "To the materialist philosopher the beautiful is a mere accident, and therefore rare. To the spiritualist philosopher the beautiful is the rule, the law, the universal foundation of things, to which every form returns as soon as the force of accident is withdrawn."

As we accustom ourselves to make larger and larger synthesis in the department of aesthetics, what diapason of theistic message may we not hear? Beauty wherever and however expressed is a medium of revelation. It is a bush ever burning, never consumed. Before it "put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." That beauty should be—to that intent, for that end, from everlasting hath wrought the Ancient of Days. C. CAVERNO

BEAUTY, bū'ti, AND BANDS, bandz (נָעִים, nō'am, and הֶבְרִים, hōbh'īm): The names given in Zec 11 7.14 to two symbolical staves, the first signifying Jeh's covenant of grace with the peoples, and the second representing the brotherhood of Judah and Israel. The breaking of the two staves is symbolic of the breaking of Jeh's covenant and of the union between Judah and Israel.

BEBAI, bē'bā-i, beb'a-i (בְּבַי, bēbhay; LXX Βηβαί, Bēbaí, "fatherly"):

(1) Descendants of B. returned with Ezra to Jerus (Ezr 8 11 called Babi; 1 Esd 8 37); one of these is Zechariah, the son of Bebai (Ezr 8 11, Zacharias; 1 Esd 8 37). 623 returned with Zerubbabel to Jerus (Ezr 2 11; 1 Esd 5 13; Neh 7 16 gives the number 628); some of these had married "strange wives" (Ezr 10 28; 1 Esd 9 29).

(2) A chief of the people who sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 15).

(3) An unknown town (Jth 15 4). Omitted in B and Vulg.

BECAUSE, bē-kōs' (ὅτι, hina, "in order that"): "The multitude rebuked them, b. [AV; RV "that"] they should hold their peace" (Mt 20 31).

BECHER, bē'kēr (בֶּכֶר, bekher, "the firstborn"; cf HPN, 88):

(1) Son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21; 1 Ch 7 6.8).
(2) Son of Ephraim whose family is called Becherites (AV "Bachrites"), Nu 26 35 (1 Ch 7 20 called Bered). Cf BERED.

BECHORATH, bē-kor'ath. See BECORATH.

BECK, bek, BECKON, bek'n (νεύμα, neúma): This word from neúō, "to nod," "beckon," "make a sign" by moving the head or eyes (Lk 5 7; Jn 13 24; Acts 21 40; 24 10), occurs only in 2 Macc 8 18, "Almighty God who at a beck can cast down both them that come against us, and also all the world," RV, "able at a beck." So Shak, "troops of soldiers at their beck"; "nod" is now generally used.

BECOME, bē-kum':

(1) Gr gínomai, used in NT for a change of state, corresponding to Heb hāyāh of OT. Cf Mt 18 3 with Dt 27 9.

(2) For what is fitting, suitable, proper, in NT: "prépei" (Mt 3 15; Eph 5 3; 1 Tim 2 10); in OT, נָאֻה, nā'āwāh, נָאֻה, nā'āh, Ps 93 5: "Holiness becometh thy house." In this sense, the adv. "becomingly" must be interpreted: "Walk becomingly toward them that are without" (1 Thess 4 12), i.e. in a way that is consistent with your profession.

BECORATH, bē-kō'rath (בְּכוֹרֶת, bēkhōrath, "the first birth"; AV Bechorath): A forefather of Saul of the tribe of Benjamin (1 S 9 1).

BECTILETH, bek'ti-leth (τὸ πεδίον Βαικτελαίθ, tó pedíon Baikteilaíth): A plain which is defined as "near the mountain which is at the left hand of the upper Cilicia" (Jth 2 21). The name in Syr is Beth K'ḥilath, "house of slaughter." So far there is no clue to its identification.

BED, BEDCHAMBER, BEDSTEAD: For the very poor of the East, in ancient times as now, the "bed" was and is, as a rule, the bare ground; and the bedclothes, the gown, simlāh, or "outer garment," worn during the day ("For that is his only covering, it is his garment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep?" [Ex 22 27]; cf Dt 24 13, "Thou shalt surely restore to him the pledge when the sun goeth down, that he may sleep in his garment").

When one was on a journey, or watching his flock by night as a shepherd, such a "bed" was the most natural, and often a stone would serve as a pillow. (See Gen 28 11, where Jacob "took one of the stones of the place, and put it under his head, and lay down in that place to sleep.")

Mat.

An advance on this custom, which came in due course of time, or under change of circumstances, was the use of a mat on the floor as a bed, with or without covering. At first it was lit. laid on the floor, which was generally of one common level, in some convenient place near the wall; but later it was put on an elevation, either a raised part of the floor on one side, or a bedstead, which gave rise to the expression "going up to the bed" (cf Gen 49 33 EV, "He gathered up his feet into the bed," and Ps 132 3, "go up into my bed").

With a later development and civilization, "beds" came to be built upon supports and constructed in different forms, which fact is reflected in the variety of names given the "bed" in the Heb and related languages.

(2) It is a far cry from the simple sleeping customs of Dt 24 13 to the luxurious arts and customs of the post-exilic days, when beds of fine wood and ivory are found in use among the Hebrews, as well as pillows of the most costly materials elaborately embroidered (see Jth 10 21; Est 1 6; cf Cant 3 10); but it all came about as a natural, as well as artificial development, with changed conditions and contacts and increasing civilization and luxury. As marking the several stages of that development, we find pictures of the poor, first sleeping upon the ground without mat or mattress, then in a single sleeping-room for the whole family, often without a separate bed, then with "beds" that were simply wadded quilts, or thin mattresses, and mats for keeping them off the ground; then with still better "beds" laid upon light portable, wooden frames, or upon more elevated bedsteads (cf Ps 132 3 and Mk 4 21 RV "under the bed"). The degree of richness depended, of course, upon time and place, in a measure, but more upon the wealth and station of the family and the style of the house or tent in which they lived, as it does even with the Bedouin of today. The prophet Amos gives a vivid and significant picture of the luxury of certain children of Israel, "that sit in Samaria in the corner of a couch, and on the silken cushions of a bed" (3 12); and of certain children of luxury "that lie upon beds of ivory, and stretch themselves upon their couches, and eat the lambs out of the flock . . . that drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief oils; but they are not grieved for the affliction of Joseph" (Am 6 4-6; cf Rev 18 10-13).

(3) We find that the poor, while sleeping for the most part in their ordinary clothing, often, in cold weather, made their beds of the skins of animals, old cloaks, or rugs, as they do still in the East. The "beds" and "bedding" now in ordinary use among Orientals are much the same, we may be sure, as they were in olden times. "Bedsteads" of any pretention were and are rare among the common people; but the richness of "beds" and "bedsteads" among Asiatics of wealth and rank was quite equal to that of the Greeks and Romans (cf Prov 7 16. 17, "I have spread my couch with carpets of tapestry, with striped cloths of the yarn of Egypt. I have perfumed my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon"); Cant 1 16.17: "The beams of our house are cedars, and our rafters are firs . . .

also our couch is green." Cf the "palanquin" of Solomon, "of the wood of Lebanon," "the pillars thereof of silver," "the bottom of gold," and "the seat of purple" (3 9.10).

(4) As soon as any family could afford it, a special bedroom would be set apart, and the whole family would sleep in it (see Lk 11 5-8, "My children are with me in bed"). When the house had two stories the upper story was used for sleeping, or, during very hot weather, preferably the roof, or the room on the roof. See House. When morning came the "bed," a wadded quilt or mattress, used with or without covering according to the season, was rolled up, aired and sunned, and then put aside on the raised platform, or packed away in a chest or closet.

The words mishkābh and mittāh came to have a fig. meaning signifying the final resting-place; and 'eres used of the "bedstead" of the King of Og (Dt 3 11) is thought by some to mean his sarcophagus (Benzinger, Heb Arch., 123; Nowack, I, 143). Gen 47 31, "And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head" is not rightly rendered (see STAFF, and Crit. Comm. in loc.).

etc what they severally stand for, or how they are related to the Heb terms rendered "bed" or "couch" in the OT. Of one thing we can be sure, reasoning from what we know of "the unchanging East," the "beds" and sleeping customs of the Hebrews in Christ's time were in the main about what they were in later OT times.

(2) An interesting case for study is that of the man "sick of the palsy" whom they brought to Jesus "lying on a bed," and who when healed "took up the bed, and went forth before them all" (Mt 9 2.6; Mk 2 4.12; Lk 5 18.19; cf Jn 5 8-12). Here the "bed" on which the sick of the palsy lay was let down from the housetop "through the tiles with his couch into the midst before Jesus" (Lk 5 18.19); and when the man was healed Jesus commanded him, as Luke says, to "take up [his] couch and go unto [his] house," and he "took up that whereon he lay, and departed to his house, glorifying God" (5 24.25). It seems, therefore, that this "bed" was a "pallet" and "couch" combined, a thin mattress upon a light portable frame, such as we have already seen was in use among the ancients. Another kindred case was that of the sick man at the pool of Bethesda (Jn 5 2 ff) whom Jesus healed and commanded to "take up his bed and walk," and he "took up his bed and walked"; only in this case the "bed" is a "pallet" without the frame, it would seem.

(3) Jesus in His teaching (Mk 4 21; cf Lk 8 16) asks, in language which is significant in this connection: "Is the lamp brought to be put under . . . the bed?" (Lk 8 16: "No man, when he hath lighted a lamp, covereth it with a vessel, or putteth it under a bed"). Here, clearly, "the bed" is the "bedstead," bedclothes, draperies and all, under which "the lamp" would be obscured and hindered in its function of "giving light to all in the room." Again (Lk 17 34) Jesus says, "In that night there shall be two men on one bed," which is incidental evidence that the "beds" of that day were not all "pallets" or "couches" for one only (cf Lk 11 7, "My children are with me in bed"; Cant 1 16; 3 10; Prov 7 16.18).

(4) For fig. use in the prophets (e.g. Ezk 23 17) and in the NT (e.g. "Let the bed be undefiled," He 13 4), see commentaries in loc.

BEDAD, bē'dad (בְּדָד, b'dhadh, "alone"): Father of Hadad, king of Edom "before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen 36 35; 1 Ch 1 46).

BEDAN, bē'dan (בְּדָן, b'dhān, "son of judgment" [?]):

(1) One of the leaders in Israel who with Jerubbaal, Jephthah and Samuel is mentioned as a deliverer of the nation (1 S 12 11). The text is questioned because LXX, Syr and Arab. read Barak instead.

(2) A son of Ulam of the house of Manasseh (1 Ch 7 17).

BEDCHAMBER, bed'cham-bēr. See BED.

BEDEDIAH, be-dē'ya (בְּדִיָּה, bēdh'yāh, "servant of Jeh"): A son of Bani who had married a "strange wife" (Ezr 10 35).

BEDSTEAD, bed'sted. See BED.

BEE, bē (בְּבוֹרָה, b'bhōrah; cf Arab. dabr, "a swarm of bees," also Arab. debbūr, "a wasp," said to be a corruption of zunbūr, "a wasp"; all are apparently from the Heb dābhar, "to speak," "arrange," "lead," "follow," or from Arab. dabara, "follow" [cf Arab. dabbara, "arrange"], though the connection in meaning is not apparent): Honey is mentioned many times in the Bible, esp. in the OT, but the word "bee" occurs only four times, and only one of the four times in connection with honey, in the story of Samson (Jgs 14 8). Both wild and domesticated bees are found today in Pal, but it is not clear that bees were kept in Bible times, although it would seem very probable. The frequently recurring phrase, "a land flowing with milk and honey," certainly suggests that the honey as well as the milk is a domestic product. The hives now in use are very primitive and wasteful as compared with hives that are made in Europe and America. Sometimes a large water jar is used. More frequently a cylinder about 3 or 4 ft. long and 6 in. in diameter is constructed of mulberry withes plaited together and plastered with mud or cow dung. A number of these cylinders are placed horizontally, being piled up together under some rude structure which serves as a protection from the direct rays of the sun. In the passage already cited it is related that Samson found a swarm of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion which he had killed on his previous visit. We are not told how much time had intervened, but it does not take long in the dry climate of Pal for scavenging beasts and insects to strip the flesh from the bones and make the skeleton a possible home for a swarm of bees. The other three passages refer to the offensive power of bees. In Dt 1 44, in the speech of Moses he says, "The Amorites . . . chased you, as bees do"; in Ps 118 12, the psalmist says, "They compassed me about like bees"; in Isa 7 18, the bee is the type of the chastisement that the Lord will bring from the land of Assyria.

BEEF, bēf. See CATTLE.

BEEIADA, bē-ē-lī'a-da (בְּעִיָּאדָה, b'elyādāh, "the Lord knows"; ELIADA, which see; cf HPN, 144, 192, n. 1, 202): A son of David (1 Ch 14 7).

BEELSARUS, bē-el'sa-rus, bē-el-sā'rus (Βεελσαράος, Beelsároos): One who accompanied Zerubabel in the return from the captivity (1 Esd 5 8), called Bilshan in Ezr 2 2 and Neh 7 7.

BEELTETHMUS, bē-el-teth'mus (Βεελθეთμος, Beēlthēmos; Balthemus): One of the officers of King Artaxerxes in Pal (1 Esd 2 16.25). According to Professor Sayce, the name by etymology means "lord of official intelligence" or "postmaster." Rendered "chancellor" in Ezr 4 8 and "story-writer" in 1 Esd 2 17.

BEEZEBUB, bē-el-zē-bub (in AV and RV is an error [after Vulg] for Beelzebub [RVm], Βεελζεβούλ, Beelzeboúl; WH, Βεεζεβούλ, Beezeboúl): In the time of Christ this was the current name for the chief or prince of demons, and was identified with SATAN (q.v.) and the DEVIL (q.v.). The Jews committed the unpardonable sin of ascribing Christ's work of casting out demons to Beelzebub, thus ascribing to the worst source the supreme manifestation of goodness (Mt 10 25; 12 24.27; Mk 3 22; Lk 11 15.18.19). There can be little doubt that it is the same name as BAALZEBUB (q.v.). It is a well-known phenomenon in the history of religions that the gods of one nation become the devils of its neighbors and enemies. When the Aryans divided into Indians and Iranians, the Devas remained gods for the Indians, but became devils (daevas) for the Iranians, while the Ahuras remained gods for the Iranians and became devils (asuras) for the Indians. Why Baalzebub became Beelzebub, why the b changed into l, is a matter of conjecture. It may have been an accident of popular pronunciation, or a conscious perversion (Beelzebub in Syr = "lord of dung"), or OT z'bhūbh may have been a perversion, accidental or intentional of z'bhāl (= "house"), so that Baalzebul meant "lord of the house." These are the chief theories offered (Cheyne in EB; Barton in Hastings, ERE).

BEER, bē'ēr (בֵּער, bē'ēr; φρέαρ, phréar; Lat puteus = "well"):

(1) A station on the march of the Israelites to the N. of the Arnon (Nu 21 16). Here it was that they sang round the well this song:

'Spring up O well; greet it with song,
Well, that the princes have dug,
The nobles of the people have bored,
With the sceptre—with their staves' (Nu 21 16 ff).

The place is not identified.

(2) The town to which Jotham fled from his brother Abimelech after declaring his parable from Mt. Gerizim (Jgs 9 21). This may be identical with BEEROTH, which see.

BEERA, bē-ē'ra, bē'ēr-a (בְּעֵרָא, bē'ērā', "expounder"): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 37).

BEERAH, bē-ē'ra, bē'ēr-a (בְּעֵרָה, bē'ērāh; "expounder"): A prince of the house of Reuben whom Tiglath-pileser carried away captive (1 Ch 5 6). Cf 2 K 15 29; 16 7.

BEER-ELIM, bē-ēr-ē'lim (בְּעֵר אֵלִים, bē'ēr ēlīm; φρέαρ τοῦ Ἀιλέμ, phréar tou Aileim, lit. "well of E."): Probably lay to the N. of Moab, answering to Eglaim in the S. (Isa 15 8). It may possibly be identical with BEER (1); but there is no certainty.

BEERI, bē-ē'rī (בְּעֵרִי, bē'ērī, "expounder"):

(1) Father of Judith, one of Esau's wives (Gen 26 34).

(2) The father of the prophet Hosea (Hos 1 1).

BEER-LAHAI-ROI, bē-ēr-lā-hi'roi, bē-ēr-lā-hi-rō'i (בְּעֵר לַחַי רֹאִי, bē'ēr lahai rō'i, "well of the Living One that seeth me"): "A fountain of water in the wilderness," "the fountain in the way to Shur" (Gen 16 7-14). It was the scene of Hagar's theophany, and here Isaac dwelt for some time (Gen 16 7 f; 24 62; 25 11). The site is in The Negeb between Kadesh and Bered (16 14). Rowland identifies the well with the modern Ain Moilāhhi, cir 50 miles S. of Beersheba and 12 miles W. of Ain Kadis. Cheyne thinks that Hagar's native country, to which she was fleeing and from which she took a wife for Ishmael, was not Egypt (miṣrayim), but a north Arabian district called by the Assyrians Muṣri (EB). S. F. HUNTER

BEEROTH, bē-ē'roth, bē'ēr-oth (בְּעֵרוֹת, bē'ērōth; Βηρώθ, Bērōth): One of the cities of the Canaanites whose inhabitants succeeded in deceiving Israel, and in making a covenant with them (Josh 9 3 ff). Apparently they were Hivites (ver 7). The occasion on which the Beerothites fled to Gittaim where they preserved their communal identity is not indicated. The town was reckoned to Benjamin (2 S 4 2 f). Onom places it under Gibeon, 7 Rom miles from Jerus on the way to Nicopolis (Amwās). If we follow the old road by way of Gibeon (el-Jib) and Bethhoron, Beeroth would lie probably to the N.W. of el-Jib. The traditional identification is with el-Bireh, about 8 miles from Jerus on the great north road. If the order in which the towns are mentioned (Josh 9 17; 18 25) is any guide as to position, el-Bireh is too far to the N.W. The identification is precarious. To Beeroth belonged the murderers of Ish-bosheth (2 S 4 2), and Naharai, Joab's armor-bearer (2 S 23 37; 1 Ch 11 39). It was reoccupied after the Exile (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29). W. EWING

BEEROTH BENE-JAAKAN, ben'ē-jā'a-kan (בְּעֵרוֹת בְּנֵי יַעֲקֹב, bē'ērōth benē ya'āqān; RVm "the wells of the children of Jaakan"): A desert camp of the Israelites mentioned before Moserah (Dt 10 6). In Nu 33 31.32 the name is given simply "Bene-jaakan," and the situation after Moseroth. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

BEEROTHITE, bē-ē'roth-it, bē'ēr-oth-it, BE-ROTHITE (בְּעֵרוֹתִי, bē'ērōthī; 2 S 4 5.9; 2 S 23 37; shortened form, 1 Ch 11 39). See BEEROTH.

BEERSHEBA, bē-ēr-shē'ba (בְּעֵר שֶׁבַע, bē'ēr shēbha'; Βηρσαβέ, Bersabée): Allotted originally to Simeon (Josh 19 2), one of "the uttermost cities of the tribe of the children of Judah" (Josh 15 28).

(1) The most probable meaning of Beersheba is the "well of seven." "Seven wells" is improbable on etymological grounds; the numeral should in that case be first. In Gen 21 31 Abraham and Abimelech took the Name an oath of witness that the former had dug the well and seven ewe lambs were offered in sacrifice, "Wherefore he called that place Beer-sheba; because there they swore both of them." Here the name is ascribed to the Heb root שָׁבַע, shābha', "to swear," but this same root is connected with the idea of seven, seven victims being offered and to take an oath, meaning "to come under the influence of seven."

Another account is given (Gen 26 23-33), where Isaac takes an oath and just afterward, "the same day Isaac's servants came, and told him concerning the well which they had digged, and said unto him, We have found water. And he called it Shibah: therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day."

(2) Beersheba was a sacred shrine. "Abraham planted a tamarisk tree in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of Jeh, the Everlasting God" (Gen 21 33). Theophanies occurred there to Hagar (Gen 21 17), to Isaac (26 24), to Jacob (46 2), and to Elijah (1 K 19 5). By Amos (5 5) it is classed with Bethel and Gilgal as one of the rival shrines to the pure worship of Jeh, and in another place (8 14) he writes "They shall fall, and never rise up again," who swear, "As the way [i.e. cultus] of Beer-sheba liveth." The two unworthy sons of Samuel were judges in Beersheba (1 S 8 2) and Zibiah, mother of King Jehoash, was born there (2 K 12 1; 2 Ch 24 1).

(3) Geographically Beersheba marked the southern limit of Judah, though theoretically this extended to the "river of Egypt" (Gen

3. Its 15 18)—the modern Wady el-Avish—60 miles farther south. It was the extreme border of the cultivated land.

From Dan to Beersheba (2 S 17 11, etc) or from Beersheba to Dan (1 Ch 21 2; 2 Ch 30 5) were the proverbial expressions, though necessarily altered through the changed conditions in later years to "from Geba to Beer-sheba" (2 K 23 8) or "from Beer-sheba to the hill-country of Ephraim" (2 Ch 19 4).

(4) Today Beersheba is Bir es-Seba' in the Wady es Seba', 28 miles S.W. of Hebron on "the southern border of a vast rolling plain broken

4. Modern by the torrent beds of Wady Khalil Beersheba and Wady Seba" (Robinson). The plain is treeless but is covered by verdure in the spring; it is dry and monotonous most of the year. Within the last few years this long-deserted spot—a wide stretch of shapeless ruins, the haunt of the lawless Bedouin—has been re-occupied; the Turks have stationed there an enlightened Kaimerkhan (subgovernor); government offices and shops have been built; wells have been cleared, and there is now an abundant water supply pumped even to the separate houses. Robinson (BW, XVII, 247 ff) has described how he found seven ancient wells there—probably still more will yet be found. The whole neighborhood is strewn with the ruins of the Byzantine city which once flourished there; it was an episcopal see. It is probable that the city of OT times stood where Tell es Seba' now is, some 2½ miles to the E.; from the summit a commanding view can be obtained (PEF, III, 394, Sheet XXIV).

BEETLE, bē't'l (RV CRICKET; חֲרָגֹל, hargōl; see LOCUST): This name occurs only in Lev 11 22 as one of four winged jumping insects (shereḡ hā-ōph) which may be eaten. It certainly is not a beetle and is probably not a cricket. Probably all four are names of locusts, of which more than 30 species have been described from Syria and Pal, and for which there are at least 8 Arab. names in use, though with little distinction of species. Closely allied to hargōl are the Arab. harjalet, a troop of horses or a flight of locusts, from harjal, "to gallop," and harjawān, "a wingless locust."

BEEVES, bēvs (Lev 22 21 AV). See CATTLE.

BEFORE, bē-fōr': The tr of a great variety of Heb and Gr words. "Haran died b. [ERV "in the presence of," lit. "before the face of"] his father Terah" (Gen 11 28). To be "before" God is to enjoy His favor (Ps 31 22). "The Syrians before" (Isa 9 12 RVm "on the east," as "behind," owing to the position of Canaan, relative to Syria, implies the west).

BEG, BEGGAR, BEGGING: It is significant that the Mosaic law contains no enactment concerning

1. No Law Concerning Beggars or Begging in Israel beggars, or begging, though it makes ample provision for the relief and care of "the poor in the land." Bib. Heb seems to have no term for professional begging, the nearest approach to it being the expressions "to ask (or seek) bread" and "to wander." This omission certainly is not accidental; it comports with the very nature of the Mosaic law, the spirit of which is breathed in this, among other kindred provisions, that a poor Hebrew who even sold himself for debt to his wealthy brother was allowed to serve him only until the Jubilee (see JUBILEE), and his master was forbidden to treat him as a slave (Lev 25 39). These laws, as far as actually practised, have always virtually done away with beggars and begging among the Jews.

Begging, however, came to be known to the Jews in the course of time with the development of

2. Begging Not Un-known to the Ancient Jews among themselves, or among neighboring or intermingling peoples, as may be inferred from Ps 59 15; cf 109 10, where Jeh is besought that the children of the wicked may be cursed with beggary, in contra-distinction to the children of the righteous, who have never had to ask bread (Ps 37 25, "I have been young, and now am old; yet have I not seen the righteous forsaken, nor his seed asking [EV "begging"] bread." For the Heb expression corresponding to "begging" see Ps 59 15, "They shall wander up and down for food"; and cf Ps 119 10, "Let me not wander," etc.

The first clear denunciation of beggary and alms-taking in Jewish lit. is found in Eccus (Sirach)

3. Begging and Alms-taking Denounced in Jewish Literature 40 28-30, where the Heb for "begging" is to "wander," etc., as in Ps 59 15, according to the ed of Cowley and Neubauer, Oxford, 1897. There as well as in Tobit, and in the NT, where beggars are specifically mentioned, the word eleēmosinē has assumed the special sense of alms given to the begging poor (cf Tob 4 7.16.17; 12 8-11; Eccus [Sir] 3 14.30; 7 10; 16 14; Mt 6 2-4; 20 30-34; Mk 10 46-52; Lk 11 41; 12 33; Jn 9 1-41; Acts 9 36; 10 2.4.31; 24 17).

Jerusalem Beggars.

As to professional beggars, originally, certainly, and for a long time, they were a despised class

4. Professional Beggars a Despised Class among the Hebrews; and the Jewish communities are forbidden to support them from the general charity fund (BB, 9a; Yōreh De'āh, 250, 3). But the spirit of the law is evinced again in that it is likewise forbidden to drive a beggar away without an alms (ho-Yād ha-Hāzākāh, l.c. 7 7).

Begging was well known and beggars formed a considerable class in the gospel age. Proof of this is found in the references to almsgiving 5. In the Gospel Age in the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5-7 and parallels), and in the accounts of beggars in connection with public places, e.g. the entrance to Jericho (Mt 20 30 and parallels), which was a gateway to pilgrims going up to Jerus to the great festivals and in the neighborhood of rich men's houses (Lk 16 20), and esp. the gates of the Temple at Jerus (Acts 3 2). This prevalence of begging was due largely to the want of any adequate system of ministering relief, to the lack of any true medical science and the resulting ignorance of remedies for common diseases like ophthalmia, for instance, and to the impoverishment of the land under the excessive taxation of the Rom government (Hausrath, Hist of NT Times, I, 188 [Eng. tr Williams and Norgate], cf Edersheim, L and T of Jesus, II, 178). That begging was looked down upon is incidentally evidenced by the remark of the unjust steward, "To beg I am ashamed" (Lk 16 3); and that, when associated with indolence, it was strongly condemned by public opinion appears from Sir (40 28-30).

The words used for "beg," "beggar" of EV in the NT differ radically in idea: in those formed from aitēs (Mk 10 46; Lk 16 3; 18 35; Jn 9 8 RV) the root idea is that of "asking," while ptōchós (Lk 16 20.22) suggests the cringing or crouching of a beggar. But see Mt 5 3 where the word for "humble" is ptōchos.

A marked change has come over Jewish life in modern times, in this as well as in other respects.

6. A

Change in Modern Times

Since the 17th cent. the Jewish poor in many parts of the world have made it a practice, esp. on Fridays and on the eves of certain festivals, to go systematically from house to house asking alms. In parts of Europe today it is a full-grown abuse: crowds of Jewish beggars push their way and ply their trade about the synagogue doors (Abrahams, EB, art. "Alms," 310). So the Jewish beggar, in spite of the spirit of the law and ancient Jewish custom, has, under modern conditions too well known to require explanation here, become a troublesome figure and problem in modern Jewish society. For such beggars and begging, see Jew Enc, arts. "Schnorrers," "Alms," etc. and for another kind of begging among modern Jews, and collections for poverty-stricken Jewish settlers in Pal, see arts. "Ḥalukah," "Charity," etc.

BEGGARLY, beg'er-li (πρωχός, ptōchós): The word has the thought of "to crouch" or "cringe," such as is common with professional beggars. It is used in Mt 5 3 and Gal 4 9, and in both cases means complete spiritual destitution. As used in Gal it expresses the contrast between their present condition and the former estate, toward which he says they are again tending. Paul has in mind both the Jewish and heathen systems of religion with all their outward show. He therefore here emphasizes the immeasurable superiority of the riches and liberty in Christ. He further expresses this same thought of the law in Rom 8 3 and He 7 18. In view of the wretchedness of the condition indicated by the word "beggarly," he states his astonishment that they should so little appreciate the liberty and riches which they now enjoy as even to think of going back to the former condition.

JACOB W. KAPP

BEGIN, bê-gin': To make the first movement toward a given end (בָּרַךְ, halal; ἀρχομαι, archomai). Those who interpret it in many passages pleonastically mean by this, that in such passages as "began to teach" or "began to speak," nothing more is intended than to express vividly and graphically the thought of the dependent infinitive. Mt 4 17; Lk 3 23; Acts 1 1 are so understood. For contrary opinion, see Thayer's Lexicon and Winer's Grammar of NT Greek.

The noun, ἀρχή, archē, "beginning," in the writings of John, is used sometimes in an abstract sense, to designate a previous stage (Jn 1 1.2; 8 25; 1 Jn 1 1; 3 8) and, sometimes, the Source or First Cause (Rev 3 14; 21 6; 22 13). Often used also, not for the absolute beginning, but, relatively, for the starting-point of some important movement (1 Jn 2 7.24; Acts 11 15; Phil 4 15).

H. E. JACOBS

BEGINNING, bê-gin'ing (ἀρχή, archē): The natural meaning of the word is with reference to time. The primitive Gr root means "to be long," "to draw out." Thus it is used to refer to some point of time long drawn out, or long past (Gen 1 1). It is used also to express the inauguration of a particular event (Ex 12 2). The principal interest in the word centers in the use of it in Jn 1 1. It must be interpreted here by that which follows in the statement as to the relation of the Logos to the Eternal God and the use of the word "was." It is true that the word archē cannot be separated from the idea of time, but when time began He already was, and therefore He was from eternity. See TIME; ETERNITY.

Figurative: In a fig. sense it is used of that which is most excellent, the chief part (Prov 1 7); of the most eminent person (Col 1 18); the author (Rev 3 14). JACOB W. KAPP

BEGOTTEN, bê-got'n (ἔγεννη, yēladh; "to bear," "bring forth," "beget"; denotes the physical relation of either parent to a child, Gen 3 16; 4 18): Used metaphorically of God's relation to Israel (Dt 32 18) and to the Messianic king (Ps 2 7); (γεννάω, gennāō, "to beget," or "bear"): generally used of a father (Mt 1 1–16); more rarely of a mother (Lk 1 13.57); used metaphorically of causing or engendering moral and spiritual relations and states (1 Cor 4 15; Philem 10); of the new birth of the Holy Spirit (Jn 3 3ff). Men who obey and love God as sons are begotten of Him (Jn 1 13; 1 Jn 2 29; 3 9; 4 7; 5 1.4.18; cf 1 Pet 1 23). Used esp. of God's act in making Christ His Son: "Thou art my Son; this day have I begotten thee" (Ps 2 7) quoted in Acts (13 33) in reference to His resurrection (cf Rom 1 4). The same passage is cited (He 1 5) as proving Christ's filial dignity, transcending the angels in that "he hath inherited a more excellent name than they," i.e. the name of son; and again (He 5 5) of God conferring upon Christ the glory of the priestly office.

Commentators differ as to whether the act of begetting the Son in these two passages is (a) the eternal generation, or (b) the incarnation in time, or (c) the resurrection and ascension. The immediate context of 1 5 (see 1 3) seems to favor the last view (Westcott). The first view would not be foreign to the author's thought: with 5 5 of 6 20, "a high priest forever" (Alford). The author of He thinks of the eternal and essential sonship of Christ as realized in history in His ascension to the "right hand of the Majesty" (1 3). And what is emphatic is the fact and status of sonship, rather than the time of begetting. T. REES

BEGUILE, bê-gil': In 2 Pet 2 14 AV (cf Jas 1 14) the word δολέζω, deleázō, is tr^d "beguile," and means particularly to "entice," "catch by bait." Doubtless Peter got this idea from his old business of fishing, baiting the hook to beguile the fish. In Rom 7 11; 16 18; 1 Cor 3 18 the word is ἐξαπατάω, exapatāō, and means "to cheat" or "to thoroughly deceive." The thought is to be so completely deceived as to accept falsehood for the truth, believing it to be the truth. In Col 2 4.18 AV; Jas 1 22 the word is παραλογίζομαι, paralogizomai, and means "to miscalculate," "to be imposed upon." It refers particularly to being beguiled by mere probability. See DECEIT; DELUSION.

JACOB W. KAPP

BEHALF, bê-hāf': "On the part of" (Ex 27 21, i.e. so far as it affects them); "on the side of" (Job 36 2). For huper, "over," in the sense of furnishing assistance, as in 2 Cor 5 20, "in the interest of Christ" (ver 21); "for our good," "in his cause" (Phil 1 29); also, often in 2 Cor, in general sense of "concerning" (5 12; 7 4; 8 24; 9 2; 12 5). Huper does not of itself indicate substitution, although one who shelters ["is over"] another, suffers "in his stead" (AV 2 Cor 5 20), as well as "in his behalf."

BEHAVIOR, bê-hāv'yēr (οἶστρον, ta'am, "taste," "flavor," hence "intellectual taste," i.e. judgment, reason, understanding): Of significance as referring to David's feigning madness before Achish, king of Gath, being "sore afraid." Gesenius renders it "changed his understanding," i.e. his mental behavior and outward manner (1 S 21 13, and title to Ps 34).

Twice used in the NT (AV) of the well-ordered life of the Christian (κόσμος, kósmios, "well-arranged," "modest," i.e. living with decorum: 1 Tim 3 2), defining the blameless life expected of a minister (overseer), "A bishop must be . . . of good behavior," RV "orderly" (καρδότημα, kardôtēma, "demeanor," "deportment"), including, according to Dean Alford, "gesture and habit" as the outward expression of a reverent spirit (1 Pet 3 1.2). "Aged women . . . in behavior as becometh holiness" (Tit 2 3; RV "reverent in demeanor").

BEHEADING, bē-hed'ing. See PUNISHMENTS.

BEHEMOTH, bē'hē-moth, bē-hē'moth (בְּהֵמוֹת, b'hemōth: Job 40 15): Apparently the pl. of b'hēmāh, "a beast," used of domestic or wild animals. The same form, b'hēmōth, occurs in other passages, e.g. Dt 28 26; 32 24; Isa 18 6; Hab 2 17, where it is not rendered "behemoth" but "beasts." According to some, the word b'hēmōth, occurring in Job 40 15, is not a Heb word, the pl. of b'hēmāh, but a word of Egyp origin signifying "water ox." This etymology is denied by Cheyne and others. The word has by various writers been understood to mean rhinoceros and elephant, but the description (Job 40 15-24) applies on the whole very well to the hippopotamus (Hippopotamus amphibius) which inhabits the Nile and other rivers of Africa. Esp. applicable are the references to its great size, its eating grass, the difficulty with which weapons penetrate its hide, and its frequenting of streams.

"He lieth under the lotus-trees,
In the covert of the reed, and the fen.
The lotus-trees cover him with their shade;
The willows of the brook compass him about."

The remains of a fossil hippopotamus of apparently the same species are found over most of Europe, so that it may have inhabited Pal in early historical times, although we have no record of it. There is a smaller living species in west Africa, and there are several other fossil species in Europe and India. The remains of Hippopotamus minutus have been found in enormous quantities in caves in Malta and Sicily.

For an elaborate explanation of behemoth and leviathan (q.v.) as mythical creatures, see Cheyne, EB, s.v.

BEHOLDING, bē-hōld'ing: Many Heb and Gr words are so rendered in EV, but ἐποπτεύσαντες, epopteúsantes, "your good works, which they behold" (1 Pet 2 12); "beholding your chaste behavior" (3 2), and ἐπόπται, epóptai, "We were eyewitnesses of his majesty" (2 Pet 1 16) are peculiar to Peter. The fact that this word is used only by Peter and is used in both epistles is an argument for identity of authorship. The word epóptēs denotes one who had been initiated into the innermost secrets of his faith and who enjoyed the highest religious privileges; but now in contradiction to the secrecy of all pagan "mysteries" (Eleusinian, etc) the apostles would share with all the faithful every spiritual vision which they enjoyed ("we made known unto you").

In 2 Cor 3 18, for κατοπτριζόμενοι, katoptrizómenoi, the ERV gives "reflecting (as a mirror) the glory of the Lord," ARV "beholding (as in a mirror," etc). Katoptron was a mirror of polished metal. We cannot clearly and fully behold the outshining of spiritual grandeur in Christ Jesus, but in the gospel God accommodates and adjusts the vision as we are able to bear it, and the glory beheld becomes glory imparted to (and reflected by) the beholder.

John's Gospel gives us θεόωπαί, theóomai ("to look closely at"), and θεωπέω, theōréō ("to discern"). "We beheld [etheasámetha] his glory" (Jn 1 14), "that they may behold [theōrōsin] my glory" (17 24). In classic lit., the former word is closely associated with theatrical spectacles, and the latter with athletic games, and they both convey the idea of unceasing interest, deepening in this connection into love and joy.

M. O. EVANS

BEHOOVE, bē-hōōv': Used in the NT for two Gr words dei (Lk 24 26; Acts 17 3) and opheilō (He 2 17); the former referring to a physical, and the latter to a moral, necessity (Bengel on, 1 Cor 11 10). The former means "must," that is, it is required by the order which God has ordained; the latter, "ought," that is, it is required as a debt.

BEIRUT, bā'rōōt'. See BERYTUS.

BEKA, bē'kā (בֶּכָּה, beka', "half"): Half a shekel, the amount contributed by each male of the Israelites for the use of the Sanctuary (Ex 38 26). Its value varied according to the standard used, but on the ordinary, or Phoen, standard it would represent about 122 grains. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

BEL, bel, bāl (בֶּל, bāl): Appellative name of a Bab god (cf BAAL), in the OT and Apoc identified with Marduk or Merodach, the tutelary deity of Babylon (cf Isa 46 1; Jer 51 44; Bar 6 41). See BABYLONIA AND ASSYRIA, THE RELIGION OF.

BEL AND THE DRAGON. See DANIEL, BOOK OF, X.

BEL, bel, bāl, AND THE DRAGON, drag'un (Gr words: δράκων, drákōn, "dragon," "serpent"; ἐκτός, ektós, "except"; ὥρασις, hōrasis, "vision," "prophecy"; ὄφίς, óphis, "serpent"; σφραγισάμενος, sphragisámenos, "having sealed"; χωρίς, chōrís, "except," Heb or Aram. words: חָתָם, hātham, "to seal"; זֶפֶת, zēphā, "pitch"; זֶפֶת, zā'āphā, "storm," "wind"; נָחָשׁ, nāhāsh, "snake"; תַּנְיִן, tannīn, "serpent," "sea monster"):

- VII. AUTHOR, PLACE AND DATE OF COMPOSITION

Probably not in Babylon; perhaps the Heb text originated in Pal about 146 BC or later. The LXX version produced in Egypt about 100 BC, which may be the date and language of the Book. Ⓞ (Theodotion's version) was produced probably at Ephesus about 180 AD

VIII. CANONICITY AND AUTHENTICITY
Accepted as canonical by the Jews of Egypt but rejected by the Jews of Pal. Accepted as part of the Bible by Gr and Lat church Fathers, by the Council of Trent and therefore by the Rom church; denied by Protestants to be canonical

LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—Bel and the Dragon is the third of the three Apocryphal additions to Daniel, The SONG OF THE THREE CHILDREN and SUSANNA (q.v.) being the other two. In the Gr and Lat VSS (see below, "IV. Textual Authorities") these "additions" form an integral part of the canonical Book of Dnl, and they are recognized as such and therefore as themselves canonical by the Council of Trent. But the Song of the Three Children is the only piece having a necessary connection with the Heb canonical Book of Dnl; in the Gr and Lat texts it follows Dnl 3 24. The other two are appended and appear to have an origin independent of the book to which they are appended and also of each other, though in all three as also in the Heb Book of Dnl the name and fame of Daniel stand out prominently.

II. Name.—Since in the Gr and Lat recensions or VSS Bel forms a portion of the Book of Dnl it does not bear a special name. But in the only two known MSS of the LXX in Syro-Hexaplar (see below, "IV. Textual Authorities") these words stand at the head of the "addition" now under consideration: "From [or 'a part of'] the prophecy of Habakkuk son of Joshua of the tribe of Levi." That the Bib. writing prophet of that name is meant is beyond question. In Θ this fact is distinctly stated (see ver 33); and it is equally beyond question that these tales could never have come from the prophet so called (see below "VIII. Canonicity and Authenticity").

In codd. A and B of Θ the title is: Horasis 12, i.e. ch 12 of Dnl, canonical Dnl being comprised in 11 chs. In the Vulg, Bel forms ch 14, but, as in the case of the earlier chs, it has no heading.

In the Syr Pesh (W) the story of Bel is preceded by "Bel the idol," and that of the Dragon by "Then follows the Dragon." Bel and the Dragon is the title in all Protestant VSS of the Apocrypha, which rigidly keep the latter separate from the books of the Heb canon.

III. Contents.—The stories of Bel and of the Dragon have a separate origin and existed apart; they are brought together because they both agree in holding up idolatry to ridicule and in encouraging Jewish believers to be true to their religion. The glorification of Daniel is also another point in which both agree, though while the Daniel of the Bel story appears as a shrewd judge corresponding to the etymology of that name, he of the Dragon story is but a fearless puritan who will die rather than be faithless to his religion.

It is evident however that the editor of the "additions" has fused both stories into one, making the Dragon story depend on that which precedes (see vs 23 f). It seems very likely that, in a Nestorian list mentioned by Churton (Uncanonical and Apocryphal Scriptures, 391), Bel and the Dragon is comprised under the title, The Little Daniel.

The two stories as told in common by LXX and Θ may be thus summarized:

There is in Babylon an image of Bel which Daniel refuses to worship, though no form of worship is mentioned except that of supplying the god with food. The king (Cyrus) according to Θ) remonstrates with the delinquent Hebrew, pointing out to him the immense amount of food consumed daily by Bel, who thus proves himself to be a living god. Daniel, doubting the king's statement as to the food, asks to be allowed to test the alleged fact.

His request being granted, he is shown by expressed desire the lectisternia, the sacred tables being covered by food which the god is to consume during the night. The doors are all sealed by arrangement, and after the priests have departed Daniel has the temple floor strewn with light ashes. When the morning breaks it is found that the doors are still sealed, but the food has disappeared. Upon examination the tracks of bare feet are found on the ash-strewn floor, showing that the priests have entered the temple by a secret way and removed the food. Angered by the trick played on him the king has the priests put to death and the image destroyed.

The word Bel, a short form of Baal, occurs in the OT in Isa 46 1; Jer 50 2; 51 44, where it stands for Merodach or Marduk, chief of the Bab deities. Originally however it denotes any one of the Bab local deities, and esp. the principal deity worshipped at Nippur (for similar use of the Heb "Baal" see art. on this word). In Θ Cyrus appears as an abettor of Bel-worship, which is quite in accordance with the practice of the early Pers kings to show favor to the worship of the countries they conquered. See Century Bible, "Ezr, Neh and Est," 40.

There is in Babylon a great live dragon worshipped by a large number of the inhabitants, who lavishly feed it. In the present case the god is or is represented by a living creature which can be fed, and, indeed, needs feeding. Daniel refuses to bow down before the dragon and makes an offer to the king to kill it. Believing the god well able to care for himself, the king accepts Daniel's challenge. Daniel makes a mixture of which pitch forms the principal ingredient and thrusts it down the dragon's throat, so that "it bursts asunder and dies." The people are infuriated at the death of their god and demand that the king shall have the god-murderer put to death, a demand to which the royal master yields by having Daniel cast into a den of lions, as was done to other culprits found guilty of capital charges. But though the prophet remained in the company of 7 lions for 6 days he suffered no injury. On the last day when Daniel, without food, was naturally hungry, a miracle was performed by way of supplying him with food. Habakkuk (see above, "II. Name"), when cooking food for his reapers, heard an angel's voice commanding him to carry the food he had prepared to Daniel in the lions' den in Babylon. Upon his replying that he did not know where the den, or even Babylon, was, the angel laid hold of his hair and by it carried the prophet to the very part of the den where Daniel was. Having handed the latter the meal intended for the reapers, he was safely brought back by the angel to his own home. It would seem that Habakkuk was protected from the lions as well as Daniel. Seeing all this the king worshipped God, set Daniel free, and in his stead cast his accusers into the lions' den, where they were instantly devoured.

Zöckler in his commentary (p. 215) speaks of the "fluidity" of the Dragon myth, and he has been followed by Marshall and Daubney. But what in reality does the Gr word drakōn, rendered "dragon," mean? In the LXX the word is used generally (15 times) to translate the Heb tannin which denotes a serpent or sea monster. It is this word (tannin) which in the Aram. version of the Dragon story translates the Gr drakōn. Now in Ex 4 3 and 7 9 the Heb tannin and nāhāsh ("serpent") seem identified as are the Gr drakōn and ophis in Rev 12 9. We may therefore take drakōn in the present story to stand for a serpent. We know that in Babylon the god Nina was worshipped in the form of a serpent (see Sayce, Hibbert Lectures, 281 f), and it is more probable that it is the worship of this god or of some other serpent deity that is here meant, than that there is any allusion to the Bab story according to which Marduk the supreme deity of Babylon engaged in a conflict with Tiamat the monster—foe to light and order. (1) The dragon of the present story is a god and not as Tiamat, a kind of devil, and a male, not a female. (2) The dragon in the present story is a serpent, which is not true of Tiamat. (3) Apsu (male) and Tiamat (female) are Bab deities who give birth to the gods of heaven; these gods subsequently led by their mother Tiamat engaged in a fierce contest with Marduk.

Since Gunkel published his book, Schöpfung und Chaos (1895), it has been the fashion to see reflections of the Marduk-Tiamat conflict throughout the OT. But recent investigations tend to show that Bab mythology has not dominated Heb thought to the extent that was formerly thought, and with this statement Gunkel himself now agrees, as the last ed of his commentary on Genesis proves.

IV. Textual Authorities.—

(1) Greek.—There exist in Gr two forms of the text (see below). (a) The LXX text has been preserved in but one original MS, the cod.

1. Manuscripts

Christianus (from the Chigi family who owned it, published in Rome in 1772). This belongs to about the 9th cent. This text has been printed also in Cozza's Sacrorum Bibliorum vetustissima fragmenta Graeca et Latina, part iii, Romae, 1877, and in Swete's ed of the LXX side by side with Θ . In Tischendorf's LXX it occurs at the close of the ordinary text of the LXX. (b) Of Θ (the text of Theodotion) we have the following important MSS: B, A, Q (cod Marchalianus), Γ (vs 1.2-4 only) and Δ (from ver 21 to ver 41).

(2) Syriac.—There exists in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, a MS of the 8th cent. of the Syro-Hexaplar version made by Paul of Tella in 617 AD at Alexandria from col vi (LXX) of Origen's Hexapla. This most valuable MS has been edited and published by Ceriani.

(1) Greek.—(a) The LXX: Of this we have but one MS (see above under "Manuscripts") and until its publication at Rome in 1772 what is now known as Θ was believed to be the real LXX version, notwithstanding hints to the contrary by early Christian writers. (b) Θ , or the version of Theodotion: This version appears to be a revision of the LXX, with the help, perhaps, as in the case of the canonical Daniel, of a Heb (or Aram.) original, now lost. It is much less pedantic than Aquila's Gr tr which preceded it, and its Gr is better. It is also a better tr than the LXX; yet it has many transliterations of Heb words instead of trs. This version of Daniel displaced that of the LXX at a very early time, for though Origen gave place to the LXX in his Hexapla, in his writings he almost always cites from Θ . In his preface to Daniel Jerome points to the fact that in his own time the church had rejected the LXX in favor of Θ , mentioning the defectiveness of the former as the ground. Even Irenaeus (d. 202) and Porphyry (d. 305) preferred Θ to the LXX. Field was the first to point out that it is the work of Theodotion (not the LXX) that we have in 1 Esd, etc.

(2) Syriac.—In addition to the Syro-Hexaplar version (see above, under "Manuscripts") the Pesh version must be noted. It follows Θ closely, and is printed in Walton's Polyglot (in one recension only of Bel and the Dragon) and in a revised text edited by Lagarde in 1861; not as R. H. Charles (Enc Brit, VII, 807) erroneously says in The Book of Tobit by Neubauer.

(3) Latin.—(a) The old Lat version, which rests on Θ , fragments of which occur in Sabatier's work, Bibliorum sacrorum Latinae versiones antiquae (1743, etc, II). (b) The Vulg, which follows Jerome's tr, is also based on Θ , and follows it closely.

(4) Aramaic.—For the Aram. version published by M. Gaster and claimed to be the text of the book as first written, see below, "V. Original Language."

V. Original Language.—It has been until recent years most generally maintained that Bel and the Dragon was composed and first edited in the Gr language. So Eichhorn, de Wette, Schrader, Fritzsche, Schürer and König. In favor of this the following reasons have been given: (1) No Sem original with reasonable claims has been discovered. Origen, Eusebius and Jerome distinctly say that no Heb (or Aram.) form of this tract existed or was known in their time. (2) The Hebraisms with which this work undoubtedly abounds are no more numerous or more crucial than can be found in works by Jewish authors which are known to have been composed in the Gr language, such as the continual recurrence of kai (= "and"), kai eipe ("and he said"), etc.

On the other hand, the opinion has been growing among recent scholars that this work was written first of all either in Heb or Aram. Some of the grounds are the following: (1) It is known that Theodotion in making his tr of other parts of the OT (Dnl) endeavored to correct the LXX with the aid of the MT. A comparison of the LXX and of Θ of Bel and the Dragon reveal differences of a similar character. How can we account for them unless we assume that Theodotion had before him a Sem original? A very weak argument, however, for the translator might have corrected on a priori principles, using his own judgment; or there might well have been in his time different recensions of the LXX. Westcott (DB, I, 397a; 2d ed, 714a) holds that some of Θ 's changes are due to a desire to give consistency to the facts. (2) Much has been made of the Semiticisms in the work, and it must be admitted that they are numerous and striking. But are these Hebraisms or Aramaisms? The commonest and most undoubted Semiticism is the repeated use of kai and kai egeneto with the force of the waw-consecutive and only to be explained and understood in the light of that construction. But the waw-consecutive exists only in classical Heb; Aram. and post-Bib. Heb, including late parts of the OT (parts of Eccl, etc), know nothing of it. It must be assumed then that if the Semiticisms of this work imply a Sem original, that original was Heb, not Aram.

The following Hebraisms found in the LXX and in Θ may briefly be noted: (1) The use of the Gr kai with all the varied meanings of the waw-consecutive (see below, under "VI. Teaching"). The beginning of a sentence with kai en ("and there was") (vs 1.3 in LXX; 2 f, etc, in Θ) agrees with the Heb waw-consecutive construction, but makes poor Gr. In ver 15 kai egeneto can be understood only in the light of the Heb for which it stands. (2) The syntactical feature called parataxy (coördination) presents itself throughout the Gr of this piece, and it has been reproduced in the Eng. trs (AV, RV) as any Eng. reader can see. In the classical languages it is hypotaxy that prevails. If, as seems likely, those responsible for LXX and Θ followed a Heb original, they failed to make sufficient allowance for the peculiar force of the waw-consecutive idiom, for this does not involve hypotaxy to any considerable extent. (3) The constant occurrence of Kúrios ("Lord") without the art. implies the Heb Yahwe; and the phrase the "Lord God" is also Heb. (4) There are difficulties and differences best explained by assuming a Heb. origin. The Gr. word sphragisamenos has no sense in ver. 14 (LXX) for, retaining it, we should read of a sealing of the temple (of Bel) and also of a sealing with signet rings of the doors. The Heb. word "shut" (šātham) is written much like that for "seal" (hātham), and was probably, as Marshall suggests, mistaken for the latter. The temple was "shut" and the doors "sealed." In ver. 10 the LXX (choris) and Θ (ektós) have 2 words of similar sense, which are best explained as independent renderings of one Heb. word.

Marshall, identifying this dragon story with the Bab. creation-myth of Marduk and Tiamat, thinks that instead of "pitch" used in making the obolus with which Daniel destroyed the dragon, the original Aram. document has "storm wind," the two words being in Aram. written much alike (zā'āphā = "storm wind," and zēphā = pitch). But the fact is quite overlooked that the obolus contained not only pitch, but also "fat" and "hair" (see ver. 27). Besides, in the Aram. version, published by Gaster, to which Marshall attaches great importance as at least a real source, we have four ingredients, viz. pitch (zēphā), fat, flax (kittān) and hair. Dr. Marshall's suggestion involves therefore not only the confusion of two words spelled differently in Aram., but the substitution of 3 or 4 terms for one in the original draft. Moreover in Bel and the Dragon the several ingredients are made up into a cake with which the dragon was gorged. Dr. Marshall's view assumes also an Aram. original which is against the evidence. But the suggestion would not have been made but for a desire to assimilate the dragon story to the Bab. creation-myth, though in motive and details both differ so essentially.

In favor of a Sem. original many writers have cited the fact that forms of the story have been found in Heb. and Aram. In the 13th cent. Raymond Martini in his Pugio Fidei (written against the Jews) quotes Bel and the Dragon from a Heb. Midr. on Gen. which Neubauer discovered and which is almost verbatim identical with the unique MS. containing Midr. Rabba de Rabba (see Neubauer, Tobit, viii, and Franz Delitzsch, de Habacuci, 82). Still other Heb. forms of these stories have been found. All the "additions" to Dnl. "occur in Heb. in the remains of Yosippon," the "Heb. Josephus," as he has been called. He wrote in the 10th cent.

But most important of all is the discovery by Dr. M. Gaster of the dragon story in Aram., imbedded in the Chronicles of Yerahmeel, a work of the 10th cent. Dr. Gaster maintains that in this Aram. fragment we have a portion of the original Bel and the Dragon (see PSBA, 1894, 280 ff [Intro.], 312 [Text] and 1895 [for notes and tr.]). The present writer does not think Dr. Gaster has made out his case. (1) If such an Aram. original did really exist at any time we should have learned something definite about it from early writers, Jewish and Christian. (2) Dr. Gaster has discovered an Aram. form of only two of the three "additions," those of the Song of the Three Children and of the dragon story. What of the rest of the Aram. document? (3) It has already been pointed out that the waw-consecutive constructions implied in the Gr. texts go back to a Heb., not an Aram. original. (4) The Aram. text of the Dragon story not seldom differs both from the LXX and Θ as in the following and many other cases: The two Gr. VSS have in ver. 24 "The king [said]," which the Aram. omits; in ver. 35 the Aram. after "And Habakkuk said" adds "to the angel," which the LXX and Θ are without. (5) The compiler of the Yerahmeel Chronicle says distinctly that he had taken the Song of the Three Children and the dragon story from the writings of Theodotion (see PSBA, 1895, 283), he having, it is quite evident, himself put them into Aram. Dr. Gaster lays stress on the words of the compiler, that what he gives in Aram. is that which "Theodotion found" (loc. cit.). But the reference can be only to the LXX which this translator made the basis of his own version; it is far too much to assume that the Chronicler means an Aram. form of the stories.

VI. Teaching.—The two stories teach the doctrine of the oneness and absoluteness of Yahwe, called throughout Kúrios ("Lord"), a lit. rendering of the Heb. word 'ādhōnāi ("Lord") which the Jews substituted for Yahwe in reading the Heb. as do now-a-days Jews. In the Gr. and Lat. VSS it is the word read (the K'rē perpetuum), not that written K'thibh, which is trd. It would have been more consonant with universal practice if the proper name Yahwe had been transliterated as proper names usually are.

But very little is said of the character of Yahwe. He is great and the only (true) God (ver. 41), the living God in contrast with Bel (ver. 57). Of the nature of His demands on His worshippers, ritualistic and ethical, nothing is said. There is no reference to any distinctly Jewish beliefs or practices; nothing about the tōrah or about any Divine revelation to men, about sacrifice or the temple or even a priesthood, except that in the LXX (not in Θ) Daniel the prophet is spoken of as a priest—strong evidence of the low place assigned by the writer to the external side of the religion he professed. We do however find mention of an angel, a sort of deus ex machina in the Dragon story (vs. 34 ff); cf. Dnl. 6.22.

The incident of the transportation of Habakkuk to Babylon shows that the writer had strong faith in supernatural intervention on behalf of the pious. Apart from this incident the two stories steer fairly clear of anything that is supernatural. But vs. 33-39 are a late interpolation.

VII. Author, Place and Date of Composition.—

Nothing whatever is known of the author of the book and nothing definite or certain of the place or date of composition. It has been commonly felt, as by Bissell, etc., that it reflects a Bab. origin. Clay (see ver. 7) abounded in Babylon (but surely not only in Babylon); bronze (ver. 7) was often used in that country for the manufacturing of images, and the lion, it is known, was native to the country (but that was the case also in Pal. in Bib. and even post-Bib. times). None of the arguments for a Bab. origin have much weight, and there are contrary arguments of considerable force.

The anachronisms and inconsistencies are more easily explained on the assumption of a non-Bab. origin. Besides, the Judaism of Babylon was of a very strict and regulation kind, great attention being given to the law and to matters of ritual. There is nothing in Bel and the Dragon regarding these points (see above under "Teaching").

If we assume a Heb. original, as there are good grounds for doing, it is quite possible that these legends were written in Pal. at a time when the Jewish religion was severely persecuted: perhaps when Antiochus VII (Sidetes, 139-128 BC) reconquered Judah for Syria and sorely oppressed the subject people. Yet nothing very dogmatic can be said as to this. We cannot infer much from the style of the Heb. (or Aram.?), since no Sem. original has come down to us. It is quite clear that these "additions" imply the existence of the canonical Book of Dnl. and belong to a subsequent date, for they contain later developments of traditions respecting Daniel. The canonical Book of Dnl. is dated by modern scholars about 160 BC, so that a date about 135 BC (see above) could not be far amiss.

If, on the other hand, we take for granted that the LXX is the original text of the book, the date of that recension is the date of the work itself. It seems probable that this recension of Dnl was made in Egypt about 150 BC (see 1 Macc 1 54; 2 59), and we have evidence that up to that date the "three additions" formed no part of the book, though they exist in all Gr and Syr MSS of Dnl, which have come down to us. Probably the "additions" existed as separate compositions for some time before they were joined to Dnl proper, but it is hardly too much to assume that they were united no later than 100 BC. Yet the data for reaching a conclusion are very slight. It may be added that the Gr of the LXX is distinctly Alex in its character, as Westcott, Bissell and others have pointed out. Theodotion's version is supposed to have been made at Ephesus toward the end of the 2d cent. AD.

VIII. Canonicity and Authenticity.—The Alex Jews, recognizing the LXX as their Bible, accepted the whole of the Apoc as canonical. The Pal Jews, on the other hand, limited their canonical Scriptures to the Heb OT. There is, of course, some uncertainty (largely no doubt because it was originally a tr from the Heb) as to whether the LXX at the first included the Apoc in its whole extent or not, but all the evidence points to the fact that it did, though individual books like Dnl existed apart before they formed a portion of the Gr or Egypt canon.

In the early Christian church all the three "additions" are quoted as integral parts of Dnl by Gr and by Lat Fathers, as e.g. by Irenaeus (IV, 5, 2 f); Tertullian (De idololatria, c.18); Cyprian (Ad fortunatum, c.11).

By a decree of the Council of Trent these "additions" were for the Rom church made as much a part of the Bible canon as the Heb Book of Dnl. Protestant churches have as a rule excluded the whole of the Apoc from their Bibles, regarding its books as either "Deutero-canonical" or "non-canonical." In consequence of this attitude among Protestants the Apoc has until lately been greatly neglected by Protestant writers. But a great change is setting in, and some of the best commentaries by Protestant scholars produced in recent years deal with the Apoc and its teaching.

Julius Africanus (fl. first half of 3d cent. AD) was the first to impugn the truth of the stories embodied in the "additions" to Daniel. This he did in a letter to Origen to which the recipient vigorously replied.

The improbabilities and contradictions of these three pieces have often been pointed out from the time of Julius Africanus down to the present day. The following points may be set down as specimens: (1) Daniel is called a priest in the LXX (ver 1), and yet he is identified with the prophet of that name. (2) Habakkuk the prophet (he is so called in Θ [see ver 33], and no other can be intended) is made to be a contemporary of Daniel and also of the Pers king Cyrus (see vs 1 and 33 in the Eng. Bible). Now Cyrus conquered Babylon in 538 BC, the principal Jews in Babylon returning to Pal the following year. The events narrated in Bel and the Dragon could not have occurred during the time Cyrus was king of Babylon, but the LXX speaks of "the king" without naming him. (3) It was not Cyrus but Xerxes who destroyed the image of Bel, this being in 475 BC (see Herod. i.183; Strabo xvi.1; Arrian, Exped. Alex., vii.1). (4) It is further objected that dragon-worship in Babylon, such as is implied in the dragon story, is contrary to fact. Star-worship, it has been said, did exist, but not animal-worship. So Eichhorn and Fritzsche. But there is every reason for believing that the worship of living animals as representing deity, and esp.

of the living serpent, existed in Babylon as among other nations of antiquity, including the Greeks and Romans (see Herzog, 1st ed, art. "Drache zu Babylon," by J. G. Müller). It has already been pointed out (see list of meanings) that the word "dragon" denotes a serpent.

LITERATURE.—Eichhorn, Einleitung in die apoc. Schriften des Alten Testaments (1795), 431 ff (remarkable for its time: compares the LXX and Θ); W. H. Daubney, The Three Additions to Daniel (Cambridge, 1906; contains much matter though rather uncritically treated); the commentaries of Fritzsche (Vol I: still very rich in material; it forms part of the Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch); Bissell (in Lange's series, but not a tr); Ball, Speaker's Commentary (this is the best Eng. commentary on the Apoc. See also Schürer, Geschichte, III, 333, and his art. in RE, I, 639; and the articles by Kamphausen in EB, I, 1014; Toy, in Jew Enc, II, 650; R. H. BELA, bē'la. See ZOAR.

BELA, BELAH, bē'la (בֵּלָא, bela', "destruction"; AV Belah, Gen 46 21):

(1) B., the son of Beor, was the first king of Edom previous to the kingdom of Israel and reigned in the city of Dinhabah (Gen 36 32 f; 1 Ch 1 43 f). LXX A, Βαλάκ, Balak.

(2) B., the firstborn son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21; 1 Ch 7 6 f; 1 Ch 8 1). He was the head of the family of the Belaites (Nu 26 38), the father of Addar (called Ard, Nu 26 40), Gera, Abihud, Abishua, Naaman, Ahoah, Gera, Shephuphan (cf Shephupham, Nu 26 39), Hiram (1 Ch 8 3-5; Nu 26 40).

(3) B., a son of Azaz, of the tribe of Reuben, was a man of great power and wealth. His possessions reached from Nebo to the Euphrates (1 Ch 5 8 ff).

A. L. BRESLICH

BELAITES, bē'la-its (בְּלֵאִים, bal'z, "belonging to Bela"): The descendants of Bela (Nu 26 38). Cf BELA (2).

BELCH, belsh: The primary idea of this word is "to gush forth" as a fountain. As used in Ps 59 7 the thought is that these enemies had so cherished these evil thoughts and bitter wrath that now the heart is a very fountain of evil, and has taught the tongue how to give utterance thereto. But the previous verse shows that the Psalmist also had in mind the howling and barking of the dogs about the city. The imprecations of his enemies are like the snarling, howling, barking of dogs which in an eastern city makes the night hideous with the noise, and is continued until the daybreak.

JACOB W. KAPP

BELEMUS, bel'ē-mus (Βήλεμος, Bēlemos; Balsamus): An officer of King Artaxerxes in Pal associated with Beeltethmus in hindering the rebuilding of the temple (1 Esd 2 16): called Bishlam in Ezr 4 7.

BELIAL, bē'li-al, bē'yal (בְּלִיָּאֵל, bē'liya'al; Βελίαρ, Beliar): This name, occurring very frequently in the OT, has the sense of "worthlessness" (cf 2 S 23 6m); accordingly in such phrases as "sons of Belial" (Jgs 20 13; 1 S 10 27, etc), "men of Belial" (1 S 30 22; 1 K 21 13, etc), which the ERV usually retains, the ARV more correctly renders, "base fellows" (so "daughter of Belial" 1 S 1 16, "wicked woman"). There is here no suggestion of a proper name. Afterward, however, "Belial" became a proper name for Satan, or for Antichrist (thus frequently in the Jewish Apocalyptic writings, e.g. in XII P, Bk Jub, Asc Isa, Sib Or). In this sense Paul used the word in 2 Cor 6 15, "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" (Beliar). Bousset thinks that Paul's "man of sin" in 2 Thess 2 3, where some authorities read "man of lawlessness," is a tr of this term. The sense at least is similar. See ANTICHRIST; MAN OF SIN. JAMES ORR

BELIE, bē-lī': Is the tr of בָּהַשׁ, kāhash, "to be untrue" (Jer 5 12), "They have belied the Lord" (ARV "denied Jeh"), here used as synonym of "give the lie to."

In Wisd 1 11 "belie" tr καταψεύδομαι, katapseúdōmai (the kata prefix referring to the kata in katalalia in the same verse), "A mouth that belieth destroyeth a soul."

BELIEF, bē-lēf'. See FAITH.

BELIEVERS, bē-lēv'ers (in AV and RV of Acts 5 14, for πιστεύοντες, pisteúontes, RVm "believing"; in AV of 1 Tim 4 12 for οἱ πιστοί, hoi pistoi, RV "them that believe"): Equivalent phrases, they (he, she) that believe (for οἱ πεπιστευκότες, hoi pepisteu-kótes; οἱ πιστεύοντες, hoi pisteúontes; πιστός [adj.], pistós, etc) occur frequently as a regular description of those who professed their faith in Christ, and attached themselves to the Christian church. The one essential condition of admission into the Christian community was, that men should believe in Jesus Christ (Acts 16 31). The actual experiences of the men thus denoted varied with all the possible degrees and modifications of FAITH (q.v.). Believers are nowhere in the NT distinguished as a subordinate class from the "Christians who know" as in the gnostic antithesis of pistikoí and gnōstikoi, "believers" and "knowers." T. REES

BELL (מצלח, m'cillōth, פֶּצְמוֹן, pa'āmōn): The former of these terms occurs only once (Zec 14 20) where it is thus tr^d. It is derived from a verb meaning "to tingle" or "dirl" (1 S 3 11), and there is, therefore, no objection etymologically to rendering the noun by "bells." But the little bell attached to the harness of horses would hardly be a suitable place for a fairly long inscription, and as buckles shaped exactly like cymbals (see MUSIC) were used as ornaments for horses, "cymbals" is probably a better rendering.

The other Heb word for bell is found only in Ex 28 33 f; 39 25,26, where "bells of gold" are directed to be attached to the hem of Aaron's official robe, that the people may hear him when he enters and quits the sanctuary. Bells were not employed by the Hebrews to summon the congregation to worship, nor do Mohammedans so use them at the present day. The church bell is a peculiarly Christian institution, said to have been introduced by Bishop Paulinus of Nola in Campania, who lived about the end of the 4th cent. Little bells, however, like those attached to the hem of Aaron's robe, frequently form part of the harness of horses, or are fastened to the necks of the he-goats or wethers that lead the flock in eastern lands. JAMES MILLAR

BELLOWS, bel'ōz, bel'us: The word occurs once only in EV, in Jer 6 29, where the prophet is predicting the coming of the destroyer (ver 26), "a great nation" from "the north country" (ver 22), down upon Israel, because "all of them deal corruptly" (ver 28). "The bellows blow fiercely; the lead is consumed of the fire." Here the imagery is drawn from the refiner's art, and the "bellows" are those used to make the refiner's fires burn fiercely. See CRAFTS, II, 10.

BELLY, bel'i: בֶּהֱמוֹן, gāhōn="the external abdomen" (Gen 3 14; Lev 11 42). קֶבֶה, kōbhāh

= "the abdominal cavity" (Nu 25 8 ARV "body"). בֶּהֱמָה, bēhen="the internal abdomen," "the womb" (1 K 7 20; Job 15 2,35 AV; 20 15,23; 40 16; Ps 17 14; Prov 13 25; 18 20; Jer 1 5; Ezk 3 3); also fig. "the internal regions," "the body of anything" (Jon 2 2). מֵעֵה, mē'eh="intestines," "abdomen" (Dnl 2 32; Jon 1 17; 2 1,2). In the NT κοιλία, koilia="a cavity," esp. the abdominal (Mt 12 40; 15 17; Mk 7 19); the seat of appetite and of the carnal affections (Rom 16 18; 1 Cor 6 13; Phil 3 19; Rev 10 9,10); the innermost of the soul (ARVm Jn 7 38).

BELMAIM, bel'mā-im, AV Belmen (Βελμαίμ, Belmaím, Jth 7 3; Βαίμαίν, Bailmaín, 4 4): A place in the neighborhood of Dothan (7 3), to which warning was sent to prepare for the invasion of Holofernes (4 4). It probably answers to the modern Bir Bil'ameh (Ibleam), a ruined site about half a mile S. of Jen'in.

BELMEN, bel'men, BELMON, bel'mon. See BELMAIM.

BELOMANCY, bel'ō-man-si. See AUGURY, IV, 2.

BELOVED, bē-luv'ed, bē-luv'd' (ἀγαπητός, agapētos): A term of affectionate endearment common to both Testaments; in the OT found, 26 out of 42 times, in Solomon's Song of Love. Limited chiefly to two Heb words and their derivatives: אֶהְבֶּה, 'āhēbh, "to breathe" or "long for," hence to love, corresponding to the NT, ἀγαπάω, agapáo, "to prefer," i.e. a love based on respect and benevolent regard; דָּוָה, dōdh, "love," chiefly love between the sexes, based on sense and emotion, akin to φιλέω, philéo (Lat amare). Used occasionally, in their nobler sense, interchangeably, e.g. the former of a husband's love for his wife (Dt 21 15,16); twice of a lover (Cant 1 14,16), thus lifting the affection of the Song of Sol out of mere amorousness into the realm of the spiritual and possibly Messianic. Both words used of God's love for His chosen: e.g. Solomon, "b. of his God" (Neh 13 26); Benjamin "b. of Jehovah" (Dt 33 12); so even of wayward Israel (Jer 11 15).

In the NT "beloved" used exclusively of Divine and Christian love, an affection begotten in the community of the new spiritual life in Christ, e.g. "b. in the Lord" (Rom 16 8). The beauty, unity, endearment of this love is historically unique, being peculiarly Christian. "Brethren" in Christ are "beloved" (1 Thess 1 4; 1 Cor 15 58; Jas 1 16; 2 5). Many individuals are specified by name: Timothy (2 Tim 1 2); Philemon (Philem ver 1); Amplias, Urbane, Stachys, Persis (Rom 16 8,9,12), etc. The aged John is the conspicuous NT illustration of the depth and tenderness of Christian love. In his epistles alone he addresses his disciples 12 times as "beloved." Paul terms "God's elect" "holy and beloved" (Col 3 12).

The term rises to still Diviner significance as an epithet of Christ, whom Paul, grateful for His "freely bestowed" grace, terms "the Beloved." This is the word used repeatedly to express God the Father's infinite affection for Jesus His "beloved Son" (Mt 3 17; 12 18; 17 5; Mk 1 11; 9 7; Lk 3 22; 20 13).

Agapētos rendered as above 47 times is 9 times "dearly beloved" (RV uniformly omits "dearly") and 3 times "well beloved" (RV omits "well"). The former rendering found only once in the OT (דִּירָה, y'dhīdhūth, "something beloved"), portraying God's tender love for His people: "dearly beloved of my soul" (Jer 12 7). Thrice is Daniel spoken of as "greatly beloved" of Gabriel and of God (הַמְּדִידָה, hāmūdihōth, "precious," i.e. delight=beloved; Dnl 9 23; 10 11.19). Through the apostles the word has become familiar in pastoral and sermonic address. Few NT words better illustrate the power and impress of the Christian spirit on succeeding centuries than this. BELSHAZZAR, bel-shaz'ar (בֶּלְשַׁצְצָר, bēlsha'ṣṣar; Βαλτασάρ, Baltasár, Bab Bel-shar-usur): According to Dnl 5 30, he was the Chaldaean king under whom Babylon was taken by Darius the Mede. The Bab monuments speak a number of times of a Bel-shar-usur who was the "firstborn son, the offspring of the heart of" Nabunaid, the last king of the Bab empire, that had been founded by Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, at the time of the death of Ashurbanipal, king of Assyria, in 626 BC. There is no doubt that this Belshazzar is the same as the Belshazzar of Dnl. It is not necessary to suppose that Belshazzar was at any time king of the Bab empire in the sense that Nebuchadnezzar and Nabunaid were. It is probable, as M. Pognon argues, that a son of Nabunaid, called Nabunaid after his father, was king of Babylon, or Bab king, in Harran (Haran), while his father was overlord in Babylon. This second Nabunaid is called "the son of the offspring of the heart" of Nabunaid his father. It is possible that this second Nabunaid was the king who was killed by Cyrus, when he crossed the Tigris above Arbela in the 9th year of Nabunaid his father, and put to death the king of the country (see the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle, col. ii, 17); since according to the Eshki-Harran inscription, Nabunaid the Second died in the 9th year of Nabunaid the First. Belshazzar may have been the son of the king who is said in the same chronicle to have commanded the Bab army in Accad from the 6th to the 11th year of Nabunaid I; or, possibly longer, for the annals before the 6th and after the 11th year are broken and for the most part illegible. This same son of the king is most probably mentioned again in the same chronicle as having died in the night in which Babylon was captured by Gobryas of Gutium. As Nabunaid II, though reigning at Harran under the overlordship of his father, is called king of Babylon on the same inscription on which his father is called by the same title; so Belshazzar may have been called king of Babylon, although he was only crown prince. It is probable, also, that as Nabunaid I had made one of his sons king of Harran, so he had made another king of Chaldaea. This would account for Belshazzar's being called in Dnl 5 30 the Chaldaean king, although, to be sure, this word Chaldaean may describe his race rather than his kingdom. The 3d year of Belshazzar, spoken of in Dnl 8 1, would then refer to his 3d year as sub-king of the Chaldaeans under his father Nabunaid, king of Babylon, just as Cambyes was later subking of Babylon, while his father Cyrus was king of the lands. From the Book of Dnl we might infer that this subkingdom embraced Chaldaea and Susiana, and possibly the province of Babylon; and from the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle that it extended over Accad as well. That the city of Babylon alone was sometimes at least governed by an official called king is highly probable, since the father of Nergal-shar-usur is certainly, and the father of Nabunaid I is probably, called king of Babylon, in both of which cases, the city, or at most the province, of Babylon must have been meant, since we know to a certainty all of the kings who had been ruling over the empire of Babylon since 626 BC, when Nabopolassar became king, and the names of neither of these fathers of kings is found among them.

In addition to Nabunaid II, Belshazzar seems to have had another brother named Nebuchadnezzar, since the two Bab rebels against Darius Hystaspis both assumed the name of Nebuchadnezzar the son of Nabunaid (see the Behistun Inscription, I, 85, 89, 95). He had a sister also named Ina-esagilaramat, and a second named probably Ukabu'shai'-na.

Belshazzar had his own house in Babylon, where he seems to have been engaged in the woolen or clothing trade. He owned also estates from which he made large gifts to the gods. His father joins his name with his own in some of his prayers to the gods, and apparently appointed him commander of the army of Accad, whose especial duty it was to defend the city of Babylon against the attacks of the armies of Media and Persia.

It would appear from the Nabunaid-Cyrus Chronicle, that Belshazzar was de facto king of the Bab empire, all that was left of it, from the 4th to the 8th month of the 17th year of the reign of his father Nabunaid, and that he died on the night in which Babylon was taken by Gobryas of Gutium (that is, probably, DARIUS THE MEDE [q.v.]).

The objection to the historical character of the narrative of Dnl, based upon the fact that Belshazzar in 5 11.18 is said to have been the son of Nebuchadnezzar, whereas the monuments state that he was the son of Nabunaid, is fully met by supposing that one of them was his real and the other his adoptive father; or by supposing that the queen-mother and Daniel referred to the greatest of his predecessors as his father, just as Omri is called by the Assyrians the father of Jehu, and as the claimants to the Medo-Pers throne are called on the Behistun Inscription the sons of Cyaxares, and as at present the reigning sheikhs of northern Arabia are all called the sons of Rashid, although in reality they are not his sons.

BELTESHAZZAR, bel-tē-shaz'ar (בֶּלְטַשְׁצָר, bēltsha'ṣṣar; Bab Balat-sharušur, "protect his life"; Dnl 4 8): The Bab name given to Daniel (Dnl 1 7; 2 26; 5 12). Not to be confounded with Belshazzar.

BELUS, bē'lus, TEMPLE OF. See BABEL.

BEN-, ben(prefix) (sing. בֶּן, ben, "son of"; pl. בָּנִים, b'nē, "sons of" = Aram. בָּר, bar): This word is used in sing. or pl. to express relationship of almost any kind: (1) to a person; as such it is found as part of many compound names like Benjamin, Benhur, etc (cf Bar); (2) to a clan; in this connection it is found in the pl. only: "children of Israel," "children of Ammon," etc; (3) to a town; perhaps as place of birth ("son of Jabesh"; 2 K 15 10 ff); (4) to occupation, state of life, age, character, quality even of things; (5) peculiarly employed in the sense of "scholar," "disciple," ("son of prophet"), or in phrases like "son of death," etc; (6) in poetry, "sons of flame" for "sparks" (Job 5 7m), etc. The frequent metaphorical use of the word indicates that it was rarely used to express the relation of father to son like the Arab. Ibn. Cf HPN, 64 ff. A. L. BRESLICH

BEN, ben (בֶּן, bēn, "son"): A Levite appointed to assist as musician in the temple service (1 Ch 15 18). The text seems to be doubtful, since the name is omitted in ver 20 and not mentioned at all in the LXX.

BEN-ABINADAB, ben-a-bin'a-dab, ben-ab-inā'dab (בֶּן-אַבְינָדָב, ben 'ābhīnādābh, "son of Abinadab"): One of the "captains" of Solomon who provided for the king and his household, each for a month in the year (1 K 4 11). His district was the region of Dor. In AV he is called "the son of Abinadab." His wife was Tappath, the daughter of Solomon.

BENAI AH, bē-nā'ya, bē-nī'a (בְּנֵי-אֵהָ, bēnāyāhū, "Jeh has built." Cf HPN, 182, 265, 268):

(1) B., the son of Jehoiada of Kabzeel (cf Josh 15 21), was a man of "mighty deeds" and was more honorable than any of the mighty men of David except the three chiefs. Therefore David made him his chief counselor (2 S 23 23m; cf 1 Ch 27 34 where the order of names seems to be reversed) and set him over the Cherethites (cf Carites, 2 K 11 4 ff and m) and Pelethites and he was made the 3d captain of the host and chief over the course of the 3d month (1 Ch 27 5 f; 2 S 8 18; 20 23; 1 Ch 18 17; 2 S 23 20 ff; 11 22 ff). Being a true friend of David (cf 2 S 15 18) he did not take part in the usurpation of Adonijah (1 K 1 8.10.26), and was therefore with others chosen by the king to proclaim Solomon king over Israel (1 K 1 32 ff) and later by Solomon to execute Adonijah (1 K 2 25), Joab (1 K 2 29 ff), and Shimei (1 K 2 46). In recognition of his services Solomon appointed him over the host in Joab's place (1 K 2 35; 4 4).

(2) B., a Pirathonite (cf Jgs 12 13.15), was one of David's 30 mighty men (2 S 23 30; 1 Ch 11 31). He was captain over the course of the 11th month numbering 24,000 (1 Ch 27 14).

(3) A ruler of the house of Simeon (1 Ch 4 36).

(4) A Levite of second degree appointed as singer (1 Ch 15 18) with "psalteries set to Alamoth" (1 Ch 15 20; 16 5).

(5) A priest appointed "to blow the trumpet before the ark of God" (1 Ch 15 24; 16 6).

(6) The father of Jehoiada (1 Ch 27 34), but see (1) above.

(7) An ancestor of Jahaziel of the house of Asaph (2 Ch 20 14).

(8) An overseer in the service of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31 13).

(9, 10, 11, 12) Four different men of Israel who had taken "strange wives" (Ezr 10 25.30.35.43).

(13) The father of Pelatiah who was seen by Ezekiel in his vision (Ezr 11 1.13).

BEN-AMMI, ben-am'ī (בֶּן-אַמִּי, ben 'ammī, "son of my kinsman," Gen 19 38): The progenitor of the Ammonites was a son of Lot's younger daughter, born after the destruction of Sodom. The account of his birth as well as that of Moab was commonly regarded as an expression of Israel's intense hatred and contempt toward these two nations. However, this idea is rather unwarranted, in view of the fact that the origin of the tribe of Judah (which is held in especial honor by J) is accounted for in a similar way (Gen 38). Gunkel (Schöpfung und Chaos, 190) suggests that the narrative (19 30-38) was originally a Moabitic account tracing the common origin of Moab and Ammon to Lot. It presupposes a universal catastrophe—such as the conflagration of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboim suggests—in which all the human race, save Lot and his two daughters, perished. In order to avert the extinction of the race, his daughters resorted to incestuous practices. In this case we have here a Moabite parallel to the Deluge story (Skinner, Genesis, 313-14). While the common origin of the two brother tribes is undoubtedly a fact (Jgs 10 6; 11 15.18.25; Dt 2 19; 2 Ch 20, etc), the folk-etymology of their names is rather suspicious. The name Ben-Ammi is probably derived from the deity "Emu," which is the name for Nergal among the Shuhites on the W. of the Euphrates, a land which corresponds to the position of the Bnē-'Ammō, "children of his people" (Nu 22 5). The chief god of the Kataban Arabs was called Ammi (Hom., ZDMG, V, 95, 525, n. 1). In cuneiform inscriptions this name appears as part of the title of the Ammonite rulers (HDB). Neubauer (Studia Biblica, 1-26) suggests that the name Balaam is a compound of Bel + Am, that is, "Am is Lord." For other compounds with Ammi see Gray, HPN, 41-60.

S. COHEN

BENCH (בֶּרֶשׁ, keresh): Found only in EV in Ezk 27 6, in the prophet's "lamentation over Tyre": "They have made thy benches of ivory inlaid in boxwood, from the isles of Kittim," where the word evidently stands for the "benches" of the boat whose "mast" (ver 5) and "oars" (ver 6) have just been described, in the vivid figs. of speech in which the city itself is pictured as a merchant-ship. Cf ver 8, "Thy wise men, O Tyre, were in thee, they were thy pilots." See SEAT.

BEN-DEKER, ben-dē'kēr (בֶּן-דֶּקֶר, ben-deker, "son of Deker," AV "son of Dekar"): The word is derived from a Heb root meaning "to pierce." Cf HPN, 69. One of the 12 officers who provided victuals for King Solomon and his household (1 K 4 9).

BENEATH, bē-nēth': The adv. for "under" (kātō). In Jn 8 23, the words "ye are from beneath," suggest hell in contrast to heaven. But the succeeding clause, "ye are of this world," gives the key for the interpretation. Earth, not hell, is expressed, although "that more awful meaning surely is not excluded" (Alford).

BENE-BERAK, ben-ē-bē'rak (בְּנֵי בִּרְקָ, bēnē bērak; Βανηβαράκ, Banēbarāk): A town in the territory of Dan (Josh 19 45), represented by the modern village Ibn Ibraḳ, about an hour S.E. of Jaffa.

BENEDICTION, ben-ē-dik'shun: From the earliest times the records bear testimony that pronouncing the benediction or giving the blessing was a common practice. In the temple service, this duty was assigned to the Aaronites and was made an impressive part of the service. The form of the benediction used is given in Nu 6 22-27. References to this practice may be found in Lev 9 22; Dt 10 8; 2 Ch 30 27. After a time, minute directions were given concerning it and careful preparation was made for this part of the service. All Aaronites, of proper age, were entitled to perform this service, except those who by previous conduct or on account of physical defect were disqualified. One who had killed another, whether intentionally or otherwise, or who had violated the marriage vows, had given himself excessively to wine drinking or other excesses, or indeed had been guilty of unrighteous conduct or life, was not only prohibited from pronouncing the blessing, but was required to withdraw before this part of the service was performed. If one was blind even of one eye, or had a defect in his hands or speech, or was a hunchback, he was also excluded. Before the priest could engage in this service he was required to wash his hands. Then, with uplifted hands, while the people stood, he uttered the words of blessing. The main idea was that thus the name of Jeh was put on the people. Later it came to be regarded as having some special blessing in and of itself, a result against which the more spiritual of the priests protested.

It was common not only to pronounce the benediction in the public worship but also in the family. We have such instances in Gen 9 26,27; 27 27-30. This practice prevailed also on many other occasions not only in Israel, but among the heathen as well. We may readily see, therefore, that from the very beginning of the Christian church the use of the benediction was common. In the course of time an extensive lit. developed on this subject and it may be said that there are now three distinct ideas in the church as to the benediction. That section of the church which regards the minister as clothed with sacerdotal powers, holds that the blessings pronounced are actually conferred in the act of the utterance of the words, because of the powers conferred upon him when he was set aside for the sacred office. On the other hand it is held that it is merely a prayer that God may bestow certain blessings on the people. From this position others dissent, and teach that it is the declaration of the special privileges and relations in which those stand who have entered into covenant fellowship with Christ; that the blessings now declared are theirs by right of that relation, and are conferred upon them by the Holy Spirit. The Gr and Rom Catholic churches take the first position, and therefore we find among them much of detail and minutiae as to the manner in which it should be pronounced. In the Gr church the priest raises his hand with the thumb touching the third finger, signifying the procession of the Holy Ghost from the Father alone; or according to others to form the sacred name IHS. In the Rom church the form is, the thumb, first and second fingers are to be open, to symbolize the Trinity. In this church too, the benediction is pronounced in a multitude of cases and in each case the thing so blessed by the priest is made sacred. Crosses, church vessels, houses, paschal eggs, churchyards, are thus blessed. Every parish has a collection of these forms of blessing in what is known as the "Benedictionale." The authority for this is based on some documents claiming to reach back to early church history, but as they belong to the forged decretal class, the position of the Rom church on this subject is untenable.

Apostolic benedictions, as we find them in the epistles, present considerable variety. One of the striking features is that in a number of cases there is the omission of the Holy Ghost. The best explanation seems to be that the Father and the Son effect the redemption of the world and the Holy Ghost applies the blessing so wrought out. "Grace, mercy and peace" may then be said to be sent from the Father and the Son through the Holy Ghost to be the possession of all who have come into the kingdom. The third person of the Trinity, being thus in the act of applying the blessing, is not mentioned. The fact that in other cases Father, Son and Holy Ghost are mentioned, proves that the writers knew the character and office of the Holy Ghost. The most common form used today is that in 2 Cor 13 14. Occasionally some changes are introduced by ministers, but it would seem best to adhere strictly to the Scriptural forms. See BLESSING; SALUTATION.

BENEFACITOR, ben-ê-fak'tēr (Gr euergētēs, Lk 22 25): There is here a probable allusion to two kings of Egypt (Ptolemy III and VII), who had the surname "Euergetes," of whom the period of the first was 247-242 BC, and of the second, 147-117 BC. Jesus draws the contrast between worldly kingdoms, in which the title "benefactor" is given those who rule with all the splendor of earthly display and luxury, and His kingdom, in which it belongs only to those whose work is that of humble, obscure and often menial service.

BENEFIT, ben'ê-fit (בְּנִיטָה, g'mul = "a deed," 2 Ch 32 25); נִטָּב, yāṭabh = (causat.) "to make well," "to do good" (Jer 18 10). The pl. of בְּנִיטָה, g'mul, is found in Ps 103 2. Ps 68 19 (AV) should be tr^d "Blessed be the Lord. Day by day he sustains us; God is our salvation." χάρις, chāris = "gift"; "grace" (2 Cor 1 15, "a second benefit": that is, two visits in the same journey). euepyeia, euergesia = "good deed done" (1 Tim 6 2: "because they that partake of the benefit [of their service] are believing and beloved"); ἀγαθός, agathós = "good" (Philem ver 14 AV; RV "goodness").

The name of three kings of Syria mentioned in the historical books. Hadad is the Syrian god of storms, and is apparently identical with Rimmon (2 K 5 18), the Assyrian Rammānu, "the Thunderer," whose temple was in Damascus.

The Name The name Benhadad, "son of Hadad," accords with the custom which obtained in Sem mythology of calling a king or a nation the son of the national god, as we have Mesha', son of Chemosh, and the Moabites, children of Chemosh. Benhadad seems to have become a general designation for the kings of Syria (Am 1 4; Jer 49 27).

I. Benhadad I was the son of Tabrimmon, who is called (1 K 15 18) "the son of Hezion, king of Syria, that dwelt at Damascus."

1. The Kingdom of Syria Founded Hezion has been with some plausibility identified with Rezon (1 K 11 23, 25) who founded the kingdom of Damascus and imparted to Syria that temper of hostility to Israel which became hereditary. Meanwhile the Aramaeans had shaken themselves free from the rule of the Hittites, and with Damascus for a center had planted strong settlements in the plains westward from the Euphrates. By the time that Benhadad entered into this succession, Syria was the strongest power in this region of Western Asia, and ready to take advantage of every opportunity of increasing her dominions.

Such an opportunity presented itself in the appeal of Asa, king of Judah, for help against Baasha, king of Israel. The two Hebrew kingdoms had been at feud ever since their

2. Syria and Judah disruption. Baasha had pushed his frontier southward to Ramah, within 5 miles of Jerus., and this commanding eminence he proceeded to fortify. The danger of a hostile fortress overlooking his capital, and the humiliation of his rival's presence so near, were more than Asa could bear. It was at this juncture that he bethought him of Benhadad. Taking all the silver and the gold that were left in the treasury of the house of the Lord, and the treasury of the king's house, he sent them to Benhadad with a request for an alliance, begging him at the same time to break off the league he had with Baasha and thus enable Asa to dislodge his enemy. Benhadad saw an opening for the aggrandizement of his kingdom and broke off the alliance he had had with Jeroboam and Baasha. By an invasion of Northern Israel he obliged Baasha to withdraw from Ramah and confine himself to the neighborhood of his own capital (1 K 15 16 ff.). Judah obtained relief, but the price paid for it was too great. Asa had surrendered his treasures, and very likely some of his independence.

For his shortsightedness in laying himself under obligation to Benhadad and relying upon the help of Syria rather than upon the Lord

3. Short-sightedness of Asa his God, Asa was rebuked by the prophet Hanani (2 Ch 16 1 ff.). Benhadad had extended his territories by the transaction and seems to have exercised henceforward some sort of sovereignty over both the Hebrew kingdoms.

II. Benhadad II was in all probability the son of Benhadad I. He is the Hadad-ezer, or Hadad-idri, of the monuments. He comes

1. Hadad-idri of the Monuments first upon the scene of the Bib. history invading the land of Israel with a large host, in which were 32 tributary kings, and horses and chariots. He had penetrated as far as Samaria, the newly built city of Omri, now the capital of his son Ahab. Benhadad and his Syrian host had laid siege to Samaria, and Ahab had been summoned to surrender. Ahab was disposed to come to terms, but the intolerable proposals made by Benhadad drove him to resistance. Encouraged by the elders of the people, and acting on the counsel of a prophet, Ahab made a sortie and falling upon the carousing Syrians put them so completely to rout that Benhadad himself only escaped on a horse with the horsemen.

Monolith of Shalmaneser II.

Next year the Syrians resolved to retrieve their defeat saying of the Israelites, "Their God is a

2. Expeditions against Israel god of the hills; therefore they were stronger than we; but let us fight against them in the plain, and surely we shall be stronger than they." Ahab had been warned to expect the return of the Syrians and was prepared for the fresh attack. For seven days the two armies faced each other, the Israelites "like two little flocks of kids" before a host that filled the country. On the seventh day they joined battle near to Aphek, and the Syrians met again an overwhelming defeat. Jeh was proved to be God both of the plains and of the hills. Benhadad was taken prisoner, and appealing to the clemency of the victor, he persuaded Ahab to spare his life. A treaty was agreed upon between the two monarchs under which Ahab's people were to have bazaars of their own in Damascus, as it would appear with Ahab Benhadad I had had for his subjects before in Samaria (1 K 20 1-34). The treaty was denounced by a prophet, and Ahab was warned that this man whom God had devoted to destruction would be the destruction of himself and his people. Under the treaty, however, there were three years without war between Syria and Israel.

The treaty and the resulting period of peace receive striking confirmation from the monuments.

From the monolith inscription of Shalmaneser II we learn that this Assyrian king in the 6th year of his reign (854 BC) had crossed the Tigris and by the made his way across the Euphrates Monuments on boats of sheepskin into Syria to Halman (Aleppo). At Karkar he encountered the combined forces of Damascus, Hamath, Israel and the states which had united to oppose his progress westward: Ahabbu Sir-lai, Ahab of Israel and Dad'idri, Hadadezer (Benhadad II) of Damascus are named in the inscription with chariots, horsemen and infantry, making common cause against Shalmaneser and fighting on the same side. It was Benhadad, as we gather, that bore the brunt of the assault, but the result of the battle was the complete rout of the allies with the loss of 14,000 men. That the assistance of Israel on the occasion was the outcome of the treaty between Ahab and Benhadad, and that the combination against Shalmaneser took place during the three years of peace, are in the highest degree probable.

The disaster to the allies, however, seems to have broken up the confederacy. When the king of Syria is next mentioned in Bib. history,

5. Alliance Broken Off it is defending the city of Ramoth-Gilead against the attack made upon it by Ahab, who is found now in alliance with Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah, attempting unsuccessfully and with fatal results to himself, to recover this city of Israel from the weakened power of Damascus. At Ramoth-Gilead Benhadad is not said to have 32 tributary kings in his train, but 32 military commanders who have taken their place (1 K 22 2.29-31).

The peace between Israel and Syria having been broken, there was frequent, if not continuous, war between the kingdoms, in which the prophet Elisha is a prominent figure. He healed of his leprosy Naaman, Benhadad's commander-in-chief. He disclosed to the king of Israel the places wherever Benhadad pitched his camp. He smote with blindness a great host whom Benhadad had sent with horses and chariots to seize him at Dothan, and led them into Samaria where he saw them treated kindly and sent back to their master (2 K 6 8-23).

Some time after Benhadad again assembled all his host and laid siege to Samaria. So great was the famine that women ate their own children. The king of Israel sent one of his men to put Elisha to death, but Elisha closed his house against him and announced that on the morrow there would be great plenty in the city. And so it happened. Certain lepers, despairing of relief, had gone into the Syrian camp and learned that the Syrians had abandoned their camp in a panic, believing that the king of Israel had hired the kings of the Musri and the northern Hittites to raise the siege (2 K 6 24-7 20; cf Burney's note, 7 6).

Still another notice of Benhadad II is found in the Annals of Shalmaneser, who records that in the

8. Murder of Benhadad 11th year of his reign he defeated a combination of 12 kings of the Hittites with Benhadad at their head, and slew 10,000 men. Of this there is no record in Bib. history, but it must have been shortly before the tragedy which ended the career of the Syrian king. Benhadad had fallen sick and sent his commander-in-chief, Hazael, to inquire as to the issue of his sickness of the prophet Elisha, who was visiting Damascus. Elisha foretold the king's death, and wept as he read to Hazael the cruel purpose which the Syrian commander was even then maturing. Hazael professed to be incredulous, but he departed from Elisha and the very next day in cold blood put his master to death and ascended the throne (2 K 8 7-15). Thus ingloriously ended the reign of one of the most powerful of the Syrian kings.

III. Benhadad III was the son of the usurper Hazael, and though not in the dynastic succession, assumed on the death of his father the

1. His Contemporaries dynastic name. He was contemporary with Amaziah, king of Judah; Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, king of Israel; and Ramman-Nirari III, king of Assyria. The fortunes of Israel had fallen low in the days of Jehoahaz, and Hazael and Benhadad III were the instruments of Jeh's displeasure with the nation. At this time Jehoahaz had no more than 53 horsemen and 10 chariots and 10,000 footmen; for the king of Syria had destroyed them and made them like the dust in threshing (2 K 13 7). It was when the fortunes of Israel were at the lowest ebb by reason of the oppression of the king of Syria—by this time Benhadad—that help came to them and Jeh gave Israel a savior, so that Israel went out from under the hands of the Syrians, "and the children of Israel dwelt in their tents [in their homes] as beforetime" (2 K 13 5). The "saviour" of the Bib. narrative is the one allusion in Scripture to the king of Assyria of that day, Ramman-

2. The Assyrians in the West Nirari III, whose inscriptions record his victorious expedition to the West. "From the Euphrates to the land of the Hittites," runs an inscription, "the west country in its entire compass, Tyre, Zidon, the land Omri, Edom, Philistia as far as the Great Sea of the sun-setting, I subjected to my yoke; payment of tribute I imposed upon them. Against Syria of Damascus I marched; Mari, the king of Syria, in Damascus his royal city I besieged." He then proceeds to tell of the subjugation of the monarch and of the spoils obtained from his capital. That Mari, which means in Aramaic "lord," is Benhadad III, the son of Hazael, is now generally believed.

With the capture of Damascus and the collapse of the Syrian power under Mari (Benhadad III), an era of recuperation and prosperity became possible to Israel and Judah. 3. Downfall of Damascus before Ramman-Nirari III So it came to pass that "Jehoash the son of Jehoahaz took again out of the hand of Benhadad the son of Hazael the cities which he had taken out of the hand of Jehoahaz by war. Three times did Joash smite him, and recovered the cities of Israel" (2 K 13 25). Israel was able to breathe freely for a time and Jeroboam II restored the Northern Kingdom to its former extent and glory. But the flame of war which had been sent into the house of Hazael and which devoured the palaces of Benhadad (Am 1 4 ff) was only waiting the time when the Assyrians would be free to renew their expeditions to the West and carry Samaria and Israel "into captivity beyond Damascus" (Am 5 27).

BENJAMIN, ben'ja-min (בִּנְיָמִין, binyāmīn, or בִּנְיָמִן, binyāmīn; Beniactin, Beniaetn, Beniaetn, Beniamin):

(1) The youngest of Jacob's sons. His mother Rachel died in giving him birth. As she felt death approaching she called him Benoni,

1. The Patriarch "son of my sorrow." Fearing, probably, that this might bode evil for the child—for names have always preserved a peculiar significance in the East—Jacob called him Benjamin, "son of the right hand" (Gen 35 17 ff). He alone of Jacob's sons was born in Pal, between Bethel and Ephrath. Later in the ch, in the general enumeration of the children born in Paddan-aram, the writer fails to except Benjamin (ver 24). Joseph was his full brother. In the history where Benjamin appears as an object of solicitude to his father and brothers, we must not forget that he was already a grown man. At the time of the descent of Israel to Egypt Joseph was about 40 years of age. Benjamin was not much younger, and was himself the father of a family. The phrase in Gen 44 20, "a little one," only describes in oriental fashion one much younger than the speaker. And as the youngest of the family no doubt he was made much of. Remorse over their heartless treatment of his brother Joseph may have made the other brothers especially tender toward Benjamin. The conduct of his brethren all through the trying experiences in Egypt places them in a more attractive light than we should have expected; and it must have been a gratification to their father (Gen 42 ff). Ten sons of Benjamin are named at the time of their settlement in Egypt (Gen 46 21).

(2) At the Exodus the number of men of war in the tribe is given as 35,400. At the second census it is 45,600 (Nu 1 37; 26 41).

2. The Tribe Their place in the host was with the standard of the camp of Ephraim on the west of the tabernacle, their prince being Abidan the son of Gideoni (Nu 2 22 f). Benjamin was represented among the spies by Palti the son of Raphu; and at the division of the land the prince of Benjamin was Elidad the son of Chislon (Nu 13 9; 34 21).

(3) The boundaries of the lot that fell to Benjamin are pretty clearly indicated (Josh 18 11 ff).

It lay between Ephraim on the N. and Judah on the S. The northern frontier started from the Jordan over against Jericho, and ran to the north of that town up through the mountain westward past Beth-aven, taking in Bethel. It then went down by Ataroth-addar to Beth-horon the nether. From this point the western frontier ran southward to Kiriath-jearim. The southern boundary ran from Kiriath-jearim eastward to the fountain of the waters of Netophah, swept round by the south of Jerus, and passed down through the wilderness by Geliloth and the stone of Bohan, to the northern shore of the Dead Sea at the mouth of the Jordan. The river formed the eastern boundary. The lot was comparatively small. This, according to Jos, was owing to "the goodness of the land" (Ant, V, i, 22); a description that would apply mainly to the plains of Jericho. The uplands are stony, mountainous, and poor in water; but there is much good land on the western slopes.

It will be seen from the above that Benjamin held the main avenues of approach to the highlands from both E. and W.: that by

4. Importance of Position which Joshua led Israel past Ai from Gilgal, and the longer and easier ascents from the W., notably that along which the tides of battle so often rolled, the Valley of Aijalon, by way of the Beth-horons. Benjamin also sat astride the great highway connecting N. and S., which ran along the ridge of the western range, in the district where it was easiest of defense. It was a position calling for occupation by a brave and warlike tribe such as Benjamin proved to be. His warriors were skilful archers and slingers, and they seem to have cultivated the use of both hands, which gave them a great advantage in battle (Jgs 20 16; 1 Ch 8 40; 12 2, etc). These characteristics are reflected in the Blessing of Jacob (Gen 49 27). The second deliverer of Israel in the period of the Judges was Ehud, the left-handed Benjamite (Jgs 3 15).

The Benjamites fought against Sisera under Deborah and Barak (Jgs 5 14). The story told in Jgs 20 21 presents many difficulties

5. History which cannot be discussed here. It is valuable as preserving certain features of life in these lawless times when there was no king in Israel. Whatever may be said of the details, it certainly reflects the memory of some atrocity in which the Benjamites were involved and for which they suffered terrible punishment. The election of Saul as first king over united Israel naturally lent a certain prestige to the tribe. After the death of Saul they formed the backbone of Ish-bosheth's party, and most unwillingly conceded precedence to Judah in the person of David (2 S 2 15.25; 3 17 ff). It was a Benjamite who heaped curses upon David in the hour of his deep humiliation (2 S 16 5); and the jealousy of Benjamin led to the revolt on David's return, which was so effectually stamped out by Joab (2 S 19 f). Part of the tribe, probably the larger part, went against Judah at the disruption of the kingdom, taking Bethel with them. 1 K 12 20 says that none followed the house of David but the house of Judah only. But the next verse tells us that Rehoboam gathered the men of Judah and Benjamin to fight against Jeroboam. It seems probable that as Jerus had now become the royal city of the house of David, the adjoining parts of Benjamin proved loyal, while the more distant joined the Northern Kingdom. After the downfall of Samaria Judah assumed control of practically the whole territory of Benjamin (2 K 23 15.19, etc). Nehemiah gives the Valley of Hinnom as the south boundary of Benjamin in his time (Neh 11 30), while westward it extended to include Lod and Ono. Saul of Tarsus was a member of this tribe (Phil 3 5).

(4) A great-grandson of Benjamin, son of Jacob (1 Ch 7 10).

(5) One of those who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 32, and probably also Neh 3 23; 12 34).

BENJAMITE, ben'ja-mit: One belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, such as Ehud (Jgs 3 15), Saul (1 S 9 1.2), Sheba (2 S 20 1), Shimei (1 K 2 8), etc.

BENO, bē'no (בְּנוֹ, b'nō, "his son"): The son of Jaaziah of the house of Levi (1 Ch 24 26.27).

BEN-ONI, ben-ō'nī (בֶּן-אֹנִי, ben-'ōnī; ὁδύνης μου, huidōs odūnēs mou, "son of my sorrow"): The name given by the dying Rachel to her new-born son; changed by his father Jacob to BENJAMIN (Gen 35 18) q.v.

BEN-ZOHEHETH, ben-zō'heth (בֶּן-זֹהֶת, ben-zō-hēth, "son of Zoheth," from a Heb root meaning "to be strong[?]"): A son of Ishi of the house of Judah (1 Ch 4 20).

BEON, bē'on (Nu 32 3). See BAAL-MEON.

BEOR, bē'or (בְּעוֹר, b'ōr, "destroyer"[?]):

(1) Father of Bela, the first king of Edom (Gen 36 32; 1 Ch 1 43).

(2) The father of the seer Balaam (Nu 22 5; 24 3.15; 31 8; Dt 23 4; Josh 13 22; 24 9, omitted in LXX; Mic 6 5; 2 Pet 2 15, AV and RVm "Bosor").

BERA, bē'ra (בְּרָא, berā', "gift"[?]; cf HPN, 74 n.): King of Sodom (Gen 14 2) who in the battle of Siddim was subdued by Chedorlaomer.

BERACAH, bē-rā'ka (בִּרְכָּה, b'rākhāh, "blessing," AV Berachah): A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 3).

BERACAH, bē-rā'ka, ber'a-ka, VALLEY OF (AV Berachah; בְּרַחֲמֵי, 'ēmek b'rākhāh; κοιλάς εὐλογίας, koiłās eulogías): After the victory of Jehoshaphat and his people over Moab and Ammon, "On the fourth day they assembled themselves in the valley of Beracah; for there they blessed Jeh: therefore the name of that place was called The valley of Beracah [i.e. of blessing] unto this day" (2 Ch 20 26). In the Wady 'Arrāb there is a ruin called Breikāt and the valley in its proximity receives the same name. This is on the main road from Hebron to Jerus and not far from Tekoa; it suits the narrative well (see PEF, III, 352).

BERACHIAH, ber-a-ki'a. See BERECHIAH.

BERAIAH, bē-rī'a (בְּרֵאִיָּה, b'rā'yāh, "Jeh hath created"): A son of Shimei of the house of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 21).

BEREA, be-rē'a. See BERĒA.

BEREAVE, bē-rēv', BEREAVER, bē-rēv'ēr, BEREFT, bē-reft': Bereave is frequently used in the OT in the (now almost obsolete) meaning of "to deprive," "to take away," esp. with reference to loss of children. The Heb word used here is שָׁחַל, shākhōl, "to be childless," or in the Piel "to make childless" (cf Gen 42 36 et al.). In AV Eccl 4 8 (from the Heb חָסַר, hāṣēr, "to lack") we read "and bereave my soul of good" (RV "deprive"), and in Ezk 36 14 (from Heb כָּשַׁל, kāshal, "to stumble"), "neither bereave thy nations any more" (RVm "cause to stumble").

Bereaver, otherwise very rare, is found RV Ezk 36 13 (from Heb שָׁחַל, shākhōl, "to be childless"), "a bereaver of thy nation" (AV "hast bereaved").

Bereft is found in 1 Tim 6 5 (from the Gr aposterēō, "to rob") "bereft of the truth" (AV "destitute"). The expression bereavement (RV Isa 49 20) in the phrase "the children of thy b." means "the children born to thee in the time when God had afflicted thee." A. L. BRESLICH

BERECHIAH, ber-ē-ki'a (בִּרְכִּיָּה, berekh'yāh, berekh'yāhū, "Jeh blesses," HPN, 216, 287):

(1) A descendant of David (1 Ch 3 20).

(2) The father of Asaph, the singer (1 Ch 6 39 AV "Berachiah"; 15 17).

(3) A former inhabitant of Jerus, a Levite (1 Ch 9 16).

(4) A doorkeeper for the ark at David's time (1 Ch 15 23).

(5) One of the heads of the children of Ephraim (2 Ch 28 12).

(6) The father of Meshullam the builder (Neh 3 4.30; 6 18).

(7) The father of the prophet Zechariah (Zec 1 1.7). A. L. BRESLICH

BERED, bē'red (בְּרֵד, beredh, "hail," from a Heb root meaning "to be cold"): The son of Shuthelah of the house of Ephraim (1 Ch 7 20). Cf BECHER.

BERED, bē'red (בְּרֵד, beredh; Βαράδ, Barád): A place in the Negeb mentioned in the story of Hagar (Gen 16 14). The well Beer-lahai-roi was "between Kadesh and Bered." The Onkelos Tg renders it Haghrā', which is the usual equivalent of Shur, while the Jerus Tg renders it Hālūcāh which is also Shur (Ex 15 22). Hālūcāh is clearly the city of Elusu mentioned by Ptolemy and from the 4th to the 7th cents. by various ecclesiastical writers. It was an important town on the road from Pal to Kadesh and Mt. Sinai. This is without doubt the very large and important ruin Kh. Khalaṣa, some 70 miles S. of Jerus on the road from Beersheba and Rehoboth. "These ruins cover an area of 15 to 20 acres, throughout which the foundations and inclosures of houses are distinctly to be traced. . . . We judged that here there must have been a city with room enough for a population of 15,000 to 20,000 souls" (Robinson, BR, I, 201). E. W. G. MASTERMAN BERENICE, ber'e-nēs. See BERNICE.

BERI, bē'rī (בְּרִי, bērī, "wisdom"): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 36).

BERIAH, bē-rī'a, BERIITES, bē-rī'its (בְּרִיָּה, b'rī'āh, "in shouting," prob. derived from a Heb root meaning "to make noise," or "in evil," from another Heb root):

(1) A son of Asher and father of Heber and Malchiel (Gen 46 17; 1 Ch 7 30.31; the head of the family of the Berites, Nu 26 44 ff).

(2) A son of Ephraim, called B. by his father because "it went evil with his house" (1 Ch 7 23).

(3) A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 13.16).

(4) A Levite in the line of Gershon (1 Ch 23 10 f).

BERITES, bē'rits (בְּרִיתִים, bērīm; according to Klostermann and others, בִּכְרִים, bikhrīm): The word is found only once in the OT (2 S 20 14). The passage seems to be doubtful. The suggestion of Klostermann does not improve matters any; the other proposed reading, בְּחִירִים, bahūrīm (Vulg virī electi), "choice young men," is to be preferred.

BERITH, bē'rith (בְּרִית, b'rith, "covenant"). See BAAL-BERITH.

BERNICE, bār-nī'sē (Βερνίκη, Bernikē, "victorious"): One of the shameless women of the Bible, mentioned in Acts 25 13.23; 26 30. She was the eldest daughter of Herod Agrippa I (Acts 12 1.6.11.21) who ruled from 38-45 AD. Her whole life from the Jewish standpoint was incestuous. Its story is told by Jos (Ant, XIX, v, 1; XX, vii, 1-3), also by Juvenal (6, 156). Her first husband was her own uncle, Herod of Calchis. After his death she consorted with her own brother Agrippa II, with whom she listened to the impassioned defense of Paul at Caesarea before Felix. For a while she was married to King Ptolemy or Polemo of Sicily, who for her sake embraced Judaism, by the rite of circumcision. But she left him soon to return to Agrippa. Later on she figures shamefully in the lives of Vespasian and Titus, father and son. If heredity stands for anything, its lessons are forcibly taught in the history of the Herodian family. HENRY E. DOSKER BERODACH-BALADAN, bē-rō'dak-bal'a-dan. See MERODACH-BALADAN.

BERCEA, be-rē'a (Βέρροια or Βέρροια, Béroia):

(1) A town of southwestern Macedonia, in the district of Emathia. It lay at the foot of Mt. Bermius, on a tributary of the Haliacmon, and seems to have been an ancient town, though the date of its foundation is uncertain. A passage in Thucydides (i.61) relating to the year 432 BC probably refers to another place of the same name, but an inscription (Inscr Graec, II, 5, 296i) proves its existence at the end of the 4th cent. BC, and it is twice mentioned by Polybius (xxvii.8; xxviii.8). After the battle of Pydna in 168 BC Bercea was the first city to surrender to Rome and fell in the third of the four regions into which Macedonia was divided (Livy xlv.45; xlv.29). Paul and Silas came to Bercea from Thessalonica, which they had been forced by an uproar to leave, and preached in the synagogue to the Jews, many of whom believed after a candid examination of the apostolic message in the light of their Scriptures (Acts 17 10.11). A number of "Gr women of honorable estate and of men" also believed, but the advent of a body of hostile Jews from Thessalonica created a disturbance in consequence of which Paul had to leave the city, though Silas and Timothy stayed there for a few days longer (Acts 17 12-15). Perhaps the Sopater of Bercea who accompanied Paul to Asia on his last journey to Jerus was one of his converts on this visit (Acts 20 4). Bercea, which was one of the most populous cities of Macedonia, early became a bishopric under the metropolitan of Thessalonica and was itself made a metropolis by Andronicus II (1283-1328): there is a tradition that the first bishop of the church was Onesimus. It played a prominent part in the struggles between the Greeks and the Bulgarians and Serbs, and was finally conquered by the Turks in 1373-74. The town, which still bears among the Greeks its ancient name (pronounced Verria) though called by the Turks Karaferia, possesses but few remains of antiquity with the exception of numerous inscriptions (Leake, Travels in Northern Greece, III, 290 ff; Cousinéry, Voyage dans la Macédoine, I, 57 ff; Dimitsas, Makedonia, in Greek, 57 ff). MARCUS N. TOP

(2) The place where Menelaus the ex-high priest was executed by order of Antiochus Eupator, the victim, according to local custom, being cast from a tower 50 cubits high into a bed of ashes (2 Macc 13 3 ff). It was the ancient city of Halab, lying about midway between Antioch and Hierapolis. Seleucus Nicator gave it the name Bercea. It was a city of importance under the Moslems in the Middle Ages, when the old name again asserted itself, and remains to the present time.

The name "Aleppo" came to us through the Venetian traders in the days before the great overland route to India via Aleppo lost its importance through the discovery of the passage round the Cape. Aleppo is now a city of nearly 130,000 inhabitants. The governor exercises authority over a wide district extending from the Euphrates to the Mediterranean.

(3) (Βερέα, Beréa): A place mentioned in 1 Macc 9 4. It may be identical with BEEROTH (q.v.) in Benjamin, a Hivite town, 8 miles N. of Jerus, or with the modern Birez-Zait, 1½ miles N.W. of Jifneh. W. EWING

BEROTH, bē'roth (1 Esd 5 19). See BEEROTH.

BEROTHAH, bē-rō'tha (Ezk 47 16: בְּרוֹתָה, bērōthāh; LXX B, Ἀβθηρά, Abthērā; or BEROΘHAI, 2 S 8 8; בְּרוֹתַי, bērōthai, where for בְּרוֹתַי, mib-bērōthai, LXX reads ek tōn eklektōn póleon, "from the select cities"): Probably two forms of the same name. Ezk 47 16 places it on the ideal northern frontier of Israel, between Damascus and Hamath. According to 2 S 8 8 it was a city of Hadadezer, king of Zobah. In the || passage (1 Ch 18 8) Cun is given in place of Berothai. Its site is unknown. Ewald connected it with Beirūt (so also apparently H. P. Smith, ICC, "Samuel," 307), but Ezekiel's description excludes this view. Others have sought it in the Wady Brissa, in the E. slope of Lebanon, N. of Baalbec. A more plausible conjecture identifies it with Bereitān (Brithēn), a village somewhat S. of Baalbec (Baedeker, Pal, 369). Possibly, however, the ideal northern frontier line should be drawn farther south. See HETHLON; ZEDAD; ZOBAB. C. H. THOMSON

BEROTHITE, bē'roth-it. See BEEROTHITE.

BERRIES, ber'is: Occurs in Jas 3 12 (AV) in the phrase "olive berries" (ἐλαίαι, elaiai). The RV reads simply "olives."

BERYL, ber'il. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

BERYTUS, ber'i-tus, bē-rī'tus (Βηρυτός, Bērūtós; Arab. بَيْرُوت; mod. Beirūt, Beyrout, Beyrouth): An ancient Phoen city situated on the N. side of a promontory jutting out from the base of Lebanon to the W. into the Mediterranean and forming a bay on the N. connected with the fable of St. George and the Dragon, and hence called St. George's Bay. The city is about 25 miles N. of Sidon and about 12 S. of the famous Lycus, or Dog River, at the mouth of which are found the sculptured rocks bearing the monuments of the ancient kings of Egypt, Babylonia and Assyria.

The city has been thought by some to be the Berothai of 2 S 8 8 or the Berothah of Ezk 47 16, but the connection in which these cities are mentioned seems to preclude the identification. The town is, however, an ancient one, for it occurs in Am Tab as Beruti where it is closely connected with Gebal of which it may have been a dependency.

Though not mentioned in OT or NT it appears in the history of Herod the Great as an important town where was assembled a court of 150 judges, presided over by Saturninus, a former Rom consul, to try the case which Herod brought against his two sons, Alexander and Aristobulus, who were condemned there by the Rom court (Ant, XVI, xi, 2). Beirût was a Rom colony at this time where many veterans settled and it afterward became the seat of a great Rom law school which was attended, in the days of Justinian, by thousands of students. It was utterly destroyed by an earthquake in 551 AD, and for a time was abandoned. Many remains of temples and public buildings of the Rom period remain. It rose to some importance during the Crusades and is at present the chief seaport of Syria, and has the only harbor on the coast. It is a town of about 125,000 inhabitants.

BERZELUS, bêr-zê'lus. See ZORZELLEUS.

BESAI, bê'sî (בְּסַי, bēsay, "downtrodden"): The descendants of B. (Nethinim) returned with Zerubabel to Jerus (Ezr 2 49; Neh 7 52=Basthai, 1 Esd 5 31).

BESET, bê-set' (ἐπερίστατος, euperistatos): The most common sense of this word is "to surround." This is the thought in Ps 139 5, and teaches the omnipresence of God. Often wicked men find that the things which they have done so envelope them that they cannot escape ruin (Hos 7 2). The reference in He 12 1 is first of all against the sin of apostasy against which repeated warning is given in this book. But the warning is also against any sin that is esp. dangerous to us. It, again and again, surrounds us like a besieging army. To surrender would be traitorous and disgraceful, since the Captain of the Lord's host is with us.

JACOB W. KAPP
BESIDE, bê-sid': Near to, or close to (Ps 23 2). It is often used to refer to the mental state, to the derangement of the mind (ἐξίστημι, existēmi, Mk 3 21; Acts 26 24 AV). Or it may refer to the condition of being out of the ordinary course of the life. A life consecrated to God and spent in the interest of humanity is so designated (2 Cor 5 13). It has the sense also of a state of being out of one's usual mind, but not of mental derangement, occasioned by something that causes amazement or astonishment (Mk 5 42). Or it may refer to a state in which one is not conscious of present conditions, but is rapt in vision (Acts 10 10).

Besides is used in the sense of in addition to or that which is over and above what has been said or is possessed (Lk 16 26; see ARVm "in"; Philem ver 19).

JACOB W. KAPP
BESIEGE, bê-sěj'. See SIEGE.

BESODEIAH, bes-ô-dē'ya, bes-ô-dī'a (בְּסוֹדֵיָהּ, bē'sōdihyāh, "in the confidence or counsel of Jeh"; cf Jer 23 18,22; and HPN, 207, 221, 286): Father of Meshullam, the builder (Neh 3 6).

BESOM, bê'zum: Occurs only once in Scripture: "I will sweep it with the besom of destruction" (Isa 14 23). Refers to what was in store for Babylon. The Heb word maṭ'āṭē, rendered "besom," is close of kin to the one (tī'zē'ṭihā) rendered "sweep." In early Eng. "besom" was synonymous with "broom," and is still so used in some parts of Eng-land.

BESOR, bê'sor, THE BROOK (נַחַל בְּסוֹר, nahal bē'sôr; A, Βεχόρ, Bechôr, B, Βεαρά, Beaná; 1 S 30 9.10.21; Jos, Ant, VI, xiv, 6): A torrent-bed (nahal) mentioned in the account of David's pursuit of the Amalekites. Thought to be Wady Ghazza, which enters the sea S.W. of Gaza.

BEST: Of five Heb originals the chief is טוֹב, tōbh, "good," expressing quality, character. Various-ly used of objects pleasing to the senses, feelings, mind, moral sense, e.g. "best of the land" (Gen 47 6); "of sheep" (1 S 15 9); of persons "married to whom they think best" (Nu 36 6); of abode, "where it liketh [RV "pleaseth"] him best" (Dt 23 16).

In Nu 18 12 the revenues of the priests were to be "holy gifts," e.g. the "best of the oil," etc (חֵלֶב, hēleb, "fat"); also vs 29.30.32, the gifts of the heave-offering were to be "of all the best," indicating that the richest elements of life were to go into the support and service of the sanctuary. So "the choice [best] fruits" (זִמְרָה, zimrah, lit. "the song of the land"), a beautifully poetic expression for the most celebrated fruits (Gen 43 11); equally choice is זָהָב, pāzaz, "separate," "the finest [best] gold," hence "purified" (1 K 10 18).

Used but twice in the NT: (1) of spiritual gifts (κρείττον, kreiton, "better" [RV "greater"]; 1 Cor 12 31); (2) of raiment (πρώτος, prōtos, "first"), "best robe" (Lk 15 22), of special significance as expressing the Father's lavish love for the repentant and returning sinner.

DWIGHT M. PRATT
BESTEAD, bê-sted' (נִקְשֶׁה, niksheh, "caught in a snare," "entrapped"; as Judah hard pressed in their own land by the Assyrians [Isa 8 21 AV]); Found only here. OE word steden meaning "place," hence "set," "beset"; usually with "ill," "sorely bested." In RV rendered "sorely distressed."

BESTIALITY, bes-ti-al'i-ti. See CRIMES.

BESTOW, bê-stō': The seven Heb words rendered by this term variously mean "to put" or "place," "to give"; "do," "deposit," as e.g. to locate chariots and horsemen in cities (1 K 10 26); or give a blessing (Ex 32 29). Four Gr words so tr^d signify "to give," "to labor," "to feed," "to place around"; as συνάγω, sunāgō, "to stow away goods" (Lk 12 17); or ψαλίζω, psōmizō, "give away" (1 Cor 13 3). The term has richest significance in expressing God's abundant gift of grace and love, δίδωμι, dīdōmi (2 Cor 8 1 AV; 1 Jn 3 1).

BETAH, bê'ta (2 S 8 8). See TIBHATH.

BETANE, bet'a-nē (Βαιτάνη, Baitānē): A place named in Jth 1 9, among those to which the mes-sengers of Nebuchadnezzar were sent. From the order in which they are named we should seek for it S. of Jerus. It may be identical with Beit 'Ainūn, about 3 miles N. of Hebron.

BETEN, bê'ten (בֵּתֵן, beten; Βαυτί, Batné): A city of Asher mentioned between Hali and Achshaph (Josh 19 25). Onom places it 8 Rom miles E. of Ptolemais, giving it the name Bethseten. It may be identical with the modern village el-B'aneh, but no certainty is possible.

BETH, bāth (בֵּת): The second letter of the Heb alphabet. With the daghesh it is transliterated in this dictionary as b, and, without, as bh (=v). It came also to be used for the number two (2) and with the dieresis for 2,000. For name, etc, see ALPHABET; BAYITH.

BETH, beth (in proper names; Gr transliteration in LXX, βῆθ, bēth, baith, or beth): This is the Eng.

transliteration for the Heb בֵּית, bēth, meaning "house," "tent," "place." It occurs in many compound proper names formed similarly to the method of compounding words in the German language, as shown in the arts. immediately following. Thus we have bēth 'ānāth or 'ānoth="house of replies" (Josh 19 38; Jgs 1 33); bēth'el="house of God" (Gen 12 8; 13 3), etc. We also find the word in hybrid formations, e.g. Βηθφαγή, Bēthphagē=Bethphage="fig house" (Mt 21 1).

FRANK E. HIRSCH

BETHABARA, beth-ab'a-ra (בֵּית עַבְרָה, bēth 'ābhārāh; Βηθαβάρη, Bēthabará, "house of the ford"): According to AV (following TR) the place where John baptized (Jn 1 28). RV (with Tisch, WH following S^aBAC) reads BETHANY. It is distinguished from the Bethany of Lazarus and his sisters as being "beyond the Jordan." The reading "Bethabara" became current owing to the advocacy of Origen. Various suggestions have been made to explain the readings. G. A. Smith (HGHL) suggests that Bethany ("house of ered a well-known ford near Beisan called Abarah, near the mouth of the valley of Jezreel. This is 20 miles from Cana and 60 miles from Bethany, and all the conditions of the place fit in with the history." See also BETHANY (2).

BETH-ANATH, beth-ā'nath (בֵּית אֲנָת, bēth 'ānāth; Βαιναθά, Bainatháth): A city in the territory of Naphtali, named with Horem and Bethshemesh (Josh 19 38; Jgs 1 33). It is represented by the modern village Ainatha, about 12 miles N.W. of Safed. The name signifies the "house" or "temple" of Anath, a goddess of the Canaanites.

BETH-ANOTH, beth-ā'noth (בֵּית עֲנוֹת, bēth 'ānōth; Βαιθανάμ, Baithanám, probably "House of Anath"—a god; Josh 15 59): The ruin of Beit 'Ainān, 1½ miles S.E. of Halhāl, in the neighborhood also of Bethzur and Gedor—places mentioned in association with it as towns in the hill country of Judah—appears to be a probable site. The present surface ruins belong to later ages.

the ship") and Bethabara ("house of the ford") are names for the same place. Bethabara has also been identified with Bethbarah, which, however, was probably not on the Jordan but among the streams flowing into it (Jgs 7 24). It is interesting to note that LXX^b reads Baithabara for MT Bēth-'ārābhāh, one of the cities of Benjamin (Josh 18 22). If this be correct, the site is in Judaea.

Another solution is sought in the idea of a corruption of the original name into Bethany and Bethabara, the name having the consonants n, b and r after Beth. In Josh 13 27 (LXX^b) we find Baithanabra for Bēthnimrah (MT), and Sir George Grove in DB (arts. "Bethabara" and "Bethnimrah") identifies Bethabara and Bethnimrah. The site of the latter was a few miles above Jericho (see BETH-NIMRAH), "immediately accessible to Jerus and all Judaea" (cf Mt 3 5; Mk 1 5, and see art. "Bethany" in EB). This view has much in its favor.

Then, again, as Dr. G. Frederick Wright observes: "The traditional site is at the ford east of Jericho; but as according to Jn 1 29.35.43 it was only one day's journey from Cana of Galilee, while according to Jn 10 40; 11 3.6.17 it was two or three days from Bethany, it must have been well up the river toward Galilee. BETHANY, beth'a-ni (Βηθανία, Bēthania):

(1) A village, 15 furlongs from Jerus (Jn 11 18), on the road to Jericho, at the Mount of Olives (Mk 11 1; Lk 19 29), where lived "Simon the leper" (Mk 14 3) and Mary, Martha and Lazarus (Jn 11 18 f). This village may justifiably be called the Judaeac home of Jesus, as He appears to have preferred to lodge there rather than in Jerus itself (Mt 21 17; Mk 11 11). Here occurred the incident of the raising of Lazarus (Jn 11) and the feast at the house of Simon (Mt 26 1-13; Mk 14 3-9; Lk 7 36-50; Jn 12 1-8). The Ascension as recorded in Lk 24 50-51 is thus described: "He led them out until they were over against Bethany; and he lifted up his hands, and blessed them. And it came to pass, while he blessed them, he parted from them, and was carried up into heaven."

Bethany is today el'Azarēyeh ("the place of Lazarus"—the L being displaced to form the art.). It is a miserably untidy and tumble-down village facing E. on the S.E. slope of the Mount of Olives, upon the carriage road to Jericho. A fair number of fig, almond and olive trees surround the houses. The traditional tomb of Lazarus is shown and there are some remains of mediaeval buildings, besides rock-cut tombs of much earlier date (PEF, III, 27, Sheet XVII).

(2) "Bethany beyond the Jordan" (Jn 1 28; AV Bethabara; Βηθαβάρᾱ, Bēthabarā, a reading against the majority of the MSS, supported by Origen on geographical grounds): No such place is known. Grove suggested that the place intended is BETH-NIMRAH (which see); the modern Tell nimirin, a singularly suitable place, but hard to fit in with Jn 1 28; cf 2 1. The traditional site is the ford E. of Jericho. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BETH-ARABAH, beth-ar'a-ba (בֵּית הָעֲרָבָה, bēth hā-ʿarābhāh; Βαιθαραβᾱ, Baitharabā, "place of the Arabah"):

(1) One of the 6 cities of Judah "in the wilderness" (Josh 15 61), on the borders of Benjamin and Judah (Josh 15 6; 18 18 LXX). "The wilderness of Judah" is the barren land W. of the Dead Sea. Beth-arabah is not yet identified.

(2) One of the cities of Benjamin (Josh 18 22). LXX^B reads Baithabara, and this may be correct. The names are easily confounded. See BETHABARA.

BETHARAM, beth-ā'ram (בֵּית הָרָם, bēth hā-rām). See BETH-HARAM.

BETH-ARBEL, beth-ār'bel (בֵּית אַרְבֵּל, bēth 'arbēl): The scene of a terrific disaster inflicted on the inhabitants by Shalman (Hos 10 14). If the place intended was in Pal, and was not the famous city of that name on the Euphrates, then probably it should be identified either with Irbid (or Irbil) in Galilee, or with Irbid, which corresponds to Arbela of the Onom, E. of the Jordan, about 12 miles S.E. of Gadara. If, as Schrader thinks (COT, II, 140), Shalman stands for the Moabite king, Shalamanu, a tributary of Tiglath-pileser, the eastern town would be the more natural identification. Possibly however the reference is to Shalmaneser III or IV. For the Galilean site, see ARBEL; see also DB, s.v.

W. EWING

BETHASMOTH, beth-az'moth (AV Bethsamōs; Βαιθασμῶθ, Baithasmōth [1 Esd 5 18]; corresponds to Beth-azmaveth in Neh 7 28): A town in the territory of Benjamin, and may be identified with the modern *el-Hizme*h. See AZMAVETH.

BETH-AVEN, beth-ā'ven (בֵּית אֵוֶן, bēth 'āven; Βαιθᾱ, Baithōn, Βαιθαίν, Baithaīn): A place on the northern boundary of the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 12) E. of Bethel, near Ai (Josh 7 2), W. of Michmash (1 S 13 5; 14 23). Beth-aven, "house of vanity," i.e. "idolatry," may possibly represent an original bēth-ʾōn, "house of wealth." Wilson (PEFS, 1869, 126) suggests Khīrbet An, W. of Michmash. The name is used in mockery for Bethel by Hosea (4 15; 10 5.8, etc; cf Am 5 5).

BETH-AZMAVETH, beth-az-mā'veth (Neh 7 28). See AZMAVETH.

BETH-BAAL-MEON, beth-bā-al-me'on (Josh 13 17). See BAAL-MEON.

BETH-BARAH, beth-bā'ra (בֵּית בָּרָה, bēth bārāh; Βαιθβάρᾱ, Baithērā): Perhaps Bēth-ʾābhāra, the guttural being lost in copying. It is a ford which the Midianites were expected to pass in fleeing from Gideon. Messengers were therefore sent by Gideon to the Ephraimites bidding them "take before them the waters, as far as Beth-barah, even [RVm "and also"] the Jordan" (Jgs 7 24). "The waters" were the streams emptying themselves into the Jordan: "even the Jordan" is a gloss on "the waters." Between the Jordan and the modern Wady Fari'ah an enemy could be entrapped; it is therefore probable that Beth-barah was on that stream near its entrance into the Jordan. See BETHABARA. S. F. HUNTER

BETHBASI, beth-bā'sī (Βαιθβασί, Baithbasi): The name may mean "place of marshes" = Heb bēth-bē'ī. According to G. A. Smith there is a Wady el-Bassah E. of Tekoa in the wilderness of Judaea. The name means "marsh," which Dr. Smith thinks impossible, and really "an echo of an ancient name." Jonathan and Simon repaired the ruins of the fortified place "in the desert" (1 Macc 9 62.64). Jos reads Bethalaga, i.e. Beth-hoglah (Ant, XIII, i, 5). Pesh VS reads Beth-Yashan (see JESHANAH), which Dr. Cheyne thinks is probably correct. Thus the origin of the name and the site of the town are merely conjectural.

BETH-BIRI, beth-bir'ī (AV Beth-birei, beth-bir'ē-ī) בֵּית בִּרְיָ, bēth bir'ī; οἶκος Βραουμσεωρεῖμ, oikos Braoumseōreīm; 1 Ch 4 31 [called in Josh 19 6, Beth-lebaoth, "abode of lions"]): A site belonging to Simeon in the Negebe—unidentified.

BETH-CAR, beth-kār (בֵּית כָּר, bēth-kār; Βαιθ-χόρ, Baithchór, Βελχόρ, Belchór): "And the men of Israel went out of Mizpah, and pursued the Philis, and smote them, until they came under Beth-car" (1 S 7 11). 'Ain Kārem has been suggested; if Mizpah is nebi Samwīl then this identification is probable, as the pursuit would be along the deep Wady beit Hannāneh—a natural line of retreat for the Philis to take. See BETH-HACCHEREM.

BETH-DAGON, beth-dā'gon (בֵּית דָּגוֹן, bēth-dāghōn; Βηθδαγών, Bēthdagōn):

(1) A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Gederoth, Naamah, and Makkedah (Josh 15 41). It may be represented by the modern Beit Dījan, about 6 miles S.E. of Jaffa. This however is a modern site, and not in the Shephelah. Nearly 2 miles to the south is Khīrbet Dājūn, a Rom site. The connection in which it occurs leads us to expect a position farther S.E.

(2) A city on the border of Asher (Josh 19 27) which Conder would identify with Tell D'auk, near the mouth of the Belus, in the plain of Acre.

The name seems to have been of frequent occurrence. There is a Beit Dejan about 6 miles E. of Nāblus, and Jos speaks of a fortress called Dagon above Jericho (Ant, XII, viii, 1; BJ, I, ii, 3). This would seem to indicate a widespread worship of Dagon. But the name may mean "house of corn."

BETH-DIBLATHAIM, beth-dib-la-thā'im (בֵּית דִּבְלַתַּיִם, bēth dibhlāthayim; οἶκος Δεβλαιθαίμ, oikos Deblaitheim, lit. "house of D."): A town in Moab mentioned with Dibon and Nebo (Jer 48 22). It is probably identical with Almondiblathaim (Nu 33 46 f). Mesha claims to have fortified it along with Mehedeba and Ba'al-me'on (see MOABITE STONE). The place is not yet identified.

BETH-EDEN, beth-ē'den (Am 1 5 AVm; EV "house of Eden"). See CHILDREN OF EDEN.

BETHEL, beth'el (בֵּית אֵל, bēth-ʾēl; Βαιθᾱ, Baithēl and οἶκος θεοῦ, oikos theou, lit. "house of God"):

(1) A town near the place where Abraham halted and offered sacrifice on his way south from Shechem. It lay W. of Ai (Gen 12 8). It is

1. Identification named as on the northern border of Benjamin (the southern of Ephraim, Josh 16 2), at the top of the ascent from the Jordan valley by way of Ai (Josh 18 13). It lay S. of Shiloh (Jgs 21 19). Onom places it 12 Rom miles from Jerus, on the road to Neapolis. It is represented by the modern Beitin, a village of some 400 inhabitants, which stands on a knoll E. of the road to Nāblus. There are four springs which yield supplies of good water. In ancient times these were supplemented by a reservoir hewn in the rock S. of the town. The surrounding country is bleak and barren, the hills being marked by a succession of stony terraces, which may have suggested the form of the ladder in Jacob's famous dream.

Bethel.

The town was originally called Luz (Gen 28 19, etc). When Jacob came hither on his way to Paddan-aram we are told that he

2. The lighted upon "the place" (Gen 28 11, Sanctuary Heb). The Heb mākōm, like the cognate Arab. makām, denotes a sacred place or sanctuary. The mākōm was doubtless that at which Abraham had sacrificed, E. of the town. In the morning Jacob set up "for a pillar" the stone which had served as his pillow (Gen 28 18; see PILLAR—maḡḡēbhāh), poured oil upon it and called the name of the place Bethel, "house of God"; that is, of God whose epiphany was for him associated with the pillar. This spot became a center of great interest, lending growing importance to the town. In process of time the name Luz disappeared, giving place to that of the adjoining sanctuary, town and sanctuary being identified. Jacob revisited the place on his return from Paddan-aram; here Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died and was buried under "the oak" (Gen 35 6 f). Probably on rising ground E. of Bethel Abraham and Lot stood to view the uninviting highlands and the rich lands of the Jordan valley (Gen 13 9 ff).

Bethel was a royal city of the Canaanites (Josh 12 16). It appears to have been captured by Joshua (8 7), and it was allotted to

3. History Benjamin (Josh 18 22). In Jgs 1 22 ff it is represented as held by Canaanites, from whom the house of Joseph took it by treachery (cf 1 Ch 7 28). Hither the ark was brought from Gilgal (Jgs 2 1 LXX). Israel came to Bethel to consult the Divine oracle (20 18), and it became an important center of worship (1 S 10 3). The home of the prophetess Deborah was not far off (Jgs 4 5). Samuel visited Bethel on circuit, judging Israel (1 S 7 16).

With the disruption of the kingdom came Bethel's greatest period of splendor and significance. To counteract the influence of Jerus as the national religious center Jeroboam embarked on the policy which won for him the unenviable reputation of having "made Israel to sin." Here he erected a temple, set up an image, the golden calf, and established an imposing ritual. It became the royal sanctuary and the religious center of his kingdom

(1 K 12 29 ff; Am 7 13). He placed in Bethel the priests of the high places which he had made (1 K 12 32). To Bethel came the man of God from Judah who pronounced doom against Jeroboam (1 K 13), and who, having been seduced from duty by an aged prophet in Bethel, was slain by a lion. According to the prophets Amos and Hosea the splendid idolatries of Bethel were accompanied by terrible moral and religious degradation. Against the place they launched the most scathing denunciations, declaring the vengeance such things must entail (Am 3 14; 4 4; 5 11m; 9 1; Hos 4 15; 5 8; 10 5.8.13). With the latter the name Bethel gives place in mockery to Beth-aven. Bethel shared in the downfall of Samaria wrought by the Assyrians; and according to an old tradition, Shalmaneser possessed himself of the golden calf (cf Jer 48 13). The priest, sent by the Assyrians to teach the people whom they had settled in the land how to serve Jeh, dwelt in Bethel (2 K 17 28). King Josiah completed the demolition of the sanctuary at Bethel, destroying all the instruments of idolatry, and harrying the tombs of the idolaters. The monument of the man of God from Judah he allowed to stand (2 K 23 4.15). The men of Bethel were among those who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 28; Neh 7 32), and it is mentioned as reoccupied by the Benjamites (Neh 11 31). Zechariah (7 2) records the sending of certain men from Jerus in the 4th year of King Darius to inquire regarding particular religious practices. Bethel was one of the towns fortified by Bacchides in the time of the Maccabees (1 Macc 9 50; Ant. XIII, i, 3). It is named again as a small town which, along with Ephraim, was taken by Vespasian as he approached Jerus (BJ, IV, ix, 9).

(2) A city in Judah which in 1 S 30 27 is called Bethel; in Josh 19 4 Bethul; and in 1 Ch 4 30 Bethuel. The site has not been identified. In Josh 15 30 LXX gives Baithel in Judah, where the Heb has K'sil—probably a scribal error.

BETHELITE, beth'-el-it: The term applied to a man who in the days of Ahab rebuilt Jericho (1 K 16 34). See HIEL.

BETHEL, MOUNT (הַר בֵּית־אֵל, har bēth-'ēl; Βαυθὰ λούζα, Baithēl louza [1 S 13 2, RV "the mount of Bethel"; Josh 16 1]): The hill which stretches from the N. of the town to Tell 'Aṣūr. The road to Shechem lies along the ridge. An army in possession of these heights easily commanded the route from north to south.

BETH-EMEK, beth-ē'mek (בֵּית הָעֶמֶק, bēth hā-'ēmek; Βηθαμεῖκ, Bēthaemēk, "house of the valley"): A town in the territory of Zebulun (Josh 19 27). It has not been identified, but must be sought somewhere E. of Acre, not far from Kābul, the ancient Cabul.

BETHER, bē'thēr (בֵּתֵר, bether): In Cant 2 17 mention is made of "the mountains of Bether." It is doubtful if a proper name is intended. The RVm has, "perhaps, the spice malobathron." A Bether is prominent in late Jewish history as the place where the Jews resisted Hadrian under Bar Cochba in 135 AD. Its identity with Bittūr, 7 miles S.W. of Jerus, is attested by an inscription.

BETHESDA, bē-thez'da (Βηθεσδα, Bēthesdā; TR, Jn 5 2 [probably בֵּית הַחֶסֶד, bēth hāṣḥēd, "house of mercy"]; other forms occur as Bēthzathā and Bēthsaidā):

(1) The only data we have is the statement in Jn 5 2-4: "Now there is in Jerus by the sheep gate a pool, which is called in Hebrew Bethesda, having five porches. In these lay a multitude of them that were sick, blind, halt, withered." Many ancient authorities add (as in RVm) "waiting for the moving of the water: for an angel of the Lord went down at certain seasons into the pool, and troubled the water," etc.

Pool of Bethesda.

The name does not help as to the site, no such name occurs elsewhere in Jerus; the mention of the

1. The sheep gate is of little assistance because the word "gate" is supplied, and even Conditions were it there, its site is uncertain. of the Sheep "pool" or "place" is at least Narrative: as probable; the tradition about the Jn 5:2 "troubling of the water" (which may be true even if the angelic visitant may be of the nature of folk-lore) can receive no rational explanation except by the well-known phenomenon, by no means uncommon in Syria and always considered the work of a supernatural being, of an intermittent spring. The arrangement of the five porches is similar to that demonstrated by Dr. F. Bliss as having existed in Rom times as the "Pool of Siloam"; the story implies that the incident occurred outside the city walls, as to carry a bed on the Sabbath would not have been forbidden by Jewish traditional law.

(2) Tradition has varied concerning the site. In the 4th cent., and probably down to the Crusades, a pool was pointed out as the true site, a little to the N.W. of the present St. Stephen's Gate; it was part of a twin pool and over it were erected at two successive periods two Christian churches. Later on this site was entirely lost and from the 13th cent. the great Birket Israel, just N. of the Temple area, was pointed out as the site.

Within the last quarter of a cent., however, the older traditional site, now close to the Church of St. Anne, has been rediscovered, excavated and popularly accepted. This 2. The Traditional Site pool is a rock-cut, rain-filled cistern, 55 ft. long × 12 ft. broad, and is approached by a steep and winding flight of steps. The floor of the rediscovered early Christian church roofs over the pool, being supported upon five arches in commemoration of the five porches. At the western end of the church, where probably the font was situated, there was a fresco, now much defaced and fast fading, representing the angel troubling the waters.

(3) Although public opinion supports this site, there is much to be said for the proposal, promulgated by Robinson and supported 3. A More by Conder and other good authorities, Probable that the pool was at the "Virgin's Site Fount" (see GICHON), which is today an intermittent spring whose "troubled" waters are still visited by Jews for purposes of cure. As the only source of "living water" near Jerus, it is a likely spot for there to have been a "sheep pool" or "sheep place" for the vast flocks of sheep coming to Jerus in connection with the temple ritual. BETH-EZEL, beth-ē'zel (בֵּית הָאֵזֶל, bēth hā-ē'zel; οἶκος ἐχόμενος αὐτῆς, oikos echómenos autēs; lit. "adjoining house"): A place named along with other cities in the Phil plain (Mic 1 11). The site has not been identified. By some it is thought to be the same as Azel of Zec 14 5; but see AZEL.

BETH-GADER, beth-gā'dēr (בֵּית גָּדֶר, bēth-gādhēr; Βαϊθγεδώρ, Baithgedōr, or Βαϊθαιδών (B), Baithgaidōn): The name occurs between those of Bethlehem and Kiriath-jearim in 1 Ch 2 51. It is possibly identical with Geder of Josh 12 13.

BETH-GAMUL, beth-gā'mul (בֵּית גַּמּוּל, bēth-gāmūl; οἶκος Γαϊμὺλ, oikos Gaimōl; גַּמּוּלָּה, Gamōlā): A city in Moab named with Dibon, Kiriathaim and Beth-meon (Jer 48 23). Conder places it at Umm el-Jamāl, toward E. of the plateau, S. of Medeba (HDB, s.v.). Others (Guthe, Kurz. bib. Wörterbuch, s.v.; Buhl, GAP, 268, etc) favor Jemeil, a site 6 miles E. of Dhibān. Since the town is not mentioned among the cities of Israel Buhl doubts if it should be sought N. of the Arnon.

BETH-GILGAL, beth-gil'gal (בֵּית הַגִּלְגָּל, bēth ha-gilgāl; Βηθαγγαλγάλ, Bēthaggalgāl; AV house of Gilgal): The Gilgal which lay in the plain E. of Jericho (Neh 12 29). See GILGAL.

BETH-HACCHEREM, beth-ha-kē'rem, beth-hak'e-rem (AV Beth-haccherem; בֵּית הַחֶרֶם, bēth ha-kerem; Βηθαχχαράμ, Bēthachcharām [see DB], "place of the vineyard"): A district (in Neh 3 14) ruled over by one, Malchijah; mentioned in Jer 6 1 as a suitable signal station. From its association with Tekoa (Jer 6 1) and from the statement by Jerome that it was a village which he could see daily from Bethlehem, the Frank mountain (Herodium) has been suggested. It certainly would be a unique place for a beacon. More suitable is the fertile vineyard country around 'Ain Kārem (the "spring of the vineyard"). On the top of Jebel 'Ahi, above this village, are some remarkable cairns which, whatever their other uses, would appear to have been once beacons. 'Ain Kārem appears as Carem in the LXX (Josh 15 59). See BETH-CAR. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BETH-HAGGAN, beth-hag'an (בֵּית הַגֶּן, bēth ha-gān, "house of the garden"). The place where Ahaziah was slain by Jehu (2 K 9 27). The words are rendered in EV "the garden house," but some take them to be a proper name. The location is doubtful.

BETH-HANAN, beth-hā'nan (1 K 4 9), ELON-BETH-HANAN. See ELON.

BETH-HARAM, beth-hā'ram (בֵּית הָרָם, bēth hārām; Βαιθαρὰν, Baitharān; A, Βαιθαρὰν, Baitharrā; AV wrongly, Beth-Aram): An Amorite city taken and fortified by the Gadites (Josh 13 27; Nu 32 36; in the latter passage the name appears as Beth-haran, probably the original form). It corresponds to Bēthramphtha of Jos (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1), which, according to Eusebius, was the name used by the Syrians. Here was a palace of Herod (Ant, XVII, x, 6; BJ, II, iv, 2). Onom says it was called Livia. Jos says it was fortified by Herod Antipas, who called it Julius for the wife of Augustus (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). The name would be changed to Julius when Livia, by the will of the emperor, was received into the Gens Julia. It is represented by Tell er-Rāmeḥ in Wādī Ḥesbān, about 6 miles E. of Jordan. W. EWING

BETH-HARAN, beth-hā'ran (בֵּית הָרָן, bēth hārān): A fenced city E. of the Jordan (Nu 32 36) identical with BETH-HARAM, which see.

BETH-HOGLAH, beth-hog'la (בֵּית הַגְּלָה, bēth-hoghlāh; LXX Βαιθαγλαάμ, Baithaglaām, "house of partridge"): Mentioned in Josh 15 6; 18 19, identified with Ain Hajlah ("partridge spring") lying between Jericho and the Jordan, where in 1874 there was still a ruined Gr monastery called Kasr Hajlah, dating from the 12th cent. The ruins are now destroyed. In Josh 15 5; 18 19 it is said to be at the mouth of the Jordan on a Tongue (Lisān) of the Salt Sea. But it is now several miles inland, probably because the Jordan has silted up a delta to that extent. See DEAD SEA.

BETH-HORON, beth-hō'ron (בֵּית הָחֹרֶן, bēth-hōrōn [other Heb forms occur]; Βηθωράν, Bēthōrōn, probably the "place of the hollow"; cf Hauran, "the hollow"):

(1) The name of two towns, Beth-horon the Upper (Josh 16 5) and Beth-horon the Lower (Josh 16 3), said to have been built

1. The Ancient Towns (1 Ch 7 24) by Sheerah, the daughter of Beriah. The border line between Benjamin and Ephraim passed by the Beth-horons (Josh 16 5; 21 22), the cities belonging to the latter tribe and therefore, later on, to the Northern Kingdom. Solomon "built Beth-horon the upper, and Beth-horon the nether, fortified cities, with walls, gates, and bars" (2 Ch 8 5; 1 K 9 17).

From Egyp sources (Müller, As. und Europa, etc) it appears that Beth-horon was one of the places conquered by Shishak of Egypt from Rehoboam. Again, many cents. later, Bacchides repaired Beth-horon, "with high walls, with gates and with bars and in them he set a garrison, that they might work malice upon ["vex"] Israel" (1 Macc 9 50.51), and at another time the Jews fortified it against Holofernes (Jth 4 4.5).

(2) These two towns are now known as Beit Ur el fokā (i.e. "the upper") and Beit Ur el tahta (i.e. "the lower"), two villages crowning hill tops, less than 2 miles apart; the former is some 800 ft. higher than the latter. Today these villages are sunk into insignificance and are off any important lines of communication, but for many cents. the towns occupying their sites dominated one of the most historic roads in history.

(3) When (Josh 10 10) Joshua discomfited the kings of the Amorites "he slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them by the way of the 'Ascent of Beth-horon.'" When the Philis were opposing King Saul at Michmash they sent a company of their men to hold "the way of Beth-horon." This pass ascends from the plain of Ajalon (now Yālo) and climbs in about $\frac{3}{4}$ hr. to

3. The Pass Beit Ur el tahta (1,210 ft.); it then ascends along the ridge, with valleys Beth-horons lying to north and south, and reaches

Beit Ur el fokā (2,022 ft.), and pursuing the same ridge arrives in another $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles at the plateau to the N. of el Jīb (Gibeon). At intervals along this historic route traces of the ancient Rom paving are visible. It was the great highroad into the heart of the land from the earliest times until about three or four cents. ago. Along this route came Canaanites, Israelites, Philis, Egyptians, Syrians, Romans, Saracens and Crusaders. Since the days of Joshua (Josh 10 10) it has frequently been the scene of a rout. Here the Syrian general Seron was defeated by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 3 13-24), and six years later Nicanor, retreating from Jerus, was here defeated and slain (1 Macc 7 39 ff; Jos, Ant, XII, x, 5). Along this pass in 66 AD the Rom general Cestius Gallus was driven in headlong flight before the Jews.

Now the changed direction of the highroad to Jerus has left the route forsaken and almost forgotten. See PEF, III, 86, Sh XVII.

The battle which gave to the Israelites under Joshua the command of southern Pal has always excited interest because of the astronomical marvel which is recorded

1. The Political Situation to have then taken place.

In invading Pal the Israelites were not attacking a single coherent state, but a country occupied by different races and divided, like Greece at a later period, into a number of communities, each consisting practically of but a single city and the cultivated country around it. Thus Joshua destroyed the two cities of Jericho and Ai without any interference from the other Amorites. The destruction of Jericho gave him full possession of the fertile valley of the Jordan; the taking of Ai opened his way up to the ridge which forms the backbone of the country, and he was able to lead the people unopposed to the mountains of Ebal and Gerizim for the solemn reading of the Law. But when the Israelites returned from this ceremony a significant division showed itself amongst their enemies. Close to Ai, Joshua's most recent conquest, was Beeroth, a small town inhabited by Hivites; and no doubt because in the natural order of events Beeroth might look to be next attacked, the Hivites determined to make terms with Israel. An embassy was therefore sent from Gibeon, their chief city, and Joshua and the Israelites, believing that it came from a distant land not under the Ban, entered into the proposed alliance.

The effect on the political situation was immediate. The Hivites formed a considerable state, relatively speaking; their cities were well placed on the southern highland, and Gibeon, their capital, was one of the most important fortresses of that district, and only 6 miles distant from Jerus, the chief Amorite stronghold. The Amorites recognized at once that, in view of this important defection, it was imperative for them to crush the Gibeonites before the Israelites could unite with them, and this they endeavored to do. The Gibeonites, seeing themselves attacked, sent an urgent message to Joshua, and he at the head of his picked men made a night march up from Gilgal and fell upon the Amorites at Gibeon the next day and put them to flight.

exposed to a great danger, for the Amorites might have caught him before he had gained a footing on the plateau, and have taken him at a complete disadvantage. It was thus that the eleven tribes suffered such terrible loss at the hands of the Benjamites in this very region during the first inter-tribal war, and probably the military significance of the first repulse from Ai was of the BATTLE OF BETH-HORON.

We are not told by which route he marched, but it is significant that the Amorites fled by the way of Beth-horon; that is to say, not toward their own cities, but away from them. A glance at the map shows that this means that Joshua had succeeded in cutting their line of retreat to Jerus. He had probably therefore advanced upon Gibeon from the south, instead of by the obvious route past Ai which he had destroyed and Beeroth with which he was in alliance. But, coming up from Gilgal by the ravines in the neighborhood of Jerus, he was same character; the forces holding the high ground being able to overwhelm their opponents without any fear of reprisals.

It would seem possible, therefore, that Joshua may have repeated, on a larger scale, the tactics he employed in his successful attack upon Ai. He may have sent one force to draw the Amorites away from Gibeon, and when this was safely done, may have led the rest of his army to seize the road to Jerus, and to break up the forces besieging Gibeon. If so, his strategy was successful up to a certain point. He evidently led the Israelites without loss up to Gibeon, crushed the Amorites there, and cut off their retreat toward Jerus. He failed in one thing. In spite of the prodigious efforts which he and his men had made, the greater part of the Amorite army succeeded in escaping him and gained a long start in their flight, toward the northwest, through the two Beth-horons.

It was at this point that the incident occurred upon which attention has been chiefly fixed. The

3. Joshua's been a collection of war songs and Command other ballads) ascribes to Joshua the command:

'Sun, be thou silent upon (be) Gibeon [cf RVm];
And thou, Moon, in (be) the valley of Aijalon.
And the Sun was silent,
And the Moon stayed,

Until the nation had avenged themselves of their enemies' (Josh 10 12.13).

And the prose narrative continues, "The sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down about a whole day."

In these two, the ballad and the prose chronicle, we have several distinct astronomical relations indicated. The sun to Joshua was

4. The associated with Gibeon, and the sun Astronom- can naturally be associated with a ical locality in either of two positions: it Relations may be overhead to the observer, in which case he would consider it as being above the place where he himself was standing; or on the other hand, he might see the locality on the skyline and the sun rising or setting just behind it. In the present instance there is no ambiguity, for the chronicle distinctly states that the sun was in "the midst of heaven"; lit. in the halving of the heaven, that is to say overhead. This is very important because it assures us that Joshua must have been at Gibeon when he spoke, and that it must have been noonday of summer when the sun in southern Pal is only about 8° or 12° from the exact zenith. Next, the moon appeared to be associated with the valley of Aijalon; that is, it must have been low down on the horizon in that direction, and since Aijalon is N.W. of Gibeon it must have been about to set, which would imply that it was about half full, in its "third quarter," the sun being, as we have seen, on the meridian. Thirdly, "the sun hasted not to go down," that is to say, it had already attained the meridian, its culmination; and henceforward its motion was downward. The statement that it was noonday is here implicitly repeated, but a further detail is added. The going down of the sun appeared to be slow. This is the work of the afternoon, that is of half the day, but on this occasion the half-day appeared equal in length to an ordinary whole day. There is therefore no question at all of the sun becoming stationary in the sky: the statement does not admit of that, but only of its slower progress.

The idea that the sun was fixed in the sky, in other words, that the earth ceased for a time to rotate on its axis, has arisen from the unfortunate rendering of the Heb vb. 5. The dām, "be silent," by "stand thou "Silence" still." It is our own word "dumb," of the Sun both being onomatopoeic words from the sound made when a man firmly closes his lips upon his speech. The primary meaning of the word therefore is "to be silent," but its secondary meaning is "to desist," "to cease," and therefore in some cases "to stand still."

From what was it then that Joshua wished the sun to cease: from its moving or from its shining? It is not possible to suppose that, engaged as he was in a desperate battle, he was even so much as thinking of the sun's motion at all. But its shining, its scorching heat, must have been most seriously felt by him. At noon, in high summer, the high-land of southern Pal is one of the hottest countries of the world. It is impossible to suppose that Joshua wished the sun to be fixed overhead, where it must have been distressing his men who had already been 17 hours on foot. A very arduous pursuit lay before them and the enemy not only had a long start but must have been fresher than the Israelites. The sun's heat therefore must have been a serious hindrance, and Joshua must have desired it to be tempered. And the Lord hearkened to his voice and gave him this and much more. A great hailstorm swept up from the west, bringing with it a sudden lowering of temperature, and no doubt hiding the sun and putting it to "silence." And "Jehovah fought for Israel," for the storm burst with such violence

6. "Jeho- upon the Amorites as they fled down vah Fought the steep descent between the Beth- for Israel" horons, that "they were more who died with the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword" (ver 11). This was the culminating incident of the day, the one which so greatly impressed the sacred historian. "There was no day like that before it or after it, that Jehovah hearkened unto the voice of a man" (ver 14). It was not the hailstorm in itself nor the veiling of the sun that made the day so remarkable. It was that Joshua had spoken, not in prayer or supplication, but in command, as if all Nature was at his disposal; and the Lord had hearkened and had, as it were, obeyed a human voice: an anticipation of the time when a greater Joshua should command even the winds and the sea, and they should obey Him (Mt 8 23-27).

The explanation of the statement that the sun "hasted not to go down about a whole day" is found in ver 10, in which it is stated that the Lord discomfited the Amorites before Israel, "and he slew them with a great slaughter at Gibeon, and chased them by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah." The Israelites had of course no time-keepers, no clocks or watches, and the only mode of measuring time available to them was the number of miles they marched. Now from Gibeon to Makkedah by the route indicated is some 30 miles, a full day's march for an army. It is possible that, at the end of the campaign, the Israelites on their return found the march from Makkedah to Gibeon heavy work for an entire day. Measured by the only means available to them, that afternoon seemed to be double the ordinary length. The sun had "hasted not to go down about a whole day."

Joshua's reference to the moon in connection with the Valley of Aijalon appears at first sight

8. The irrelevant, and has frequently been Chronicle assumed to be merely inserted to complete the parallelism of the poem. and the But when examined astronomically Poem Inde- it becomes clear that it cannot have pendent been inserted haphazard. Joshua must Witnesses have mentioned the moon because he actually saw it at the moment of speaking. Given that the sun was "in the midst of heaven," above Gibeon, there was only a very restricted arc of the horizon in which the moon could appear as associated with some terrestrial object; and from Gibeon, the Valley of Aijalon does lie within that narrow arc. It follows therefore that unless the position assigned to the moon had been obtained from actual observation at the moment, it would in all probability have been an impossible one. The next point is esp. interesting. The ballad does not expressly state whether the sun was upon Gibeon in the sense of being upon it low down on the distant horizon, or upon it, in the sense of being overhead both to Joshua and to that city. But the moon being above the Valley of Aijalon, it becomes clear that the latter is the only possible solution. The sun and moon cannot both have been setting—though this is the idea that has been generally held, it being supposed that the day was far spent and that Joshua desired it to be prolonged—for then sun and moon would have been close together, and the moon would be invisible. The sun cannot have been setting, and the moon rising; for Aijalon is W. of Gibeon. Nor can the sun have been rising, and the moon setting, since this would imply that the time of year was either about October 30 of our present calendar, or about February 12. The month of February was already past, since the Israelites had kept the Feast of the Passover. October cannot have come; for, since Beeroth, Gibeon and Jerus were so close together, it is certain that the events between the return of the Israelites to Gilgal and the battle of Beth-horon cannot have been spread over several months, but must have occupied only a few days. The poem therefore contains implicitly the same fact that is explicitly stated in the prose narrative—that the sun was overhead—but the one statement cannot, in those days, have been inferred from the other.

A third point of interest is that the position of the moon gives an indication of the time of the year.

The Valley of Aijalon is 17° N. of W. from Gibeon, of which the latitude is 31° 51' N. With these details, and assuming the time to be nearly noon, the date must have been about the 21st day of the 4th month of the Jewish calendar, corresponding to July 22 of our present calendar, with a possible uncertainty of one or two days on either side. The sun's declination would then be about 21° N., so that at noon it was within 11° of the zenith. It had risen almost exactly at 5 AM and would set almost exactly at 7 PM. The moon was now about her third quarter, and in N. lat. about 5°. It had risen about 11 o'clock the previous night, and was now at an altitude of under 7°, and within about half an hour of setting. The conditions are not sufficient to fix the year, since from the nature of the luni-solar cycle there will always be one or two years in each cycle of 19 that will satisfy the conditions of the case, and the date of the Heb invasion of Pal is not known with sufficient certainty to limit the inquiry to any particular cycle.

It will be seen however that the astronomical conditions introduced by the mention of the moon are much more stringent than might have been expected. They supply therefore proof of a high order that the astronomical details, both of the poem and prose chronicle, were derived from actual observation at the time and have been preserved to us unaltered. Each, therefore, supplies a strictly contemporaneous and independent record.

This great occurrence appears to be referred to in one other passage of Scripture—the Prayer of Habakkuk. Here again the rendering of the Eng. VSS is unfortunate, and the passage should stand:

'The sun and moon ceased [to shine] in their habitation;
At the light of Thine arrows they vanished,
And at the shining of Thy glittering spear.
Thou didst march through the land in indignation,
Thou didst thresh the nations in anger' (Hab 3 11.12).

BETHINK, bē-think' (בְּחַשְׁבֹּן, hēshibh 'el lēbh, "to lay to heart," hence "recall to mind"):

Anglo-Saxon word used only in seventh petition of Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the Temple. If the people, carried into captivity, because of sin, should "take it to heart," then God (he prayed) would hear and forgive (1 K 8 47; 2 Ch 6 37). A choice illustration of the mental and heart process in reflection, repentance and conversion.

In Josh 12 3 the way to Beth-jeshimoth is described as S. of the Arabah, near the Dead Sea. It was in the lot assigned to Reuben (Josh 13 20). At what times and how long it was actually held by Israel we do not know; but it appears in Ezk 25 9 as belonging to Moab. It may be identical with Khirbet es-Suweimeh, where there are some ruins and a well, about 3 miles E. of the mouth of the Jordan.

BETH-LE-APHRAH, beth-lē-af'ra (בֵּית לַעֲפְרָה, bēth le'aphrah; LXX ἐξ οἴκου κατὰ γέλωτα, ex oikou katà gélōta, "house of dust"): The name of a place found only in Mic 1 10. From the connection in which it is used it was probably in the Phili plain. There seems to be a play upon the name in the sentence, "at Beth le-aphrah have I rolled myself in the dust," aphrah meaning "dust," and possibly another on Philistine in rolled, הִתְפַּלְשִׁיתִי, hith-pallāshitī (see G. A. Smith, The Book of the Twelve Prophets, called Minor, in loc.).

BETH-LEBAOTH, beth-lē-bā'oth, beth-leb'a-oth (בֵּית לְבָאוֹת, bēth le'bha'ōth; Βαιθαλάβω, Baithalabō, "house of lionesses"): A town in the territory of Simeon (Josh 19 6). In 1 Ch 4 31 the name is given as Beth-birei: RV BETH-BIRI (q.v.).

BETHLEHEM, beth'lē-hem (בֵּית-לְחֶם, bēth lehem; Βαιθλέμ, Baithléem, or Βηθλέμ, Bēthléem, "house of David," or possibly "the house of Lakhmu," an Assy deity):

1. Bethlehem Judah, or EPHRATH or EPHRATHAH (q.v.) is now Beit Lahm (Arab. = "house of meat"), a town of upward of 10,000 inhabitants, 5 miles S. of Jerus and 2,350 ft. above sea level. It occupies an outstanding position upon a spur running E. from the watershed with deep valleys to the N.E. and S. It is just off the main road to Hebron and the south, but upon the highroad to Tekoa and En-gedi. The position is one of natural strength; it was occupied by a garrison of the Philis in the days of David (2 S 23 14; 1 Ch 11 16) and was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 6). The surrounding country is fertile, cornfields, fig and olive yards and vineyards abound. Bethlehem is not naturally well supplied with water, the nearest spring is 800 yds. to the S.E., but for many cents. the "low level aqueduct" from "Solomon's Pools" in the Artās valley, which has here been tunneled through the hill, has been tapped by the inhabitants; there are also many rock-cut cisterns.

In 1 Ch 2 51 Salma, the son of Caleb, is described as the "father of Bethlehem." In Gen 35 19;

48 7 it is recorded that Rachel "was buried in the way to Ephrath (the same is Beth-lehem)." Tradition points out the site of Rachel's tomb near where the road to Bethlehem leaves the main road. The Levites of the events of Jgs 17, 19 were Bethlehemites. In the list of the towns of Judah

noticeable that from her new home she could view the mountains of Moab, her native land. David himself "was the son of that Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah, whose name was Jesse" (1 S 17 12). To Bethlehem came Samuel to anoint a successor to unworthy Saul (1 S 16 4): "David went to and fro from Saul to feed his father's sheep at Bethlehem" (1 S 17 15). David's "three mighty men"

"brake through the host of the Philis, and drew water out of the well of Beth-lehem, that was by the gate, and took it, and brought it to David" (2 S 23 14. 16). Tradition still points out the well. From this town came those famous "sons of Zeruiah," David's nephews, whose loyalty and whose ruthless cruelty became at once a protection and a menace to their royal relative: in 2 S 2 32 it is mentioned that one of them, Asahel, was buried "in the sepulchre of his father, which was in Beth-lehem."

After the time of David, Bethlehem would appear to have sunk into insignificance. But its future fame is pointed at by Micah (5 2): "But thou, Beth-lehem Ephrathah, which art little to be among the thousands of Judah, out of thee shall one come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel; whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting."

In the return of the Jews captive Bethlehemites re-inhabited the place (Ezr 2 21; Neh 7 26 "men"; 1 Esd 5 17 "sons").

In the NT Bethlehem is mentioned as the birth-place of the Messiah Jesus (Mt 2 1.5; Lk 2 4.15)

4. The Christian Era

in consequence of which event occurred Herod's "massacre of the innocents" (Mt 2 8.16). Inasmuch as Hadrian devastated Bethlehem and set up there a sacred grove to Adonis (Jerome, Ep. ad Paul, lviii.3) it is clear that veneration of this spot as the site of the Nativity must go back before 132 AD. Constantine (cir 330) founded a basilica over the cave-stable which tradition pointed out as the scene of the birth, and his church, unchanged in general structure though enlarged by Justinian and frequently adorned, repaired and damaged, remains today the chief attraction of the town. During the Crusades, Bethlehem became of great importance and prosperity; it remained in Christian hands after the overthrow of the Lat kingdom, and at the present day it is in material things one of the most prosperous Christian centers in the Holy Land.

II. Bethlehem of Zebulun (Josh 19 15) was probably the home of Ibzan (Jgs 12 8.10) though Jewish tradition is in support of (1). See Jos, Ant, V, vii, 13. This is now the small village of Beit Lahm, some 7 miles N.W. of Nazareth on the edge of the oak forest. Some antiquities have been found here recently, showing that in earlier days it was a place of some importance. It is now the site of a small German colony. See PEF, I, 270, Sh V. E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BETH-LEHEMITE, beth-lē-hem-it (בֵּית הַלֶּחֶמִי, bēth ha-lahmī): An inhabitant of Bethlehem, a town in Judah, 5 miles S. of Jerus. Jesse is so named in 1 S 16 18; 17 58, and Elhanan in 2 S 21 19. The children of Bethlehem are referred to in Ezr 2 21; Neh 7 26; 1 Esd 5 17.

BETH-LOMON, beth-lō'mōn (Βαιθλωμών, Baithlōmōn; B, Παγελωμών, Rhagethlōmōn): The inhabitants of this city are mentioned as returning with Zerubbabel from Babylon (1 Esd 5 17). It is the city of Bethlehem in Judah, the modern Beit Lahm (Ezr 2 21).

BETH-MARCABOTH, beth-mār'ka-both (בֵּית הַמַּרְכָּבֹת, bēth ha-markābhōth; Βαιθμαχεράβ, Baithmacheréb, "the house of chariots"): Mentioned along with Hazar-susah, "the station of horses" (Josh 19 5; 1 Ch 4 31) as cities in the Negeb near Ziklag. It is tempting to connect these stations with "the cities for his chariots, and the cities for his horsemen" which Solomon built (1 K 9 19; cf 1 K 10 26). The site of Beth-marcaboth has not been identified, but Guérin (La Terre Sainte. Jerus et le Nord de la Judée, II, 230) suggests Khan Yunas, S.W. of Gaza, as a suitable chariot city.

BETH-NIMRAH, beth-nim'ra (בֵּית נִמְרָה, bēth nimrāh, "house of leopard," Nu 32 36, but in ver 3 it is simply Nimrah): In Josh 13 27 the full name appears. In Isa 15 6 the name appears as Nimrim, identified as Tell Nimrim, between Jericho and the mountains on the east; where there is a fountain of large size. The city was assigned to Gad. In the 4th cent. AD it was located as five Rom miles N. of Livias. Eusebius calls it Betham-naram (SEP, I, Tell Nimrin).

BETH-PAZZEZ, beth-paz'ez (בֵּית פַּצֵּז, bēth pazēz; Βηρσαφής, Bērsaphēs, Βαιθφρασίη, Baithphrasēē): A town in the territory of Issachar, named with En-gannim and En-haddah (Josh 19 21). The site has not been discovered; it probably lay near the modern Jenin.

BETH-PEOR, beth-pē'or (בֵּית פְּעוֹר, bēth pē'ōr; οἶκος Φογῶρ, oikos Phogōr; in Josh (B), Βαιθφογῶρ, Baithphogōr, or βεθ-, beth-): "Over against Beth-peor" the Israelites were encamped, "beyond the Jordan, in the valley," when Moses uttered the speeches recorded in Dt (Dt 3 29; 4 46). "In the valley in the land of Moab over against Beth-peor" Moses was buried (Dt 34 6). Beth-peor and the slopes of Pisgah (AV "Ashdodth-pisgah") are mentioned in close connection in Josh 13 20. According to Onom, Beth-peor was situated near Mt. Peor (Fogor) opposite Jericho, 6 miles above Livias. Mt. Peor is the "top" or "head" of Peor (Nu 23 28). Some height commanding a view of the plain E. of the river in the lower Jordan valley is clearly intended, but thus far no identification is possible. "The slopes of Pisgah" are probably the lower slopes of the mountain toward Wādy 'Ayūn Mūsa. Somewhere N. of this the summit we are in search of may be found. Conder suggested the cliff at Minyeh, S. of Wādy Jedeideh, and of Pisgah; and would locate Beth-peor at el-Mareighāt, "the smeared things," evidently an ancient place of worship, with a stone circle and standing stones, about 4 miles E., on the same ridge. This seems, however, too far S., and more difficult to reach from Shittim than we should gather from Nu 25 1 ff.

that it was near but outside Jerus; it was at the Sabbatical distance limit E. of Jerus, and was surrounded by some kind of wall. The mediaeval Bethphage was between the summit and Bethany. The site is now inclosed by the Roman Catholics. As regards the Bethphage of the NT, the most probable suggestion was that it occupied the summit itself where Kefr et Tār stands today. This village certainly occupies an ancient site and no other name is known. This is much more probable than the suggestion that the modern Abu Dis is on the site of Bethphage.

BETH-REHOB, beth-rē'hob (בֵּית רְהוֹב, bēth-rēhōb; ὁ οἶκος Ραάβ, ho oikos Rhadāb): An Aramaean town and district which, along with Zobah and Maacah, assisted Ammon against David (2 S 10 6.8, Rehob). It is probably identical with Rehob (Nu 13 21), the northern limit of the spies' journey. Laish-Dan (probably Tell el-Kadi) was situated near it (Jgs 18 28). The site of the town is unknown. It has been conjecturally identified with Hunin, W. of Banias, and, more plausibly, with Banias itself (Thomson, *The Land and the Book*², 218; Buhl, Geog., 240; Moore, ICC, Jgs, 399).

C. H. THOMSON

BETHSAIDA, beth-sā'i-da (Βηθσαιδά, Bēthsaidā, "house of fishing"):

(1) A city E. of the Jordan, in a "desert place" (that is, uncultivated ground used for grazing) at which Jesus miraculously fed the multitude with five loaves and two fishes (Mk 6 32 ff; Lk 9 10). This is doubtless to be identified with the village of Bethsaida in Lower Gaulonitis which the Tetrarch Philip raised to the rank of a city, and called Julias, in honor of Julia, the daughter of Augustus. It lay near the place where the Jordan enters the Sea of Gennesaret (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1; III, x, 7; Vita, 72). This city may be located at et-Tell, a ruined site on the E. side of the Jordan on rising ground, fully a mile from the sea. As this is too far from the sea for a fishing village, Schumacher (The Jaulān, 246) suggests that el-Araj, "a large, completely destroyed site close to the lake," connected in ancient times with et-Tell "by the beautiful roads still visible," may have been the fishing village, and et-Tell the princely residence. He is however inclined to favor el-Mes'adiyah, a ruin and winter village of Arab el-Tellawiye, which stands on an artificial mound, about a mile and a half from the mouth of the Jordan. It should be noted, however, that the name is in origin radically different from Bethsaida. The substitution of sin for sad is easy: but the insertion of the guttural 'ain is impossible. No trace of the name Bethsaida has been found in the district; but any one of the sites named would meet the requirements.

To this neighborhood Jesus retired by boat with His disciples to rest awhile. The multitude following on foot along the northern shore of the lake would cross the Jordan by the ford at its mouth which is used by foot travelers to this day. The "desert" of the narrative is just the barrīyeh of the Arabs where the animals are driven out for pasture. The "green grass" of Mk 6 39, and the "much grass" of Jn 6 10, point to some place in the plain of el-Bateihah, on the rich soil of which the grass is green and plentiful compared with the scanty herbage on the higher slopes.

(2) Bethsaida of Galilee, where dwelt Philip, Andrew, Peter (Jn 1 44; 12 21), and perhaps also James and John. The house of Andrew and Peter seems to have been not far from the synagogue in Capernaum (Mt 8 14; Mk 1 29, etc). Unless they had moved their residence from Bethsaida to Capernaum, of which there is no record, and which for fishermen was unlikely, Bethsaida must have lain close to Capernaum. It may have been the fishing town adjoining the larger city. As in the case of the other Bethsaida, no name has been recovered to guide us to the site. On the rocky promontory, however, E. of Khān Minyeh we find Sheikh 'Aly es-Saiyādīn, "Sheikh Aly of the Fishermen," as the name of a ruined waley, in which the second element in the name Bethsaida is represented. Near by is the site at 'Ain et-Tābigah, which many have identified with Bethsaida of Galilee. The warm water from copious springs runs into a little bay of the sea in which fishes congregate in great numbers. This has therefore always been a favorite haunt of fishermen. If Capernaum were at Khān Minyeh, then the two lay close together. The names of many ancient places have been lost, and others have strayed from their original localities. The absence of any name resembling Bethsaida need not concern us.

Many scholars maintain that all the NT references to Bethsaida apply to one place, viz. Bethsaida Julias. The arguments for and

Were There against this view may be summarized as follows:

Bethsaidas? (a) Galilee ran right round the lake, including most of the level coast-land on the E. Thus Gamala, on the eastern shore, was within the jurisdiction of Jos, who commanded in Galilee (BJ, II, xx, 4). Judas of Gamala (Ant, XVIII, i, 1) is also called Judas of Galilee (ib, i, 6). If Gamala, far down the eastern shore of the sea, were in Galilee, a fortiori Bethsaida, a town which lay on the very edge of the Jordan, may be described as in Galilee.

But Jos makes it plain that Gamala, while added to his jurisdiction, was not in Galilee, but in Gaulonitis (BJ, II, xx, 6). Even if Judas were born in Gamala, and so might properly be called a Gaulonite, he may, like others, have come to be known as belonging to the province in which his active life was spent. "Jesus of Nazareth" was born in Bethlehem. Then Jos explicitly says that Bethsaida was in Lower Gaulonitis (BJ, II, ix, 1). Further, Luke places the country of the Gerasenes on the other side of the sea from Galilee (8 26)—antipera tēs Galilāias ("over against Galilee").

(b) To go to the other side—eis tō pérān (Mk 6 45)—does not of necessity imply passing from the E. to the W. coast of the lake, since Jos uses the vb. diaperaiōō of a passage from Tiberias to Tarichaea (Vita, 59). But (a) this involved a passage from a point on the W. to a point on the S. shore, "crossing over" two considerable bays; whereas if the boat started from any point in el-Bateiḥah, to which we seem to be limited by the "much grass," and by the definition of the district as belonging to Bethsaida, to sail to el-Tell, it was a matter of coasting not more than a couple of miles, with no bay to cross. (β) No case can be cited where the phrase eis to peran certainly means anything else than "to the other side." (γ) Mark says that the boat started to go unto the other side to Bethsaida, while John gives the direction "over the sea unto Capernaum" (6 17). The two towns were therefore practically in the same line. Now there is no question that Capernaum was on "the other side," nor is there any suggestion that the boat was driven out of its course; and it is quite obvious that, sailing toward Capernaum, whether at Tell Hūm or at Khān Minyeh, it would never reach Bethsaida Julias. (δ) The present writer is familiar with these waters in both storm and calm. If the boat was taken from any point in el-Bateiḥah towards el-Tell, no east wind would have distressed the rowers, protected as that part is by the mountains. Therefore it was no contrary wind that carried them toward Capernaum and the "land of Gennesaret." On the other hand, with a wind from the W., such as is often experienced, eight or nine hours might easily be occupied in covering the four or five miles from el-Bateiḥah to the neighborhood of Capernaum.

(c) The words of Mark (6 45), it is suggested (Sanday, Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 42), have been too strictly interpreted: as the Gospel was written probably at Rome, its author being a native, not of Galilee, but of Jerus. Want of precision on topographical points, therefore, need not surprise us.

But as we have seen above, the "want of precision" must also be attributed to the writer of Jn 6 17. The agreement of these two favors the strict interpretation. Further, if the Gospel of Mark embodies the recollections of Peter, it would be difficult to find a more reliable authority for topographical details connected with the sea on which his fisher life was spent.

(d) In support of the single-city theory it is further argued that (α) Jesus withdrew to Bethsaida as being in the jurisdiction of Philip, when he heard of the murder of John by Antipas, and would not have sought again the territories of the latter so soon after leaving them. (β) Mediaeval works of travel notice only one Bethsaida. (γ) The E. coast of the sea was definitely attached to Galilee in AD 84, and Ptolemy (cir 140) places Julias in Galilee. It is therefore significant that only the Fourth Gospel speaks of "Bethsaida of Galilee." (δ) There could hardly have been two Bethsaidas so close together.

But: (α) It is not said that Jesus came hither that he might leave the territory of Antipas for that of Philip; and in view of Mk 6 30 ff, and Lk 9 10 ff, the inference from Mt 14 13 that he did so, is not warranted. (β) The Bethsaida of mediaeval writers was evidently on the W. of the Jordan. If it lay on the E. it is inconceivable that none of them should have mentioned the river in this connection. (γ) If the 4th Gospel was not written until well into the 2d cent., then the apostle was not the author; but this is a very precarious assumption. John, writing after 84 AD, would hardly have used the phrase "Bethsaida of Galilee" of a place only recently attached to that province, writing, as he was, at a distance from the scene, and recalling the former familiar conditions. (δ) In view of the frequent repetition of names in Pal the nearness of the two Bethsaidas raises no difficulty. The abundance of fish at each place furnished a good reason for the recurrence of the name.

BETHSAMOS, beth-sā'mos. See BETHASMOS.

BETH-SHEAN, beth-shē'an, BETH-SHAN, beth'shan (בֵּית־שֵׁאן, בֵּית־שָׁן, bēth-shan, or bēth-shē'an; in Apoc Βαθσαῦ or Βεθρά, Baithsán or Bethsá): A city in the territory of Issachar assigned to Manasseh, out of which the Canaanites were not driven (Josh 17 11; Jgs 1 27); in the days of Israel's strength they were put to taskwork (Jgs 1 28). They doubtless were in league with the Philis who after Israel's defeat on Gilboa exposed the bodies of Saul and his sons on the wall of the city (1 S 31 7 ff), whence they were rescued by the men of Jabesh, who remembered the earlier kindness of the king (1 S 31 7 ff; 2 S 21 12). In 1 K 4 12 the name applies to the district in which the city stands. It was called Scythopolis by the Greeks. This may be connected with the invasion of Pal by the Scythians who, according to George Syncellus, "overran Pal and took possession of Beisan." This may be the invasion noticed by Herodotus, cir 600 BC (i.104-6). Here Tryphon failed in his first attempt to take Jonathan by treachery (1 Macc 12 40). It fell to John Hyrcanus, but was taken from the Jews by Pompey. It was rebuilt by Gabinius (Ant, XIV, v, 3), and became an important member of the league of the "ten cities" (BJ, III, ix, 7). The impiety of the inhabitants is painted in dark colors by Jos (Vita, 6; BJ, II, xviii, 3); and the Mish speaks of it as a center of idol worship (ʿĀbhōdhāh Zārāh, i.4). Later it was the seat of a bishop.

It is represented by the modern Beisān, in the throat of the Vale of Jezreel where it falls into the Jordan valley, on the southern side of the stream from 'Ain Jalud. The ruins of the ancient city are found on the plain, and on the great mound where probably stood the citadel. Between the town and the stretch of marsh land to the S. runs the old road from E. to W. up the Vale of Jezreel, uniting in Esdraelon with the great caravan road from N. to S.

BETH-SHEMESH, beth-shē'mesh, beth'shē-mesh (בֵּית-שֶׁמֶשׁ, bēth-shemesh; Βαιθσαμης, Baithsámus, "house of the sun"): This name for a place doubtless arose in every instance from the presence of a sanctuary of the sun there. In accordance with the meaning and origin of the word, it is quite to be expected that there should be several places of this name in Bible lands, and the expectation is not disappointed. Analysis and comparison of the passages in the Bible where a Beth-shemesh is mentioned show four places of this name.

The first mention of a place by this name is in the description of the border of the territory of Judah (Josh 15 10) which "went

1. Beth-shemesh of Judah down to B." This topographical indication "down" puts the place toward the lowlands on the E. or W. side of Pal, but does not indicate which. This point is clearly determined by the account of the return of the ark by the Philis lords from Ekron (1 S 6 9-19). They returned the ark to Beth-shemesh, the location of which they indicated by the remark that if their affliction was from Jeh, the kine would bear the ark "by the way of its own border." The Philis lay along the western border of Judah and the location of B. of Judah is thus clearly fixed near the western lowland, close to the border between the territory of Judah and that claimed by the Philis. This is confirmed by the account of the twelve officers of the commissariat of King Solomon. One of these, the son of Dekar, had a Beth-shemesh in his territory. By excluding the territory assigned to the other eleven officers, the territory of this son of Dekar is found to be in Judah and to lie along the Philis border (1 K 4 9). A Philis attack upon the border-land of Judah testifies to the same effect (2 Ch 28 18). Finally, the battle between Amaziah of Judah and Jehoash of Israel, who "looked one another in the face" at Beth-shemesh, puts B. most probably near the border between Judah and Israel, which would locate it near the northern part of the western border of Judah's territory. In the assignment of cities to the Levites, Judah gave Beth-shemesh with its suburbs (Josh 21 16). It has been identified with a good degree of certainty with the modern 'Ain Shems.

It may be that Ir-shemesh, "city of the sun," and Har-heres, "mount of the sun," refer to Beth-shemesh of Judah (Josh 15 10; 19 41-43; 1 K 4 9; Jgs 1 33,35). But the worship of the sun was so common and cities of this name so many in number that it would be hazardous to conclude with any assurance that because these three names refer to the same region they therefore refer to the same place.

In the description of the tribal limits, it is said of Issachar (Josh 19 22), "And the border reached to Tabor, and Shahazumah, and Beth-shemesh; and the goings out of their border were at the Jordan." The description indicates that Beth-shemesh was in the eastern part of Issachar's territory. The exact location of the city is not known.

A Beth-shemesh is mentioned together with Beth-anath as cities of Naphtali (Josh 19 38).

There is no clear indication of the location of this city. Its association with Beth-anath may indicate that they were near each other in the central part of the tribal allotment.

3. Beth-shemesh of Naphtali As at Gezer, another of the cities of the Levites, the Canaanites were not driven out from Beth-shemesh.

A doom is pronounced upon "Beth-shemesh, that is in the land of Egypt" (Jer 43 13). The Seventy identify it with Heliopolis. There is some uncertainty about this identification. If Beth-shemesh, "house of the sun," is here a description of Heliopolis, why does it not have the art.? If it is a proper name, how does it come that a sanctuary in Egypt is called by a Heb name? It may be that the large number of Jews in Egypt with Jeremiah gave this Heb name to Heliopolis for use among themselves, B. being a tr of Egypt Perra as suggested by Griffith. Otherwise, B. cannot have been Heliopolis, but must have been some other, at present unknown, place of Sem worship. This latter view seems to be favored by Jeremiah's double threat: "He shall also break the pillars of Beth-shemesh, that is in the land of Egypt; and the houses of the gods of Egypt shall he burn with fire" (ib). If B. were the "house of the sun," then the balancing of the statement would be only between "pillars" and "houses," but it seems more naturally to be between Beth-shemesh, a Sem place of worship "that is in the land of Egypt" on the one hand, and the Egypt place of worship, "the houses of the gods of Egypt," on the other.

But the Seventy lived in Egypt and in their interpretation of this passage were probably guided by accurate knowledge of facts unknown now, such as surviving names, tradition and even written history. Until there is further light on the subject, it is better to accept their interpretation and identify this Beth-shemesh with Heliopolis. See ON.

BETH-SHEMITE, beth-shē'mīt (בֵּית-שֶׁמֶשִׁי, bēth-shimshī [1 S 6 14,18]): An inhabitant of Beth-shemesh in Judah (cf BETH-SHEMESH 1).

BETH-SHITTAH, beth-shit'a (בֵּית הַשִּׁטָּה, bēth ha-shittāh, "house of the acacia"): A place on the route followed by the Midianites in their flight before Gideon (Jgs 7 22). It is probably identical with the modern Shutfa, a village in the Vale of Jezreel, about 6 miles N.W. of Beisan.

BETHSURA, beth-sū'ra (Βαιθσοῦρα, Baithsoûra [1 Macc 4 29, etcl], BETHSURON (2 Macc 11 5 RV): The Gr form of the name BETH-ZUR (q.v.).

BETH-TAPPUAH, beth-tap'û-a (בֵּית-תַּפּוּחַיִם, bēth-tappū'ah; Βεθταπφουά, Beththapphoué, "place of apples" [see however APPLE]): A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 53), probably near Hebron (cf Tappuah, 1 Ch 2 43), possibly the same as Tephon (1 Macc 9 50). The village of Tuffuh, 3½ miles N.W. of Hebron, is the probable site; it stands on the edge of a high ridge, surrounded by very fruitful gardens; an ancient highroad runs through the village, and there are many old cisterns and caves. (See PEF, III, 310, 379, Sh XXI.) E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BETHUEL, be-thū'el (בְּתוּאֵל, bethū'el, "dweller in God"): A son of Nahor and Milcah, Abraham's nephew, father of Laban and Rebekah (Gen 22 23; 24 15,24,47,50; 25 20; 28 2,5). In the last-named passage, he is surnamed "the Syrian." The only place where he appears as a leading character in the narrative is in connection with Rebekah's betrothal to Isaac; and even here, his son Laban stands out more prominently than he—a fact explainable on the ground of the custom which recognized the right of the brother to take a special interest in the welfare of the sister (cf Gen 34 5.11.25; 2 S 13 20.22). Ant. I, xvi, 2 states that Bethuel was dead at this time.

FRANK E. HIRSCH

BETHUEL, be-thū'el, beth-ū-el (בְּתוּאֵל, b'thū'el, "destroyed of God"): A town of Simeon (1 Ch 4 30), the same as Bethul (Josh 19 4), and, probably, as the Beth-el of 1 S 30 27.

BETHUL, beth'ul, bē'thul (בֶּתּוּל, b'thūl): See BETHUEL; CHESIL.

BETHULIA, bē-thū'li-a (Βαιθουλούα, Baithoulouá): A town named only in the Book of Jth (4 6; 6 10 ff; 7 1 ff; 8 3; 10 6; 12 7; 15 3.6; 16 21 ff). From these references we gather that it stood beside a valley, on a rock, at the foot of which was a spring, not far from Jenūn; and that it guarded the passes by which an army might march to the S. The site most fully meeting these conditions is that of Sānūr. The rock on the summit of which it stands rises sheer from the edge of Merj el-Gharik, on the main highway, some 7 miles S. of Jenūn. Other identifications are suggested: Conder favoring Mūhiliyeh, a little farther north; while the writer of the article "Bethulia" in EB argues for identification with Jerus. W. EWING

BETH-ZACHARIAS, beth-zak-a-rī'as (Βαθ-ζαχαριά, Baith-zachariá): Here Judas Maccabaeus failed in battle with Antiochus Eupator, and his brother Eleazar fell in conflict with an elephant (1 Macc 6 32 ff; AV "Bathzacharias"). It was a position of great strength, crowning a promontory which juts out between two deep valleys. It still bears the ancient name with little change, Beit Zakariá. It lies about 4 miles S.W. of Bethlehem (BR, III, 283 ff; Ant. XII, ix, 4).

BETH-ZUR, beth-zūr (בֵּית צֹר, bēth-çūr; Βαθ-σοῦρ, Baith-soúr, "house of rock"; less probably "house of the god Zur"):

(1) Mentioned (Josh 15 58) as near Halhul and Gedor in the hill country of Judah; fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 7). In Neh 3 16 mention is made of "Nehemiah the son of Azbuk, the ruler of half the district of Beth-zur." During the Maccabean wars it (Bethsura) came into great importance (1 Macc 4 29.61; 6 7.26.31.49.50; 9 52; 10 14; 11 65; 14 7.33). Jos describes it as the strongest place in all Judaea (Ant. XIII, v, 6). It was inhabited in the days of Eusebius and Jerome.

(2) It is the ruined site Beit Šār, near the main road from Jerus to Hebron, and some 4 miles N. of the latter. Its importance lay in its natural strength, on a hilltop dominating the highroad, and also in its guarding the one southerly approach for a hostile army by the Vale of Elah to the Judaeian plateau. The site today is conspicuous from a distance through the presence of a ruined mediaeval tower. (See PEF, III, 311, Sh XXI).

BETIMES, bē-tīmz': In the sense of "early" is the tr of two Heb words: (1) שָׁכַח, shākhām, a root meaning "to incline the shoulder to a load," hence "to load up," "start early": in Gen 26 31 "they rose up betimes in the morning," also in 2 Ch 36 15 (ARV "early"); (2) שָׁחַר, shāhar, a root meaning "to dawn" in Job 8 5; 24 5, ARV "diligently," and in Ps 13 24, "chasteneth him betimes."

In the Apoc (Sir 6 36) "betimes" is the tr of ὀρθίζω, orthízō, lit. "to rise early in the morning," while in Bel ver 16 the same word is tr^d "betime."

In other cases the AV "betimes" appears as "before the time" (Sir 51 30); "early" (1 Macc 4 52; 11 67); "the morning" (1 Macc 5 30).

BETOLION, bē-tō'li-on (Βετολίω [A], Βητολιώ [B], Betoliō or Bētoliō; AV Betolius, bē-tō'-li-us): A town the people of which to the number of 52 returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 21). It corresponds to Bethel in Ezr 2 28.

BETOMESTHAIM, bē-tō-mes'thā-im, AV Betomestham, bē-tō-mes'tham (Βετομεσθάιμ, Betomesthāim [Jth 4 6]): BETOMASTHAIM, AV Betomasthem (Βαιτομασθάιμ, Bailomasthāim [Jth 15 4]): The place is said to have been "over against Jezreel, in the face of [i.e. eastward of] the plain that is near Dothan." It can hardly be Deir Massīn, which lies W. of the plain. The district is clearly indicated, but no identification is yet possible.

BETONIM, bet'ō-nim, bē-tō'nim (בֶּטְנִים, b'tōnīm; Βοτανει, Bolanet or Bolanin): A town E. of the Jordan in the territory of Gad (Josh 13 26). It may be identical with Baṭneh, about 3 miles S.W. of es-Salt.

BETRAY, bē-trā' (רָמָה, rāmāh; παραδίδομι, paradidōmī): In the OT only once (1 Ch 12 17). David warns those who had deserted to him from Saul: "If ye be come to betray me to mine adversaries . . . the God of our fathers look thereon." The same Heb word is elsewhere tr^d "beguile" (Gen 29 25; Josh 9 22), "deceive" (1 S 19 17; 28 12; 2 S 19 26; Prov 26 19; Lam 1 19).

In the NT, for paradidōmī: 36 times, of the betrayal of Jesus Christ, and only 3 times besides (Mt 24 10; Mk 13 12; Lk 21 16) of kinsmen delivering up one another to prosecution. In these three places RV translates according to the more general meaning, "to deliver up," and also (in Mt 17 22; 20 18; 26 16; Mk 14 10.11; Lk 22 4.6) where it refers to the delivering up of Jesus. The Revisers' idea was perhaps to retain "betray" only in direct references to Judas' act, but they have not strictly followed that rule. Judas' act was more than that of giving a person up to the authorities; he did it under circumstances of treachery which modified its character: (a) he took advantage of his intimate relation with Jesus Christ as a disciple to put Him in the hands of His enemies; (b) he did it stealthily by night, and (c) by a kiss, an act which professed affection and friendliness; (d) he did it for money, and (e) he knew that Jesus Christ was innocent of any crime (Mt 27 4).

BETRAYERS, bē-trā'ērs (προδοῦναι, prodōtai, "betrayers," "traitors"): Stephen charged the Jews with being betrayers of the Righteous One (Acts 7 52) i.e. as having made Judas' act their own; cf Lk 6 16: "Judas Iscariot, who became a traitor"; 2 Tim 3 4, "traitors."

BETROTH, bē-troth', bē-trōth' (בְּרִית, 'āras): On betrothal as a social custom see MARRIAGE. Hosea, in his great parable of the prodigal wife, surpassed only by a greater Teacher's parable of the Prodigal Son, uses betrothal as the symbol of Jeh's pledge of His love and favor to penitent Israel (Hos 2 19.20). In Ex 21 8.9 the RV renders "espouse" for the "betroth" of AV, the context implying the actual marriage relation.

As the title indicates, the historical period in the life of Israel extends from the cessation of OT prophecy to the beginning of the Christian era.

I. The Period in General.—The Exile left its ineffaceable stamp on Judaism as well as on the Jews. Their return to the land of their fathers was marked by the last rays of the declining sun of prophecy. With Malachi it set. Modern historical criticism has projected some of the canonical books of the Bible far into this post-exilic period. Thus Kent (HJP, 1899), following the lead of the Wellhausen-Kuenen hypothesis, with all its later leaders, has charted the period between 600 BC, the date of the first captivity, to 160 BC, the beginning of the Hasmonean period of Jewish history, in comparative contemporaneous blocks of double decades. Following the path of Koster, the historical position of Ezr and Neh is inverted, and the former is placed in the period 400–380 BC, contemporaneously with Artaxerxes II; Joel is assigned to the same period; portions of Isa (chs 63–66, 24–27) are placed about 350 BC; Zec is assigned to the period 260–240, and Dnl is shot way down the line into the reign of the Seleucidae, between 200 and 160 BC. Now all this is very striking and no doubt very critical, but the ground of this historical readjustment is wholly subjective, and has the weight only of a hypothetical conjecture. Whatever may be our attitude to the critical hypothesis of the late origin of some of the OT lit., it seems improbable that any portion of it could have reached far into the post-exilic period. The interval between the Old and the New Testaments is the dark period in the history of Israel. It stretches itself out over about four cents., during which there was neither prophet nor inspired writer in Israel. All we know of it we owe to Jos, to some of the apocryphal books, and to scattered references in Gr and Lat historians. The seat of empire passed over from the East to the West, from Asia to Europe. The Pers Empire collapsed, under the fierce attacks of the Macedonians, and the Gr Empire in turn gave way to the Rom rule.

II. A Glance at Contemporaneous History.—For the better understanding of this period in the history of Israel, it may be well to pause for a moment to glance at the wider field of the history of the world in the cents. under contemplation, for the words “fulness of time” deal with the all-embracing history of mankind, for whose salvation Christ appeared, and whose every movement led to its realization.

(1) In the four cents. preceding Christ, the Egypt empire, the oldest and in many respects the most perfectly developed civilization of antiquity, was tottering to its ruins. The 29th or Mendesian Dynasty, made place, in 384 BC, for the 30th or Sebennitic Dynasty, which was swallowed up, half a century later, by the Pers Dynasty.

The Macedonian or 32d replaced this in 332 BC, only to give way, a decade later, to the last or 33d, the Ptolemaic Dynasty. The whole history of Egypt in this period was therefore one of endless and swiftly succeeding changes. In the Ptolemaic Dynasty there was a faint revival of the old glory of the past, but the star of empire had set for Egypt, and the mailed hand of Rome finally smote down a civilization whose beginnings are lost in the dim twilight of history. The Caesarian conquest of 47 BC was followed, 17 years later, by the annexation of Egypt to the new world-power, as a Rom province. Manetho's history is the one great literary monument of Egypt history in this period. Her priests had been famous for their wisdom, to which Lycurgus and Solon, the Gr legislators, had been attracted, as well as Pythagoras and Plato, the world's greatest philosophers.

(2) In Greece also the old glory was passing away. Endless wars sapped the strength of the national life. The strength of Athens

2. Greece and Sparta, of Corinth and Thebes had departed, and when about the beginning of our period, in 337 BC, the congress of Gr states had elected Philip of Macedon to the hegemony of united Greece, the knell of doom sounded for all Gr liberty. First Philip and after him Alexander wiped out the last remnants of this liberty, and Greece became a fighting machine for the conquest of the world in the meteoric career of Alexander the Great. But what a galaxy of illustrious names adorn the pages of Gr history, in this period, so dark for Israel! Think of Aristophanes and Hippocrates, of Xenophon and Democritus, of Plato and Apelles, of Aeschines and Demosthenes, of Aristotle and Praxiteles and Archimedes, all figuring, amid the decay of Gr liberty, in the 4th and 3d cents. before Christ! Surely if the political glory of Greece had left its mark on the ages, its intellectual brilliancy is their pride.

(3) Rome meanwhile was strengthening herself, by interminable wars, for the great task of world-conquest that lay before her. By the

3. Rome Lat and Samnite and Punic wars she trained her sons in the art of war, extended her territorial power and made her name dreaded everywhere. Italy and north Africa, Greece and Asia Minor and the northern barbarians were conquered in turn. Her intellectual brilliancy was developed only when the lust of conquest was sated after a fashion, but in the cent. immediately preceding the Christian era we find such names as Lucretius and Hortentius, Cato and Cicero, Salust and Diodorus Siculus, Virgil and Horace. At the close of the period between the Testaments, Rome had become the mistress of the world and every road led to her capital.

(4) In Asia the Pers empire, heir to the civilization and traditions of the great Assyr-Bab world-power, was fast collapsing and was ultimately utterly wiped out by the younger Gr empire and civilization.

4. Asia In far-away India the old ethnic religion of Brahma a cent. or more before the beginning of our period passed through the reformatory crisis inaugurated by Gatama Buddha or Sakya Mouni, and thus Buddhism, one of the great ethnic religions, was born. Another reformer of the Taustic faith was Confucius, the sage of China, a contemporary of Buddha, while Zoroaster in Persia laid the foundations of his dualistic world-view. In every sense and in every direction, the period between the Testaments was therefore one of political and intellectual ferment.

III. Historical Developments.—As regards Jewish history, the period between the Testaments may be divided as follows: (1) the Pers period;

- (2) the Alexandrian period; (3) the Egypt period; (4) the Syrian period; (5) the Maccabean period; (6) the Rom period.

(1) The Pers period extends from the cessation of prophecy to 334 BC. It was in the main uneventful in the history of the Jews, a breathing spell between great national crises, and comparatively little is known of it. The land of Pal was a portion of the Syrian satrapy, while the true government of the Jewish people was semi-theocratic, or rather sacerdotal, under the rule of the high priests, who were responsible to the satrap. As a matter of course, the high-priestly office became the object of all Jewish ambition and it aroused the darkest passions. Thus John, the son of Judas, son of Eliashib, through the lust of power, killed his brother Jesus, who was a favorite of Bagoses, a general of Artaxerxes in command of the district. The guilt of the fratricide was enhanced, because the crime was committed in the temple itself, and before the very altar. A storm of wrath, the only notable one of this period, thereupon swept over Judaea. The Persians occupied Jerus, the temple was defiled, the city laid waste in part, a heavy fine was imposed on the people and a general persecution followed, which lasted for many years (Ant, XI, 7; Kent, HJP, 231). Then as later on, in the many persecutions which followed, the Samaritans, ever pliable and willing to obey the tyrant of the day, went practically scot free.

1. The Persian Period

(2) The Alexandrian period was very brief, 334–323 BC. It simply covers the period of the Asiatic rule of Alexander the Great. In Greece

2. The Alexandrian Period things had been moving swiftly. The Spartan hegemony, which had been unbroken since the fall of Athens, was now destroyed by the Thebans under Epaminondas, in the great battles of Leuctra and Mantinea. But the new power was soon crushed by Philip of Macedon, who was thereupon chosen general leader by the unwilling Greeks. Persia was the object of Philip's ambition and vengeance, but the dagger of Pausanias (Ant, XI, viii, 1) forestalled the execution of his plans. His son Alexander, a youth of 20 years, succeeded him, and thus the "great he-goat," of which Daniel had spoken (Dnl 8 8; 10 20), appeared on the scene. In the twelve years of his reign (335–323 BC) he revolutionized the world. Swift as an eagle he moved. All Greece was laid at his feet. Thence he moved to Asia, where he defeated Darius in the memorable battles of Granicus and Issus. Passing southward, he conquered the Mediterranean coast and Egypt and then moved eastward again, for the complete subjugation of Asia, when he was struck down in the height of his power, at Babylon, in the 33d year of his age. In the Syrian campaign he had come in contact with the Jews. Unwilling to leave any stronghold at his back, he reduced Tyre after a siege of several months, and advancing southward demanded the surrender of Jerus. But the Jews, taught by bitter experience, desired to remain loyal to Persia. As Alexander approached the city, Jaddua the high priest, with a train of priests in their official dress, went out to meet him, to supplicate mercy. A previous dream of this occurrence is said to have foreshadowed this event, and Alexander spared the city, sacrificed to Jeh, had the prophecies of Daniel concerning him rehearsed in his hearing, and showed the Jews many favors (Ant, XI, viii, 5). From that day on they became his favorites; he employed them in his army and gave them equal rights with the Greeks, as first citizens of Alexandria, and other cities, which he founded. Thus the strong Hellenistic spirit of the Jews was created, which marked so large a portion of the nation, in the subsequent periods of their history.

(3) The Egyptian period (324–264 BC). The death of Alexander temporarily turned everything into chaos. The empire, welded together by his towering genius, fell apart under four of his generals—

Ptolemy, Lysimachus, Cassander, and Selenus (Dnl 8 21.22). Egypt fell to the share of Ptolemy Soter and Judaea was made part of it. At first Ptolemy was harsh in his treatment of the Jews, but later on he learned to respect them and became their patron as Alexander had been. Hecataeus of Thrace is at this time said to have studied the Jews, through information received from Hezekiah, an Egypt Jewish immigrant, and to have written a Jewish history from the time of Abraham till his own day. This book, quoted by Jos and Origen, is totally lost. Soter was succeeded by Ptolemy Philadelphus, an enlightened ruler, famous through the erection of the light-house of Pharos, and esp. through the founding of the celebrated Alexandrian library. Like his father he was very friendly to the Jews, and in his reign the celebrated Gr tr of the OT Scriptures, the LXX, was made, according to tradition (Ant, XII, ii). As however the power of the Syrian princes, the Seleucidae, grew, Pal increasingly became the battle ground between them and the Ptolemies. In the decisive battle between Ptolemy Philopator and Antiochus the Great, at Raphia near Gaza, the latter was crushed and during Philopator's reign

Judaea remained an Egypt province. And yet this battle formed the turning-point of the history of the Jews in their relation to Egypt. For when Ptolemy, drunk with victory, came to Jerus, he endeavored to enter the holy of holies of the temple, although he retreated, in confusion, from the holy place. But he wreaked his vengeance on the Jews, for opposing his plan, by a cruel persecution. He was succeeded by his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, a child of 5 years. The long-planned vengeance of Antiochus now took form in an invasion of Egypt.

Coele-Syria and Judaea were occupied by the Syrians and passed over into the possession of the Seleu-cidae.

(4) The Syrian period (204–165 BC). Israel now entered into the valley of the shadow of death.

This entire period was an almost interrupted martyrdom. Antiochus was succeeded by Seleucis Philopator.

But harsh as was their attitude to the Jews, neither of these two was notorious for his cruelty to them. Their high priests, as in former periods, were still their nominal rulers.

But the aspect of everything changed when Antiochus Epiphanes (175–164 BC) came to the throne.

He may fitly be called the Nero of Jewish history.

The nationalists among the Jews were at that time wrangling with the Hellenists for the control of affairs. Onias III, a faithful high priest, was expelled from office through the machinations of his brother Jesus or Jason (2 Macc 4 7–10). Onias went to Egypt, where at Heliopolis he built a temple and officiated as high priest. Meanwhile

Jason in turn was turned out of the holy office by the bribes of still another brother, Menelaus, worse

by far than Jason, a Jew-hater and an avowed defender of Gr life and morals. The wrangle between the brothers gave Antiochus the opportunity he craved to wreak his bitter hatred on the Jews, in the spoliation of Jerus, in the wanton and total defilement of the temple, and in a most horrible persecution of the Jews (1 Macc 1 16–28;

2 Macc 5 11–23; Dnl 11 28; Ant, XII, v, 3.4). Thousands were slain, women and children were sold into captivity, the city wall was torn down, all sacrifices ceased, and in the temple on the altar of burnt offering a statue was erected to Jupiter Olympius (1 Macc 1 43; 2 Macc 6 1-2). Circumcision was forbidden, on pain of death, and all the people of Israel were to be forcibly paganized. As in the Pers persecution, the Samaritans again played into the hands of the Syrians and implicitly obeyed the will of the Seleucidae. But the very rigor of the persecution caused it to fail of its purpose and Israel proved to be made of sterner stuff than Antiochus imagined. A priestly family dwelling at Modin, west of Jerus, named Hasmonean, after one of its ancestors, consisting of Mattathias and his five sons, raised the standard of revolt, which proved successful after a severe struggle. See ASMONAEAN.

Judaea is specially adapted to guerilla tactics, and Judas Maccabaeus, who succeeded his father, as leader of the Jewish patriots, was a past master in this kind of warfare. All efforts of Antiochus to quell the rebellion failed most miserably, in three Syrian campaigns. The king died of a loathsome disease and peace was at last concluded with the Jews. Though still nominally under Syrian control, Judas became governor of Pal. His first act was the purification and rededication of the temple, from which the Jews date their festival of purification (see PURIFICATION). When the Syrians renewed the war, Judas applied for aid to the Romans, whose power began to be felt in Asia, but he died in battle before the promised aid could reach him (Ant. XII, xi, 2). He was buried by his father's side at Modin and was succeeded by his brother Jonathan. From that time the Maccabean history becomes one of endless cabals. Jonathan was acknowledged by the Syrians as meridarch of Judaea, but was assassinated soon afterward. Simon succeeded him, and by the help of the Romans was made hereditary ruler of Pal. He in turn was followed by John Hyrcanus. The people were torn by bitter partisan controversies and a civil war was waged, a generation later, by two grandsons of John Hyrcanus, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. In this internecine struggle the Roman general Pompey participated by siding with Hyrcanus, while Aristobulus defied Rome and defended Jerus. Pompey took the city, after a siege of three months, and entered the holy of holies, thereby forever estranging from Rome every loyal Jewish heart.

(6) The Roman period (63-4 BC). Judaea now became a Rom province. Hyrcanus, stripped of the hereditary royal power, retained only the high-priestly office. Rome exacted an annual tribute, and Aristobulus was sent as a captive to the capital. He contrived however to escape and renewed the unequal struggle, in which he was succeeded by his sons Alexander and Antigonus. In the war between Pompey and Caesar, Judaea was temporarily forgotten, but after Caesar's death, under the triumvirate of Octavius, Antony and Lepidus, Antony, the eastern triumvir, favored Herod the Great, whose intrigues secured for him at last the crown of Judaea and enabled him completely to extinguish the old Maccabean line of Judaeian princes.

IV. Internal Developments in This Period.—One thing remains, and that is a review of the developments within the bosom of Judaism itself in the period under consideration. It is self-evident that the core of the Jewish people, which remained loyal to the national traditions and to the national faith, must have been radically affected by the terrible cataclysms which mark their history, during the four cents. before Christ. What, if any, was the literary activity of the Jews in this period? What was their spiritual condition? What was the result of the manifest difference of opinion within the Jewish economy? What preparation does this period afford for the "fulness of time"? These and other questions present themselves, as we study this period of the history of the Jews.

(1) The voice of prophecy was utterly hushed in this period, but the old literary instinct of the nation asserted itself; it was part and parcel of the Jewish traditions and would not be denied. Thus in this period many writings were produced, which although they lack canonical authority, among Protestants at least, still are extremely helpful for a correct understanding of the life of Israel in the dark ages before Christ.

(a) The Apocrypha.—First of all among the fruits of this literary activity stand the apocryphal books of the OT. It is enough here to mention them. They are fourteen in number: 1 and 2 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, 2 Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, Song of the Three Holy Children, History of Susannah, Bel and the Dragon, Prayer of Manasses, 1 and 2 Maccabees. As 3 and 4 Maccabees fall presumably within the Christian era, they are not here enumerated. All these apocryphal writings are of the utmost importance for a correct understanding of the Jewish problem in the day in which they were written. For fuller information, see APOCRYPHA.

(b) Pseudepigrapha.—Thus named from the spurious character of the authors' names they bear. Two of these writings very probably belong to our period, while a host of them evidently belong to a later date. In this class of writings there is a mute confession of the conscious poverty of the day. First of all, we have the Psalter of Solomon, originally written in Heb and tr^d into Gr—a collection of songs for worship, touching in their spirit, and evincing the fact that true faith never died in the heart of the true believer. The second is the Book of Enoch, a production of an apocalyptic nature, named after Enoch the patriarch, and widely known about the beginning of the Christian era. This book is quoted in the NT (Jude ver 14). It was originally written in Heb or Aram. and tr^d into Gr. As there is no trace of a Christian influence in the book, the presumption is that the greater part of it was written at an earlier period. Both Jude and the author of Revelation must have known it, as a comparative study of both books will show. The question of these quotations or allusions is a veritable crux interpretum: how to reconcile the inspiration of these books with these quotations?

(c) The Septuagint.—The tradition of the LXX is told by Jos (Ant. XII, ii, 13). Aristeas and Aristobulus, a Jewish priest in the reign of Ptolemy Philometor (2 Macc 1 10), are also quoted in support of it by Clement of Alexandria and by Eusebius. See SEPTUAGINT. The truth of the matter is most probably that this great tr of the OT Scriptures was begun at the instance of Ptolemy Philadelphus 285-247 BC, under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus, and was completed somewhere about the middle of the 2d cent. BC. Internal evidence abounds that the tr was made by different hands and at different times. If the tr was in any way literal, the text of the LXX raises various interesting questions in regard to the Heb text that was used in the tr, as compared with the one we now possess. The LXX was of the utmost missionary value and contributed perhaps more than any other thing to prepare the world for the "fulness of time."

The return from Babylon marked a turning-point in the spiritual history of the Jews. From that time onward, the lust of idolatry, which had marked their whole previous history, utterly disappears. In the place of it came an almost intolerable spirit of exclusiveness, a striving after legal holiness, these two in combination forming the very heart and core of the later Pharisaism. The holy books, but especially the law, became an object of almost idolatrous reverence; the spirit was utterly lost in the form. And as their own tongue, the classic Heb., gradually gave way to the common Aram., the rabbis and their schools strove ever more earnestly to keep the ancient tongue pure, worship and life each demanding a separate language. Thus the Jews became in a sense bilingual, the Heb tongue being used in their synagogues, the Aram. in their daily life, and later on, in part at least, the Gr tongue of the conqueror, the lingua franca of the period. A spiritual aristocracy very largely replaced the former rule of their princes and nobles. As the core of their religion died, the bark of the tree flourished. Thus tithes were zealously paid by the believer (cf Mt 23 23), the Sabbath became a positive burden of sanctity, the simple laws of God were replaced by cumbersome human inventions, which in later times were to form the bulk of the Talm, and which crushed down all spiritual liberty in the days of Christ (Mt 11 28; 23 4.23). The substitution of the names "Elohim" and "Adonai" for the old glorious historic name "Jahveh" is an eloquent commentary on all that has been said before and on the spiritual condition of Israel in this period (Ewald, H of I, V, 198), in which the change was inaugurated. The old centripetal force, the old ideal of centralization, gave way to an almost haughty indifference to the land of promise. The Jews became, as they are today, a nation without a country. For, for every Jew that came back to the old national home, a thousand remained in the land of their adoption. And yet scattered far and wide, in all sorts of environments, they remained Jews, and the national consciousness was never extinguished. It was God's mark on them now as then. And thus they became world-wide missionaries of the knowledge of the true God, of a gospel of hope for a world that was hopeless, a gospel which wholly against their own will directed the eyes of the world to the fulness of time and which prepared the fallow soil of human hearts for the rapid spread of Christianity when it ultimately appeared.

During the Gr period the more conservative and zealous of the Jews were all the time confronted with a tendency of a very considerable portion of the people, especially the younger and wealthier set, to adopt the manners of life and thought and speech of their masters, the Greeks. Thus the Hellenistic party was born, which was bitterly hated by all true-blooded Jews, but which left its mark on their history, till the date of the final dispersion 70 AD. From the day of Mattathias, the Chasids or Hasideans (1 Macc 2 42) were the true Jewish patriots. Thus the party of the Pharisees came into existence (Ant, XIII, x, 5; XVIII, i, 2; BJ, I, v, 2). See PHARISEES. They were opposed by the more secular-minded Sadducees (Ant, XIII, x, 6; XVIII, i, 3; BJ, II, viii, 14), wealthy, of fine social standing, wholly free from the restraints of tradition, utterly oblivious of the future life and closely akin to the Gr Epicureans. See SADDUCEES. These parties bitterly opposed each other till the very end of the national existence of the Jews in Pal, and incessantly fought for the mastery, through the high-priestly office. Common hatred for Christ, for a while, afforded them a community of interests.

Throughout this entire dark period of Israel's history, God was working out His own Divine plan with them. Their Scriptures were tr^d

4. Preparation for Christianity into Gr, after the conquest of Alexander the Great the common language in the East. Thus the world was prepared for the word of God, even as the latter in turn prepared the world for the reception of the gift of God, in the gospel of His Son. The LXX thus is a distinct forward movement in the fulfilment of the Abrahamic promise (Gen 12 3; 18 18). As the sacrificial part of Jewish worship declined, through their wide separation from the temple, the eyes of Israel were more firmly fixed on their Scriptures, read every Sabbath in their synagogues, and, as we have seen, these Scriptures, through the rendering of the LXX, had become the property of the entire world. Thus the synagogue everywhere became the great missionary institute, imparting to the world Israel's exalted Messianic hopes. On the other hand, the Jews themselves, embittered by long-continued martyrdoms and suffering, utterly carnalized this Messianic expectation in an increasing ratio as the yoke of the oppressor grew heavier and the hope of deliverance grew fainter. And thus when their Messiah came, Israel recognized Him not, while the heart-hungry heathen, who through the LXX had become familiar with the promise, humbly received Him (Jn 1 9-14). The eyes of Israel were blinded for a season, 'till the fulness of the Gentiles shall be gathered in' (Rom 9 32; 11 25). HENRY E. DOSKER

BEULAH, bū'la (בְּעֻלָּה, bē'ulāh, "married"): A name symbolically applied to Israel: "Thy land [shall be called] B. . . . thy land shall be married. . . . so shall thy sons marry thee" (Isa 62 4 f). In this figure, frequently used since Hosea, the prophet wishes to express the future prosperity of Israel. The land once desolate shall again be populated.

BEWAIL, bē-wāl' (κόπτω, kóptō): In the middle voice, this word has the thought of striking on the breast and of loud lamentation, so common among oriental people in time of great sorrow. It is used to express the most intense grief, a sorrow that compels outward demonstration (Lk 8 52; 23 27). A striking instance of this grief is that of the daughter of Jephthah (Jgs 11 37; Lev 10 6). See BURIAL, IV, 4, 5, 6; GRIEF.

BEWITCH, bē-wich' (ἐξίστημι, existēmi): There are two Gr words in the NT tr^d "bewitch." The one given above (Acts 8 9.11 AV "bewitched," RV "amazed") has reference to the work of Simon Magus. It means "to be out of one's mind," "to astonish," "to overwhelm with wonder." The other word, βασκαίνω, baskainō (Gal 3 1), means "to fascinate by false representation." It is by this means the apostle complains they have been led to accept a teaching wholly contrary to the gospel of Christ. Both these words reveal to us something of the difficulty the early teachers had to eradicate the idea so widely held by the Jews and Egyptians especially, that there were certain powers, dark and mysterious, which by certain occult forces they could control. For a long time this had to be contended with as one of the corrupt practices brought into the church by the converts, both from Judaism and heathenism. These words have a reference to the evil eye which for cents. was, and even today is, an important factor in the life of the people of the East. 1 Tim 6 20 is a reference to this thought and explains the word "science" (AV) as there used. See DIVINATION; EVIL EYE; SORCERY; SUPERSTITION. JACOB W. KAPP

BEWRAY, bē-rā', BEWRAYER, bē-rā'ēr: In its derivation is entirely different from betray (Lat tradere), and meant originally "to disclose," "reveal" (cf Shakspeare, Titus Andronicus, II, iv, 3: "Writedown thy mind, bewray thy meaning so"); but has been affected by the former word and is used almost synonymously. It is the tr of three Heb words: (1) קָרָא, kārā, meaning "to call out" (Prov 27 16), "the ointment of his right hand which bewrayeth itself" (ARV "his right hand encountereth oil," ARVm "the oil of his right hand betrayeth itself"); (2) נָגַד, nāghadh, meaning "to front," "to announce" (by word of mouth): Prov 29 24, "heareth cursing and bewrayeth it not" (ARV "heareth the adjuration and uttereth nothing"); (3) גָּלָה, gālāh, "to denude," fig. "to reveal" (Isa 16 3), "bewray not him that wandereth" (ARV "betray not the fugitive").

In Sir 27 17 "bewray [RV "reveal"] his secrets" is the tr of ἀποκαλύπτω, apokalúptō, lit. "to uncover"; so also in Sir 27 21 (RV "revealeth"). Bewrayer of 2 Mace 4 1 ("bewrayer of the money and of his country," RV "had given information of the money and had betrayed his country") is the tr of ἐνδείκτης, endeiktēs, lit. "one who shows."

In the NT "bewrayeth" is the AV of Mt 26 73; "thy speech bewrayeth thee" is the tr of the phrase δῆλον ποιεῖν, dēlon poieîn, which the ARV renders "maketh thee known." ARTHUR J. KINSELLA

BEYOND, bē-yond': Found in the Heb only in its application to space and time, and for these ideas three words are employed: הַלְלָאָה, hāl'āh (Gen 35 21)="to the distance"; עָבַר, 'ābhar="to go beyond," "to cross," derivative עָבַר, 'ēbher (Chald. עָבַר, 'ābhar)="across," "beyond" (Dt 30 13; Josh 18 7; Jgs 3 26; 1 S 20 36; 2 Ch 20 2; Ezr 4 17.20; Jer 25 22); and עַל, 'al (Lev 15 25)="beyond the time." In the NT πέραν, péran, is used to express "beyond" in the spatial sense (Mt 4 15), while other words and phrases are employed for adverbial ideas of degree: ὑπερπερισσός, huperperissōs (Mk 7 37); ὑπέρ, hupér (2 Cor 8 3; 10 16); καθυπερβολήν, kathuperbolēn (Gal 1 13). In the AV עָבַר, bē'ēbher, is occasionally tr^d "beyond," and when this word is joined to יַרְדֵּן, ha-yardēn, "Jordan," as it usually is, it becomes critically important. In ARV, bē'ēbher ha-yardēn is tr^d "beyond the Jordan," in Gen 50 10.11; Dt 3 20.25; Josh 9 10; Jgs 5 17; "on this side Jordan" in Dt 1 1.5; Josh 1 14.15; "on the other side Jordan" in Dt 11 30; Josh 12 1; 22 4; 24 2.8 (cf AV and RV, vs 14.15; see RIVER, THE), Jgs 10 8; 1 S 31 7; and "on the side of Jordan" in Josh 5 1. ARV gives "beyond the Jordan" throughout. עָבַר, mē'ēbher, is used with ha-yardēn in Nu 34 15; 35 14; Josh 13 32; Jgs 7 25; and עָבַר, 'ēbher, alone in Dt 4 49 (AV "on this side"); Josh 13 27 (AV "on the other side"). It is clear that the phrase may be tr^d "across Jordan"; that it is used of either side of the Jordan (Dt 3 8 speaks of the eastern, 3 20.25 of the western); that "beyond Jordan" may be used of the side of the Jordan on which the writer stands (Josh 5 1; 9 1; 12 7); but from the fact that Dt 1 1.5; 4 41.46.47.49, where statements are made about Moses, the reference is to the country E. of the Jordan, while in Dt 3 20.25; 11 30, where Moses is represented as speaking, the W. is indicated, critics have concluded that the author (at least of Dt) must have lived after Moses, being careful to distinguish between himself and the prophet.

BEZAANANNIM, bē-zā-an-an'im (Josh 19 33 RVm). See ZAAANANNIM.

BEZAI, bē'zā-i (צַי, bēḡay, "shining"?):

(1) A chief who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh 10 18).

(2) The descendants of B. returned with Zerubabel to Jerus (323, Ezr 2 17; 324, Neh 7 23=Bassai, 1 Esd 5 16).

BEZALEL, bez'a-lel (בְּצַלֵּל, bēḡal'ēl, "in the shadow [protection] of 'El [God]"; Βεσελεήλ, Be-seleēl; AV Bezaleel):

(1) A master workman under Moses; son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah. Jeh gave him especial wisdom and skill for his task, which was, with the aid of Oholiab of the tribe of Dan, to superintend the making of the tabernacle and its furniture (Ex 31 2; 35 30; 36 1.2 (8); 37 1; 38 22; 1 Ch 2 20; 2 Ch 1 5).

(2) An Israelite of the time of Ezra who put away a foreign wife (Ezr 10 30). F. K. FARR

BEZEK, bē'zek (בִּזְעַק, bezek; Βέζεκ, Bézek, B, Ἀβιέζεκ, Abiēzek):

(1) The city of Adoni-bezek taken by Judah and Simeon (Jgs 1 4f), in the territory allotted to Judah. It is somewhat doubtfully identified with Bezkaḥ, about 3 miles N.E. of Gezer.

(2) The place where Saul marshaled his army before marching to the relief of Jabesh-gilead (1 S 11 8). Onom speaks of two villages of this name 17 Rom miles from Shechem, on the way to Scythopolis. No doubt Khirbet Izbūk is intended. Here, or on the neighboring height, Rās Izbūk, a mountain 2,404 ft. above sea level, the army probably assembled. W. EWING

BEZER, bē'zēr (בִּצְרַיִם, bezer; Βόσρορ, Bósor, "strong"):

(1) A city of refuge, set apart by Moses for the Reubenites and located in the "plain country" (or table-land, Mishōr) E. of the Jordan, later assigned to this tribe by Joshua (Dt 4 43; Josh 20 8). The same city was assigned by lot as place of residence to the children of Merari of the Levite tribe (Josh 21 36; 1 Ch 6 63.78). Driver, HDB, suggests the identity of B. with Bozrah (LXX Bosor) (Jer 48 24). Besheir has been suggested as the present site. According to the MS it was fortified by Mesha.

(2) A son of Zophah of the house of Asher (1 Ch 7 37). A. L. BRESLICH

BEZETH, bē'zeth (בְּזֵת, Bēzēth): A place in the neighborhood of Jerus to which Bacchides withdrew and where he slew several deserters (1 Macc 7 19). Possibly the same as Bezetha (see JERUSALEM).

BEZETHA, be-zē'tha: Also called by Jos the "New City" (BJ, V, iv, 2), certain suburbs of Jerus, N. of the Temple, which were outside the second but included within the third wall. BEZETH (q.v.) may be the same place. See JERUSALEM.

BIATAS, bī'a-tas (Φαλίᾱς, Phalías; A, Φιαθάς, Phiathás): RV "Phalías," one of the Levites (1 Esd 9 48) who "taught [the people] the law of the Lord, making them withal to understand it." Called Pelaiah in Neh 8 7.

LITERATURE

This word designates the collection of the Scriptures of the OT and NT recognized and in use in the Christian churches. Different religions (such as the Zoroastrian, Hindu, Buddhist, Mohammedan) have their collections of sacred writings, sometimes spoken of as their "Bibles." The Jews acknowledge only the Scriptures of the OT. Christians add the writings contained in the NT. The present art. deals with the origin, character, contents and purpose of the Christian Scriptures, regarded as the depository and authoritative record of God's revelations of Himself and of His will to the fathers by the prophets, and through His Son to the church of a later age (He 1 1.2). Reference is made throughout to the arts. in which the several topics are more fully treated.

I. The Names.—The word "Bible" is the equivalent of the Gr word biblia (dim. from biblos, the inner bark of the papyrus), meaning

1. Bible originally "books." The phrase "the books" (ta biblia) occurs in Dnl 9 2 (LXX) for prophetic writings. In the Prologue to Sir ("the rest of the books") it designates generally the OT Scriptures; similarly in 1 Mace 12 9 ("the holy books"). The usage passed into the Christian church for OT (2 Clem 14 2), and by and by (cir 5th cent.) was extended to the whole Scriptures. Jerome's name for the Bible (4th cent.) was "the Divine Library" (Bibliotheca Divina). Afterward came an important change from pl. to sing. meaning. "In process of time this name, with many others of Gr origin, passed into the vocabulary of the western church; and in the 13th cent., by a happy solecism, the neut. pl. came to be regarded as a fem. sing., and 'The Books' became by common consent 'The Book' (biblia, sing.), in which form the word was passed into the languages of modern Europe" (Westcott, Bible in the Church, 5). Its earliest occurrences in Eng. are in Piers Plowman, Chaucer and Wycliffe.

There is naturally no name in the NT for the complete body of Scripture; the only Scriptures then known being those of the OT.

2. Other Designations—In 2 Pet 3 16, however, Paul's epistles seem brought under this category. The common designations for the OT books by Our Lord and His apostles were "the scriptures" (writings) (Mt 21 42; Mk 14 49; Lk 24 32; Jn 5 39; Acts 18 24; Rom 15 4, etc), "the holy scriptures" (Rom 1 2); once "the sacred writings" (2 Tim 3 15). The Jewish technical division (see below) into "the law," the "prophets," and the "holy writings" is recognized in the expression "in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and the psalms" (Lk 24 44). More briefly the whole is summed up under "the law and the prophets" (Mt 5 17; 11 13; Acts 13 15). Occasionally even the term "law" is extended to include the other divisions (Jn 10 34; 12 34; 15 25; 1 Cor 14 21). Paul uses the phrase "the oracles of God" as a name for the OT Scriptures (Rom 3 2; cf Acts 7 38; He 5 12; 1 Pet 4 11).

Special interest attaches to the names "Old" and "New Testament," now and since the close of the 2d cent. in common use to distinguish the Jewish and the Christian Scriptures. "Testament" (lit. "a will") is used in the NT (AV) to represent the Gr word diathēkē, in classical usage also "a will," but in the LXX and NT employed to translate the Heb word berith, "a covenant." In RV, accordingly, "testament" is, with two exceptions (He 9 16.17), changed to "covenant" (Mt 26 28; 2 Cor 3 6; Gal 3 15; He 7 22; 9 15, etc). Applied to the Scriptures, therefore, "Old" and "New Testament" mean, strictly, "Old" and "New Covenant," though the older usage is now too firmly fixed to be altered. The name is a continuation of the OT designation for the law, "the book of the covenant" (2 K 23 2). In this sense Paul applies it (2 Cor 3 14) to the OT law; "the reading of the old testament" (RV "Covenant"). When, after the middle of the 2d cent., a definite collection began to be made of the Christian writings, these were named "the New Testament," and were placed as of equal authority alongside the "Old." The name Novum Testamentum (also Instrumentum) occurs first in Tertullian (190–220 AD), and soon came into general use. The idea of a Christian Bible may be then said to be complete.

II. Languages.—The OT, it is well known, is written mostly in Heb; the NT is written wholly in Gr. The parts of the OT not in Heb, viz. Ezr 4 8–6 18; 7 12–26; Jer 10 11; Dnl 2 4–7 28, are in Aram. (the so-called Chaldee), a related dialect, which, after the Exile, gradually displaced Heb as the spoken language of the Jews (see ARAMAIC; LANGUAGE AND TEXT OF OT). The ancient Heb text was "unpointed," i.e. without the vowel-marks now in use. These are due to the labors of the Massoretic scholars (after 6th cent. AD).

The Gr of the NT, on which so much light has recently been thrown by the labors of Deissmann and others from the Egypt papyri, showing it to be a form of the "common" (Hellenistic) speech of the time (see LANGUAGE OF NT), still remains, from its penetration by Heb ideas, the influence of the LXX, peculiarities of training and culture in the writers, above all, the vitalizing and transforming power of Christian conceptions in vocabulary and expression, a study by itself. "We speak," the apostle says, "not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Spirit teacheth" (1 Cor 2 13). This is not always remembered in the search for parallels in the papyri. (For tr^s into other languages, see VERSIONS.)

III. Compass and Divisions.—The story of the origin, collection, and final stamping with canonical authority of the books which compose our present Bible involves many points still keenly in dispute. Before touching on these debatable matters, certain more external facts fall to be noticed relating to the general structure and compass of the Bible, and the main divisions of its contents.

A first step is to ascertain the character and contents of the Jewish Bible—the Bible in use by Christ and His apostles. Apart from references in the NT itself, an important aid is here afforded by a passage in Jos (CAP, I, 8), which may be taken to represent the current belief of the Jews in the 1st cent. AD. After speaking of the prophets as writing their histories "through the inspiration of God," Jos says: "For we have not myriads of discordant and conflicting books, but 22 only, comprising the record of all time, and justly accredited as Divine. Of these, 5 are books of Moses, which embrace the laws and the traditions of mankind until his own death, a period of almost 3,000 years. From the death of Moses till the reign of Artaxerxes, the successor of Xerxes, king of Persia, the prophets who followed Moses narrated the events of their time in 13 books. The remaining 4 books consist of hymns to God, and maxims of conduct for men. From Artaxerxes to our own age, the history has been written in detail, but it is not esteemed worthy of the same credit, on account of the exact succession of the prophets having been no longer maintained." He goes on to declare that, in this long interval, "no one has dared either to add anything to [the writings], or to take anything from them, or to alter anything," and speaks of them as "the decrees [dogmata] of God," for which the Jews would willingly die. Philo (20 BC–cir 50 AD) uses similar strong language about the law of Moses (in Eusebius, Pr. Ev., VIII, 6).

In this enumeration of Jos, it will be seen that the Jewish sacred books—39 in our Bible—are reckoned as 22 (after the no. of letters in the Heb alphabet), viz. 5 of the law, 13 of the prophets and 4 remaining books. These last are Ps, Prov, Cant and Eccl. The middle class includes all the historical and prophetic books, likewise Job, and the reduction in the no. from 30 to 13 is explained by Jgs–Ruth, 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr–Neh, Jer–Lam and the 12 minor prophets, each being counted as one book. In his 22 books, therefore, Jos includes all those in the present Heb canon, and none besides—not the books known as the APOCRYPHA, though he was acquainted with and used some of these.

Other lists and divisions.—The statement of Jos as to the 22 books acknowledged by the Jews is confirmed, with some variation of enumeration, by the lists preserved by Eusebius (HE, vi.26) from Melito of Sardis (cir 172 AD) and Origen (186–254 AD), and by Jerome (Pref to OT, cir 400)—all following Jewish authorities. Jerome knew also of a rabbinical division into 24 books. The celebrated passage from the Talm (Bābhā' Bathra', 14b: see CANON OF OT; cf Westcott, Bible in Church, 35; Driver, LOT, vi) counts also 24. This no. is obtained by separating Ruth from Jgs and Lam from Jer. The threefold division of the books, into Law, Prophets, and other sacred Writings (Hagiographa), is old. It is already implied in the Prologue to Sir (cir 130 BC), "the law, the prophets, and the rest of the books"; is glanced at in a work ascribed to Philo (De vita contempl., 3); is indicated, as formerly seen, in Lk 24 44. It really reflects stages in the formation of the Heb canon (see below). The rabbinical division, however, differed materially from that of Jos in reckoning only 8 books of the prophets, and relegating 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr–Neh, Est, Job and Dnl to the Hagiographa, thus enlarging that group to 9 (Westcott, op. cit., 28; DB, I, "Canon"). When Ruth and Lam were separated, they were added to the list, raising the no. to 11. Some, however, take this to be the original arrangement. In printed Heb Bibles the books in all the divisions are separate. The Jewish schools further divided the "Prophets" into "the former prophets" (the historical books—Josh, Jgs, S and K), and "the latter prophets" (Isa, Jer, Ezk and the 12 minor prophets as one book).

NT references.—It may be concluded that the above lists, excluding the Apoc, represent the Heb Bible as it existed in the time of Our Lord (the opinion, held by some, that the Sadducees received only the 5 books of the law rests on no sufficient evidence). This result is borne out by the evidence of quotations in Jos and Philo (cf Westcott, op. cit.). Still more is it confirmed by an examination of OT quotations and references in the NT. It was seen above that the main divisions of the OT are recognized in the NT, and that, under the name "Scriptures," a Divine authority is ascribed to them. It is therefore highly significant that, although the writers of the NT were familiar with the LXX, which contained the Apoc (see below), no quotation from any book of the Apoc occurs in their pages. One or two allusions, at most, suggest acquaintance with the Book of Wisdom (e.g. Wisd 5 18–21 || Eph 6 13–17). On the other hand, "every book in the Heb Bible is distinctly quoted in the NT with the exception of Josh, Jgs, Ch, Cant, Eccl, Ezr, Neh, Est, Ob, Zeph and Nah" (Westcott). Enumerations differ, but about 178 direct quotations may be reckoned in the Gospels, Acts and Epistles; if references are included, the no. is raised to about 700 (see QUOTATIONS IN NT). In four or five places (Lk 11 49–51; Jas 4 5; 1 Cor 2 9; Eph 5 14; Jn 7 38) apparent references occur to sources other than the OT; it is doubtful whether most of them are really so (cf Westcott, op. cit., 46–48; Eph 5 14 may be from a Christian hymn). An undeniable influence of Apocalyptic literature is seen in Jude, where vs 14.15 are a direct quotation from the Book of Enoch. It does not follow that Jude regarded this book as a proper part of Scripture.

Hitherto we have been dealing with the Heb OT; marked changes are apparent when we turn to the Septuagint, or Gr version of the LXX.

2. The LXX current in the Gr-speaking world at the commencement of the Christian era.

The importance of this version lies in the fact that it was practically the OT of the early church. It was used by the apostles and their converts, and is freely quoted in the NT, sometimes even when its renderings vary considerably from the Heb. Its influence was necessarily, therefore, very great.

Origin.—The special problems connected with origin, text and literary relations of the LXX are dealt with elsewhere (see SEPTUAGINT). The version took its rise, under one of the early Ptolemies, from the needs of the Jews in Egypt, before the middle of the 2d cent. BC; was gradually executed, and completed hardly later than cir 100 BC; thereafter spread into all parts. Its renderings reveal frequent divergence in MSS from the present MT, but show also that the translators permitted themselves considerable liberties in enlarging, abbreviating, transposing and otherwise modifying the texts they had, and in the insertion of materials borrowed from other sources.

The Apocrypha.—The most noteworthy differences are in the departure from Jewish tradition in the arrangement of the books (this varies greatly; cf Swete, Intro to OT in Gr, II, ch i), and in the inclusion in the list of the other books, unknown to the Heb canon, now grouped as the Apocrypha. These form an extensive addition. They include the whole of the existing Apoc, with the exception of 2 Esd and Pr Man. All are of late date, and are in Gr, though Sir had a Heb original which has been partly recovered. They are not collected, but are interspersed among the OT books in what are taken to be their appropriate places. The Gr fragments of Est, e.g. are incorporated in that book; Sus and Bel form part of Dnl; Bar is joined with Jer, etc. The most important books are Wisd, Sir and 1 Macc (cir 100 BC). The fact that Sir, originally in Heb (cir 200 BC), and of high repute, was not included in the Heb canon, has a weighty bearing on the period of the closing of the latter.

Ecclesiastical use.—It is, as already remarked, singular that, notwithstanding this extensive enlargement of the canon by the LXX, the books just named obtained no Scriptural recognition from the writers of the NT. The more scholarly of the Fathers, likewise (Melito, Origen, Athanasius, Cyr, Jerome, etc), adhere to the Heb list, and most draw a sharp distinction between the canonical books, and the Gr additions, the reading of which is, however, admitted for edification (cf Westcott, op. cit., 135–36, 168, 180, 182–83). Where slight divergencies occur (e.g. Est is omitted by Melito and placed by Athanasius among the Apoc; Origen and Athanasius add Bar to Jer), these are readily explained by doubts as to canonicity or by imperfect knowledge. On the other hand, familiarity with the LXX in writers ignorant of Heb could not but tend to break down the limits of the Jewish canon, and to lend a Scriptural sanction to the additions to that canon. This was aided in the West by the fact that the Old Lat VSS (2d cent.) based on the LXX, included these additions (the Syr Pesh followed the Heb). In many quarters, therefore, the distinction is found broken down, and ecclesiastical writers (Clement, Barnabas, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clem. Alex., Basil, etc) quote freely from books like Wisd, Sir, Bar, Tob, 2 Esd, as from parts of the OT.

An important landmark is reached in the Vulg or Lat version of Jerome. Jerome, on grounds explained in his Preface, recognized only the Heb Scriptures as canonical; under pressure he executed later a hasty tr of Tob and Jud. Feeling ran strong, however, in favor of the other books, and ere long these were added to Jerome's version from the Old Lat (see VULGATE). It is this enlarged Vulg which received official recognition, under anathema, at the Council of Trent (1543), and, with revision, from Clement VIII (1592), though, earlier, leading Romish scholars (Ximenes, Erasmus, Cajetan) had made plain the true state of the facts. The Gr church vacillated in its decisions, sometimes approving the limited, sometimes the extended, canon (cf Westcott, op. cit., 217–29). The churches of the Reformation (Lutheran, Swiss), as was to be expected, went back to the Heb canon, giving only a qualified sanction to the reading and ecclesiastical use of the Apoc. The early English VSS (Tyndale, Coverdale, etc) include, but separate, the apocryphal books (see ENGLISH VERSIONS). The Anglican Articles express the general estimate of these books: "And the other books (as Jerome saith) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine" (Art. VIII). Modern Protestant Bibles usually exclude the Apoc altogether.

From this survey of the course of opinion on the compass of the OT, we come to the NT. This admits of being more briefly treated.

4. The NT It has been seen that a Christian NT did not, in the strict sense, arise till after the middle of the 2d century. Gospels and Epistles had long existed, collections had begun to be made, the Gospels, at least, were weekly read in the assemblies of the Christians (Justin, 1 Apol., 67), before the attempt was made to bring together, and take formal account of, all the books which enjoyed apostolic authority (see CANON of NT). The needs of the church, however, and very specially controversy with gnostic opponents, made it necessary that this work should be done; collections also had to be formed for purposes of tr into other tongues. Genuine gospels had to be distinguished from spurious; apostolic writings from those of later date, or falsely bearing apostolic names. When this task was undertaken, a distinction soon revealed itself between two classes of books, setting aside those recognized on all hands as spurious: (1) books universally acknowledged—those named afterward by Eusebius the homologoumena; and (2) books only partially acknowledged, or on which some doubt rested—the Eusebian antilegomena (HE, iii.25). It is on this distinction that differences as to the precise extent of the NT turned.

(1) "Acknowledged books."—The "acknowledged" books present little difficulty. They are enumerated by Eusebius, whose statements are confirmed by early lists (e.g. that of Muratori, cir 170 AD), quotations, VSS and patristic use. At the head stand the Four Gospels and the Acts, then come the 13 epistles of Paul, then 1 Pet and 1 Jn. These, Westcott says, toward the close of the 2d cent., "were universally received in every church, without doubt or limitation, as part of the written rule of Christian faith, equal in authority with the Old Scriptures, and ratified (as it seemed) by a tradition reaching back to the date of their composition" (op. cit., 133). With them may almost be placed Revelation (as by Eusebius) and He, the doubts regarding the latter relating more to Pauline authority than to genuineness (e.g. Origen).

(2) "Disputed books."—The "disputed" books were the epistles of Jas, Jude, 2 and 3 Jn and 2 Pet. These, however, do not all stand in the same rank as regards authentication. A chief difficulty is the silence of the western Fathers regarding Jas, 2 Pet and 3 Jn. On the other hand, Jas is known to Origen and is included in the Syr Pesh; the Muratorian Fragment attests Jude and 2 Jn as "held in the Catholic church" (Jude also in Tertullian, Clem. Alex., Origen); none of the books are treated as spurious. The weakest in attestation is 2 Pet, which is not distinctly traceable before the 3d cent. (See CANON of NT; arts. s.v.) It is to be added that, in a few instances, as in the case of the OT Apoc, early Fathers cite as Scripture books not generally accepted as canonical (e.g. Barnabas, Hermas, Apoc of Pet).

The complete acceptance of all the books in our present NT canon may be dated from the Councils of Laodicea (cir 363 AD) and of Carthage (397 AD), confirming the lists of Cyril of Jerus, Jerome and Augustine.

IV. Literary Origin and Growth—Canonicity.—Thus far the books of the OT and NT have been taken simply as given, and no attempt has been made to inquire how or when they were written or compiled, or how they came to acquire the dignity and authority implied in their reception into a sacred canon. The field here entered is one bristling with controversy, and it is necessary to choose one's steps with caution to find a safe way through it. Details in the survey are left, as before, to the special articles.

Attention here is naturally directed, first, to the OT. This, it is obvious, and is on all sides admitted, has a long literary history prior to its final settlement in a canon. As to the course of that history traditional and modern critical views very widely differ. It may possibly turn out that the truth lies somewhere midway between them.

(1) OT indications.—If the indications furnished by the OT itself be accepted, the results are something like the following:

(a) Patriarchal age: No mention is made of writing in the patriarchal age, though it is now known that a high literary culture then prevailed in Babylonia, Egypt and Palestine, and it is not improbable, indeed seems likely, that records in some form came down from that age, and are, in parts, incorporated in the early history of the Bible.

(b) Mosaic age: In Mosaic times writing was in use, and Moses himself was trained in the learning of the Egyptians (Ex 2 10; Acts 7 22). In no place is the composition of the whole Pent (as traditionally believed) ascribed to Moses, but no inconsiderable amount of written matter is directly attributed to him, creating the presumption that there was more, even when the fact is not stated. Moses wrote "all the words of Jeh" in the "book of the covenant" (Ex 21-23; 24 4.7). He wrote "the words of this law" of Dt at Moab, "in a book, until they were finished" (Dt 31 9.24.26). This was given to the priests to be put by the side of the ark for preservation (vs 25.26). Other notices occur of the writing of Moses (Ex 17 14; Nu 33 2; Dt 31 19.22; cf Nu 11 26). The song of Miriam, and the snatches of song in Nu 21, the first (perhaps all) quoted from the "book of the Wars of Jeh" (Nu 21 14 ff), plainly belong to Mosaic times. In this connection it should be noticed that the discourses and law of Dt imply the history and legislation of the critical JE histories (see below). The priestly laws (Lev, Nu) bear so entirely the stamp of the wilderness that they can hardly have originated anywhere else, and were probably then, or soon after, written down. Joshua, too, is presumed to be familiar with writing (Josh 8 30-35; cf Dt 27 8), and is stated to have written his farewell address "in the book of the law of God" (Josh 24 26; cf 1 7.8). These statements already imply the beginning of a sacred literature.

(c) The Judges: The song of Deborah (Jgs 5) is an indubitably authentic monument of the age of the Judges, and the older parts of Jgs, at least, must have been nearly contemporary with the events which they record. A knowledge of writing among the common people seems implied in Jgs 8 14 (ARVm). Samuel, like Joshua, wrote "in a book" (1 S 10 25), and laid it up, evidently among other writings, "before Jehovah."

(d) The age of David and Solomon was one of high development in poetical and historical composition: witness the elegies of David (2 S 1 17 ff; 3 33.34), and the finely-finished narrative of David's reign (2 S 9-20), the so-called "Jerusalem-Source," admitted to date "from a period very little later than that of the events related" (Driver, LOT, 183). There were court scribes and chroniclers.

David and the Monarchy: David, as befits his piety and poetical and musical gifts (cf on this POT, 440 ff), is credited with laying the foundations of a sacred psalmody (2 S 23 1 ff; see PSALMS), and a whole collection of psalms (1-72, with exclusion of the distinct collection, 42-50), once forming a separate book (cf Ps 72 20), are, with others, ascribed to him by their titles (Pss 1, 2, 10 are untitled). It is hardly credible that a tradition like this can be wholly wrong, and a Davidic basis of the Psalter may safely be assumed. Numerous psalms, by their mention of the "king" (as Pss 2, 18, 20, 21, 28, 33, 45, 61, 63, 72, 101, 110), are naturally referred to the period of the monarchy (some, as Ps 18 certainly, Davidic). Other groups of psalms are referred to the temple guilds (Sons of Korah, Asaph).

(e) Wisdom literature: Solomon is renowned as founder of the Wisdom literature and the author of Proverbs (1 K 4 32; Prov 1 1; 10 1; Eccl 12 9; Eccl itself appears to be late), and of the Song (Cant 1 1). The "men of Hezekiah" are said to have copied out a collection of his proverbs (Prov 25 1; see PROVERBS). Here also may be placed the Book of Job. Hezekiah's reign appears to have been one of literary activity: to it, probably, are to be referred certain of the Pss (e.g. Pss 46, 48; cf Perowne, Delitzsch). In history, during the monarchy, the prophets would seem to have acted as the "sacred historiographers" of the nation. From their memoirs of the successive reigns, as the later books testify (1 Ch 29 29; 2 Ch 9 29; 12 15, etc), are compiled most of the narratives in our canonical writings (hence the name "former prophets"). The latest date in 2 K is 562 BC, and the body of the book is probably earlier.

(f) Prophecy: With the rise of written prophecy a new form of literature enters, called forth by, and vividly mirroring, the religious and political conditions of the closing periods of the monarchy in Israel and Judah (see PROPHECY). On the older view, Obadiah and Joel stood at the head of the series in the pre-Assyr period (9th cent.), and this seems the preferable view still. On the newer view, these prophets are late, and written prophecy begins in the Assyrian period with Amos (Jeroboam II, cir 750 BC) and Hosea (cir 745-735). When the latter prophet wrote, Samaria was tottering to its fall (721 BC). A little later, in Judah, came Isaiah (cir 740-690) and Micah (cir 720-708). Isaiah, in the reigns of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz and Hezekiah, is the greatest of the prophets in the Assyrian age, and his ministry reaches its climax in the deliverance of Jerus from Sennacherib (2 K 18, 19; Isa 36, 37). It is a question whether some oracles of an Isaianic school are not mingled with the prophet's own writings, and most scholars now regard the 2d part of the book (chs 40-66) as exilic or (in part) post-exilic in date. The standpoint of much in these chs is certainly in the Exile; whether the composition of the whole can be placed there is extremely doubtful (see ISAIAH). Nahum, who prophesies against Nineveh, belongs to the very close of this period (cir 660).

The prophets Zephaniah (under Josiah, cir 630 BC) and Habakkuk (cir 606) may be regarded as forming the transition to the next—the Chaldaean—period. The Chaldaeans (unnamed in Zeph) are advancing but are not yet come (Hab 1 6). The great prophetic figure here, however, is Jeremiah, whose sorrowful ministry, beginning in the 13th year of Josiah (626 BC), extended through the succeeding reigns till after the fall of Jerus (586 BC). The prophet elected to remain with the remnant in the land, and shortly after, troubles having arisen, was forcibly carried into Egypt (Jer 43). Here also he prophesied (chs 43, 44). From the reign of Jehoiaquim, Jeremiah consistently declared the success of the Chaldaean arms, and foretold the 70 years' captivity (25 12-14). Baruch acted as his secretary in writing out and editing his prophecies (chs 36, 45).

(g) Josiah's reformation: A highly important event in this period was Josiah's reformation in his 18th year (621 BC), and the discovery, during repairs of the temple, of "the book of the law," called also "the book of the covenant" and "the law of Moses" (2 K 22 8; 23 2.24.25). The finding of this book, identified by most authorities with the Book of Dt, produced an extraordinary sensation. On no side was there the least question that it was a genuine ancient work. Jeremiah, strangely, makes no allusion to this discovery, but his prophecies are deeply saturated with the ideas and style of Dt.

(h) Exilian and post-exilian: The bulk of Isa 40-66 belongs, at least in spirit, to the Exile, but the one prophet of the Exile known to us by name is the priestly Ezekiel. Carried captive under Jehoiachin (597 BC), Ezekiel labored among his fellow-exiles for at least 22 years (Ezk 1 2; 29 17). A man of the strongest moral courage, his symbolic visions on the banks of the Chebar alternated with the most direct expostulation, exhortation, warning and promise. In the description of an ideal temple and its worship with which his book closes (chs 40-48), critics think they discern the suggestion of the Levitical code.

(i) Daniel: After Ezekiel the voice of prophecy is silent till it revives in Daniel, in Babylon, under Nebuchadnezzar and his successors. Deported in 605 BC, Daniel rose to power, and "continued" until the 1st year of Cyrus (536 BC; Dnl 1 21). Criticism will have it that his prophecies are a product of the Maccabean age, but powerful considerations on the other side are ignored (see DANIEL). Jonah may have been written about this time, though the prophet's mission itself was pre-Assyrian (9th cent.). The rebuilding of the temple after the return, under Zerubbabel, furnished the occasion for the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah (520 BC). Scholars are disposed to regard only Zec 1-8 as belonging to this period—the remainder being placed earlier or later. Malachi, nearly a cent. after (cir 430), brings up the rear of prophecy, rebuking unfaithfulness, and predicting the advent of the "messenger of the covenant" (Mal 3 1.2). To this period, or later, belong, besides post-exilian psalms (e.g. Pss 124, 126), the books of Ezr, Neh, Ch, Est and apparently Eccl.

(j) A preëxilic Bible: If, in this rapid sketch, the facts are correctly represented, it will be apparent that, in opposition to prevalent views, a large body of sacred lit. existed (laws, histories, psalms, wisdom-books, prophecies), and was recognized long before the Exile. God's ancient people had "Scriptures"—had a Bible—if not yet in collected form. This is strikingly borne out by the numerous OT passages referring to what appears to be a code of sacred writings in the hands of the pious in Israel. Such are the references to, and praises of, the "law" and "word" of God in many of the Pss (e.g. 1, 19, 119, 12 6; 17 4; 18 21.22), with the references to God's known "words," "ways," "commandments," "statutes," in other books of the OT (Job 8 8; Hos 8 12; Dnl 9 2). In brief, Scriptures, which must have contained records of God's dealings with His people, a knowledge of which is constantly presupposed, "laws" of God for the regulation of the heart and conduct, "statutes," "ordinances," "words" of God, are a postulate of a great part of the OT.

(2) Critical views.—The account of the origin and growth of the OT above presented is in marked contrast with that given in the textbooks of the newer critical schools. The main features of these critical views are sketched in the art. CRITICISM (q.v.); here a brief indication will suffice. Generally, the books of the OT are brought down to late dates; are regarded as highly composite; the earlier books, from their distance from the events recorded, are deprived of historical worth. Neither histories nor laws in the Pent belong to the Mosaic age: Josh is a "romance"; Jgs may embody ancient fragments, but in bulk is unhistorical. The earliest fragments of Israelitish literature are lyric pieces like those preserved in Gen 4 23.24; 9 25-27; Nu 21; the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5) is probably genuine. Historical writing begins about the age of David or soon thereafter. The folklore of the Hebrews and traditions of the Mosaic age began to be reduced to writing about the 9th cent. BC.

(a) The Pentateuch: Our present Pent (enlarged to a "Hexateuch," including Josh) consists of 4 main strands (themselves composite), the oldest of which (called J, from its use of the name Jehovah) goes back to about 850 BC. This was Judean. A parallel history book (called E, from its use of the name Elohim, God) was produced in the Northern kingdom about a century later (c 750). Later still these two were united (JE). These histories, "prophetic" in spirit, were originally attributed to individual authors, distinguished by minute criteria of style: the more recent fashion is to regard them as the work of "schools." Hitherto the only laws known were those of the (post-Mosaic) Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23). Later, in Josiah's reign, the desire for centralization of worship led to the composition of the Book of Dt. This, secreted in the temple, was found by Hilkiah (2 K 22), and brought about the reformation of Josiah formerly mentioned. Dt (D), thus produced, is the third strand in the Pentateuchal compilation. With the destruction of the city and temple, under the impulse of Ezekiel, began a new period of law-construction, now priestly in spirit. Old laws and usages were codified; new laws were invented; the history of institutions was recast; finally, the extensive complex of Levitical legislation was brought into being, clothed with a wilderness dress, and ascribed to Moses. This elaborate Priestly Code (PC), with its accompanying history, was brought from Babylon by Ezra, and, united with the already existing JE and D, was given forth by him to the restored community at Jerus (444 BC; Neh 8) as "the law of Moses." Their acceptance of it was the inauguration of "Judaism."

(b) Histories: In its theory of the Pent the newer criticism lays down the determinative positions for its criticism of all the remaining books of the OT. The historical books show but a continuation of the processes of literary construction exemplified in the books ascribed to Moses. The Deuteronomic element, e.g. in Josh, Jgs, 1, 2 S, 1, 2 K, proves them, in these parts, to be later than Josiah, and historically untrustworthy. The Levitical element in 1, 2 Ch demonstrates its pictures of David and his successors to be distorted and false. The same canon applies to the prophets. Joel, e.g. must be post-exilian, because it presupposes the priestly law. The patriarchal and Mosaic histories being subverted, it is not permitted to assume any high religious ideas in early Israel. David, therefore, could not have written the Pss. Most, if not practically all, of these are post-exilian.

(c) Psalms and prophets: Monotheism came in—at least first obtained recognition—through Amos and Hosea. The prophets could not have the foresight and far-reaching hopes seen in their writings: these passages, therefore, must be removed. Generally the tendency is to put dates as low as possible and very many books, regarded before as pre-exilian, are carried down in whole or part, to exilian, post-exilian, and even late Gr times (PC, Psalter, Job, Prov, Cant, Eccl, 2 Isa, Joel, Lam). Dnl is Maccabean and unhistorical (cir 168-167 BC).

It is not proposed here to discuss this theory, which is not accepted in the present art., and is considered elsewhere (see CRITICISM; PENTATEUCH). The few points calling for remark relate to canonical acceptance.

(3) Formation of the canon.—The general lines of the completed Jewish canon have already been sketched, and some light has now been thrown on the process by which the several books obtained a sacred authority. As to the actual stages in the formation of the canon opinions again widely diverge (see CANON OF THE OT).

(a) Critical theory: On the theory at present in favor, no collections of sacred books were made prior to the return from Babylon. The only books that had authority before the Exile were, perhaps, the old Book of the Covenant, and, from Josiah's time, the Book of Dt. Both, after the return, were, on this theory, embodied, with the JE histories, and the PC, in Ezra's completed Book of the Law (with Josh [?]), in which, accordingly, the foundation of a canon was laid. The fivefold division of the law was later. Subsequently, answering to the 2d division of the Jewish canon, a collection was made of the prophetic writings. As this includes books which, on the critical view, go down to Gr times (Jon; Zec 9-14), its completion cannot be earlier than well down in the 3d cent. BC. Latest of all came the collection of the "Hagiographa"—a division of the canon, on the theory, kept open to receive additions certainly till the 2d cent., some think after. Into it were received such late writings as Eccl, Maccabean Pss, Dnl. Even then one or two books (Eccl, Est) remained subjects of dispute.

(b) More positive view: It will appear from the foregoing that this theory is not here accepted without considerable modification. If the question be asked, What constituted a right to a place in the canon? the answer can hardly be other than that suggested by Jos in the passage formerly quoted—a real or supposed inspiration in the author of the book. Books were received if men had the prophetic spirit (in higher or lower degree: that, e.g. of wisdom); they ceased to be received when the succession of prophets was thought to fail (after Mal). In any case the writings of truly inspired men (Moses, the prophets, psalmists) were accepted as of authority. It was sought, however, to be shown above, that such books, many of them, already existed from Moses down, long before the Exile (the law, collections of psalms, of proverbs, written prophecies: to what end did the prophets write, if they did not mean their prophecies to be circulated and preserved?); and such writings, to the godly who knew and used them, had the full value of Scripture. A canon began with the first laying up of the "book of the law" before Jeh (Dt 31 25, 26; Josh 24 26). The age of Ezra and Nehemiah, therefore, is not that of the beginning, but, as Jewish tradition rightly held (Jos; 2 Macc 2 13; Talm), rather that of the completion, systematic delimitation, acknowledgment and formal close of the canon. The divisions of "law, prophets, and holy writings" would thus have their place from the beginning, and be nearly contemporaneous. The Samaritans accepted only the 5 books of the law, with apparently Josh (see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH).

(c) Close of the canon: There is no need for dogmatism as to an absolute date for the close of the canon. If inspired voices continued to be heard, their utterances were entitled to recognition. Books duly authenticated might be added, but the non-inclusion of such as a book as Sir (Ecclus: in Heb, cir 200 BC) shows that the limits of the canon were jealously guarded, and the onus of proof rests on those who affirm that there were such books.

Calvin, e.g. held that there were Maccabean Pss. Many modern scholars do the same, but it is doubtful if they are right. Eccl is thought on linguistic grounds to be late, but it and other books need not be so late as critics make them. Dnl is confidently declared to be Maccabean, but there are weighty reasons for maintaining a Pers date (see DANIEL). As formerly noticed, the threefold division into "the law, the prophets, and the rest [tá loipá, a definite number] of the books" is already attested in the Prologue to Sir.

Critical controversy, long occupied with the OT, has again keenly attached itself to the NT, with similar disturbing results (see CRITICISM). Extremes of opinion may be here neglected, and account be taken only of those that can claim reasonable support. The NT writings are conveniently grouped into the historical books (Gospels and Acts); Epistles (Pauline and other); and a Prophetic book (Rev). In order of writing, the Epistles, generally, are earlier than the Gospels, but in order of subject, the Gospels naturally claim attention first.

(1) The Gospels and Acts.—The main facts about the origin of the Gospels can perhaps be distinguished from the complicated literary theories which scholars are still discussing (see GOSPELS). The first three Gospels, known as the Synoptics, evidently embody a common tradition, and draw from common sources. The Fourth Gospel—that of John—presents problems by itself.

(a) The Synoptics: The former—the Synoptic Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk)—fall in date well within the apostolic age, and are, in the 2d cent., uniformly connected with the authors whose names they bear. Mark is spoken of as "the interpreter of Peter" (Papias, in HE iii.39); Luke is the well-known companion of Paul. A difficulty arises about Matthew, whose Gospel is stated to have been written in Aram. (Papias, ut supra, etc), while the gospel bearing his name is in Gr. The Gr gospel seems at least to have been sufficiently identified with the apostle to admit of the early church always treating it as his.

The older theory of origin assumed an oral basis for all 3 Gospels. The tendency in recent criticism is to distinguish two main sources: (1) Mk, the earliest gospel, a record of the preaching of Peter; (2) a collection of the sayings and discourses of Jesus, attributed to Matthew (the Eusebian Logia, now called Q); with (3) a source used by Luke in the sections peculiar to himself—the result of his own investigations (Lk 1 1-4). Mt and Lk are supposed to be based on Mk and the Logia (Q); in Luke's case with the addition of his special material. Oral tradition furnished what remains. A simpler theory may be to substitute for (1) a Petrine tradition already firmly fixed while yet the apostles were working together in Jerus. Peter, as foremost spokesman, would naturally stamp his own type upon the oral narratives of Christ's sayings and doings (the Mk type), while Matthew's stories, in part written, would be the chief source for the longer discourses. The instruction imparted by the apostles and those taught by them would everywhere be made the basis of careful catechetical teaching, and records of all this, more or less fragmentary, would be early in circulation (Lk 1 1-4). This would explain the Petrine type of narrative, and the seeming dependence of Mt and Lk, without the necessity of supposing a direct use of Mk. So important a gospel could hardly be included in the "attempts" of Lk 1 1.

(b) The Fourth Gospel: The Fourth Gospel (Jn), the genuineness of which is assumed (see JOHN, GOSPEL OF), differs entirely in character and style. It is less a narrative than a didactic work, written to convince its readers that Jesus is "the Son of God" (Jn 20 31). The gospel may be presumed to have been composed at Ephesus, in the last years of the apostle's residence there. With this its character corresponds. The other gospels had long been known; John does not therefore traverse the ground already covered by them. He confines himself chiefly to matters drawn from his personal recollections: the Judaean ministry, the visits of Christ to Jerus, His last private discourses to His disciples. John had so often retold, and so long brooded over, the thoughts and words of Jesus, that they had become, in a manner, part of his own thought, and, in reproducing them, he necessarily did so with a subjective tinge, and in a partially paraphrastic and interpretative manner. Yet it is truly the words, thoughts and deeds of his beloved Lord that he narrates. His gospel is the needful complement to the others—the "spiritual" gospel.

(c) The Acts: The Acts narrates the origin and early fortunes of the church, with, as its special motive (cf 1 8), the extension of the gospel to the Gentiles through the labors of Paul. Its author is Luke, Paul's companion, whose gospel it continues (1 1). Certain sections—the so-called "we-sections" (16 10-17; 20 5-15; 21 1-18; 27 1-28 16)—are transcribed directly from Luke's journal of Paul's travels. The book closes abruptly with Paul's 2 years' imprisonment at Rome (28 30,31; 60-61 AD), and not a hint is given of the issue of the imprisonment—trial, liberation or death. Does this mean that a 3d "treatise" was contemplated? Or that the book was written while the imprisonment still continued? (thus now Harnack). If the latter, the Third Gospel must be very early.

(2) The Epistles.—(a) Pauline: Doubt never rested in the early church on the 13 epistles of Paul. Following upon the rejection by the "Tübingen" school of all the epistles but 4 (Rom 1, 2 Cor, Gal), the tide of opinion has again turned strongly in favor of their genuineness. An exception is the Pastoral epistles (1, 2 Tim, Tit), still questioned by some on insufficient grounds (see PASTORAL EPISTLES). The epistles, called forth by actual needs of the churches, are a living outpouring of the thoughts and feelings of the mind and heart of the apostle in relation to his converts. Most are letters to churches he himself had founded (1, 2 Cor, Gal, Eph[?], Phil, 1, 2 Thess): two are to churches he had not himself visited, but with which he stood in affectionate relations (Rom, Col); one is purely personal (Philem); three are addressed to individuals, but with official responsibilities (1, 2 Tim, Tit). The larger number were written during his missionary labors, and reflect his personal situation, anxieties and companionships at the places of their composition; four are epistles of the 1st Rom imprisonment (Eph, Phil, Col, Philem): 2 Tim is a voice from the dungeon, in his 2d imprisonment, shortly before his martyrdom. Doctrine, counsel, rebuke, admonition, tender solicitude, ethical instruction, prayer, thanksgiving, blend in living fusion in their contents. So marvelous a collection of letters, on such magnificent themes, was never before given to the world.

The earliest epistles, in point of date, are generally held to be those to the Thessalonians, written from Corinth (52, 53 AD). The church, newly-founded, had passed through much affliction (1 Thess 1 6; 2 14; 3 3,4, etc), and Paul writes to comfort and exhort it. His words about the Second Coming (4 13 ff) led to mistaken expectations and some disorders. These his 2d epistle was written to correct (2 Thess 2 1-3; 3 6, etc).

Corinth itself received the next epistles—the 1st called forth by reports received at Ephesus of grave divisions and irregularities (1 Cor 1 11; 3 3; 11 18 ff, etc), joined with pride of knowledge, doctrinal heresy (15 12 ff), and at least one case of gross immorality (ch 5) in the church; the 2d, written at Philippi, expressing joy at the repentance of the offender, and removing the severe sentence that had been passed upon him (2 Cor 2 1-10; cf 1 Cor 5 3,4), likewise vindicating Paul's own apostleship (chs 10-13). The date of both is 57 AD. 1 Cor contains the beautiful hymn on love (ch 13), and the noble chapter on resurrection (ch 15).

In the following year (58 BC) Paul penned from Corinth the Epistle to the Romans—the greatest of his doctrinal epistles. In it he develops his great theme of the impossibility of justification before God through works of law (chs 1-3), and of the Divine provision for human salvation in a "righteousness of God" in Christ Jesus, received through faith. He exhibits first the objective side of this redemption in the deliverance from condemnation effected through Christ's reconciling death (chs 3-5); then the subjective side, in the new life imparted by the spirit, giving deliverance from the power of sin (chs 6-8). A discussion follows of the Divine sovereignty in God's dealings with Israel, and of the end of these dealings (chs 9-11), and the epistle concludes with practical exhortations, counsels to forbearance and greetings (chs 12-16).

Closely connected with the Epistle to the Romans is that to the Galatians, in which the same truths are handled, but now with a polemical intent in expostulation and reproach. The Galatian churches had apostatized from the gospel of faith to Jewish legalism, and the apostle, sorely grieved, writes this powerful letter to rebuke their faithlessness, and recall them to their allegiance to the truth. It is reasonable to suppose that the 2 epistles are nearly related in place and time. The question is complicated, however, by the dispute which has arisen as to whether the churches intended are those of Northern Galatia (the older view; cf Conybeare and Howson, Lightfoot) or those of Southern Galatia (Sir Wm. Ramsay), i.e. the churches of Derbe, Lystra, Iconium and Antioch, in Paul's time embraced in the Rom province of Galatia (see GALATIA; GALATIANS). If the latter view is adopted, date and place are uncertain; if the former, the epistle may have been written from Ephesus (cir 57 AD).

The 4 epistles of the imprisonment all fall within the years 60, 61 AD. That to the Philippian, warmly praising the church, and exhorting to unity, possibly the latest of the group, was sent by the hand of Epaphroditus, who had come to Rome with a present from the Philippian church, and had there been overtaken by a serious illness (Phil 2 25-30; 4 15-18). The remaining 3 epistles (Eph, Col, and Philem) were written at one time, and were carried to their destinations by Epaphras. Eph and Col are twin epistles, similar in thought and style, extolling the preeminence of Christ, but it is doubtful whether the former was not really a "circular" epistle, or even, perhaps, the lost Epistle to the Laodiceans (Col 4 16; see EPISTLE TO THE LAODICEANS). The Colossian epistle has in view an early form of gnostic heresy (cf Lightfoot, Gal). Philem is a personal letter to a friend of the apostle's at Colossae, whose runaway slave, Onesimus, now a Christian, is being sent back to him with warm commendations. See CAPTIVITY EPISTLES.

Latest from Paul's pen are the Pastoral Epistles (1, 2 Tim, Tit), implying his liberation from his 1st imprisonment, and a new period of missionary labor in Ephesus, Macedonia and Crete (see PASTORAL EPISTLES). Timothy was left at Ephesus (1 Tim 1 3), Titus at Crete (Tit 1 5), for the regulation and superintendence of the churches.

The epistles, the altered style of which shows the deep impress of advancing years and changed conditions, contain admonitions to pastoral duty, with warnings as to perils that had arisen or would arise. 1 Tim and Tit were written while the apostle was still at liberty (63 AD); 2 Tim is from his Rom prison, when his case had been partly heard, and the end was impending (2 Tim 4 6.16.17).

(b) Epistle to the Hebrews: These are the Pauline Epistles proper. The Epistle to the Hebrews, though ascribed to Paul in the title of the AV, is not really his. It is an early writing (probably before the destruction of Jerus, 70 AD) of some friend of the apostle's (in Italy, cf 13 23.24), designed, by a reasoned exhibition of the superiority of Jesus to Moses and the Levitical priesthood, and of the fulfilment of OT types and institutions in His person and sacrifice, to remove the difficulties of Jewish Christians, who clung with natural affection to their temple and divinely appointed ritual. It was included by Eusebius, with others in the East (not, however, by Origen), among the epistles of Paul: in the West the Pauline authorship was not admitted. Many, nevertheless, with Origen, upheld a connection with Paul ("the thoughts are Paul's"). Ideas and style suggest an Alexandrian training: hence Luther's conjecture of Apollas as the writer. There can be no certainty on the subject. The value of the Epistle is unimpaired, whoever was the author.

(c) Catholic Epistles: Of the 7 so-called "Catholic" Epistles, Jas and Jude are by "brethren" of the Lord (James, "the Lord's brother," was head of the church at Jerus, Acts 15 13; 21 18; Gal 1 19, etc); Peter and John, to whom the others were ascribed, were apostles. Jas and 1 Pet are addressed to the Jews of the Dispersion (1 Pet 1 1; Jas 1 1). The doubts respecting certain of these writings have already been mentioned. The early date and acceptance of Jas is attested by numerous allusions (Clem. of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Did). Many regard it as the earliest of the epistles—before Paul's. Its tone is throughout practical. The seeming conflict with Paul on faith and works, which led Luther to speak slightly of it, is only verbal. Paul, too, held that a dead faith avails nothing (1 Cor 13 2; Gal 5 6). 1 Jn, like 1 Pet, was undisputed (if the Fourth Gospel is genuine, 1 Jn is), and, on internal grounds, the shorter epistles (2, 3 Jn) need not be doubted (see EPISTLES OF JOHN). Jude, rugged in style, with allusions to Jewish Apocalypses (vs 9.14), is well attested, and 2 Pet seems to found on it. The last-named epistle must rely for acceptance on its own claim (2 Pet 1 1.18), and on internal evidence of sincerity. It is to be observed that, though late in being noticed, it never appears to have been treated as spurious. The style certainly differs from 1 Pet; this may be due to the use of an amanuensis. If accepted, it must be placed late in Peter's life (before 65 AD). 1 Pet and Jude, in that case, must be earlier (see CATHOLIC EPISTLES).

(3) Prophecy.—The Book of Revelation: The one prophetic book of the NT—the apocalyptic counterpart of Dnl in the OT—is the Book of Rev. The external evidence for the Johannine authorship is strong (see APOCALYPSE). Tradition and internal evidence ascribe it to the reign of Domitian (cir 95 AD). Its contents were given in vision in the isle of Patmos (Rev 1 9). The theory which connects it with the reign of Nero through the supposed fitness of this name to express the mystic no. 666 is entirely precarious (cf Salmon, Intro to NT, 245–54). The main intent is to exhibit in symbolic form the approaching conflicts of Christ and His church with anti-Christian powers—with secular world-power (Beast), with intellectual anti-Christianism (False Prophet), with ecclesiastical anti-Christianism (Woman)—these conflicts issuing in victory and a period of triumph, preluding, after a sharp, final struggle, the last scenes (resurrection, judgment), and the eternal state. When the visions are taken, not as poetic imaginings, but as true apocalyptic unveilings, the change in style from the gospel, which may be regarded as already written, can readily be understood. These mighty revelations in Patmos brought about, as by volcanic force, a tremendous upheaval in the seer's soul, breaking through all previous strata of thought and feeling, and throwing everything into a new perspective. On the resultant high keynote: "Amen: Come, Lord Jesus" (Rev 22 20), the NT closes.

(4) Canonicity.—The principal steps by which the books now enumerated were gradually formed into a NT "Canon," have been indicated in previous sections. The test of canonicity here, as in the OT, is the presence of inspiration. Some would prefer the word "apostolic," which comes to the same thing. All the writings above reckoned were held to be the works of apostles or of apostolic men, and on this ground were admitted into the list of books having authority in the church. Barnabas (cir 100–120 AD) already quotes Mt 20 16 with the formula "it is written." Paul quotes as "scripture" (1 Tim 5 18) a passage found only in Lk (10 7). Paul's Epistles are classed with "other scriptures" in 2 Pet 3 16. Post-apostolic Fathers draw a clear distinction between their own writings and those of apostles like Paul and Peter (Polycarp, Ignatius, Barnabas). The Fathers of the close of the 2d cent. treat the NT writings as in the fullest degree inspired (cf Westcott, Intro to Study of Gospels, Append. B). An important impulse to the formation of a definite canon came from the gnostic Marcion (cir 140 AD), who made a canon for himself in 2 parts, "Gospel" and "Apostolicon," consisting of one gospel (a mutilated Lk) and 10 epistles of Paul (excluding Pastorals). A challenge of this kind had to be taken up, and lists of NT writings began to be made (Melito, Muratorian Fragment, etc), with the results previously described. By the commencement of the 4th cent. unanimity had practically been attained as regards even the Antilegomena. At the Council of Nicaea (325 AD), Westcott says, "the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments were silently admitted on all sides to have a final authority" (Bible in Church, 155). See CANON OF NT.

V. Unity and Spiritual Purpose—Inspiration.—Holy Scripture is not simply a collection of religious books: still less does it consist of mere fragments of Jewish and Christian literature. It belongs to the conception of Scripture that, though originating "by divers portions and in divers manners" (He 1 1), it should yet, in its completeness, constitute a unity, evincing, in the spirit and purpose that bind its parts together, the Divine source from which its revelation comes. The Bible is the record of God's revelations of Himself to men in successive ages and dispensations (Eph 1 8–10; 3 5–9; Col 1 25.26), till the revelation culminates in the advent and work of the Son, and the mission of the Spirit. It is this aspect of the Bible which constitutes its grand distinction from all collections of sacred writings—the so-called "Bibles" of heathen religions—in the world. These, as the slightest inspection of them shows, have no unity. They are accumulations of heterogeneous materials, presenting, in their collocation, no order, progress, or plan. The reason is, that they embody no historical revelation working out a purpose in consecutive stages from germinal beginnings to perfect close.

The Bible, by contrast, is a single book because it embodies such a revelation, and exhibits such a purpose. The unity of the book, made up of so many parts, is the attestation of the reality of the revelation it contains.

This feature of spiritual purpose in the Bible is one of the most obvious things about it (cf POT, 30 ff). It gives to the Bible what is

2. The Purpose of Grace sometimes termed its "organic unity." The Bible has a beginning, middle and end. The opening chs of Gen have their counterpart in the "new heaven and new earth" and paradise restored of the closing chapters of Rev (21, 22). Man's sin is made the starting-point for disclosures of God's grace. The patriarchal history, with its covenants and promises, is continued in the story of the Exodus and the events that follow, in fulfilment of these promises. Dt recapitulates the lawgiving at Sinai. Josh sees the people put in possession of the promised land. Backsliding, rebellion, failure, do not defeat God's purpose, but are overruled to carry it on to a surer completion. The monarchy is made the occasion of new promises to the house of David (2 S 7). The prophets root themselves in the past, but, at the very hour when the nation seems sinking in ruin, hold out bright hopes of a greater future in the extension of God's kingdom to the Gentiles, under Messiah's rule. A critical writer, Kautzsch, has justly said: "The abiding value of the OT lies above all in this, that it guarantees to us with absolute certainty the fact and the process of a Divine plan and way of salvation, which found its conclusion and fulfilment in the new covenant, in the person and work of Jesus Christ" (Bleibende Bedeutung des AT, 22, 24, 28-29, 30-31).

Fulfilment in Christ.—How truly all that was imperfect, transitional, temporary, in the OT was brought to realization and completion in the redemption and spiritual kingdom of Christ need not here be dwelt upon. Christ is the prophet, priest and king of the New Covenant. His perfect sacrifice, "once for all," supersedes and abolishes the typical sacrifices of the old economy (He 9, 10). His gift of the Spirit realizes what the prophets had foretold of God's law being written in men's hearts (Jer 31 31-34; 32 39, 40; Ezk 11 19, 20, etc). His kingdom is established on moveless foundations, and can have no end (Phil 2 9-11; He 12 28; Rev 5 13, etc). In tracing the lines of this redeeming purpose of God, brought to light in Christ, we gain the key which unlocks the inmost meaning of the whole Bible. It is the revelation of a "gospel."

"Inspiration" is a word round which many debates have gathered. If, however, what has been said is true of the Bible as the record

3. Inspiration of a progressive revelation, of its contents as the discovery of the will of God for man's salvation, of the prophetic and apostolic standing of its writers, of the unity of spirit and purpose that pervades it, it will be difficult to deny that a quite peculiar presence, operation, and guidance of the Spirit of God are manifest in its production. The belief in inspiration, it has been seen, is implied in the formation of these books into a sacred canon. The full discussion of the subject belongs to a special art. (see INSPIRATION).

Biblical claim.—Here it need only be said that the claim for inspiration in the Bible is one made in fullest measure by the Bible itself. It is not denied by any that Jesus and His apostles regarded the OT Scriptures as in the fullest sense inspired. The appeal of Jesus was always to the Scriptures, and the word of Scripture was final with Him. "Have ye not read?" (Mt 19 4). "Ye do err, not knowing the scriptures, nor the power of God"

(Mt 22 29). This because "God" speaks in them (Mt 19 4). Prophecies and psalms were fulfilled in Him (Lk 18 31; 22 37; 24 27, 44). Paul esteemed the Scriptures "the oracles of God" (Rom 3 2). They are "God-inspired" (2 Tim 3 16). That NT prophets and apostles were not placed on any lower level than those of the OT is manifest from Paul's explicit words regarding himself and his fellow-apostles. Paul never faltered in his claim to be "an apostle of Christ Jesus through the will of God" (Eph 1 1, etc)—"separated unto the gospel of God" (Rom 1 1)—who had received his message, not from man, but by "revelation" from heaven (Gal 1 11, 12). The "mystery of Christ" had "now been revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit," in consequence of which the church is declared to be "built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone" (Eph 2 20; 3 5).

Marks of inspiration.—It might be shown that these claims made by NT writers for the OT and for themselves are borne out by what the OT itself teaches of prophetic inspiration, of wisdom as the gift of God's spirit, and of the light, holiness, saving virtue and sanctifying power continually ascribed to God's "law," "words," "statutes," "commandments," "judgments" (see above). This is the ultimate test of "inspiration"—that to which Paul likewise appeals—its power to "make wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus" (2 Tim 3 15)—its profitableness "for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness" (ver 16)—all to the end "that the man of God may be complete, furnished completely unto every good work" (ver 17). Nothing is here determined as to "inerrancy" in minor historical, geographical, chronological details, in which some would wrongly put the essence of inspiration; but it seems implied that at least there is no error which can interfere with or nullify the utility of Scripture for the ends specified. Who that brings Scripture to its own tests of inspiration, will deny that, judged as a whole, it fulfils them?

3. The claim of the Bible to a Divine origin is justified by its historical influence. Regarded even as lit., the Bible has an unexampled 4. Historical Influence of the Bible place in history. Ten or fifteen MSS are thought a goodly number for an ancient classic; the MSS of whole or parts of the NT are reckoned by thousands, the oldest going back to the 4th or 5th cent. Another test is tr. The books of the NT had hardly begun to be put together before we find tr^s being made of them in Lat, Syr, Egyp, later into Gothic and other barbarous tongues (see VERSIONS). In the Middle Ages, before the invention of printing, tr^s were made into the vernacular of most of the countries of Europe. Today there is not a language in the civilized world, hardly a language among uncivilized tribes, wherever missions have gone, into which this word of God has not been rendered. Thanks to the labors of Bible Societies, the circulation of the Bible in the different countries of the world in recent years outstrips all previous records. No book has ever been so minutely studied, has had so many books written on it, has founded so vast a lit. of hymns, liturgies, devotional writings, sermons, has been so keenly assailed, has evoked such splendid defences, as the Bible. Its spiritual influence cannot be estimated. To tell all the Bible has been and done for the world would be to rewrite in large part the history of modern civilization. Without it, in heathen lands, the arm and tongue of the missionary would be paralyzed. With it, even in the absence of the missionary, wondrous results are often effected.

In national life the Bible is the source of our highest social and national aspirations. Professor Huxley, though an agnostic, argued for the reading of the Bible in the schools on this very ground. "By the study of what other book," he asked, "could children be so much humanized, and made to feel that each figure in that vast historical procession fills, like themselves, but a momentary space in the interval between two eternities, and earns the blessings or the curses of all times, according to its effort to do good and to hate evil, even as they are also earning their payment for their work?" (Critiques and Addresses, 61).

VI. Addenda.—A few notes may be added, in closing, on special points not touched in the preceding sections.

Already in pre-Talm times, for purposes of reading in the synagogues, the Jews had larger divisions of the law into sections called Pārâ-1. Chapters shâhs, and of the prophets into similar and Verses sections called Haphtârâhs. They had also smaller divisions into Pesûkim, corresponding nearly with our verses. The division into chapters is much later (13th cent.). It is ascribed to Cardinal Hugo de St Caro (d. 1248); by others to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury (d. 1227). It was adopted into the Vulg, and from this was transferred by R. Nathan (cir 1440) to the Heb Bible (Bleek, Keil). Verses are marked in the Vulg as early as 1558. They first appear in the NT in Robert Stephens' edition of the Gr Testament in 1551. Henry Stephens, Robert's son, reports that they were devised by his father during a journey on horseback from Paris to Lyons.

The AV of 1611, based in part on earlier English VSS, esp. Tyndale's, justly holds rank as one of the noblest monuments of the English language of its own, or any, age. 2. AV and RV Necessarily, however, the Gr text used by the translators ("Textus Receptus"), resting on a few late MSS, was very imperfect. With the discovery of more ancient MSS, and multiplication of appliances for criticism, the need and call for a revised text and tr became urgent. Finally, at the instance of the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, the task of revision was undertaken by Committees representing the best English and American scholarship. Their labors resulted in the publication, in 1881, of the Revised NT, and in 1885, of the Revised OT (a revised edition of the Apoc was published in 1896). The preferences of the American Revisers were printed in an appendix, a pledge being given that no further changes should be made for 14 years. The English Companies were disbanded shortly after 1885, but the American Committee, adhering to its own renderings, and believing that further improvements on the English RV were possible, continued its organization and work. This issued, in 1901, in the production of the ARV, which aims at greater consistency and accuracy in a number of important respects, and is supplied, also, with carefully selected marginal references (see AMERICAN REVISED VERSION). Little could be done, in either ERV or ARV, in the absence of reliable data for comparison, with the text of the OT, but certain obvious corrections have been made, or noted in the margin.

In recent years abundant helps have been furnished, apart from Commentaries and Dictionaries, for the intelligent study of the English Bible. LITERATURE

I. As a Science.—Bib. theology seems best defined as the doctrine of Bib. religion. As such it works up the material contained in the OT and the NT as the product of exegetical study. This is the modern technical sense of the term, whereby it signifies a systematic representation of Bib. religion in its primitive form.

Bib. theology has sometimes been taken to signify not alone this science of the doctrinal declarations of the Scriptures, but the whole group of sciences concerned with the interpretation and exposition of the Scriptures. In that wider view of Bib. theology, the term exegetical theology has been used to define and include the group of sciences already referred to. But the whole weight of preference seems, in our view, to belong to the narrower use of the term Bib. theology, as more strictly scientific.

This is not to confound the science of Bib. theology with that of dogmatics, for their characters are sharply distinguished. The science of dogmatics is a historico-philosophical one; that of Bib. theology is purely historic. Dogmatics declares what, for religious faith, must be regarded as truth; Bib. theology only discovers what the writers of the OT and the NT adduce as truth. This latter merely ascertains the contents of the ideas put forward by the sacred writers, but is not concerned with their correctness or verification. It is the what of truth, in these documentary authorities, Bib. theology seeks to attain. The why, or with what right, it is so put forward as truth, belongs to the other science, that of dogmatics.

Bib. theology is thus the more objective science; it has no need of dogmatics; dogmatics, on the other hand, cannot be without the aid of Bib. theology.

3. Place and Method of Biblical Theology The Bib. theologian should be a Christian philosopher, an exegete, and, above all, a historian. For it is in a manner purely historical that Bib. theology seeks to investigate the teaching, in whole, of each of the sacred writers. Each writing it studies in itself, in its relation to the others, and in its place in history taken as a whole. Its method is historical-genetic. The proper place of Bib. theology is at the head of historical theology, where it shines as a center of light. Its ideal as a science is to present a clear, complete and comprehensive survey of the Bib. teachings.

In pursuance of this end, Bib. theology is served by scientific exegesis, whose results it presents in ordered form so as to exhibit the organic unity and completeness of Bib. religion. The importance of Bib. theology lies in the way it directs, corrects and fructifies all moral and dogmatic theology by bringing it to the original founts of truth. Its spirit is one of impartial historical inquiry.

II. History of Biblical Theology.—Bib. theology, in any truly scientific form, dates only from the 18th cent. Offspring as it was of

1. Its Rise in Scientific Form German rationalism, it has yet been found deserving of cultivation and scientific study by the most orthodox theology. Indeed, Pietism, too, urged its claims as Bib. dogma, over against the too scholastic dogma of orthodoxy. The Patristic theology, no doubt, was Bib., and the

2. Patristic and Scholastic Periods Alexandrian School deserves special praise. The scholastic theology of the Middle Ages leaned on the Fathers rather than on the Bible. Bib. theology, in spirit, though not in form, found a revival at the Reformation. But this was early followed by a 17th cent. type of scholasticism, polemical and confessional.

Even in that cent., however, efforts of a more purely Bib. character were not wanting, as witness those of Schmidt, Witsius and Vit-

3. 17th and 18th Cents. But throughout the entire 18th cent. there were manifest endeavors to throw off the scholastic yoke and return to Bib. simplicity. Haymann (1708), Büsching (1756), Zachariae (1772) and Storr (1793), are examples of the efforts referred to. But it was from the rationalistic side that the first vindication of Bib. theology as a science of independent rank was made. This merit belonged to Gabler (1787), who urged a purely historical treatment of the Bible, and was, later, shared by his colleague, G. L. Bauer, who issued a Bib. Theology of the NT (Ger) in four parts (1800–1802). More independent still was the standpoint assumed by C. F. Ammon in his Biblisches Theologie (2d ed, 1801–2). Ammon does not fail to apprehend the historical character of our science, saying that Bib. theology should deal only with the “materials, fundamental ideas, and results of Bib. teaching, without troubling itself about the connection of the same, or weaving them into an artificial system.”

The influence of Schleiermacher was hardly a fortunate one, the OT being sundered from the NT, and attention centered on the latter.

4. OT Theology in First Half of 19th Cent. Kayser (1813) and, still more, De Wette, who died in 1850, pursued the perfecting of our science, particularly in matters of method. Continuations of the work were Baumgarten-Crusius (1828), Cramer (1830) and Cölln, whose work was posthumously presented by D. Schulz in 1836. It was in the second quarter of the 19th cent. that the Bib. theology of the OT began to receive the full attention it deserved. It has been declared the merit of Hegel's philosophy to have taught men to see, in the various Bib. systems of doctrine, a complete development, and Hegel did, no doubt, exert a fertilizing influence on historical inquiry. But it must also be said that the Hegelian philosophy affected Bib. theology in a prejudicial manner, as may be seen in Vatke's a priori construction of history and doctrine in his work, Die bib. Theologie (1835), and in Bruno Bauer's Die Religion des AT (1838–39), which controverted but did not improve upon Vatke. Steudel (1840), Oehler (1845) and Hävernick (1848) are worthy of particularly honorable mention in this OT connection. In his Theology of the OT (3d ed, 1891; Amer. ed, 1883) G. F. Oehler excellently maintained the close connection between the OT and the NT, which Hengstenberg had already emphasized in 1829.

The Bib. theology of the NT was furthered by the memorable Neander. In 1832, he first issued his Planting and Training of the Christian Church, while his Life of Jesus first appeared in 1837. In this latter work, he summarized the doctrine of the Redeemer, while the former presented the doctrinal teaching of the apostolic writers in such wise as to show the different shades of thought peculiar to each of them, pointing out, at the same time, “how, notwithstanding all difference, there was an essential unity beneath, unless one is deceived by the form, and how the form in its diversity is easily explained.” C. F. Schmid improved in some respects upon Neander's work in his excellent Biblical Theology of the NT, issued (1853) after his death by Weizsäcker (new ed, 1864). In Schmid's work, the Bib. theology of the NT is presented with objectivity, clearness and penetrating sympathy.

Hahn's Theology of the NT (1854) came short of doing justice to the diverse types of doctrinal development in the NT. The work of G. V. Lechler on the apostolic and post-apostolic age, was, in its improved form of 1857, much more important. E. Reuss, in 1852, issued his valuable History of the Christian Theology of the Apostolic Age, a complete and critical work, but not sufficiently objective in its treatment. The Prelections on NT Theology of F. C. Baur, head of the Tübingen school, exemplify both the merits and the defects of the school. They are critical, independent and suggestive, but lacking in impartiality. They were published by his son after his death (1864). A new ed of these lectures on NT theology was issued by Pffeiderer in 1893.

Having first dealt with the teachings of Jesus, Baur then set out the materials of the NT theology in three periods, making Paul well-nigh the founder of Christianity. For him only four epistles of Paul were genuine products of the apostolic age, namely, Romans, the two Corinthians, Galatians, together with the Revelation. To the growth and history of the NT Baur applied the method of the Hegelian dialectic, and, though powerful and profound, displayed a lack of sane, well-balanced judgment. Yet so conservative a scholar as Weiss gave Baur the credit of having “first made it the problem of criticism to assign to each book of the NT its place in the history of the development of primitive Christianity, to determine the relations to which it owes its origin, the object at which it aims, and the views it represents.” Among Baur's followers may be noted Pffeiderer, in his Paulinism (1873).

The Theology of the NT, by J. J. Van Oosterzee (Eng. ed, 1870), is a serviceable book for students, and the NT Theology of A. Immer (1878), already famous for his hermeneutical studies, is noteworthy. Chief among subsequent cultivators of the Bib. theology of the NT must be reckoned B. Weiss, whose work in two volumes (Eng. ed, 1882-83) constitutes a most critical and complete, thorough and accurate treatment of the subject in all its details: W. Beyschlag, whose NT Theology (Eng. ed, in 2 vols, 1895) is also valuable; H. Holtzmann, whose treatise on NT Theology (1897) dealt in a critical fashion with the doctrinal contents of the NT. Holtzmann's learning and ability are great, but his work is marred by naturalistic presuppositions. The French work on Theology of the NT, by J. Bovon (2 vols, 1893-94) is marked by great independence, skill and fairness. The Theology of the NT, by W. F. Adeney (1894), and the yet more recent, and very attractively written, work with the same title, by G. B. Stevens (1899), bring us pretty well up to the present state of our science in respect of the NT.

Coming back to the Bib. theology of the OT in the second half of the 19th cent., we find A. Klostermann's Investigations into the OT Theology, which appeared in 1868.

6. OT Theology The OT theology, no less than that of the NT, was set forth by that great scholar, H. Ewald, in four vols (1871-75; Eng. ed [first part], 1888). His interest in NT theology was due to his strong feeling that the NT is really the second part of the record of Israel's revelation. A. Kuenen dealt with the Religion of Israel in two volumes (Eng. ed, 1874-75), writing nobly but with defective insight into, and comprehension of, the higher religious ideas of Israel. F. Hitzig's Prelections (1880) deal with the theology of the OT, as part of their contents. H. Schultz treated of the OT Theology in two vols (1st ed, 1869; 5th ed, 1896; Eng. ed, 1892), in a careful, mainly just, and, by comparison, well-balanced handling of the development of its religious ideas.

We have not touched upon writers like Smend, for example, in his History of OT Religion (1893), and J. Robertson, in his Early Religion of Israel (2d ed, 1892), who treat of the Bib. theology of the OT only in a way subsidiary to the consideration of the historico-critical problems. The Conception of Revelation in the OT was dealt with by F. E. König in 1882 in a careful and comprehensive manner, and with regard to the order and relation of the documents, revelation in Israel being taken by him in a supernaturalistic sense. Significant also for the progress of OT Bib. theology was The Theological and the Historical View of the OT, by C. Siegfried (1890), who insisted on the development of the higher religion of Israel being studied from the elder prophets as starting-point, instead of the law.

Mention should be made of Biblical Study: Its Principles, Methods and History, by C. A. Briggs (1883; 4th ed, 1891); of the important Compendium of the Bib. Theology of the O and the NT by K. Schlottmann (1889); of E. Riehm's valuable OT Theology (1889); and of G. Dalman's Studies in Bib. Theology—the Divine name and its history—in 1889. Also, of the OT Theology of A. Duff (1891); A. Dillmann's Handbook of OT Theology, edited by Kittel (1895); and of Marti's ed of the Theology of the OT of A. Kayser (3d ed, 1897).

Of Theology of the OT, by A. B. Davidson (1904), it may be said that it does full justice to the idea of a progressive development of doctrine in the OT, and is certainly divergent from the view of those who, like Cheyne, treat the OT writings as so many fragments, from which no theology can be extracted. Biblical Theology of the OT, by B. Stade (1905), is the work of a distinguished representative of the modern critical views, already famous for his work on the history of Israel (1887). The Theology of the OT by W. H. Bennett (1906) is a clear and useful compendium of the subject.

Recent works like The Problem of the OT by James Orr (1905), OT Critics by Thomas Whitelaw (1903), and Essays in Pentateuchal Criticism, by Harold M. Wiener (1909),

7. Bearings of Criticism deal with the critical questions, and do not concern us here, save to remark that they are not without bearing, in their results, upon the theology of the

OT. Such results are, e.g. the insistences, in Orr's work, on the unity of the OT, the higher than naturalistic view of Israel's religious development, the discriminate use of Divine names like Elohim and Jehovah, and so forth; and the express contention in Whitelaw's work, that the critical hypotheses are not such as can yield "a philosophically reasonable theology" (p. 346). Indeed, it must not be supposed that even works, like that of S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the OT (first issued in 1891), are without resultant influence on Bib. theology.

So far from that, the truth is that there is probably no result of the readjustment of the history and lit. of the OT so important as its bearings on the Bib. theology of the OT. For the order and the method of revelation are most surely involved in the order and relation of the books or documents, and the course of the history. The progress of the revelation ran parallel with the work of God in Nature and in the growth of human society. Hence the reconstruction of the historical theology of the OT will take much time and study, that the full value of the OT may be brought out as that of an independent and permanent revelation, with characteristic truths of its own. Meantime, the reality of that revelation, and the teleological character of the OT, have been brought out, in the most signal manner, by theological scholars like Dörner, Dillmann, Kittel, Kautsch, Schultz and others, who feel the inadequacy of natural development or "human reflection" to account for OT theology, and the immediacy of God's contact with man in OT times to be alone sufficient to account for a revelation so weighty, organically connected, dynamically bound together, monotheistic and progressive.

III. Divisions of Biblical Theology.—The divisions of OT theology are matters of grave difficulty. For the newer criticism has

1. Divergent Views practically transformed that mode of representing the process of Israel's religious development, which had been customary or traditional. On this latter view, the Patriarchal Age was succeeded by the Mosaic Age, with its law-giving under Moses, followed, after an intercalated period of Judges and monarchy, by the splendid Age of Prophecy. Then there was the Exile preparing the way, after the Return, for the new theocracy, wherein the Law of Moses was sought with more persistent endeavor, though not without darkly legalistic result. Such were the historic bases for OT theology, but the modifications proposed by the new criticism are sufficiently serious. These it will be necessary to indicate, without going beyond the scope of this art. and attempting criticism of either the one view or the other. It is the more necessary to do so, that finality has not been reached by criticism. We are only concerned with the difference which these divergent views make for OT Bib. theology, whose reconstruction is very far from perfected.

That they do mean serious difference has been indicated in the historical part of this art. Most obtrusive of these differences is the proposal to invert the order of law and prophecy, and speak rather of the Prophets and the Law. For the Law is, on the newer view, taken to belong to the post-prophetic period—in short, to the

2. Law and Prophecy period of the return from the Exile, whereas, in the traditional scheme of the order of revelation, the Law was found in full force both at the Exodus and the Return, with a dead-letter period between. The garment of legalism, the newer criticism asserts, could not have suited the Israelitish nation in its early and undeveloped stage, as it does after the teachings of the prophets and the discipline of the Exile. Against this, the older scheme prefers the objection that an external and legalistic system is made the outcome of the lofty spiritual teaching of the prophets; the letter appears super-imposed upon the spirit. Criticism, however, postulates for the ritual codes of the Pent an influence parallel in time with that of prophetism.

Besides the adjustments of prophecy and law just referred to, the critical views postulate a primal period in which the religion

3. Prophetism and Judaism of the prophets, with their view of Israel's vocation, was inculcated; also, a final period of Judaism, intercalated between the Return and the Maccabees, in which are seen at work the Levitical law, and various anti-legal tendencies. It must be obvious that attempts to integrate the OT theology amid the prevailing uncertainties of criticism must be far from easy or final, even if the need and importance be felt of keeping the religious interest before even the historical in OT study. For the OT writers, religion was primary, history secondary and incidental, we may well believe.

We must be content to know less of the remote beginnings and initial stages of Israel's religious development, for, as A. B. Davidson remarked, "in matters like this we never can get at the beginning." J. Robertson deems criticism wrong in not allowing "a sufficient starting-point for the development," by which he means that pure prophetic religion needs "a pure pre-prophetic religion" to explain its more than "germinal or elementary character." It may be noted, too, how much greater place and importance are attached to Mosaism or Moses by critics like Reuss, Schultz, Bredenkamp and Strack, than by Wellhausen, who yet allows a certain substratum of actual and historical fact.

It may be observed, further, that no one is under any compulsion to account for such a transformation, as even Wellhausen allows, in the slow growth from very low beginnings of the idea of Jeh up to pure and perfect monotheism—among a non-metaphysical people—by the simple supposition of naturalistic theory. Evolutionary the critical hypothesis of the religious development of Israel may be, but that development was clearly not so exclusively controlled by human elements or factors as to exclude the presence of supernatural energy or power of revelation. It had God within it—had, in Dörner's phrase, "teleology as its soul." Thus, as even Gunkel declares, "Israel is, and remains, the people of revelation." This is why Israel was able to make—despite all retrograde tendencies—rectilinear progress toward a predestined goal—the goal of being what Ewald styled a "purely immortal and spiritual Israel." OT theology does not seem to have sufficiently realized that the OT really presents us with theologies rather than a theology—with the progressive development of a religion rather than with theological ideas resting on one historic plane.

JAMES LINDSAY

BICHRI, bik'rī (בִּכְרִי, bikhri, "first born"; cf HPN, 88, 102): Father of Sheba who rebelled against David. B. is of the house of Benjamin and the word probably means a "descendant of Becher" (2 S 20 1 ff). Cf BECHER 1.

BID: Various signifying, according to six Heb and as many Gr originals: (1) "to command" (Nu 14 10; Mt 1 24 AV, προστάτω, proslátō); (2) "to prescribe" or "order" (Jn 2 2); (3) "to consecrate," and so rendered in RV (Zeph 1 7; cf 1 S 16 5); (4) εἶπον, eípon, "to say" or "tell" (Mt 16 12); (5) "to call" i.e. "invite" (καλέω, kaléō), conspicuously used in this sense in Christ's parables of the Marriage Feast (Mt 22 3-9) and of the Great Supper (Lk 14 7-24); (6) "to take leave of," ἀποτάττω, apotátō (Lk 9 61).

BIDDEN, bid'n: "Called," "invited" (1 S 9 13).

BIDE, bid: A variant of "abide" (q.v.); is the rendering of περιμένω, periménō, in Wisd 8 12 (RV "they shall wait for me"). In Acts 1 4 the same word is tr^d "wait for."

BIDKAR, bid'kar (בִּדְקָר, bidhkar; "son of Deker" [?]; cf HPN, 69): A captain in the service of Jehu, formerly his fellow-officer (2 K 9 25).

BIER, bē:

(1) Found in the OT only in 2 S 3 31, "and king David followed the bier"; and in the NT in Lk 7 14, "and he [Jesus] came nigh and touched the bier." The Heb word rendered "bier" (miṭṭāh) and its Gr equivalent (sorós) mean strictly "coffin." The so-called "bier" among the ancient Hebrews was simply an open coffin or a flat wooden frame, on which the body of the dead was carried from the house to the grave.

(2) Closed coffins, so universal now in the West, were unknown to common usage among the Hebrews of olden times, though not unknown to Egyptians, Greeks and Romans.

At the burial of Abner the people were commanded to "rend their clothes" and "gird themselves with sackcloth," and the king himself in token of his grief and royal regard, "followed the bier" in the procession to the grave (2 S 3 31).

(3) Of Jesus, when He met the procession that went out of the gate of the city of Nain, bearing to the grave the only son of the widowed mother, Luke says, "When the Lord saw her, he had com-

BILDAD, bil'dad (בִּלְדָּד, bildadh, "Bel has loved"): The second of the three friends of Job who, coming from distant regions, make an appointment together to condole with and comfort him in his affliction (Job 2 11). He is from Shuah, an unknown place somewhere in the countries E. and S.E. of Pal (or the designation Shuhite may be intended to refer to his ancestor Shuah, one of Abraham's sons by Keturah, Gen 25 2), and from his name (compounded with Bel, the name of a Bab deity) would seem to represent the wisdom of the distant East. His three speeches are contained in Job 8, 18 and 25. For substance they are largely passion on her . . . and he came nigh and touched the bier," and commanded the young man to arise, etc. We should recall that contact with a dead body was forbidden by the law as a source of defilement (Nu 19 11 f); so Jesus here "came nigh" and "touched the bier" only in raising the young man, thus avoiding any criticism for infraction of the law. In Jn 11 35, as here, we have a miracle of Jesus which clearly pointed to a higher law—the eternal law of compassion which received its first full expression in the life of Jesus and forms one of the distinctive features of the gospel.

BIGTHA, big'tha (בִּגְתָּה, big'hthā'; LXX Βαραζή, Barazē; B, Βαραζή, Bōrazē; A, Ὁαρεβωά, Oarebōā): One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains having charge of the harem of King Xerxes ("Ahasuerus") and commanded to bring Vashti to the king's banquet (Est 1 10).

BIGTHAN, big'than, BIGTHANA, big-thā'na (בִּגְתָּן, בִּגְתָּנָה, big'hthān, big'hthānā'; LXX omits name): One of the two chamberlains or eunuchs of Xerxes ("Ahasuerus") who conspired against the king's life, the conspiracy being detected by Mordecai and the culprits hanged (Est 2 21). Possibly these men had been partially superseded by the degradation of Vashti and were thus prompted to take revenge on Xerxes.

BIGVAI, big'vā-i (בִּגְוַי, big'way; Βαγοῦλ, Baogel, Baogouá, Bagouá):

(1) The head of one of the families who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2; Neh 7 7), having a large number of his retainers (2,056, according to Ezr 2 14; 2,067, according to Neh 7 19), besides 72 males later under Ezra (8 14).

(2) One of those who subscribed the covenant with Nehemiah (10 16).

BIKATH-AVEN, bik-ath-ā'ven (בִּקְעָת־אֵבֶן, bik'ath āven, "valley of vanity" [Am 1 5 AVm]). See AVEN; BETH-EDEN.

an echo of what Eliphaz has maintained, but charged with somewhat increased vehemence (cf 8 2; 18 3.4) because he deems Job's words so impious and wrathful. He is the first to attribute Job's calamity to actual wickedness; but he gets at it indirectly by accusing his children (who were destroyed, 1 19) of sin to warrant their punishment (8 4). For his contribution to the discussion he appeals to tradition (8 8-10), and taking Eliphaz' cue of cause and effect (ver 11) he gives, evidently from the literary stores of wisdom, a description of the precarious state of the wicked, to which he contrasts, with whatever implication it involves, the felicitous state of the righteous (8 11-22). His second speech is an intensified description of the wicked man's woes, made as if to match Job's description of his own desperate case (cf 18 5-21 with 16 6-22), thus tacitly identifying Job with the reprobate wicked. His third speech (25), which is the last utterance of the friends, is brief, subdued in tone, and for substance is a kind of Parthian shot, reiterating Eliphaz' depravity idea, the doctrine that dies hardest. This speech marks the final silencing of the friends.

JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

BILEAM, bil'ē-am (בִּלְעָם, bil'am; Ἰβλαάμ, Ib-laám): A town in the territory of Manasseh assigned to the Kohathite Levites (1 Ch 6 70), probably the same as Ibaleam (Josh 17 11, etc), and identical with the modern Bel'āmeḥ, half a mile S. of Jenān.

BILGAH, bil'ga, BILGAI, bil'gā-i (בִּלְגַּי, bil-gāh; בִּלְגַּי, bilgay, "cheerfulness"): A priest or priestly family in the time of the Return (Neh 12 5), and (under the form of "Bilgai," Neh 10 8) in the time of Nehemiah. According to 1 Ch 24 14, Bilgah is the 15th of the 24 divisions of the priests who officiated in the Temple. In the LXX, the names read Βελγά, Belgái, Belgá and Balgás. The traditional explanation of the name is "rejuvenation"; modern exegetes explain it as "cheerfulness."

BILHAH, bil'ha (person) (בִּלְהָה, bilhāh; Βαλλά, Ballá): A slave girl whom Laban gave to Rachel (Gen 29 29), and whom the latter gave to Jacob as a concubine (Gen 30 3.4); the mother of Dan and Naphtali (Gen 30 4.7; 35 25; 46 25; 1 Ch 7 13); guilty of incest with Reuben (Gen 35 22).

BILHAH, bil'ha (place) (בִּלְהָה, bilhāh; A, Βαλαά, Balaá; B, 'Αβελλά, Abellá): A city in Simeon (1 Ch 4 29)=Baalāh (Josh 15 29), Balah (19 3), and Baalath (19 44). Unidentified.

BILHAN, bil'han (בִּלְחָן, bilhān; Βαλαάν, Balaán):

(1) A Horite chief, son of Ezer (Gen 36 27; 1 Ch 1 42).

(2) A descendant of Benjamin, son of Jediahel, father of seven sons who were heads of houses in their tribes (1 Ch 7 10).

BILL, BOND, etc:

(1) In the parable of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16 6 f) "bill," AV, better "bond," RV, is used to translate the Gr grámmata, which is the equivalent of the contemporary Heb legal term shetar, "writing." This "writing," in the usage of the times, was an acknowledgment of the taking over or receiving of goods or money that had to be written and signed by the debtor himself. (See Bābhā' Bathrā 10 8.) Edersheim's averment that the Gr word was adopted into the Heb (Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, II, 272), is based, according to competent textual critics, upon a false reading. The Gr, according to Tisch., Treg. and WH, is tá grámmata, not tó grámma (TR). The word is indefinite, lit. "the letter," and determines nothing involved in controversy.

(2) A question much discussed is, Was "the bond" (RV) merely an acknowledgment of debt, or was it an obligation to pay a fixed annual rental from the produce of a farm? Edersheim, for instance, holds the former view, Lightfoot the latter. That the obligation is stated in the parable in kind—wheat and oil—and not in money—seems to bear against the simple debt theory. Edersheim sets down the remissions spoken of as authorized by the steward as amounting in money value to only about £5 and £25 respectively, and thinks they represented not a single but an annual payment (cf Kennedy, 1-vol HDB, and Fraser, DCG, art. "Bill").

(3) Still another question has arisen: Was the old "bond" simply altered, or was a new one substituted for it? Here again Lightfoot and Edersheim are in the controversy and on opposite sides. The alteration of the old bond is suggested though not demanded by the language here, and, moreover, would be, Edersheim thinks, in accordance with the probabilities of the case. Such bonds were usually written, not on vellum or papyrus, but on wax-covered tablets, and so could be easily erased or altered by the stylus with its flat, thick "eraser" (mōhēk).

(4) It is probably safe to conclude: (a) that the "bill" or "bond" had to be written and signed by the person assuming the obligation; (b) that it was the only formal or legal evidence of the debt incurred; and (c) that the supervision of the whole transaction belonged of right to "the steward." Should "the steward" conspire with the debtor against the master, the latter, it would appear, would have no check against the fraud.

BILL OF DIVORCEMENT, di-vōrs'ment. See DIVORCE IN OT.

BILLOW, bil'o (גַּל, gal, "a great rolling wave"): Figuratively, of trouble, "All thy waves and thy billows are gone over me" (Ps 42 7; cf Jon 2 3).

BILSHAN, bil'shan (בִּלְשָׁן, bilshān): An Israelite who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2=Neh 7 7). The name may be explained as "inquirer" (new Heb and Aram.), בִּלְשָׁן, bālshān, the ב (b) being an abbreviation of בֵּן, ben, as in בִּדְחָקָר, bidhkar, and בִּמְחָל, bimhāl. Bilshan would then be a compound of בֵּן, ben, and לָשׁוֹן, lāshōn. J. Halévy (Revue études juives, X, 3) translates the name "père de la langue," אֲבִי לָשׁוֹן, 'abh lāshōn. In 1 Esd 5 8, he is called "Beelsarus," which is akin to the form "Belshar"="Belshar-ušsur" or "O Bel, protect the king." Bilshan points to "Belsua," "his lord." The rabbis take Bilshan as a surname to the preceding Mordecai. H. J. WOLF BIMHAL, bim'hal (בִּמְחָל, bimhāl): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 33).

BIND, bind, BOUND (δέω, dēō): There are a number of Heb words used to express this word in its various meanings, 'ālam (Gen 37 7), 'āšar (42 24), kāšhar (Dt 6 8). It sometimes means "to attach," "to fasten" (Ex 28 28; Deut 14 25). It was used also with reference to an agreement in a judicial sense (Nu 30 2.3), or to make one a prisoner (Jgs 16 10; Ps 149 8). It means also "to control" (Job 38 31).

Figurative: In a fig. sense, to bind heavy and burdensome (extra) so-called religious duties on men (Mt 23 4). This fig. use of the word in Mt 16 19 and 18 18 has given special interest to it. Necessarily certain powers for administration must be conferred on this company of men to carry out the purpose of Christ. That this power was not conferred on Peter alone is evident from the fact that in Mt 18 18 it is conferred on all the apostles. The use of the word in the NT is to declare a thing to be binding or obligatory (Jn 20 23). In this sense this authority is used by some denominations in the service in preparation for the Lord's Supper, in which after the confession of sin by the people the ministers say, "I declare to you who have sincerely repented of your sins and believe on the Lord Jesus Christ the entire forgiveness of your sins." This statement is followed by the further declaration that if any have not so repented God will not forgive them, but will retain them and call them to account. The claim of the church of Rome that these statements of Our Lord confer on the priests and bishops, or primarily on the pope, the power to retain or forgive sins, is without historical validity and does violence to the Scriptures. See AUTHORITY; FORGIVENESS; PETER.

BINEA, bin'ē-a (בִּנְיָה, bin'āh): A name in the genealogy of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 37=9 43).

BINNUI, bin'ū-i (בִּנְוִי, binnūy, a proper name, "a building up"):

(1) A Levite, living in the time of Ezra (Ezr 8 33; Neh 10 9; 12 8).

(2) One of the b'nē Pahath-mō'ābh who had taken foreign wives (Ezr 10 30—Balthus of 1 Esd 9 31) and one of the b'nē Bānī (Ezr 10 38) who had also intermarried.

(3) The son of Henadad, who built part of the wall of Jerus (Neh 3 24), and sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 9). In all probability he is identical with "Bavvai, the son of Henadad" mentioned in 3 18. "Bavvai" is either a corruption of "Binnui," or is the name of the Levitical house of which Bavvai was the chief representative.

Binnui is mentioned in 10 9 as a leading Levite, and, besides, the names in these vs are obviously those of priests and Levites; so the former theory is probably correct.

(4) Head of a family who returned with Zerubabel (Neh 7 15; Ezr 2 10). H. J. WOLF

BIRD-CATCHER, būrd'kach-ēr. See FOWLER.

BIRDS, būrds (בִּרְדִּים, 'ayit; Gr variously τὰ πτερινά, tá peteirá [Mt 13 4], τὰ ὄρνεα τοῦ οὐρανοῦ, tá órnea toú ouranoú [Rev 19 17], ὄρνις, órnis [Mt 23 37; Lk 13 34]; Lat avis; OE "brid"):

I. Meaning of the Word.—All authorities agree that the exact origin of the word bird, as we apply it to feathered creatures, is unknown.

1. In Early The Heb 'ayit means to "tear and Hebrew scratch the face," and in its original form undoubtedly applied to birds of prey. It is probable that no spot of equal size on the face of the globe ever collected such numbers of vultures, eagles and hawks as ancient Pal. The land was so luxuriant that flocks and herds fed from the face of Nature. In cities, villages, and among tent-dwellers incessant slaughter went on for food, while the heavens must almost have been obscured by the ascending smoke from the burning of sacrificed animals and birds, required by law of every man and woman. From all these slain creatures the offal was thrown to the birds. There were no guns; the arrows of bowmen or "throw sticks" were the only protection against them, and these arms made no noise to frighten feathered creatures, and did small damage. So it easily can be seen that the birds would increase in large numbers and become so bold that men were often in actual conflict with them, and no doubt their faces and hands were torn and scratched.

Later, as birds of song and those useful for food came into their lives, the word was stretched to cover all feathered creatures. In the

2. In Later AV 'ayit is tr'd "fowl," and occurs Usage several times: "And when the fowls came down upon the carcases, Abram drove them away" (Gen 15 11). "They shall be left together unto the fowls of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth; and the fowls shall summer upon them, and all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them" (Isa 18 6). "There is a path which no fowl knoweth, and which the vulture's eye hath not seen" (Job 28 7). The ARV changes these and all other references to feathered creatures to "birds," making a long list. The Heb 'ayit in its final acceptance was used in Pal as "bird" is with us.

Our earliest known form of the word is the OE "brid," but they applied the term to the young of any creature. Later its meaning was

3. In Old narrowed to young produced from English eggs, and the form changed to "bird."

II. Natural History of Birds.—The first known traces of birds appear in the formation of the Triassic period, and are found in the shape of footprints on the red sandstone of the Connecticut valley.

This must have been an ancient sea bed over which stalked large birds, leaving deeply imprinted impressions of their feet. These im-

1. Earliest impressions baked in the sun, and were Traces and drifted full of fine wind-driven sand Specimens before the return of the tide. Thus were preserved to us the traces of 33 species of birds all of which are proven by their footprints to have been much larger than our birds of today. The largest impressions ever found measured 15 in. in length by 10 in width, and were set from 4 to 6 ft. apart. This evidence would form the basis for an estimate of a bird at least four times as large as an ostrich. That a bird of this size ever existed was not given credence until the finding of the remains of the dinornis in New Zealand. The largest specimen of this bird stood 10½ ft. in height. The first complete skeleton of a bird was found in the limestone of the Jurassic period in Solenhofen, Bavaria. This bird had 13 teeth above and 3 below, each set in a separate socket, wings ending in three-fingered claws much longer than the claws of the feet, and a tail of 20 vertebrae, as long as the body, having a row of long feathers down each side of it, the specimen close to the size of a crow. The first preserved likeness of a bird was found frescoed on the inside of a tomb of Maydoon, and is supposed to antedate the time of Moses 3,000 years. It is now carefully preserved in the museum of Cairo. The painting represents six geese, four of which can be recognized readily as the ancestors of two species known today. Scientists now admit that Moses was right in assigning the origin of birds to the water, as their structure is closer reptilian than mammalian, and they reproduce by eggs. To us it seems a long stretch between the reptile with a frame most nearly bird-like and a feathered creature, but there is a possibility that forms making closer connection yet will be found.

The trunk of a bird is compact and in almost all instances boat-shaped. Without doubt pre-

2. Struc- navigation and fashioned his vessel tural from the body of a water bird, and Formation then noticed that a soaring bird steered its course with its tail and so added the rudder. The structural formation of a bird is so arranged as to give powerful flight and perfect respiration. In the case of a few birds that do not fly, the wings are beaten to assist in attaining speed in running, as the ostrich, or to help in swimming under the water, as the auk. The skull of a young bird is made up of parts, as is that of man or animal; but with age these parts join so evenly that they appear in a seamless formation. The jaws extend beyond the face, forming a bill that varies in length and shape with species, and it is used in securing food, in defence, feather dressing, nest building—in fact it is a combination of the mouth and hand of man. The spine is practically immovable, because of the ribs attached to the upper half and the bony structure supporting the pelvic joints of the lower. In sharp contrast with this the neck is formed of from 10 to 23 vertebrae, and is so flexible that a bird can turn its head completely around, a thing impossible to man or beast. The breast bone is large, strong, and provided with a ridge in the middle, largest in birds of strong flight, smallest in swimmers, and lacking only in birds that do not fly, as the ostrich. The wings correspond to the arms of man, and are now used in flight and swimming only. Such skeletons as the Archeopteryx prove that the bones now combined in the tip of the wing were once claws. This shows that as birds spread over land and developed wing power in searching longer distances for food or when driven by varying conditions of climate, the wings were used more in flight, and the claws gradually joined in a tip and were given covering that grew feathers, while the bill became the instrument for taking food and for defence. At the same time the long tail proving an incumbrance, it gradually wore away and contracted to the present form. Studied in detail of bony structure, muscle, and complicated arrangement of feathers of differing sizes, the wing of a bird proves one of Nature's marvels. The legs are used in walking or swimming, the thigh joint being so enveloped in the body that the true leg is often mistaken for it. This makes the knee of a man correspond to the heel of a bird, and in young birds of prey especially, the shank or tarsus is used in walking, until the bones harden and the birds are enabled to bear their weight on the feet and straighten the shank. The toes vary with species. Pliny classified birds by them: "The first and principal difference and distinction in birds is taken from their feet; for they have either hooked talons, as Hawkes, or long round claws as Hens, or else they be broad, flat and whole-footed as Geese." Flight is only possible to a bird when both wings are so nearly full-feathered that it balances perfectly. In sleep almost every bird places its head under its wing and stands on one foot. The arrangement by which this is accomplished, without tiring the bird in the least, is little short of miraculous and can be the result only of slow ages of evolution. In the most finished degree this provision for the comfort of the bird is found among cranes and other long-legged water birds. The bone of one part of the leg fits into the bone of the part above, so that it is practically locked into place with no exertion on the part of the bird. At the same time the muscles that work the claws, cross the joints of the leg so that they are stretched by the weight of the bird, and with no effort, it stands on earth or perches on a branch. This explains the question so frequently asked as to why the feet of a perching bird do not become so cramped and tired that it falls.

Birds feed according to their nature, some on prey taken alive, some on the carrion of dead bodies, some on fish and vegetable products of the water, some on fruit seed, insects and worms of the land.

3. Birds' Food, Blood, etc. Almost every bird indulges in a combination of differing foods. Their blood is from 12° to 16° warmer than that of the rest of the animal kingdom, and they exhibit a corresponding exhilaration of spirits. Some indulge in hours of sailing and soaring, some in bubbling notes of song, while others dart near earth in playful dashes of flight. Birds are supposed to be rather deficient in the senses of taste and touch, and to have unusually keen vision. They reproduce by eggs that they deposit in a previously selected and prepared spot, and brood for a length of time varying with the species. The young of birds of prey, song birds, and some water birds, remain in the nests for differing lengths of time and are fed by the old birds; while others of the water birds and most of the game birds leave the nest as soon as the down is dry, and find food as they are taught by their elders, being sheltered at night so long as needful.

III. Birds of the Bible.—The birds of the Bible were the same species and form as exist in Pal today. Because of their wonderful coloring, powerful flight, joyous song, and their similarity to humanity in home-making and the business of raising their young, birds have been given much attention, and have held conspicuous place since the dawn of history. When the brain of man was young and more credulous than today he saw omens, signs and miracles in the characteristic acts of birds, and attributed to them various marvelous powers: some were considered of good omen and a blessing, and some were bad and a curse.

The historians of the Bible frequently used birds in comparison, simile, and metaphor. They are first mentioned in Gen 7 14, 15.

1. Earliest Mention "They, and every beast after its kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after its kind, and every bird after its kind, every bird of every sort." This is the enumeration of the feathered creatures taken into the ark to be preserved for the perpetuation of species after the flood abated. They are next found in the description of the sacrifice of Abram, where it was specified that he was to use, with the animals slaughtered, a turtle dove and a young pigeon, the birds not to be divided. It is also recorded that the birds of prey were attracted by the carcasses as described in Gen 15 9-11, "And he said unto him, Take me a heifer three years old, and a she-goat three years old, and a ram three years old, and a turtle-dove, and a young pigeon. And he took him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each half over against the other: but the birds divided he not. And the birds of prey came down upon the carcasses, and Abram drove them away." Pal abounded in several varieties of "doves" (q.v.) and their devotion to each other, and tender, gentle characteristics had marked them as a loved possession of the land; while the clay cotes of pigeons were reckoned in establishing an estimate of a man's wealth.

In an abandon of gratitude to God these people offered of their best-loved and most prized possessions as sacrifice; and so it is not surprising to find the history of burnt

2. Used in Sacrifice offerings frequently mentioning these birds which were loved and prized above all others. Their use is first commanded in Lev 1 14-17, "And if his oblation to Jeh be a burnt-offering of birds, then he shall offer his oblation of turtle-doves, or of young pigeons. And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and wring off its head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be drained out on the side of the altar; and he shall take away its crop with the filth thereof, and cast it beside the altar on the east part, in the place of the ashes." Again in Lev 5 7-10, we read: "And if his means suffice not for a lamb, then he shall bring his trespass-offering for that wherein he hath sinned, two turtle-doves, or two young pigeons, unto Jeh; one for a sin-offering, and the other for a burnt-offering." Throughout the Bible these birds figure in the history of sacrifice (Lev 12 8; 14 4-8; Nu 6 10, etc.).

The custom of weaving cages of willow wands, in which to confine birds for pets, seems to be referred to when Job asks (41 5),

3. Other References "Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? Or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?"

See Job 12 7:

"But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; And the birds of the heavens, and they shall tell thee."

David was thinking of the swift homeward flight of an eagle when he wrote:

"In Jehovah do I take refuge:
How say ye to my soul,
Flee as a bird to your mountain?" (Ps 11 1).

His early days guarding the flocks of his father no doubt suggested to him the statement found in Ps 50 11:

"I know all the birds of the mountains;
And the wild beasts of the field are mine"
(RVm "in my mind").

In describing Lebanon, the Psalmist wrote of its waters:

"By them the birds of the heavens have their habitation;
They sing among the branches" (104 12).

He mentioned its trees:

"Where the birds make their nests;
As for the stork, the fir-trees are her house" (104 17).

See also 78 27; 148 10.

The origin of the oft-quoted phrase, "A little bird told me," can be found in Eccl 10 20: "Reville not the king, no, not in thy thought; and revile not the rich in thy bedchamber: for a bird of the heavens shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter." In a poetical description of spring in the Song of Solomon, we read:

"The flowers appear on the earth;
The time of the singing of birds is come,
And the voice of the turtle-dove is heard in our land"
(Cant 2 12).

In his prophecy concerning Ethiopia, Isaiah wrote, "They shall be left together unto the ravenous birds of the mountains, and to the beasts of the earth; and the ravenous birds shall summer upon them, and all the beasts of the earth shall winter upon them" (Isa 18 6). In foretelling God's judgment upon Babylon, Isaiah (46 11) refers to Cyrus as "a ravenous bird [called] from the east, the man of my counsel from a far country"; "probably in allusion to the fact that the griffon was the emblem of Persia; and embroidered on its standard" (HDB, I, 632); (see EAGLE). Jer 4 25 describes the habit of birds, which invariably seek shelter before an approaching storm. In His denunciation of Israel, Jeh questions, in Jer 12 9, "Is my heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey? are the birds of prey against her round about?" When Jeremiah threatened the destruction of Jerus, he wrote that Jeh would "cause them to fall by the sword before their enemies, and by the hand of them that seek their life; and their dead bodies will I give to be food for the birds of the heavens" (19 7): that is, He would leave them for the carrion eaters. Ezekiel threatens the same fate to the inhabitants of Gog (39 4,17). Hosea (9 11) prophesies of Ephraim, "Their glory shall fly away like a bird." In the Sermon on the Mount, Jesus mentions the birds, as recorded by Mt 6 26: "Behold the birds of the heaven, that they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; and your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are not ye of much more value than they?" In the sermon from the boat where He spoke the parable of the Sower He again mentioned the birds: "As he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the birds came and devoured them" (13 4). Mark describes the same sermon in 4 4, and ver 32 of the same ch quotes the parable of the Mustard Seed: "Yet when it is sown, [it] groweth up, and becometh greater than all the herbs, and putteth out great branches; so that the birds of the heaven can lodge under the shadow thereof." In 8 5, Luke gives his version of the parable of the Sower, and in 13 19 of the Mustard Seed. See also Rev 19 17,21. These constitute all the important references to birds in the Bible, with the exception of a few that seem to belong properly under such subjects as TRAPS; NETS; CAGES, etc.

BIRDS OF ABOMINATION. See ABOMINATION, BIRDS OF.

BIRDS OF PREY, prā: They were undoubtedly the first birds noticed by the compilers of Bib. records. They were camp followers, swarmed over villages and perched on the walls of cities. They were offensive in manner and odor, and of a boldness unknown to us in birds. They flocked in untold numbers, there was small defence against them, and the largest and strongest not only carried away meat prepared for food and sacrifice, but also preyed upon the much-prized house pigeons, newly born of the smaller animals, and even at times attacked young children. See Gen 15 11, "And the birds of prey came down upon the carcasses, and Abram drove them away." Because they were attracted from above the clouds by anything suitable for food, people recognized that these were birds of unusual vision. When Job wanted to tell how perfectly the path to the gold mine was concealed, he wrote, "That path no bird of prey knoweth" (Job 28 7). The inference is, that, if it were so perfectly concealed that it escaped the piercing eyes of these birds, it was not probable that man would find it. These birds were so strong, fierce and impudent that everyone feared them, and when the prophets gave warning that people would be left for birds of prey to ravage, they fully understood what was meant, and they were afraid (Isa 18 6). In His complaint against His heritage, Jeh questions, "Is my heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey? are the birds of prey against her round about?" (Jer 12 9). And when he prophesied the destruction of Jerus, Jeremiah painted a dreadful picture, but one no doubt often seen in that land of pillage and warfare: "Their dead bodies will I give to be food for the birds of the heavens, and for the beasts of the earth" (19 7).

BIRDS, UNCLEAN, un-klēn': The lists of birds forbidden as food are given in Lev 11 13-19 and Dt 14 12-18. The names are almost identical, Dt containing one more than Lev and varying the order slightly. In Dt 14 13 the first name, hā-rā'āh, is almost certainly a corruption of hā-dā'āh, the first name in Lev 11 14. In ARV it is tr^d "kite" in Lev, while in Dt it is tr^d "glede." The additional one in Dt is hā-dayyāh, and is tr^d "kite." Doubtless the three words, hā-dā'āh, hā-'ayyāh and hā-dayyāh, are generic and refer to different birds of the kite or perhaps falcon family, so it is impossible to give specific meanings to them. There are twenty-one names in all, counting the extra one in Dt. The tr of many of these words is disputed. The ARV gives them as follows: eagle, gier eagle, ospray, kite, falcon, glede, every raven, ostrich, night-hawk, sea-mew, hawk, little owl, cormorant, great owl, horned owl, pelican, vulture, stork, heron, hoopoe and bat. It will be observed that all of them are either carrion-eaters, birds of prey, or water fowl. The names of those birds which may be eaten are not given, the principle of classification is that of elimination. No principle of separation is given as is the case with the animals. The reason for the prohibition doubtless lies in the unsanitary and repulsive nature of the flesh of these birds, the Divine command endorsing the instincts which were repelled by such food. For particulars, see separate arts. on each of these birds. See also ABOMINATION, BIRDS OF.

JAMES JOSIAH REEVE

BIRSHA, būr'sha (בִּרְשָׁה, birsha): King of Gomorrah (Gen 14 2), who joined the league against Chedorlaomer. The name is probably corrupt; some have tried to explain it as בִּרְשָׁה, beresha, "with wickedness," a name purposely used by the writer in referring to this king.

BIRTH, būrth (γένεσις, genesis):

(1) It was said by the angel beforehand of John the Baptist, "Many shall rejoice at his birth"; and when he was born Elisabeth said, "Thus hath the Lord done unto me . . . to take away my reproach among men" (Lk 1 14,25). Among the ancient Hebrews barrenness was a "reproach," and the birth of a child, of a son esp., an occasion for rejoicing.

(2) This, no doubt, was due in part to the Messianic hope inspired and sustained by prophecy (see Gen 3 15, where it was foretold that the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head; and subsequent prophecies too numerous to mention). Cases in point worth studying are found in Gen 4 1, where Eve rejoices over the birth of her firstborn and cries, "I have gotten a man with the help of Jeh"; and 1 S 1 20, where Hannah exults over her firstborn, calling his name "Samuel," "because," she says, "I have asked him of Jeh."

(3) The marvelous passage in Isa 7 14, "Behold, a virgin shall conceive, and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel," must have intensified the longing and hope of every devout Jewish maiden to be a mother, if mayhap, under God, she might be the mother of Messiah—Immanuel! (Cf Mt 1 22. 23; Lk 1 13 f.) See JESUS CHRIST; VIRGIN BIRTH.

BIRTH, VIRGIN. See VIRGIN BIRTH.

BIRTHDAY, bûrth'dā:

(1) The custom of observing birthdays of great men, esp. of kings, was widespread in ancient times (see Gen 40 20 f., "the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday," etc.; of 2 Macc 6 7; and Herod. ix.110; in the NT, Mt 14 6; Mk 6 21, "Herod on his birthday made a supper to his lords," etc., i.e. Herod Antipas). Here we see the ancient custom reflected in two conspicuous instances cents. apart: (a) Pharaoh, on his birthday "made a feast unto all his servants," etc., and (b) Herod on his birthday "made a supper to his lords, and the high captains," etc. The AV (Mt 14 6) has it "when Herod's birthday was kept," etc.

The correct text here (Tisch., HH) has a very peculiar construction, but without material difference of meaning. The locative case gives the time of the principal action, "danced on Herod's birthday, when it occurred." The construction is not unexampled (see Jeff, §699). This need not be called "a case absolute," though it corresponds to the Lat. ablative (locative) absolute; and the Gr. genitive absolute is itself not really "absolute," i.e. it is not cut loose from the rest of the construction, but gives some event to which the principal action is referred, for the indication of its circumstances.

(2) The term "birthday" (τὰ γενέσια, tá genésia) was applied also to the anniversary of a king's accession to the throne (Edersheim); but Wieseler's argument that such is the case here is not conclusive. It is easy to suppose that when Herod's birthday approached he was sojourning at the castle of Machaerus, accompanied by leading military and civil officials of his dominions (Mk 6 21). Petty ruler as he was, not properly "king" at all, he affected kingly ways (cf Est 5 3.6; 7 2).

(3) Genesia, which in Attic Gr means the commemoration of the dead, in later Gr is interchangeable with genéthlia—"birthday celebrations"; and there is no good reason why the rendering of the AV and RV here, "birthday," should not be right. (See Swete on Mk 6 21, and HDB, s.v.) For date of Christ's birth, etc, see JESUS CHRIST; CALENDAR, etc.

BIRTHRIGHT, bûrth'rit (בְּכֹרֶת, b'khôrâh, from b'khôr, "firstborn"; πρωτοτόκια, prōtotókia): Birthright is the right which naturally belonged to the firstborn son. Where there were more wives than one, the firstborn was the son who in point of time was born before the others, apparently whether his mother was a wife or a concubine. Sarah protests against Ishmael being heir along with Isaac, but it is possible that the bestowal of the rights of the firstborn on Isaac was not due to any law, but rather to the influence of a favorite wife (Gen 21 10). The birthright of the firstborn consisted in the first place of a double portion of what his father had to leave. This probably means that he had a double share of such property as could be divided. We have no certain knowledge of the manner in which property was inherited in the patriarchal age, but it seems probable that the lands and flocks which were the possession of the family as a whole, remained so after the death of the father. The firstborn became head of the family and thus succeeded to the charge of the family property, becoming responsible for the maintenance of the younger sons, the widow or widows, and the unmarried daughters. He also, as head, succeeded to a considerable amount of authority over the other members. Further, he generally received the blessing, which placed him in close and favored covenant-relationship with Jeh. According to the accounts which have come down to us, all these gifts and privileges could be diverted from the firstborn son. This could happen with his own consent, as in the case of Esau, who sold his birthright to Jacob (Gen 25 29-34), or by the decision of the father, as in the case of Reuben (Gen 48 22; 49 3.4; 1 Ch 5 1.2) and of Shimri (1 Ch 26 10). In the Deuteronomic version of the law, a provision is made, prohibiting the father from making the younger son the possessor of the birthright, just because his mother was specially beloved (Dt 21 15-17). The blessing also could be diverted from the eldest son. This was done when Jacob blessed the children of Joseph, and deliberately put the younger before the elder (Gen 48 13.14.17-19); even when the blessing was obtained by the younger son in a fraudulent manner, it could not be recalled (Gen 27). Jacob does not appear to have inherited any of the property of his father, although he had obtained both the birthright and the blessing.

In the NT "birthright," prototokia, is mentioned only once (He 12 16), where the reference is to Esau. In various passages where Our Lord is spoken of as the firstborn, as in Col 1 15-19; He 1 2, the association of ideas with the OT conception of birthright is easy to trace. See also FIRST-BORN; FAMILY; HEIR; INHERITANCE; LAW.

BIRTH-STOOL, bûrth'stôol: Found only in Ex 1 16, in connection with Heb women in Egypt when oppressed by Pharaoh. The Heb ('ôbhnayîm) here rendered "birth-stool" is used in Jer 18 3, and is there rendered "potter's wheel." The word is used in both places in the dual form, which points, no doubt, to the fact that the potter's wheel was composed of two discs, and suggests that the birth-stool was similarly double. See STOOL.

BIRZAITH, bûr-zā'ith, AV Birzavith, bûr-zā'vith (בִּרְצִית, birzāwîth or birzāyîth; Βηρζαίθ, Bē-zāith, or Βερζαίθ, Berzate): The name of a town in Asher founded by Malchiel (1 Ch 7 31). It probably corresponds to the modern Bir ez-Zait, "well of olive oil," near Tyre.

BISHLAM, bish'lam (בִּשְׁלָם, bishlām, "peaceful" [?]): One of three foreign colonists who wrote a letter of complaint against the Jews to Artaxerxes (Ezr 4 7=1 Esd 2 16). In 1 Esd the reading is "Bēlemus." "And in the days of Artaxerxes wrote Bishlam, Mithredath, Tabeel, and the rest of his companions, unto Artaxerxes, king of Persia," etc (Ezr 4 7). The LXX renders Bishlam en eirēnē, "in peace," as though it were a phrase rather than a proper name; this is clearly an error.

BISHOP, bish'up: The word is evidently an abbreviation of the Gr ἐπίσκοπος, episkopos; Lat episcopus.

GENERAL

The LXX gives it the generic meaning of "superintendency, oversight, searching" (Nu 4 16; 31 14) in matters pertaining to the church, the state, and the army (Jgs 9 28; the LXX 2 K 12 11; 2 Ch 34 12.17; 1 Macc and Classic 1 54; Wisd 1 6). Nor is it unknown to classical Gr. Thus Homer in the Iliad applied it to the gods (xxii.255), also Plutarch, Cam., 5. In Athens the governors of conquered states were called by this name.

The word is once applied to Christ himself, "unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (1 Pet 2 25). It abounds in Pauline lit.,

2. NT Use and is used as an alternative for presbúteros or elder (Tit 1 5.7; 1 Tim 3 1; 4 14; 5 17.19). The earliest ecclesiastical offices instituted in the church were those of elders and deacons, or rather the reverse, inasmuch as the latter office grew almost immediately out of the needs of the Christian community at Jerus (Acts 6 1-6). The presbyteral constitution of Jerus must have been very old (Acts 11 30) and was distinct from the apostolate (Acts 15 2.4.6.22. 23; 16 4). As early as 50 AD Paul appointed "elders" in every church, with prayer and fasting (Acts 14 23), referring to the Asiatic churches before established. But in writing to the Philipians (1 1) he speaks of "bishops" and "deacons." In the gentile Christian churches this title evidently had been adopted; and it is only in the Pastoral Epistles that we find the name "presbyters" applied. The name "presbyter" or "elder," familiar to the Jews, signifies their age and place in the church; while the other term "bishop" refers rather to their office. But both evidently have reference to the same persons. Their office is defined as "ruling" (Rom 12 8), "overseeing" (Acts 20 17.28; 1 Pet 5 2), caring for the flock of God (Acts 20 28). But the word archein, "to rule," in the hierarchical sense, is never used. Moreover each church had a college of presbyter-bishops (Acts 20 17.28; Phil 1 1; 1 Tim 4 14). During Paul's lifetime the church was evidently still unaware of the distinction between presbyters and bishops.

Of a formal ordination, in the later hierarchical sense, there is no trace as yet. The word "ordained" used in the AV (Acts 1 22) is an unwarrantable interpolation, rightly emended in the RV. Neither the word cheirotónēsantes (Acts 14 23, tr^d "appointed" ARV) nor katastēsēs (Tit 1 5, tr^d "appoint" ARV) is capable of this tr. In rendering these words invariably by "ordain," the AV shows a vitium originis. No one doubts that the idea of ordination is extremely old in the history of the church, but the laying on of hands, mentioned in the NT (Acts 13 3; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6; cf Acts 14 26; 15 40) points to the communication of a spiritual gift or to its invocation, rather than to the imparting of an official status.

According to Rome, as finally expressed by the Council of Trent, and to the episcopal idea in general, the hierarchical organization, which originated in the 3d cent., existed from the beginning in the NT church. But besides the NT as above quoted, the early testimony of the church maintains the identity of "presbyters" and "bishops." Thus Clement of Rome (Ep. 1, chs 42, 44, 57), the Did. ch 15; perhaps the Constitutions, II, 33, 34, in the use of the pl. form; Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., iii.2, 3), Ambrosiaster (on 1 Tim 3 10; Eph 4 11), Chrysostom (Hom 9 in Ep. ad Tim), in an unequivocal statement, the "presbyters of old were called bishops . . . and the bishops presbyters," equally unequivocally Jerome (Ad Tit. 1, 7), "the same is the presbyter, who is also the bishop." Augustine and other Fathers of the 4th and 5th cents. hold this view, and even Peter Lombard, who preceded Aquinas as the great teacher of the church of the Middle Ages. Hatch of Oxford and Harnack of Berlin, in the face of all this testimony, maintain a distinction between the presbyters, as having charge of the law and discipline of the church, and the bishops, as being charged with the pastoral care of the church, preaching and worship. This theory is built upon the argument of prevailing social conditions and institutions, as adopted and imitated by the church, rather than on sound textual proof. The distinction between presbyters and bishops can only be maintained by a forced exegesis of the Scriptures. The later and rapid growth of the hierarchical idea arose from the accession of the Ebionite Christian view of the church, as a necessary continuation of the OT dispensation, which has so largely influenced the history of the inner development of the church in the first six cents. of her existence.

HENRY E. DOSKER

ANGLICAN VIEW

I. Episcopacy Defined.—Episcopacy is the government in the Christian church by bishops. The rule of the Orthodox churches in the East, of the Roman Catholics, and of the Anglicans is that the consecration of other bishops, and the ordination of priests and deacons can only be by a bishop; and with them, a bishop is one who claims historic descent from apostolic or sub-apostolic times.

II. Offices in the Early Church.—In the NT, the office of bishop is not clearly defined. Indeed there appear to have been many degrees of ministry in the infant church: apostles, prophets, evangelists, teachers, presbyters or elders, bishops or overseers, and deacons.

Due allowance is not generally made for the mental attitude of the apostles and early Christians. They were looking for the speedy return of Christ, and consequently did not organize the church in its infancy, as it was afterward found necessary to do. For this reason, while the different persons who composed the body of Christian ministers did not overlap or infringe on each other's work, yet the relative rank or priority of each minister was not clearly defined.

The apostles were undoubtedly first, and in them rested the whole authority, and they were the depository of the power committed

1. Apostles unto them by Christ.

Next to the apostles in rank, and first in point of mention (Acts 11 27), came the prophets. So important were these officers in the early church that they were sent from Jerus to warn the rapidly growing church at Antioch of an impending famine. Then it appears that there were resident prophets at Antioch, men of considerable importance since their names are recorded, Barnabas, Symeon, Lucius, Manaen and Saul (Acts 13 1). These men received a command from the Holy Spirit to "separate me Barnabas and Saul," on whom they laid their hands and sent them forth on their work. The election is conducted on the same lines as the election by the eleven apostles of St. Matthias, and Barnabas and Paul are hereafter called apostles. It is an ordination to the highest order in the Christian ministry by "prophets and teachers." Whether "prophets and teachers" refers to two distinct ministries, or whether they are terms used for the same one is uncertain. It may be that of the five men mentioned, some were prophets, and others teachers.

In Acts 15 32 we have given us the names of two other prophets, Judas and Silas. St. Paul tells the Corinthians (1 Cor 12 28) that God hath set some in his church, first apostles, secondly prophets, thirdly teachers, and writing to the Ephesians he places the prophets in the same rank. "He gave some, apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; for the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry" (Eph 4 11.12 AV). And again, he says that the mystery of Christ is now "revealed unto his holy apostles and prophets in the Spirit" (Eph

3 5). The same apostle in that wonderful imagery of Christians being built up for a habitation of God, says they are "being built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner stone" (Eph 2 20).

In the case of the ordination of Timothy, which St. Paul says distinctly was by his own laying on of hands and that of the presbytery, it is of great consequence to note that St. Paul says to Timothy that his ordination was "according to the prophecies which went before on thee" (1 Tim 1 18 AV). From this it would appear that the prophets, as in the case of St. Paul himself, guided by the Holy Ghost, chose Timothy for the overseership or bishopric, or it may be, which is just as likely, that Timothy was set apart by the laying on of hands by some prophets, to the rank of elder or presbyter which did not carry with it the "overseership." It is at any rate evident that in the selection of Timothy St. Paul is insistent on pointing out that it was through the prophets (cf 1 Tim 1 18; 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6).

In Revelation, the term prophet constantly occurs as a term denoting rank equivalent to that of apostle: "ye saints, and ye apostles, and ye prophets" (Rev 18 20); "blood of prophets and of saints" (Rev 16 6; 18 24). The angel calls himself "thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets" (Rev 22 9 AV). The words prophecy and prophesying are used in a general sense, and it does not mean that they were in every case the formal utterances of prophets.

The ministry of the elders of the Christian church was modeled after that of the synagogue in which there were elders and teachers.

3. Elders or The Christian elders or presbyters were Presbyters most likely a council of advice in each local Christian ecclesia. They appear to act conjointly and not separately (Acts 15 4.6.22; 16 4; 20 17; Jas 5 14).

Teachers were the equivalent of those teachers or catechists of the synagogue before whom Our Lord was found in the temple. Evan-

4. Teachers gelists were persons who probably had the gift of oratory and whose function it was to preach the glad tidings. Philip was one of them (Acts 21 8). In the instructions to Timothy he is bidden to do the

5. Evangel- work of an evangelist, that is to say, ists to preach the gospel. This was to be part of his work in the ministry.

In writing to Timothy, St. Paul twice says that he himself was ordained preacher, and apostle and teacher. This does not mean that he held three grades of the ministry, but that his duties as an apostle were to preach and to teach. The fact that the apostles called themselves elders does not thereby confirm the view that the bishops mentioned by them were not superior to elders, any more than the fact that the apostles called themselves teachers, or preachers, makes for the view that teachers, or preachers, were the equals of apostles.

Bishops or overseers were probably certain elders chosen out of the body of local elders. Under the Jewish dispensation, the elders

6. Bishops stayed at home, that is, they did no ministerial visiting, but it was soon found necessary as the Christian church grew to have someone to attend to outside work to win over by persuasion and exposition of the Scriptures those inclined to embrace Christianity. This necessitated visiting families in their own homes. Then, it became necessary to shepherd the sheep. Someone had to oversee or superintend the general work. The Jewish elders always had a head and in a large synagogue the conditions laid down for its head, or legatus, were almost identical with those laid down by St. Paul to Timothy. He was to be a father of a family, not rich or engaged in business, possessing a good voice, apt to teach, etc.

The term episkopos was one with which the Hellenistic Jews and Gentiles were well acquainted; and it became thus a fitting term by which to designate the men called out of the body of elders to this special work of oversight. Then, again, the term episkopos was endeared to the early Christians as the one applied to Our Lord—"the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls" (1 Pet 2 25). The duties of elders, or presbyters, are not clearly defined in the NT.

In the Acts, the term is found only twice, once in reference to Judas, "his bishopric [or overseership] let another take" (Acts 1 20 AV), and in St. Paul's address to the elders of Ephesus, he warns them to feed the church over which they have been made overseers or bishops (Acts 20 28). It is impossible to say whether this "overseership" refers to all the elders addressed, or to such of those elders as had been made "overseers," or "bishops."

In the epistles, we find the church more clearly organized, and in these writings we find more definite allusions to bishops and their duties (Phil 1 1; 1 Tim 3 1.2; Tit 1 7; 1 Pet 2 25).

St. Paul tells Timothy, "If a man desire the office of a bishop [or overseer] he desireth a good work." "A bishop [or overseer] must be blameless" (1 Tim 3 1.2 AV). He tells Titus that "he is to ordain elders in every city" and that a "bishop must be blameless, as the steward of God" (Tit 1 5.7 AV).

On the other hand, there are numerous texts where elders and their duties are mentioned and where there is no reference whatever to bishopric or oversight. The epistles show that of necessity there had grown to be a more distinct organization of the ministry, and that following the custom of the synagogue to some of the elders had been committed a bishopric or oversight. At the same time the rank of a bishop, or overseer, was not yet one of the highest. St. Paul does not enumerate it in the order of ministry which he gives to the Ephesians—apostles, prophets, evangelists, pastors and teachers.

That Timothy had an oversight over the elders or presbyters is evident from the fact that St. Paul enjoins him to rebuke those that sin: "Against an elder receive not an accusation, except at the mouth of two or three witnesses. Them that sin reprove in the sight of all" (1 Tim 5 19.20). This, of course, refers to a formal trial by one in authority of persons inferior to him in rank.

It has been asserted that the terms elder and bishop in the NT were equivalent and denoted the same office or grade in the ministry. This assertion seems unwarranted. They do not naturally denote the same grade any more than do apostle and teacher, or angel and prophet.

The deacons were the seven appointed to take charge of the temporal affairs of the church. Their appointment was perhaps suggested

7. Deacons by the alms-collectors of the synagogue.

In the NT they do not appear as deacons to have had any part in the sacred ministry, except, in the case of Philip the evangelist, if it be assumed that he was a deacon, which is uncertain. Nowhere is it recorded that they laid hands on anyone, or were considered as capable of bestowing any grace. In the epistles they are mentioned with the bishops—"bishops and deacons" (Phil 1 1), thus showing the nature of their influence as the helpers of the "bishops" in the management of the growing funds, or properties of the church.

III. Episcopacy according to the NT.—The passages where the Gr word occurs which has been tr^d either as bishops, or overseers, are so few that they are enumerated: Acts 20 17, 28: the Ephesian elders are stated to be bishops [or overseers] to feed the church; Phil 1 1: the salutation of Paul and Timothy to bishops [or overseers] and deacons at Philippi; 1 Tim 3 1, 2 and Tit 1 7 give the exhortation to Timothy and Titus as holding the office of a bishop; 1 Pet 2 25, where the apostle referring to Christ says, "unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls."

IV. The "Didache."—Passing out of the NT, we come to the early Christian writing, the so-called Teaching of the Twelve Apostles. Setting aside the question for what class of Christians this document was intended, the clear fact stands out that at the date of its writing the two highest grades in the Christian ministry were still called apostles and prophets. Various dates have been assigned to this document ranging from 80 to 160 AD.

At the end of ch 10, which deals with the thanksgiving or eucharist, the remark is made, "But permit the prophets to make thanksgiving as much as they desire." Chs 11 and 13 deal with apostles and prophets. They were to be treated "according to the ordinance of the gospel." An apostle was not to be allowed to stay more than a couple of days at the utmost, and in no case was he to receive any money, else he was to be considered "a false prophet." A prophet could beg on behalf of others, but not for himself; but a prophet could settle among a congregation, and in that case he was to receive the same first-fruits "of money and raiment and of every possession" as the chief priest did under the old dispensation. It is to be noted that in reality the prophets, though placed second in order, were to be treated with the greater respect. If the prophet settles down, he becomes the man of the first rank in that Christian community.

Ch 15 deals with bishops and deacons, and we are told that if appointed they rendered the ministry of prophets and teachers, but the warning is given, "Despise them not, therefore, for they are your honoured ones, together with the prophets and teachers." This shows that bishops were localized; and that while they could be appointed over a community, they were not considered as of equal rank with the prophets.

V. Clement of Rome.—Clement of Rome in his Epistle to the Corinthians says that the apostles preaching through countries and cities appointed the first-fruits of their labors to be bishops and deacons (ch 42). It is usually said that Clement meant elders by the term "bishops," but it is much more likely that he meant what he said; that according to the tradition received by him, the apostles appointed bishops, that is, appointed bishops out of the elders—mentioned in the Acts. In ch 44 Clement warns against the sin of ejecting from the episcopate those who have presented the offerings, and says, "Blessed are those presbyters who have finished their course."

The reason why the terms apostles and prophets fell into desuetude was, as regards the first, not so much out of respect to the original apostles, but because the apostles in the sub-apostolic age became apparently only wandering evangelists of little standing; while the prophets lowered their great office by descending to be soothsayers, as the Shepherd of Hermas plainly intimates. With the fall of the apostles and the prophets, there rose into prominence the bishops and deacons.

VI. Bishops and Deacons.—The deacons acted as secretaries and treasurers to the bishops. They were their right-hand men, representing them in all secular matters. As the numbers of Christians increased, it was found absolutely necessary for the bishops to delegate some of their spiritual authority to a second order.

VII. Bishops and Presbyters (Priests).—Thus very slowly emerged out of the body of elders the official presbyters or priests. To them the bishop delegated the power to teach, to preach, to baptize, to celebrate the Holy Eucharist; but how slowly is evidenced by the fact that so late as 755 AD the Council of Vern forbade priests to baptize, except by distinct permission of their bishop.

VIII. Ignatian Epistles on the Three Orders.—When we come to the Ignatian epistles written between 110–17 AD, we find a distinct threefold order. We have given us the names of Damas, for bishop, Bassus and Apollonius for presbyters, Zotion for deacon. Throughout these epistles there is no question that the bishop is supreme. Apostles and prophets are not even mentioned. The bishop succeeds to all the powers the apostles and prophets had. On the other hand, as with the Jewish elders, so with the Christian presbyters, they form a council with the bishop. Here we see in clear day what we had all along suspected to be the case in apostolic times: a council of presbyters with a ruler at their head and deacons to attend to money matters.

It is quite immaterial as to whether a bishop had ten or a hundred presbyter-elders under him, whether he was bishop in a small town or in a large city. The question of numbers under him would not affect his authority as has been claimed. The greatness of the city in which he exercised this rule would add dignity to his position, but nothing to his inherent authority.

From this time on it is admitted by all that bishops, priests and deacons have been continuously in existence. Their powers and duties have varied, have been curtailed as one order has encroached on the power of the other, but still there the three orders have been. Gradually the presbyters or priests encroached on the power of the bishop, till now, according to Anglican usage, only the power of ordaining, confirming and consecrating churches is left to them.

IX. Views of Reformers.—At the time of the Reformation there was a great outcry against bishops. This was caused by the fact that under feudalism the bishops had come to be great temporal lords immersed in schemes of political and material aggrandizement, and often actually leading their armies in times of war. Many of the bishops were proud and arrogant, forgetful that their duties as fathers of the children of Christ were to look after those committed to them with fatherly kindness and charity or that as pastors they had to tend the erring sheep with Divine patience and infinite love.

The bulk of the adherents to the Reformed religion, looking upon the bishops as they were and as their fathers had known them, recoiled from retaining the office, although their principal men, like Calvin, deplored the loss of bishops, and hoped that bishops of the primitive order would some day be restored. The present modern Anglican bishop seems to sum up in his person and office the requirements laid down by Calvin.

Thus the claim put forth by the Anglicans in the preface to the Ordinal may be considered as sound: "It is evident unto all men, Conclusion diligently reading Holy Scripture and ancient Authors, that from the Apostles' time there have been these Orders of Ministers in Christ's Church—Bishops, Priests, and Deacons."

CONGREGATIONAL VIEW

As a spiritual and social democracy, Congregationalism finds no warrant or precedent in the NT for the episcopal conception of the Church. The NT words "bishop," "presbyter," and "elder." It interprets ἐπίσκοπος, episkopos, lit. as overseer—not an ecclesiastical dignitary but a spiritual minister. It finds the Romanist view of Peter's primacy, founded alone on Mt 16 18, contradicted by the entire trend of Christ's teaching, as e.g. when referring to the Gentiles exercising lordship and authority Christ says, "Not so shall it be among you" (Mt 20 26ff). He set the precedent of official greatness when He said "the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister," and that "whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister [servant]." Paul's testimony confirms this in suggesting no primacy among the apostles and prophets, but making "Christ . . . himself . . . the chief corner stone" (Eph 2 20). The organization and history of the early Christian church establish this view of its simplicity and democracy. In Acts 1 20 the RV corrects the rendering "bishopric" (given by the King James translators, who were officers in the Episcopal church) to "office," thus relieving the verse of possible ecclesiastical pretensions.

The church formed on the day of Pentecost was the spontaneous coming together of the original 120 disciples and the 3,000 Christian converts, for fellowship, worship and work, under the inspiration and guidance of the Holy Spirit. Its only creed was belief in the risen Christ and the renewing power of the Holy Spirit; its only condition of membership, repentance and baptism.

The apostles naturally took leadership but, abrogating all authority, committed to the church as a whole the choice of its officers

2. Election of Officers by Popular Vote and the conduct of its temporal and spiritual affairs. Judas' place in the apostolate was not filled by succession or episcopal appointment (Acts 1 23-26). The seven deacons were elected by popular vote (Acts 6 1-6). One of the seven—Philip—preached and, without protest, administered the rite of baptism (Acts 8 12,13).

The churches in the apostolic era were independent and self-governing, and the absence of anything like a centralized ecclesiastical authority is seen by the fact that the council at Jerus, called to consider whether the church at Antioch should receive the uncircumcised into membership, was a delegated body, composed in part of lay members, and having only advisory power (Acts 15 1-29).

The apostolic letters, forming so large a part of the NT, are not official documents but letters of loving pastoral instruction and counsel.

3. The Epistles not Official Documents The terms bishops, elders, pastors and teachers are used synonymously and interchangeably, thus limiting the officers of the early church to two orders: pastors and deacons. See also CHURCH GOVERNMENT; DIDACHE.

Under the spiritual tyrannies of the Church of England, during the reigns of Henry VIII, Edward VI, "bloody" Mary and Queen Elizabeth, the Dissenting bodies, chiefly the Congregationalists, returned to the simplicity and spiritual freedom of the primitive church. The issue

4. Restoration of Primitive Ideals was forced by two arbitrary acts of Parliament under Elizabeth: the Act of Supremacy and the Act of Uniformity. Emancipation from the intellectual and religious tyranny of these acts was won at the cost of many martyrdoms. These struggles and persecutions wrought into the successors of Robert Browne, the father of modern Congregationalism, a deep-seated and permanent resentment against all forms of autocratic power in church and state. They challenged, at the cost of life, both the Divine Right of kings, and of bishops. They believed that in Christ Jesus all believers are literally and inalienably made "kings and priests unto God" (Rev 1 6 AV), actual spiritual sovereigns, independent of all human dictation and control in matters of belief and worship. The Pilgrims expatriated themselves to secure this spiritual liberty; and to their inherent antagonism to inherited and self-perpetuated power, whether civil or ecclesiastical, must be credited the religious freedom and civil democracy of America.

BIT AND BRIDLE, brī'd'l (מֵתֶגֶח וְרֶשֶׁן, methegh wā-reṣen): The two words occur in conjunction (Ps 32 9 AV, "Be ye not as the horse, or as the mule, which have no understanding; whose mouth must be held in with bit and bridle, lest they come near unto thee"; RV "else they will not come near unto thee," m, "that they come not near." Methegh, tr^d "bit" above, is properly a bridle, or halter in which the bit was a loop passed round the under jaw of the animal; reṣen has a similar meaning. The counsel in the ver is that men should render a willing obedience to God and not be like the animals that man has to bridle and curb in order to get them to do his will. Cf Jas 3 3, where we have "bit" as tr of chalínós, "a bit" or "curb," "We put bits [RV "bridles"] in the horses' mouths that they may obey us." "Bridle" occurs separately as tr of methegh (2 S 8 1), "David took Methegh-ammah," AVm "the bridle of Ammah," RV "the bridle of the mother city," m, as AV; the meaning may be that he took the control or dominion of it; "I will put . . . my bridle in thy lips" (2 K 19 28; Isa 37 29); "a bridle for the ass" (Prov 26 3); of rezen (Job 30 11), "They have also let loose the bridle before me," RV "and they have cast off the bridle before me" (acted in an unbridled [unrestrained] manner); 41 13, said of "leviathan" (RV "the hippopotamus"), "Who can come to him with his double bridle?" ARV "within his jaws?" ERV "within his double bridle," others, "into the double row of his teeth"; Isa 30 28, "a bridle in the jaws of the people causing them to err," RV "a bridle that causeth to err"; of maḥšōm, which means "a muzzle" (Ps 39 1), "I will keep my mouth with a bridle," AVm "Heb, a bridle, or muzzle for my mouth"; so RVm.

To "bridle" occurs (Jas 1 26, "bridleth not his tongue"; 3 2 "able to bridle the whole body"; chalínagōgēō, "to lead" or "guide with a bit"). In 1 Esd 3 6, and 2 Macc 10 29, we have "bridles of gold" (chruochalínós). W. L. WALKER

BITHIAH, bi-thi'a (בִּיתְיָה, bithyāh; Βεθιά, Beth-thiā; B, Γελιά, Geliā, "daughter of Jeh"): The daughter of a Pharaoh who married Mered, a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 18). Whether this Pharaoh was an Egypt king, or whether it was in this case a Heb name, it is difficult to say. The name Bithiah seems to designate one who had become converted to the worship of Jeh, and this would favor the first supposition. If, as the RV reads, the other wife of Mered is distinguished as "the Jewess" (instead of AV "Jehudijah"), this supposition would receive further support.

BITHRON, bith'ron (בֵּיתְרוֹן, ha-bithrōn; ὅλην τὴν παρατείνονσαν, hōlēn tēn parateínousan, lit. "the entire [land] extending"; 2 S 2 29, "the Bithron," i.e. the gorge or groove): Does not seem to be a proper name; rather it indicates the gorge by which Abner approached Mahanaim. Buhl (GAP, 121) favors identification with Wādī 'Ajlūn, along which in later times a Rom road connected 'Ajlūn and Mahanaim. Others (Guthe, Kurz. bib. Wörterbuch, s.v.) incline to Wādī esh Sha'ib.

BITHYNIA, bi-thin'i-a (Βιθυνία, Bithunía): A coast province in northwestern Asia Minor on the Propontis and the Euxine. Its narrowest compass included the districts on both sides of the Sangarius, its one large river, but in prosperous times its boundaries reached from the Rhyndacus on the west to and beyond the Parthenius on the east. The Mysian Olympus rose in grandeur to a height of 6,400 ft. in the southwest, and in general the face of Nature was wrinkled with rugged mountains and seamed with fertile valleys sloping toward the Black Sea.

Hittites may have occupied Bithynia in the remote past, for Priam of Troy found some of his stoutest enemies among the Amazons on the upper Sangarius in Phrygia, and these may have been Hittite, and may easily have settled along the river to its mouth. The earliest discernible Bithynians, however, were Thracian immigrants from the European side of the Hellespont. The country was overcome by Croesus, and passed with Lydia under Pers control, 546 BC. After Alexander the Great, Bithynia became independent, and Nicomedes I, Prusias I and II, and Nicomedes II and III, ruled from 278 to 74 BC. The last king, weary of the incessant strife among the peoples of Asia Minor, especially as provoked by the aggressive Mithridates, bequeathed his country to Rome. Nicomedia and Prusa, or Brousa, were founded by kings whose names they bear; the other chief cities, Nicaea and Chalcedon, had been built by Gr enterprise earlier. There were highways leading from Nicomedia and Nicaea to Dorylaeum and to Angora (see Ramsay, Historical Geography of Asia Minor, and The Church in the Rom Empire before A.D. 170). Under Rome the Black Sea littoral as far as Amisus was more or less closely joined with Bithynia in administration.

Ships Drawn up on Coast of Black Sea.

Paul and Silas essayed to go into Bithynia, but the Spirit suffered them not (Acts 16 7). Other evangelists, however, must have labored there early and with marked success. Bithynia is one of the provinces addressed in 1 Pet 1 1.

Internal difficulties and disorders led to the sending of Pliny, the lawyer and literary man, as governor, 111 to 113 AD. He found Christians under his jurisdiction in such numbers that the heathen temples were almost deserted, and the trade in sacrificial animals languished. A memorable correspondence followed between the Rom governor and the emperor Trajan, in which the moral character of the Christians was completely vindicated, and the repressive measures required of officials were interpreted with leniency (see E. G. Hardy, Pliny's Correspondence with Trajan, and Christianity and the Rom Government). Under this Rom policy Christianity was confirmed in strength and in public position. Subsequently the first Ecumenical Council of the church was held in Nicaea, and two later councils convened in Chalcedon, a suburb of what is now Constantinople. The emperor Diocletian had fixed his residence and the seat of government for the eastern Roman Empire in Nicomedia.

Bithynia was for a thousand years part of the Byzantine Empire, and shared the fortunes and misfortunes of that state. On the advent of the Turks its territory was quickly overrun, and Orchan, sultan in 1326, selected Brousa as his capital, since which time this has been one of the chief Ottoman cities. G. E. WHITE

BITTER, bit'ér, BITTERNESS, bit'ér-nes (מָר, mar, or מָרָה, mārāh="bitter" [lit. or fig.]; also [noun] "bitterness" or [adv.] "bitterly". "angry," "chafed," "discontented," "heavy" [Gen 27 34; Ex 15 23; Nu 5 18.19.23.24.27; Est 4 1; Job 3 20; Ps 64 3; Prov 5 4; 27 7; Eccl 7 26; Isa 5 20; Jer 2 19; 4 18; Ezk 27 31; Am 8 10; Hab 1 6]; the derivatives מָרַר, mārār, and מָרָה, mārāh, used with the same significance according to the context, are found in Ex 1 14; 12 8; Nu 9 11; Job 13 26; Isa 24 9. The derivatives mārī and mārīrī occur in Dt 32 24; Job 23 2m; and מָרָרָר, tamrūr, is found in Jer 6 26; 31 15. In the NT the verb πικραίνω, pikraínō="to embitter"; the adj. πικρός, pikrós

= "bitter," and the noun πικρία, pikria, "bitterness," supply the same ideas in Col 3 19; Jas 3 11,14; Rev 8 11; 10 9,10: It will be noted that the word is employed with three principal spheres of application: (1) the physical sense of taste; (2) a fig. meaning in the objective sense of cruel, biting words; intense misery resulting from forsaking God, from a life of sin and impurity; the misery of servitude; the misfortunes of bereavement; (3) more subjectively, bitter and bitterness describe emotions of sympathy; the sorrow of childlessness and of penitence, of disappointment; the feeling of misery and wretchedness, giving rise to the expression "bitter tears"; (4) the ethical sense, characterizing untruth and immorality as the bitter thing in opposition to the sweetness of truth and the gospel; (5) Nu 5 18 RV speaks of "the water of bitterness that causeth the curse." Here it is employed as a technical term.

BITTER HERBS, hûrbs, or ûrbs (מֵרִירִים, m'rîrîm): Originally in the primitive Passover (Ex 12 8; Nu 9 11) these were probably merely salads, the simplest and quickest prepared form of vegetable accompaniment to the roasted lamb. Such salads have always been favorites in the Orient. Cucumbers, lettuce, water-cress, parsley and endive are some of those commonly used. Later on the Passover ritual (as it does today) laid emphasis on the idea of "bitterness" as symbolical of Israel's lot in Egypt. In modern Pal the Jews use chiefly lettuce and endive for the "bitter herbs" of their Passover. In Lam 3 15 the same word is used: "He hath filled me with bitterness [m'rîrîm], he hath sated me with wormwood." Here the parallelism with "wormwood" suggests some plant more distinctly bitter than the mild salads mentioned above, such, for example, as the colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis) or the violently irritating squirting cucumber (Ecballium elaterium).

BITTERN, bit'érn (בִּירְדָּן, kippôdh; Lat Botaurus stellaris; Gr ἐχίνος, echínos): A nocturnal member of the heron family, frequenting swamps and marshy places. Its Heb name means a creature of waste and desert places. The bittern is the most individual branch of the heron (ardeidae) family on account of being partially a bird of night. There are observable differences from the heron in proportion, and it differs widely in coloration. It is one of the birds of most ancient history, and as far back as records extend is known to have inhabited Europe, Asia, Africa, Australia and America. The African bird that Bible historians were familiar with was 2½ ft. in length. It had a 4-in. bill, bright eyes and plumage of buff and chestnut, mottled with black. It lived around swamps and marshes, hunting mostly at night, and its food was much the same as that of all members of the heron family, frogs being its staple article of diet. Its meat has not the fishy taste of most members of the heron family, and in former times was considered a great delicacy of food. In the days of falconry it was protected in England because of the sport afforded in hunting it. Aristotle mentions that previous to his time the bittern was called ôlenos, which name indicates "an idle disposition." It was probably bestowed by people who found the bird hiding in swamps during the daytime, and saw that it would almost allow itself to be stepped upon before it would fly. They did not understand that it fed and mated at night. Pliny wrote of it as a bird that "bellowed like oxen," for which reason it was called Taurus. Other mediaeval writers called it botaurus, from which our term bittern is derived. There seems to be much confusion as to the early form of the name; but all authorities agree that it was bestowed on the bird on account of its voice. Turner states that in 1544 the British called it "miredromble," and "botley bump," from its voice. Rolland says the French called it Bœuf d'eau. In later days "bog-bull," "stake-driver" and "thunder-pumper" have attached themselves to it as terms fitly descriptive of its voice. Nuttall says its cry is "like the interrupted bellowing of a bull, but hollower and louder, and is heard at a mile's distance, as if issuing from some formidable being that resided at the bottom of the waters." Tristram says, "Its strange booming note, disturbing the stillness of night, gives an idea of desolation which nothing but the wail of a hyena can equal." Thoreau thought its voice like the stroke of an ax on the head of a deeply driven stake. In ancient times it was believed the bird thrust its sharp beak into a reed to produce this sound. Later it was supposed to be made by pushing the bill into muck and water while it cried. Now the membrane by which the sound is produced has been located in the lungs of the bird. In all time it has been the voice that attracted attention to the bittern, and it was solely upon the ground of its vocal attainments that it entered the Bible. There are three references, all of which originated in its cry. Isaiah in prophesying the destruction of Babylon (14 23 AV) wrote: "I will also make it a possession for the bittern, and pools of water"; in other words he would make of it a desolate and lonely swamp. Again in 34 11 AV, in pronouncing judgment against Idumaea, he wrote, "But the cormorant and the bittern shall possess it." In the RV, "cormorant" and "bittern" are changed to "pelican" and "porcupine." The change from the cormorant to pelican makes less difference, as both are water birds, and the Heb shālākh, which means "a plunging bird," would apply equally to either of them. If they were used to bear out the idea that they would fill the ruins with terrifying sound, then it is well to remember that the cormorant had something of a voice, while the pelican is notoriously the most silent of birds.

The change from bittern to porcupine is one with which no ornithologist would agree. About 620 BC, the prophet Zephaniah (2 14) clearly indicates this bird: "And herds shall lie down in the midst of her, all the beasts of the nations: both the pelican and the porcupine shall lodge in the capitals thereof; their voice shall sing in the windows; desolation shall be in the thresholds: for he hath laid bare the cedar work." This should forever settle the question raised by some modern commentators as to whether a bird or beast is intended by the word kippōdh. In some instances it seems to have been confounded with kunfudh, the hedgehog or porcupine. No natural historian ever would agree to this, because these animals are not at home in the conditions that were known to exist here. Even granting that Nineveh was to be made dry, it must be remembered that the marshes of the Tigris lay very close, and the bird is of night, with a voice easily carrying over a mile. Also it was to "sing" and to "lodge" on the "upper lintels" which were the top timbers of the doors and windows. These formed just the location a bittern would probably perch upon when it left its marshy home and went booming through the night in search of a mate. It was without doubt the love song of the bittern that Isaiah and Zephaniah used in completing prophecies of desolation and horror, because with the exception of mating time it is a very quiet bird. For these reasons the change from bittern to porcupine in the RV, of the paragraph quoted, is a great mistake, as is also that of cormorant to pelican.

"their villages"; AV Bizjothjah, biz-joth'ja, "place of Jah's olives" [Young], or "contempt of Jah" [Strong]): According to MT, a town in the south of Judah, near Beersheba (Josh 15 28). LXX reads "and her daughters," only one consonant of MT being read differently; and so We, Hollenberg, Di et al. The LXX has probably preserved the original text (cf Neh 11 27).

BIZTHA, biz'tha (LXX Μαζάν, Mazán; also Bazán and Bazéd): One of the seven eunuchs or chamberlains of King Ahasuerus (Xerxes). It is possible that the name is derived from the Pers besteh, "bound," hence "eunuch" (Est 1 10).

BLACK. See COLORS.

BLACKNESS (בְּחֹרֶרֶת, kimrūrīm, "obscurations"; קְדָרִית, kadhrūth, "darkness"; γνόφος, gnóphos, "darkness," ζόφος, zóphos, "blackness"): Terms rarely used but of special significance in picturing the fearful gloom and blackness of moral darkness and calamity. Job, cursing the day of his birth, wishes that it, dies ater ("dead black day"), might be swallowed up in darkness (Job 3 5). Because of Israel's spiritual infidelity Jeh clothes the heavens with the blackness of sackcloth (Isa 50 3), the figure being that of the inky blackness of ominous, terrifying thunder clouds. The fearful judgment against sin under the old dispensation is illustrated by the appalling blackness that enveloped smoking, burning, quaking Sinai at the giving of the law (He 12 18; cf Ex 19 16-19; 20 18). The horror of darkness culminates in the impenetrable blackness of the under-world, the eternal abode of fallen angels and riotously immoral and ungodly men (Jude ver 13; see also ver 6 and 2 Pet 2 4.17). Human language is here too feeble to picture the moral gloom and rayless night of the lost: "Pits [AV "chains"] of darkness" (cf the ninth plague of Egypt, "darkness which may be felt" [Ex 10 21]). Wicked men are "wandering stars," comets that disappear in "blackness of darkness . . . reserved for ever." In art this fig. language has found majestic and awe-inspiring expression in Doré's illustrations of Dante's Purgatory and Milton's Paradise Lost.

BLAINS, blānz (אֲבִיבָהּ, 'ābhā'bu'āh: only in Ex 9 9.10): Pustules containing fluid around a boil or inflamed sore. It is an OE word "bleyen," used sometimes as a synonym for boil. Wyclif (1382) uses the expression "stinkende bleyne" for Job's sores. The Heb word is from a root which means that which bubbles up. See BOIL.

BLASPHEMY, blas'fē-mi (βλασφημία, blasphēmīa): In classical Gr meant primarily "defamation" or "evil-speaking" in general; "a word of evil omen," hence "impious, and irreverent speech against God."

(1) In the OT as subst. and vb.: (a) (בָּרַךְ, bārakh) "Naboth did blaspheme God and the king" (1 K 21 10.13 AV); (b) (גָּדַף, gādaph) of Sennacherib defying Jeh (2 K 19 6.22=Isa 37 6.23; also Ps 44 16; Ezk 20 27; cf Nu 15 30), "But the soul that doeth aught with a high hand [i.e. knowingly and defiantly], . . . the same blasphemeth [so RV, but AV "reproacheth"] Jehovah; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people." Blasphemy is always in word or deed, injury, dishonour and defiance offered to God, and its penalty is death by stoning; (c) (הָרַף, hārāph) of idolatry as blasphemy against Jeh (Isa 65 7); (d) (נָקַב, nāqabh) "And he that blasphemeth the name of Jeh, he shall surely be put to death" (Lev 24 11.16); (e) (נָאָץ, nā'āץ) David's sin is an occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme (2 S 12 14; also Ps 74 10.18; Isa 52 5; cf Ezk 35 12; 2 K 19 3 AV; Isa 37 3).

(2) In the NT blasphemy, subst. and vb., may be (a) of evil-speaking generally (Acts 13 45; 18 6). The Jews contradicted Paul "and blasphemed," RVm "railed." (So in AV of Mt 15 19=Mk 7 22; Col 3 8, but in RV "railings"; Rev 2 9 RVm "reviling"; so perhaps in 1 Tim 1 20; or Hymenaeus and Alexander may have blasphemed Christ by professing faith and living unworthily of it.) (b) Speaking against a heathen goddess: the town clerk of Ephesus repels the charge that Paul and his companions were blasphemers of Diana (Acts 19 37). (c) Against God: (α) uttering impious words (Rev 13 1.5.6; 16 9.11.21; 17 3); (β) unworthy conduct of Jews (Rom 2 24) and Christians (1 Tim 6 1; Tit 2 5, and perhaps 1 Tim 1 20); (γ) of Jesus Christ, alleged to be usurping the authority of God (Mt 9 3=Mk 2 7=Lk 5 21), claiming to be the Messiah, the son of God (Mt 26 65=Mk 14 64), or making Himself God (Jn 10 33.36). (d) Against Jesus Christ: Saul strove to make the Christians he persecuted blaspheme their Lord (Acts 26 11). So was he himself a blasphemer (1 Tim 1 13; cf Jas 2 7).

(3) Blasphemy against the Holy Spirit: "Every sin and blasphemy shall be forgiven unto men; but the blasphemy against the Spirit shall not be forgiven. And whosoever shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven him; but whosoever shall speak against the Holy Spirit, it shall not be forgiven him, neither in pardonable

Sin

this world, nor in that which is to come" (Mt 12 31.32=Mk 3 28.29; Lk 12 10). As in the OT "to sin with a high hand" and to blaspheme the name of God incurred the death penalty, so the blasphemy against the Holy Spirit remains the one unpardonable sin. These passages at least imply beyond cavil the personality of the Holy Spirit, for sin and blasphemy can only be committed against persons. In Mt and Mk a particular case of this blasphemy is the allegation of the Pharisees that Jesus Christ casts out devils by Beelzebub. The general idea is that to attribute to an evil source acts which are clearly those of the Holy Spirit, to call good evil, is blasphemy against the Spirit, and sin that will not be pardoned. "A distinction is made between Christ's other acts and those which manifestly reveal the Holy Spirit in Him, and between slander directed against Him personally as He appears in His ordinary acts, and that which is aimed at those acts in which the Spirit is manifest" (Gould, Mark ad loc.). Luke does not refer to any particular instance, and seems to connect it with the denial of Christ, although he, too, gives the saying that "who shall speak a word against the Son of man, it shall be forgiven." But which of Christ's acts are not acts of the Holy Spirit, and how therefore is a word spoken against Him not also blasphemy against the Holy Spirit? John identifies the Holy Spirit with the exalted Christ (Jn 14 16-18.26.28). The solution generally offered of this most difficult problem is concisely put by Plummer (Luke ad loc.): "Constant and consummate opposition to the influence of the Holy Spirit, because of a deliberate preference of darkness to light, render repentance and therefore forgiveness morally impossible." A similar idea is taught in He 6 4-6, and 1 Jn 5 16: "A sin unto death." But the natural meaning of Christ's words implies an inability or unwillingness to forgive on the Divine side rather than inability to repent in man. Anyhow the abandonment of man to eternal condemnation involves the inability and defeat of God. The only alternative seems to be to call the kenotic theory into service, and to put this idea among the human limitations which Christ assumed when He became flesh. It is less difficult to ascribe a limit to Jesus Christ's knowledge than to God's saving grace (Mk 13 32; cf Jn 16 12.13). It is also noteworthy that in other respects, at least, Christ acquiesced in the view of the Holy Spirit which He found among His contemporaries. See HOLY SPIRIT.

BLAST (נִשְׁמָאֵה, nəshāmāh, רִיחַ, rūḥ):

(1) The blowing of the breath of Jeh, expressive of the manifestation of God's power in Nature and Providence. "With the blast of thy nostrils the waters were piled up" (Ex 15 8), referring to the east wind (14 21; cf 2 S 22 16 and Ps 18 15). "I will send a blast upon him" (2 K 19 7 AV; RV "put a spirit in him," i.e. "an impulse of fear" [Dummelow in loc.]; cf Isa 37 7). "By the blast of his anger are they consumed" (Job 4 9; cf Isa 37 36).

(2) The word rūḥ is used with reference to the tyranny and violence of the wicked (Isa 25 4).

(3) The blowing of a wind instrument: "When they make a long blast with the ram's horn" (Josh 6 5).

BLAST, BLASTING, blast'ing (שִׂדְדָּה, shiddā-phōn—root, שָׂדָה, shādaph, lit. "scorching"): This is the effect produced upon grain or other plants by the hot east winds which blow from the desert of Arabia. They usually continue to blow for two or three days at a time. If they occur in the spring near ripening time, the grain is often turned yellow and does not properly mature. The farmers dread this wind. In some localities, if they suspect that the east wind is coming, they set up a great shouting and beating of pans, hoping to drive it off. Sometimes this wind is a double pestilence, when it brings with it a cloud of locusts (2 Ch 6 28). The writer, while journeying in the northern part of the Arabian desert, the source of these winds, witnessed such a cloud of locusts on their way toward habitable regions. It did not call for a very vivid imagination on the part of the children of Israel to realize the meaning of the curses and all manner of evil which would befall those who would not hearken to the voice of Jeh. Dt 28 22-24 could easily be considered a poetic description of the east winds (Arab. hawa sharḳī'yeh) which visit Pal and Syria at irregular intervals today. The heat is fiery: it dries up the vegetation and blasts the grain; the sky is hazy and there is a glare as if the sun were reflected from a huge brass tray. Woodwork cracks and warps; the covers of books curl up. Instead of rain, the wind brings dust and sand which penetrate into the innermost corners of the dwellings. This dust fills the eyes and inflames them. The skin becomes hot and dry. To one first experiencing this storm it seems as though some volcano must be belching forth heat and ashes. No other condition of the weather can cause such depression. Such a pestilence, only prolonged beyond endurance, was to be the fate of the disobedient. This word should not be confused with mildew. Since the words blasting and mildew occur together it may be inferred that mildew (lit. "a paleness") must mean the sickly color which plants assume for other causes than the blasting of the east wind, such, as for instance, fungus diseases or parasites (1 K 8 37; Am 4 9; Hag 2 17).

BLASTUS, blas'tus (Βλάστος, Blástos, "shoot"): The chamberlain of Herod Agrippa I, whose services as an intermediary between them and the king were gained by the people of Tyre and Sidon. These cities were dependent on Pal for corn and other provisions, and when Herod, on the occasion of some commercial dispute, forbade the export of foodstuffs to Tyre and Sidon, they were at his mercy and were compelled to ask for peace. "Having made Blastus the king's chamberlain their friend," probably by means of a bribe, the Phoen embassy was given an opportunity of setting their case before Herod (Acts 12 20 ff).

BLAZE, blāz ("to publish"): Found only in AV of Mk 1 45, for Gr diaphēmizein, trd by RV "spread abroad," as in Mt 9 31; 28 15.

BLEMISH, blem'ish:

(1) מִאֵם, mām, מִאֲרָם, m'ām; μῶμος, mōmos: This word signifies no particular skin disease, as has been supposed; but is used generally for any and all disfiguring affections of the skin, such as eczema, herpes, scabies, etc, even for scratches and scars, as in Lev 24 19.20; and thence for moral defects, as in Eph 5 27. The existence of a blemish in a person of priestly descent prevented him from the execution of the priestly office; similarly an animal fit for sacrifice was to be without blemish. In the NT Christ is presented as the antitype of a pure and ritually acceptable sacrifice "as a lamb without blemish and without spot" (He 9 14; 1 Pet 1 19), and the disciples are admonished to be blameless, "without blemish" (Eph 5 27). Rarely the word is used to designate a reprobate person (2 Pet 2 13).

(2) Blemish in the eye, תְּבַלְל, t'ballul (from a root בָּלַל, bālal, "to overflow"; Arab. بَلَّ, balla, בל, balal, "to moisten"), cataract, white spots in the eye (Lev 21 20). H. L. E. LÜERING BLESS (בָּרַךְ, bārakh): This word is found more frequently in the OT than in the NT, and is used in different relations.

(1) It is first met in Gen 1 22 at the introduction of animal life upon the earth, where it is written, "And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply," etc. The context furnishes the key to its meaning, which is the bestowal of good, and in this particular place the pleasure and power of increase in kind. Thus it is generally employed in both Testaments, the context always determining the character of the bestowal; for instance (where man is the recipient), whether the good is temporal or spiritual, or both.

Occasionally, however, a different turn is given to it as in Gen 2 3 AV, where it is written, "And God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it." Here the good consists in the setting apart and consecrating of that day for His use.

(2) In the foregoing instances the Creator is regarded as the source of blessing and the creature the recipient, but the order is sometimes reversed, and the creature (man) is the source and the Creator the recipient. In Gen 24 48, for example, Abraham's servant says, "I bowed my head, and worshipped Jeh, and blessed Jeh, the God of my master Abraham," where the word evidently means to worship God, to exalt and praise Him.

(3) There is a third use where men only are considered. In Gen 24 60, her relatives "blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of ten thousands" (AV "millions"), where the word expresses the wish or hope for the bestowal of the good designated. There are also instances where such a blessing of man by man may be taken in the prophetic sense, as when Isaac blessed Jacob (Gen 27 4.27), putting himself as it were in God's place, and with a sense of the Divine concurrence, pronouncing the good named. Here the word becomes in part a prayer for, and in part a prediction of, the good intended. Balaam's utterances are simply prophetic of Israel's destiny (Nu 23 9.10.11.23m.24).

Although these illustrations are from the OT the word is used scarcely differently in the NT; "The blessing of bread, of which we read in the Gospels, is equivalent to giving thanks for it, the thought being that good received gratefully comes as a blessing"; cf Mt 14 19 and 15 36 with 1 Cor 11 24 (Adeney, HDB, I, 307). See also BENE-DICTION.

JAMES M. GRAY

BLESSED, bles'ed (בָּרֵךְ, bārūkh): Where God is referred to, this word has the sense of "praise," as in 1 S 25 32, "Blessed be Jeh, the God of Israel." But where man is in mind it is used in the sense of "happy" or "favored," and most frequently so in the Psalms and the Gospels, as for example, "Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the wicked" (Ps 1 1); "Blessed art thou among women" (Lk 1 42); "Blessed are the poor in spirit" (Mt 5 3). See BEATITUDES.

BLESSEDNESS, bles'ed-nes: This tr of μακαρισμός, makarismós (a word signifying "beatification" or "the ascription of blessing"), is used but three times, in Rom 4 6.9, and Gal 4 15, in AV only. In the first two instances it refers to the happy state or condition of a man to whom Christ's righteousness is imputed by faith, and in the last to a man's experience of that condition. See HAPPINESS.

BLESSING (בְּרָכָה, b'rākhāh; εὐλογία, eulogia): Sometimes means the form of words used in invoking the bestowal of good, as in Dt 33 1; Josh 8 34; and Jas 3 10. Sometimes it means the good or the benefit itself which has been conferred, as in Gen 27 36, "Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?" and Prov 10 22, "The blessing of Jeh, it maketh rich." "The cup of blessing" (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, tó potērion tēs eulogias, a special use of the word in 1 Cor 10 16), means the cup for which we bless God, or which represents to us so much blessing from God.

JAMES M. GRAY

BLESSING, CUP OF (τὸ ποτήριον τῆς εὐλογίας, "the consecrated cup," 1 Cor 10 16): A technical term from the Jewish liturgy transferred to the Lord's Supper, and signifying the cup of wine upon which a blessing was pronounced. The suggestion that it carries with it a higher significance, as a cup that brings blessing, is not without force. The succeeding words, "we bless," are equivalent to "for which we give thanks." It was consecrated by thanksgiving and prayer. See also CUP.

BLESSING, VALLEY OF. See BERACAH.

BLINDFOLD, blind'fold (περικαλύπτω, perikalúptō): A sport common among the children of ancient times, in which the blindfolded were struck on the cheek, then asked who had struck them, and not let go until they had correctly guessed. This treatment was accorded Christ by his persecutors (Lk 22 64).

BLINDING, blind'ing. See PUNISHMENTS.

BLINDNESS, blind'ness (τυφλός, typhlós, and variants; τυφλός, typhlós): The word blind is used as a vb., as Jn 12 40, usually in the sense of obscuring spiritual perception. In reference to physical blindness it is used as a noun frequently or else as an adj. with the noun man. There are 54 references to this condition, and there is no reason to believe, as has been surmised, that blindness was any less rife in ancient times than it is now, when defective eyes and bleared, inflamed lids are among the commonest and most disgusting sights in a Pal crowd. In the Papyrus Ebers (1500 BC) there are enumerated a number of diseases of the eye and a hundred prescriptions are given for their treatment. That the disease occurred in children and caused destruction and atrophy of the eyeball is testified to by the occurrence of a considerable number of mummy heads, in which there is marked diminution in size of one orbit. The commonest disease is a purulent ophthalmia, a highly infectious condition propagated largely by the flies which can be seen infesting the crusts of dried secretion undisturbed even on the eyes of infants. (In Egypt there is a superstition that it is unlucky to disturb them.) This almost always leaves the eyes damaged with bleared lids, opacities of the cornea, and sometimes extensive internal injury as well. Like other plagues, this disease was thought to be a Divine infliction (Ex 4 11). Minor forms of the disease destroy the eyelashes and produce the unsightly tender-eyes (in Gen 29 17 the word rakh may mean simply "weak").

Blindness from birth is the result of a form of this disease known as ophthalmia neonatorum which sets in a few days after birth. I have seen cases of this disease in Pal. Sometimes ophthalmia accompanies malarial fever (Lev 26 16). All these diseases are aggravated by sand, and the sun glare, to which the unprotected inflamed eyes are exposed. Most of the extreme cases which one sees are beyond remedy—and hence the giving of sight to the blind is generally put in the front of the mighty works of healing by Our Lord. The methods used by Him in these miracles varied probably according to the degree of faith in the blind man; all were merely tokens, not intended as remedies. The case of the man in Mk 8 22 whose healing seemed gradual is an instance of the phenomenon met with in cases where, by operation, sight has been given to one congenitally blind, where it takes some time before he can interpret his new sensations.

The blindness of old age, probably from senile cataract, is described in the cases of Eli at 98 years of age (1 S 3 2; 4 15), Ahijah (1 K 14 4), and Isaac (Gen 27 1). The smiting of Elymas (Acts 13 11) and the Syrian soldiers (2 K 6 18) was either a miraculous intervention or more probably a temporary hypnotism; that of Paul (Acts 9 8) was doubtless a temporary paralysis of the retinal cells from the bright light. The "scales" mentioned were not material but in the restoration of his sight it seemed as if scales had fallen from his eyes. It probably left behind a weakness of the eyes (see THORN IN THE FLESH). That blindness of Tobit (Tob 2 10), from the irritation of sparrows' dung, may have been some form of conjunctivitis, and the cure by the gall of the fish is paralleled by the account given in Pliny (xxii.24) where the gall of the fish Callionymus Lyra is recommended as an application in some cases of blindness. The hypothesis that the gall was used as a pigment to obscure the whiteness of an opaque cornea (for which Indian ink tattooing has been recommended, not as a cure but to remove the unsightliness of a white spot) has nothing in its favor for thereby the sight would not be restored. The only other reference to medicaments is the fig. mention of eyesalve in Rev 3 18.

Blindness unfitted a man for the priesthood (Lev 21 18); but care of the blind was specially enjoined in the Law (Lev 19 14), and offences against them are regarded as breaches of Law (Dt 27 18).

Figuratively, blindness is used to represent want of mental perception, want of prevision, recklessness, and incapacity to perceive moral distinctions (Isa 42 16, 18, 19; Mt 23 16 ff; Jn 9 39 ff).

ALEX. MACALISTER

BLINDNESS, JUDICIAL, jū-dish'al, jōo-dish'al: Among the ancient Israelites in the pre-Can. period disputes within the family or clan or tribe would be settled by the natural head of the family or clan or tribe. According to Ex 18 Moses, as the leader of the tribes, settled all disputes. But he was compelled to appoint a body of magistrates—heads of families—to act in conjunction with himself, and under his judicial oversight. These magistrates settled ordinary disputes while he reserved for himself the more difficult cases. After the conquest of Canaan, the conditions of life became so complex, and questions of a difficult nature so constantly arose, that steps were taken (1) to appoint official judges—elders of the city (Josh 8 33; Jgs 8 3; 1 K 21 8); (2) to codify ancient custom, and (3) to place the administration of justice on an organized basis. It is significant that in one of the oldest documents in the Pent—viz. in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 20–23 33)—the miscarriage of justice was of such frequent occurrence as to require special mention (23 1–3, 6–8). In fact the OT abounds with allusions to the corruption and venality of the magisterial bench (Dt 16 19; Lev 19 15; Am 5 12; Mic 3 11; 7 3; Isa 1 23; 5 23; Zeph 3 3; Ps 15 5; Prov 17 23). According to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 23 8) 'a bribe blindeth the eyes of the open-eyed.' This descriptive phrase indicates a prolific cause of the miscarriage of justice—an exceedingly common thing in the East, in the present no less than in the past. The prohibition in ver 3, "Neither shalt thou favor a poor man in his cause," is rather remarkable and many scholars are of opinion that "a great man" should be read for "a poor man" as, according to ver 6 AV, the common fault was "wresting the judgment of the poor." The rich alone could offer a satisfactory bribe. But it should be pointed out that Lev (19 15) legislates in view of both tendencies—"respecting the person of the poor" and "honoring the person of the mighty." Sympathy with the poor no less than a bribe from the well-to-do might affect the judgment of the bench. Dt (16 19) reproduces the words of the Book of the Covenant with a slight alteration—viz. "eyes of the wise" for "eyes of the open-eyed" ("them that have sight"). Both phrases vividly bring out the baneful effect of bribery—a magistrate otherwise upright and honest—opened and wise—may be unconsciously yet effectively influenced in his judicial decisions by a gift sufficiently large. A similar phrase is found in the story of Abraham's life (Gen 20 16). A gift of a thousand shekels to Abraham was intended to be a "covering of the eyes" for Sarah, i.e. compensation or reparation for the wrong which had been done. For a gift of such magnitude she ought to wink at the injury. Job (9 24) declares in his bitterness that God "covereth the faces of the judges"—inflicts judicial blindness on them so that justice in this world is out of the question. Judicial corruption was the burden of the prophets' preaching—"judges loved bribes, and followed after rewards," with the result that "the fatherless" and "the widow" were helpless to have their grievances redressed (Isa 1 23). A satisfactory reward would always secure the acquittal of the offender (Isa 5 23). Micah combines judges, priests and prophets under a similar charge; they are all guilty of gross venality (3 11). Prov (17 23) defines the wicked person as one who is always prepared to take a "bribe out of the bosom, to pervert the ways of justice"; on the other hand the good man is he who will not take a reward against the innocent (Ps 15 5) or "shaketh his hands from taking a bribe" (Isa 33 15). In regard to Jeh alone is absolute incorruptibility affirmed—he "regardeth not persons, nor taketh reward" (Dt 10 17).

T. LEWIS

BLOOD, blud (דם, dām, probably from אדם, 'ādam, "to be red"; αἷμα, haima): Used in the OT to designate the life principle in either animal or vegetable, as the blood of man or the juice of the grape (Lev 17 11, et al.); in the NT for the blood of an animal, the atoning blood of Christ, and in both OT and NT in a fig. sense for bloodshed or murder (Gen 37 26; Hos 4 2; Rev 16 6).

Although the real function of the blood in the human system was not fully known until the fact of its circulation was established by 1. Primitive William Harvey in 1615, nevertheless Ideas from the earliest times a singular mystery has been attached to it by all peoples. Blood rites, blood ceremonies and blood feuds are common among primitive tribes. It came to be recognized as the life principle long before it was scientifically proved to be. Naturally a feeling of fear, awe and reverence would be attached to the shedding of blood. With many uncivilized peoples scarification of the body until blood flows is practised. Blood brotherhood or blood friendship is established by African tribes by the mutual shedding of blood and either drinking it or rubbing it on one another's bodies. Thus and by the inter-transfusion of blood by other means it was thought that a community of life and interest could be established.

Notwithstanding the ignorance and superstition surrounding this suggestively beautiful idea, it grew to have more than a merely human

2. Heb and OT Customs significance and application. For this crude practice of inter-transference of human blood there came to be a symbolic substitution of animal blood in sprinkling or anointing. The first reference in the OT to blood (Gen 4 10) is fig., but highly illustrative of the reverential fear manifested upon the shedding of blood and the first teaching regarding it.

The rite of circumcision is an OT form of blood ceremony. Apart from the probable sanitary importance of the act is the deeper meaning in the establishment of a bond of friendship between the one upon whom the act is performed and Jeh Himself. In order that Abraham might become "the friend of God" he was commanded that he should be circumcised as a token of the covenant between him and God (Gen 17 10-11; see CIRCUMCISION).

It is significant that the eating of blood was prohibited in earliest Bible times (Gen 9 4). The custom probably prevailed among heathen nations as a religious rite (cf Ps 16 4). This and its unhygienic influence together doubtless led to its becoming taboo. The same prohibition was made under the Mosaic code (Lev 7 26; see SACRIFICE).

Blood was commanded to be used also for purification or for ceremonial cleansing (Lev 14 5-7, 51.52; Nu 19 4), provided, however, that it be taken from a clean animal (see PURIFICATION).

In all probability there is no trace of the superstitious use of blood in the OT, unless perchance in 1 K 22 38 (see BATHING); but everywhere it is vested with cleansing, expiatory, and reverently symbolic qualities.

As in the transition from ancient to Heb practice, so from the OT to the NT we see an exaltation of the conception of blood and blood ceremonies. In Abraham's covenant his own blood had to be shed. Later an expiatory animal was to shed blood (Lev 5 6; see ATONEMENT), but there must always be a shedding of blood. "Apart from shedding of blood there is no remission" (He 9 22). The exaltation and dignifying of this idea finds its highest development then in the vicarious shedding of blood by Christ Himself (1 Jn 1 7). As in the OT "blood" was also used to signify the juice of grapes, the most natural substitute for the drinking of blood would be the use of wine. Jesus takes advantage of this, and introduces the beautiful and significant custom (Mt 26 28) of drinking wine and eating bread as symbolic of the primitive inter-transfusion of blood and flesh in a pledge of eternal friendship (cf Ex 24 6.7; Jn 6 53-56). This is the climactic observance of blood rites recorded in the Bible.

WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

BLOOD AND WATER (αἷμα καὶ ὕδωρ, háima kai húdōr): The remarkable passage (Jn 19 34) from which this expression is taken refers to the piercing of the Saviour's side by the soldier. The evangelist notes here what he, as an eyewitness of the crucifixion, had seen as a surprising fact. Whereon this surprise was founded cannot now be more than guessed at. Nor is it necessary here to discuss the reason or reasons why the apostle mentions the fact at all in his report, whether merely for historical accuracy and completeness, or as a possible proof of the actual death of Christ, which at an early date became a subject of doubt among certain Christian sects, or whether by it he wished to refer to the mystical relation of baptismal cleansing ("water") and the atonement ("blood") as signified thereby. Let it suffice to state that a reference often made to 1 Jn 5 6.8 is here quite out of place. This passage, though used by certain Fathers of the church as a proof of the last-named doctrine, does not indeed refer to this wonderful incident of the crucifixion story. The argument of 1 Jn 5 8 concerns the Messiahship of Jesus, which is proved by a threefold witness, for He is the one whom at the baptism of John ("water") God attested as the Messiah by the heavenly voice, "This is my beloved Son," who at the crucifixion ("blood") had the testimony that the Father had accepted His atoning sacrifice, and whose promise of sending the Comforter fulfilled on Pentecost ("spirit") presented us with the final proof of the completed Messianic task. The same expression in 1 Jn 5 6 refers probably to the same argument with the implied meaning that Jesus came not only by the merely ceremonial water of baptism, but also by the more important, because vivifying, blood of atonement.

The physiological aspect of this incident of the crucifixion has been first discussed by Gruner (Commentatio de morte Jesu Christi vera, Halle, 1805), who has shown that the blood released by the spear-thrust of the soldier must have been extravasated before the opening of the side took place, for only so could it have been poured forth in the described manner. While a number of commentators have opposed this view as a fanciful explanation, and have preferred to give the statement of the evangelist a symbolical meaning in the sense of the doctrines of baptism and eucharist (so Baur, Strauss, Reuss and others), some modern physiologists are convinced that in this passage a wonderful phenomenon is reported to us, which, inexplicable to the sacred historian, contains for us an almost certain clue to the real cause of the Saviour's death. Dr. Stroud (On the Physiological Cause of the Death of Christ, London, 1847) basing his remarks on numerous postmortems, pronounced the opinion that here we had a proof of the death of Christ being due not to the effects of crucifixion but to "laceration or rupture of the heart" as a consequence of supreme mental agony and sorrow. It is well attested that usually the suffering on the cross was very prolonged. It often lasted two or three days, when death would supervene from exhaustion. There were no physical reasons why Christ should not have lived very much longer on the cross than He did. On the other hand, death caused by laceration of the heart in consequence of great mental suffering would be almost instantaneous. In such a case the phrase "of a broken heart," becomes lit. true. The life blood flowing through the aperture or laceration into the pericardium or caul of the heart, being extravasated, soon coagulates into the red clot (blood) and the limpid serum (water). This accumulation in the heart-sac was released by the spear-thrust of the soldier (which here takes providentially the place of a postmortem without which it would have been impossible to determine the real cause of death), and from the gaping wound there flow the two component parts of blood distinctly visible.

Several distinguished physicians have accepted Dr. Stroud's argument, and some have strengthened it by the observation of additional symptoms. We may mention Dr. James Begbie, fellow and late president of the Royal College of Physicians of Edinburgh, Sir J. Y. Simpson, professor at the University of Edinburgh, and others (see Dr. Hanna, Our Lord's Life on Earth, Appendix I). The latter refers to the loud cry, mentioned by the Synoptists (Mt 27 50; Mk 15 37; Lk 23 46), which preceded the actual death of Jesus, as a symptom characteristic of cases of "broken heart." He adds that Dr. Walshe, professor of medicine in University College, London, one of the greatest authorities on the diseases of the heart, says that a "piercing shriek" is always uttered in such cases immediately before the end.

While we may never reach a state of absolute certainty on this subject, there is no valid reason to deny the probability of this view of the death of Christ. It certainly gives a more solemn insight into Christ's spiritual anguish, "the travail of his soul" on our behalf, which weighed upon Him so heavily that long before the usual term of bodily and therefore endurable suffering of crucified persons Christ's loving heart broke, achieving the great atoning sacrifice for all mankind.

BLOOD, AVENGER OF. See AVENGER.

BLOOD, ISSUE, ish'û, OF. See BLOODY FLUX.

BLOODGUILTINESS, blud-gilt'i-nes: Found in the AV only in Ps 51 14. RV adds Ex 22 2,3; 1 S 25 26,33. Ezk 18 13 seems to indicate that the phrase does not necessarily signify bloodshed, but any grievous sin which, if it remains, will block God's favor to His land and people (cf Dt 21 8; Isa 1 15). Ps 51 is to be interpreted in this light.

BLOOD - REVENGE, blud-rê-venj': See AVENGER.

BLOODSHEDDING, blud'shed-ing (αἱματεκχυσία, haimatekchusia, He 9 22): In this passage the indispensability of expiating sacrifice is positively set forth.

BLOODTHIRSTY, blud'thûrs-ti (אַנְשֵׁי דָמִים, 'anshê dāmîm, "men of blood"): This occurs in the AV only in Prov 29 10; in RV, Ps 5 6; 55 23; 59 2; 139 19. See BLOODY.

BLOODY, blud'i (דָּם, dām="blood" of man or an animal; and where the King James translators have rendered with the adj. "bloody," the Heb employs the noun in the construct case, "of blood"): "A bridegroom of blood" (Ex 4 25,26, AV bloody husband). Zipporah, not being an Israelite, probably objected to the circumcision of infants, if not to the rite altogether; apprehending, however, that her husband's life was imperiled possibly through some grievous sickness (4 24) because of their disobedience in this particular, she performed the ceremony herself upon her son, saying, "A bridegroom of blood art thou to me."

In RV the expression (AV "bloody") is variously rendered, "man of blood" (2 S 16 7,8); "men of blood" (Ps 26 9); "bloodthirsty" (5 6; 59 2; 139 19). In 2 S 21 1, "It is for Saul, and for his bloody house," might be rendered "Upon Saul and his house rests bloodshed."

Ezekiel calls Jerus "the bloody city" (Ezk 22 2; 24 6; cf 7 23), referring to those unjustly put to death by the wicked rulers of Jerus. Nineveh also is called "the bloody city" (Nah 3 1). The capital here virtually stands for the kingdom, and history bears witness to the enormous cruelties perpetrated by the Assy rulers. It is siege on siege, pools of blood everywhere, the flaying of men alive, "great baskets stuffed with the salted heads of their foes." For two hundred years it is the story of brute force and ruthless cruelty. "The prey departeth not." And now every cruelty which they have visited upon others is to be turned upon themselves (3 19).

BLOODY FLUX, fluks (πυρετός καὶ δυσεντερία, pyretós kai dusenteria, lit. "fever and dysentery"): The disease by which the father of Publius was afflicted in Malta (Acts 28 8). RV calls it "dysentery"; a common and dangerous disease which in Malta is often fatal to soldiers of the garrison even at the present day (Aitken, Pract. of Medicine, II, 841). It is also prevalent in Pal at certain seasons, and in Egypt its mortality was formerly about 36 per cent. Its older name was due to the discharge of blood from the intestine. Sometimes portions of the bowel become gangrenous and slough, the condition described as affecting Jehoram (2 Ch 21 19). There seems to have been an epidemic of the disease at the time of his seizure (2 Ch 21 14, 15), and in the case of the king it left behind it a chronic ulcerated condition, ending in gangrene. Somewhat similar conditions of chronic intestinal ulceration following epidemic dysentery I have seen in persons who had suffered from this disease in India.

BLOODY SWEAT, swet (ὥσεὶ θρόμβοι αἱματος, hōseî thrōmboi haimatos): Described in Lk 22 44 as a physical accompaniment of Our Lord's agony at Gethsemane (on the passage, which is absent in some MSS, see WH). Many old writers take this to mean that the perspiration dropped in the same manner as clots of blood drop from a wound, regarding the Gr word prefixed as expressing merely a comparison as in Mt 28 3, where leukón hōs chion means "white as snow." Cases of actual exudation of blood are described in several of the mediaeval accounts of stigmatization, and Lefébvre describes the occurrence of something similar in his account of Louise Lateau in 1870. For references to these cases see art. "Stigmatization" in Enc Brit, XXII, 550. It is perhaps in favor of the older interpretation that the word used by Aeschylus for drops of blood is stagōn (Agam. 1122) and by Euripides stalagmós, not thromboi. None of the instances given by Tissot (Traité des nerfs, 279), or Schenck (Observ. méd., III, 455), can be said to be unimpeachable; but as the agony of Our Lord was unexampled in human experience, it is conceivable that it may have been attended with physical conditions of a unique nature.

BLOOM, blōōm, BLOSSOM, blos'um. See FLOWERS.

BLOT, blot (מָחָה, mūh, contracted from מָחָה, m'ūh, "spot"): Occurs in the sense of scorn (Prov 9 7). In Job 31 7 (AV) it is used fig. of a moral defect; RV has "spot." Blot out (מָחָה, māhāh, "to wipe out," ἐξαλείφω, exaleiphō, "to smear out"), to obliterate or destroy: "That a tribe be not blotted out" (AV "destroyed," Jgs 21 17). To blot men out of God's book is to cut them off by an untimely death (Ex 32 32).

Figuratively: "To blot out sin" is to forgive sin fully (Ps 51 1,9; Acts 3 19; Col 2 14). Not to blot out sin is to reserve for punishment (Neh 4 5). The names of those who inherit eternal life are not blotted out of the "book of life" (Rev 3 5). See BOOK OF LIFE; BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE; FORGIVENESS.

BLOW, blō (נָשַׁף, nāshaph): Used with reference to the wind (Ex 15 10; Ps 78 26; 147 18; πνέω, pnēō, "to breathe," Lk 12 55; Jn 3 8; Rev 7 1); תָּקַע, tāka', with reference to trumpet sound (Nu 10 3,4-10; Ps 31 6 AV; Jgs 7 18,20; 1 K 1 34; 1 Ch 15 24; Ps 81 3; Ezk 33 3,6; Hos 5 8; Joel 2 1,15); פָּשַׁח, pūshāh, with reference to the strong expulsion of the breath (Ezk 21 31; 22 20,21; Hag

1 9; Isa 40 7; 54 16; Job 20 26); נָשָׁף, nāshaph, with reference to a forcible slap or stroke with a hand or an instrument (Ps 39 10; Isa 40 24; Jer 14 17 AV).

BOANERGES, bō-a-nūr'jēz (Βοανηργές, Boanērgēs; בְּנֵי רָעַשׁ, bēnē reghesh, "sons of thunder"): The surname bestowed by Jesus upon James and John, the sons of Zebedee, when they were ordained to the apostleship (Mk 3 17). See JAMES, SON OF ZEBEDEE. It has also been regarded as an equivalent of the "Heavenly Twins," the Sons of Zeus or Thunder. According to this interpretation, the name Boanerges would represent the Dioscuri in some form or other of their varied presentation in the cults of the Mediterranean (cf Professor J. Rendel Harris in Expos, ser. vii, III, 146).

BOAR, bōr (בָּזִיר, hāzīr): In lamenting the troubled state of the Jewish nation the Psalmist (80 13) says: "The boar out of the wood doth ravage it, and the wild beasts of the field feed on it," with evident reference to Israel's enemies, the Assyrians, etc. The wild boar is abundant in certain parts of Pal and Syria, esp. in the thickets which border the lakes and rivers, as about the Hālēh, the sea of Galilee, the Jordan, and in the deltas of streams flowing into the Dead Sea, as Ghaur-us-Sāfiyeh. Several fountains in Lebanon bear the name, 'Ain-ul-Hāzīr, though hāzīr is not an Arab. word, khanzīr being the Arab. for "swine." See SWINE.

BOARD, bōrd (קֶרֶשׁ, keresh, "a slab or plank," "deck of a ship," "bench," "board"): This word is found in Ex 26 16-21; 36 21 ff; its pl. occurs in Ex 26 15.17-29; 35 11; 36 20-34; 39 33; 40 18; Nu 3 36; 4 31. This word also is used in tr of לִבְיָה, lū'ah (Ex 27 8; 38 7; Cant 8 9; Ezk 27 5 AV)="a tablet" (of stone, wood or metal), "board," "plate," "table"; also of צֶלָא="rib," hence a "side," "timber," "plank" (1 K 6 15 f). In 1 K 6 9, שְׂדֵרָה, s'dherāh="a rank," "a row," hence, "a range" or "board" is used. In the NT we find the expression "on board" in Acts 27 44 AV, in tr of ἐπὶ σάνισιν, epi sanisin="planks."

BOAST, bōst (הָלַל, hālāl, "to praise"; καυχάσθαι, kaucháomai, "to vaunt oneself," used both in a good and a bad sense): To praise God: "In God have we made our boast all the day long" (Ps 44 8); to praise oneself, to vaunt (Ps 10 3). In the NT the RV frequently translates "glory," where the AV has "boast," in a good sense (2 Cor 7 14). In the sense of self-righteousness (Eph 2 9; Rom 2 17. 23). Boaster (ἀλαζών, alazōn, "a braggart") occurs in AV (Rom 1 30; 2 Tim 3 2); RV has "boastful."

BOAZ, bō'az (בֹּאֵז, bō'az; Βόας, Bóas; "quickness"?) Ruth 2-4; 1 Ch 2 11.12; Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32):

(1) A resident of Bethlehem and kinsman of Elimelech, Naomi's husband. In Ruth 2 1 he is described as a gībōr hayil, a phrase which can mean either "a mighty man of valor" or else "a man of position and wealth." The latter is probably the sense in which the phrase is applied to Boaz (cf 1 S 9 1). He had fields outside the town, and to them Ruth went to glean. Boaz noticed her and extended special kindness and protection to her, bidding her remain with his female workers, and charging the men not to illtreat her, and also giving her of the reapers' food at mealtime. Boaz awoke one night and found Ruth lying at his feet. He praised her virtue, and promised to take charge of her if her dead husband's next-of-kin failed to do so. He laid her case before the next-of-kin, and finally redeemed the family property himself and bought as well the right to take Ruth in marriage.

Field of Boaz.

The son of Boaz and Ruth was Obed, father of Jesse, and grandfather of David. 1 Ch 2 11.12 makes Boaz a descendant of Hezron, and so probably a chief of the Hezronite clan in Bethlehem. Jewish tradition identifies Boaz with Ibzan (Jgs 12 8-10).

Boaz "is set before us as a model of piety, generosity and chastity" (H. P. Smith, OT History, 398). He found virtue and rewarded it. HPM, §§ 501-8, gives a picture of the life of "a well-to-do landed proprietor of central Pal," much of which could aptly be taken as a description of Boaz.

(2) The name of one of the two bronze pillars erected in front of Solomon's temple, the other being Jachin (1 K 7 21; 2 Ch 3 17). See JACHIN AND BOAZ; TEMPLE.

BOCCAS, bok'as (Βοκκάς, Bokkás): A priest in the line of Ezra (1 Esd 8 2) called Bukki in Ezr 7 4 and Borith in 2 Esd 1 2.

BOCHERU, bō'kē-rōō (בֹּכְרִי, bōkhrū): A son of Azrikam, Saul's descendant (1 Ch 8 38=9 34). For the ending רִי (ū), of the forms בֹּכְרִי, gashmū (Neh 6 1.6) and מְלִיכָה, m'likhū (12 14 AV and RVm).

BOCHIM, bō'kim (הַבְּכִים, ha-bōkhīm): A place on the mountain W. of Gilgal said to have been so named (lit. "the weepers") because Israel wept there at the remonstrance of the angel (Jgs 2 1.5). No name resembling this has been discovered. Given on the occasion mentioned, it may not have endured. Many, following LXX, identify it with Bethel.

BODY, bod'ī:

PHILOLOGICAL

(1) Generally speaking, the OT language employs no fixed term for the human body as an entire organism in exact opposition to "soul" or "spirit." Various terms were employed, each of which denotes only one part or element of the physical nature, such as "trunk," "bones," "belly," "bowels," "reins," "flesh," these parts being used, by synecdoche, for the whole: עֵצֶם, ēcem="bone," or "skeleton," hence "body," is found in Ex 24 10 AV; Lam 4 7; נֶפֶשׁ, nepesh="living organism" (Lev 21 11; Nu 6 6.7.11; 19 11.13.16; Hag 2 13); נְבִלָה, n'bhēlāh="a flabby thing," "carcass" (Dt 21 23; Isa 26 19; Jer 26 23; 36

30); בֶּטֶן, beten="womb" (Dt 28 4.11.18.53; 30 9; Job 19 17 AV; Ps 132 11; Mic 6 7); יָרֵךְ, yārekh="thigh," "generative parts," "body" (Jgs 8 30); גִּוְיָאָה, gōwiyāh="a body, whether alive or dead" (1 S 31 10.12; 2 K 8 5 AV; Dnl 10 6); מַעִים, mē'im, "body" (Cant 5 14); גִּוְפָה, gūphāh="corpse" (1 Ch 10 12); גֻּבָּה, gēwāh="the back," i.e. (by extension) "person" (Job 20 25); שָׂרָר, sh'er="flesh, as living or for food," "body" (Ezk 10 12); גֶּשֶׁם, geshem="a hard shower of rain," hence "a body" (Dnl 4 33; 5 21; 7 11); נִידְהָה, nīdhneh="a sheath," hence the receptacle of the soul, "body" (Dnl 7 15).

The Gr word which is used almost exclusively for "body" in the NT is sōma, sōma, Lat corpus (Mt 5 29.30; 6 22.23.25; 26 26; Jn 2 21; Acts 9 40; 1 Cor 15 35.37.38.44; Eph 1 23; 2 16; 4 4.12.16; 5 23.30). χρῶς, chrōs, signifying primarily the "surface" or "skin," occurs in Acts 19 12. A compound word with sōma, as its base, σύνσωμος, sūssōmos="a member of the same body," occurs in Eph 3 6. From the above, it appears that the NT places the body as a whole into opposition to the spirit or the invisible nature. Paul, of course, employs the term also to designate the sublimated substance with which we are to be clothed after the resurrection when he speaks of the "spiritual body" (1 Cor 15 44). FRANK E. HIRSCH

(2) sōma, sōma, Lat corpus: The term "body" is not found in the Heb of the OT in the sense in which it occurs in the Gr. "The Heb

1. In the word for 'body' is גִּוְיָאָה, gōwiyāh, OT which is sometimes used for the 'living' body (Ezk 1 11), 'bodies of the cherubim' (Gen 47 18; Neh 9 37), but usually for the dead body or carcass. Properly speaking the Heb has no term for 'body.' The Heb term around which questions relating to the body must gather is flesh" (Davidson, OT Theol., 188). Various terms are used in the OT to indicate certain elements or component parts of the body, such as "flesh," "bones," "bowels," "belly," etc, some of which have received a new meaning in the NT. Thus the OT "belly" (Heb beten, Gr koilia), "Our soul is bowed down to the dust; our belly cleaveth unto the earth" (Ps 44 25 AV)—as the seat of carnal appetite—has its counterpart in the NT: "They serve . . . their own belly" (Rom 16 18). So also the word trā "bowels" (mē'im, rahāmim) in the sense of compassion, as in Jer 31 20 AV: "Therefore my bowels are troubled for him," is found in more than one place in the NT. Thus in Phil 1 8 AV, "I long after you all in the bowels splāgchna of Christ," and again, "if there be any bowels [splāgchna] and mercies" (Phil 2 1 AV).

"Body" in the NT is largely used in a fig. sense, either as indicating the "whole man" (Rom 6 12; He 10 5), or as that which is morally corrupt—"the body of this death" (Rom 6 6; 7 24). Hence the expression, "buffet my body" (1 Cor 9 27, hupōpiázō, a word adopted from the prize-ring, palaestra), the body being considered as the lurking-place and instrument of evil. (Cf Rom 8 13 AV "Mortify the deeds of the body.")

Between these two the various other meanings seem to range. On the one hand we find the church called "the body of Christ" (Eph 4

3. Other Meanings 16; 1 Cor 12 13), with diversity of gifts, enjoying the "unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace." On the other we read of a spiritual, incorruptible body, a resurrection-body as opposed to the natural body, which is doomed to corruption in death (1 Cor 15 44). Not only do we find these meanings in the word itself, but also in some of its combinations. On the one hand we read in Eph 3 6 of the Gentiles as "partakers of the promise in Christ" as "fellow-heirs," and "of the same body" (sūssōma) in corporate union with all who put their trust in the Redeemer of mankind; on the other, we read of mere "bodily [somatic] exercises," which are not profitable (1 Tim 4 8)—where "body" evidently is contrasted with "spirit." And again, we read of the Holy Ghost descending in "bodily" (somatic) shape upon the "Son of God" (Lk 3 22), in whom dwelt the "fulness of the Godhead bodily" (somatically) (Col 2 9). So, too, the "body" is called a temple of the Holy Ghost: "Know ye not that your body is a temple of the Holy Spirit?" (1 Cor 6 19).

From all this it is apparent that the body in itself is not necessarily evil, a doctrine which is taught in Gr philosophy, but nowhere in the OT and NT. The rigid and harsh dualism met with in Plato is absent from St. Paul's writings, and is utterly foreign to the whole of Scripture. Here we are distinctly taught, on the one hand, that the body is subordinated to the soul, but on the other, with equal clearness, that the human body has a dignity, originally conferred upon it by the Creator, who shaped it out of earth, and glorified it by the incarnation of Christ, the sinless One, though born of a woman. Julius Müller has well said: "Paul denies the presence of evil in Christ, who was partaker of our fleshly nature (Gal 4 4), and he recognizes it in spirits who are not partakers thereof (Eph 6 12 AV, 'spiritual wickedness in high places'). Is it not therefore in the highest degree probable that according to him evil does not necessarily pertain to man's sensuous nature, and that sārx (say body) denotes something different from this?" (The Christian Doctrine of Sin, I, 321, Eng. ed). He further shows that the derivation of sin from sense is utterly irreconcilable with the central principle of the apostle's doctrine as to the perfect holiness of the Redeemer, and that "the doctrine of the future resurrection—even taking into account the distinction between the sōma psuchikón and the sōma pneumatikón (1 Cor 15 44)—is clearly at variance with the doctrine that sin springs from the corporal nature as its source" (318).

The very first sin was spiritual in its origin—an act of rebellion against God—the will of the creature in opposition to the will of the

5. The First Sin Creator (Gen 3). It was conceived in doubt—"Hath God said?"; it was born in desire—"The tree was good for food"; it was stimulated by a rebellious hankering after equality with God: "Ye shall be as God, knowing good and evil"; it was introduced from without, from the spiritual world, through the agency of a mysterious, supernatural being, employing "a beast of the field more subtle than any which Jehovah God had made." That the serpent in the OT is not identified with Satan, and that the clearest utterance in pre-Christian times on the subject is to be found in the Book of Wisd 2 24 ("by the envy of the devil death entered into the world"), may be true. That the narrative of the Fall is fig. or symbolical may also be granted. But the whole tendency of the early narrative is to connect the first human sin with a superhuman being, employing an agent known to man, and making that agent its representative in the "subtlety" of the great temptation as a prelude to the mighty fall. The NT is clear on this point (Jn 8 44; 16 11; 2 Cor 11 3; 1 Tim 2 14; He 2 14; Rev 12 9). Great historic truths are imbedded in that narrative, whatever we may think of the form which that narrative has assumed. There can be no doubt that the oldest and truest traditions of the human race are to be found there. It is not denied that sin has desecrated the temple of the living God, which is the body. That body indeed has become defiled and polluted by sin. Paul recognizes "an abnormal development of the sensuous in fallen man, and regards sin as having in a special manner entrenched itself in the body, which becomes liable to death on this very account (Rom 6 23; 7 24)" (Enc of Rel. and Ethics, I, 761). But we may safely say that the theory which connects sin with the physical body, and gives it a purely sensuous origin, is alien to the whole spirit and letter of revelation.

FIGURATIVE

(3) In the NT (σῶμα, sōma, "the body" both of men and animals) the word has a rich fig. and spiritual use: (1) the temporary home of the soul (2 Cor 5 6); (2) "the temple of the Holy Spirit" (1 Cor 6 19); (3) "temple" (Jn 2 21); (4) "the old man," the flesh as the servant of sin or the sphere in which moral evil comes to outward expression (Rom 6 6; 7 7; cf Paul's use of sárx, "flesh"); (5) the "church" as Christ's body, the organism through which He manifests His life and in which His spirit dwells (Eph 1 23; Col 1 24); (6) the spiritual "unity" of believers, one redeemed society or organism (Eph 2 16; a corpus mysticum, Eph 4 4); (7) "substance" (spiritual reality or life in Christ) v. "shadow" (Col 2 17); (8) the ascended and glorified body of Jesus (Phil 3 21); (9) the resurrection or "spiritual" (v. natural) body of the redeemed in heaven (1 Cor 15 44); (10) the whole personality, e.g. the spiritual presence, power and sacrificial work of Christ, the mystical meaning of "the body and the blood" symbolized in the bread and cup of the sacrament (1 Cor 11 27). The term body is exceptionally rich in connection with the self-giving, sacrificial, atoning work of Christ. It was the outward sphere or manifestation of His suffering. Through the physical He revealed the extent of His redeeming and sacrificial love. He "bare our sins in his body upon the tree" (1 Pet 2 24), thus forever displacing all the ceaseless and costly sacrifices of the old dispensation (He 9 24-28). Special terms "body of his flesh" (Col 1 22); "body of sin" (Rom 6 6); "body of this death" (Rom 7 24); "body of his glory" (Phil 3 21).

πτῶμα, ptōma, used only of fallen, i.e. dead bodies (Rev 11 8.9).

DWIGHT M. PRATT

BODY-GUARD, bod'i-gärd: The expression occurs in Apoc (1 Esd 3 4), "the body-guard that kept the king's person."

BODY OF DEATH, deth (σῶμα τοῦ θανάτου, sōma tou thanátou): These words are found in Paul's impassioned argument on the reign of the law, which dooms man to continuous disappointment and convinces him of the terrible power of indwelling sin. "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom 7 24 AV). It is the "picture of the still unredeemed man in his relation to the law" (Meyer). The tr, "this body of death," though grammatically possible, is logically impermissible. The picture here before the mind of the apostle is not physical but ethical. Death points to the dominion of sin, to the reign of the law, as revealed in his physical life, from which he is delivered only through regeneration, by faith in Christ. It points to the "I must" and to the "I cannot." It is therefore the bondage under the law of sin, the body as the seat of this conscious and bitter struggle, that the figure points at. And yet the ethical may have a physical background. There may be a distant reference here to the dreadful punishment of the ancients of chaining the living body to a corpse, that the constant corruption of death might extinguish the life of the victim of this exquisite torture.

HENRY E. DOSKER

BODY OF HEAVEN: The AV translates the Heb idiom, עֶצֶם הַשָּׁמַיִם, 'ecem ha-shāmayim, by "the body of heaven" (Ex 24 10). A more correct rendering is given in the RV, "the very heaven," taking the word 'ecem in its idiomatic use as an intensive, which is derived from its lit. meaning, "bone," as "strength," "substance," and then as "self" (cf Job 21 23); the substance of the blue, unclouded sky, hence the clear sky itself.

BODY, SPIRITUAL, spir'it-ū-al: Paul describes the body after the resurrection as a spiritual body (sōma psuchikón) and contrasts it with the natural (psychical) body, sōma pneumatikón, 1 Cor 15 44). Our present natural body has for its life-principle the soul (psuchē) but the resurrection body is adapted and subordinated to the spirit (pneūma). See PSYCHOLOGY. The apostle does not argue for a literal and material identity of that future body with the present one, but thinks of it as the counterpart of the present animal organism so conditioned as to be adapted to a state of existence which lies wholly within the sphere of the spirit. Against his Corinthian readers he argues that the resurrection cannot be succeeded by a state of non-existence, nor is he willing to admit a mere etherealized state. There must be a body, but between it and our present body there is a similar difference to that between the first and second Adam. The present body and the first Adam were alike dominated by the soul (psuchē); but as the second Adam became a life-giving spirit, so will the resurrection body be a spiritual one. Christ became a life-giving spirit through the resurrection (Meyer on 1 Cor 15 45); and since we are to bear His image (ver 49), it becomes evident that Christ's resurrection-body is the nearest possible approach to a sensible representation of the spiritual body. For this Paul argues more directly when he affirms that our resurrection-body shall be transformed according to the body of His glory (Phil 3 21; cf 1 Jn 3 2). The body of Christ after the resurrection was conformed in many respects to the body of His earthly life, yet with some marked differences. He ate (Lk 24 42.43); He breathed (Jn 20 22); possessed flesh and bones (Lk 24 39), and could be apprehended by the bodily senses (Lk 24 40; Jn 20 27). His body possessed characteristics which differentiated it entirely from the popular fancy of ghosts or apparitions (Lk 24 36-43). Yet His body was superior to the usual barriers which restrict human movements. Barred doors and distances did not impede His going (Jn 20 19-26; Lk 24 31-36). The context shows that the purpose of His eating was to convince the disciples that it was really He (Lk 24 41-43), and not to sustain life which His body was probably capable of maintaining in other ways. John speaks of His appearances after His resurrection as "manifestations" (Jn 21 1-21). A change in His person and appearance had certainly taken place, for those who knew Him best did not at once recognize Him (Lk 24 16; Jn 20 14). It is evident therefore that the post-resurrection-body of Jesus was one that had the power of materializing itself to natural senses, or withdrawing itself at will. It was this same body which was taken into the heavens at the ascension, and which remains in heaven (Acts 1 11; 3 21). There is no hint that it underwent any change in its removal from earth. Hence the spiritual body of which Paul speaks is not to be unlike the body which Jesus possessed after His resurrection. There is to be an absence of the desires and passions which belong naturally to the present bodily existence (Mt 22 30; Lk 20 35.36).

BOHAN, bō'han (בֹּהַן, bōhan, "thumb," "stumpy"): A son of Reuben according to Josh 15 6; 18 17. No mention is made of B. in the genealogies of Reuben. "The stone of Bohan" (ebhen bōhan) was a boundary mark on the N.E. frontier of Judah, separating it from Benjamin. Site unidentified.

BOIL (noun) (שִׁחָן, sh'hān; ἔλκος, hēlkos): A localized inflamed swelling. The Heb word is derived from a root probably meaning "to burn," and is used as a generic term for the sores in the sixth plague of Egypt (Ex 9 9-11); for a sore which might be confounded with leprosy (Lev 13 18-23); for Job's malady (2 7) and Hezekiah's disease (2 K 20 1; Isa 38 21). Our Eng. word is derived from the vb. "to heal," i.e. to suppurate, now obsolete except as a dialect word in Scotland and Ireland. Wyclif uses the name for Lazarus' sores (Lk 16 20), "houndis lickeden his bylis." The Egypt word shn is the name of an abscess, and occurs in the reduplicated form hnhnt in Papyr. Ebers, CV. The plague of boils in Egypt came without warning immediately after the insect plagues of kinnām (sandflies) and that of ārōbh or flies, and followed the epizootic murrain, which is suggestive in the light of the transmission of toxic germs by insects. It has been supposed by some to be elephantiasis, as Pliny says that this disease was peculiar to Egypt (xxvi.5). A stronger case has been made out for its identity with confluent smallpox; but as it is not described as being a fatal disease, it may more probably have been an aggravated form of the ordinary gregarious furuncles or boils, due to the microbe streptococcus pyogenes.

Job's body is said to have been covered with itchy, irritating sores which made his face unrecognizable (2 12), caused continual burning pain (3 24; 6 4), and which were infested with maggots (7 5) and exhaled a nauseous fetor (19 17). His sleep was destroyed and his nervous system enfeebled (3 26) so that he required assistance to move, as he sat in the ashes (2 8). Various diagnoses have been made of his malady, but it is most probable that it was a form of the disease known as "oriental sore," or "Bagdad boil," called in Algeria "Biskra batton," in which the intensely itchy sores are often multiple, affecting the face, hands, and other exposed parts. The cases which I have seen have been very intractable and disfiguring.

Hezekiah's boil was apparently more localized, and the indefinite description would accord with that of a carbuncle. It seems to have rendered him unclean (Isa 38 22), though the reference may be to the practice referred to in Lev 13 18 f. The "botch" of Egypt (Dt 28 27.35 AV) is a tr of the same word, as is "boil" in RV. Botch is an old Eng. name for boil and occurs in Piers Plowman, and the adj. "botchy" is used in Troilus and Cressida (II, 1, 6). The word is cognate to the old French boche or poche, a form of our later word "pock." The sores of Lazarus (Lk 16 20) were probably old varicose ulcers, such as are as common on the legs of the old and poor in the East as they are in the West.

BOIL (verb) (בָּשַׁל, bāshal, רָחַח, rāḥaḥ): "Boil" is the tr of bāshal, "to bubble up," "to boil," "to be cooked," Piēl, "to cause to boil," "to cook" (Lev 8 31; 1 K 19 21; 2 K 6 29; Ezk 46 20. 24 bis); of rāḥaḥ, "to be hot," "to boil," "to be made to boil," "to be greatly moved" under strong emotion (the bowels), Hiph. "to cause to boil" (Job 30 27 AV "My bowels boiled, and rested not," ERV "My bowels boil." ARV "My heart is troubled"; 41 31, "He maketh the deep to boil like a pot"; Ezk 24 5, "make it boil well"); of bā'āh, "to bubble" or "well up" (Isa 64 2 [1, in Heb] "The fire causeth the waters to boil"); in AVm of Ps 45 1 ("My heart is inditing a good matter") we have Heb "boileth" or "bubbleth up" (rāhash, "to boil" or "bubble up," RV text, "My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter").

"Boiling-places," occurs in Ezk 46 23 as the tr of m'bhāshsh'elōth, "hearths," "boiling-places." ARV has "boiling-houses" for "places of them that boil" (Ezk 46 24), "boil well" for "consume" (24 10); ARV has "boiling over" for "unstable" (Gen 49 4; ERVm "bubbling over").

BOLDNESS, bōld'nes (παρρησία, parrēsia, "confidence," "fearlessness," "freedom of speech"): This was one of the results of discipleship (Acts 4 13.29.31; Eph 3 12; Phil 1 20; 1 Tim 3 13; 1 Jn 4 17). It was a necessary qualification for the work assigned them. They were not only subject to violent persecutions, but also were the constant subject of ridicule and contempt. Paul uses the word in the sense of plainness in 2 Cor 3 12. In He 10 19; 1 Jn 2 28; 4 17, it has the sense of freeness resulting from confidence. In Philem ver 8, the reference is to the authority which Paul claims in this case. JACOB W. KAPP

BOLLED, bōld (בִּבְלוֹל, gibh'ol, "the calyx of flowers"): Hence "in bloom," and so rendered, in RV, of flowering flax (Ex 9 31).

BOLSTER, bōl'stēr: Found in AV only in 1 S 19 13.16, "Behold, the tephrahim was in the bed, with the pillow of goat's hair at the head thereof" (AV "for his bolster"), and 26 7.11.12.16, "Saul lay sleeping . . . with his spear stuck in the ground at his head." "Bolster" in these passages in AV was used to translate a Heb word whose true significance is "the place of the head," or "the head-place." It will be noted that it has disappeared from the RV, which rightly has throughout "head," instead of "bolster." See CUSHION.

BOLT, bōlt (נָעַל, nā'al, "to bind up"): The ancient Hebrews had fastenings of wood or iron for the doors of houses (2 S 13 17.18; Cant 5 5), city gates (Neh 3 3.6.13-15), prison doors, etc (Isa 45 2), which were in the form of bolts. These were sometimes pushed back from within; but there were others which, by means of a key, could be unfastened and pushed back from without (Jgs 3 23 ff). These were almost the only form of locks known. See BAR; LOCK.

In Hab 3 5, resheph (a poetic word for "flame") is rendered "fiery bolts" (AV "burning coals"). It seems to denote "the fiery bolts, by which Jeh was imagined to produce pestilence or fever" (Driver, Dt, 367).

BOND. See BAND; BILL; CHAIN.

BONDAGE, bon'dāj: Used in two senses in Scripture, a literal and a metaphorical sense.

(1) In the former sense it refers (a) to the condition of the Hebrews (עֲבָדָה, 'ābhōdāh) in Egypt (Ex 1 14 AV; 2 23 and often) which is frequently called "the house of bondage" ("slaves," עֶבְרִי, 'abhādhīm), Ex 13 3.14; 20 2; Dt 5 6 and often. It also refers to the condition of the Hebrews in Babylonia (Isa 14 3 AV) and in Persia (Ezr 9 8f), where a slightly different form of the same root (עֲבָדִית, 'abhēdhūth) is used in the original. In both these cases the bondage was not so much personal as national. As a rule individuals were not subject to individuals, but the whole Heb people were subject to the Egyp, Bab and the Pers states. They were forced to labor on public works, and otherwise, and were denied their own freedom when the exigencies of state seemed to demand it. The former word 'abhōdhāh is also used in Neh 5 18 as descriptive of the subject and depressed conditions of the Hebrews in Pal during the earlier years after their return from captivity, when they were still living under Pers suzerainty. (b) The word bondage ('abhādhīm) is also used to describe the slavery into which the poor Jews were being forced by their more prosperous brethren in the earlier years under the Persians in Pal (Neh 5 5). Here true personal, though temporary, slavery is meant. (c) Marriage is once referred to as a bondage (1 Cor 7 15) (vb. δουλεύω, doulōō).

(2) It is used in the metaphorical sense only in NT. ἡ δουλεία, hē douleia, "bondage," is the power of physical corruption as against the freedom of life (Rom 8 21), the power of fear as over against the confidence of Christian faith (Rom 8 15; He 2 15), and esp. is it the bondage of the letter, of the elements, of a ceremonial and institutional salvation which must be scrupulously and painfully observed, as contrasted with the freedom of the sons of God, emancipated by faith in Jesus Christ. This bondage is a peculiarly Pauline idea since he was fighting for Christian freedom (Gal 2 4; 4 3.9. 24.25; 5 1). In 2 Pet 2 19 the idea is essentially different. Libertinism, masquerading under the name of freedom, is branded as bondage, in contrast with the true freedom of righteous living. See SLAVERY. WILLIAM JOSEPH MCGLOTHLIN

BONDMAID, bond'mād: Occurs but three times in AV (Lev 19 20; 25 44; Gal 4 22 [RV "handmaid"]). The first instance is that of a Heb girl who has by birth, purchase or otherwise come into temporary slavery. The word here is שִׁפְחָה, shiphkhāh. It occurs often in the OT, but is elsewhere tr^a "maid," "handmaid," "woman servant," "maidservant," etc. The other instance (Lev 25 44) refers to foreign slave girls and has a different word, אִמָּה, 'āmāh, which also occurs a number of times, but is elsewhere tr^a "handmaid," etc. The NT instance (Gal 4 22) refers to Hagar, Abraham's Egyp slave girl. The original word παιδική, paidiskē, occurs several other times, but in AV is elsewhere tr^a "maid," "damsel," etc. It means a slave girl. See SLAVERY.

WILLIAM JOSEPH MCGLOTHLIN
BONDMAN, bond'man: One of the tr^a of the word עֶבְרִי, 'ebhedh, very common in the OT. It refers to the ordinary slave, either foreign (Gen 43 18; 44 9.33; Lev 25 44.46) or Heb (Lev 25 42; 2 K 4 1). Hebrews were forbidden to enslave Hebrews, but did it nevertheless. It also refers to the Israelites in the bondage of Egypt (Dt 15 15, and often), and in the exile of Babylonia (Ezr 9 9). The intended treatment of the men of Judah in Samaria (2 Ch 28 10) was apparently to sell them into ordinary slavery or bondage. The word is used once in the NT (Rev 6 15) to translate δούλος, doulos, where it evidently means a slave in contrast with a freeman. See SLAVERY.

WILLIAM JOSEPH MCGLOTHLIN
BONDSERVANT, bond'sūr-vant: Appears only once in AV (Lev 25 39) where it translates עֶבְרִי,

'ebhedh, "a slave": "Thou shalt not cause him to render the service of a bondservant" or slave. RV frequently uses bondservant (δούλος, doulos) instead of the word "servant" of AV (Jn 8 34.35; 1 Cor 7 21; Gal 4 7). See SLAVERY.

BONE, bōn, BONES (עֵצָה, 'eḡem, עֲצָמִים, 'oḡem; Aram. ܪܝܬܐ, gerem, by extension used for "bony frame," "body," "strength," Ps 35 10; "the whole man"; Lk 24 39, "flesh and bones" = the solid and tangible framework of the body; fig. the substance, the idea of a thing, the thing, per se): Figurative: Very often we find the use of these words in metaphorical phrases, in which a disease or a discomfort of the body denotes certain emotions or mental attitudes. Thus the expression "rotteness of the bones" (Prov 12 4; 14 30) signifies the feelings of a man whose wife causes him shame and confusion, or is equivalent to "envy," "jealousy." The tr of the LXX in these passages by σκώληξ, skōlēx, "worm," and σῆς, sēs, "maggot," "moth," is incorrect. The same phrase is used in Hab 3 16 for utter dejectedness through the anticipation of approaching evil. Similarly the "shaking of the bones" (Job 4 14) is expressive of fear, and denotes dejection and sadness in Jer 23 9. The "burning of the bones" is found as a symptom of Job's disease (Job 30 30), and stands for grief, depression of spirits in Ps 102 3 and Lam 1 13, and also for the feeling of Jeremiah, when he attempted to hold back the Divine message (Jer 20 9), while "dryness of bones" (Prov 17 22) is the opposite of "good health." Other similar expressions of mental distress are the "piercing of the bones" (Job 30 17), the bones are "troubled" (Ps 6 2), "out of joint" (Ps 22 14), "consumed" (Ps 31 10 AV), "wasted away" or "waxed old" (Ps 32 3), "broken" (Ps 51 8; Lam 3 4), "ill at rest" (Ps 38 3), "bone of my bones," etc (Gen 2 23), having the same nature, and the nearest relation (2 S 5 1) and affection (Eph 5 30). In the last-mentioned passage, RV omits "of his flesh, and of his bones" as an interpolation from Gen 2 23. The figs. in Mic 3 2.3 are expressive of the most cruel oppression and murder.

H. L. E. LUERING

BONNET, bon'et: In AV the designation of the special headdress of the rank and file of the priesthood, RV "head-tire" (Ex 28 40). It consisted of a long swath of fine white linen wound around the head in oriental fashion. The Heb word found in Ex 29 9 RV, "to bind head-tires," lit. "to wind head-tires," means, in the light of usage, "to form an egg-shaped turban." Cf Jos, Ant, III, vii, 3; and see Rich, Dict. Rom and Gr Ant, s.v. pileus, for illustration of the egg-shaped cap of Ulysses, with which Jerome compared the priestly turban. See DRESS; MITRE, etc.

LITERATURE

A book is any record of thought in words. It consists of a fixed form of words embodied in some kind of substance. The form of words

1. Definition is the main factor, but it has no existence without the record. The kind of record is indifferent; it may be carved on stone, stamped on clay, written or printed on vellum, papyrus or paper, or only stamped on the mind of author or hearer, if so be it keeps the words in fixed form. Looked on as a form of words the book is called a work, and looked on as a record it is called a volume, document, inscription, etc., as the case may be; but neither volume nor work has any real existence as book save as united.

The Bib. words for book, both Gr and Heb, oscillate in meaning (as they do in all languages) between the two elements, the form of words and the material form. The common words for book in the NT, from which too the word "Bible" comes, refer back to the papyrus plant or the material on which the book is written, just as the Eng. word "book" was long supposed to be derived from the beech tree, on whose bark the book was written. The usual word in the Heb of the OT (sepher) may possibly refer to the act of writing, just as the Gr word grammata and the Eng. "writings" do, but more likely, as its other meanings of "numbering" and "narration" or even "missive" indicate, it refers neither to the material nor to the writing process but to the literary work itself. It suggests at least the fact that the earliest books were, indeed, books of tallies. The knot-books and various notch-book tallies are true books. In the King James' version the "word" (dabhar) is sometimes tr^d book, and, although changed in these places in the RV to "acts" or "deeds," it was nevertheless quite properly tr^d a book, just as the "word" in Gr is used for book, and indeed in Eng. when the Bible is called the Word. Besides these terms commonly tr^d book in the EV, various book forms are referred to in the Bible as roll or volume (which is the same in origin), tablet, and perhaps rock inscription (Job 19 23.24).

The fact that the Bible is a book, or indeed a library of many kinds of books, makes necessary that to approach its study one should have some systematic idea of the nature of the book; the origin of new forms and their survival, oral and manuscript transmission, the nature of the inward book and the various kinds of inward books. Apart from the matter of general archaeological use for historical interpretation, the questions of inspiration, the incarnate, creative, and indwelling word and many other doctrines are wholly bound up with this question of the nature of the book, and many phrases, such as the Book of Life, can hardly be understood without knowing with some degree of clearness what a book is.

The archaeology, text criticism and higher criticism of the past few years have revolutionized book history and theory in their respective fields. Above all the young science of experimental psychology has, in its short life, contributed more even than the others to an understanding of the book and The Book, the word of God and the Word of God, the Bible and Jesus Christ.

Modern experimental psychology by its study of inward images, inward speech, inward writings and other kinds of inward book forms has, in particular, thrown on Bib. inspiration, higher criticism and text criticism and the various aspects of the doctrine of the word, an unexpected light. Inward books, it appears, are not only real, but of many kinds, visual and auditory, oral and written, sensory and motor, and these different kinds have perhaps a material basis and local habitation in different parts of the brain. At least they have real existence; they are real records which preserve a fixed form of words, to be brought out of the recesses of the mind from time to time for re-shaping, re-study or utterance. (See Dittrich, Sprachpsychologie, 1903; LeRoy, Le langage, Paris, 1905; Van Ginneken, Principes de linguistique psychol., 1907; A. Marty, Untersuch. Sprachphilosophie, 1908; Macnamara, Human Speech, 1909; the classical work is Wundt, Völkerpsychologie: Die Sprache, Leipzig, 1900.)

Inward books may be originals or copies. Every book is, to begin with, inward. Men sometimes speak of an autograph as the "original," but it is in fact only a first-hand copy of the original, which is inward, and never by any chance becomes or can become outward. Besides these originals there are also inward copies of the books of others. The fact that a book may be memorized is no new thing, but the analysis of the process is. It seems that a book may be inwardly copied through eye or ear or touch or any sense from some outward book; or again it may be copied back and forth within, from sense copy to motor copy, from visual to oral, auditory to inward writing. In reading aloud the visual image is copied over into oral; in taking dictation the auditory image is copied over into inward writing. Many men, even in reading from print, cannot understand unless they translate as they go into oral images or even move their lips. Many others either hearing or reading a French book, e.g. have to translate inwardly into English and have in the end two memory copies, one French and one English, both of which may be recalled. In whatever way they are recorded, these memory impressions are real copies of outward books, and in the case of tribal medicine men, Vedic priests, the ancient minstrels, village gossips, and professional story-tellers of all kinds, the inward collection of books may become a veritable library.

The end for which a book is created is in general to reach another mind. This means the utterance or copying into some outward material

3. Publication and the re-copying by another into memory. The commonest modes of utterance are oral speech and writing; but there are many others, some appealing to eye, some to ear, some to touch: e.g. gesture language of the Indian and the deaf mute, pressure signs for the blind and deaf, signal codes, drum language, the telegraph click, etc. If the persons to be reached are few, a single oral speech or manuscript may be enough to supply all needs of publication, but if there are very many the speech or writing must somehow be multiplied. This may be done by the author himself. Blind Homer, it is alleged, repeated the Iliad in many cities; and the modern political orator may repeat the same speech several times in the same evening to different audiences. So too the author may, as many Lat writers did, copy out several autographs. If the audience is still too great to be reached by authors' utterances, the aid of heralds, minstrels, scribes and the printing-press must be called in to copy from the autographs or other author's utterances; and in case of need more help yet is called in, copies made from these copies, and copies again, and so on to perhaps hundreds of copyings. This process may be represented as $x+x^1+x^2+x^3+x^n$ where x =an original, x^1 a first-hand copy of author's utterance, x^2 a second-hand copy, x^3 a third-hand, etc.

Books may thus be divided into originals, first-hand or authors' copies and re-copies. Re-copies in turn whether at second-, third-, fourth- or n th-hand, may be either mechanical or personal, according as the copy is direct from outward material to outward material or from the outward material to a human memory.

(1) Mechanical copies include photographic copies of MSS, or of the lips in speaking, or of gesture, or any other form of utterance which may be photographed. They include also phonographic records, telegraph records, and any other mechanical records of sound or other forms of utterance. Besides photographic and phonographic processes, mechanical copies include founding, stamping by seal or die, stereographic, electrotype, stencil, gelatine pad and printing-press processes, any processes, in short, which do not pass via the human mind, but direct from copy to copy by material means. They do not include composition in movable types or by type-setting machines, typewriting machines and the like, which, like writing, require the interposition of a human mind. These mechanical copies are subject to defects of material, but are free from psychological defects and error, and defect of material is practically negligible.

(2) Personal copies include inward copies, or memory books, and the re-uttered copies from these copies, to which latter class belong all copied MSS. The memory copy may be by eye from writing, or from the lips of a speaker in the case of the deaf. Or it may be by ear from oral speech, telegraph key, drum or other sound utterances. Or it may be again from touch, as in the case of finger-tip lip-reading or the reading of raised characters by the blind. Each of these kinds may perhaps be located in a different part of the mind or brain, and its molecular substratum may be as different from other kinds of inward record as a wave of light is different from a wave of sound, or a photograph from the wax roll of a phonograph; but whatever the form or nature, it somehow records a certain fixed form of words which is substantially equivalent to the original. This memory copy, unlike the mechanical copy, is liable to substantial error. This may arise from defects of sense or of the inward processes of record and it is nearly always present. Why this need be so is one of the mysteries of human nature, but that it is, is one of the obvious facts; and when memory copies are re-uttered there is still another crop of errors, "slips of tongue and pen," equally mysterious but equally inevitable. It comes to pass, therefore, that where oral or manuscript transmission exists, there is sure to be a double crop of errors between the successive outward copies. When thus a form of words is frequently re-copied or reprinted via the human mind the resulting book becomes more and more unlike the original as to its form of words, until in the late manuscript copies of early works there may often be thousands of variations from the original. Even an inspired revelation would thus be subject to at least one and perhaps two or three sets of errors from copying before it reached even the autograph stage.

Before the knowledge of handwriting became general, oral publication was usual, and it is still not uncommon. The king's laws and proclamations, the works of poets and historians, and the sacred books were anciently published orally by heralds and minstrels and prophets; and these primitive publishers are survived still by town criers, actors, reciters, and Scripture readers.

Up to the point of the first impression on another mind, oral publication has many advantages. The impression is generally more vivid, and the voice conveys many nice shades of feeling through inflection, stress, and the delicate variations in tone quality which cannot be expressed in writing. When it comes to transmission, however, oral tradition tends to rapid deterioration with each re-copy. It is true that such transmission may be quite exact with enough painstaking and repetition; thus the modern stage affords many examples of actors with large and exact repertoires, and the Vedas were, it is alleged, handed down for cents.

4. Oral Transmission

by a rigidly trained body of memorizers. The memorizing of Confucian books by Chinese students and of the Koran by Moslem students is very exact. Nevertheless exact transmission orally is rare, and exists only under strictly artificial conditions. Ear impressions, to begin with, tend to be less exact than eye impressions, in any event, because they depend on a brief sense impression, while in reading the eye lingers until the matter is understood. Moreover, the memory copy is not fixed and tends to fade away rapidly; unless very rigidly guarded and frequently repeated it soon breaks up its verbal form. This is readily seen by the great variety in the related legends of closely related tribes; and in modern times in the tales of village gossips and after-dinner stories, which soon lose their fixed verbal form, save as to the main point.

There is great difference of opinion as to the part which oral transmission played in the composition of the OT. The prevailing theory of the higher critics of the 19th cent. made this the prime factor of transmission to at earliest the 8th cent. BC, but the recent remarkable revelations of archaeology regarding the use of written documents in Pal at the time of the Exodus and before has changed the situation somewhat. The still more recent developments as to the Sem character of Pal before the invasion of the Israelites, together with the growing evidence of the prevailing use of handwriting all over Pal by not later than the 9th cent., point in the same direction. It is now even asserted (Clay, Amorites) that the Sem wave was from the north rather than the south, in which case the only possible ground for ascribing illiteracy to the Hebrews at the time of the conquest, and therefore exclusive oral tradition, would be removed.

Whatever may be the facts, it may be said with some definiteness that the theory which implies two sets of traditions, handed down for several cents. and retaining a considerable amount of verbal likeness, implies written tradition, not oral, for no popular tradition keeps identical verbal forms for so long a time, and there is little ground for supposing artificial transmission by professional memorizers. The schools of the prophets might, indeed, have served as such, but there is no evidence that they did; and it would have been curious if, writing being within easy reach, this should have been done. As in almost all literatures, it is far more likely that the popular traditions are derived from and refreshed by literary sources, than that lit. was compiled from traditions with long oral transmission.

Bib. references to oral publication are found in the references to heralds (see s.v.), to Solomon's wisdom as "spoken" (1 K 4 32-34), proclamations and edicts, the public reading of the law in the OT, and the reading in the synagogue in the NT. All the oracles, "thus saith the Lord" and "the word of Jeh," to Moses, etc., and all allusions to preaching the word, belong to this class of oral publication and transmission. A direct allusion to oral transmission is found in Ps 44 1, "We have heard with our ears, O God, our fathers have told us."

The distinction of handwriting as against oral utterance lies first in the permanence of the record, but it has also a curious psychological

5. MSS advantage over speech. The latter reaches the mind through hearing one letter at a time as uttered. With writing, on the other hand, the eye grasps three to six letters at a time, and takes in words as wholes instead of spelling them out. The ear always lags, therefore, the eye anticipates, although it may also linger if it needs to. While therefore impressions from hearing may perhaps be deeper, one may gather many more in the same time from reading.

When it comes to transmission, the advantage of handwriting is obvious. In the first place, even the poorest ink hardly fades as rapidly as memory. Then at best few men reach a hundred years, and therefore no memory copy, while on the other hand the limit to the life of writing has never been reached. We have writings that have lasted 6,000 years, at least; while if the Palermo stone, e.g. had been orally transmitted it must needs have passed through some 200 copyists at least, each producing two sets of errors. The advantage of manuscript transmission over oral tradition in its permanence is thus very great. It is true, of course, that in the case of fragile material like papyrus, paper, or even leather, transmission ordinarily implies many re-copyings and corresponding corruption, but even at worst these will be very much better than the best popular oral tradition.

In the broad sense MSS include all kinds of written books without regard to material, form or instruments used. In the narrowest sense they are limited to rolls and codices, i.e. to literary manuscripts. Inscriptions are properly written matter engraved or inscribed on hard material. Documents, whether private letters or official records, are characteristically folded in pliable material. Literary works again are usually rolls or else codices, which latter is the usual form of the printed books as well. These three classes of written books have their corresponding sciences in epigraphy, diplomatics and paleography.

(1) Epigraphy has to do primarily with inscriptions set up for record in public places. These include published laws, inscriptions, biographical memorials like the modern gravestone inscriptions and those on memorial statues, battle monuments and the like. It includes also votive inscriptions, inscriptions on gems, jewels, weights and measures, weapons, utensils, etc. Seals and coins from all points of view belong here and form another division under printing. These have their own sciences in numismatics and sphragistics. The chief Bib. reference is to the "tables of stone" (Ex 24 12). See TABLE; ALPHABET; WEIGHT; WRITING, etc.

(See Lidzbarski, Handb. nordsemit. Epigr., 1898-.)

(2) Sphragistics is the science of seals. Scripture references to the seal or signet (Gen 38 18; Job 38 14; Rev 5 1; etc) are many. See SEAL; SIGNET.

(3) Numismatics has to do with inscriptions on coins and medals, and is becoming one of the greatest sources of our knowledge of ancient history, esp. on account of the aid derived from coins in the matter of dating, and because of the vast quantity of them discovered. See MONEY.

(4) Diplomatics, or the science of documents, has to do with contracts of sale and purchase (Jer 3 8; 32 14), bills of divorce (Dt 24 1) and certificates of all sorts of the nature of those registered in the modern public records. These may be on clay tablets, as in Babylonia and the neighboring regions, or on ostraca as found esp. in Egypt, but everywhere in the ancient Mediterranean world, and notably for Bib. history, in Samaria, as discovered by the Harvard expedition. Multitudes of the Egypt papyri discovered in modern times are of this character as well as the Italian papyri until papyrus was succeeded by vellum. Many are also found on wax, gold, silver, brass, lead tablets, etc. See LETTERS; OSTRACA; PAPYRI.

(5) Paleography has to do with volumes or books of considerable bulk, chiefly. It has, therefore, to do mainly with literary works of all sorts, but it shades into diplomatics when official documents, such as collections of laws (e.g. Deuteronomy), treatises, such as the famous treaty between the Hittites and Egypt, and modern leases are of such bulk as to be best transmitted in volume form. It has to do chiefly with the clay tablets, papyrus, leather, vellum and paper volumes. The clay tablet is mentioned in the OT at various points (see TABLET), the roll in both OT and NT (see ROLL). The leather roll is the traditional form for the Heb Scriptures up to the present day, although the codex or modern volume form had been invented before the conclusion of the NT, and the earliest extant copies are in this form. The books of the OT and NT were all probably first written on rolls. For the different methods of producing these various forms—graving, casting, pressing, pen and ink, etc, see WRITING.

A Reader with a Roll (from a Fresco at Pompeii).

Printing differs from writing chiefly in being executed in two dimensions. In writing, a chisel or brush or pen follows a continuous or interrupted line, while printing stamps a letter or a part of a letter, a line, a page, or many pages at a stroke. The die, the wedge for clay tablets, seals, molds, xylographic plates, as well as the typewriter, movable type or electrotpe plates, etc, belong properly to printing rather than writing. The wedge stamp, or single-letter die, the typewriter, the matrix and movable type form, however, a sort of transition between the pen point and the printing-press in that they follow letter after letter. Coins and seals, on the other hand, differ little from true printing save in the lengths of the writings; Bab seals and the rotary press are one in principle. Sphragistics, or the science of seals, and numismatics, or the science of coins, medals, etc, belong thus with printing from this point of view, but are more commonly and conveniently classed with epigraphy, on the principle that they depend on the light and shade of incision or relief in one color as distinguished from the color contrasts of ink or paint. Printed books include the xylographic process of Chinese and early European printing, page and form printing from movable type, and all electrotpe, stencil, gelatine pad, etc, processes.

The advantage of printing over writing is in the more rapid multiplication of copies, and still more in the accuracy of the copies. The first setting in movable type is as liable to error as any written copy, but all impressions from this are wholly without textual variations. For printed editions of the Bible see TEXT; VERSIONS, etc.

In the natural process of transmission all reprints in movable type, manuscripts or oral repetitions accumulate variations with each re-copying. These are, in general, errors, and the process is one of degeneration. In oral transmission the average error with each generation is very great, and it is only with incredible pains that the best copies are made equal to even the average manuscript, which in turn at its best only equals the first type-set copy. The same expenditure of care on this type-set copy produces thousands of copies in printing where it produces one in manuscript. The phonograph, the typewriter, type-bar composition, photographic and electrotpe methods have reduced the average error in modern books to a very low point. But even after incredible pains on the part of the authors and professional proofreaders, the offered reward of a guinea for each detected error in the Oxford revised version of the Bible brought several errors to light. This version is however about as nearly free from textual error as any large book ever made, and millions of copies of it are now printed wholly without textual variation.

But textual errors are not the only variations. It often happens that the author or someone else undertakes to correct the errors and makes substitutions or additions of one sort or another. The result is a revised edition, which is, in general, an improvement, or evolution upward. Variations are thus of two kinds: involuntary and intentional, corresponding pretty well with the words "copies" and "editions" of a work.

Strictly speaking, every book with intentional changes is a new work, but colloquially it is counted the "same work" until the changes become so great that the resemblance of the form of words to the original is hard to recognize. It is a common thing for a work to be edited and reedited under a certain author's name (Herzog), then become known by the joint name of the author and editor (Herzog-Plitt or Schaff-Herzog), and finally become known under the name of the latest editor (Hauck). In this case it is often described for a time on a title-page as "founded" on its predecessor, but generally the original author's name is dropped from the title-page altogether when no great portions retain the original verbal form. All editions of a work are recognized in common use in some sense as new works; and in the bookshop or library a man is careful to specify the latest ed of Smith, or Brown's ed of Smith, to avoid getting the older and outdated original work.

Sometimes the original work and the additions, corrections, explanations, etc, are kept quite separate and distinct—additional matter being given in MSS in the margins, or between lines, and in printed books as footnotes or in brackets or parentheses. This is commonly the case with the text-and-comment eds of Bib. books and great writers. Sometimes, as often in ancient MSS, it happens in copying that what were marginal and interlinear notes become run in as an undistinguished part of the text and, still more often, what was indicated as quotation in an original work loses its indications and becomes an undistinguished part of the work. In the case of the paraphrase the comment is intentionally run in with the words of the text; and most editors of scientific works likewise make no attempt to distinguish between the original matter and additions by another hand, the whole responsibility being thrown forward on the editor. Sometimes the original work itself to begin with is largely made up of quotation, or is a mere compilation or collection of works in which the "originality" is confined to title-page or preface or even a mere title, as in the case of the OT, the NT, and the Bible, and the order of arrangement of parts.

Almost all books are thus composite. Even in a manuscript copy of a manuscript, or an oral repetition of an oral tale, two human minds have contributed to the net result, and the work of each may perhaps be distinguished from that of the other. In the case of a new ed by the same author, the result is still composite—a new work composed of old and new material. With all new eds by other authors the compositeness increases until, e.g. an ed of the Bible with textual variants and select comments from various writers becomes the combined work of thousands of writers, each distinguished as to his work from all the rest by his name or some symbol.

The work proper or work unchanged, save for involuntary error, includes thus copies, trs, abridgments, selections and quotations; the revised work or work with voluntary changes includes eds and paraphrases (which are simply texts with commentary run into the text), digests, redactions, etc., and perhaps compilations.

These two kinds of variations give rise to the two sciences of text-criticism and higher or historical criticism. The former distinguishes all accidental errors of transmission, the latter all the voluntary changes; the former aims to reconstruct the original, the latter to separate in any given book between the work of the original and each editor.

In this connection it must not be forgotten that the original itself may be a composite work—containing long quotations, made up wholly of selections or even made up of whole works bound together by a mere title. In these cases textual criticism restores not the original of each, but the original text of the whole, while higher criticism takes up the task of separating out the elements first of later eds and redactions of this original, then of the original itself.

The involuntary variations of MSS or oral tradition give rise to the science of text-criticism. The point of the science is to reconstruct exactly the original form of words or text. Formerly the method for this was a mere balancing of probabilities, but since Tregelles it has become a rigid logical process which traces copies to their near ancestors, and these in turn farther back, until a genealogical tree has been formed of actual descent. The law of this is in effect that "like variations point to a common ancestor," the biological law of "homology," and if the groupings reveal as many as three independent lines of copies from the original, the correct text can be constructed with mathematical precision, since the readings of two lines will always be right against the third—granting a very small margin of error in the psychological tendency of habit in a scribe to repeat the same error. The method proceeds (1) to describe all variations of each MS (or equally of each oral or printed copy) from the standard text; (2) to group the MSS which have the most pronounced variations; (3) to unite these groups on the principle of homology into larger and larger groups until authors' utterances have been reached and through these the inward original. The results are expressed in a text and variants—the text being a corrected copy of the original, and the variants showing the exact contribution of each copyist to the MSS which he produced.

It is carefully to be remembered that text-criticism proper has only to do with a particular form of words. Every tr or ed is a separate problem complete in itself when the very words used by translator and the editor have been reconstructed. These may in turn be useful in reconstructing the original, but care must be had not to amend, tr or ed from the original, and the original in turn, when it contains quotations from other writers, must not be amended from the originals of these writers.

The task of textual criticism is to set forth each man's words—each original author, each copyist, each translator, each editor, just as his words were—no more and no less. (See TEXT OF OT; TEXT OF NT.)

Higher criticism has to do with voluntary variations or variations in subject-matter. Like text-criticism it has to do with distinguishing the share of each of several coöperators in a composite work; and like it higher criticism traces the contributions of various authors each to its source. It differs, however, in dealing with original matter. While the variations by officious scribes, or intelligent scribes who correct spelling, grammar, wrong dates and the like, come pretty closely into the region of editing, and on the other hand the redactor is sometimes little more than an officious copyist, still the line of involuntary and voluntary change holds good, whether it be the grafting into an original work by the author of many quotations, or the grafting onto the work by others of the work of themselves or of other authors. It is not the business of the textual critic to separate out either of these (it is expressly his business not to), although his work may greatly help and even furnish results which can be used automatically. The whole of this double field of composite authorship belongs to higher criticism.

In the case of most modern works the task of the higher critic is a simple one. Quotation marks, a growing ethical feeling against plagiarism, the mechanical conveniences of typographical display, and the like, all contribute to a careful separation of the work of each contributor. Nevertheless, in many cases as, for example, in the editing of textbooks and newspapers, this is not regarded. While the signed article in the encyclopaedia is now nearly universal, the signed review more and more common, the signed editorial is still rare, and the others by no means universal. It is still a matter of interest to many to pick out by his "style" the author of an unsigned article, review or editorial—which is higher criticism.

In ancient lit., where there were few such mechanical conveniences in discriminating, and little or no conscience had been developed about incorporating anything which suited the purpose of the writer in part or as a whole, the result was often a complete patchwork of verbal forms of many writers. The task of higher criticism is to sort out the original and each of its literary variants, and to trace these variants to their originals. The net result in the case of any work does not differ much from an ordinary modern work with quotation marks and footnotes referring to the sources of the quotations. It restores, so to speak, the punctuation and footnotes which the author omitted or later copyists lost. It includes many nice questions of discrimination through style and the historical connection of the fragments with the works from which they were taken; and after these have been analyzed out, many nice questions also of tracing their authorship or at least the time, place and environment of their composition. It includes thus the questions of superhuman authorship and inspiration.

Literary criticism has to do with originals as originals, or, in composite works, the original parts of originals. An original work may include quotations from others or be mainly quotations, and its "originality" consists in part in the way these quotations are introduced and used. By "original," however, is meant in the main new verbal forms. The original work must not plagiarize nor even use stereotyped phrases, although it may introduce proverbs or idiomatic phrases. In general, however, originality means that literary food has been digested—reduced to its chemical elements of word or briefest phrase and rebuilt into a wholly new structure in the mind. The building in of old doorways and ornaments may be a part of the literary architect's originality, but they themselves were not "original" with him.

The literary critic has thus to do with a man's originality—the contribution that he has made to the subject, the peculiar quality of this in its fitness to influence other minds which is effected by the "reaction of the whole personality," all his learning and emotion experience, on every part of his material—what in short we call style. This involves a judgment or comparison with all other works on the same subject as to its contribution of new matter and its readability.

The chief problems of book science may be described in the words of biological science as (1) the origin of new forms, (2) survival.

11. Origin of New Forms

The question of the origin of a new literary work and its survival is so like that of the origin of a new species and its survival that it may be regarded less as analogy than as falling under the same laws of variations, multiplication, heredity and natural selection. The origin of variant forms of the same original through involuntary and voluntary changes has been traced above up to the point where editorial variants overwhelm the original and a new author's name takes the place of the old. After this step has been taken it is a new work, and at bottom the origin of all new works is much the same. The process is most clearly seen in treatises of some branch of science, say physics. A general treatise, say on Heat, is published, giving the state of knowledge on the subject at that time. Then monographs begin to be produced. The monograph may and generally does include, in bibliographical or historical outline, the substance of previous works, and in every event it implies the previous total. The point of the monograph itself is, however, not the summary of common knowledge but the contribution that it makes, or, in the language of natural science, the "useful variant" of the subject which it produces. After some accumulation of these monographs, or useful variants of previous treatises, some author gathers them together and unites them with previous treatises into a new general treatise or textbook, which is in effect the latest previous treatise with all variants developed in the meantime.

In either case a permanent new form has been produced—the old common knowledge with a difference, and the process goes on again: the new work is multiplied by publication into many like individuals; these like individuals develop each its variations; the variations in the same direction unite in some new accepted fact, idea or law, expressed in a monograph; common knowledge with this new variation forms a new general work which again is multiplied, and so on.

And what is true of scientific monographs is just as true in substance of literature, of oral tradition and of the whole history of ideas. It is the perpetual putting together of variations experienced two or more times by one individual or one or more times each by two or more individuals, with the common body of our ideas, and producing thus a new fixed form. Popular proverbs, for example, and all poetry, fiction and the like, come thus to sum up a long human experience.

And carrying the matter still farther back, what is true of the scientific book and of poetry and of folk-literature, is true also of the inward evolution of every thought, even those phrased for conversation or indeed for self-communion—it is the result of a series of variations and integrations. The workings of the scientist's mind in producing a contribution and the workings of the farmer's mind in evolving a shrewd maxim, are alike the result of a long series of these observations, variations and integrations. Repeated observations and the union of observations which vary in the same direction is the history of the thought process all the way along from the simplest perception of the infant, up through the ordinary thinking of the average man, to the most complex concept of the philosopher.

Through all the processes of inward thought and outward expression thus the same process of evolution in the production of a new form holds good: it is the synthesis of all works on a given subject (i.e. any more or less narrow field of reality), the multiplication of this synthetic work, the development of new variations in it and the reunion again of all these variations in a more comprehensive work.

When it comes to the matter of the survival of a new work when it has been produced, the problem is a double one: (1) the survival of

12. Survival the individual book, and (2) the survival of the work, i.e. any copy of the original whose text does not vary so far that it may not be recognized as the "same" work. The original book is in a man's mind and survives only so long as its author survives. In the same sense that the author dies, the individual book dies. No new book, therefore, survives its author. If, however, by survival is meant the existence of any copy, or copy of a copy of this original, containing much (but never quite) the same form of words, then the book survives in this world, in the same sense that the author survives, i.e. in its descendants; it is the difference between personal immortality and race immortality. At the same time, however, the survival of species depends on the individual. A work or a species is no metaphysical reality, but a sum total of individuals with, of course, their relations to one another.

On the average, the chance of long survival for any individual copy of a book is small. Every new book enters into a struggle for existence; wind and weather, wear and tear conspire to destroy it. On the whole they succeed sooner or later. Some books live longer than others, but however durable the material, and however carefully treated they may be, an autograph rarely lasts a thousand years. If survival depended on permanence of the individual, there would be no Bible and no classics.

The average chance of an individual book for long life depends (1) on the intrinsic durability of its material, or its ability to resist hostile environment, (2) on isolation.

The enemies to which books are exposed are various: wind, fire, moisture, mold, human negligence and vandalism, and human use. Some materials are naturally more durable than others. Stone and metal inscriptions survive better than wood or clay, vellum than papyrus or paper.

On the other hand, however, if isolated or protected from hostile environment, very fragile material may outlast more substantial. Papyrus has survived in the mounds of Egypt, and unbaked clay tablets in the mounds of Babylonia, while millions of stone and metal inscriptions written thousands of years later have already perished. Here the factor of isolation comes in. Fire and pillage, moth and rust and the bookworm destroy for the most part without respect of persons. It is only those books which are out of the way of destructive agencies which survive. An unbaked tablet which has survived 5,000 years under rubbish may crumble to dust in 5 years after it has been dug up and exposed to the air. This isolation may be accidental or "natural," as when tablets and papyrus are preserved under ruins, but it may also be artificial and the result of human care. A third factor of survival is therefore the ability of a work to procure for itself human protection, or artificial isolation. In brief this ability is the "value" of a book to its owner. This value may lie in the material, artistic excellence, association or rarity. Any variation in the direction of value which may be expressed financially tends to preserve. In fire or shipwreck, these are the ones saved, in pillage the ones spared. They are the ones for whom fire-proof buildings and special guardians are provided. An exception to this rule is when the material is more valuable for other than book purposes. In times of war the book engraved on gold or lead or paper may be melted down for coin or bullets or torn up for cartridges, while stone and vellum books are spared. The general law is, however, that value tends to preserve, and it has been remarked that all the oldest codices which have survived in free environment are sumptuous copies.

Literary value on the other hand is, on the whole, a factor of destruction for the individual rather than of survival. The better a book is the more it is read, and the more it is read, the faster it wears out. The worthless book on the top shelf outlasts all the rest. In cases of fire or shipwreck an owner will save books which cannot be replaced and the books most easily replaced are those with literary value. A man will sometimes save his favorite books, and does treat them often with a certain reverent care, which tends to preservation but, on the whole, literary value tends to destruction.

When it comes to the survival of the work or race survival, matters are reversed. Literary value is the prime factor. It is the ability of a book to get itself multiplied or re-copied which counts—the quality, whatever it may be, which tends to make a man wish to replace his copy when it is worn out, and to make many men wish to read the work.

This literary interest operates first to produce a large number of copies in order to meet the demand, each of which copies has its chance of survival. It operates also by inducing men to use the very best material, paper, ink, binding, etc., which results in giving each individual book a longer time to produce a new copy.

The modern newspaper published in a million copies is ephemeral, in the first place, because it is printed upon paper which cannot last, save in very favorable conditions of isolation, for more than forty or fifty years. In the second place, it is very rarely reprinted save for an occasional memorial copy. Books like the Bible or Virgil, Dante or Shakespeare, on the other hand, are reprinted in multitudes of editions and in many instances in the most permanent material that art can devise.

It often happens that a book is popular for a short time, but will not survive a changed environment. The newspaper is popular for a few hours, but the time environment changes and interest is gone. It sometimes happens that a book is very popular in one country and wholly fails to interest in another. Millions of copies of Uncle Tom's Cabin and Ben Hur were required to fill the demand of one generation where a few hundreds may suffice for the next.

All the time popular taste, which is only another name for average human experience, is judging a book. A book survives because it is popular—not necessarily because it is popular with the uneducated majority, but because it appeals continually to the average human experience of some considerable class, good or bad. Survival is, therefore, natural. Skilled critics help popular judgment, and select lists aid, but in the long run the test is simply of its correspondence with human experience; in short, it is because men "like" it that a book survives.

There is thus going on all the time a process of struggle and "natural selection" which in the end is a survival of the fittest in the true evolutionary sense, i.e. books survive because fitted to their environment of human experience or taste. There grows up, therefore, continually in every country a certain class of books which are counted classics. These are those which have survived their tests, and are being still further tested. Some have been tested from remote antiquity, and it is the books which survive the test of many periods of time, many kinds of geographical environment, and many varieties of intellectual environment, i.e. which appeal to many classes of readers, which are the true classics and which, on the other hand, show that they do correspond with the fundamental facts of human experience, simply because they have survived. In general it is the religious books which have survived in all nations, and the only books which have been tested in all lands and ages and appeal to Oriental and Western, ancient and modern alike, are those of the Christian Bible.

It has been noticed above that the process of forming a new work is the bringing together of all works on the same subject in order

13. Book to unite all their variations in the new Collections work. It is for this purpose that every student brings together the working library on his specialty; it is what the librarian does when he brings together all the books on a subject for the use of students. Every man who reads up on a subject is performing the same task for himself, and likewise every man who does general reading.

There are few libraries, however, which attempt to get together all the books on a subject. Most libraries are select libraries containing the best books on the subject: by this is meant all books which have anything new or in short have a useful variation. This is an artificial process of the critical human mind, but in humanity in general it is going on all the time as a natural process. Men are perpetually at work choosing their "five-foot shelves," the collections of the very "best of best books." The reason for this lies in the fact that the average human mind can read and hold only a limited number of books; an unconscious process is all the time going on tending to pick out the small number of books which on the whole contain the greatest amount of human experience to the average page. The mass of world's books, however enormous, is thus boiled down by a natural selection to a few books, which contain the essence of all the rest. The process tends to go on in every country and every language. The most universal example is the Bible, which represents a long process of natural selection through many periods of time and considerable variety of geographical influence. It unites the quintessence of Sem ideas with the corresponding quintessence of Indo-European ideas, each embodied in a correspondingly perfect language—for language itself is in the last analysis the quintessence of the experience of any people in its likeness and unlikeness to other peoples. It is therefore by the mere fact of "survival" and "natural selection" proved to be the "fittest" to survive, i.e. that which corresponds most nearly to universal human experience. Councils do not form the canon of Scripture: they simply set a seal upon a natural process. The Bible is thus the climax of evolution among books as man is among animals. It is as unique among books as man is unique among all living things. See LIBRARIES.

The history of books begins at least with the history of writing. Some of the pictures on the cave walls of the neolithic age (Déchelette, Man: Archaeol., Prehist. [1908], 201-37) seem to have the essential characteristics of books and certainly the earliest clay tablets and inscriptions do. These seem to carry back with certainty to at least 4,200 years BC. By a thousand years later, tablet books and inscriptions were common and papyrus books seem to have been well begun. Another thousand years, or some time before Hammurabi, books of many sorts were numerous. At the time of Abraham, books were common all over Egypt, Babylonia, Pal, and the eastern Mediterranean as far at least as Crete and Asia Minor. In the time of Moses, whenever that may have been, the alphabet had perhaps been invented, books were common among all priestly and official classes, not only in Babylonia, Assyria and Egypt, but at least in two or three scores of places in Pal, north Syria and Cyprus. In the time of David not only was historical, official and religious lit. common in Egypt and Assyria, but poetry and fiction had been a good deal developed in the countries round about Pal; and very soon after, if not long before, as the Moabitic, Siloam, Zkr, Jenirli, Baal-Lebanon, Gezer and Samaritan inscriptions show, Sem writing was common all over Pal and its neighborhood.

LITERATURE.—Articles by Dziatzko on "Buch" and "Bibliothek." in Pauly-Wissowa, Real-encyclopädie d. class. Altertumsu., V, 5, and his Antikes Buchwesen, Leipzig, 1900, are mines of material, and the bibliographical reference thorough. The rapid developments in the history of most ancient books may be followed in Hortschansky's admirable annual volume, Bibliographie des Bibliotheken- und Buchwesens, Leipzig, 1904 ff. For a first orientation the little book of O. Wiese, Schrift und Buchwesen in alter u. neuer Zeit (3d ed, Leipzig, 1910), or in English, the respective articles in the Encyclopaedia Britannica, are perhaps best. On the scientific side the best introductions are Vol I of Iwan Müller's Handb. d. klass. Altertumsu. and T. Birt's D. antike Buchwesen (Berlin, 1882). For Bib. aspects of the Book, the best of all, and very adequate indeed, is the long article of E. von Dobschütz on the "Bible in the Church" in the Hastings' Encyclopaedia of Religion, II, 579-615, and esp. on account of the bibliographical apparatus at the end of each section. These little bibliographies give a complete apparatus on many of the above subjects. Paragraphs with bibliographies on others of above topics will be found in the W. Sanday article on "Bible," just preceding.

BOOK OF LIFE (סֵפֶר חַיִּים, ṣēpher ḥayyim; ἡ βιβλος τῆς ζωῆς, hē biblos tēs zōēs, "book of life"): The phrase is derived from the custom of the ancients of keeping genealogical records (Neh 7 5,64; 12 22,23) and of enrolling citizens for various purposes (Jer 22 30; Ezk 13 9). So God is represented as having a record of all who are under His special care and guardianship. To be blotted out of the Book of Life is to be cut off from God's favor, to suffer an untimely death, as when Moses pleads that he be blotted out of God's book—that he might die, rather than that Israel should be destroyed (Ex 32 32; Ps 69 28). In the NT it is the record of the righteous who are to inherit eternal life (Phil 4 3; Rev 3 5; 13 8; 17 8; 21 27). In the apocalyptic writings there is the conception of a book or of books, that are in God's keeping, and upon which the final judgment is to be based (Dnl 7 10; 12 1; Rev 20 12,15; cf Bk Jub 39 6; 19 9). See APOCALYPSE; BLOT; BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE; JUDGMENT, LAST. L. KAISER

BOOK OF NOAH. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE.

BOOK OF REMEMBRANCE, rē-mem'brans (סֵפֶר זִכְרוֹן, ṣēpher zikkārōn, "book of record"): Is related in meaning to the "Book of Life." It refers to a list of the righteous, recorded in a book that lies before God (Mal 3 16; cf Dnl 7 10). See BOOK OF LIFE.

BOOKS OF ADAM. See APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE; ADAM, BOOKS OF.

BOOT, bōot (בּוֹט, ṣē'ōn; AV battle; ARV "armor"; ARVm 'boot'): The word ṣē'ōn, found only in Isa 9 5 (He 9 4), is probably a loanword from the Assyrian ṣēnu, meaning "shoe," "sandal." The root has the same meaning in Aram. and Ethiopic. The passage should be tr'd "every boot of the booted warrior."

BOOTH, bōoth, bōoth: The Heb word ṣukkāh (rendered in the AV "booth" or "booths," eleven times; "tabernacle" or "tabernacles," ten times; "pavilion" or "pavilions," five times; "cottage" once) means a hut made of wattled twigs or branches (Lev 23 42; Neh 8 15). In countries where trees are abundant such wattled structures are common as temporary buildings as they can be constructed in a very short time. Cattle were probably housed in them (Gen 33 17). Such hurriedly-made huts were used by soldiers (2 S 11 11; 1 K 20 12) and by harvesters—hence the name feast of "booths" or "tabernacles" (see TABERNACLES, FEAST OF). Job (27 18) uses booth (|| moth's house) as a symbol of impermanence. Similar huts were erected in vineyards, etc, to protect them from robbers and beasts of prey. The isolated condition of Jerus in the time of the prophet Isaiah is compared to a "booth in a vineyard" (Isa 1 8). T. LEWIS

BOOTHS, FEAST OF. See FEASTS AND FASTS, I, 2.

BOOTY, bōot'i (בָּזַז and בָּזָז, bāz, baz): "Booty" is the tr of bāz or baz, usually rendered "prey" and "spoil" (Jer 49 32); of malḳō'ah, "prey," "booty" (Nu 31 32, "the booty—the rest of the prey," RV "the prey, over and above the booty," bāz); of mēshīṣṣāh, "spoil" (Hab 2 7; Zeph 1 13; RV "spoil"); of ōphēleia, "gain" (2 Macc 8 20). "Booty" respects what is of personal service to the captor; spoils whatever serves to designate his triumph; prey includes whatever gratifies the appetite and is to be consumed" (Crabb, English Synonymes). Persons (for slaves, etc) might be part of the booty. See also SPOIL. W. L. WALKER

BOOZ, bō'oz (TR, Boóζ, Boóz; WH, Boés, Boés): AV, Gr form of Boaz (thus RV) (Mt 1 5; Lk 3 32).

BOR-ASHAN, bōr-ash'an: A correction of the MT in ARV in 1 S 30 30 for AV "Chor-ashan" and ERV "Cor-ashan." Probably the same as ASHAN (Josh 15 42; 1 Ch 4 32; 6 59), which see.

BORDER, bōr'dēr, BORDERS: Indicating in both sing. and pl. the outlines or territory of a country. In the sense of "limits," "boundaries" or "territory," it occurs as a tr of גְּבֻלָּה, ḡbhūlāh (and its fem. גְּבֻלָּה, ḡbhūlāh, in Ps 74 17) in numerous passages in OT, esp. in Josh. רֶכֶּחָה, yē'ekhāh="the flank," "the side," "the coast," hence "the border" occurs in Gen 49 13; קֶצֶה, kā'eh="an extremity," "brim," "brink," "edge" (Ex 16 35; 19 12; Josh 4 19); מִסְגֵּרֶת, misgereth =something inclosing, i.e. "a margin" (Ex 37 12,14;

1 K 7 28 f.31 f.35 f AV; 2 K 16 17 AV); שֵׁפָה or שֵׁפָה, sāphāh, or sepheth="the lip" (as a natural boundary) hence "a margin," "brim," "brink," "edge" (Ex 28 26; 39 19 AV); קֶעַץ, kēc="an extremity," "end" (2 K 19 23 AV); תֹּצֵאת, tōcā'āh="exit," hence "boundary" (1 Ch 5 16); תֹּר, tōr="a succession," "a string," "row," hence "border" (Cant 1 11 AV); יָד, yād="hand," used in a great variety of applications, both lit. and fig., proximate and remote; but how it should be tr'd with "border" in 1 Ch 7 29 is not clear; better would be: "in the hands of the children of Manasseh." Three Gr words occur for the idea: κράσπεdon, krāspedon="a margin," "fringe" (Mt 23 5; Mk 6 56; Lk 8 44); ὄριον, hōrion="a limit," "a boundary line" (Mt 4 13); μεθόριος, methōrios="contiguous" (neuter pl. as noun, "frontier," "border" in Mk 7 24).

FRANK E. HIRSCH

BORDERER, bor'dēr-ēr (παράκειμένους, parakeimēnous): One who dwells on the borders or confines of a country. Only in 2 Macc 9 25, "The princes that are borderers and neighbors unto my kingdom."

BORE, bōr: According to the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20 20—23 33) a slave whom his master had purchased was to be released after six years. Should he choose to remain in his master's service a religious ceremony was necessary to ratify his decision. "Then his master shall bring him unto God" (better than "unto the judges" of the AV), "and shall bring him to the door, or unto the doorpost; and his master shall bore his ear through with an awl" (Ex 21 6). It is highly improbable that "unto God" means "to a sanctuary"; for there was no special reason for performing this ceremony near the door of a sanctuary. On the other hand the entrance to a private house was a sacred spot. According to primitive thinking near the door dwelt the household gods whose function it was to guard the house and its occupants, e.g. against the entry of disease. It was natural that the ceremony of attaching the slave permanently to the master's household should be performed in the presence of the household gods. "The boring of the ear of slaves was a common practice in antiquity, possibly to symbolize the duty of obedience, as the ear was the organ of hearing" (Bennett). The Deuteronomist (Dt 15 17) rejects the religious aspect of the ceremony—probably as a relic of Can. religion—and looks upon it as a secular and symbolical operation. According to his view, the awl was thrust through the ear of the slave to the door. The slave in question was permanently attached to the household. T. LEWIS

BORITH, bō'rith: Mentioned in the genealogical table which traces the descent of Esdras (Ezra) from Aaron (2 Esd 1 2). In 1 Esd 8 2, his name appears as BOCCAS (q.v.), and in 1 Ch 6 5.51; Ezr 7 4, BUKKI (q.v.).

BORROWING, bor'ō-ing:

(1) In the OT period loans were not of a commercial nature, i.e. they were not granted to enable a man to start or run a business. They were really a form of charity, and were made by the lender only to meet the pressure of poverty. To the borrower they were esteemed a form of misfortune (Dt 28 12 f), and by the lender a form of beneficence. Hence the tone of the Mosaic legislation on the subject.

(2) Laying interest upon the poor of Israel was forbidden in all the codes (see Ex 22 25 [JE]; Dt 23 19; Lev 25 36 H), because it was looked upon as making unwarranted profit out of a brother's distress: "If thou lend money to any of my people with thee that is poor, thou shalt not be to him as a creditor; neither shall ye lay upon him interest . . . and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious."

(3) The Law, however, allowed interest to be taken of a foreigner, or non-Jew (Dt 23 20: "Unto a foreigner thou mayest lend upon interest"; cf Dt 15 3); and even among Jews pledges were allowed under limitations, or taken against the law (Dt 24 10; cf Job 24 2.3: "There are that remove the landmarks . . . they take the widow's ox for a pledge"). In Dt 15 1 ff there is a remarkable law providing a "release" by the creditor every "seven years," a "letting drop of loans" (see Driver in loc.). In Ex 3 22, AV "shall borrow" is rendered "shall ask" in RV.

BOSCATH, bos'kath. See BOZKATH.

BOSOM, bōz'um: In the ordinary signification of the anterior upper portion of the trunk of the body, חֵיק, חֵיק, hōk or hēk, "inlet," "lap" (Ex 4 6.7; Nu 11 12; Dt 13 6; 28 54.56; Ruth 4 16; Ps 74 11; Isa 65 6.7; Lam 2 12). "A present in the bosom" (Prov 21 14): bribes carried ready for use in the fold of the robe. חֶזֶן, hēzen="bosom" (with special reference to that portion of the body which is between the arms), occurs in Ps 129 7; חֶבֶן, hōbh="a cherisher," hence "the bosom" (Job 31 33); צֶלְהָת, callath=something advanced or deep, "a bowl"; fig. "the bosom" (Prov 19 24 AV; 26 15 AV). The Gr employs κόλπος, kōlpos (Lk 6 38; Jn 13 23). For Abraham's bosom, see separate art.

Figurative: In a fig. sense it denotes intimacy and unrestrained intercourse (Gen 16 5; 2 S 12 8); tender care and watchfulness (Isa 40 11); closest intimacy and most perfect knowledge (Jn 1 18); "into their bosom" (Ps 79 12) indicates the bosom as the seat of thought and reflection.

BOSOR, bō'sor (Βοσόρ, Bosór):

(1) A city named among those taken by Judas Maccabaeus "in the land of Gilead" (1 Macc 5 26.36). From the towns named it is evident that this phrase is elastic, covering territory beyond what is usually called the land of Gilead. Possibly therefore Bosor may be identical with Buṣr el-Hariri, in the Luhf, S.E. of el-Lejā'.

(2) In 2 Pet 2 15 AV, the Gr form of BEOR (q.v.).

BOSORA, bos'ō-ra (Βοσorpā, Bosorā): One of the strong cities of Gilead taken by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 5 26.28). It is identical with the Rom Bostra, the city whose extensive ruins lie on the S.E. border of the Haurān, on the old Rom road that runs between Der'ah and Ṣalkhad. The modern name is Bosra eski-Shām. It cannot be identified with BOZRAH either (1) or (2), as it lies much too far north. It appears for the first time in history in the passage noted above. The ruins show it to have been a place of great strength and importance. In the time of Herod the Great it was in the hands of the Nabataeans. When Aulus Cornelius Palma conquered these regions, Bostra was made capital of the province under the name of Nova Trajana Bostra, in honor of the emperor Trajan. This was in 105 AD, from which year the Bostrian era was reckoned. It was taken by the Moslems under Khalid—"the sword of God." It resisted the attack of Baldwin III. Later it fell on evil days. Now, if it be true, as the proverb says, that "the prosperity of Bosra is the prosperity of the Haurān," the case of the latter is sad indeed.

BOTANY, bot'a-ni: On account of the great diversity in the climatic and topographical conditions Pal is peculiarly rich in the variety of its flora—the best authority, Post, distinguishes 3,500 species. The land as a whole belongs to the botanical area known as the "Mediterranean region," a region characterized climatically by very dry, hot summers and fairly mild winters. Plants here grow in spring, rest in the hot, dry season and grow again in autumn; the long-continued, scorching sunlight and the absence of water for five or six months at a time, lead to the destruction of vast quantities of seeds and young plants imported by various natural means and by human agency. Among these xerophile or drought-resisting plants, some of the most characteristic features are a thick, leathery rind admitting of little transpiration, e.g. cactus, stonecrops, etc., and the presence of bulbs, rigid stalks, or fleshy leaves, of which the flora of Pal abounds with examples. Equally characteristic are dry, much-branched spiny trees or shrubs with scanty foliage and small leaves, such as the acacias and the thorny burnet. In connection with this last, it may be mentioned that, next to the strong sunlight and drought, the great enemy of vegetation over a great part of the "Mediterranean region"—emphatically so in Pal—is the goat. He is one of the most destructive of animals, and as he has for long ages been allowed to graze freely all over the hillsides, it is not wonderful that in many spots it is only plants like the thorny burnet with its powerful spines which have survived.

1. General Characteristics of Palestinian Flora

The common plants of Pal will be referred to in order shortly, but among those esp. characteristic of the whole region are the olive and the fig, the ilex oak and the bay laurel, the arbutus and the sumach.

A number of trees and shrubs which have been imported into this region within comparatively recent times have become so acclimatized as to be today among the most noticeable plants. Prominent among these is the well-known Opuntia or prickly pear, an introduction from the continent of America; so characteristic is this of modern Pal scenery that it is a common feature in pictures by artists who have painted Scripture scenes in the Holy Land. The common variety, Opuntia ficus-Indica with its innumerable sharp prickles makes impenetrable hedges round many of the village gardens, while the Opuntia cochinillifera, cultivated specially round Nablús and introduced from tropical America with the cochineal insect, is almost unarmed. The American aloe (Argave Americana)—quite a different plant be it noted from either the ALÖES (which see) of the Bible or the well-known medicinal aloes—has established itself in many parts as a garden ornament and will doubtless in time become thoroughly indigenous. More important and more recent of introduction is the group of eucalypti or gum trees, of which some half-dozen varieties have been imported. As is well known, they all come from Australia, where they flourish in climatic conditions somewhat similar to those of the Mediterranean region. Seeds of eucalypti were first introduced into Europe in 1854, having been sent from Melbourne to Paris, and from that center they have found their way to all parts. The most common variety is the Eucalyptus globulus which is now to be found everywhere in the Mediterranean region. It was introduced into Pal through the late Baron E. de Rothschild of Paris, and great plantations of it have been made specially in the neighborhood of the Jewish colonies. In the marshy plains between Sammarin and Caesarea over a million have been planted, and here, and also on the marshy shores of Lake Hüle, this tree has attained magnificent proportions. Many specimens will be found with trunks two or three feet in circumference and of a height of upward of 100 feet. This size is nothing for a eucalyptus, many of these trees attaining in their native habitat a height of 300, or even 400 ft., but time is required, and it may be that eventually many of the eucalypti of the Holy Land will also acquire giant proportions. That this group of trees has come to stay is evident. Not only in small forests such as those mentioned, but also in isolated groups all over the land they may be found. Their quick growth, fresh, evergreen foliage and their reputed health-giving properties account for their wide cultivation. Concerning this last it may be said that the virtues of the eucalyptus as a prophylactic against malaria have been much exaggerated. The most malignant cases of malaria may sometimes be found in houses shaded by eucalyptus boughs, and the Anopheles, or malarial-bearing mosquito, in such situations will be found swarming among its leaves. Probably the beneficial action of the eucalyptus is simply one of drying up marshy lands by absorbing great quantities of water into its deep-running roots.

2. Plants Introduced Since Bible Times

Other trees which have been recently introduced but now flourish even better than the indigenous trees are the locust tree (Robinia pseudo-acacia), from America, the "Pride of India" (Melia Azedaracht) called in Arab. zinzilukt, a stranger from India, very extensively grown, the so-called "Spanish pepper tree" (Schinus molle), the Casuarina stricta from Australia, the very common ailanthus (A. glandulosus), a native of China, and many others. Of fruit trees the apricot, mulberry, orange, citron, lemon and prickly pear have all been introduced into Syria within historic times; as have almost all the best varieties of the indigenous fruits.

A question of great interest to Bible students is, How far has the fertility of the land altered in historic times? Two facts are important in answering this:

3. Fertility and Climate

(1) The general features of the climate have been the same since the days of the patriarchs, probably since the dawn of history. We may gather this from the many Bib. references to the seasonal rain (Lev 26 4)—the "early" and the "latter" (e.g. Dt 11 14; Jer 5 24; Hos 6 3); to the frequent droughts (e.g. 1 K 17; Am 4 6,7); to the grateful mention of the "dew" (Dt 32 2; 2 S 1 21; 17 12; Mic 5 7, etc.); to the repeated mention of the most characteristic products of modern Pal—the olive and fig, the vine and almond, the oak and the terebinth. It is further confirmed by the presence everywhere of the ruins of ancient terraces on the hillsides and of the "broken cisterns" which are found at every site where once cultivation flourished.

(2) It is undeniable that the destruction of forest and thicket all over the land has been immense during the past fifty years. The increasing demands for fires by resident Europeans and the development of steam mills, the result of European enterprise, are largely responsible. The firewood brought to Jerus comes from ever-increasing distances, as the wood in the neighborhood is consumed, and the destruction has been increasingly ruthless. First the branches are cut, then the trunks are leveled, and finally the very roots are dug out of the soil. At a greater distance, as for example in the once extensive forests E. of the Jordan, a terrible destruction is being wrought by the charcoal burners. Thousands of sacks of charcoal arrive in Jerus during the autumn months, chiefly in the care of Circassian settlers in the E. Jordan lands; but a similar work is pursued by other charcoal burners in the northern parts of upper Galilee. All the tree trunks are soon destroyed and then the rising branches are cut as soon as they reach any size, so that miles of country which, within the memory of many now living, were forest are now either entirely treeless or covered with nothing but brushwood. This last consists of dwarf oak, carob, terebinth, arbutus, wild olive and hawthorn—all capable of development into noble trees. The process having been commenced by the hand of man is assisted by the goats who crop the tender leaves and shoots, and thus keep stunted many of the bushes. Older inhabitants can remember that between Bethlehem and Hebron, where today scarcely a twig is visible, there were trees and brushwood all the way, and in the 7th cent. the pilgrim Arculphus writes of a pine wood as existing S. of Bethlehem. This destruction is common all over the land. The only trees which have any chance of surviving are those which from their near proximity to some sacred Wely or grave, or in some case from their own traditional sanctity, have been left uninjured from motives of superstition. Such "holy" trees occur all over the land, sometimes singly, at others in groves; they may be any species of tree. Commonly they are oaks, terebinths, carob, meis (nettle tree), sidr (zizyphus) or hawthorn.

Besides the wilful destruction of trees for firewood or charcoal another agent has in places been in operation. It is a common thing for the fellahin to clear a large area for ploughing by burning all the vegetation; such fires sometimes extend far beyond the area intended (cf Ps 83 14). There is a large and almost entirely sterile district, chiefly of bare rock, between Safed and Jebel Jermuk in Galilee which was swept a few years ago by a raging fire which eyewitnesses state blazed for a week. The destruction of all this vegetation has led to the washing away of almost all the soil, so that now great labor would be required to make this area productive. The removal of the natural vegetation produces sterility in two ways. Firstly, whereas the deep roots of trees and shrubs support the soil even on hillsides of considerable slope, and slowly but surely cause the disintegration of the underlying rocks, while their stems and branches by accumulating decaying leaves and twigs ever make more and richer soil, so the destruction of these plants leads to the washing away of the soil by the torrential winter's rain, until the bare rock—never on the hillslopes very far from the surface—is laid open to the sky. Secondly, the rainfall, which was once largely absorbed by this soil, now rapidly rushes off the denuded rocks and flows away to the valleys. The consequent result of this—combined with the destruction of many miles of the artificial soil-surfaces of terraces—is that a large proportion of the rainfall which once found its way slowly through the soil to the sources of the springs—never very deep in Pal—now rapidly runs down the valley bottoms to the lower grounds. The whole mountain region thus suffers from drought. It is a common saying that "trees bring rain." Probably the truth is simply that vegetation modifies the climate almost entirely by retaining moisture in the soil, and in the surface air near the soil; by preventing rapid evaporation for the surface through the shade they afford, and by increasing the output of the springs in the way described above. Remove the vegetation, and the soil gradually leaves the hillsides and the rainfall is largely wasted. This is what has happened over large districts in the Holy Land, and the consequent diminution of some of the springs even within half a cent. has been scientifically noted.

While therefore, from the permanent climatic conditions, Pal could never have been a land of verdure such, for example, as England, yet we know with certainty that its native vegetation has much diminished within the memory of many now living. But besides this, we have abundant historical evidence that at several periods it was much more productive. This is shown, for example, abundantly in the writings of Jos, and, for later periods, in the accounts of many pilgrims. But indeed the mere fact that for many cents. Pal had a population far greater than today is in itself a proof; for as things are, modern Pal is not able to support a much greater population than at present. Great expenditure of capital and labor on the restoring of ancient terraces, the construction of dams and systems of irrigation and the planting of trees is one essential preparation for any considerable development of the land. For any of these things to be possible a radical change in the attitude of the Turkish government is an essential preliminary.

With regard to Bible evidence it is clear from very many references in the historical books of the OT that "forest" or "woodland" was very plentiful in those days. In a large proportion where the word ya'ar (tr^d "forest") occurs it is definitely associated with trees. (For references see FOREST.) Whether these references are always to tall trees or also to the brushwood such as is plentiful in parts of Galilee today, is immaterial, as the latter consists of the same elements as the former, only stunted through the interference of man. It would certainly appear probable that at the time of the arrival of the Hebrews there were considerable forests of trees—oaks, terebinths, pines, etc—over a great part of the higher mountains. In Josh 17 14-18 we have reference to Joshua's twice-repeated command to the people to cut down the "forest," as the inhabited areas were too narrow for them. In later ages, e.g. in NT times, the cultivation of the land must have been so thorough that, to the W. of the Jordan especially, the area left for forest trees must necessarily have been much circumscribed; but the land then with its millions of olive trees and countless vineyards in the mountains and its great palm groves at Jericho and the coast, not to mention all kinds of imported fruit trees, must have presented a very different appearance from its present comparative barrenness. As a single example we may compare the glowing description by Jos of the extraordinary fertility of Gennesaret with its present condition (Jos, BJ, III, x, 8). Two periods in history stand out preëminent in the history of Pal as times of prosperity and fertility: that about and immediately succeeding the rise of Christianity and that of the Lat kingdom of Jerus (see Conder, The Latin Kingdom of Jerusalem, 239-41: "The present culture of Pal does not, perhaps, attain to a tenth of that which enriched the Latins in the 1st cent. of their rule"). In both these periods the land was highly cultivated and the population large, in the former more so than the latter. That the blight of the Ottoman Turks is largely responsible for the decay of agriculture and progressive deforestation in recent centuries is undoubted, but it is more than possible that at one if not at both these periods another factor was at work. It is difficult to believe that in the days when Palmyra was a vast city and Petra a great emporium, the home of a highly developed civilization, these sites were not better supplied by springs than at present; at those times great tracts of country E. of the Jordan, now swallowed up by the desert, were sites of flourishing cities whose melancholy and lonely ruins are the wonder of all. No afforestation and no increased cultivation will account for the supplies of water which must have sustained such a development; and it is only reasonable to suppose, and there is much to support such a view, that there must have been then a rainfall somewhat greater or more prolonged than today. It must be remembered the increased rainfall of, say, only one inch per annum over a long series of years, or a sustained extension of the rainfall to two or three inches later in the season, or even a few degrees of greater cold producing heavy snow instead of rain, would, any of them, greatly improve the fertility of the soil and the output of the springs. All the evidence seems to confirm the theory that there have been cycles of greater and of lesser rainfall extending over cents., and that the periods we have mentioned, certainly the Rom period, coincided with one of the former cycles. At the present time there is some evidence that the rainfall has, on the whole, been increasing during the last 50 years and the cultivated area of the land, as contrasted with the natural "forest" land, is also slowly extending.

In dealing briefly with some of the more characteristic and remarkable of the plants of the Holy Land we must recognize at least four distinct plant zones: (1) The coast plains and the western mountains, with a distinctly "Mediterranean flora"; (2) The Jordan valley or Ghor, with a very peculiar semi-tropical flora in which a considerable number of African forms occur; (3) The steppe or desert zones, specially those E. of the Jordan and to the south. The higher western slopes to the E. of the Jordan also have a very similar flora; (4) The Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon above 4,000 ft. in which Alpine forms occur, and in the higher regions of which there is a flora entirely distinct from the three other zones. These divisions are necessarily somewhat artificial. Everywhere the western slopes are more fertile than the eastern, so that the land to the E. of the water-parting in western Pal partakes more of the desert flora than that opposite to it on the east. Vegetation in all parts is more abundant on the hill slopes with a northern aspect, as it gets more shade; this is particularly noticeable in the drier areas.

(1) The coast-plains and western mountains.—(a) In the maritime plain there is a rich red alluvial soil with abundance of water deep under the surface. The annual mean temperature is 70° F.; frost is extremely rare, and the atmosphere is distinctly humid, though the rainfall is less than in the higher hills. Citrons, oranges and lemons here flourish, palms grow in places on the coast, melons and pomegranates reach perfection. Vines have been extensively planted by Jewish colonists in the neighborhood of Jaffa. Cereals—wheat, barley and Egypt maize (Sorghum annuum)—are extensively grown. The wild flora is similar to that of the mountains. The sycamore fig (Arab. jummeiz) flourishes around Jaffa—it is a tree which requires a warm climate; it was in Talmudic writings one of the distinctions between "lower" and "upper" Galilee that the sycamore fig flourished in the former and not in the latter. It is evident it was far more plentiful in olden times (see SYCAMORE). A closely allied tree, the mulberry, is common everywhere, though not really indigenous. Two varieties occur, the Morus nigra (Arab. tūt-shāmi) a native of central Asia, cultivated for its delicious fruit, and the M. alba (Arab. tūt beledi) a native of China introduced as food for silk worms. See SYCAMINE. Another tree which reaches perfection only in the warmer regions of the plain—and that too in the Jordan valley—is the tamarisk (Arab. athl) of which Post recognizes 9 species. It is characterized by its brittle feathery branches covered by minute scale-like leaves; a bedraggled, wind-torn tamarisk half buried in sea-sand is a characteristic sight all along the Syrian coast. Under favorable conditions some species attain considerable size. See TAMARISK.

(b) In the higher mountain regions there is an average temperature of 62° F. and extreme variations between a maximum of 100° or 80° in the shade in the summer and a few degrees of frost in the winter. Here the fig, vine and olive do admirably; their late fruiting corresponding with the "dew"—or clouds of fine mist—which settle over the mountains after sunset, particularly in the north. Apricots, mulberries, quince, apples and pears (chiefly from imported grafts), peaches and plums, almonds and walnuts do well in sheltered spots. Wheat and barley are grown on hill slopes or in valley bottoms all over the mountain region.

In the valleys where there is running water the oleander (Nerium oleander; Arab. difteh) abounds—a plant beautiful in foliage and flower but poisonous and not uncommonly imparting its poison to the water in which it grows. In similar situations occurs the Vitex (V. Agnus Castris), a variety of verbenas whose lilac or purple flowers are, wherever they occur, a sure sign of the presence of water on or near the surface.

In similar situations flourishes the oriental plane (Platanus orientalis; Arab. dilb), a tree which often attains great size (see PLANE TREE), and also the alder (Alnus orientalis; Arab. naght), a tree of humbler growth. There are some 8 varieties of willow (Arab. sifsaf), a tree very common along the water courses (see WILLOW). Poplars (Arab. haur) are plentiful in places, esp. near water. Three native varieties are known, but the cylindrical Lombardy poplar, an imported variety, is most widely cultivated (see POPLAR). The southern hackberry or nettle tree (Celtis australis; Arab. mais) a member of the Urticaceae closely allied to the elm, is an indigenous tree which is widely planted; it is not uncommonly seen beside Moslem shrines. It grows to a height of 20 to 30 ft., and yields a close-grained timber taking a high polish. The walnut (Juglans regia; Arab. jauz) is a valuable timber tree and grows to noble proportions. It flourishes around Damascus, being a water-loving tree; some of the most magnificent specimens occur at Sheba', a village in the lower slopes of Hermon. The walnut is really an imported tree, its native home being Persia and the Himalayas, but it has been long naturalized.

The carob (Ceratonia siliqua; Arab. kharrūb) is a handsome evergreen tree whose dense, dark glistening foliage renders it everywhere conspicuous. It is widely distributed, esp. in the lower mountain regions. Its pods are the HUSKS (which see) of Lk 15 16. Oaks are among the most important and characteristic of all the trees and shrubs of Pal: the evergreen oak which forms, it is estimated, two-thirds of all the shrubby vegetation of Carmel and attains noble proportions at some of the Moslem shrines, the Valonica oak, plentiful on the hills E. of Nazareth, and the ilex or holm oak, commonest near the coast, are among the more important. The recent destruction of timber in the Holy Land has esp. fallen upon the oaks, which afford the best of all fuel; as their growth is very slow and there is no attempt to plant young trees this is most regrettable. (For fuller account see OAK.) Closely allied to the oak both in the OT and with the modern inhabitant—though botanically very distinct—is the terebinth or turpentine tree (Pistacia terebinthus; Arab. butm), one of the finest trees in Pal. Although from a distance superficially like an oak, the foliage is very different. In many spots in Pal where terebinths are for various reasons regarded as “sacred” they have obtained splendid proportions. See TEREBINTH.

Pines, although they flourish on the coast and lower mountain slopes, are, together with cypresses, junipers and cedars, reserved to the discussion of the flora of the fourth division of the country—the Alpine regions.

The hawthorn (Crataegus; Arab. za'rār), of which there are 4 varieties, occurs as a shrub or small tree everywhere, its sweet-scented white or pink blossom being much in evidence in the spring.

Among the more important shrubs which make up the thickets over the limestone hills the following may be briefly enumerated:

The sumach (Rhus conaria), usually a shrub but occasionally a small tree, grows in considerable quantities in fertile spots in the mountains; from its fruit an acid drink is concocted and the fruit, bark and young leaves are used in tanning.

A plant closely allied to this, and also to the terebinth, is the lentisk (Pistacia lentiscus; Arab. serres), a common shrub in the lower mountain region, e.g. on Carmel, which yields mastich, a white gum, thought by many to be the BALM of the OT (which see).

The bay laurel (Laurus nobilis; Arab. el ghār) occurs in clumps in many places. It is the Daphne of the Greeks and was sacred to Apollo. From its large, leathery, shining leaves were made the laurel crowns of victory in classical times. This, it may be mentioned in passing, is quite a distinct plant from our familiar “cherry laurel,” which is allied to the cherry.

The butchers' broom (Ruscus aculeatus) is very plentiful. It is a plant peculiar in having its leaf-petioles flattened out like a leaf (phillodia), so that the flower and berry appear to arise from the middle of the midrib of the leaf.

The myrtle (Myrtus communis; Arab. rihān or ās) is exceedingly common, esp. in northern Pal, and when it grows near water it attains a good size. See MYRTLE.

A showy shrub, which sometimes attains to the dimensions of a tree 20 or 30 ft. high, is the arbutus (Arab. koṭlib) or strawberry tree. Two kinds occur, the less common Arbutus unedo or true “strawberry tree” which has a rough, warty fruit of a scarlet color, and Arbutus andrachne with a smooth, red bark, which when peeled off leaves a reddish inner surface. It has small orange-colored, non-edible berries. The red stems of this arbutus may be seen conspicuous in thickets all over the land, but very few are allowed to come to full growth.

Among some of the more showy shrubs we may mention the oleaster (Eleagnus hortensis; Arab. zaizafān) with its beautiful silvery leaves and white blossom (see OIL TREE); the styrax (Styrax officinale; Arab. haz or 'abhar), a shrub or small tree, with beautiful white flowers, somewhat resembling orange blossoms, the dried juice from whose bark is the official STORAX (which see); the Judas tree (Cercis siliquaestrum; Arab. zemzarik), a straggling shrub or tree with very showy pink flowers, and the caper (Capparis spinosa; Arab. el āṣāf), which is very common on old walls and about ruins (see CAPER BERRY). The beautiful rockrose or Cistus (Arab. ghibrah) is found on many shrubby hillsides, even on the bare mountain tops. The C. villosus has pink and the C. salviaefolius white blossoms, the petals being curiously crumpled and falling off almost at once when the flower is picked. From the Cistus is obtained the gum called Ladanum (Arab. ladhanun; Heb lōt) for which see MYRRH. Many of the hill tops near the watershed, which should be clothed by forests of oaks and pines, are now almost bare and support upon the dry and scanty soil nothing but low bushes of thorny burnet, mingled with wild thyme and mint, with, in places, small bushes of the Cistus. This thorny burnet (Poterium Spinosum; Arab. ballān) is almost ubiquitous; its long thorns and tiny leaves enable it to survive the goats. It is of considerable economic importance, as from masses of this plant the fellahin fire almost all the limekilns in the land; and they use it extensively too for their ovens. It is a common sight in the late summer, after the harvest is gathered in, to see companies of peasants gathering this plant into clumps all over the hillsides, and conveying it on the women's heads in huge masses to the kilns. They pile around the kilns enormous heaps, enough to keep the furnace continually burning for several days. They may well be the “thorns under the pot” of Eccl 7 6. See THORNS.

Of the myriad spring flowers which make such a brilliant annual display it is impossible here to write in any detail. Earliest after the rains appear the crocuses and the cyclamen, then the narcissi, anemones—scarlet, white and purple—the scarlet ranunculi, gladioli, irises, dwarf orchids, pink and yellow flax, mountain lilies, borage and bugloss, the primrose-colored Pal scabious, and vast numbers of small Compositae all appear in quick succession. When these fade many brilliant thistles continue to add some color to the otherwise dry roadsides, and last of all, in the late summer, numbers of tall stalks of squill, shot from the now leafless bulbs, remain scattered in groups over the dry and leafless ground as last survivors of the season's display. The varieties of flowers are enormous, but those mentioned are almost universally present.

Of cultivated vegetables mention may be made of CUCUMBERS (q.v.), lettuce, onions, GARLIC (q.v.), MELONS (q.v.), cauliflower and cabbage, potatoes (a fairly recent introduction), sweet potatoes, the egg plant (Meloenia badinjān), artichokes (which also grow wild) and the bāmieh (Hibiscus esculentus).

(2) The Jordan valley.—The flora of this region is of a very special kind, and has affinities to Africa. Several trees and shrubs are of great interest. Firstly, mention may be made of the group of true acacias. One variety, the 'anbar (Acacia Farnesiana), is by no means peculiar to the Ghor, but is used for making hedges in many parts of the land; its little yellow, fluffy, scented flowers are a great favorite with the natives; it is usually a shrub rather than a tree. The remaining acacias are desert inhabitants and in many places are the only trees. The seyyal, which includes A. tortilis and A. seyal, flourishes on the west shores of the Dead Sea, at 'Ain Jidy and southward; from it is obtained the gum arabic of commerce; it probably yielded the wood known in the OT as SHITTIM WOOD (q.v.).

The semitropical Ghor is the home of many other thorny trees. Extremely characteristic of the whole region are the jubee trees of which the nabk or sidr tree (Zizyphus spina-Christi), is the most common. It has rounded yellowish fruit; under favorable conditions it develops into a tall and handsome tree. Somewhat less common is the 'ennābh (Z. vulgaris) which bears an edible fruit of the shape and size of an olive. A third kind, the dôm (Z. lotus), is merely a shrub and has small pea-sized fruit. These various kinds of jujube trees are found in every part of the Jordan depression and of the valleys approaching it. Closely allied botanically to these thorny shrubs is the samûr (Palurus aculeatus) or "Christ thorn," widely used for the making of hedges (see BRIERS). Another common shrub, or small tree, in the hotter parts of the Ghor near Jericho and the Dead Sea, is the zakkûm (Balanites Aegyptiaca) from whose oval berries the monks of Jericho extract a resinous substance which they term "Balm of Gilead."

The dibk (Cordia myxa), a giant borage, which grows to a tree of 7 or 8 ft. high is widely cultivated but grows in the Ghor spontaneously. The fruit, which is edible, is used principally for making bird lime.

A very striking tree near Jericho and the Dead Sea is the 'oshr (Calotropis procera), a member of the N.O. Asclepiadeae. It has large obovate leaves, cabbage-like in consistence—a great contrast to the small, dry, dull-colored leaves of most of its neighbors. The trunk has a cork-like bark and white, milky juice and the fruit consists of queer apple-like follicles which, though solid looking, are only inflated with air and contain but silk threads and seeds. These have been supposed to be the apples of Sodom of Jos, which he describes as looking like tempting fruit but which on examination prove to contain but dust. A much more likely theory is that he refers to the equally common colocynth (Citrullus colocynthis). See WILD GOURD.

Another abundant herb is the Solanum coagulans (Arab. khâdak), whose apple-like fruit has also received (without serious claim) the name of "apple of Sodom."

Then there are in the immediate neighborhood of the Dead Sea a whole group of salt-loving plants which grow in the saline marshes such, for example, as the samphire or glasswort (Salicornia fructosa and S. herbacea). The latter of these is called the kali plant, because it is burnt in order to obtain potash (el kali). Another group is included under the name of sea blite or sueda (Arab. suweid) of which there are several varieties.

Along the banks of the Jordan willows (Siler safsaf) and tamarisks (especially Tamarix Jordanis) abound.

At various parts of the Jordan valley, but particularly to the north of Lake Huleh, flourishes the papyrus reed (Cyperus papyrus), known in Arab. as babir, the source of the earliest paper.

Of cultivated plants, palms, as we know from history, grow here well, though their cultivation has been neglected; sterile wild palms still occur in some of the warmer valleys, esp. to the E. of the Dead Sea. Many dead palm-tree trunks lie scattered along the shores of the Dead Sea.

In situations well supplied with water, bananas flourish—they are cultivated both near Jericho and near the Lake of Galilee. Oranges, lemons and citrons also grow well. All kinds of ordinary vegetables are grown in various parts of this region. Wheat and barley yield an early and an abundant crop in irrigated regions on both sides of the Jordan; rice and Indian maize are cultivated in irrigated fields N. of Lake Huleh, and cotton at several spots. With scientific irrigation this region might be one of the most productive upon earth.

(3) The Steppe or "Desert" Zones are chiefly noticeable for the absence of trees and the stunted condition of the small shrubs and herbs which grow there. Thorny plants like Poterium, Astragalus (the most characteristic order) and Cousinea thistles flourish. With the early rains a rapid growth of dwarf flowers appears which dries up soon after the rainy season ends. Botanically the region stands somewhat distinct by the occurrence of Pers and Indian plant-forms. This region includes the great corn land of the Hauran and Nukra—some of the richest of their kind.

(4) The flora of the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon consists, in the lower slopes, of similar plants to those mentioned under (1). The Conifera are specially characteristic of this northern region, the destruction of these trees in Pal proper being in many parts complete. Of the indigenous cypress (Arab. Saru) we have one species, the Cypressus sempervirens, a handsomer tree than the cylindrical kind—a cultivated variety—planted so frequently in Turkish cemeteries (see CYPRESS). There are 6 varieties of juniper known, and one species of yew. Of pines the two important kinds are—the Aleppo pine (Pinus Halepensis), which grows with considerable rapidity and is widely planted, and the handsomer stone pine (Pinus pinia the true snobar of the Arabs), probably more truly the native tree (see PINE TREE). The most important and characteristic member of this order of trees is the cedar which still flourishes in a very few spots (see CEDAR). On the Lebanon occurs a single species of rhododendron (R. Ponticum) and one of heather (Erica verticillata). Above the height of 7,000 ft. trees and shrubs disappear and vegetation is chiefly represented by low, rounded, thorny bushes, chiefly varieties of Astragalus; by clumps of Acantholimon Lebanoticum; by small procumbent bushes of Cerasus prostata—a member of the cherry family—and the Coloneaster nummularia with scarlet berries. Even on the summit of Hermon it is astonishing how many tiny flowers are in bloom in the late summer after the snow has melted. The most curious feature of this region is the almost complete absence of Arctic forms such as are found in the Alps and even in the Himalayas.

BOTCH. See BOIL.

BOTRYS, bot'ris (Βότρυς, Βότρυς; mod. Batrân):

A town of Phoenicia on the coast some miles N. of Gebal (Byblus) on the southern side of the bold promontory called in classic times Theoprosopon. It is said to have been founded by Ithobal (Ethbaal), king of Tyre, whose daughter married Ahab (Jos, Ant, VIII, xiii, 2). The town is not mentioned in Scripture.

BOTTLE, bot'l (בִּתְּלָה, hēmeth, נֶבֶל, nō'dh, נֶבֶל, nēbhel, בִּבְבִּק, bakbuk, אוֹב, 'ōbh; ἀσκός, askós):

The most lit. rendering of all the words for b. in EV is "skin," or "wine-skin," RV. The primitive b. among eastern peoples was really a bag made from skins, tanned or untanned, of kid, goat, cow, camel or buffalo—in most cases drawn off of the animal entire, after the legs and head were cut off, and, when filled, grotesquely retaining the shape of the animal. The skins in common use today, as anciently no doubt, for holding water, milk, butter and cheese, have the hair left on and are far from cleanly-looking. Those used for wine and oil are tanned by means of oak bark and seasoning in smoke, a process that gives a peculiar astringency of flavor to the wine kept in them, and gave rise to the parable of Jesus about putting new wine into old wine-skins (Mt 9 17; Mk 2 22; Lk 5 37). The fact that the leather underwent distension once and only once under fermentation, and the further fact that the wine-skins became dried and liable to crack from the smoke and dry heat of the tents and houses, gave point to the parable: "No man putteth new wine into old wine-skins; else the wine will burst the skins, and the wine perisheth, and the skins: but they put new wine into fresh wine-skins." All such "bottles" today are liable to crack and become worthless.

Pliny Fisk used fresh goat-skins to carry water, but he says this gave the water a reddish color and an exceedingly loathsome taste. Harmer tells of carrying liquids in smoked skin-bottles, which when rent "were mended by putting in a new piece, or by gathering up the piece, or by inserting a flat bit of wood." Burckhardt says he saw Arabs keeping water for their horses on journeys in "large bags made of tanned camel-skin." They would sew the skins up well on four sides, but would leave two openings, one to admit the air, one to let out the water. Two such bags made a good load for a camel. Edwin Wilbur Rice says the leather or skin-bottles are of different sizes and kinds, usually made from the skin of the goat, rarely ever from that of the sheep, as it is not considered strong enough. But sometimes they are made from the skin of the camel, or the ox, which is then prepared by tanning. When leather bags are sewed up the joinings are smeared with grease, as the skin-bottles of all sorts are, as they grow older, lest the water, or other liquid, ooze through.

Such bottles, being more portable and less breakable than earthenware, were peculiarly well suited to the use of primitive and nomad peoples, as they are to the roving Bedouin of today. The mention of them, however, in such various accounts and connections as those for instance of the story of Hagar (Gen 21 19), of the Gibeonites (Josh 9 4), and of David (1 S 25 18) shows that they were in common use among ancient Orientals, pastoral and peasant alike. Tourists still find that they are admirably suited to travelers in waterless districts, or districts where the water is brackish and bad. One of the characteristic figures even in oriental centers like Damascus today is the waterman who sells from his dripping goat-skin water cooled with the snow of Hermon, flavored with lemon, rose, or licorice, temptingly offered up and down the streets by his clapping his brass cups and crying in the most pleading but pleasing tones, "Drink, drink, thirsty one" (cf Isa 55 1). But, as Dr. Mackie, of Beirut, says, "While the bottle is thus highly prized, and the water thus kept in it is a grateful necessity, the luxury of the East belongs to the spring itself, to the draught from the fountains of living waters. Hence the comparison Jesus made at Jacob's well (Jn 4 14), and the one blessed terminus of all, the Shepherd's leading (Rev 7 17). See HDB, s.v.

Of course in the settled life of the Orient water, milk, wine and other liquids are often kept in earthen jars or other receptacles. For such "bottles" see PITCHER; VESSEL. Glass bottles are not mentioned in the Bible; but those now found in tombs, for keeping perfume in, may have been known in OT times.

Figurative: (1) For the clouds (Job 38 37). (2) For intoxication, through which, because of their headstrong continuance in sin, Israel shall be helpless to resist the enemy's attack (Jer 13 12). (3) For sorrow: "Put thou my tears into thy bottle" (Ps 56 8). "The Psalmist's sorrows were so many that they would need a great wine-skin to hold them all. There is no allusion to the little lachrymatories of fashionable and fanciful Romans: it is a robust metaphor by far; such floods of tears had the Psalmist wept that a leathern bottle would scarce hold them" (Treasury of David, III, 39). "God treasures His servants' tears as if they were water or wine." St. Bernard says, "The tears of penitents are the wine of angels" (Dummelow's Comm., 351). GEO. B. EAGER BOTTOM, bot'um: Rendered by several Heb words: (1) שֶׁרֶשׁ, sheres, "root"; Chald, שְׁרֵשׁ, shōresh (Job 36 30, "the b. of the sea"). (2) קָרָקַע, karka', "soil," "pavement of tesserae" (Am 9 3). (3) קָצַב, keceb, "cutting," "chop," "extremity" (Jon 2 6, "the bottoms of the mountains"). (4) רִפְדָּה, rphādāh, "railing," "couch" (Cant 3 10, "the b. thereof of gold"). (5) חֵיק, hēk, "bosom," "lap" (Ezk 43 13.14.17, RVm "hollow"). (6) מַצְלָה, m'cullāh, "to be dark," "shadowy place," from prim. root ṣālal, "to tumble down," i.e. "settle"; hence the idea of a valley ("the myrtle-trees that were in the bottom," Zec 1 8 RVm "shady place"). The prophet may have been wont to frequent the myrtle grove in the glen or bottoms, in the neighborhood of Jerus, for meditation and prayer (BTP, II, 283). M. O. EVANS

BOTTOMLESS, bot'um-les, PIT (τὸ φρέαρ τῆς ἀβύσσου, to phréar tēs abýssou, "the pit of the abyss," Rev 9 1.2 AV): In RV, hē abýssos (always an adj. in classical authors="bottomless") is uniformly rendered "the abyss" (q.v.) (Lk 8 31; Rom 10 7; Rev 9 11; 11 7; 17 8; 20 1.3).

BOUGH, bou. See BRANCH.

BOUGHT, bout (תָּבַח, tāwekh, "bisection," "middle"): The best part of a sling that contains the stone, "in the midst of the bought of a sling" (1 S 25 29 AVm, AV "out of the middle," RV "from the hollow").

BOUGHT, bôt (adj. and vb.). See BUYING.

BOUND. See BIND.

BOUNDS, boundz: גָּבַל, gābhal="to twist" (as a rope), "to make an enclosure" (as by a line) occurs in Ex 19 12.23; Ps 104 9. גְּבוּל, g'bhul="a cord," hence "a boundary," "territory" (Ex 23 31 AV), with its fem. form גְּבוּלָה, g'bhulāh (Dt 32 8; Isa 10 13); חֹק, hōk="enactment," "appointment" (of time, space, quantity, labor, or usage), hence "commandment," "decree," "ordinance" (Job 14 5; 26 10 AV); in the Gr, ὁροθεσία, horothesia, in the sense of "a limit," "boundary line," occurs in Acts 17 26.

BOUNTIFULNESS, boun'ti-fōol-nes, BOUNTY, boun'ti (ἀπολόγη, haplōtēs, "singleness," "benevolence," 2 Cor 9 11 AV; טוב, tōbh, "to be good" [Prov 22 9]; εὐλογία, eulogía, "good speech," "blessing" [2 Cor 9 6]; גָּמַל, gāmal, "to treat well" [Ps 119 17]; יָד, yād, "hand," "power"): Paul speaks of the church at Corinth "being enriched in everything unto all liberality" (AV "bountifulness," 2 Cor 9 11). The offering of the church at Corinth for the Christians of Judaea is termed a "bounty," a blessing, liberally given: "and not of extortion" (AV "of covetousness," 2 Cor 9 5.6). The word occurs also in 1 K 10 13: "Besides that which Solomon gave her of his royal bounty," lit. "according to the hand of King Solomon." L. KAISER

BOW, bō. See ARCHERY.

BOW, bou, BOWING, bou'ing. See ADORATION; ATTITUDES.

BOW, bō, IN THE CLOUD: Reference to the promise made to Noah (Gen 9 13) preserved in the the Constellation figures. See ASTRONOMY, II, 4.

BOWELS, bou'elz (מֵעֵה, mē'āh, pl. מְעֵי, mē'im, רֶחֶם, rehem, pl. רַחֲמִים, rahāmīm; σπλάγχνον, spλάγχnon):

(1) Literal: The lit. meaning of these words is intestines, then the abdomen, the womb (matrix and uterus). As will be seen there is not much definiteness in the use of these expressions from the standpoint of physiology; but not less so than in modern oriental languages and even in many occidental languages, as popularly used. The remarkable phrases used in 2 Ch 21 18.19, "Jeh smote him in his bowels" and "His bowels fell out by reason of his sickness," refer to a severe and fatal case of hemorrhoids.

(2) Figurative: In fig. language these words denote deep emotions of various kinds. As in physiology we speak of the "nervus sympathicus," the ancients expressed by these terms "affection," "sympathy" and "mercy," feelings of distress and sorrow, as in Job 30 27 AV; Lam 1 20 AV; 2 11 AV. In one passage we have to translate mē'im by "heart," being the seat of affection and devotion (Ps 71 6): "Thy law is within my heart" (40 8). In the NT (RV) the word is only given in Acts 1 18. H. L. E. LUERING

BOWING, bou'ing (נָטָה, nāṭāh, "to incline," "bulge"): The Psalmist's assailants expected that he would be "like a leaning [AV "bowing"] wall" (Ps 62 3) before their united attack, as when an ill-built, bulging wall gives way under a sudden and heavy fall of rain (cf Ezk 13 11; 38 22).

BOWL, bōl:

(1) The primitive Hebrews, like the wandering Bedouin of today, probably used bowls of wood, as less breakable than earthenware. Some hollow dish of the sort would be indispensable, even in the lowest stage of nomad life, to receive the milk of the flock, and as the common dish in which to serve the family meal. We have abundant proof, however, that vessels of earthenware of various sorts were in use by the settled peoples of Canaan in the earliest times. Many interesting specimens, characteristic of different peoples and ages, have been found by excavators of the PEF, esp. recently by Flinders Petrie and Fred. Bliss at Tell el-Hesi (see Tell el-Hesi [Lachish], by Petrie, and A Mound of Many Cities, by Bliss) and by Macalister and others at Gezer, Taanach, Megiddo, etc (see PEFs).

It was probably in some such dish—"a b. fit for lords" (EV "a lordly dish")—that Jael offered Sisera a draught of sour milk (Jgs 5 25; cf Arab. leben), and the b. into which Gideon wrung the water from his fleece (Jgs 6 38) is denoted by the same word (סֶפֶל, sēphel; LXX lekánē), though this may have been of earthenware instead of wood. Certainly the sēphel was a dish of goodly size.

(2) Another word rendered sometimes "bowl" and sometimes "basin" is מִזְרָק, mizrāk. It is used of the large silver bowls presented by "the princes of the congregation" (Nu 7 13 f). See BASIN. It is also applied by Amos (6 6) to the costly bowls used by the nobles of Samaria in their debaucheries.

(3) A still larger b. is mentioned by Jer (35 5), AV "pot" (גְּבִיעַ, gābhī'a). This same word is used of Joseph's cup (Gen 44 2 f): "Put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack's mouth." As used at banquets it corresponds to the crater, from which the drinking cups (כִּסְוֶה, kōšōth) were replenished. The material seems to have been uniformly silver. But see (4).

(4) B. is used in AV to תְּבִיעַ, tēbhī'a, "the bowls made like almonds" (Ex 25 33 AV), as applied to the "cups" (RV), or calyxes, used to ornament the golden candlestick (see TABERNACLE). It seems to have been an elastic term.

(5) The b. of Zec 4 3 (גִּלְיָה, gullāh, found also in 5 2 correct text), is represented as the receptacle for oil in the candlestick of the prophet's vision. It is likewise used of "the lamp of life" (Eccl 12 6) and to designate the bowl-shaped capitals of Jachin and Boaz (1 K 7 41.42; 2 Ch 4 12.13).

(6) B. is found in Isa 51 17.22 RV, "b. of the cup" (AV "dregs of the cup"). Some think the second word here (קִבְבָּתָה, kubba'ath kōš) is a gloss to explain the unusual preceding word.

(7) In Rev where AV has "vial" (phialē) RV has "bowl." See BASIN. GEO. B. EAGER

BOWMAN, bō'man: Israel seems not to have been equal to the surrounding peoples in the use of the bow. The battle of Gilboa was clearly lost through the superior skill of the Phili bowmen. This seems to have moved David to encourage archery practice in Judah (2 S 1 18; cf Driver in loc.). It is thought probable that the revival of Israel's military power under Jeroboam, son of Joash, was due to improvement in archery. Hosea, a contemporary, speaks of the bow as the national weapon of Israel (1 5.7). The most skilled bowmen of antiquity were the Assyrians (cf Isa 5 28; 37 33). From Assyrian reliefs it seems that it was their practice to overwhelm their enemies with the bow, and to use sword and spear only when the foe had been demoralized and put to flight. See ARCHERY.

GEO. B. EAGER

BOWSHOT, bō'shot: Found only in Gen 21 16 in the account of Hagar and her child: "And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot," lit. "stretchings of a bow," a typical oriental way of indicating distance.

BOX: The passages in which this word occurs are 2 K 9 1.3 (Heb pakh, "cruet," "flask," RV vial) and the synoptic passages Mt 26 7 AV; Mk 14 3 AV; Lk 7 37 AV (Gr alabastron). "Perfume-boxes" are mentioned in Isa 3 20; in the NT passages RV renders "alabaster cruse." "Alabaster" was a white stone much used in ornamentation; and out of it small vessels were made for holding precious ointment. "She brake the cruse" (Mk 14 3), i.e. the seal, not the vessel.

In Isa 41 19 and 60 13, "box" is found in connection with "tree," as "box-tree" (q.v.).

BOXING. See GAMES.

BOX-TREE, box'trē (תַּאֲשֻׁרִי, t'ashshūr; Isa 41 19; 60 13, "boxwood" Ezk 27 6): A tree of uncertain identity, which must once have been common in the forests of Lebanon. According to Post (HDB, I, 313), "The only species of box found in Bible lands is Buxus longifolia, which is a shrub from 2 to 3 ft. high. It does not grow S. of Mt. Cassius and it is unlikely that it did in historical times."

As an alternative to the box tree the cypress, Cupressus sempervirens—known in Arab. as Sherbīn—has been suggested. It is a fine tree and was probably once plentiful, but as it seems to answer to the b'rosh (see FIR), it cannot well be the t'ashshūr. There is nothing certain to go upon.

BOY (נֶדָר, yedeh, "child," נַעַר, na'ar, "lad," "youth"; תַּיִם, ō, ē, ho and hē pāis): Refers to a child of any age, and is sometimes used of either sex: Joel 3 3; Zec 8 5; Mt 17 18; Lk 2 43; 8 51.54 fem.; 9 42. In the East the word applies also to an adult who is a servant (Mt 8 6 RVm). The boy occupied a place of special importance in the family life of all ancient people. In Syria the father even was called by the name of his son. He was known as the father of Joseph, or whatever the name might be. As is true among all oriental people, while the father had absolute control in his case as well as in the case of the rest of the household, yet the boy received a consideration and advantages not accorded to the daughter. In the Jewish family his religious life began at the fourth year. He was expected to learn the Scriptures at five, the Mish at ten, and to fulfil the whole law at thirteen. At twelve years he was expected to learn a trade, and attained to something of independence at that age, though he did not come into full rights as a citizen until he was twenty. Among many nations there was special rejoicing at the birth of the boy, and sometimes a feast. One of the most ancient customs was the planting of a cedar tree on this occasion. See CHILD; FAMILY; SON.

BOZCATH, boz'kath (בֹּצְקָת, boçkath). See BOZKATH.

BOZEZ, bō'zez (בֹּרֶז, bōçēz; Bałés, Bazés, probably from an obsolete root bāçaz, corresponding to the Arab. baṣṣa, "to shine" or "to ooze"): The name of the northern of the two cliffs that stand one on each side of the gorge of Michmash (1 S 14 4). It catches the sun during most of the day, while the southern cliff is in the shade. To this circumstance it may owe its name, "shining." "The contrast is surprising and picturesque between the dark coal color of the south side, and the ruddy or tawny tints of the northern cliff, crowned with the gleaming white of the upper chalky strata. The picture is unchanged since the day when Jonathan looked over to the white camping ground of the Philis, and Bozez must have then shone as brightly as it does now, in the full light of an eastern sun" (Conder, Tent Work, 256).

W. EWING

BOZKATH, boz'kath (בֹּצְקָת, boçkath, "stony"; LXX Βοσκηθ, Bosēdōth): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named between Lachish and Eglon (Josh 15 39). It was the birthplace of Adaiah the mother of King Josiah (2 K 22 1; AV "Boscath"). The site is not identified.

BOZRAH, boz'ra (בֹּצְרָה, boçrāh, "sheepfold"; Βοσρῶρα, Bosórrha, Βοσρόρ, Bosór):

(1) The capital of Edom, a city of great antiquity (Gen 36 33; 1 Ch 1 44; Isa 34 6; 63 1; Jer 49 13; Am 1 12). It may be identical with Bu-seirah, which lies about 7 miles S.W. of Tufaleh, on the main road to Petra.

(2) A city in Moab mentioned in Jer 48 24. It is probably identical with Bezer, the city of refuge. It may be represented today by Kusūr Bashair, which towers lie some 15 miles S.E. of Dibon. In this case Beth-gamul would be identical with Jemal, 8 miles E. of Dibon, and Beth-meon with Ma'in, S.W. of Medebah.

BRACELET, brās'let (חֲזָקֶה, 'eç'adhāh, חֶה, hāh, צַמִּיד, çāmīdh, פַּתִּיל, pāthūl, שְׁרוֹת, shērōth): Used to translate a number of Heb words, only one of which means a band for the arm ('eṣ'ādhāh), as in 2 S 1 10, "the bracelet that was on his arm." In Ex 35 22, where both men and women are said to have brought as offerings among other "jewels of gold" "bracelets" (RV "brooches"), another word (hāh) is used, meaning most likely nose-rings (see RINGS). The b. asked of Judah by Tamar as a pledge ("Thy signet, and thy b., and thy staff that is in thy hand," Gen 38 18.25 AV) was probably the cord of softly-twisted wool for the shepherd's headdress (pāthūl; RV "cord"). The bracelets ("two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold") which Abraham's servant gave to Rebekah stand for still another word (ḡāmīdh). These "bracelets" are always spoken of as "bracelets for the hands," or as "put upon the hands" (Gen 24 47; of Ezk 16 11; 23 42). Isaiah, predicting the day when Jeh will smite the haughty daughters of Zion, who "walk with outstretched necks and wanton eyes, walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet," says, "In that day the Lord will take away the beauty of their anklets . . . the bracelets" (3 19, shērōth) etc, where some translate "twisted ornaments," leaving it uncertain as to just what is specifically meant. In 2 S 1 10 the b. appears with the crown as one of the royal insignia. In 2 K 11 12, according to Wellhausen, W. R. Smith (OTJC, 31ln.) and others, we should read, "Then he brought out the king's son, and put the crown upon him and gave him bracelets" [הַבְּרָכֹת] for "testimony" [הַשְּׁמָעוּת]. See DB.

Today, as of old, the bracelet is multiform and a favorite ornament in the East. It is made of gold, silver, copper, brass, glass and even enameled earthenware, and in many designs: flat band, plain ring, interlinked rings, as well as of twisted wires, connected squares, solid or perforated, with or without pendants (Mackie).

When owned by women, bracelets had the special recommendation, along with other jewelry, of being inalienable—not to be taken by the husband in case of divorce, nor seized and sold for his debts. "Even now," says Rice (Orientalisms, etc, 41), "in Moslem lands a woman may be divorced without legal process, at the freak of her husband, but she can carry away undisputed any amount of gold, silver, jewels, precious stones, or apparel that she has loaded on her person; so she usually wears all her treasures on her person, not knowing when the fateful word may be spoken."

BRAG (μεγαλαυχέω, megalauchéō, "proud brags"): Occurs only in the Apoc (2 Macc 15 32), not being sufficiently dignified to be given a place in the canonical Scriptures by the King James translators (cf Jth 16 5).

BRAIDED, brād'ed, BRAIDING, brād'ing (τὸ πλέγμα, tó plégma, "that which is plaited," 1 Tim 2 9; ἡ ἐμπλοκή, hē emplotē, "a plaiting," 1 Pet 3 3): Used with reference to Christian women in two passages where the apostles emphasized the superiority of good works and spiritual grace over outward adornment. See EMBROIDERY.

BRAMBLE, bram'b'l. See THORNS.

BRAN (τὰ πύτυρα, tá pítura): The women of Babylon are described as burning "bran for incense" in their unchaste idolatrous worship (Bar 6 43).

BRANCH, bransh, and BOUGH: Represented by very many words in the Heb.

(1) זֶמְרָה, zēmōrah, used esp. of a vine branch. The spies "cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes" (Nu 13 23). See also Ezk 15 2; Nah 2 2. "They put the branch to their nose" (Ezk 8 17), refers to some unknown idolatrous practice, as does also Isa 17 10, "thou plantest pleasant plants, and settest it with strange slips," or "vine slips of a strange [god]" RVm.

(2) יִרְקֶת, yōneqeth, lit. "a sucker." "The tender branch thereof will not cease" (Job 14 7). Used fig. of Israel, Ps 80 11 (RV "shoots"); Ezk 17 22 AV; Hos 14 6, and of the wicked, Job 8 16 (RV "shoots"), 15 30.

(3) כֶּפֶז, kippāh, Job 15 32. Isa 9 14; 19 15, RV has "palm-branch," "Therefore Jeh will cut off from Israel head and tail, palm-branch and rush, in one day" (9 14).

(4) נֶצֶר, nēṣer (of the same Heb root, according to many commentators, as Nazareth), lit. "a little shoot springing from the root" ("out of a shoot from her roots," Dnl 11 7), which may be planted out to grow (Isa 11 1; 60 21), or may be rooted out and thrown away (Isa 14 19).

(5) צֶמַח, ṣemah. The "branch" of Messianic prophecy. See PROPHECY. "In that day shall the branch [m "shoot" or "sprout"] of Jeh be beautiful and glorious" (Isa 4 2); "a shoot out of the stock of Jesse" (Isa 11 1); "a righteous branch" (Jer 23 5; 33 15): "my servant the Branch" (Zec 3 8); "the man whose name is the Branch" (Zec 6 12).

(6) קָנָה, kānāh, is used for the "branches" of the golden candlesticks (Ex 25 32; 37 18 ff). Lit. kānāh means a "reed."

There are a number of words, less frequently used, meaning "branch":

(7) בָּדִים, baddīm (pl. only used; Ezk 17 6; 19 14).

(8) דָּלִיּוֹת, dālīyōt (pl. only used; Jer 11 16).

(9) מַטֵּה, matteh (Ezk 19 11).

(10) סָעִיפָה, ṣā'īphā (Isa 18 5; סַעֲפָה, ṣā'appāh (pl.) (Ezk 31 6); סַרְעֲפָה, ṣar'appāh (Ezk 31 5).

(11) עֵנָה, ānāph (Mal 4 1; Ps 80 11); עֵנֶה, ānāph (Dnl 4 14.21); עֵנֶה, eneph (Ezk 36 8).

(12) פֶּאֶרֶה, pu'rāh, "a bough" (Isa 10 33); פֶּאֶרֶת, pu'rōth (pl. only) (Ezk 31 5.8).

(13) צִמְרֵת, ṣammereth, "foliage" or "boughs of trees," lit. "locks" or "fleece" of trees (Ezk 17 3; 31 3).

(14) קִצְיֹר, kāṣīr (collective) (Job 14 9), "boughs" (Ps 80 11), "branches."

(15) שִׁבְלֵת, shibbeleth, the two olive branches of Zec 4 12.

(16) שֹׁךְ, sōkh, root meaning "to interweave" (Jgs 9 49); שֹׁכָה, sōkhāh (Jgs 9 48), "boughs."

(17) שָׂרִיג, sārigh (pl. only, שָׂרִיגִים, sārighīm), "branches" (of the vine) (Gen 40 10; Joel 1 7).

Represented in Gr in the NT:

(1) βαῖον, baion (Jn 12 13), "a palm branch."
(2) κλάδος, kládos (Mt 13 32; 21 8; 24 32; Mk 4 32; 13 28; Lk 13 19; Rom 11 16.17.18.19.21).

(3) κλήμα, klēma, a slip or cutting of the vine, esp. one cut off to be grafted into another plant (Jn 15 2.4.5.6).

(4) στιβάς, stibás (=στοιβάς, stoibás), a "twig" or "bough" (Mk 11 8). E. W. G. MASTERMAN

BRAND: In the double signification of an object on fire and of objects used to feed a fire. The first meaning is expressed by אֵדָה, 'ādh, "a bent stick" for stirring fire (Am 4 11; Zec 3 2; cf Isa 7 4); the second by לַפְדִּי, lappidh, in Jgs 15 4.5. A third meaning is found in זִיקָה, zikāh, indicating the brand as a spreader of fire (Prov 26 18).

BRANDING. See PUNISHMENTS.

BRASEN, brā'z'n. See BRASS.

BRASS, bras, BRAZEN (קְדֻשֶׁת, n'hōsheth): The use of the word brass has always been more or less indefinite in its application. At the present time the term brass is applied to an alloy of copper and zinc or of copper, zinc and tin. The word tr^d "brass" in the AV would be more correctly rendered bronze, since the alloy used was copper and tin (Ex 27 4). In some passages however copper is meant (Dt 8 9), as bronze is an artificial product. This alloy was known in Egypt in at least 1600 BC. It was probably known in Europe still earlier (2000 BC), which helps to answer the question as to the source of the tin. Bronze was probably of European origin and was carried to Egypt. At a later period the Egyptians made the alloy themselves, bringing their copper from Sinai, Cyprus or northern Syria (see COPPER), and their tin from the Balkan regions or from Spain or the British Isles (see TIN). When the Children of Israel came into the promised land, they found the Canaanites already skilled in the making and use of bronze instruments. This period marked the transition from the bronze age to the iron age in Pal. Museums possessing antiquities from Bible lands have among their collections many and varied bronze objects. Among the most common are nails, lamps, hand mirrors, locks, cutting instruments, etc. Within comparatively recent times brass, meaning an alloy of copper and zinc, has been introduced into Syria. The alloy is made by the native workmen (see CRAFTS). Sheet brass is now being extensively imported for the making of bowls, vases, etc. Bronze is practically unknown in the modern native arts.

Figurative: "Brass," naturally, is used in Scripture as the symbol of what is firm, strong, lasting; hence "gates of brass" (Ps 107 16), "hoofs of brass" (Mic 4 13), "walls of brass" (Jeremiah is made as a "brazen wall," 1 18; 15 20), "mountains of brass" (Dnl 2 35, the Macedonian empire; the arms of ancient times were mostly of bronze). It becomes a symbol, therefore, of hardness, obstinacy, insensibility, in sin, as "brow of brass" (Isa 48 4); "they are brass and iron" (Jer 6 28, of the wicked); "all of them are brass" (Ezk 22 18, of Israel).

BRAVERY, brāv'er-i: תִּפְאָרָה, tiph'ārāh, or תִּפְאֵרֶת, tiph'ereth = "beauty," "glory," "honor" and "majesty," hence "splendor of bravery." "The bravery of their tinkling ornaments" (Isa 3 18 AV), "the beauty of their anklets" (ARV). Cf bravado, bravura.

BRAWLER, bról'ēr (קְדֻשֶׁת, midhyānīm; קְדֻשֶׁת, midh'wānīm, "quarrelsomeness"; ἀμαχος, ámachos, "not fighting"): Spoken of the quarrelsome woman; "a contentious [AV "brawling"] woman" (Prov 21 9). He who seeks the office of a bishop should be "no brawler" (ἀπόρως, pároinos, AV "given to wine," Tit 1 7); "not contentious" (AV "not a brawler," 1 Tim 3 3; Tit 3 2).

BRAY, brā (נָחַק, nāhak, "to bray," of the ass; כָּתַשׁ, kāthash, "to pound in a mortar"): This word occurs with two distinct meanings: (a) The harsh cry of the ass (Job 6 5). Job argued that as the sounds instinctively uttered by animals denote their wants, even so his words were but the natural expression of his longing for some adequate explanation of his sufferings, or, failing this, for death itself. Used fig. of Job's mockers (Job 30 7). (b) "To beat small in a mortar," "to chastise." Prov 27 22 refers to a more elaborate process than threshing for separating grain (ERV "corn") from its husk and impurities; used fig. of a thorough but useless course of discipline; or still more probably with reference to the Syrian custom of braying meat and bruised corn together in a mortar with a pestle, "till the meat and grain become a uniform indistinguishable pulp" (see Expos T, VIII, 521).

"enmity," "disruption," "strife" (Gen 38 29; Jgs 21 15; 2 S 5 20; 1 Ch 15 13; Neh 6 1; Job 16 14; Ps 106 23; Isa 30 13; 58 12); (2) שִׁבְרָה, shebher = "fracture," "affliction," "bruise," "destruction" (Lev 24 20; Jer 14 17; Lam 2 13; Ps 60 2); (3) בִּדְהֵק, bedheq = "a gap" or "leak" (in a building or ship) occurring in 2 K 12 5-8.12; 22 5; (4) תְּנוּאָה, t'nū'āh = "alienation," "breach of promise" (Nu 14 34 AV); (5) מִפְרָץ, miphrāç = "a break" (in the shore), and hence "a haven" (Jgs 5 17, RV "creeks").

LITERATURE

The art of bread-making is very ancient. It was even known to the Egyptians at a very early day (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians), to the Hebrews of the Exodus (Nowack, Lehrbuch der hebr. Archäologie) and, of course, to the Greeks and Romans of a later day. Bread played a large part in the vocabulary and in the life of the ancient Hebrews.

I. Dietary Preëminence.—(1) In the East bread is primary, other articles of food merely accessory; while in the West meat and other things chiefly constitute the meal, and bread is merely secondary. Accordingly "bread" in the OT, from Gen 3 19 onward, stands for food in general. (2) Moreover in ancient times, as now, most probably, when the peasant, carpenter, blacksmith or mason left home for the day's work, or when the muleteer or messenger set out on a journey, he wrapped other articles of food, if there were any, in the thin loaves of bread, and thus kept them ready for his use as needed. (3) Often the thin, glutinous loaf, puffed out with air, is seen today, opened on one side and used so as to form a natural pouch, in which meat, cheese, raisins and olives are inclosed to be eaten with the bread (see Mackie in DCG, art. "Bread"). The loaf of bread is thus made to include everything and, for this reason also, it may fitly be spoken of as synonymous with food in general. To the disciples of Jesus, no doubt, "Give us this day our daily bread" would naturally be a petition for all needed food, and in the case of the miraculous feeding of the multitude it was enough to provide them with "bread" (Mt 14 15 ff).

II. Materials.—Barley was in early times, as it is today, the main bread-stuff of the Pal peasantry (see Jgs 7 13, where "the cake of barley bread" is said to be "the sword of Gideon"), and of the poorer classes of the East in general (see Jn 6 13, where the multitude were fed on the miraculous increase of the "five barley loaves," and cf Jos, BJ, V, x, 2).

But wheat, also, was widely used as a bread-stuff then, as it is now, the wheat of the Syrian plains and uplands being remarkable for its nutritious and keeping qualities.

Three kinds, or qualities, of flour, are distinguished, according to the way of making: (1) a coarser sort, rudely made by the use of pestle and mortar, the "beaten corn" of Lev 2 14.16 (RV "bruised"); (2) the "flour" or "meal" of ordinary use (Ex 29 2; Lev 2 2; 6 15), and (3) the "fine meal" for honored guests (see Gen 18 6, where Abraham commands Sarah to "make ready . . . three measures of fine meal") with which we may compare the "fine flour" for the king's kitchen (1 K 4 22) and the "fine flour" required for the ritual meal offering, as in Lev 2 1; 5 11; 7 12; 14 10; 23 13; 24 5; etc.

III. Bread-Making.—After thoroughly sifting and cleaning the grain, the first step in the process was to reduce it to "meal" or "flour"

1. Grinding by rubbing, pounding, or grinding. (In Nu 11 8 it is said of the manna "The people went about, and gathered it, and ground it in mills, or beat it in mortars.") It has been shown that by a process, which is not yet extinct in Egypt, it was customary to rub the grain between two stones, called the "corn-rubbers" or "corn grinders," of which many specimens have been found by Petrie, Bliss, Macalister and others, at Lachish, Gezer and elsewhere (PEFS, 1902, 326; 1903, 118; cf Erman, Egypt, 180, for illustrations of actual use). For detailed descriptions of the other processes, see MORTAR; MILL.

The "flour" was then ordinarily mixed simply with water, kneaded in a wooden basin or kneading-

2. Knead- 8 3) and, in case of urgency, at once made into "cakes" and baked. (See Ex 12 34, "And the people took their dough before it was leavened.") The Hebrews called such cakes maḥṣōth, and they were the only kind allowed for use on the altar during Egyptians Kneading Dough with Their Feet.

Passover, and immediately following the Feast of Unleavened Bread (also called Maḥṣōth). Commonly however the process was as follows: a lump of leavened dough of yesterday's baking, preserved for the purpose, was broken up and mixed with the day's "batch," and the whole was then set aside and left standing until it was thoroughly leavened (see LEAVEN).

We find in the OT, as in the practice of the East today, three modes of firing or baking bread:

(1) that represented by Elijah's cake baked on the hot stones (1 K 19 6 RVm; cf "the cakes upon the hearth," Gen 18 6 AV, and see Robinson, Researches, II, 406). The stones were laid together and a fire was lighted upon them. When the stones were well heated the cinders were raked off, and the cakes laid on the stones and covered with ashes. After a while the ashes were again removed and the cake was turned (see Hos 7 8) and once more covered with the glowing ashes. It was thus cooked on both sides evenly and made ready for eating (cf Vulg, Panis subcineraris, and DeLagarde, Symmicta, II, 188, where ἐγκουθία, egkouthia, is referred to as "the hiding" of the cakes under the ashes). Out of these primitive usages of the pastoral tribes and peasants grew other improved forms of baking. (2) An ancient method of baking, prevalent still among the Bedouin of Syria and Arabia, is to employ a heated convex iron plate, or griddle, what we would call a frying pan, in lieu of the heated sand or stones. The Heb "baking-pan" (מַחְבַּת, mahābath, Lev 2 5; 7 9; cf Ezk 4 3) must have been of this species of "griddle." The reference in 1 Ch 9 31 is probably to bread baked in this way. There it is said that one of the sons of the priests "had the office of trust over the things that were baked in pans."

תַּנּוּר, tannūr (cf Arab.), no doubt were used by the Hebrews, when they settled in Pal, as they were used by the settled populations of the

4. Ovens Orient in general, more and more as they approached civilized conditions.

These "ovens" were of various kinds: (1) The simplest used by the ancients were hardly more primitive than the kind quite commonly used in Pal today. It may be called the "bowl-oven." It consists of a large clay-bowl, which is provided with a movable lid. This bowl is placed inverted upon small stones and then heated with a fuel distinctly oriental, consisting of dried dung heaped over and around it. The bread is baked on the stones, then covered by the inverted oven, which is heated by the firing of the fuel of dung on the outside of the cover. (2) The jar-oven is another form of oven found in use there today. This is a large earthenware jar that is heated by fuel of grass (Mt 6 30), stubble (Mal 4 1), dry twigs or thorns (1 K 17 12) and the like, which are placed within the jar for firing. When the jar is thus heated the cakes are stuck upon the hot inside walls. (3) The pit-oven was doubtless a development from this type. It was formed partly in the ground and partly built up of clay and plastered throughout, narrowing toward the top. The ancient Egyptians, as the monuments and mural paintings show, laid the cakes upon the outside of the oven (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians); but in Pal, in general, if the customs of today are conclusive, the fire was kindled in the inside of the pit-oven. Great numbers of such ovens have been unearthed in recent excavations, and we may well believe them to be exact counterparts of the oven of the professional bakers in the street named after them in Jerus "the bakers' street" (Jer 37 21). The largest and most developed form of oven is still the public oven of the town or city of this sort; but the primitive rural types still survive, and the fuel of thorns, and of the grass, "which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven," are still in evidence.

(1) The large pone or thick, light loaf of the West is unknown in the East. The common oriental cake or loaf is proverbially thin. The thin home-made bread is really named 5. Forms of Baked Bread both in Heb and Arab. from its thinness as is reflected in the tr "wafer" in Ex 16 31; 29 23; Lev 8 26; Nu

6 19; 1 Ch 23 29. Such bread was called in Heb rāḳīk (רַקִּיק, rāḳīk; cf modern Arab. warkāk, from warak = "foliage," "paper").

(2) It is still significantly customary at a Syrian meal to take a piece of such bread and, with the ease and skill of long habit, to fold it over at the end held in the hand so as to make a sort of spoon of it, which then is eaten along with whatever is lifted by it out of the common dish (cf Mt 26 23). But this "dipping in the common dish" is so accomplished as not to allow the contents of the dish to be touched by the fingers, or by anything that has been in contact with the lips of those who sit at meat (cf Mackie, DCG, art. "Bread").

(3) Such "loaves" are generally today about 7 in. in diameter and from half an inch to an inch thick. Such, probably, were the lad's "barley loaves" brought to Christ at the time of the feeding of the 5,000 (Jn 6 9.13). Even thinner cakes, of both leavened and unleavened bread, are sometimes made now, as of old, esp. at times of religious festivals. Often they are coated on the upper sur-deft jerk of the hand, they are slipped off upon the hot pavement and baked. These are so made and baked that when done they are soft and flexible, and for this reason are preferred by many to the thinner cakes which are cooked stiff and brown.

Arab Women Preparing Bread.

(5) The precise nature of the cracknels of 1 K 14 3 (ARV "cakes") is not known. A variety of bakemeats (Gen 40 17, lit. "food, the work of the baker") are met with in the OT, but only in a few cases is it possible or important to identify their nature or forms (see Enc Bibl, coll. 460 f). A cake used for ritual purposes (Ex 29 2 and often) seems, from its name, to have been pierced with holes, like the modern Passover cakes (cf Kennedy, 1-vol HDB, art. "Bread").

(a) Every oriental household of importance seems to have had its own oven, and bread-making for the most part was in the hands of

6. Work of Women the women. Even when and where baking, as under advancing civilization, became a recognized public industry, and men were the professional bakers, a large part of the baker's work, as is true today, was to fire the bread prepared and in a sense pre-baked by the women at home. (b) The women of the East are often now seen taking a hand in sowing, harvesting and winnowing the grain, as well as in the processes of "grinding" (Eccl 12 3; Mt 24 41; Lk 17 35), "kneading" (Gen 18 6; 1 S 28 24; 2 S 13 8; Jer 7 18) and "baking" (1 S 8 13), and doubtless it was so in ancient times to an equal extent.

IV. Sanctity and Symbolism of Bread.—It would seem that the sanctity of bread remains as unchanged in the Orient as the sanctity of

1. Sanctity shrines and graves (cf Mackie, DCG, art. "Bread," and Robinson's Researches). As in Egypt everything depended for life on the Nile, and as the Nile was considered "sacred," so in Pal, as everything depended upon the wheat and barley harvest, "bread" was in a peculiar sense "sacred." The psychology of the matter seems to be about this: all life was seen to be dependent upon the grain harvest, this in turn depended upon rain in its season, and so bread, the product at bottom of these Divine processes, was regarded as peculiarly "a gift of God," a daily reminder of his continual and often undeserved care (Mt 5 45 ff; consider in this connection the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread," Mt 6 11; cf Lk 11 11). Travelers generally note as a special characteristic of the Oriental of today that, seeing a scrap of face with olive oil and take on a glossy brown color in cooking; and sometimes they are sprinkled over with aromatic seeds, which adhere and impart a spicy flavor. They may well recall to us the "oiled bread" of Lev 8 26 and "the wafers anointed with oil" of Ex 29 2 and Lev 2 4.

(4) Sometimes large discs of dough about 1 in. thick and 8 in. in diameter are prepared and laid in rows on long, thin boards like canoe paddles, and thus inserted into the oven; then, by a quick, bread on the roadside, he will pick it up and throw it to a street dog, or place it in a crevice of the wall, or on a tree-branch where the birds may get it. One thing is settled with him, it must not be trodden under foot in the common dust, for, in the estimation of all, it has in it an element of mystery and sacredness as coming from the Giver of all good.

(a) In partaking of the hospitality of the primitive peasants of Pal today, east and west of the Jordan, one sees what a sign and

2. Symbol- symbol of hospitality and friendship ism the giving and receiving of bread is.

Among the Arabs, indeed, it has become a proverb, which may be put into English thus: "Eat salt together, be friends forever." Once let the Arab break bread with you and you are safe. You may find the bread the poorest barley loaf, still marked by the indentations of the pebbles, with small patches of the gray ash of the hearth, and here and there an inlaid bit of singed grass or charred thorn, the result of their primitive process of baking; but it is bread, the best that the poor man can give you, "a gift of God," indeed, and it is offered by the wildest Arab, with some sense of its sacredness and with somewhat of the gladness and dignity of the high duty of hospitality. No wonder, therefore, that it is considered the height of discourtesy, yea, a violation of the sacred law of hospitality, to decline it or to set it aside as unfit for use. (b) Christ must have been influenced by His knowledge of some such feeling and law as this when, on sending forth His disciples, He charged them to "take no bread with them" (Mk 6 8). Not to have expected such hospitality, and not to have used what would thus be freely offered to them by the people, would have been a rudeness, not to say an offence, on the part of the disciples, which would have hindered the reception of the good tidings of the Kingdom. (c) It has well been pointed out that God's gift of natural food to His people enters in for the praises of the Magnificat (Lk 1 53), and that when Christ called Himself "the bread of life" (Jn 6 35) He really appealed to all these endeared and indissoluble associations connected in the eastern mind with the meaning and use of bread. Most naturally and appropriately in the inauguration of the New Covenant Christ adopted as His memorial, not a monument of stone or brass, but this humble yet sacred article of food, familiar and accessible to all, to become, with the "wine" of common use, in the Lord's Supper, the perpetual symbol among His disciples of the communion of saints.

BREADTH, bredth (רֹחַב, rōḥabbh, the root idea being to make wide, spacious): A term of expanse or measurement used of the ark (Gen 6 15); of the tabernacle (Ex 27 13); of Solomon's temple (1 K 6 2). πλάτος, plátos, "breadth," as of the celestial city (Rev 21 16). Figuratively, of the comprehensiveness of God's law (Ps 119 96); of the heart (1 K 4 29, rendered "largeness of heart" EV); of God's immeasurable love (Eph 3 18).

BREAK, brāk: שָׁבַר, shābhar="break" (down, off, in pieces, up), "destroy," "quench" (Isa 14 25; Jer 19 10.11; Ezk 4 16; Am 1 5); פָּרַק, pārāk="to break off" or "eraunch"; fig. "to deliver" (Gen 27 40 AV); פָּרַה, 'ārāph="to break the neck," hence "to destroy" (Ex 13 13); הָרַס, hāras="to break through" (19 21.24); פָּרַץ, pāraç="to break" (forth, away), occurs in 19 22.24; 1 S 25 10; "breaking faith," Hos 4 2; פָּרַח, pārah="to break forth as a bud" (Lev 13 12); נָתַץ, or נָתַח, nāthaç, or nāthah="destroy" (Ezk 23 34 AV, RV "gnaw"; see BREAST); הָלַל, hālāl="profane," "defile," "stain" (Nu 30 2; Ps 89 31.34); בָּקַע, bāka="rip open" (2 K 3 26; Isa 58 8); רָעַע, rā'a="to spoil by breaking to pieces," "to make good for nothing" (Job 34 24; Ps 2 9; Jer 15 12, AV "Shall iron break northern iron?"); פָּצַח, pāçah="to break out" (in joyful sound), "break forth," "make a noise" (Isa 14 7, the nations rejoice in the peace which follows the fall of the oppressor); נִיר, nīr="to glisten," "gleam" (as of a fresh furrow) (Jer 4 3; Hos 10 12); פָּתַח, pāthah="to open wide," "loosen," "have vent" (Jer 1 14); נָפַץ, nāphaç="to dash to pieces or scatter," "overspread," "scatter" (Jer 48 12, the work usually done carefully shall be done roughly; 51 20-23, descriptive of the terrible fate appointed for Babylon); נָאֵף, nā'aph="to break wedlock" (Ezk 16 38); צָלַח, çālāh, or çālēah="break out," "come mightily" (Am 5 6). The NT employs λύω, lūō="to loosen," "dissolve" (Mt 5 19); διαρύσσω, diarüssō="to penetrate burglariously," "break through" (Mt 6 19.20, Gr "dig through"); ῥήγνυμι, or rhēgnumi, or rhēssō="to disrupt," "burst," "to utter with a loud voice" (Gal 4 27); κλάω, klāō="to break" (Acts 20 7, "to break bread," i.e. to celebrate the Lord's Supper; 1 Cor 10 16). See also BREACH.

BREAK OF DAY: אֹר, 'ōr, "to be light," "the light breaks" (2 S 2 32); אוֹרָה, auḡē, "bright light," "radiance" (Acts 20 11). See DAWN.

BREAST, brest: Signifying the front view of the bust in humans and the corresponding portion of the body in animals. חֶזֶק, hāzeh, occurs in Ex 29 26.27; Lev 7 30.31.34; 8 29; 10 14.15; Nu 6 20; 18 18; and בֶּרֶךְ, hādḥ, in Dnl 2 32. שֶׁד, or שֶׁד, shadh, or, shōdh="breast" in the sense of pap of a woman or animal (Job 24 9; Cant 8 1.8.10; Isa 60 16; Lam 4 3). Only one word occurs with this signification in the NT: στήθος, stēthos="bosom," "chest" (Lk 18 13; 23 48; Jn 13 25; 21 20). See WAVE-OFFERING.

Figurative: "The breasts of virginity," pressed and bruised (Ezk 23 3.8 AV), indicative of Ezekiel's belief that Israel practiced idolatry in Egypt (cf 20 8). "To tear [pluck off] thy breasts" (Ezk 34) denotes the anguish of the people in parting with their beloved sin (cf Hos 2 2). "Its breast of silver" (Dnl 2 32) is possibly expressive of the humanity and wealth of the Medo-Pers empire.

BREASTPLATE, brest'plāt. See ARMOR.

BREASTPLATE OF THE HIGH PRIEST, präst: The Heb word חֹשֶׁן, hōshēn, rendered in AV "breastplate," means really a "pouch" or "bag." The references to it are found exclusively in the PC (Ex 25 7; 28; 29 5; 35 9.27; 39; Lev 8 8). The descriptions of its composition and particularly the directions with regard to wearing it are exceedingly obscure. According to Ezr 2 63 and Neh 7 65 the Urim and Thummim, which were carried in the priestly pouch, were lost during the Bab exile. The actual pouch was a "span in length and a span in breadth," i.e. about 9 in. square. It was made, like the ephod, of "gold, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen" (Ex 28 15 f). In it were twelve precious stones, in rows of four, representing the twelve tribes of Israel. Apparently the pouch had two rings (perhaps four) through which passed two gold chains by which it was fastened to the ephod supplied for the purpose with ouches or clasps. The pouch was worn by the high priest over his heart when he entered the "holy place" "for a memorial before Jeh." The presence of the high priest, the representative of the people, with the names of the separate tribes on his person, brought each tribe before the notice of Jeh and thereby directed His attention to them. The full designation was hōshen mishpāt, "pouch of judgment" or "decision." It was the distinctive symbol of the priest in his capacity as the giver of oracles. As already suggested the priestly pouch contained the Urim and Thummim which were probably precious stones used as lots in giving decisions. In all probability the restored text of 1 S 14 41 preserves the true custom. On one side stood Saul and Jonathan, and the people on the other side. If the result was Urim, Saul and Jonathan would be the guilty parties. If the result was Thummim, the guilt would fasten on the people.

BREATH, breth, BREATHE, brēth, BREATHING, brēth'ing: In the EV of the OT "breath" is the rendering of נְשָׁמָה, n'shāmāh, and of רוּחַ, rū'ah. These words differ but slightly in meaning, both signifying primarily "wind," then "breath," though the former suggests a gentler blowing, the latter often a blast. As applied to persons there is no very clear distinction between the words. Yet in general one may say that of the two n'shāmāh is employed preferably of breath regarded physiologically: "vital breath," hence the vital principle, "soul [animal] life" (cf Gen 2 7; 7 22; Job 27 3, where both words occur; Isa 42 52; Dnl 5 23); while rū'ah (though it, too, sometimes signifies "vital breath") is the word generally employed where the breath is regarded physically—breath or blast as an act or force—and so is related to the will or the emotions, whence the meaning "spirit," also sometimes "thought," "purpose" (cf Job 4 9; 9 18; Ps 18 15; 146 4; Ezk 37 5.6.8.9.10). The examples cited, however, and other passages reveal a lack of uniformity of usage. Yet generally rū'ah is the expression, n'shāmāh, the principle, of life. Yet when employed of God they of course signify the principle, not of His own life, but of that imparted to His creatures. "Breathe" in EV of the OT requires no remark except at Ps 27 12 ("such as breathe out cruelty"), from yāphah, "to breathe hard," "to snort" (cf Acts 9 1). In the NT "breath" (πνοή, pnōē) occurs once Acts 17 25 in the plain sense of vital principle, the gift of God. "Breathed" is employed in Jn 20 22 of Our Lord's concrete symbolism of the giving of the Spirit. In Acts 9 1 Saul's "breathing threatening and slaughter" is lit. "snorting," etc., and the nouns are partitive genitives, being the element of which he breathed. See also SPIRIT. J. R. VAN PELT

BREECHES, brich'iz, brēch'iz: A garment, extending from the waist to or just below the knee or to the ankle, and covering each leg separately. Breeches are not listed among the garments of an ordinary wardrobe, but the priests in later times (Ex 20 26) wore a garment resembling modern trousers. These priestly linen breeches, מִכְנֵסִי בָר, mikhn'sē bhadh, were worn along with the linen coat, the linen girdle and the linen turban by Aaron on the Day of Atonement, when he entered the "holy place." (The word מִכְנֵסִי, mikhn'sē is derived from a root, כָּסַה, kāsa=נָגַה, gānaz, "to cover up," "hide.") Ordinary priests also wore them on sacrificial occasions (Ex 28 42; 39 28; Lev 6 10; Ezk 44 18). Apart from the breeches just referred to, the only reference to a similar garment among the Israelites is found in Dnl 3 21, where the שָׂרְבָל, šarbāl, RV "hosen," is mentioned. (The AV translates "coats.") The rendering of the AV is the more likely, though the meaning of the Aram. šarbāl is obscure (cf the thorough discussion in Ges., Thesaurus). In Tg and Talm (cf Levy, NHWB, s.v.), and is so taken by the rabbinical commentators. Still, Aq. and Theod. (σαράβαρα, sarabara), LXX in ver 27, Symm (anaxurides), Pesh, express the meaning "trousers" (of a looser kind than those worn by us), a garment known (from Herodotus and other sources) to have been worn by the ancient Scythians and Persians, and to have been called by them sarabara. The word, with the same connotation, was brought into the Arab. in the form siṛwāl. In both these senses the word may be originally Pers: in that of mantle, meaning properly (according to Andreas) a "head-covering" (sarabara), for which in Persia the peasants often use their mantle; in that of "trousers," corresponding to the mod. Pers shalwar, "under-breeches." Cook has pointed out that "mantles, long-flowing robes, and therefore extremely liable to catch the flames," are more likely to be esp. mentioned in this ch than trousers, or (RV) "hosen."

Breeches of the High Priest.

The word שָׂרְבָל, šarbāl (Dnl 3 21), is also uncertain. The LXX and Theod. render tiārai, "turbans"; Pesh has the same word, which is variously taken by Syrian lexicographers as "tunic," "trousers," or a kind of "gaiter" (Payne Smith, Thes. Syr., col. 3098). (For further discussion of these words, cf commentaries on Dnl of Jour. Phil., XXVI, 307 ff.) In general, we must remember that a thorough discussion of Israelitish "dress" is impossible, because of the limitations of our sources.

BREED, brēd: Found in the past tense in Ex 16 20 as a tr of רָם, rām= "to bring up," "to rise." In this ver, the manna is said to have arisen, i.e. "become alive" (with worms), to indicate that God's gifts are spoiled by selfish and miserly hoarding. The pres. act. occurs in Gen 8 17 for שָׂרַץ, šāraṣ= "to wriggle," "swarm," "abound," hence "breed abundantly"; and in Dt 32 14 for בָּן, bēn= "son," "descendant," "child," "colt," "calf," "breed." The pres. part. is found in Zeph 2 9 AV for מִמְשֶׁק, mimshāk, a derivative of מָשַׁק, meshek= "possession," "territory," "field." The passage in question should therefore be tr'd "field of nettles" (RV "possession of nettles"). FRANK E. HIRSCH

BRETHREN, breth'ren. See BROTHER.

BRETHREN OF THE LORD: In Mt 12 46 ff; Mk 3 31 ff; Lk 8 19 ff, while Jesus was in the midst of an earnest argument with scribes and Pharisees, His mother and brothers sent a message evidently intended to end the discussion. In order to indicate that no ties of the flesh should interfere with the discharge of the duties of His Messianic office, He stretched His hands toward His disciples, and said: "Whosoever shall do the will of my Father who is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother." In Mt 13 54 ff; Mk 6 2 ff, while He was teaching in His own town, Nazareth, His neighbors, who, since they had watched His natural growth among them, could not comprehend the extraordinary claims that He was making, declare in an interrogative form, that they know all about the entire family, mother, brothers and sisters. They name the brothers. Bengel suggests that there is a tone of contempt in the omission of the names of the sisters, as though not worth mentioning. In Jn 2 12, they are said to have accompanied Jesus and His mother and disciples from the wedding at Cana. In Jn 7 3 ff, they are described as unbelieving, and ridiculing His claims with bitter sarcasm. This attitude of hostility has disappeared, when, at Jerus, after the resurrection and ascension (Acts 1 14), in the company of Mary and the Eleven, and the faithful group of women, they "continued steadfastly in prayer," awaiting the promise of the gift of the Holy Spirit. Their subsequent participation in the missionary activity of the apostolic church appears in 1 Cor 9 5: "Have we no right to lead about a wife that is a believer, even as the rest of the apostles, and the brethren of the Lord, and Cephas?" In Gal 1 19, James, bishop of the church at Jerus, is designated "the Lord's brother," thus harmonizing with Mt 13 55, where their names are recorded as James, Joseph, Simon and Judas. When, then, "Jude, . . . brother of James" is mentioned (Jude ver 1), the immediate inference is that Jude is another brother of the Lord. In reading these passages, the natural inference is that these "brethren" were the sons of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus, living with Mary and her daughters, in the home at Nazareth, accompanying the mother on her journeys, and called the "brethren" of the Lord in a sense similar to that in which Joseph was called His father. They were brethren because of their common relationship to Mary. This impression is strengthened by the fact that Jesus is called her prōtōtokos, "first-born son" (Lk 2 7), as well as by the very decided implication of Mt 1 25. Even though each particular, taken separately, might, with some difficulty, be explained otherwise, the force of the argument is cumulative. There are too many items to be explained away, in order to establish any other inference. This view is not the most ancient. It has been traced to Tertullian, and has been more fully developed by Belvidius, an obscure writer of the 4th cent.

Two other views have been advocated with much learning and earnestness. The earlier, which seems to have been prevalent in the first three cents. and is supported by Origen, Eusebius, Gregory of Nyssa and Ambrose, Epiphanius being its chief advocate, regards these "brethren" as the children of Joseph by a former marriage, and Mary as his second wife. Joseph disappears from sight when Jesus is twelve years old. We know nothing of him after the narrative of the child Jesus in the temple. That there is no allusion to him in the account of the family in Mk 6 3 indicates that Mary had been a widow long before she stood by the Cross without the support of any member of her immediate family. In the Apocryphal Gospels, the attempt is made to supply what the canonical Gospels omit. They report that Joseph was over eighty years of age at his second marriage, and the names of both sons and daughters by his first marriage are given. As Lightfoot (comm. on Galatians) has remarked, "they are pure fabrications." Theophylact even advanced the theory that they were the children of Joseph by a levirate marriage, with the widow of his brother, Clopas. Others regard them as the nephews of Joseph whom, after the death of his brother Clopas, he had taken into his own home, and who thus became members of his family, and were accounted as though they were the children of Joseph and Mary. According to this view, Mary excepted, the whole family at Nazareth were no blood relatives of Jesus. It is a Docetic conception in the interest of the dogma of the perpetual virginity of Mary. All its details, even that of the advanced age and decrepitude of Joseph, start from that premise.

Another view, first propounded by Jerome when a very young man, in antagonizing Belvidius, but afterward qualified by its author, was followed by Augustine, the Roman Catholic writers generally, and carried over into Protestantism at the Reformation, and accepted, even though not urged, by Luther, Chemnitz, Bengel, etc, understands the word "brother" in the general sense of "kinsman," and interprets it here as equivalent to "cousin." According to this, these brethren were actually blood-relatives of Jesus, and not of Joseph. They were the children of Alphaeus, otherwise known as Clopas (Jn 19 25), and the sister of Mary. This Mary, in Mt 27 56, is described as "the mother of James and Joses," and in Mk 15 40, "the mother of James the less and of Joses, and Salome." This theory as completely developed points to the three names, James, Judas and Simon found both in the list of the apostles and of the "brethren," and argues that it would be a remarkable coincidence if they referred to different persons, and the two sisters, both named Mary, had found the very same names for their sons. The advocates of this theory argue also that the expression "James the less" shows that there were only two persons of the name James in the circle of those who were most closely connected with Jesus. They say, further, that, after the death of Joseph, Mary became an inmate of the home of her sister, and the families being combined, the presence and attendance of her nephews and nieces upon her can be explained without much difficulty, and the words of the people at Nazareth be understood. But this complicated theory labors under many difficulties. The identity of Clopas and Alphaeus cannot be established, resting, as it does, upon obscure philological resemblances of the Aram. form of the two names (see ALPHAËUS). The most that such argument affords is a mere possibility. Nor is the identity of "Mary the wife of Clopas" with the sister of Mary, the mother of Jesus, established beyond a doubt. Jn 19 25, upon which it rests, can with equal correctness be interpreted as teaching that four women stood by the cross, of whom "Mary of Clopas" was one, and His mother's sister was another. The decision depends upon the question as to whether "Mary" be in apposition to "sister." If the ver be read so as to present two pairs, it would not be a construction without precedent in the NT, and would avoid the difficulty of finding two sisters with the same name—a difficulty greater yet than that of three cousins with the same name. Nor is the identity of "James the less" with the son of Alphaeus beyond a doubt. Any argument concerning the comparative "less," as above explained, fails when it is found that in the Gr there is no comparative, but only "James the little," the implication being probably that of his stature as considerably below the average, so as to occasion remark. Nor is the difficulty less when it is proposed to identify three of these brethren of Jesus with apostles of the same name. For the "brethren" and the apostles are repeatedly distinguished. In Mt 12 49, while the former stood without, the latter are gathered around Jesus. In Jn 2 12, we read: "his mother, and his brethren, and his disciples." In Acts 1 13 the Eleven, including James the son of Alphaeus, and Simon, and Judas of James, and then it is said that they were accompanied by "his brethren." But the crowning difficulty of this hypothesis of Jerome is the record of the unbelief of the brethren and of their derision of His claims in Jn 7 3-5.

On the other hand, the arguments against regarding them as sons of Mary and Joseph are not formidable. When it is urged that their attempts to interfere with Jesus indicate a superiority which, according to Jewish custom, is inconsistent with the position of younger brothers, it may be answered that those who pursue an unjustifiable course are not models of consistency. When an argument is sought from the fact that Jesus on the cross commended His mother to John, the implication is immediate that she had no sons of her own to whom to turn in her grief and desolation; the answer need not be restricted to the consideration that unknown domestic circumstances may explain the omission of her sons. A more patent explanation is that as they did not understand their brother, they could not understand their mother, whose whole life and interests were bound up in her first-born. But, on the other hand, no one of the disciples understood Jesus and appreciated His work and treasured up His words as did John. A bond of fellowship had thus been established between John and Mary that was closer than her nearer blood relationship with her own sons, who, up to this time, had regarded the course of Jesus with disapproval, and had no sympathy with His mission. In the home of John she would find consolation for her loss, as the memories of the wonderful life of her son would be recalled, and she would converse with him who had rested on the bosom of Jesus and whom Jesus loved. Even with the conversion of these brethren within a few days into faithful confessors, before the view of Jesus, provision was made for her deeper spiritual communion with her risen and ascended Son through the testimony of Jesus which John treasured in his deeply contemplative spirit. There was much that was alike in the characters of Mary and John. This may have had its ground in relationship, as many regard Salome his mother, the sister of the mother of Jesus mentioned in Jn 19 25.

Underneath both the stepbrother (Epiphanian) and the cousin (Hieronymian) theories, which coincide in denying that Mary was the actual mother of these brethren, lies the idea of the perpetual virginity of Mary. This theory which has as its watchword the stereotyped expression in liturgy and hymn, "Maria semper Virgo," although without any support from Holy Scripture, pervades the theology and the worship of the ancient and the mediaeval churches. From the Gr and Rom churches it has passed into Protestantism in a modified form. Its plea is that it is repugnant to Christian feeling to think of the womb of Mary, in which the Word, made flesh, had dwelt in a peculiar way, as the habitation of other babes. In this idea there lies the further thought, most prominent in mediaeval theology, of a sinfulness of the act in itself whereby new human lives come into existence, and of the inclination implanted from the creation, upon which all family ties depend. 1 Tim 4 3,4; He 13 4 are sufficient answer. The taint of sin lies not in marriage, and the use of that which is included in its institution, and which God has blessed (cf Acts 10 15), but in its perversion and abuse. It is by an inconsistency that Protestants have conceded this much to the theory of Rome, that celibacy is a holier estate than matrimony, and that virginity in marriage is better than marriage itself. The theory also is connected with the removal of Mary from the sphere of ordinary life and duties as too commonplace for one who is to be surrounded with the halo of a demi-god, and to be idealized in order to be worshipped. The interpretation that they are the Lord's real brethren ennobles and glorifies family life in all its relations and duties, and sanctifies motherhood with all its cares and trials as holier than a selfish isolation from the world, in order to evade the annoyances and humiliations inseparable from fidelity to our callings. Not only Mary, but Jesus with her, knew what it was to grieve over a house divided concerning religion (Mt 10 35 ff). But that this unbelief and indifference gave way before the clearer light of the resurrection of Jesus is shown by the presence of these brethren in the company of the disciples in Jerus (Acts 1 14). The reference to His post-resurrection appearance to James (1 Cor 15 7) is probably connected with this change in their attitude. 1 Cor 9 5 shows that at least two of these brothers were active as missionaries, undoubtedly within the Holy Land, and to Jews, according to the agreement into which James entered in Gal 2, and his well-known attitude on questions pertaining to the Gentiles. Zahn regards James as an ascetic and celibate not included in 1 Cor 9 5, which is limited then to Jude and Simon. Their marriage indicates "the absence in the Holy Family of that pseudo-asceticism which has so much confused the tradition concerning them" (Alford). See also JAMES; JUDE.

BRIBERY, brib'er-i (שֹׁחַד, shōhadh, "a gift," in a corrupt sense, "a bribe"): The Heb law condemns everything that would tend to impair the impartial administration of justice, particularly the giving and receiving of gifts or bribes, in order to pervert judgment (Ex 23 8). Allusions are frequent to the prevailing corruption of oriental judges and rulers. "And fire shall consume the tents of bribery" (Job 15 34; 1 S 8 3; Ps 26 10; Isa 1 23; 33 15; Ezk 22 12). Samuel speaks of a "ransom" in the sense of a bribe: "Of whose hand have I taken a ransom [כֹּפֶר, kōpher, "covering," AV "bribe"] to blind mine eyes therewith?" (1 S 12 3; Am 5 12; cf Am 2 6). See CRIMES; JUSTICE; PUNISHMENTS. L. KAISER

BRICK (לֶבֶן, l-bhēnāh): The ancient Egypt word appears in the mod. Egypt Arab. toob. In Syria the sun-baked bricks are commonly called libn or lebin, from the same Sem root as the Heb word.

Bricks are mentioned only a few times in the Bible. The story of how the Children of Israel, while in bondage in Egypt, had their task of brick-making made more irksome by being required to collect their own straw is one of the most familiar of Bible narratives (Ex 1 14; 5 7,10-19).

Modern excavations at Pithom in Egypt (Ex 1 11) show that most of the bricks of which that store-city was built were made of mud and straw baked in the sun. These ruins are chosen as an example from among the many ancient brick structures because they probably represent the work of the very Heb slaves who complained so bitterly of their royal taskmaster. In some of the upper courses rushes had been substituted for straw, and still other bricks had no fibrous material. These variations could be explained by a scarcity of straw at that time, since, when there was a shortage in the crops, all the straw (Arab. tibn) was needed for feeding the animals. It may be that when the order came for the workmen to provide their own straw they found it impossible to gather sufficient and still furnish the required number of bricks (Ex 5 8). However, the quality of clay of which some of the bricks were made was such that no straw was needed.

Brickmaking in early Egypt history was a government monopoly. The fact that the government pressed into service her Asiatic captives, among whom were the Children of Israel, made it impossible for independent makers to compete. The early bricks usually bore the government stamp or the stamp of some temple authorized to use the captives for brick manufacture. The methods employed by the ancient Egyptians differ in no respect from the modern procedure in that country. The Nile mud is thoroughly slipped or mixed and then rendered more cohesive by the addition of earth. The outer coating of plaster must be renewed from year to year. In some of the villages of northern Syria the brick houses are dome-shaped, looking much like beehives. In the defiant assertion of Isa 9 10 the superiority of hewn stone over bricks implied a greater difference in cost and stability than exists between a frame house and a stone house in western lands today.

In the buildings of ancient Babylonia burnt bricks were used. These have been found by modern excavators, which confirms the description of Gen 11 3. Burnt bricks were rarely used in Egypt before the Rom period and in Pal their use for building purposes was unknown. Specimens of partially burnt, glazed bricks have been found in chopped straw or stubble. The pasty mass is next worked into a mould made in the shape of a box without a bottom. If the sides of the mould have been dusted with dry earth it will easily slip off and the brick is allowed to dry in the sun until it becomes so hard that the blow of a hammer is often necessary to break it.

When the children of Israel emigrated to their new country they found the same methods of brickmaking employed by the inhabitants, methods which are still in vogue throughout the greater part of Pal and Syria. In the interior of the country, esp. where the building stone is scarce or of poor quality, the houses are made of sun-baked brick (libn). Frequently the west and south walls, which are exposed most to the winter storms, are made of hewn stone and the rest of the structure of bricks. When the brick-laying is finished the house is plastered inside and outside with the same material of which the bricks are made and finally whitewashed or painted with grey- or yellow-colored Babylonia and recently in one of the Hittite mounds of northern Syria. These were probably used for decorative purposes only. If burnt bricks had been generally used in Pal, traces of them would have been found with the pottery which is so abundant in the ruins (see POTTERY).

The fact that unburnt bricks were so commonly used explains how the sites of such cities as ancient Jericho could have become lost for so many cents. When the houses and walls fell they formed a heap of earth not distinguishable from the surrounding soil. The wood rotted and the iron rusted away, leaving for the excavator a few bronze and stone implements and the fragments of pottery which are so precious as a means of identification. The "tels" or mounds of Pal and Syria often represent the ruins of several such cities one above the other.

BRICK-KILN, bri'kil, -kiln (מִלְבֵּן, malbēn): The Heb word is better tr^d by "brickmould." In Syria the brickmould is still called milben. In Jer 43 9 the ARV rendering is "brickwork" and the ARVm "pavement." 2 S 12 31 becomes much clearer if the ARVm is incorporated. Being put to work at the brickmould was considered the task of those taken as slaves. The ancestors of the new taskmasters had themselves been put to similar toil.

BRIDE, brid. See MARRIAGE.

BRIDE-CHAMBER, brid'chām-bēr (νυμφών, numphōn): The room in which the marriage ceremonies were held (Mt 9 15; Mk 2 19; Lk 5 34; cf Mt 22 10). See CHAMBER; MARRIAGE.

BRIDE-CHAMBER, SONS (CHILDREN) OF THE (οἱ υἱοὶ τοῦ νυμφώνος, hoi huiōi tou numphōnos): These were friends or companions of the bridegroom and were usually very numerous (Mt 9 15; Mk 2 19; Lk 5 34). Any wedding guest might be included in the expression, or anyone who took part in the bridal procession and remained for the wedding-feast (see MARRIAGE). In the above passages "the sons of the bride-chamber" are the disciples of Christ.

BRIDEGROOM, brid'grōom; BRIDEGROOM, FRIEND OF. See MARRIAGE.

BRIDGE, brij (γέφυρα, géphura, 2 Macc 12 13 AV; RV GEPHYRUN): Does not occur in the canonical Scriptures, unless it be indirectly in the proper name Geshur (גֶּשׁוּר, g'shūr, 2 S 3 3; 13 37; 15 8; 1 Ch 2 23, and others). The so-called Jacob's bridge is said to mark the site where Jacob crossed the upper Jordan on his return from Paddan-aram, but, of course, does not date from the time of the patriarch. There are traces of ancient bridges across the Jordan in the vicinity of the Lake of Gennesaret, over the Arnon and over other rivers which enter the Jordan from the east; but none of them seem to date farther back than the Rom period. Nah 2 6, in which the Chaldaic paraphrase renders "bridges," evidently refers to dikes or weirs. Judas Maccabaeus is said to have planted a bridge in order to besiege the town of Casphor (2 Macc 12 13). Jos (Ant, V, i, 3) tells us that the Jordan, before the passage of the Israelites, had never been bridged, evidently implying that in his own time bridges had been constructed over it, which was the case, under the Romans. The bridge connecting the temple with the upper part of the city of which Jos speaks (War, VI, vi, 2; Ant, XV, xi, 5) probably was a viaduct.

BRIDLE, brī'd'l. See BIT.

BRIER, brī'ēr. See THORNS.

BRIGANDINE, brig'an-dēn. See ARMS (Defensive, 5); COAT OF MAIL.

BRIGHTNESS, brit'nes: Used by AV in He 1 3 for "effulgence of his glory," as in RV and ARV. The Gr apaύgasma may mean either "reflection" or "radiation." Patristic usage favors the latter; cf Wisd 7 26; also the Nicene Creed: "Light of Light," i.e. the Son not only manifests the Father, but is of the same substance. "What emanates from light, must have the nature of light" (Delitzsch).

BRIM: קָצֶה, kā'eh or קָצֶה, kē'eh="an extremity" (in a variety of applications and idioms), "border," "edge," "side," "shore" (Josh 3 15 AV; RV "brink"); also שְׂפָה or שֶׁפֶת, sāphāh or sepheth=

"edge," "lip" (1 K 7 23.24.26; 2 Ch 4 2.5). In Jn 2 7, the adv. ἀνω, anō, is used to emphasize the vb. ἐγέμισαν, egēmisan="to fill," thus giving the idea of "filling to the top."

BRIMSTONE, brim'stōn, brim'stun (בְּרִיתִּים, gophrith; τὸ θεῖον, tó theion): The word tr^d "brimstone" probably referred originally to the pitch of trees, like the cypress. By analogy it has been rendered "brimstone" because of the inflammability of both substances. Sulphur existed in Pal in early times and was known by most of the ancient nations as a combustible substance. In the vicinity of the Dead Sea, even at the present time, deposits of sulphur are being formed. Blanckenhorn (ZDPV, 1896) believes that this formation is due to the action of bituminous matter upon gypsum, as these two substances are found associated with each other in this district. Travelers going from Jericho to the Dead Sea may pick up lumps of sulphur, which are usually incrustated with crystals of gypsum. Dt 29 23 well describes the present aspect of this region. That the inhabitants of the land had experienced the terrors of burning sulphur is very probable. Once one of these deposits took fire it would melt and run in burning streams down the ravines spreading everywhere suffocating fumes such as come from the ordinary brimstone match. No more realistic figure could be chosen to depict terrible suffering and destruction. It is not at all unlikely that during some of the disastrous earthquakes which took place in this part of the world, the hot lava sent forth ignited not only the sulphur, but also the bitumen, and added to the horrors of the earthquake the destruction caused by burning pitch and brimstone.

The figurative use of the word brimstone to denote punishment and destruction is illustrated by such passages as Dt 29 23; Job 18 15; Ps 11 6; Isa 30 33; Ezk 38 22; Lk 17 29; Rev 9 17.

BRING: דָּשָׁא, dāshā="to sprout," "spring" (Gen 1 11 AV); שָׂרַץ, shāraç="to wriggle," "swarm" (Gen 1 20f; 9 7; Ex 8 3); יָלַד, yāladh="to bear," "beget" (Gen 3 16; 2 K 19 3; Job 15 35; 39 1.2; "what a day may bring forth," Prov 27 1; "before the decree bring forth," Zeph 2 2); אָנַן, ānan="to cloud over," "to darken" (Gen 9 14); שָׁלַח, shālāh="to send on," "to escort" (18 16); שָׁב, shūbh="to turn back," "bring" (again, back, home again), "fetch," "establish" (24 5.6.8; Job 10 9; Ps 68 22; "bring him back to see," Eccl 3 22; Zec 10 6.10); נָגַשׁ, nāghash="present," "adduce" (an argument) (1 S 13 9; 15 32; 23 9; 30 7; "bring forth your strong reasons," Isa 41 21.22); עָשָׂה, āsāh="to do," "cause to be," "accomplish" (Ps 37 5); קָלַה, ālāh="to carry up," "exalt," "restore" (Gen 46 4; Ex 3 8.17; 33 12; Ps 71 20; Hos 12 13); נָגַע, nāgha="to touch," "lay hand upon," "reach to" (Lev 5 7); קָבַד, kābhadh, or קָבַד, kābhēdh="to be heavy" (causat. "to make weighty"), "to be glorious" (Prov 4 8); קָנַע, kāna="to bend the knee," hence "humiliate," "bring" (down, into subjection, under), "subdue" (Dt 9 3; Isa 25 5); זָכַר, zākhar="to mark," "call to, put (put in) remembrance" (Ps 38 title; 70 title); יָבַל, yābhal="to flow," "bring" (esp. with pomp) (60 9; 68 29; 76 11; Zeph 3 10); חָיַל, hāl, or חָיַל, hāl="to writhe in pain," "to be in travail" (Isa 66 8); צָעַד, çā'adh="to step regularly," "march," "hurl" (Job 18 14); הָלַךְ, hālakh="to walk," "get" (Hos 2 14); גָּדַל, gādhal="bring up," "increase" (9 12).

The NT employs τελεσφορέω, telesphorēō = "to bring to maturity," "to ripen" (Lk 8 14); ὑπομιμνήσκω, hupomimnēskō = "to bring to mind," "suggest," "bring to remembrance" (Jn 14 26); δουλόω, doulōō = "to enslave" (Acts 7 6); σύντροφος, sūntrophos = "brought up with" (13 1 RV; "the foster-brother of"); διασώζω, diasōzō = "to save," "to care," "rescue" (23 24); ἀθετέω, athetéō = "to set aside," "cast off," "bring to naught" (1 Cor 1 19); καταργέω, katargéō = "to abolish," "destroy," "do away," "put away," "make void" (1 28); προπέμπω, propeḗmō = "to send forward," "bring forward" (1 Cor 16 6 AV; Tit 3 13 AV; 3 Jn ver 6 AV); ἐκτρέφω, ektréphō = "to rear up to maturity," "to cherish," "nourish" (Eph 6 4 AV). FRANK E. HIRSCH BRINK, brink: שֵׁפָה, sāphāh, or שֵׁפֶת, sepheth = "the lip," "margin," "bank," "edge" (Gen 41 3; Ex 2 3; 7 15); קֶצֶה, kāceh, or קֶצֶה, kēceh = "an extremity," "border," "brim" (Josh 3 8.15; Isa 19 7; Dnl 12 5). See BRIM.

BROAD, brōd (רָחֹב, rōhabh, "width"; רֶחֶב, rehēbh, "a broadway," "street," "court"; εὐρύχωρος, eurūchōros, "spacious"): Occurs frequently as a term of dimension (Ex 27 1; 1 K 6 6; Ezk 40 6.43 RV, "handbreadth long") and as indicative of strength (Neh 3 8; Jer 51 58). The centers of communal life are called the "broad places," often rendered "streets" (Jer 5 1; Cant 3 2; Nah 2 4). A court before the temple: "the broad place on the east" (AV "the east street," 2 Ch 29 4); "broad plates" (Nu 16 38.39, RV "beaten").

Figurative: Relief from distress: "Yea, he would have allured thee out of [Heb "the mouth of"] distress into a broad place" (Job 36 16); the liberty of obedience or liberty within the law (Ps 119 96, "broad," "roomy," "at liberty"); the all-sufficiency of God for His people (Isa 33 21). Jerus could not boast of a river or navy—Jeh's presence with and within her would more than supply these deficiencies; the road to destruction: "Broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction" (Mt 7 13); the ostentatious piety of the Pharisees: "They make broad [πλατύνω, platínō, "widen"] their phylacteries" (Mt 23 5). BROAD PLACE. See CITY.

BROIDERED, broid'ērd: (1) רִקְמָה, riqmāh, "variegation of color" (Ezk 16 10.13.18; 26 16; 27 7.16.24); (2) תַּשְׁבֵּעַ, tashbēc, "checkered stuff" (as reticulated). The high priest's garments consisted of "a breastplate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a broidered coat [Ex 28 4 AV; RV "a coat of checker work"], a miter, and a girdle"; (3) πλέγμα, plégma, "twined or plaited work" (1 Tim 2 9 AV). See BRAIDED; EMBROIDERY.

BROKEN: brō'k'n: Occurs both as past part. of the vb. tr^d "to break" and as an adj. The former use will be dealt with here only so far as vbs. occur which are thus tr^d but do not present the non-participial forms. Such are: מָרַח, mārāh = "bruised," "emasculated" (Lev 21 20); הָתַח, hāthath = "to frustrate," hence "to break down" either by violence or by confusion and fear (1 S 2 10; Jer 48 20.39); דָּכָה, dākāh = "to collapse" (Ps 44 19; 51 8); רָצַץ, rāṣaṣ = "to crack in pieces," "crush" (Eccl 12 6); כָּתַח, kāthath = "to bruise or violently strike," "break in pieces" (Isa 30 14); Jer 2 16 should evidently be rendered: "have grazed on the crown of thy head," instead of AV "have broken," etc, for רָעָה, rā'āh = "to tend a flock," "pasture," "graze," but gives no hint of the meaning "to break"; עָלָה, ālāh = "to arise," "depart" (Jer 37 11); συνθλάω, sunthlāō = "to dash together," "shatter" (Mt 21 44); ἐξορύσσω, exorússo = "to dig through," "to extract," "remove" (Mk 2 4). See BREAK. FRANK E. HIRSCH BROKENFOOTED, brō'k'n-fōōt-ed (שֶׁבֶחֶר רֶגֶל, shebher reghel): In Lev 21 19, one of the blemishes which prevented a man of priestly descent from the execution of the priestly office.

BROKENHANDED, brō'k'n-hand-ed (שֶׁבֶחֶר יָד, shebher yād): In Lev 21 19 one of the blemishes which prevented a man of priestly descent from the execution of the priestly office.

BROKENHEARTED, brō'k'n-hār-ted (שֶׁבֶחֶר לֵב, shābhar lēbh; συντετριμμένοι τὴν καρδίαν, sun-tetrimmenoi tēn kardían; Ps 69 20.21; Isa 61 1; Lk 4 18 AV; "of a broken heart," Ps 34 18; "broken in heart," 147 3): People who feel their spiritual bankruptcy and helplessness, and who long for the help and salvation of God. Such people are in the right condition to be met and blessed by God. Cf "of contrite spirit" (Ps 34 18; Isa 66 2).

BROOCH, brōch (חֶה, hāh): Used in pl. by RV (AV "bracelets") for a class of "jewels of gold" brought as offerings by both men and women of Israel (Ex 35 22). "Brooches," as Mackie says, is unoriental. The Heb word means most likely nose-rings. See BRACELET; RING.

BROOK, brōok (נַחַל, naḥal, נַחֲלִיק, 'āphīk, נַחֲלִי, yē'ōr, מִיכָל, mīkhāl; χειμαρρῶς, cheimarrhos): In Pal there are few large streams. Of the smaller ones many flow only during the winter, or after a heavy rain. The commonest Heb word for brook is naḥal, which is also used for river and for valley, and it is not always clear whether the valley or the stream in the valley is meant (Nu 13 23; Dt 2 13; 2 S 15 23). The Arab. wādī, which is sometimes referred to in this connection, is not an exact ||, for while it may be used of a dry valley or of a valley containing a stream, it means the valley and not the stream. 'Āphīk and yē'ōr are tr^d both "brook" and "river," yē'ōr being generally used of the Nile (Ex 1 22, etc), though in Dnl 12 5-7, of the Tigris. Cheimarrhos, "winter-flowing," is applied in Jn 18 1 to the Kidron. Many of the streams of Pal which are commonly called rivers would in other countries be called brooks, but in such a dry country any perennial stream assumes a peculiar importance. ALFRED ELY DAY

BROOK OF EGYPT, THE (נַחַל, naḥal = "a flowing stream," "a valley"; best tr^d by the oriental word wady, which means, as the Heb

1. Name word does, both a stream and its valley): The Brook of Egypt is mentioned six times in the OT (Nu 34 5; Josh 15 4.47; 1 K 8 65; Isa 27 12); once, Gen 15 18, by another word, נַחֲר, nāḥār. The Brook of E. was not an Egypt stream at all, but a little desert stream near the borderland of Egypt, a wady of the desert, and, perhaps, the dividing line between Canaan and Egypt. It is usually identified with the Wady el 'Arish of modern geography.

The Brook of E. comes down from the plateau et Tih in the Sinai peninsula and falls into the Mediterranean Sea at lat. 31 5 N., long. 33

2. Descrip- 42 E. Its source is at the foot of the central mountain group of the peninsula. The upper portion of the wady is some 400 ft. above the sea. Its course, with one sharp bend to the W. in the upper part, runs nearly due N. along the western slope of the plateau. Its whole course of 140 miles lies through the desert. These streams in the Sinai peninsula are usually dry water-courses, which at times become raging rivers, but are very seldom babbling "brooks." The floods are apt to come with little or no warning when cloudbursts occur in the mountain region drained.

patible with such discriminating use of these words. And even if the elimination of all mistakes be attributed to one person, a final R, the difficulty is scarcely lessened. For as no purpose is served by this discriminating use of words, it is evidently a natural phenomenon. In every instance of the use of yē'ôr, one or other of the usual Heb words, nahal or nāhār would have served the purpose of WĀDI-UL-'AIN (THE PRESUMED SITE OF GERAR).

The use of the Heb word nahal for this wady points to a curious and most interesting and important piece of archaeological evidence on the critical question of the origin of the Pent. In the Pent, the streams of Egypt are designated by an Egypt word (𓂏𓂐, yē'ôr) which belongs to Egypt, as the word bayou does to the lower Mississippi valley, while every other stream mentioned, not excepting this desert stream, "the Brook of E.," is designated by one or other of two Heb words, nahal and nāhār. Each of these words occurs 13 times in the Pent, but never of the streams of Egypt. The use of nāhār in Ex 7 19 in the account of the plagues is not really an exception for the word is then used generically in contrast with yē'ôr to distinguish between the "flowing streams," n'hārōth, and the sluggish irrigation branches of the Nile, yē'ōrim, "canals" (cf CANALS) (Isa 19 6; 33 21), while yē'ôr occurs 30 times but never of any other than the streams of Egypt. There is thus a most exact discrimination in the use of these various words, a discrimination which is found alike in P, J, and E of the documentary theory, and also where R is supposed to have altered the documents. Such discrimination is scarcely credible on the hypothesis that the Pent is by more than one author, in later than Mosaic times, or that it is by any author without Egypt training. The documentary theory which requires these instances of the use of these various words for "river" to have been recorded by several different authors or redactors, in different ages and all several cents. after the Exodus, far away from Egypt and opportunities for accurate knowledge of its language, seems utterly incompatible with such discriminating use of these words. The only time and place at which such experience in the use of Egypt words is to be expected in Israel is among the people of the Exodus not long subsequent to that event.

extensive use without a single mistake. The only time and place at which such experience in the use of Egypt words is to be expected in Israel is among the people of the Exodus not long subsequent to that event.

BROOM, brōōm: Occurs in 1 K 19 4m ("broom-tree"); Job 30 4, and Ps 120 4m as the tr of the Heb רֹתֵם, rōthem, where AV employed "juniper" which is retained in RV text in 1 K 19 4 and Job 30 4. Juniper is certainly incorrect and broom is not a particularly happy rendering. The rōthem was doubtless the shrub called by the Arabs ratam, a shrub which casts so little shadow that it would be used for shade only when there was no other refuge from the desert sun, and would be eaten only in case of the direst necessity, but which could be burned and used for the making of charcoal. See JUNIPER.

DAVID FOSTER ESTES

BROTH, broth (בְּרֹךְ, mārāk): Equivalent to our "soup." When Gideon (Jgs 6 19) made ready a kid, "the flesh he put in a basket," but, it is added, "he put the broth in a pot"; and he is told by the angel to "pour out the broth" (ver 20). Isaiah (65 4) makes Jeh speak of rebellious Israel as "a people that provoke me to my face continually sacrificing in gardens," and adds in description "that eat swine's flesh, and broth of abominable things is in their vessels" (mārāk, pārāk). See Food.

BROTHER, bruth'ēr (אָה, adelphós, adelphós) = kin by birth, from the same parents or parent): Used extensively in both OT and NT of other relations and relationships, and expanding under Christ's teaching to include the universal brotherhood of man. Chiefly employed in the natural sense, as of Cain and Abel (Gen 4 8); of Joseph and his brethren (Gen 42 3); of Peter and Andrew, of James and John (Mt 10 2). Of other relationships: (1) Abram's nephew, Lot, is termed "brother" (Gen 14 14); (2) Moses' fellow-countrymen are "brethren" (Ex 2 11; Acts 3 22; cf He 7 5); (3) a member of the same tribe (2 S 19 12); (4) an ally (Am 1 9), or an allied or cognate people (Nu 20 14); (5) used of common discipleship or the kinship of humanity (Mt 23 8); (6) of moral likeness or kinship (Prov 18 9); (7) of friends (Job 6 15); (8) an equal in rank or office (1 K 9 13); (9) one of the same faith (Acts 11 29; 1 Cor 5 11); (10) a favorite oriental metaphor used to express likeness or similarity (Job 30 29, "I am a brother to jackals"); (11) a fellow-priest or office-bearer (Ezr 3 2); Paul called Sosthenes "brother" (1 Cor 1 1) and Timothy his spiritual son and associate (2 Cor 1 1); (12) a brother-man, any member of the human family (Mt 7 3-5; He 2 17; 8 11; 1 Jn 2 9; 4 20); (13) signifies spiritual kinship (Matt 12 50); (14) a term adopted by the early disciples and Christians to express their fraternal love for each other in Christ, and universally adopted as the language of love and brotherhood in His kingdom in all subsequent time (2 Pet 3 15; Col 4 7.9.15). The growing conception of mankind as a brotherhood is the outcome of this Christian view of believers as a household, a family (Eph 2 19; 3 15; cf Acts 17 26). Jesus has made "neighbor" equivalent to "brother," and the sense of fraternal affection and obligation essential to vital Christianity, and coextensive with the world. The rabbis distinguished between "brother" and "neighbor," applying "brother" to Israelites by blood, "neighbor" to proselytes, but allowing neither title to the Gentiles. Christ and the apostles gave the name "brother" to all Christians, and "neighbor" to all the world (1 Cor 5 11; Lk 10 29 ff). The missionary passion and aggressiveness of the Christian church is the natural product of this Christian conception of man's true relation to man. See also FAMILY RELATIONSHIPS.

DWIGHT M. PRATT

BROTHERHOOD, bruth'ēr-hōōd: The rare occurrence of the term (only Zec 11 14 and 1 Pet 2 17) in contrast with the abundant use of "brother," "brethren," seems to indicate that the sense of the vital relation naturally called for the most concrete expression: "the brethren." But in 1 Pet 2 17 the abstract is used for the concrete. In the OT the brotherhood of all Israelites was emphasized; but in the NT the brotherhood in Christ is a relation so much deeper and stronger as to eclipse the other. See also BROTHER; BRETHREN.

BROTHER-IN-LAW. See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

BROTHERLY, bruth'ēr-li (אָה, āh, "brother"; φιλαδελφία, philadelphía, "brotherly love"): Like a brother in all the large human relationships indicated above; e.g. the early friendly and fraternal alliance between Tyre and Israel as illustrated by "brotherly covenant" between David and Solomon, and Hiram, king of Tyre (2 S 5 11; 1 K 5 12), and repudiated in a later generation by the treachery of Tyre (Am 1 9). See BROTHERLY KINDNESS (LOVE).

BROTHERLY KINDNESS, kind'nes (AV 2 Pet 1 7), or LOVE (AV Rom 12 10; 1 Thess 4 9; He 13 1; φιλαδελφία, philadelphía): In 1. As Moral RV, "love of the brethren" in all Ideal places, and so in AV of 1 Pet 1 22, thus defining the disposition as love, and its objects as brethren. Since God is Father and men are His sons, they are therefore brethren of one another. As sonship is the most essential factor in man's right relation to God, so is brotherhood in his relation to his fellow-man. Brotherhood is first known as the relation between sons of the same parent, a relation of tender affection and benevolence. It becomes gradually extended to kindred, and to members of the same tribe or nation. And the Christian ideal of society is that a similar relation should exist between all men without limit or distinction. Agápē, "love" (see CHARITY), is the word in the NT that generally denotes this ideal. "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" is the whole law of conduct as between man and man (Mt 22 39.40); and neighbor includes every man within one's reach (Lk 10 29 ff), even enemies (Mt 5 44; Lk 6 35). Without the love of man, the love of God is impossible, but "he that abideth in love abideth in God" (1 Jn 4 16.20).

But man's sonship to God may be potential or actual. He may not respond to God's love or know His Fatherhood. Likewise love to man may not be reciprocated, and therefore may be incomplete. Yet it is the Christian's duty, like God, to maintain his disposition of love and benevolence to those that hate and curse him (Lk 6 27.28). But within the Christian community, love should respond to love, and find its fulfilment, for there all men are, or should be, God's sons actually, "because the love of God hath been shed abroad in our hearts, through the Holy Spirit which was given unto us" (Rom 5 5). And this mutual love within the Christian brotherhood (1 Pet 5 9) is called philadelphia.

This twofold ideal of social morality as universal benevolence and mutual affection had been foreshadowed by the Stoics (q.v.). Men as citizens of the world should adopt an attitude of justice and mercy toward all men, even slaves; but within the community of the "wise" there should be the mutual affection of friendship. Christianity succeeded in organizing and realizing in intense and practical fellowship the ideal that remained vague and abstract in the Gr schools: "See how these Christians love one another." It was their Master's example followed, and His commandment and promise fulfilled: "Love one another . . . as I have loved you . . . ; by this shall all men know that ye are my disciples" (Jn 13 14.34.35). Paul in his earliest epistle bears witness that the Thessalonians practise love "toward all the brethren that are in all Macedonia," even as they had been taught of God, but urges them to "abound more and more" (1 Thess 4 9.10). For the healing of differences, and to build up the church in

4. Christian order and unity, he urges the Romans Advance on "in love of the brethren (to) be tenderly Heathen affectioned one to another" (Rom 12 Thought 10). Christians must even "forbear one another in love" (Eph 4 2) and "walk in love, even as Christ also loved you" (Eph 5 2; Phil 2 1.2). It involves some suffering and sacrifice. The author of the Epistle to the He recognizes the presence of "love of the brethren" and urges that it may continue (He 13 1). It is the direct result of regeneration, of purity and obedience to the truth (1 Pet 1 22.23). It proceeds from godliness and issues in love (2 Pet 1 7). "Love of the brethren" (agapē) is the one practical topic of John's epistles. It is the message heard from the beginning, "that we should love one another" (1 Jn 3 11.23). It is the test of light and darkness (2 10); life and death (3 14); children of God or children of the devil (3 10; 4 7-12). Without it there can be no knowledge or love of God (4 20), but when men love God and obey Him, they necessarily love His children (5 2). No man can be of God's family, unless his love extends to all its members.

BROTHER'S WIFE: (רַבִּית, yebhēmeth="a sister-in-law," "brother's wife" [Dt 25 7.9]; אִשְׁתִּי, 'ishshāh="a woman," "wife"; אִשְׁתֵּי אָחִי, 'ēsheth 'āh="brother's wife" [Gen 38 8.9; Lev 18 16; 20 21]; ἡ γυνὴ τοῦ ἀδελφοῦ, hē gunē tou adelphou="the brother's wife" [Mk 6 18]): A brother's wife occupies a unique position in Heb custom and law, by virtue of the institution of the Levirate. The widow had no hereditary rights in her husband's property, but was considered a part of the estate, and the surviving brother of the deceased was considered the natural heir. The right to inherit the widow soon became a duty to marry her if the deceased had left no sons, and in case there was no brother-in-law, the duty of marriage devolved on the father-in-law or the agnate who inherited, whoever this might be. The first son of the Levirate marriage was regarded as the son of the deceased. This institution is found chiefly among people who hold to ancestral worship (Indians, Persians, Afghans, etc), from which circumstances Benzinger (New Sch-Herz, IV, 276) derives the explanation of this institution in Israel. The Levirate marriage undoubtedly existed as a custom before the Israelitish settlement in Canaan, but after this received special significance because of the succession to the property of the first son of the marriage, since he was reckoned to the deceased, inherited from his putative, not from his real father, thus preventing the disintegration of property and its acquirement by strangers, at the same time perpetuating the family to which it belonged. While the law limited the matrimonial duty to the brother and permitted him to decline to marry the widow, such a course was attended by public disgrace (Dt 25 5ff). By the law of Nu 27 8, daughters were given the right to inherit, in order that the family estate might be preserved, and the Levirate became limited to cases where the deceased had left no children at all.

BROW, brou: Is found in Isa 48 4, "thy brow brass" as the tr of מַעָּל, mēcal, meaning "to be clear," i.e. conspicuous. In Lk 4 29 "led him unto the brow of the hill" is the rendering of ὀφρύς, ophrys, lit. "the eyebrow," but used throughout Gr lit. as any prominent point or projection of land (cf use of supercilium in Verg. Georg. i.108).

BROWN. See COLORS.

BRUISE, brōōz, BRUISED, brōōzd: The noun occurs in Isa 1 6 AV, "bruises and putrifying sores," as the tr of חַבְּרָאִים, habbūrāh. The vb. tr. a number of Heb words, the principal ones being (1) שָׁרַשׁ, shūph (Gen 3 15 [bis]); (2) דָּקַק, dāqak (Isa 28 28 [bis] [ARV "ground," and though the wheel of his cart and his horses scatter it, he doth not grind it" for the AV "nor break it with the wheels of his cart, nor bruise it with his horsemen"]); (3) דָּכָא, dākhā, in the classical passage, Isa 53 5, "He was bruised for our iniquities," ver 10, "Yet it pleased Jeh to bruise him"; (4) רָצַץ, rāṣaṣ, "A bruised reed shall he not break," Isa 42 3 (quoted in Mt 12 20).

In the NT bruise is the tr of σπαράσσω, sparássō, "to rend" (ARV "bruising him sorely") Lk 9 39; of συντριβω, suntribō, "to break to pieces" (Mt 12 20); "shall bruise Satan under your feet shortly" (Rom 16 20); of θραύω, thraúō, in Lk 4 18 in the quotation from Isa 58 6, "to set at liberty them that are bruised" (WH omits the verse).

BRUIT, brōōt (שִׁמְעָה, shēma): A word no longer in common use (marked "archaic" and "obsolete" by Murray), signifying a rumor or report. The word occurs in AV Jer 10 22 (RV "rumour"; ARV "tidings") and AV Nah 3 19 (RV "bruit," app. "report"; ARV "report").

BRUTE, brōōt, BRUTISH, brōōtish (בָּעָר, ba'ar, "stupid"; ἄλογος, alogos, "without speech," hence irrational, unreasonable [Acts 25 27; 2 Pet 2 12; Jude ver 10 AV]): The man who denies God acts in an irrational way. Such persons are described as brutish (Ps 49 10; 92 6; 94 8; Jer 10 14.21; 51 17). These are stupid, unteachable. This is a graphic description of the atheist. The proverb, "No fool like the learned fool," is esp. true of the ignorance of the unbelievers of the Scriptures. Their objections to the Bible, as a rule, are utterly ridiculous. The word is occasionally used in the sense of thoughtless ignorance. Brutish counsel is counsel that is foolish, unreasonable (Isa 19 11). The term is used by Agur (Prov 30 2) to express the low estimate he has of himself and his conscious lack of knowledge.

JACOB W. KAPP

BUBASTIS, bū-bas'tis. See PI-BESETH.

BUCKET, buk'et (כֵּלִי, d'li): The word is found only in Isa 40 15; Nu 24 7, in the latter passage in a fig. use. The bucket was doubtless a water-skin with two cross-pieces at the top to fit it for use in drawing water, like those now in use in Pal. The ordinary word for water-skin is a different one (nō'dh).

BUCKLE, buk'l (πόρπη, pōrpē): As a mark of favor Jonathan Maccabaeus was presented by Alexander Balas with a buckle of gold (1 Macc 10 89), the wearing of which was restricted to the blood royal. The buckle was used for fastening the mantle or outer robe on the shoulder or chest.

BUCKLER, buk'lēr: God is called a "buckler" (RV "shield") to them that trust Him (Ps 18 2.30; 2 S 22 31; Prov 2 7). See ARMOR.

BUD. See FLOWER.

BUFFALO, buf'a-lō. See CATTLE.

BUFFET, buf'et (κολαφίζω, kolaphízō, "to beat with the fist"): Refers to bodily maltreatment and violence: "Then did they spit in his face and buffet him" (Mt 26 67; Mk 14 65; 1 Cor 4 11; 1 Pet 2 20). Paul speaks of "a thorn in the flesh, a messenger of Satan to buffet me" (2 Cor 12 7). Used fig. of self-control: "I buffet [AV keep under, RVm "bruise"] my body, and bring it into bondage" (1 Cor 9 27). The Gr in this passage reads υποπιάζω, hupōpiázō, lit. "to give a blow beneath the eye." In Lk 18 5 the same word is rendered "wear out": "Lest she wear me out by her continual coming" (AV "weary me," RVm "bruise me") (see Pape's Lex., s.v.).

L. KAISER

BUGEAN, bū-jē'an, bū-jē-an (Βουγαῖος, Bougaïos): An epithet given to Haman in Apoc, Ad Est (12 6, RV; AV has "Agagite").

BUILD, bild, BUILDING, bild'ing (בָּנָה, bānāh, בִּנְיָן, binyān, once [Ezk 41 13]; οἰκοδομέω, oikodomēō): The building conditions existing at the time of the Heb conquest were rude and untutored, and, with the exception of the work of the Solomonic period, there was still little or no effort made to introduce a higher state, until the time when Gr influence began to be felt (cir 3d cent. BC). In localities where stone was not available, mud bricks were used, and their perishable nature being realized, stone slab facing came into use. These slabs were a protection against the weather and had no constructive value. Probably the hand of the "jerry" builder can be seen in an attempt to make such bad construction appear to be solid stone.

In stone localities buildings were of stone, but the class of building was only that of the rude stone waller. Random rubble masonry,

2. Masonry unskilfully laid, was the prevailing characteristic. Occasionally a piece of carefully dressed masonry is found, but it is the exception and is often a re-use of an earlier type akin to "sawed stone" (1 K 7 9). The remains of Jewish walls of the period of the early kings in Jerus show skill which does not appear to have existed elsewhere. The boss and margin stones, with wide mud joint, were, in part, the actual masonry of the early fortifications, and were re-used and imitated over and over again. The type crops up in feeble imitation at different sites throughout the country, but hammer-picked and rough hammer-dressed stones are also common. The fine comb pick and marginal dressing of the walls of the Temple area belong to the Herodian period (see Bliss and Dickie, "Excavations at Jerusalem," 273 ff, PEFS, 1898). The absence of lime is a striking characteristic. There is no distinctive type which can be named exclusively Jewish, although there is good reason for believing that the boss and margin type has a Jewish origin. Wilson (Golgotha, 124) points out that the projecting bosses had a defensive value, in breaking the force of the battering-ram, and here again the necessity of defense shows its vitality in the existence of such a well-engineered detail. The absence of the finer qualities of building craft can be traced to the same source.

Foundations of fortifications were usually on rock which was sometimes squared for a bed, but more often leveled up with small stones.

3. Founda- A portion of the S. wall of Jerus, tions certainly late (5th cent. AD), was laid on a foundation of small rubble resting on débris, accumulated over an earlier wall.

(See Plate IV, Excavations at Jerusalem, p. 29.) In smaller buildings, the foundations were usually laid on the débris of earlier structures. At Lachish mud brick walls were laid on a foundation of stone. A peculiar method of spreading a layer of sand under the foundations was also noted (see A Mound of Many Cities, 125-26).

The native wall of today is less rudely built and is bedded in lime mortar. It is a broad wall usually about 3 ft. thick, with inner and outer faces of large stones, filled in between with small rubble without proper bond, somewhat in the manner of ancient building. To make up for the want of bond, it is a common habit to insert a piece of steel joint across the return angle (see BEAM). The building and hewing methods, in all probability, are the same as they were in early Jewish times. Hewers sit at their work, with the plane of the stone on which they operate, lying obliquely from them. Stones are conveyed from the quarry, if at a distance from the building site, on donkeys, thence on men's backs to the top of the wall, by rude gangways. Every man digs his "own cistern" (Isa 36 16), which is sunk in the rock under the site of the house, and used as a quarry from which stones for the building are supplied. If water is scarce, the cistern is sunk first, and the winter rains are allowed to collect and provide the necessary water for the building.

To build up is often used in the sense of giving increase and prosperity, or of establishing and strengthening. Thus in Job 22 23;

5. Figura- Ps 69 35; Jer 18 9. A kindred sense tive is to restore what was decayed, as in Isa 58 12. To "build an house" for a person is to grant him children or a numerous posterity (Ruth 4 11; of David, 2 S 7 27; 1 Ch 17 10). Spiritually, the word is used of one's work in life, or of the formation of character and habits. The main thing here is the foundation. Those who build on Christ's word build on rock; those who reject this word build on sand (Mt 7 24-27). Christ is the sole true foundation; the work which a man builds on this will be tried by fire (1 Cor 3 9-15). The church is compared to a building (1 Cor 3 9; 1 Pet 2 4-6) reared on the foundation of apostles and prophets (their truths or teaching), Jesus Christ Himself being the chief corner-stone (Eph 2 20-22). Believers are "built-up" in Christ (Col 2 7), and are exhorted to build themselves up on their most holy faith (Jude ver 20). See ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE; FORTIFICATION.

A. C. DICKIE

BUILDER, bild'er (בָּנָה, bānāh; οἰκοδομέω, oikodomēō, τεχνίτης, technitēs): "To build," "builder," etc, are in the OT commonly the tr of bānāh, "to build," occurring very frequently; see BUILD, BUILDING. The lit. significance leads also to several fig. applications, esp. to God as Divine Builder (1) as establishing, e.g. the nation (Ps 69 35; 102 16; Jer 12 16), the throne of David (Ps 89 4), Jerus (147 2); (2) in restoration—rebuilding (Isa 58 12; 61 4; 65 21; Jer 31 4-28; 42 10; Ezk 36 36; Am 9 11; cf Acts 15 16); (3) as establishing in prosperity (Job 22 23; 1 S 2 35; Jer 24 6; cf Gen 16 2. RVm, Heb, "be build by her"); (4) the firm establishment of the Divine attributes (Ps 89 2); (5) Divine opposition (Lam 3 5, "He hath builded against me"); cf Job 19 8; (6) the choosing of a corner-stone which the builders rejected (Ps 118 22, 23; quoted by Christ [Mt 21 42; Mk 12 10; Lk 20 17]; by Peter [Acts 4 11; 1 Pet 2 7]).

In the NT Christians are represented as being (1) built by God (1 Cor 3 9, 16) on Christ as the one foundation (Mt 16 18, on Jesus as the Christ; 1 Pet 2 5f; Acts 9 31 RVm; Rom 15 20; 1 Cor 3 10.12.14 [epoikodoméō]; Eph 2 20); (2) as being continuously and progressively built up in their faith and life (Acts 20 32; 1 Cor 8 1 RVm, "buildeth up"; 10 23m, Gr "build up"; 14 4.17m; 1 Thess 5 11; cf Jude ver 20); (3) they are "built together" (sunōikodomēō) in Christ (Eph 2 22; Col 2 7 [epoikodomēō]; cf 1 Cor 3 9); (4) "built up" is used in a bad sense (1 Cor 8 10 AV and RV, "emboldened," RVm "be built up"); (6) in He 3 4 God is represented as the Builder (establisher) of all things, RVm "established," and in 11 10 as the Builder (technitēs), of the New Jerus; in 9 11 for "building" RV has "creation" (ktisis); (7) in 1 Cor 3 10-14; Gal 2 18, building represents constructing a system of teaching; Paul speaks of himself as "a wise master-builder" (sophós architekton).

BUKKI, buk'ī (בֻּכִּי, bukkī, "mouth of Jah"):

(1) A Danite, son of the tribal prince Jogli (Nu 34 22); he was one of the representative chiefs who assisted in the division of the land.

(2) Son of Abishua and father of Izzi, a priest, fourth in descent from Aaron, in the line of Eleazar (1 Ch 6 5.51), and ancestor of Ezra (Ezr 7 4). In 2 Esd 1 2 the name appears as Borith, and in 1 Esd 8 2 as Boccas.

BUKKIAH, buk-ī'a (בֻּכְיָהוּ, bukkīyāhū, "proved of God"): A Levite, son of Heman (1 Ch 25 4.13). See BAKBUKIAH.

BUL, bul (בֹּרֶל, būl): Name of the 8th month of the Jewish year (1 K 6 38). It is of Phoen origin and signifies the month of rain, the beginning of the rainy season. See CALENDAR.

BULL, bööl, BULLOCK, bööl'ok. See CATTLE.

BULL, WILD. See ANTELOPE; CATTLE.

BULLS, JEROBOAM'S. See CALF (GOLDEN).

BULRUSH, bööl'rush. See REED.

BULRUSHES, ARK OF. See ARK OF BULRUSHES.

BULWARK, bööl'wark: The word represents several Heb terms (חֵל, hēl, Isa 26 1; חֵלָה, hēlāh, Ps 48 13; מַצֹּד, māṣōd, Eccl 9 14; מִצְוֵר, māṣōr, Dt 20 20). In 2 Ch 26 15 the word is tr^d in RV "battlements." See FORTIFICATION.

BUNAH, bū'na (בֻּנָּה, būnāh); A son of Jerahmeel (1 Ch 2 25).

BUNCH, bunsh: Is used of (1) a "bunch of hyssop" (Ex 12 22, אֶגְדָּה, 'āghuddāh); (2) a "cluster of raisins" (2 S 16 1 AV; 1 Ch 12 40 AV צִמְמוֹק, ṣimmoḳ="something dried or shriveled"); (3) a "camel's hump" (Isa 30 6 AV דִּבְשֶׁת, dabbe-sheth): of obscure etymology.

BUNDLE, bun'd'l: Represents in EV the words ḥērōr, from a vb. meaning "cramp," "bind," etc (Gen 42 35; 1 S 25 29; Cant 1 13); ḥēbēth, from a vb. probably meaning "to grasp" (Ruth 2 16); and ḏēsēm, ḏēsēm, from ḏēw, ḏēw, "to tie up," "bind," hence lit. "bundle," just as the Eng. word is derived from "bind" (Mt 13 30); and plēthos, plēthos, properly "multitude." The custom of binding up precious things in bundles (cf Cant 1 13) is the basis of the very interesting metaphor in 1 S 25 29: "The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with Jeh thy God," or perhaps better, "in the bundle of the living in the care of Jeh"—an assurance of perfect safety.

J. R. VAN PELT

BUNNI, bun'ī (בֻּנִי, bunnī, būnī, būnī, būnī, cf BANI):

(1) A Levite (Neh 9 4). The repetition of Bani's name in this passage is probably a scribal error. The Syr version for the second "Bani" reads "Binnui"; but as, in 10 9 and 12 8, Binnui's name comes, as here, between those of Jeshua and Kadmiel, we should substitute Binnui here for the first Bani. The LXX renders all three names as if the Heb in each case had been בְּנֵי, b'nē, "sons of," reducing the proper names in the ver to five. The names probably stand for chief Levitical houses rather than individuals.

(2) Another Levite, one of the overseers of the temple, father of Hashabiah, according to Neh 11 15; but, according to 1 Ch 9 14, Hashabiah is "of the sons of Merari." The reading in Neh is a corruption of the one in Ch. H. J. WOLF

BURDEN, būr'd'n: In the OT more than one word is rendered "burden."

(1) מַסָּא, massā, from a root נָסָא, nāsā, "he lifted up." Thus lit. any load is called massā (Ex 23 5; Nu 4 15.24.27 ff; 2 K 5 17;

1. In the 8 9). Figuratively, people are a burden (Nu 11 11.17; Dt 1 12; 2 S 15 33; OT 19 35). A man may be a burden to himself (Job 7 20). Iniquities are a burden (Ps 38 4). Taxes may be a burden (Hos 8 10).

(2) In both AV and RV massā is tr^d "burden," as applied to certain prophetic utterances; but both ARV and RVm have "oracle." Examples are Isa 13 1; 14 28, and often; Jer 23 33.36.38, no marginal reading; Ezk 12 10; Nah 1 1; Hab 1 1; Zec 9 1; 12 1; Mal 1 1. As was natural under the circumstances, such oracles usually denounced judgment upon place or people. Hence probably the tr "burden." But some of these prophetic utterances do not contain denunciation or threat (Zec 12). The passage in Jer, moreover, implies that the prophet used the term in the sense of "oracle," for scoffers are reproved for perverting the word and giving it the meaning "burden." Massā, therefore, means something taken up with solemnity upon the lips, whether threatening or not, and the rendering, "burden," ought most likely to be given up.

The word מַסָּא, mas'ēth, of the same derivation as massā, is applied to foolish oracles (Lam 2 14 AV, oracles ARV, burdens ARV, burdens RV, oracles RVm; Am 5 11, burdens AV, exactions ARV and RV).

Massā is used also in Prov 30 1 and 31 1, and is variously rendered prophecy (AV), oracle (ARV), burden, or the name of the speaker's country (RVm, ARV), oracle (RV). The reading is doubtful, but probably the reference is to the speaker's country—"Jakeh, of Massa" (cf Gen 25 14), "Lemuel king of Massa."

(3) Other words tr^d "burden" are from the root סָבַל, ṣābhal, "to bear a load" (Neh 4 17; Ps 81 6; 1 K 11 28; AVm, charge AV, labor ARV and RV, burden ARV and RVm, Ex 5 4.5; 6 6.7; Isa 10 27; Isa 14 25).

In the NT several Gr words mean "burden."

(1) βάρος, báros, "something heavy." Burdens of the day (Mt 20 12), the burden of duty to be borne, a difficult requirement (Acts 15 28; Rev 2 24). The burden of NT one's moral infirmities (Gal 6 2).

(2) φορτίον, phortion, "something to be borne." The obligation which Christ imposes (Mt 11 30); the legal ordinances of the Pharisees (Lk 11 46); a man's individual responsibility (Gal 6 5). Whether any clear and consistent distinction can be made between these two words is doubtful. Probably, however, phortion refers to the load as something to be borne, whether heavy or light, whilst baros may be an oppressive load. According to Light-foot baros may suggest a load of which a man may rightly rid himself should occasion serve, but phortion a burden which he is expected to bear, as every soldier carries his own pack. But most likely too much weight should not be given to these distinctions.

(3) There is also the word γóμος, gómos, "the freight" of a ship (Acts 21 3); cf ὄγκος, ógkos, weight or encumbrance which impedes the runner's progress to the goal (He 12 1), with particular reference to the superfluous flesh which an athlete seeks to get rid of in training (cf 1 Cor 9 24-27), and fig. whatever hinders the full development of Christian manhood. LITERATURE

It is well to recall at the outset that there are points of likeness and of marked contrast between oriental and occidental burial customs in general, as well as between the burial customs of ancient Israel and those of other ancient peoples. These will be brought out, or suggested later in this art.

I. Immediate Burial Considered Urgent.—The burial of the dead in the East in general was and is often effected in such a way as to

1. Reasons suggest to the westerner indecent haste. Dr. Post says that burial among the people of Syria today seldom takes place later than ten hours after death, often earlier; but, he adds, "the rapidity of decomposition, the excessive violence of grief, the reluctance of Orientals to allow the dead to remain long in the houses of the living, explain what seems to us the indecency of haste." This still requires the survivors, as in the case of Abraham on the death of Sarah, to bury their dead out of their sight (Gen 23 1-4); and it in part explains the quickness with which the bodies of Nadab and Abihu were carried out of the camp (Lev 10 4), and those of Ananias and Sapphira were hastened off to burial (Acts 5 1-11). Then, of course, the defilement to which contact with a dead body gave occasion, and the judgment that might come upon a house for harboring the body of one dying under a Divine judgment, further explain such urgency and haste.

It was in strict accordance with such customs and the provision of the Mosaic law (Dt 21 23; cf Gal 3 13), as well as in compliance with the impulses of true humanity, 2. The Burial of Jesus that Joseph of Arimathea went to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus for burial on the very day of the crucifixion (Mt 27 39 ff).

The dead are often in their graves, according to present custom, within two or three hours after death. Among oriental Jews burial

3. The Usual Time takes place, if possible, within twenty-four hours after death, and frequently on the day of death. Likewise Mohammedans bury their dead on the day of death, if death takes place in the morning; but if in the afternoon or at night, not until the following day.

As soon as the breath is gone the oldest son, or failing him, the nearest of kin present, closes the eyes of the dead (cf Gen 46 4, "and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes"). The mouth, too, is closed and the jaws are bound up (cf Jn 11 44, "and his face was bound about with a napkin"). The death is announced, as it was of old, by a tumult of lamentation preceded by a shrill cry, and the weeping and wailing of professional mourners (cf Mk 5 38 ff). See MOURNING.

II. Preparations for Burial.—These are often informal and hasty. Under the tyranny of such customs as those noted, it is often 1. Often impossible to make them elaborate. Informal Canon Tristram says: "As interments and hasty take place at latest on the evening of the day of death, and frequently at night, there can be no elaborate preparations. The corpse, dressed in such clothes as were worn in life, is stretched on a bier with a cloth thrown over it, until carried forth for burial" (Eastern Customs, 94). In Acts 5 6 we read of Ananias, "The young men . . . wrapped him round, and they carried him out and buried him." "What they did," as Dr. Nicol says, "was likely this: they unfastened his girdle, and then taking the loose under-garment and the wide cloak which was worn above it, used them as a winding-sheet to cover the corpse from head to foot." In other words, there was little ceremony and much haste.

Usually, however, there was more ceremony and more time taken. Missionaries and natives of

2. Usually to wash the body (cf Acts 9 37), with More anoint it with aromatic ointments Ceremony (cf Jn 12 7; 19 39; Mk 16 1; Lk 24 1), swathe hands and feet in grave-bands, usually of linen (Jn 11 44a), and cover the face or bind it about with a napkin or handkerchief (Jn 11 44b). It is still common to place in the wrappings of the body aromatic spices and other preparations to retard decomposition. Thus the friends at Bethany prepared the body of Lazarus, and he came forth wrapped in grave-bands and with a napkin bound about his face. And, we are further told that after the burial of Jesus, Nicodemus brought "a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about a hundred pounds," and that they "took the body of Jesus, and bound it in linen cloths with the spices, as the custom of the Jews is to bury," and that Mary Magdalene and two other women brought spices for the same purpose (Jn 19 39-40; Mk 16 1; Lk 24 1). That this was a very old custom is witnessed by such passages as 2 Ch 16 14, where it is said that Asa, the king, was laid "in the bed which was filled with sweet odors and divers kinds of spices prepared by the perfumers' art" (cf Jn 12 3-7; Sir 38 16). From Acts 5 6; 8 2 it appears that there was in later times a confraternity of young men whose business it was to attend to these proprieties and preparations on behalf of the dead; but it was probably only in exceptional cases that they were called upon to act. Certainly such ministries ordinarily devolved, as they do now, upon loving relatives and friends, and mostly women, among the Jews as well as among the Greeks. The practice among the Greeks, both by similarity and contrast, affords an interesting illustration. The following instance is aptly cited in DB (art. "Burial"): Electra believing Orestes to be dead and his ashes placed in the sepulchral urn (Soph. Electra 1136-52), addresses him thus: "Woe is me! These loving hands have not washed or decked thy corpse, nor taken, as was meet, their sad burden from the flaming pyre. At the hands of strangers, hapless one, thou hast had those rites, and so art come to us, a little dust in a narrow urn."

This brings us to note two marked contrasts between customs in Israel and among other peoples.

(1) With the Greeks it was customary to cremate the dead (see 3. Contrasts between Jewish Customs and Other Peoples' CREMATION); but there was nothing in Jewish practice exactly corresponding to this. Tacitus (Hist. v.5) expressly says, in noting the contrast with Rom custom, that it was a matter of piety with the Jews "to bury rather than to burn dead bodies." The burning of the bodies of Saul and his sons by the men of Jabesh-Gilead (1 S 31 11-13) seems to have been rather a case of emergency, than of conformity to any such custom, as the charred bones were buried by the same men under the tamarisk at Jabesh, and later, by David's order, removed and laid to rest in the sepulcher of Kish (2 S 21 12-14). According to the Mosaic law burning was reserved, either for the living who had been found guilty of unnatural sins (Lev 20 4; 21 9), or for those who died under a curse, as in the case of Achan and his family, who after they had been stoned to death were, with all their belongings, burned with fire (Josh 7 25).

(2) As the burning practised by the Greeks found no place in Jewish law and custom, so embalming, as practised by the Egyptians, was unknown in Israel, the cases of Jacob and Joseph being clearly special, and in conformity to Egypt custom under justifying circumstances. When Jacob died it was Joseph, the Egypt official, who "commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father" (Gen 50 2), and it was conventionally the fit thing that when Joseph himself died his body was embalmed and "put in a coffin [sarcophagus] in Egypt" (60 26).

III. On the Way to the Grave.—When the preparations were made and the time came, the corpse was carried to the grave on a bier, or

1. Coffins litter (מִטָּה, mittāh). Coffins were unknown in ancient Israel, as they are among the Jews of the East to this day. The only one mentioned in the Bible is the sarcophagus in which the embalmed body of Joseph was preserved, unless Asa's bed (2 Ch 16 14) be another, as some think. Moslems, like eastern Jews, never use coffins. The bier sometimes has a pole at each corner by means of which it is carried on the shoulders to the tomb. See BIER.

The procession of mourners is made up largely, of course, of relatives and friends of the deceased, but is led by professional mourning women, who make the air resound with their shrieks and lamentations

2. Professional Mourners (cf Eccl 12 5; Jer 9 17; Am 5 16).

See MOURNING. Am 5 16 alludes to this custom in describing the mourning that shall be over the desolations of Israel: "Wailing shall be in all the broad ways; and they shall say in all the streets, Alas! alas! and they shall call the husbandman to mourning, and such as are skilful in lamentation to wailing." Jer (9 17, 18) breaks out: "Call for the mourning women, that they may come; . . . and let them make haste, and take up a wailing for us, that our eyes may run down with tears, and our eyelids gush out with waters." Dr. Fred. Bliss tells of a mourning delegation at the mahal, or mourning house, of a great man. "No matter how gaily they may be chatting as they approach, when they reach the house they rush forward, handkerchiefs to face, sobbing, weeping, with utmost demonstrations of grief, going through them time after time as occasion requires." Amelia B. Edwards gives a vivid account of her first experience with such mourning: "It rose like the far-off wavering sound of many owls. It shrilled, swelled, wavered, dropt, and then died away, like the moaning of the wind at sea. We never heard anything so wild and plaintive." Among some Jews of today, it is said, the funeral procession moves swiftly, because there are supposed to be innumerable evil spirits (shēdhim) hovering about, desirous to attack the soul, which is thought to be in the body until interment takes place and the corpse is actually covered (see DB, art. "Burial").

IV. At the Grave.—When the grave, or place of entombment, is reached ceremonies more or less characteristic and peculiar to the Orient take place. When the body is let down into the ground, the bier, of course, is set aside, and at first a heap of stones only is piled over the shallow grave—to preserve the dead from the dreaded depredations of hyaenas, jackals or thieves.

Tombs of the Kings.

Beyond question graves among ancient Jews were often simply dug in the earth, as they are with us, and as they are with Jews at Jerus and elsewhere in the East today.

But originally, it would seem to have been customary for each family to have a family tomb: either a natural cave, prepared with stone shelves to receive the bodies, or else hewn out of rock in the hillside, each tomb, or sepulcher, having many niches or loculi, in each one of which a body could be placed (see Gen 25 10; 49 31; 50 13; 35 19; Josh 24 32). As Dr. Nicols says, "All among the Israelites who possessed any land, or who could afford it, had their family tombs, hewn out of the rock, each sepulchre containing many niches. Many generations of a family could thus be placed in the ancestral tomb." Countless numbers of such tombs are to be found all over Pal, but Machpelah, of course, is the chief example (Gen 23). Compare the cases of Joshua buried in his inheritance at Timnath-serah (Josh 24 30), Samuel in his house at Ramah (1 S 25 1), Joab in his house in the wilderness (1 K 2 34), Manasseh in the garden of his house (2 K 21 18), Josiah in the same tomb, it would seem, as his father and grandfather (2 K 23 30), and Asa, singled out for special mention (2 Ch 16 14). According to custom, too, the Jew was not to sell his burying-place, if it was possible for him to hold it. Today in the Orient it is quite different—burying-places of Moslem, Jewish and Christian peoples, while distinct from each other, are community rather than family burying-places.

Interior of Tombs of the Kings.

When the tomb was a cave, or was dug out from some rock, the entrance was often closed with a large circular stone set up on its edge or rim and rolled in its groove to the front of the mouth of the tomb, so as to close it securely. This stone was then often further secured by a strap, or by sealing. In such case it could easily be seen or known if the tomb had been disturbed. Pilate, it will be recalled, directed that the tomb of Joseph of Arimathea, in which the body of Jesus was laid, should be carefully sealed and made as secure as the officials could make it. "So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, the guard being with them" (Mt 27 66).

3. Sealed Stones

In Syria, as elsewhere in the East, it is customary to have stated times after the burial for mourning at the tomb—for example on the third, seventh, and fortieth days, and again on the anniversary of the burial. The relatives or friends then go to the tomb without ornaments, often with hair disheveled; sometimes with head covered and faces blackened with soot, or ashes, or earth, in their oldest and poorest clothing, which is sometimes violently rent, and, sitting or moving in a circle around or near to the tomb, they break out in spells into weird, dirge-like singing or wailing.

Exterior of Garden Tomb.

The violence of grief at times leads to lacerations of the body and the shedding of blood. Morier (Second Journey through Persia), describing a celebration which takes place

5. Excessive Mourning annually to commemorate the death of the grandson of Mohammed, says: "I have seen the most violent of them, as they vociferated Ya Hosein! walk the streets with their bodies streaming with blood by the voluntary cuts they had given themselves." Such cutting of the flesh in mourning for the dead was specifically forbidden by the Mosaic law (Lev 19 28; 21 5; Dt 14 1). But excessive mourning for the dead is often alluded to in Scripture (see 2 S 1 11,12; Ps 6 6; 119 136; Lam 1 16; 3 48; Jer 9 1).

The custom of dirge-songs seems to be alluded to (Mt 9 23; Mk 5 38) in the narrative of the healing of the ruler's daughter: "Jesus came into the ruler's house, and saw the flute-players; and the crowd making a tumult." A characteristic oriental funeral procession and burial are vividly pictured in the narrative of the burial of Jacob (Gen 50 6-13).

V. Failure to Receive Burial Counted a Calamity or a Judgment.—Any lack of proper burial is still regarded in the East, as it was in ancient times, as a great indignity or a judgment from God. It is esteemed the greatest calamity that can befall a person. It gives men still untold distress to think they shall not receive suitable burial, according to the customs of their respective race, or family, or religion—a fact or sentiment that is often alluded or appealed to by way of illustration in the Interior of Garden Tomb.

Scriptures. For a corpse to remain unburied and become food for beasts of prey was the climax of indignity or judgment (2 S 21 10,11; 1 K 13 22; 14 11; 16 4; 21 24; 2 K 9 37; Jer 7 33; 8 1; Ezk 29 5; Ps 79 3; Rev 11 9), and uncovered blood cried for vengeance (Ezk 24 6 f; 39 11-16), the idea being the same as among other oriental peoples, that the unburied dead would not only inflict trouble upon his family, but bring defilement also and a curse upon the whole land. It was, therefore, an obligation resting upon all to bury even the dead found by the way (Tob 1 18; 2 8). Even malefactors were to be allowed burial (Dt 21 22,23), and the exceptional denial of it to the sons of Rizpah gave occasion for the touching story of her self-denying care of the dead found in 2 S 21 10,11.

VI. Places of Burial: How Marked.—Ordinary graves were marked by the heaping of crude stones, but hewn stones and sometimes costly pillars were set up as memorials of the dead (Ezk 39 15; 2 K 23 17 RV, "What monument is that which I see?" the reference being to a sepulchral pillar). Jacob set up a pillar over Rachel's grave (Gen 35 20), and her tomb is marked by a monument to this day. Absalom's grave in the wood of Ephraim had a heap of stones raised over it (2 S 18 17), but in this case, as in the case of Achan, it was not for honor but for dishonor. In NT times the place of burial was uniformly outside the cities and villages (see Lk 7 12; Jn 11 30). There was public provision made for the burial of strangers (Mt 27 7), as in the closing days of the monarchy there was a public burying-ground at Jerus (Jer 26 23), probably where it is to this day between the city wall and the Kidron Valley. Thousands of Jewish graves on the sloping sides of the Valley of Jehoshaphat, where the Jews have come from all lands to be buried, bear witness today to the belief that associates the coming of Messiah with a blessed resurrection. Many Jews hold that Messiah, when He comes, will descend upon the Mount of Olives, and will pass through these resting-places of the dead as He enters the Holy City in glory.

BURIER, ber'i-ēr (בִּרְיָר, kābhar): "Set up a sign by it, till the buriers have buried it" (Ezk 39 15). "When the searchers found any human remains as they passed through the land, they were to set up a mark to attract the attention of the buriers, who followed them" (Dummelow's Comm., in loc.). See BURIAL.

BURN, būrn, BURNING, būrn'ing: Figurative: In addition to the ordinary meaning, burn is used metaphorically in the following passages of the NT:

(1) καίω, kaō (Lk 24 32), "Was not our heart burning within us," i.e. greatly moved.

(2) πυρόω, pyróō, used twice, once in the sense of inflamed with sexual desire (1 Cor 7 9), "For it is better to marry than to burn," and in 2 Cor 11 29 of the heat of the passions, here of grief, or anger, "Who is offended [ARV "caused to stumble"] and I burn not?" See also PUNISHMENTS.

BUSH, būsh:

(1) סִיחַ, sīneh, Ex 3 2-4; Dt 33 16; βάτος, bátos, Mk 12 26; Lk 6 44, "bramble bush"; 20 37; Acts 7 30.35. All the OT references and the NT references, except Lk 6 44, are to the same "bush," viz. Moses' "burning bush". From its etymology sīneh clearly denotes a "thorny" plant, as does the corresponding bátos in the LXX and NT. In the Lat VSS rubus, i.e. "bramble," is used as equivalent. Several varieties of bramble flourish in Pal, of which the most common is Rubus discolor, but this is not an indigenous plant in Sinai. It is stated by Post that a bush of this plant has been planted by the monks of the Convent of St. Catherine at Sinai to the rear of the "Chapel of the Burning Bush." In spite of tradition there is but little doubt that Moses' "burning bush" must actually have been a shrub of one of the various thorny acacias, or allied plants, indigenous in the Sin peninsula.

(2) שִׁיחַ, sīah, "plant," Gen 2 5; "shrub," Gen 21 15; "bush," Job 30 4.7. In the first reference any kind of plant may be meant, but in the other passages the reference is to the low bushes or scrub, such as are found in the desert.

(3) נַהֲלֹתִים, nahālōtīm, AV bushes, RV PASTURES, m "bushes," Isa 7 19. The meaning appears to be rather a place for watering flocks, the corresponding Arab. root نَهَلَ, nahal, having the meaning "to quench one's thirst," and the corresponding noun of place, مَنْهَل, manhal, meaning a watering-place in the desert.

BUSH, THE BURNING, būrn'ing: The scene at the burning bush (סִיחַ, sīneh, "a bush," LXX bátos, "blackberry bush") reveals God to the world in one of the theophanies with fire, of which

1. Meaning and Use there are four mentioned in the Bible (Ex 3 2; 13 21; 19 18; also 2 Thess 1 8 AV, yet to be fulfilled). Many other Divine manifestations were associated with fire. The Burning Bush is mentioned elsewhere in Dt 33 16; Mk 12 26; Lk 20 37; Acts 7 30.31.

Exact identification of the particular kind of bush in which God appeared to Moses is impossible.

Attempts have been made to identify it with the blackberry bush, as by the 2. Identification LXX and also by the monks of the Convent of St. Catherine on Mount Sinai who grow the blackberry there in token of their tradition. The cassia has also been suggested. Both identifications are failures, the former because the blackberry does not grow in that region unless imported and tended, the latter for philological reasons. Nothing in the language used gives any clue to the species of the bush. The generally accepted view that it was some kind of thorn bush is an assumption with scarcely other ground than that there are so many thorny bushes in that region. This fact does, however, give to the assumption much probability.

The old Jewish commentators have many things to say in explanation of this theophany (cf Jew Enc.). That one thing which will indicated that the Israelites would not be consumed by the afflictions in Egypt. The application of this view to God's people under affliction in all ages is often made by Christian homilists. But this cannot have been the primary meaning of the theophany. Of the many theophanies and other Divine manifestations with fire, the specific significance must be learned from a careful study of the circumstances in each case. The fire does not seem to have any one fundamental meaning running through them all. In addition to the references already given, cf Ps 18 8-12; 50 3; Ezk 1 4; Mic 1 1-4; Hab 3 3-6; He 12 29.

3. Interpretation meet with much response from the Christian heart is that the unconsumed bush with the fire in the midst of it

The exact meaning of the Burning Bush as a method or medium of revelation may appear as follows: (1) The flame in this bush was not the flame of persecution by God's enemies without, but the flame of God's presence or the presence of His angel within. (2) The idea of burning and yet not being consumed is brought into the narrative by Moses' wonderment in the moment of his ignorance, before he knew that God was in the bush. (3) The real significance of the flame in this case seems to be light and glory and preservation where God manifests Himself graciously. This is the universal idea of revealed religion. The prevailing idea of God in the religions round about was that God dwelt in darkness. The approach to the gods in Egypt temples was through ever-deepening gloom. It was thought that God was very dangerous and apt to be a destroyer, so that a priest must always intervene. God as a gracious Saviour was the new idea revelation was bringing to the world. This was now first clearly announced, but was not to be fully revealed throughout the time of the long line of priests until the Great High Priest should come and make a "way of approach" that we may come "with boldness unto the throne of grace."

BUSHEL, būsh'el (μόδιος, módios): A dry measure containing about a peck, but as it is used in the NT (Mt 5 15; Mk 4 21; Lk 11 33) it does not refer to capacity but is used only to indicate a covering to conceal the light.

BUSHY, bōōsh'i: Found in Cant 5 11 as the tr of תְּלֵלִי, tālāl, meaning trailing, pendulous (LXX ἐλάται, elátai, lit. "ductile"); RVm reads "curly."

BUSINESS, biz'nes: Is the rendering of four Heb words: (1) מְלָאכָה, m'lā'kāh, in Gen 39 11 (ARV "work"); 1 Ch 26 29.30; 2 Ch 13 10 (ARV "in their work"); 17 13 (ARV "many works"); Neh 11 16.22; 13 30 (ARV "in his work"); Est 3 9; Ps 107 23; Prov 22 29; Dnl 8 27. (2) דָּבָר, dābhār, lit. "a word," is so tr'd in Dt 24 5; Josh 2 14.20; Jgs 18 7 (ARV "dealings"); 18 28 (ARV "dealings"); 1 S 21 2.8. (3) מַעֲשֶׂה, ma'āseh, "an action" (1 S 20 19). (4) עֲנָנָה, inyān, "employment" (Eccl 5 3; 8 16).

In the NT "business" in Lk 2 49 is the rendering of the phrase ἐν τοῖς τοῦ πατρὸς μου, en tois tou patrōs mou, lit. "in the things of my Father," which ARV renders "in my Father's house," with "about my Father's business" as the marginal reading. "Business" is also used in the tr of χρεῖα, chreia, lit. "need," of Acts 6 3; as the tr of σπουδή, spoudē, lit. "haste" of Rom 12 11 (ARV "diligence"); of πράγμα, pragma, lit. "thing done," of Rom 16 2 (ARV "matter"); of πράσσειν τὰ ἴδια, prássein tā idia, lit. "tend to one's own business," of 1 Thess 4 11. In Acts 19 24.25 in Paul's account of the riot in Ephesus, ἐργασία, ergasia, lit. "working," "performing," is tr'd "little business" in ver 24 (AV "small gain"), and "by this business" in ver 25 (AV "by this craft").

ARTHUR J. KINSELLA

BUSYBODY, biz'i-bod-i (περίεργος, periergos, ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, allotrioepiskopos): The word is found twice in Pauline lit.: 1 Tim 5 13, "not only idle, but tattlers also and busybodies," and 2 Thess 3 11, "work not at all, but are busybodies." It is also found in 1 Pet 4 15 AV (RV "meddler") "or as a busybody in other men's matters." If these passages be coupled with such others as Jas 3 2-10; 4 11; Eph 4 29.31; Tit 3 2, it becomes evident that sins against the eighth commandment were as common in the apostolic church as they are today. To this day backbiting is a common trait of oriental peoples. And it is this sin which is so repeatedly warned against by the apostles, as in direct conflict with the ethics of Christianity, and in violation of that spirit of brotherly love and mutual trust which Christ has enjoined on His followers, and which is the very marrow of the outward revelation of the Christian faith (1 Cor 13). HENRY E. DOSKER

BUTLER, but'lér: An officer in households of kings, or other dignitaries, having charge of wines and other potables. מַשְׁקֵה, mashkeh, "one who gives drink" (Gen 40 1-23; 41 9), rendered "cupbearer" in 1 K 10 5; 2 Ch 9 4; Neh 1 11. The office was one of considerable importance in oriental courts, because of the danger to the king's life through plots of poison, etc. Nehemiah held this position to King Artaxerxes. Wealthy courts, as that of Solomon, usually had more than one (1 K 10 5); over these cupbearers or butlers was the sar ha-mashkim, or chief butler (Gen 40 9).

V. OPEN-AIR MARKETS AND FAIRS

1. In the Earliest Periods and among Nomads.

—Among primitive races and nomads there can be, of course, no organized commerce.

1. The Yet they buy and sell, by barter and Primitive exchange, in rude and simple ways. Stage; the When tribes become settled and live "Shop" in villages the "shop" is established —usually at first the simple "stall" of the grocer (bakkal) where one can buy bread, cheese, salt and dried fish, olives, oil, bundles of wood or charcoal, and even earthenware vessels for the passing traveler. At a later stage the village will have also, according to demand, other shops, as, for instance, those of the baker, the blacksmith, the cobbler, and, today, will be found in many obscure places in the East the butcher's shop, and the coffee house.

These gradations and the gradual rise to the more organized commerce of the Gr-Rom period are indicated in a way by the succession of words for "buying" used in the Bible and the conditions and circumstances pictured and implied in the various accounts of buying and selling. Even as early as Abraham's time, however, there were buying and weighing of silver in exchange. "Hear me," pleads Abraham with the children of Heth, "and entreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar, that he may give me the cave of Machpelah . . . which is in the end of his field; for the full price let him give it to me." And Ephron said, "Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein." But Abraham said, "If thou wilt . . . I will give the price of the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there. And Ephron answered . . . My lord, hearken unto me: a piece of land worth four hundred shekels of silver, what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead. . . . And Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver . . . four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. So . . . the field, and the cave, and all the trees that were in the field, . . . were made sure unto Abraham for a possession" (Gen 23 8-18). Other examples of primitive buying are found in Josh 24 32 ("the parcel of ground which Jacob bought of the sons of Hamor the father of Shechem for a hundred pieces of money"); in Ruth 4 5-9, where Boaz is represented as buying "the parcel of land which was Elimelech's . . . of the hand of Naomi . . . and of Ruth the Moabitess, the wife of the dead . . . all that was Elimelech's"; and in 2 S 24

21-24, where David is said to have "bought the threshing-floor" of A. at "a price." Such cases, however, are in a sense exceptional; trade in general at that time was by barter and exchange, without intermediary or market-place.

In NT times things have so changed that the word most commonly used for buying (agorazō) means "to use the market-place," and

3. In NT Times another (emporeuomai) points to a class of traders or merchants who go on, from city to city—"continue" here or there "and buy and sell" (Jas 4 13 AV).

II. Oriental Buying often a Tedious Process.—Something of this is seen even in the fine examples given above. Doubtless, however, eastern buyers and sellers of old haggled over prices with controversy and heat, even as such buyers do today. Everywhere you find them now keen for bargains, but "striking a bargain" is a tedious process. They grow warm and then cool off; they are swept into a frenzy by some new turn of the strife and then calm down; but soon the haggling and arguing begin over again, becoming more heated and seemingly more hopeless than ever, and often they become so excited as to threaten to come to blows. But they don't mean it all, and at last they find a common basis; the sale is made with flattering compliments to one another, and, if we may believe appearances, to the rapturous delight of both parties to the bargain. The native Oriental clearly takes pleasure in such exercise, and sees great possibilities before him. He graciously assures you at the outset that the bargain shall be "just as you like it—just as you like it!" Is he not a servant of God? What cares he for money? What he most wants is your happiness and good will—that is the sweetest thing in life—the love and favor of brothers. After a while you offer a price. He says, "What is such a trifle between us? Take it for nothing!" But he is far from meaning it, and so the haggling begins and the fire and heat of controversy follow—perhaps for hours.

III. Shops and Bazaars.—Oriental shops are all of a pattern—the workshop and the place to store and sell goods is one and the same.

1. Oriental Shops It is on the street, of course, and a platform, usually about 2 ft. high, extends along the whole front. A small door opens to a room back, which, as far as such a thing is possible in the Orient, is private. The goods, particularly the best articles, are displayed in front, somewhat as they are in the windows of our department stores. In the center of the platform is a sejadeh, a rug or mat. Upon this the keeper sits in true oriental fashion—cross-legged. He is never too busy with his accounts to let the passerby escape his keen eye. He will give up his nargileh any time to hail the stranger, display his goods, and coaxingly invite him to look at the special beauty and quality of his articles.

All the shops or storerooms of the oriental village line the "market," which as a rule, is in the center of the village, or on the chief street.

2. The Market-Place This the Arabs call suk, sookh (cf Mt 20 3). Here the peasant is found with his donkeys or camels laden with food-stuffs and country produce. The gardener is there with his small fruits, and the fisherman with his latest "catch." All the shopkeepers, too, are on or near to this street or market center. "The sookh in a country village," says J. Garrow Duncan, "is one of the most interesting sights of modern Egypt. Formerly the cattle and dry-goods markets were uniformly held in an open space in the center of each village. Now the government compels them to go to a fenced enclosure outside of the town. At Belbeys the ordinary market is still held in the center of the town, but the cattle market is a mile away, across the canal. As in a bazaar, such as the traveler sees in Cairo, the merchants of the various trades dispose themselves here in lanes, all easily accessible from the main street, which is thus left clear. On the left are the dealers in copper utensils, busily plying their trade; next to them the makers of sieves and riddles; then comes a large space filled with pottery ware, and, close by, the vegetable venders. There, jammed in between the pottery space and the coppersmiths, is a lane of gold- and silversmiths—the greatest sharks in the market, their chief prey being the women. On the other side of the main street are the shoemakers' lane, the drapers' lane, the grocers, the seed men, the sweetmeat-sellers, fruit-merchants, dealers in glass and carnelian jewelry and, lastly, the butchers' stalls, all arranged in lanes, and all equally ready to trade or to enjoy a joke at each other's expense. There is apparently little eagerness to trade—except when a tourist appears." To one who is ignorant of the value of his wares, the oriental dealer has no fixed price. This is really regulated by the supposed ignorance of the purchaser. If you choose, you may give him what he asks, and be laughed at all round the sookh. If you are wise, you will offer something near to the real value and firmly refuse to vary or haggle, and he will come to terms.

GOING TO MARKET.

Professor Elihu Grant tells of a shop in a Syrian village—"a small room, 6 to 12 ft. square, with a door, but no window, a counter or bench, and shelves and bins along the sides, where sugar, flour, oil, matches, candies, spice, starch, coffee, rice, dried figs, etc. were found, but no wrapping-paper. The buyer must bring his own dish for liquids; other things he carries away in the ample folds of his skirt or in a handkerchief." "Every considerable Turkish town," says Van Lennep, "has a bazaar, bezesten, or 'arcade': a stone structure, open at both ends, a narrow alley or street running through it, covered with an arched roof, the sides pierced with openings or windows. This covered street is lined on both sides with shops, narrow and shallow. Dealers in similar goods and articles flock together here, as do the artisans of like trades in all oriental cities." Such shops can yet be seen in quite characteristic form in Damascus, Bagdad, Cairo and Constantinople, as in ancient days they were found in Babylon, Jerus and Noph (see Ezk 27 13-24).

IV. Buying on Credit.—The shop-keeper does not always get cash from the native buyer. Dr. Post found that debt was well-nigh universal in Syria. The peasant sows "borrowed" seed, in "borrowed" soil, plants and reaps with "borrowed" tools, and lives in a "borrowed" house. Even in case of an abundant harvest the proportion of the crop left by the landlord and the tax-gatherer leaves the man and his family but the barest living at best; at times he can barely pay the debt accumulated in making and gathering in the crop, and sometimes fails in doing this. In the rare cases when the buyer pays cash for his purchases, he makes payment, after a true oriental fashion,

Paying in coin of the most various or varying Cash values, or in rings of copper, silver or (Money) gold, such as are now common in the market-places of China. This throws light upon some Scriptural passages, as, for example, Gen 43 21,22, where the language implies that the "rings" or "strings of money" were weighed: "Behold, every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight . . . and other money have we brought down in our hand to buy food." In Ezr 2 69, three kinds of currency are mentioned, "darics of gold," "pounds of silver," and "priests' garments," as having been given into the treasury for the house of God. The term rendered "darics of gold," ʾadharkōnīm, stands for Pers coins, which were similar to the Gr "darics." The Persians are said to have got the idea of coining from Lydia, at the capture of Sardis, 564 BC. Early Lydian coins were of electrum, but Croesus changed this to coins of gold and silver, probably about 568 BC. Examples of these ancient coins are now known (Rice, Orientalisms in Bible Lands, 234).

V. Open-Air Markets and Fairs.—In inland towns and cities, markets and market-places are often found in the open air, as well as under cover. Great fairs are held thus on certain days of the week. Several towns will agree upon different days as market days and will offer in turn whatever they have for sale: lambs, sheep, cattle, horses, mules, chickens, eggs, butter, cheese, vegetables, fruits, and even jewelry and garments. In such a case it is as if the whole town for the day was turned into a market or exhibition, where everything is for sale. On such days peasants and townspeople come together in much larger numbers than is ordinary, and mingle freely together. The day thus chosen now, as in olden times, is often a holy day—Friday, which is the Moslem Sabbath, or the Christian Sunday, where Christians abound. Such instances form a side-light on such passages as Neh 13 15-22: "In those days saw I in Judah some men treading winepresses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses therewith; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerus on the sabbath day: and I testified against them." Morier testifies that he attended similar fairs in Persia, where were gathered sellers of all sorts of goods in temporary shops or tents, such as sellers of barley and flour, as it was at the gate of Samaria after the famine (2 K 7). Layard also speaks of having seen at the gate of the modern town of Mosul, opposite the site of ancient Nineveh, shops for the sale of wheat, barley, bread-stuffs, and drinks for the thirsty. It will be recalled that it was "at the gate" that Boaz (Ruth 4 1-3) called the elders and people to witness that he had bought all that was Elimelech's. For similar allusions see Job 5 4; Prov 31 23; Ps 127 5; Lam 5 14. See MONEY; TRADE, etc; also DB, DCG, etc.

BUZ, buz, BUZI, būzī, BUZITE, buz'it (בִּזִּי, būz):

(1) Second son of Nahor (Gen 22 21). The word occurs again in Jer 25 23, by the side of Dedan (Gen 10 7) and Tema (Gen 25 15), and is probably, therefore, the name of a people living in the neighborhood of Edom. Būz and Hazo (Gen 22 22) are probably the countries of Bāzu and Ḥazū (the former described as full of snakes and scorpions), which Esarhaddon invaded. (KB, II, 131).

(2) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 14) (בִּזִּי, būzī), "an inhabitant of Buz"), a title given to Elihu, the fourth speaker in the Book of Job (Job 32 2).

BY: In the sense of "against" which survives only in dialectal English (cf Wright, Dialect Dict., I, 470, for examples) is the AV rendering of the dative ἐναντίῳ, emautō of 1 Cor 4 4 (ARV renders this "against"). In classical Gr the same idiom sunōida, with dative="be conscious" or "be cognizant of" a thing.

BY AND BY: In the sense of "immediately" is the AV tr of ἐξαυτῆς, exautēs, of Mk 6 25 (ARV "forthwith"); of εὐθύς, euthús, Mt 13 21 (ARV "straightway"); of εὐθέως, euthéōs, Lk 17 1 (ARV "straightway"); 21 9 (ARV "immediately"). In Eng. lit. this meaning is obsolete (cf "After you have dined and supped, labour not by and by after, but make a pause—the space of an hour or more with some pastyme" (Babees Book, EETS, 247).

CAB. See KAB.

CABBON, kab'on (כַּבּוֹן, kabbōn; Χαβρόν, Chabrá): An unidentified place in the Shephelah of Judah near Eglon (Josh 15 40). It is possibly the same as MACHBENA, which see.

CABIN, kab'in (חֲבִיתֹת, hānuyyōth, "vaults"; Jer 37 16 RV, "cells"): In the East the prison often consisted of a pit (cf "dungeon-house" RV and "house of the pit" RVm) with vaulted cells around it for the confinement of prisoners. The word is probably a gloss. The phrase "and into the cells" seems superfluous after "into the dungeon-house."

CABUL, kā'bul (کابل, kābhul; B, Χωβαμασομέλ, Chōbamasonēl; A, Χαβὰλ ἀπὸ ἀριστερῶν, Chabōl apó aristerōn):

(1) A city on the boundary between Asher and Zebulun (Josh 19 27). It corresponds to the Chabolo of Jos (Vita, 43, etc), and is represented by the modern village Kābūl, about nine miles S.E. of Acre.

(2) A district probably connected with (1), containing 20 cities, given by Solomon to Hiram king of Tyre (1 K 9 10 ff).

ÇADHĒ, tsā-thā' (צ ד): The eighteenth letter of the Heb alphabet, and as such employed in Ps 119 to designate the 18th part, every verse of which begins with this letter. It is transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as ç (almost ts). It came also to be used for the number 90. For name, etc, see ALPHABET; TSADHE.

CAESAR, sē'zar (Καίσαρ, Kaísar): Originally the surname of the Julian gens (thus, Caius Julius Caesar); afterward a name borne by the Rom emperors. In the NT the name is definitely applied to Augustus (Lk 2 1, "Caesar Augustus"), to whom it belonged by adoption, and to Tiberius (Lk 3 1, "Tiberius Caesar"; cf Mt 22 17.21). The "Caesar" to whom Paul appealed (Acts 25 11.12.21) was Nero. The form is perpetuated in "Kaiser" and "Czar."

CAESAREA, ses-a-rē'a, sē-za-rē'a (Καίσαρεια, Kaisareía):

(1) Caesarea Palestina (pal-es-tí'na). The ancient name in the Arab. form Kaisariyeh still clings to the ruins on the sea shore, about 30 miles N. of Jaffa. It was built by Herod the Great on the site of Strato's Tower (Ant, XIII, xi, 2; XV, ix, 6), and the name Caesarea Sebaste was given it in honor of Augustus (ib, XVI, v, 1). With his usual magnificence Herod lavished adornments on the city. He erected sumptuous palaces and public buildings, a theater, and amphitheater with prospect to the sea; while a spacious system of sewers under the city secured cleanliness and health. But "the greatest and most laborious work of all" was a magnificent harbor "always free from the waves of the sea," which Jos says was not less than the Piraeus: this however is an exaggeration. It was of excellent workmanship, and all the more remarkable because the place itself was not suitable for such noble structures. The whole coast line, indeed, is singularly ill-fitted for the formation of harbors. The mighty breakwater was constructed by letting down stones 50×18×9 ft. in size into twenty fathoms deep. The mole was 200 ft. wide. Part was surmounted by a wall and towers. A promenade and dwellings for mariners were also provided. The work was done in ten or twelve years. It became the residence of the Rom procurator. It passed into the hands of Agrippa I; and here he miserably died (Acts 12 19.23). Here dwelt Philip the Evangelist (Acts 8 40; 21 8). To Caesarea Peter was sent to minister to the Rom centurion Cornelius (Acts 10). Thrice Paul passed through Caesarea (Acts 9 30; 18 22; 21 8); hither he was sent under guard from Jerus to escape danger from the Jews (23 23); and here he was imprisoned till his final departure for Rome.

Riots between Gentiles and Jews in Caesarea gave rise to the war (BJ, II, xiii, 7; xiv, 4 f). Terrible cruelties were practised on the Jews under Felix and Florus. Here Vespasian was hailed emperor by his soldiers. Titus here celebrated the birthday of his brother Domitian by setting 2,500 Jews to fight with beasts in the amphitheater. Eusebius was bishop of Caesarea (313-40 AD). In 548 AD a massacre of the Christians was organized and carried out by the Jews and Samaritans. The city passed into Moslem hands in 638. In the time of the Crusades it fell, now to the Christians and now to the Moslems; and was finally overthrown by Sultan Bibars in 1265 AD.

The cathedral stood on the site of a temple built by Herod, where the ruins are seen today; as are also those of two aqueducts which conveyed water from Nahr ez-Zerkā. The landward wall of the Rom city was nearly 3 miles in length.

(2) Caesarea Philippi (fi-lip'i) (Καίσαρεια ἡ Φιλιπποῦ, Kaisareía hē Philippou). At the S.W. base of Mt. Hermon, on a rocky terrace, 1,150 ft. above sea-level, between Wādy Khashabeh and Wādy Za'areh, lie the ruins of the ancient city. It was a center for the worship of Pan: whence the name Paneas, applied not only to the city, but to the whole district (Ant, XV, x, 3). It is possible that this may have been the site of ancient Baalhermon; while Principal G. A. Smith would place Dan here (HGHL, 480). The district was given by Augustus to Herod the Great 20 BC, by whom a temple of white marble was built in honor of the emperor. Paneas formed part of the tetrarchy of Philip. He rebuilt and beautified the town, calling it Caesarea as a compliment to Augustus, and adding his own name to distinguish it from Caesarea on the coast of Sharon (Ant, XVIII, ii, 1; BJ, II, ix, 1). From Bethsaida Jesus and His disciples came hither, and on the way Peter made his famous confession, after which Jesus began to tell them of His coming passion (Mt 16 13 ff; Mk 8 27 ff). Some think that on a height near Caesarea Philippi Jesus was transfigured. See TRANSFIGURATION, MOUNT OF. Agrippa II renamed the town Neronias (Ant, XX, ix, 4). The ancient name however outlived both Caesarea and Neronias, and survives in the Arab. form Bāniās. The modern village, built among the ruins, contains 350 inhabitants. The walls and towers of which the remains are seen date from Crusading times. The castle, es-Šubeibeh, crowns the hill behind the town, and must have been a place of strength from the earliest times. Its possession must always have been essential to the holding of the valley to the west. Immediately to the north of the town, at the foot of a steep crag, the fountain of the Jordan rises. Formerly the waters issued from a cave, Maghâret râs en-Neba', "cave of the fountain head," now filled up with débris. Two niches cut in the face of the rock recall the idolatries practised here in olden times. A shrine of el-Khudr stands on the west of the spring. With the rich soil and plentiful supplies of water, in a comparatively temperate climate, average industry might turn the whole district into a garden. As it is, the surroundings are wonderfully beautiful.

CAESAR'S HOUSEHOLD, hous'hold (οἱ ἐκ τῆς Καίσαρος οἰκίας, hoi ek tēs Kaisaros oikias, "they that are of Caesar's household," Phil 4 22): These words occur in the epistle which Paul wrote from Rome near the end of his first imprisonment there, probably in the end of 61 AD, to the church in Philippi. They give us most interesting information in regard to the progress made in the propagation of the gospel in Rome.

It is necessary to ask, in the first place, What is meant by the words "Caesar's household"? and when the meaning of that phrase is known, then it is needful to discuss the question which rises at once, In what way did the gospel enter Caesar's household? How is it that the gospel, which at the first chiefly advanced among the poorer classes in the Empire, made its way at a bound into the very palace of the Caesars?

"Caesar's household" meant the whole of the persons, slaves and freemen alike, composing the establishment of the emperor in his palace on the Palatine Hill at Rome.

1. What Exactly Was Caesar's Household? The slaves of the imperial household formed a host in themselves. At a time when many a private citizen in Rome owned several hundreds of slaves, it need not surprise anyone to know that there was a vastly larger number of such persons in the palace of the emperor. This was a period when the city of Rome and the court of the Caesars swarmed with Asiatics, many of whom were Jews, and many of them would be in slavery, or in employment, in the imperial court. It cannot be forgotten that Poppaea, Nero's shameless consort, was a proselyte to Judaism and that she continued to advocate successfully the cause of the Jews before the emperor as occasion arose.

These persons in the emperor's palace would be employed in every conceivable capacity as household servants, cooks, bathmen, gardeners, grooms, kennel-keepers, porters, doorkeepers, messengers, secretaries, amanuenses, teachers, librarians, architects, carpenters, shoemakers, and in all other forms of service. Of course they were not all slaves: there was a very large number of freemen. The domus or familia Caesaris (represented by the Gr oikia Kaisaros) included the whole of the imperial household, the meanest slaves as well as the most powerful courtiers. On the character and constitution of this household we happen to possess more information than perhaps on any other department of social life in Rome. "In Rome itself, if we may judge by these inscriptions, the domus Augusta must have formed no inconsiderable fraction of the whole population; but it comprised likewise all persons in the emperor's service, whether slaves or freemen, in Italy and even in the provinces" (Lightfoot, Comm. on Phil, 171). In the list of offices filled by members of the imperial household were also such functions as those of keepers of the wardrobe or of the plate-chest; even the "tasters" formed a separate class of servants under a chief of their own. To belong to Caesar's household would secure even to the lowest grade of slaves substantial privileges and immunities, and would give a certain social importance, which made this position a valued one. An office in the emperor's household, however mean, was thought of so highly, that in the monumental inscriptions such a fact is recorded with scrupulous care.

The next inquiry is, How did the gospel win its way into Caesar's household? And, first, there is no need at all to suppose that the

2. How Did the Gospel Enter into Caesar's Household? gospel was unknown, even in the palace, previous to the arrival of Paul in Rome. For in that numerous household of the emperor there would be Jews, perhaps many of them; and all the Jews were at that time filled with

Messianic hopes, and thus were ready to listen to the gospel. As soon therefore as the gospel entered Rome, as soon as it was proclaimed

3. The Gospel Known There before Paul's Arrival in the many synagogues there, these members of Caesar's household could not fail, equally with the other members of the synagogue, to hear the story of Jesus Christ and of His cross and resurrection. A fact such as this, that the gospel was known in Rome previous to Paul's arrival there, is quite sufficient to account for the other fact, that the gospel was known in Caesar's palace.

But the propagation of the gospel received a great impetus and help forward, when Paul arrived in the city. For although he was a

4. The Gospel Advances in the Palace "bound prisoner," his wrist fastened by an iron chain, day and night, to the soldier who guarded him, he was able to "preach the kingdom of God and to teach those things which concern the Lord Jesus Christ, with all confidence, no man forbidding him" (Acts 28 31 AV). And in this way the gospel would again reach members of the emperor's household. Immediately after his arrival in Rome, Paul had put himself in communication with "the chief of the Jews"—probably the rulers of the synagogues in Rome—and many of them came to him in his lodging and conferred with him. Those chief men of the Jews expressed their great desire to hear from him what his thoughts were in regard to the hope of Israel (ver 22); and naturally all the Jews in Rome would be equally desirous to gain this information from a man of the outstanding position and character of Paul. The Jewish community in Rome had for years past been permeated with the hope of the coming of the Messiah; indeed successive rumors of false Christs had kept them in a fever of excitement, which, on one occasion at least, had broken out in tumult, so strong was their hope of His speedy appearing. Thus it would come about, as a matter of course, that the gospel would reach all the Jews in Rome, and from this knowledge of Jesus, whom Paul proclaimed, the Jews who were in the service of the emperor could not possibly be excluded.

But besides this, the fact that Paul was in daily contact and intercourse with the soldiers who

5. The Gospel Carried by Paul's Soldier-Guard guarded him could not fail to lead to the introduction of the gospel into the regiment. And as part of the Praetorian Guard was quartered in buildings on the Palatine Hill, attached to the emperor's palace there, there was thus one other channel through which the gospel would be made known to some of those who resided in the palace of Caesar. It is thus seen that there is nothing at all surprising in the fact that there were Christians in Caesar's household.

Some of Lightfoot's suggestions and conjectures on this subject are exceedingly interesting. He reviews the names of the persons to whom Paul sends greeting in Rom 16 and compares them with the names of persons who lived at that time, and which have been found in monumental inscriptions on the columbaria or places of sepulture exhumed on the Appian Way. Many of the occupants of those columbaria were freedmen or slaves of the emperors, and were contemporaries of Paul. The result of Lightfoot's review of the names is that he claims to have established a fair presumption that among the salutations in Rom 16 some members at least of the imperial household are included (Phil, 177).

In the household of the emperor there were necessarily many persons of high rank. Perhaps we may find a hint that the gospel had been embraced by some in the higher grades of society, in such strange facts as the execution of Titus Flavius Clemens, a man of consular rank and cousin to the emperor, and also in the fact that Flavia Domitilla, the wife of Flavius Clemens, was banished by Domitian, notwithstanding her near relationship to him, for she was the emperor's niece. Her daughter Portia also shared in the same punishment of exile. The charges brought against all three were atheism and inclination to Jewish customs: surely such charges were sufficiently vague and even self-contradictory. The opinion has been suggested that probably these three persons in the inner circle of the emperor's kinsmen were Christians.

Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, etc, 353), speaking of Lightfoot's conjectures, already referred to, writes, "In all probability he is right in thinking that all the slaves of Aristobulus (son of Herod the Great) and of Narcissus (Claudius' favorite freedman) had passed into the imperial household, and that members of their two familiae are saluted as Christians by Paul (Rom 16 10 ff)."

The fact of greatest interest in the whole subject is, that in society so profligate and corrupt as the court of Nero, there were "saints," Christian men whose garments were clean and who kept themselves unspotted from the world amid surroundings so dreadful and in temptation so unceasing; that the gospel was known and obeyed and loved, and that hearts and lives were loyal to Christ even in the palace of Nero Caesar.

JOHN RUTHERFURD

CAGE, kāj (כַּלִּיב, kālībī; φυλακή, phylakē): The earliest known form of cage made to confine a bird, for the pleasure of its song or the beauty of its coloring, was a crude affair of willows or other pliable twigs. Later cages were made of pottery, and now they are mostly made of wire. References in the Bible make it very clear that people were accustomed to confine in cages such birds as they esp. prized for pets, or to detain them for market purposes. James indicated that cages were common when he wrote (3 7): "For every kind of beasts and birds . . . is tamed, and hath been tamed by mankind." In Job (41 5) we find these lines

"Wilt thou play with him as with a bird?
Or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?"

The only way to play with a bird is to confine it so that it grows accustomed to you and thus loses fear. Jeremiah compared the civil state of Judah to a "cage [crate] full of birds" (5 27), "the houses of the rich being stuffed with craftily-obtained wealth and articles of luxury" (HDB). The sale of sparrows as an article of food still continues in the eastern markets. Jesus referred to this (Mt 10 29) and it was He who entered the temple and overthrew "the seats of them that sold the doves" (Mt 21 12). In Rev 18 2 we find a reference to "a hold [AV "cage"] of every unclean and hateful bird." See also Eccles 11 30.

GENE STRATTON-PORTER

CAIAPHAS, kā'a-fas, kī'a-fas (Καϊάφας, Kaïáphas; Caiaphas=Kephass [cf Dods in Expositor's Gr Test, I, 803], and has also been interpreted as meaning "depression"): Caiaphas was the surname of Joseph, a son-in-law of Annas (cf Jn 18 13), who filled the post of high priest from about 18-36 AD, when he was deposed by Vitellius (cf Jos, Ant, XVIII, ii, 2; iv, 3). He is mentioned by Lk as holding office at the time of John the Baptist's preaching in the wilderness (Lk 3 2).

Caiaphas took a leading part in the trial and condemnation of Jesus. It was in his court or palace that the chief priests (Sadducees) and Pharisees, who together constituted the Sanhedrin, assembled "that they might take Jesus by subtlety, and kill him" (cf Mt 26 3-4; Jn 11 49). The regal claims of the new Messiah and the growing fame of His works had made them to dread both the vengeance of imperial Rome upon their nation, and the loss of their own personal authority and prestige (cf Jn 11 48). But Caiaphas pointed a way out of their dilemma: let them bide their time till the momentary enthusiasm of the populace was spent (cf Mt 26 5), and then by the single sacrifice of Jesus they could at once get rid of a dangerous rival and propitiate the frowns of Rome (cf Jn 11 49-50; 18 14). The commentary of St. John upon this (Jn 11 51-52) indicates how the death of Jesus was indeed to prove a blessing not only for Israel but also for all the children of God; but not in the manner which the cold-blooded statecraft of Caiaphas intended. The advice of the high priest was accepted by the Sanhedrin (ver 53), and they succeeded in arresting Jesus. After being led "to Annas first" (18 13), Jesus was conducted thence in bonds to Caiaphas (ver 24). According to Mt He was led immediately upon His arrest to Caiaphas (Mt 26 57). Mk and Lk do not refer to Caiaphas by name. His conduct at this preliminary trial of Jesus (vs 57-68), its time and its procedure, were almost entirely illegal from the standpoint of the then existing Jewish law (cf JESUS CHRIST, TRIAL OF; and A. Taylor Innes, The Trial of Jesus Christ). False witnesses were first called, and when Jesus refused to reply to their charges, Caiaphas asked of Him if He were "the Christ, the Son of God" (ver 63). Upon Our Lord's answering "Thou hast said" (ver 64), Caiaphas "rent his garments, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy: what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard the blasphemy" (ver 65). Upon this charge was Jesus found "worthy of death" (ver 66). Caiaphas is also mentioned in Acts 4 6 as being among those who presided over the trial of Peter and John.

CAIN, kān (קַיִן, kayin, "spear" or "smith," resembling in sound the root kānāh, "get," "acquire," Gen 4 1 RVm, but not necessarily derived from that root; LXX Káiv, Káin):

(1) In Gen 4 1-24 Cain is the first son of Adam and Eve. His birth is hailed as a manifestation of Jeh's help. He becomes "a tiller of the ground," and brings to Jeh an offering of the produce of the soil, his brother Abel, the shepherd, bringing at the same time the fat of the first-born of his own flock. From Cain and from his offering Jeh withhold the sign of acceptance which he grants to Abel. That the ground of this difference of treatment is to be found (so He 11 4) in

1. The Scripture Narrative

Cain's lack of right disposition toward Jeh is shown by his behavior (see ABEL). Instead of humbling himself he gives signs of strong indignation at Jeh's refusal to favor him. Under the just rebuke of Jeh he hardens his heart and is further confirmed in impenitence. His jealousy of Abel, unrepented of, increases until it culminates in deliberate murder. Deliberate, for in Gen 4 8 we must restore a clause to the Heb text, all the ancient VSS bearing witness, and read "And Cain said unto Abel his brother, Let us go into the field," etc. In the vain attempt to conceal his crime Cain adds falsehood to his other sins. He is cursed "from," i.e. away from, that soil upon which he poured out his brother's blood, and must become a fugitive and a wanderer, far from the immediate presence of Jeh. Although his remonstrance against the severity of his sentence displays no genuine contrition, still Jeh in pity appoints a "sign" for his protection. Cain takes up his abode in the land of Nod ("wandering"), and there builds a city and becomes the ancestor of a line which includes Jabal, forefather of tent-dwelling cattle-keepers; Jubal, forefather of musicians; Tubal-cain, forefather of smiths; and Lamech, like Cain, a man of violence. In Cain's character we see "a terrible outburst of self-will, pride, and jealousy, leading to a total and relentless renunciation of all human ties and affection." "Among the lessons or truths which the narrative teaches may be instanced: the nature of temptation, and the manner in which it should be resisted; the consequences to which an unsubdued temper may lead a man; the gradual steps by which in the end a deadly crime may be committed; the need of sincerity of purpose lest our offering should be rejected; God's care for the guilty sinner after he has been punished; the interdependence upon one another of members of the human race; and the duties and obligations which we all owe to each other" (Driver). In He 11 4 Cain's spiritual deficiency is pointed out; 1 Jn 3 12 observes his envy and jealousy, as "of the wicked one," and Jude ver 11 makes him a very type of the ungodly.

With few and bold strokes the story of Cain as it stands paints for us the character of the first of murderers and the scene of his detection and condemnation. To the religious purpose of the narrative all other things are made tributary. But if we cannot refrain from putting the familiar question, Who was Cain's wife? it is also impossible upon close study of Gen 4, as it stands, to avoid asking what was the nature of the sign of Jeh's acceptance (ver 4), or of the "sign" appointed for Cain (ver 15); or what we are to think of the introduction in the midst of the narrative, without explanation, of such important institutions as sacrifice (vs 3,4) and blood-revenge (ver 14); who were the persons of whom Cain stood in fear (ver 14); who inhabited the city he built (ver 17); how the wanderer and fugitive could become the city-builder; and why the shepherd life should be represented as beginning with Abel (ver 2) and again with Jabal (ver 20); also whether the narrator means that not only the collection of men in cities (ver 17), but also animal husbandry, music and metal-working (ver 20-22) are to be looked upon with disfavor as having sprung from Cain or from his descendants? Most of these questions find their answers in one consideration: the narrative is not exhaustively complete and is not intended to be so. That a large body of racial traditions existed, from which, with the severest condensation, the author of Gen selected his material, is the conclusion forced by close examination of the Gen narrative and comparison of it with the most ancient extant traditions. "In Gen 4 these old stories are not told for their own sakes. The incompleteness and the difficulties left unsolved do not allow this assumption to be made. They form simply the material foundation, to which higher

3. Critical ideas and doctrines are attached" Theories (Dillmann).

Without going outside the Scripture text we may find strong evidence that the narrative under consideration is founded in part upon ancient sources. Let the line of Cain (4 17-24) be compared with that of Seth (5 1-29):

CAINITE	SETHITE
Adam ("man")	Adam ("man")
	Seth
	Enosh ("man")
Cain	Kenan
Enoch	Mahalalel
Irad	Jared
Mehujael	Enoch
Methushael	Methuselah
Lamech	Lamech
Jabal, Jubal, Tubal-cain	Noah
	Shem, Ham, Japhet

The Heb forms of the names show even more clearly that Cain = Kenan, Irad = Jared, Methushael = Methuselah; a single transposition, that of the first and third names after Cain, brings the two Enochs together, and likewise the similar names Mehujael and Mahalalel. Thus we have six names nearly or quite identical; seven ancestors in one list and ten in the other, ending in both cases with a branching into three important characters. Resemblances equally certain, though not by any means so obvious, exist between the names in this double list and the names of the ten kings of Babylonia who reigned before the Flood, as the latter are given by Berossus, the Babylonian historian of the 3d cent. BC (see Skinner, Driver, Sayce as below). Thus one source of which the author in Gen 4 made use appears to have been an ancient list in genealogical form, by which the first of mankind was linked with the beginnings of civilized institutions and arts. Another part of his material was the story of a brother's murder of a brother (4 1-16). Many maintain at this point that the narrative must be based upon the doings of tribes, rather than of individuals. It is true that not seldom in the OT tribal history is related under individual names (cf Gen 49; Jgs 1, and the tables of tribes in Gen 25 1-4; 36); yet the tribe referred to can hardly be the Kenites of the OT, who appear as the close allies of Israel, not esp. bloodthirsty or revengeful, and haunted by no shadow of early crime against a brother tribe (see KENITES). The indications in 4 1-16 of a developed state of society and a considerable population may go to show that the narrative of the murder was not originally associated with the sons of the first man. Thus there is room to suppose that in the process of condensation and arrangement Cain, son of Adam; Cain, the murderer; and Cain, city-builder and head of a line of patriarchs, have been made one. The critical conclusions here epitomized are indeed reached by a delicate and difficult process; but it is asserted in their favor that they make possible the removal of difficulties which could be explained in no other manner. The question which will arise with many, What theory of inspiration can be held consistently with the application of such critical processes? is dealt with at length by most modern commentators (see CRITICISM; INSPIRATION).

CALAH, kā'la (כַּלָּח, kālāh; Χάλαχ, Chálach, also Chálak or Kálach; in Assy Kalhu, Kalḫa, Kalḫi, Kalah): The name of one of the great cities of Nimrod (Gen 10 11), or rather, Asshur (text), which formed, with Nineveh, Resen between Calah and Nineveh, and Rehoboth-Ir (probably lying more to the N.), Asshur's great fourfold capital. The meaning of the name is unknown, but if a Sumerian etymology be accepted, some such sig-nification as "Holy Gate" (Ka-lab) or the like—a parallel to Ka-dingira=Bāb-ili, "Gate of God" (see BABEL, BABYLON)—might be regarded as possible.

As Nineveh is mentioned by Hammurabi, who reigned about 2000 BC, it is clear that that city was already, in his time, an important place; and the passage in Gen 10 11 implies, though it does not actually prove, that Calah was of about the same period. The Assyrian king Aššur-naṣir-āpli (cir 885 BC) states that Calah was made (probably=founded) by Shalmaneser (I) cir 1300 BC, but this is possibly simply an indication that he rebuilt it. Later on, the site seems to have become neglected, for Aššur-naṣir-āpli states that, the city having fallen into ruin, he rebuilt it, and it thereafter became practically the capital of the country, to the City for he not only reërected or restored its shrines and temples—the temple of Ninip, with the god's image; the temple of "the Lady of the Land," and the temples of Sin, Gula, and Enlil—but he also received tribute there. Among his other works may be mentioned the water-channel Pati-ḥengala, and the plantations, whose fruits, apparently, he offered to the god Aššur (Asshur), and the temples of the city. It also became a favorite place of residence for the later kings of Assyria, who built palaces, and restored the city's temples from time to time.

Calah occupied the roughly triangular tract formed by the junction of the Greater Zab (r.) with the Tigris (l.), which latter stream anciently flowed rather closer to the western wall than it does now, and would seem to have separated the small town represented by Selamiyeh from the extensive ruins of Calah, which now bear the name of Nimroud. The main ruins are situated on a large, rectangular platform on the bank of the old bed of the Tigris. The most prominent edifice was the great Temple-tower at the N.W. corner—a step-pyramid (ziggurat) like the Bab towers, constructed of brick faced with stone, and rising, in stages, to a height of cir 126 ft., probably with a sanctuary at the top (see BABEL, TOWER or). A long vault occupies the basement-stage of this structure, and caused Sir A. H. Layard, its discoverer, to regard it as the probable traditional tomb of Ninus, under whose shadow the tragedy of Pyramis and Thisbe took place. Ovid (Metam. iv.98) describes the tomb of Ninus as having been situated "at the entrance of Nineveh," and, if this be correct, Calah must have been regarded as the southern portion of that great city, which, on a preaching journey, may well have taken three days (Jon 3 3) to traverse, provided Khorsabad was in reality its northern extremity.

The platform upon which the temple-tower of Calah was situated measures cir 700×400 yds., and the portion not occupied by that erection afforded space for temples and palaces. In the center of the E. and Palaces side of this platform lie the remains of the palace of Aššur-naṣir-āpli, the chambers and halls of which were paneled with sculptured and inscribed slabs, the principal doorways being flanked with finely carved winged and human-headed lions and bulls. In the S.E. corner are the remains of the palace of Esarhaddon, built, at least in part, with material taken from the palace of Tiglath-pileser IV, which was situated in the S. portion of the platform. The remains of this last are, as a result of this spoliation, exceedingly meager. The S.W. corner of the platform contains the remains of the last palace built on the site—a very inferior erection constructed for Aššur-ētil-flāni (cir 626 BC). One of the temples on this platform was that dedicated to Ninip, situated at the S.W. corner of the temple-tower. The left-hand entrance was flanked by man-headed lions, while the sides of the right-hand entrance were decorated with slabs showing the expulsion of the evil spirit from the temple—a spirited sculpture now in the Nimroud Gallery of the British Museum.

On the right-hand side of the entrance was an arch-headed slab with a representation of King Aššur-naṣir-āpli in low relief, standing in the usual conventional attitude. Before it stood a stone tripod altar, implying that Divine honors were paid to this king. (Both these are now in the British Museum.) The remains of another temple were found to the E. of this, and there are traces of further buildings at other points of the platform.

The slabs from Aššur-naṣir-āpli's palace show this king's warlike expeditions, but as descriptive lettering is wanting, the campaigns cannot be identified. Notwithstanding this disadvantage, however, they are of considerable importance, showing, as they do, incidents of his various campaigns—the crossing of rivers, the march of his armies, the besieging of cities, the reception of tribute, the life of the camp and hunting the lion and the wild bull. The reliefs from the temples, which are much larger and finer, show the king engaged in various religious ceremonies and ritual acts, and are among the most striking examples of Assyrian sculpture. When looking at these works of art, the student's thoughts go back with thankfulness to those Assyrians who, through the generations, cared for and preserved these monuments, though the vandalism of Esarhaddon in dressing off the slabs of Tiglath-pileser IV to carve his own bas-reliefs thereon will ever be regretted.

The site is described as being 14 miles S. of Kouyunjik (Nineveh) and consists of an inclosure formed of narrow mounds still having the appearance of walls. Traces of no less than 108 towers, the city's ancient defences, are said to be visible even now on the N. and E., where the walls were further protected by moats. The area which the walls inclose—about 2,331×2,095 yds.—would contain about 1,000 acres.

Layard, Nineveh and Its Remains, and Nineveh and Babylon, still remain the standard works upon the subject, and his Monuments of Nineveh gives the most complete collection of the sculptures found. See also George Smith, Assyrian Discoveries, and Rassam, Asshur and the Land of Nimrod.

CALAMITY, ka-lam'i-ti (כָּלָמִית, 'ēdh, "a load" or "burden" under which one is crushed, hence "misfortune"; חַיָּיָה, hayyāh, חַוְוָה, hawwāh, "fall," "ruin," the latter word used only in pl.; רָע, ra', "evil in essence," hence "adversity," once only, Ps 141 5, RV "wickedness"): Purely an OT term, signifying adversities—natural, but more often those that result from wickedness or moral evil. Various kinds: (1) folly, "a foolish son" (Prov 19 13); (2) disease, poverty, bereavement, as in Job's experience (Job 6 2; 30 13); (3) persecution (2 S 22 19; Ps 18 18); (4) Divine retribution and judgment (Dt 32 35); cf ruin of the wicked (Prov 1 26, also 27 RV for "destruction" AV); (5) the devastation of war (Jer 46 21); (6) adversities of any kind (Prov 27 10).

CALAMOLALUS, kal-a-mol'a-lus, -mol-ā'lus (A, Καλαμολάλος, Kalamōlālos, B, Καλαμωκάλος, Kalamōkālos): This name is corrupt (1 Esd 5 22). It has evidently arisen through combining the two names Lod and Hadid, in the lists of Ezr (2 33) and Neh (7 37).

CALAMUS, kal'a-mus. See REED.

CALCOL, kal'kol, CHALKOL, kal'kol (כַּלְכֹּל, kalkōl): Mentioned in 1 K 4 31 as one of the wise men with whom Solomon was compared. The better orthography is Calcol which AV gives for the same name in 1 Ch 2 6. In the former passage, Calcol is the son of Mahol, while in the latter he is called the son of Zerah of the tribe of Judah, and a brother of Heman and Ethan.

CALDRON, kōl'drun (the rendering of קִלְחָה, kallāhath, סִיר, ṣīr, דֹּדֶה, dūdh, אֶגְמֹן, 'aghmōn): Kallāhath is found only in 1 S 2 14; Mic 3 3. It is a pot for cooking, of undefined size and characteristics, in the former passage for sanctuary use, in the latter for domestic. Ṣīr is tr^d caldron in Jer 1 13(RV); 52 18f(AV); Ezk 11 3.7.11. It was distinctly a large pot, employed both for domestic use and in the sanctuary. Dūdh is tr^d caldron only in 2 Ch 35 13. It was also a pot for cooking. 'Aghmōn is tr^d caldron by AV in Job 41 20, but it is a mistranslation; RV correctly has "rushes." GEORGE RICKER BERRY

CALEB, kā'leb (כֶּלֶב, kālēbh; in the light of the cognate Syr and Arab. words, the meaning is not "dog," which is כֶּלֶב, kelebh, in Heb, but "raging with canine madness"; Χαλέβ, Chalēb): As a person, Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, occurs in the story of the spies (Nu 13 ff). He represents the tribe of Judah as its prince (Nu 13 6; cf ver 2). While the majority of the men sent out by Moses bring back evil report, Caleb and Hoshea, or Joshua, the son of Nun, are the only ones to counsel the invasion of the promised land (ib, 30; 14 6 ff). Accordingly, these two alone are permitted to survive (14 38; 32 12). Upon the conquest and distribution of the land by Joshua, Caleb reminds the leader of the promise made by God through Moses, and so he receives Hebron as an inheritance for himself and his descendants (Josh 14 6-15), after driving out from thence the Anakim who were in possession of the city (15 14). In the || account in Jgs 1 8 ff, the dispossession of the Can inhabitants of Hebron is ascribed to Judah (ver 10). Both accounts agree in mentioning Othniel, a younger brother of Caleb, as the conqueror of Kiriath-sepher or Debir; as his reward he receives the hand of Achsah, Caleb's daughter. Achsah is given by her father a portion of the Southland; but, upon request, she obtains a more fruitful locality with upper and nether springs (Josh 15 15-19; Jgs 1 12-15).

In 1 S 30 14 Caleb is undoubtedly the name of a clan which is, moreover, differentiated from Judah. Modern scholars therefore assume that Caleb was originally an independent clan which in historical times merged with Judah. As Caleb is called the son of Kenaz (Jgs 1 13) or the Kenizzite (Nu 32 12), it is further believed that the Calebites were originally associated with an Edomite clan named Kenaz (Gen 36 11), and that they entered their future homes in the southern part of Pal from the south. Their migration up north would then be reflected in the story of the spies.

In the genealogical tables (1 Ch 2), Caleb is made a descendant of Judah through his father Hezron. He is the brother of Jerahmeel, and the "father" of Hebron and of other towns in Judah. (Chelubai, ver 9, is apparently identical with Caleb.)

Nabal, with whom David had an encounter, is called a Calebite, i.e. one belonging to the house of Caleb (1 S 25 3).

CALEB-EPHRATHAH, kā'leb ef'ra-thā (AV Caleb-ephatah, -ef'ra-tā, כֶּלֶב אֶפְרָתָה, kālēbh 'ephraṭhāh): The place where Hezron died (1 Ch 2 24). Many scholars, however, read with the LXX "after the death of Hezron, Caleb came unto Ephrath, the wife of Hezron, his father." The name does not occur elsewhere, and none resembling it has been recovered.

CALNDAR, kal'en-dar (Lat calendarium, "an account book," from calendae, "day on which accounts were due"): The Heb or Jewish calendar had three stages of development: the preëxilic, or Bib.; the postexilic, or Talmudic; and the post-Talmudic. The first rested on observation merely, the second on observation coupled with calculation, and the third on calculation only. In the first period the priests determined the beginning of each month by the appearance of the new moon and the recurrence of the prescribed feasts from the vernal and autumnal equinoxes. Thus the month Abib ('ābhīb), the first month of the year according to the Levitical law, in which the Passover was to be celebrated, was determined by observation (Ex 12 2; Dt 16). After the exile more accurate methods of determining the months and seasons came into vogue, and calculation was employed to supplement and correct observations and the calendar was regulated according to the Bab system, as is evidenced by the names of the months which are derived from it. In later times the calendar was fixed by mathematical methods (see art. "Calendar" in Jew Enc). The difficulty of ascertaining the first day of the new moon by observation, in the early period, led to the celebration of two days, as seems to be indicated in 1 S 20 27. We have only four names of months belonging to the preëxilic period, and they are Phoen. Of these Abib ('ābhīb) was the first month, as already indicated, and it corresponded to Nisan (nīṣān) in the later calendar. It was the month in which the Exodus occurred and the month of the Passover (Ex 13 4; 23 15; 34 18; Dt 16 1).

The 2d month of this calendar was Ziv (zīw) (1 K 6 1.37); Ethanīm ('ēthānīm) was the 7th (1 K 8 2), corresponding to Tishrī of the later calendar, and Bul (būl) the 8th, corresponded to Marhesvan (marḥeshvān) (1 K 6 38). There were of course other month names in this old calendar, but they have not come down to us. These names refer to the aspects of the seasons: thus Abib ('ābhīb) means grain in the ear, just ripening (Lev 2 14; Ex 9 31); Ziv (zīw) refers to the beauty and splendor of the flowers in the spring; Ethanīm ('ēthānīm) means perennial, probably referring to living fountains; and Bul (būl) means rain or showers, being the month when the rainy season commenced. The full calendar of months used in the postexilic period is given in a table accompanying this art. The names given in the table are not all found in the Bible, as the months are usually referred to by number, but we find Nīṣān in Neh 2 1 and Est 3 7; Ṣīwān in Est 8 9; Tammūz in Ezk 8 14, although the term as here used refers to a Phoen god after whom the month was named; 'Ēlūl occurs in Neh 6 15; Kīslēw (ARV "chislev") in Neh 1 1 and Zec 7 1; Tēbhēth in Est 2 16; Sh'bhāt in Zec 1 7 and Ādhār in Ezr 6 15 and several times in Est. These months were lunar and began with the new moon, but their position in regard to the seasons varied somewhat because of the intercalary month about every three years.

The year (שָׁנָה, shānāh) originally began in the autumn, as appears from Ex 23 16 and 34 22, where it is stated that the feast of Ingathering should be at the end of the year; the Sabbatic year began, also, in the 7th month of the calendar year (Lev 25 8-10), indicating that this had been the beginning of the year. This seems to have been a reckoning for civil purposes, while the year beginning with Nīṣān was for ritual and sacred purposes. This resulted from the fact that the great feast of the Passover occurred in this month and the other feasts were regulated by this, as we see from such passages as Ex 23 14-16 and Dt 16 1-17. Jos (Ant, I, iii, 3) says: "Moses appointed that Nīṣān, which is the same with Xanthikos, should be the first words is uncertain, but the former has a close || in the Arab. ijl, "calf." Par is generally used of animals for sacrifice, ēghel, in that and other senses. Ēghel is used of the golden calves and frequently in the expression, ēghel marbēk, "fatted calf," or "calf of the stall," the latter being the literal meaning (1 S 28 24; Jer 46 21; Am 6 4; Mal 4 2).

At the present day beef is not highly esteemed by the people of the country, but mutton is much prized. In the houses of the peasantry it is common to see a young ram being literally stuffed with food, mulberry or other leaves being forced into its mouth by one of the women, who then works the sheep's jaw with one hand. The animal has a daily bath of cold water. The result is deliciously fat and tender mutton. Such an animal is called a ma'laf. From the same root we have ma'laf, "manger," suggestive of the Heb marbēk, "stall."

The calf for sacrifice was usually a male of a year old. Other references to calves are: "to skip like month of their festivals, because he brought them out of Egypt in that month; so that this month began the year as to all solemnities they observed to the honor of God, although he preserved the original order of the months as to selling and buying and other ordinary affairs." A similar custom is still followed in Turkey, where the Mohammedan year is observed for feasts, the pilgrimage to Mecca and other sacred purposes, while the civil year begins in March O.S.

The year was composed of 12 or 13 months according as to whether it was ordinary or leap year. Intercalation is not mentioned in Scripture, but it was employed to make the lunar correspond approximately to the solar year, a month being added whenever the discrepancy of the seasons rendered it necessary. This was regulated by the priests, who had to see that the feasts were duly observed at the proper season. The intercalary month was added after the month of Ādhār and was called the second Ādhār (שְׁנִי, shēnī, אָדָר, wa-ādhār, "and Adar"), and, as already indicated, was added about once in 3 years. More exactly, 4 years out of every 11 were leap years of 13 months (Jew Enc, art. "Calendar"), this being derived from the Bab calendar. If, on the 16th of the month Nīṣān, the sun had not reached the vernal equinox, that month was declared to be the second Ādhār and the following one Nīṣān. This method, of course, was not exact and about the 4th cent. of our era the mathematical method was adopted. The number of days in each month was fixed, seven having 30 days, and the rest 29. When the intercalary month was added, the first Ādhār had 30 and the second 29 days.

LITERATURE

I. The Name.—The term כֶּלֶב, ēghel, is the ordinary Heb name for a male calf and is as flexible as the Eng. name, applying to any animal from one a year old (Mic 6 6) or perhaps younger (Lev 9 3; 12 6) to one three years old (Gen 15 9; cf Jer 34 18, 19). It has been thought that the habitual use of this diminutive term for the golden bulls which Aaron and Jeroboam set up—esp. as it is twice made feminine (Hos 10 5; 13 2)—was intended to indicate their small size and thus to express contempt for them. This however, though plausible, is by no means certain. It was not their size which made these bulls contemptible in the eyes of the prophets, and besides there were no life-size bulls of molten gold in any surrounding countries so far as known. The reference to female calves that were kissed (13 2), presumably at Bethel, may refer not to the worship of the bulls, but to their female counterparts, since in all other countries such female deities invariably accompanied the bull gods. Bethel may be esp. mentioned because it was the "king's sanctuary" (Am 7 13) or because of the multitude of altars and high places found there (Hos 10 8; cf 8 11; Am 5 26). False worship is also mentioned in connection with Jeroboam's apostasy, at Gilgal and Gilead (Hos 4 15; 12 11; Am 4 4; 5 5), Samaria (Hos 8 6; 10 5; 13 2.16); and Beersheba (Am 5 5; 8 14) where no bulls had been set up by Jeroboam so far as stated. That these places receive more condemnation than Dan—which is explicitly mentioned in only one passage (8 14) though it was a chief center of the bull worship (1 K 12 30)—may be due to the fact that the worship of the female deity was the more popular. This was certainly true in neighboring countries and also in other cities in Pal, as has recently been proved by the excavations (see below).

II. Ancient Calf Worship.—The origin of animal worship is hidden in obscurity, but reverence for the bull and cow is found widespread among the most ancient historic cults. Even in the prehistoric age the influence of the bull symbol was so powerful that it gave its name to one of the most important signs of the Zodiac, and from early historic times the horns of the bull were the familiar emblem of the rays of the sun, and solar gods were very commonly represented as bull-gods (Jensen, Kosmologie, 62–90; Winckler, Altorientalische Forschungen, 1901–5, passim; Jeremias, Das Alter der bab. Astronomie, 1909, passim). The Egyptians, close neighbors of the Hebrews, in all eras from that of the Exodus onward, worshipped living bulls at Memphis (not Mendes, as EB) and Heliopolis as incarnations of Ptah and Ra, while one of the most elaborate rituals was connected with the life-size image of the Hathor-cow (Naville, Deir el Bahari, Part I [1907], 163–67), while the sun was revered as the “valiant bull” and the reigning Pharaoh as “Bull of Bulls.” But far more important in this connection is the fact that “calf” worship was almost if not quite universal among all the ancient Sem peoples. If the immediate ancestors of Abraham did not revere this deity, they were certainly quite unlike their relatives, the Babylonians, among whom, according to all tradition, they lived before they migrated to Pal (Gen 11 28.30; Jos, Ant, I, vi, 5), for the Babylonians revered the bull as the symbol of their greatest gods, Anu and Sin and Marduk—the ideograph of a young bullock forming a part of the latter’s name—while Hadadrimmon, an important Amorite deity, whose attributes remarkably resemble those of Jeh (see Ward, AJSL, XXV, 175–85; Clay, Amurru [1909], 87–89), is pictured standing on the back of a bull. In Phoenicia also the bull was a sacred animal, as well as in northern Syria where it ranked as one of the chief Hittite deities, its images receiving devout worship (see further, Sayce, Enc of Rel. and Ethics, s.v. “Bull”). Among all these peoples the cow goddess was given at least equal honor. In Babylonia the goddess Ishtar has the cow for her symbol on very ancient seal cylinders, and when this nude or half-nude goddess appears in Pal she often stands on a bull or cow (see William Hayes Ward, Cylinders and Other Ancient Oriental Seals), and under slightly different forms this same goddess is revered in Arabia, Moab, Phoenicia, Syria and elsewhere, while among the Sem Canaanites the bull was the symbol of Baal, and the cow of Astarte (see particularly Barton, Hebraica, IX, 133–63; X, 1–74, and Semitic Origins, ch vii; Driver, “Astarte” in DB). Recent excavations in Pal have shown that during all eras no heathen worship was as popular as that of Astarte in her various forms (see S. A. Cook, Rel. of Ancient Pal, 1909). That she once is found wearing ram’s horns (PEFS [1903], 227) only reveals her nature more clearly as the goddess of fertility. Her relation to the sacred fish at Carnion in Gilead and to the doves of Ascalon, as well as to female prostitution and to Nature’s “resurrection” and fruitage, had been previously well known, as also her relation to the moon which governs the seasons. Is there any rational motif which can account for this widespread “calf” worship? Is it conceivable that this cult could so powerfully influence such intelligent and rather spiritually-minded nations as the Egyptians and Babylonians if it were wholly irrational and contained no spiritual content? And is there no rational explanation behind this constant fusion of the deity which controls the breeding of cattle with the deity which controls vegetation? How did the bull come to represent the “corn spirit,” so that the running of a bull through the corn (the most destructive act) came to presage good crops; and how did the rending of a bull, spilling his life blood on the soil, increase fertility? (See Fraser, Golden Bough, II, 291–93, 344.) The one real controlling motif of all these various representations and functions of the “calf” god may be found in the ancient awe, esp. among the Semites, for the Mystery of Life. This seems to offer a sufficient reason why the bull, which is a most conspicuous example of life-giving power, should be so closely connected with the reproductive processes of the animal and vegetable kingdoms and also with the sun, which from earliest historic times was considered as preëminently the “giver of life.” Bull worship was not always an exhibition of gross animalism, but, certainly in Bible times, often represented a concept which was the product of reflection upon one of the deepest mysteries of Nature. Few hymns in Egypt or Babylon express higher spiritual knowledge and aspiration than those addressed to the bull gods or to others honored with this title, e.g. this one to the god Sin of Ur, the “heifer of Anu,” “Strong young bull, with strong horns, . . . with beard of lapis-lazuli color . . . self-created, full of developed fruit . . . Mother-womb who has taken up his abode, begetter of all things, exalted habitation among living creatures; O merciful gracious father, in whose hand rests the life of the whole world; O Lord, thy divinity is full of awe like the far-off heaven and the broad ocean!” (Rogers, Religion of Babylonia and Assyria [1908], 164). Many modern scholars believe that the primitive Egyptians and Babylonians really thought of their earthly and heavenly gods as animals (see esp. Maspero, Bulletin critique, 1886; Revue de l’histoire des religions, 1888), but it seems certain that at least as early as the date of the Exodus these stars and beasts were not regarded by all as being themselves deities, but rather as symbols or representations of deity (Davis and Cobern, Ancient Egypt, 281–89; Brugsch, Die Aegyptologie, I, 135; Chwolson, Die Ssabier u. der Ssabismus, II, 134).

The text of Ex 32 is certainly composite (see e.g. Bacon’s “Exodus” in loc. and DB), and some words and phrases are a verbal duplicate of the narrative of Jeroboam’s calf worship (cf Ex 32 4 with 1 K 12 28, and see || columns in Driver’s Deuteronomy). Some Bible critics so analyze the text as to make the entire calf story a later element, without ancient basis, added to some short original statement like Ex 32 7–11, for the sake of satirizing Jeroboam’s bull worship and its non-Levitical priesthood (see e.g. Kuenen, Hexateuch). Most recent critics have however accepted the incident as an ancient memory or historic fact attested by the oldest sources, and used thus by the Deuteronomist (Dt 9), though the verbal form may have been affected by the later editor’s scorn of the northern apostasy. It seems clearly unreasonable to suppose that a Heb writer at any era would so fiercely abuse his own ancestors, without any traditional basis for his statements, merely for the sake of adding a little more which cast reproach upon his northern neighbors, and it seems equally unlikely that any such baseless charges would have been accepted as true by the slandered nation. The old expositors, accepting the essential historicity of the account, generally followed Philo and the early Fathers in supposing this calf of gold was an image of the Apis or Mnevis bulls of Egypt, and this is occasionally yet advocated by some Egyptologists (e.g. Steindorf, Ancient Egypt [1903], 167; cf also Jeremias, OT in Light of Ancient East [1911], II, 138). The objections made to this view by the skeptics of the 18th cent., based on the supposed impossibility of such chemical and mechanical skill being possessed at that era, have mostly been made obsolete by recent discovery. The common modern objection that this could not have been Apis worship because the Apis was a living bull, is by no means conclusive, since images of Apis are not uncommon and were probably worshipped in the temple itself. It may be added that a renaissance of this worship occurred at this very era. So Erman, Handbook of Egypt Rel. (1907), 23-79. Modern Bible scholars, however, are practically unanimous in the opinion that the Golden Calf, if worshipped at all, must have been a representation of a Sem, not an Egypt, deity. In favor of this it may be suggested: (1) It was an era when each deity was considered as the god of a particular country and it would seem impossible that a native Egypt god should be thought of as joining with Egypt's enemies and assisting them to reach a land over which he had no control. (2) The Israelitish religion shows little influence from Egypt, but was immensely influenced from Canaan and Babylon, Apis only being mentioned once (Jer 46 20 [tr^d "heifer"]; cf Ezk 20 7,8, and see Brugsch, Steinschrift und Bibelwort, passim, and Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 217). (3) The bull and cow are now known to have been ordinary symbols for the most popular deities which were worshipped by all the race-relatives of the Hebrews and nowhere more devoutly than in Canaan and in the adjoining districts (see above). (4) Some of the chief gods of the pasture land of Goshen, where the Hebrews had resided for centuries (Gen 47 6; 50 8), were Sem gods which were worshipped not only by the Edomitic Bedawin and other foreigners living there by the "pools of Pithom" (cf Ex 1 11) but by the native Egyptians, Ramses II even naming a daughter after one of these. The special god of this district had as its symbol a bull calf, and one inscription actually speaks of the statue of a "golden calf of 600 pounds weight" which it was the custom to dedicate annually to one of these Sem gods, while another inscription mentions a statue of gold "a cubit in height" (Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt [1905], III, 630-38; Naville, Goshen, Store City of Pithom; Erman, Handbook, 173-74; Brugsch, op. cit.). (5) The chief proof, however, is the statement of the text that the feast in connection with this worship was a "feast to Jehovah" (Ex 32 5). When Moses disappeared for forty days in the Mount, it was not unnatural that the people should turn back to the visible symbols worshipped by their ancestors, and should give to them the new name or new attributes which had been attached to deity by Moses. The worship was condemned for much the same reason as that of Jeroboam's calves (see next section).

1. Narrative of Aaron’s Golden Calf

Though this passage (1 K 12 26-33; cf 2 Ch 10 14,15) may have been reditted later, "there is no reason to infer that any detail of fact is underived from the olden time" (Burney, Heb Text of Kings [1902], and DB). These calves which Jeroboam set up were doubtless bulls (1 K 12 28, Heb) but at least as early as Hosea's time it seems probable (see above) that the more licentious worship of the feminine principle had been added to the official worship (Hos 10 5; 13 2, Heb). This which elsewhere naturally and universally accompanied the bull worship could most truly be called "the sin of Samaria" (Am 8 14) and be classed as the "sin of Jeroboam" (1 K 14 9,16; 16 26; 2 K 10 29). There is no sufficient reason for explaining the term "molten" in any other than its most natural and usual sense (Ex 32 8,24; 2 K 17 16; Dt 9 16), for molded metal idols were common in all eras in Pal and the surrounding countries, though the core of the image might be molten or graven of some inferior metal overlaid with gold (Isa 30 22; 40 19, Heb; Dt 7 25; Ex 32 4). These bull images were undoubtedly intended to represent Jeh (yet cf Robertson, op. cit., and Orr, Problem of OT [1906], 145). The text explicitly identifies these images with Aaron's calf (1 K 12 28), so that nearly all the reasons given above to prove that Aaron's image represented not an Egypt but an ancient Sem deity are equally valid here. To these various other arguments may be added: (1) The text itself states that it is Jeh who brought them from Egypt (Hos 2 15; 12 13; 13 4), whom they call "My lord," and to whom they swear (Hos 2 16 AVm; 4 15); and to whom they present their wine offerings, sacrifices and feasts (Hos 8 13; 9 4,5, Heb; cf Am 5 8). (2) Jehu, though he destroyed all Baal idols, never touched these bulls (2 K 10 28,29). (3) The ritual, though freer, was essentially that of the Jerus temple (1 K 12 32; Hos 5 6; Am 4 5; 5 22,23; see, Oettli, Greifswalder Studien [1895], quoted in DB, I, 342). (4) Even the southern prophets recognized that it was Jeh who had given Jeroboam the kingdom (1 K 11 31; 12 15,24) and only Jeh worship could have realized Jeroboam's purpose of attaching to the throne by this cult such devout citizens as would otherwise be drawn to Jerus to worship. It was to guard against this appeal which the national sanctuary made to devout souls that this counter worship had been established. As Budde says, "A foreign cult would only have driven the devout Ephraimites the more surely over to Jerusalem" (Rel. of Israel [1899], 113). Jeroboam was not attempting to shock the conscience of his religious adherents by making heathenism the state religion, but rather to win these pious worshippers of Jeh to his cause. (5) The places selected for the bull worship were places already sacred to Jeh. This was preëminently true of Bethel which, cents. before Jerus had been captured from the Jebusites, had been identified with special revelations of Jehovah's presence (Gen 13 3,4; 28 19; 31 13; 35 15; 1 S 7 16; Hos 12 4). (6) The history shows that the allegiance of his most pious subjects was retained (1 K 12 20) and that not even Elijah fled to the Southern, supposing that the Northern Kingdom had accepted the worship of heathen gods as its state religion. Instead of this, Elijah, though the boldest opponent of the worship of Baal, is never reported as uttering one word against the bull worship at Dan and Bethel.

III. Attitude of Elijah to the Bull Symbols.—This surprising silence is variously explained. A few scholars, though without any historic or textual evidence for the charge, are sure that the Bible narratives (though written by southern men) are fundamentally defective at this point, otherwise they would report Elijah's antagonism to this cult. Other few, equally without evidence, are comfortably sure that he fully approved the ancient ancestral calf cult. Others, with more probability, explain his position on the ground that, though he may not have favored the bull symbol—which was never used by the Patriarchs so far as known, and certainly was not used as a symbol of Jeh in the Southern Kingdom, or Hosea the northern prophet would have spoken of it—yet being himself a northern man of old ideals and simple habits, Elijah may have believed that, even with this handicap, the freer and more democratic worship carried on at the ancient holy places in the N. was less dangerous than the elaborate and luxurious ritual of the aristocratic and exclusive priesthood of the S., which insisted upon political and religious centralization, and was dependent upon such enormous revenues for its support (cf 1 K 12 10.14). At any rate it is self-evident that if Elijah had turned against Jeroboam and the state religion, it would have divided seriously the forces which needed to unite, in order to oppose with all energy the much fouler worship of Baal which just at this crisis, as never before or afterward, threatened completely to overwhelm the worship of Jeh.

IV. Attitude of Amos and Hosea to the Bull

Symbols.—It is easy to see why Hosea might fiercely condemn a ritual which Elijah might rightly tolerate. (1) This calf worship may have deteriorated. Elijah lived closer to the time when the new state ritual was inaugurated and would naturally be at its best. Hosea lived at an era when he could trace the history of this experiment for nearly two cents., and could see clearly that these images had not helped but greatly hindered the development of the ethical and spiritual religion of Jeh. Even if at first recognized as symbols, these images had become common idols (Hos 12 11; 13 2, and passim). "This thing became a sin" (1 K 12 30; 13 34). The history of religion shows many such instances where the visible or verbal symbol which in one era had been a real aid to devotion at a later time became positively antagonistic to it (see IMAGES). As Baal was also worshipped under the form of a calf and as Jeh himself was at times called "Baal" (Isa 54 5; Jer 31 32; Hos 2 16 Heb) this unethical tendency would be accelerated, as also by the political antagonism between Judah and Ephraim and the bitter hatred between the two rival priest-hoods (cf 2 Ch 11 15; 13 9). Certain it is that by the middle of the 8th cent. the worship at Dan and Bethel had extended itself to many other points and had become so closely affiliated with the heathen worship as to be practically indistinguishable—at least when viewed from the later prophetic standpoint. But (2) it cannot be doubted that the prophetic standpoint had changed in 200 years. As the influence of the northern worship had tended toward heathenism, so the influence of the southern worship of an imageless god had tended toward higher spiritual ideals. Elijah could not have recognized the epoch-making importance of an imageless temple. The constant pressure of this idea—God is Spirit—had developed a new spiritual conscience, which by the 8th cent. was so keen that the worship of Jeh under the form of an image was not improperly considered as almost if not quite as bad as out-and-out heathenism, just as the Reformers of the 16th cent. regarded the Roman Catholic images as little better than idols (Hos 8 5.6; 11 2; 13 2; cf 2 K 17 16.17). The influence of this new conscience is also seen in the fact that it is not simply or perhaps chiefly the "calves" which are condemned, but the spirit of ungodliness and unkindness which also made the orthodox worship in Jerus little if any better than that at Bethel (Hos 6 4; 5 12.14). The influence of this theology—God is Spirit—had so filled the souls of these prophets that even the sacrifices had lost their importance when unaccompanied by kindness and spiritual knowledge (Hos 6 6; 7 1), and it is the absence of this essential spirit, rather than the form of worship, which Amos and Hosea condemn in the Northern Kingdom (Am 2 6-8; 3 10; 4 1; 5 7.12-15.21-24; 6 12; 8 4-6; Hos 4 2.3; 9 1; 10 12-14). These later prophets could also see, as Elijah could not possibly have seen, that unity of worship was imperatively needed, and that sacrifices in the old sacred "high places" must be discontinued. Only thus could superstitious fanaticism and religious disintegration be avoided. A miscellaneous and unregulated Jeh cult might become almost as bad as heathenism. Indeed it might be worse if it gave the Baal spirit and interpretation to Jeh worship. See also ASTROLOGY, II, 2.

CALF IMAGE. See IMAGES.

CALITAS, kal'i-tas (Καλίτας, Kalitäts, or Καλειτάς, Kaleitais): One of the Levites who put away their foreign wives at the request of Esdras (Ezra), 1 Esd 9 23, "Colius, who was called Calitas." It is the Gr form of Heb Kelita (cf || passage, Ezr 10 23, "Kelaiah, the same is Kelita"). He is also named with those who explained the law when read to the people by Esdras (1 Esd 9 48; cf Neh 8 7). It is not certain whether he is to be identified with the Kelita of Neh 10 10 (one of the Levites who signed the covenant made by Nehemiah). The word probably means "dwarf."

CALKER, kók'ēr. See SHIPS AND BOATS.

CALLING, kól'ing (κλήσις, klésis, from kaléo, "I call"): Is a NT expression. The word is used chiefly by Paul, though the idea and term are found also elsewhere. It has a definite, technical sense, the invitation given to men by God to accept salvation in His kingdom through Jesus Christ. This invitation is given outwardly by the preaching of the gospel, inwardly by the work of the Holy Spirit. With reference to Israel, it is on the part of God irrevocable, not repented of. Having in His eternal counsel called this people, He intrusted them with great gifts, and because He did thus enrich them, He also, in the course of time, summoned them to fulfil the task of initiating the world into the way of salvation, and of preparing salvation for the world. Therefore He will not desert His people, for He will not revoke that call (Rom 11 29). This calling is high or upward, in Christ, that is, made in heaven by God on account of Christ and calling man to heaven (Phil 3 14). Similarly it is a heavenly calling (He 3 1); also a holy calling, holy in aim, means, and end (2 Tim 1 9). Christians are urged to walk worthy of this calling (Eph 4 1) (ARV and RV, but AV has "vocation"). In it there is hope; it is the inspirer of hope, and furnishes for hope its supreme object (Eph 4 4). Men are exhorted so to live that God will count them worthy of their calling (2 Thess 1 11). They are also urged to make their calling and election sure (2 Pet 1 10). See ELECTION. There is a somewhat peculiar use of the word in 1 Cor 1 26 and 7 20, namely, that condition of life in which men were when God called them, not many of them wise after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, some circumcised, some uncircumcised, some bond, some free, some male, some female, some married, some unmarried.

CALLISTHENES, ka-lis'the-néz (Καλλισθένης, Kallisthénēs): An officer of Nicanor who was charged with the burning of the sacred portals of the temple at the time of the desecration under Antiochus Epiphanes (168 BC). After the decisive defeat of Nicanor's army at Emmaus (165 BC) the Jews celebrated the victory in the city of their fathers and burned C. who had fled into an out-house with others who had set the sacred gates on fire, "the meet reward of their impiety" (2 Macc 8 33).

CALNEH, kal'ne (כַּלְנֶה, kalneh; Χαλαννή, Chalannē): The name of the fourth city of Nimrod's kingdom (Gen 10 10), the three

1. Identified preceding it being Babel, Erech, and with Accad, i.e. the capital of the realm of Nippur Babylonia and the chief cities of three of the principal states. The meaning of the name is unknown, and many regard the identification as uncertain. G. Rawlinson thought it to be the modern Niffer (or Noufar), comparing the Talmudic (cf Yoma') Nopher, which is said to be the same as Calneh. What place-name Calneh corresponds with in cuneiform is doubtful. Fried. Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies?) compared it with Kul-unu, but as we are told to pronounce this group as Kullaba, it seems unlikely that there is any connection between the two. The identification proposed by G. Rawlinson, however, may be regarded as being supported by the bilingual Creation-legend, in which Merodach (=Nimrod) is made the founder of Babylon, Erech and Nippur, which would in that case be three of the four cities mentioned in Gen 10 10.

The inscriptions reveal to us Nippur as a city with a glorious past. Sargon of Agadé, Sur-Engur, Dungi and all the more prominent

2. Nippur's kings of Babylonia in its larger sense Importance interested themselves in the rebuilding and restoration of its renowned temples, so as to gain the favor of their great divinities. The city's earlier divine patrons were Enlil and Ninlil, the older Bel and Beltis, whose shrines were at the great temple-tower called Ê-kura, "the house of the land," and a poetical

3. Its Deities and Their Legends legend in Sumerian (dialectical) recording their visit to the city, and enumerating its sacred places, still exists (PSBA, March, 1911, 85 ff).

Later, the chief deities of the city seem to have been Ninip, the son of Enlil, and his spouse Nin-Nipri, "the lady of Nippur." These two divine beings likewise evoked the muse of the city-scribes, who dealt with the glories of the god in a composition extending over several tablets, in which his favor to his spouse Nin-Nipri is extolled; and to whom a career very similar to that of Merodach, the head of the Bab pantheon, is attributed (PSBA, December, 1906, 270 ff). The great temple-tower of Niffer, which was dedicated to the god Enlil, was a very striking object among the buildings and temples of the city, and the

4. Its Ruins Today lower stages are still in an extremely perfect condition. Most interesting, also, are the remains of streets and houses which enable the general conditions of life in ancient Babylonia to be estimated, and suggest that they are similar to those subsisting even at the present day. Our knowledge of the city is almost entirely due to the American excavations at Niffer, inaugurated by Rev. J. P. Peters, which have been most fruitful, and have shed quite a new light on the city's history. See Peters' Nippur (2 vols, 1887); the many volumes written or edited by Professor H. V. Hilprecht under the general title The Babylonian Expedition of the University of Pennsylvania; and Professor A. T. Clay's Light on the OT from Babel (Philadelphia, 1907).

CALNEH, kal'ne, CALNO, kal'no (כַּלְנֶה, kalneh [Am 6 2], כַּלְנוֹ, kalnō [Isa 10 9]): "Probably the Kulnia (Kullani) associated with Arpad and Had-rach, Syrian cities, in the Assyrian 'tribute' list (Western Asiatic Inscriptions, II, 53, no. 3); Kullanhu about six miles from Arpad" (HDB, I, 344, and 1-vol HDB, 109).

CALVARY, kal'va-ri. See GOLGOTHA.

CALVES, kävz, OF THE LIPS (LXX καρπὸν χειλῶν, karpón cheilēōn): This is the AV rendering of a dubious Heb text in Hos 14 2 (פְּרִי שְׁפָתַי, pārī sēphāthēnū). The RV runs "So will we render as bullocks the offering of our lips." Strange as the text is, it may be retained, and it admits of at least a possible explanation. The prophet calls on his contemporaries to return in penitence to Jeh. Their worship should consist not of meaningless dumb ritual, but of "words"—hymns and prayers, expressive of real gratitude and of actual needs—or perhaps pledges of repentance and reform. The people respond and undertake that their worship shall consist of "calves or bullocks of lips," i.e. not of animal offerings, but of promises of reform or vows of obedience. But this explanation is forced and most modern commentators follow the LXX, which presupposes a slightly different Hebrew text, and renders פְּרִי שְׁפָתַי, pārī sēphāthēnū, "fruit of our lips," i.e. adoring gratitude or, as the author of the Epistle to the He, who quotes this verse from the LXX, explains it, "sacrifice of praise" (He 13 15). The same phrase occurs in Isa 57 19, where it signifies gladsome gratitude. T. LEWIS

CAMBYSES, kam-bi'sēz (Aram., כַּמְבִּיזַי; Pers, Kambujiya; Assy, Kambuzia; Egypt, Kambythet; Susian, Kanpuziya): The older son of Cyrus, king of Persia. Some have thought that he is the Ahasuerus of Ezr 4 6. This seems to be most improbable, inasmuch as the Heb form of Ahasuerus is the exact equivalent of the Old Pers form of Xerxes, and we have no evidence that Cambyses was ever called Xerxes.

Ancient authorities differ as to who was the mother of Cambyses. It is variously said that she was Cassandane, a Pers princess, Amytis, a Median princess, or Nititis, a daughter of Apries king of Egypt. He had one brother, Bardes or Smerdes, whom he put to death secretly shortly after his accession, probably because of an attempted rebellion. Cambyses organized an expedition for the conquest of Egypt, which was rendered successful by internal treachery and by the aid of the Phoen, Cyprian and Gr fleets. During this campaign Cambyses seems to have acted with good generalship and with clemency toward the conquered. After the subjugation of Egypt, Cyrene and Barca, the modern Tripoli, submitted to his sway. He then desired to undertake the conquest of Carthage, but was compelled to give it up, because his Phoen allies, without whose ships it was impossible for him to conduct his army in safety, refused to join in an attack upon a country that had been colonized by them. He is said to have sent an army of 50,000 men against the oasis of Jupiter Ammon. This army is said to have perished in the sands. A little less unsuccessful expedition was made against Ethiopia. After some initial successes, Cambyses was forced to return to Egypt with the shattered remains of his army. He found that the Egyptians were in revolt, led by their king Psammetichus III, whose life he had formerly spared. This revolt was put down with great harshness, the Egypt king being taken and executed, and many of the temples being destroyed. Shortly after this, Cambyases heard that a certain Magian, who claimed to be his brother Smerdes whom he had secretly put to death, had set himself up as king of Persia, and that almost the whole of his Asiatic dominions had acknowledged him as king. With the fragments of his army he started toward Persia to attack the usurper, but on the way was killed by a wound inflicted by himself, it is uncertain whether by accident or with intention. His general and cousin, Darius Hystaspis, soon put down the false Smerdis and reigned in his stead.

For two or more years Cambyases was king of Babylon, while his father was king of the lands. The son was a drunkard and subject to fits of unbridled passion, but seems to have been of good capacity as a general and as an administrator. Many of the tales that have been told against him were doubtless invented by his enemies, and he has left us no records of his own. That he married his own sisters is probable; but it must be remembered that this was the custom of the Egypt kings of that time and may have been of the Pers kings as well. As to his conduct in Egypt, the only contemporary Egypt authority says that he worshipped before the holiness of Neit as all the pious kings had done, that he ordered that the temple of Neit should be purified, and that its revenues should be restored as they had been before they had been confiscated by Akhmes for his Gr troops. He adds also that not merely were the strangers who had taken up their abode in the temple of Neit ejected from her sanctuary, but that their goods were taken away and their houses destroyed. Darius Hystaspis, the only other contemporary source of information, says of him simply that he was the son of Cyrus, of the same father and mother as Bardes, whom he slew secretly at some time before he set out on his Egypt campaign; and that he died by suicide shortly after he had heard of the rebellion of Persia, Media and the other provinces against him, and of the establishment of Gaumata the Magian as king under the claim that he was "Barzia, the son of Cyrus and brother of Cambyases."

The name of Cambyases is found in three of the Elephantine papyri recently published (September, 1911) by Professor Sachau of Berlin. The fragment numbered 59 1 is so broken that it is impossible to make out the connection or the sense. In papyrus I, we are told that when Cambyases came to Egypt he found in the fortress of Yeb (Elephantine) a temple or synagogue ('agōra'), which had been built in the days of the Egypt kings; and that although he had torn down the temples of the Egypt gods, he had allowed no harm to be done to that of Jeh. The third papyrus is so interesting, because of its mention of Bagoas, the Pers governor of Jerus in 407 BC, who had hitherto been known only from Jos, and of Dalayah the son of the Sanballat who opposed the rebuilding of the wall of Jerus in the time of Ezra-Nehemiah, that we shall now give a tr of it in full: "A memorial of that which Bagoas and Dalayah said to me: Thou shalt say in Egypt unto Arsames with regard to the house of the altar of the God of heaven that was built in the fortress of Yeb before the time of Cambyases and which the accursed(?) Waidrang destroyed in the 14th year of Darius the king, that it shall be built again upon its place as it was before, and that meal-offerings and incense-offerings shall be offered upon that altar as they used to be."

CAMEL, kam'el (גָּמֶל, gāmāl; κάμηλος, kāmēlos; בֶּכְרָה, bekher, and בִּכְרָה, bikhrāh [Isa 60 6; Jer 2 23: "dromedary," ARVm "young camel"], רֶכֶשׁ, rekhes [1 K 4 28; see HORSE], בִּכְרֹת, kirkārōth [Isa 66 20, "swift beasts," ARV "dromedaries"]; בְּנֵי הָרָמְאִים, b'nē hā-rammākhīm [Est 8 10, "young dromedaries," ARV "bred of the stud"]; אֶחָשְׁתָּרָנִים, 'āhasht-rānīm [Est 8 10.14, AV "camels," ARV "that were used in the king's service"]): There are two species of camel, the Arab. or one-humped camel or dromedary, Camelus dromedarius, and the Bactrian or two-humped camel, Camelus bactrianus. The latter inhabits the temperate and cold parts of central Asia and is not likely to have been known to Bib. writers. The Arab. camel inhabits southwestern Asia and northern Africa and has recently been introduced into parts of America and Australia. Its hoofs are not typical of ungulates but are rather like great claws.

Young Camels Grazing.

The toes are not completely separated and the main part of the foot which is applied to the ground is a large pad which underlies the proximal joints of the digits. It may be that this incomplete separation of the two toes is a sufficient explanation of the words "parteth not the hoof," in Lev 11 4 and Dt 14 7. Otherwise these words present a difficulty, because the hoofs are completely separated though the toes are not. The camel is a ruminant and chews the cud like a sheep or ox, but the stomach possesses only three compartments instead of four, as in other ruminants. The first two compartments contain in their walls small pouches, each of which can be closed by a sphincter muscle. The fluid retained in these pouches may account in part for the power of the camel to go for a relatively long time without drinking.

The Arab. camel is often compared with justice to the reindeer of the Esquimaux. It furnishes hair for spinning and weaving, milk, flesh and leather, as well as being an invaluable means of transportation in the arid desert. There are many Arab. names for the camel, the commonest of which is jamal (in Egypt gamal), the root being common to Arab., Heb and other Sem languages. From it the names in Lat, Gr, Eng. and various European languages are derived. There are various breeds of camels, as there are of horses. The riding camels or dromedaries, commonly called hajīn, can go, even at a walk, much faster than the pack camels. The males are mostly used for carrying burdens, the females being kept with the herds. Camels are used to a surprising extent on the rough roads of the mountains, and one finds in the possession of fellāhīn in the mountains and on the littoral plain larger and stronger pack camels than are often found among the Bedawin. Camels were apparently not much used by the Israelites after the time of the patriarchs. They were taken as spoil of war from the Amalekites and other tribes, but nearly the only reference to their use by the later Israelites was when David was made king over all Israel at Hebron, when camels are mentioned among the animals used for bringing food for the celebration (1 Ch 12 40). David had a herd of camels, but the herdsman was Obil, an Ishmaelite (1 Ch 27 30). Nearly all the other Bib. references to camels are to those possessed by Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Ishmaelites, Amalekites, Midianites, Hagrites and the "children of the East" (see EAST). Two references to camels (Gen 12 16; Ex 9 3) are regarded as puzzling because the testimony of the Egypt monuments is said to be against the presence of camels in ancient Egypt. For this reason, Gen 12 16, in connection with Abram's visit to Egypt, is turned to account by Canon Cheyne to substantiate his theory that the Israelites were not in Egypt but in a north Arab. land of Mušri (EB s.v. "Camel," 4). While the flesh of the camel was forbidden to the Israelites, it is freely eaten by the Arabs.

There are three references to the camel in NT: (1) to John's raiment of camel's hair (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6); (2) the words of Jesus that "it is easier for a camel to go through a needle's eye, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Mt 19 24; Mk 10 25; Lk 18 25); (3) the proverb applied to the Pharisees as blind guides, "that strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel" (Mt 23 24). Some MSS read ho kámilos, "a cable," in Mt 19 24 and Lk 18 25.

There are a few unusual words which have been trd "camel" in text or margin of one or the other version. (See list of words at beginning of art.) Bekher and bikhrāh clearly mean a young animal, and the Arab. root word and derivatives are used similarly to the Heb. Rākhash, the root of rekhes, is compared with the Arab. rakad, "to run," and, in RV, rekhes is trd "swift steeds." Kirkārōth, ram-mākhām and 'āhasht'rānīm must be admitted to be of doubtful etymology and uncertain meaning.

CAMEL'S HAIR (τρίχες καμήλου, triches kamēlou): In Mt 3 4 and Mk 1 6 the description of John's raiment is explicit to the extent of telling the kind of hair of which his raiment was made. It is probable that his garment was made of a tawed camel skin, for the more expensive woven camel's hair garment would not be in keeping with the rest of the description. It is still common among the poor in some parts of Syria, when a camel or other animal dies, to remove its skin and, after treating the inner surface to stop decomposition, to make it up into various domestic articles. The writer once saw a peasant dragging a skin along the road which proved to be that of a donkey which had just died on the route. His intention was probably to make it up into a cloak. Some believe that Elijah's mantle was of camel's hair (2 K 1 8; cf Zec 13 4). Of that we cannot be sure, for in the East today the hairy garment is usually goat's hair or wool either woven or still clinging to the skin. It was much more likely to have been one of these latter. See SHEEP RAISING. Camel's hair, when woven into fabrics, as in rugs, makes an article of even softer and more glossy texture than wool. See WEAVING. JAMES A. PATCH

CANA, kā'na, OF GALILEE (Κανά τῆς Γαλιλαίας, Kanā tēs Galilaias): This was the scene of Christ's earliest miracle, when, at the marriage feast, He turned water into wine (Jn 2 1 ff). It was the home of Nathanael (21 2). From Cana, after the marriage, Jesus "went down" to Capernaum (2 12), and returned at the request of the centurion (4 46, 51). These are the only notices of Cana in Scripture, and from them we learn merely that it was in Galilee, and in the uplands W. of the lake. Other villages of the same name are mentioned by Jos, but probably this one is intended by the Cana where for a time he dwelt (Vita, 16) which he locates in the plain of Asochis (ib, 41). The Gr kanā probably transliterates an old Heb kānāh, "place of reeds." This ancient name survives in Khīrbet Kānā, a ruined site with rock-hewn tombs, cisterns and a pool, on the northern edge of Sahl el-Baṭṭauf, the plain of Asochis. Near by are marshy stretches where reeds still abound: the name therefore is entirely appropriate. The name Kānā el-Jelīl, the exact Arab. equivalent of Kanā tēs Galilaias, is also heard among the natives. This, however, may have arisen from the suggested identification with Cana of the Gospel. The position agrees well enough with the Gospel data.

Kefr Kennah, a thriving village about 3½ miles from Nazareth, on the southern edge of Sahl Tor'an, the plain S. of the range of that name, through which the road from Nazareth to Tiberias passes, has also many advocates. This identification is accepted by the Gr and Lat churches, which have both built extensively in the village; the Greeks showing stone jars said to have been used in the miracle, and the traditional house of Cana of Galilee.

Nathanael being pointed out. A copious spring of excellent water rises W. of the village; and the pomegranates grown here are greatly prized. The change of name, however, from Kānā to Kennah—(note the doubled n), is not easy; and there are no reeds in the neighborhood to give the name any appropriateness.

Onom locates Cana in the tribe of Asher toward Great Sidon, probably thinking of Kānā, a village about 8 miles S. of Tyre. The pilgrims of the Middle Ages seem to be fairly divided as to the two sites. Saewulf (1102), Brocardius (1183), Marinus Sanutus (1321), Breydenbach (1483) and Anselm (1507) favor the northern site; while on the side of Kejr Kennah may be reckoned St. Paula (383), St. Willibald (720), Isaac Chelo (1334) and Quaresimus (1616). It seems pretty certain that the Crusaders adopted the identification with Khirbet Kānā (Conder, Tent Work, 69 f). While no absolute decision is possible, on the available evidence probability points to the northern site.

Col. Conder puts in a claim for a third site, that of 'Ain Kānā on the road from er-Reineh (a village about 1½ mile from Nazareth on the Tiberias road) to Tabor (Tent Work, 81). W. EWING Canaan is stated in Gen 10 6 to have been a son of Ham and brother of Mizraim, or Egypt. This indicates the Mosaic period when the conquerors of the XVIIIth and XIXth Egyp Dynasties made Canaan for a time a province of the Egyp empire. Under the Pharaoh Menephtah, at the time of the Exodus, it ceased to be connected with Egypt, and the Egyp garrisons in the S. of the country were expelled by the Philis, who probably made themselves masters of the larger portion of it, thus causing the name of Philistia or Pal to become synonymous with that of Canaan (see Zeph 2 5). In the Am Tab, Canaan is written Kinakhna and Kinakhkhi. The latter form corresponds with the Gr Xvā (Chnā), a name given to Phoenicia (Hecat. Fragments 254; Eusebius, Praep. Ev., i.10; ix.17).

In Nu 13 29 the Canaanites are described as dwelling "by the sea, and along by the side of the Jordan," i.e. in the lowlands of Pal. The name was confined to the country W. of the Jordan (Nu 33 51; Josh 22 9), and was esp. applied to Phoenicia (Isa 23 11; cf Mt 15 22). Hence Sidon is called the "firstborn" of Canaan (Gen 10 15, though cf Jgs 3 3), and the LXX translates "Canaanites" by "Phoenicians" and "Canaan" by the "land of the Phoenicians" (Ex 16 35; Josh 5 12). Kinakhkhi is used in the same restricted sense in the Am Tab, but it is also extended so as to include Pal generally. On the other hand, on the Egyp monuments Seti I calls a town in the extreme S. of Pal "the city of Pa-Kana'na" or "the Canaan," which Conder identifies with the modern Khurbet Kenan near Hebron.

As in the Am Tab, so in the OT, Canaan is used in an extended sense to denote the whole of Pal W. of the Jordan (Gen 12 5; 23 2.19; 28 1; 31 18; 35 6; 36 2; 37 1; 48 7; Ex 15 15; Nu 13 2; Josh 14 1; 21 2; Ps 135 11). Thus Jerus which had Amorite and Hittite founders is stated to be of "the land of the Canaanite" (Ezk 16 3), and Isa (19 18) terms Hebrew, which was shared by the Israelites with the Phoenicians and, apparently, also the Amorites, "the language of Canaan." Jabin is called "the king of Canaan" in Jgs 4 2.23.24; but whether the name is employed here in a restricted or extended sense is uncertain.

As the Phoenicians were famous as traders, it has been supposed that the name "Canaanite" is a synonym of "merchant" in certain passages of the OT. The pursuit of the trade, however, was characteristic only of the maritime cities of Phoenicia, not of the Canaanitish towns conquered by the Israelites. In Isa 23 11 we should tr "Canaan" (as LXX) instead of "merchant city" (AV); in Hos 12 7 (8), "as for Canaan" (LXX), instead of "he is a merchant" (AV); in Zeph 1 11, "people of Canaan" (LXX), instead of "merchant people" (AV); on the other hand, "Canaanite" seems to have acquired the sense of "merchant," as "Chaldean" did of "astrologer," in Isa 23 8, and Prov 31 24, though probably not in Zec 14 21, and Job 41 6 (Heb 40 30).

Much light has been thrown upon the history of Canaan prior to the Israelitish occupation by recent excavation, supplemented by the monuments of Babylonia and Egypt. The Results of Pal Exploration led the way by its Recent excavations in 1890-92 at Tell el-Hesi, which turned out to be the site of Lachish, first under Professor Flinders Petrie and then under Dr. Bliss. Professor Petrie laid the foundations of Pal archaeology by fixing the chronological sequence of the Lachish pottery, and tracing the remains of six successive cities, the fourth of which was that founded by the Israelites. Between it and the preceding city was a layer of ashes, marking the period when the town lay desolate and uninhabited. The excavations at Lachish were followed by others at Tell es-Safi, the supposed site of Gath; at Tell Sandahanna, the ancient Marissa, a mile S. of Bêt Jibrîn, where interesting relics of the Gr period were found, and at Jerus, where an attempt was made to trace the city walls. Next to Lachish, the most fruitful excavations have been at Gezer, which has been explored by Mr. Macalister with scientific thoroughness and skill, and where a large necropolis has been discovered as well as the remains of seven successive settlements, the last of which comes down to the Seleucid era, the third corresponding with the first settlement at Lachish. The two first settlements go back to the neolithic age. With the third the Sem or "Amorite" period of Canaan begins; bronze makes its appearance; high-places formed of monoliths are erected, and inhumation of the dead is introduced, while the cities are surrounded with great walls of stone. While Mr. Macalister has been working at Gezer, German and Austrian expeditions under Dr. Schumacher have been excavating at Tell em-Mutesellim, the site of Megiddo, and under Dr. Sellin first at Tell Taanach, the ancient Taanach, and then at Jericho. At Taanach cuneiform tablets of the Mosaic age were found in the house of the governor of the town; at Samaria and Gezer cuneiform tablets have also been found, but they belong to the late Assyrian and Bab periods. At Jericho, on the flat roof of a house adjoining the wall of the Canaanitish city, destroyed by the Israelites, a number of clay tablets were discovered laid out to dry before being inscribed with cuneiform characters. Before the letters were written and despatched, however, the town, it seems, was captured and burnt. An American expedition, under Dr. Reisner, is now exploring Sebasteiyeh (Samaria), where the ruins of Ahab's palace, with early Hebrew inscriptions, have been brought to light, as well as a great city wall built in the age of Nebuchadrezzar.

(1) The stone age.—The history of Canaan begins with the palaeolithic age, palaeolithic implements having been found in the lowlands. Our first knowledge of its population dates from the neolithic period. The neolithic inhabitants of

4. History Gezer were of short stature (about 5 ft. 4 in. in height), and lived in caves—at least in the time of the first prehistoric settlement—and burned their dead. Their sacred place was a double cave with which cup-marks in the rock were connected, and their pottery was rude; some of it was ornamented with streaks of red or black on a yellow or red wash. In the time of the second settlement a rude stone wall was built around the town. The débris of the two neolithic settlements is as much as 12 ft. in depth, implying a long period of accumulation.

Foundation Sacrifice Found at Gezer.

(2) The bronze age.—The neolithic population was succeeded by one of Sem type, which introduced the use of metal, and buried its dead. The name of Amorite has been given to it, this being the name under which the Sem population of Canaan was known to the Babylonians. Gezer was surrounded by a great wall of stone intersected by brick towers; at Lachish the Amorite wall was of crude brick, nearly 29 ft. in thickness (cf Dt 1 28). A "high-place" was erected at Gezer consisting of 9 monoliths, running from N. to S., and surrounded by a platform of large stones. The second monolith has been polished by the kisses of the worshippers; the seventh was brought from a distance. Under the pavement of the sanctuary lay the bones of children, more rarely of adults, who had been sacrificed and sometimes burnt, and the remains deposited in jars. Similar evidences of human sacrifice were met with under the walls of houses both here and at Taanach and Megiddo. In the Israelitish strata the food-bowl and lamp for lighting the dead in the other world are retained, but all trace of human sacrifice is gone. At Lachish in Israelitish times the bowl and lamp were filled with sand. The second "Amorite" city at Gezer had a long existence. The high-place was enlarged, and an Egyptian of the age of the XIIth Dynasty was buried within its precincts. Egypt scarabs of the XIIth and XIIIth Dynasties are now met with; these give place to scarabs of the Hyksos period, and finally to those of the XVIIIth Dynasty (1600 BC). Hittite painted pottery of Cappadocian type is also found in the later débris of the city as well as seal-cylinders of the Bab pattern.

(3) A Babylonian province.—Meanwhile Canaan had for a time formed part of the Bab empire. Gudea, viceroy of Lagas under the kings of the Dynasty of Ur (2500 BC), had brought "limestone" from the "land of the Amorites," alabaster from Mt. Lebanon, cedar-beams from Amanus, and gold-dust from the desert between Pal and Egypt. A cadastral survey was drawn up about the same time by Uru-malik, "the governor of the land of the Amorites," the name by which Syria and Canaan were known to the Babylonians, and colonies of "Amorites" engaged in trade were settled in the cities of Babylonia. After the fall of the Dynasty of Ur, Babylonia was itself conquered by the Amorites who founded the dynasty to which Khammu-rabi, the Amraphel of Gen 14 1, belonged (see HAMMURABI). In an inscription found near Diarbekir the only title given to Khammu-rabi is "king of the land of the Amorites." Bab now became the official, literary and commercial language of Canaan, and schools were established there in which the cuneiform script was taught. Canaanitish culture became wholly Bab; even its theology and gods were derived from Babylonia. The famous legal code of Khammu-rabi (see HAMMURABI, CODE OF) was enforced in Canaan as in other parts of the empire, and traces of its provisions are found in Gen. Abram's adoption of his slave Eliezer, Sarai's conduct to Hagar, and Rebekah's receipt of a dowry from the father of the bridegroom are examples of this. So, too, the sale of the cave of Machpelah was in accordance with the Bab legal forms of the Khammu-rabi age. The petty kings of Canaan paid tribute to their Bab suzerain, and Bab officials and "commercial travelers" (damgari) frequented the country.

(4) Jerusalem founded.—We must ascribe to this period the foundation of Jerus, which bears a Bab name (Uru-Salim, "the city of Salim"), and commanded the road to the naphtha springs of the Dead Sea. Bitumen was one of the most important articles of Bab trade on account of its employment for building and lighting purposes, and seems to have been a government monopoly. Hence the rebellion of the Canaanitish princes in the naphtha district (Gen 14) was sufficiently serious to require a considerable force for its suppression.

(5) The Hyksos.—The Amorite dynasty in Babylonia was overthrown by a Hittite invasion, and Bab authority in Canaan came to an end, though the influence of Bab culture continued undiminished. In the N. the Hittites were dominant; in the S., where Egypt influence had been powerful since the age of the XIIth Dynasty, the Hyksos conquest of Egypt united Pal with the Delta. The Hyksos kings bear Canaanitish names, and their invasion of Egypt probably formed part of that general movement which led to the establishment of an "Amorite" dynasty in Babylonia. Egypt now became an appanage of Canaan, with its capital, accordingly, near its Asiatic frontier. One of the Hyksos kings bears the characteristically Canaanitish name of Jacob-el, written in the same way as on Bab tablets of the age of Khammu-rabi, and a place of the same name is mentioned by Thothmes III as existing in southern Pal.

(6) Egyptian conquest.—The Pharaohs of the XVIIIth Dynasty expelled the Hyksos and conquered Pal and Syria. For about 200 years Canaan was an Egypt province. With the Egypt conquest the history of the second Amorite city at Gezer comes to an end. The old wall was partially destroyed, doubtless by Thothmes III (about 1480 BC). A third Amorite city now grew up, with a larger and stronger wall, 14 ft. thick. The houses built on the site of the towers of the first wall were filled with scarabs and other relics of the reign of Amon-hotep III (1440 BC). At Lachish the ruins of the third city were full of similar remains, and among them was a cuneiform tablet referring to a governor of Lachish mentioned in the Am Tab. At Taanach cuneiform tablets of the same age have been discovered, written by Canaanites to one another but all in the Bab script and language.

(7) Tell el-Amarna tablets.—In the Am Tab we have a picture of Canaan at the moment when the Asiatic empire of Egypt was breaking up through the religious and social troubles that marked the reign of Amon-hotep IV. The Hittites were attacking it in the N.; in the S. of Canaan the Kh-biri or "confederate" bands of free-lances were acquiring principalities for themselves. The petty kings and governors had foreign troops in their pay with which they fought one against the other; and their mercenaries readily transferred their allegiance from one paymaster to another, or seized the city they were engaged to defend. Hittites, Mitannians from Mesopotamia, and other foreigners appear as governors of the towns; the Egypt government was too weak to depose them and was content if they professed themselves loyal. At times the Canaanitish princes intrigued with the Assyrians against their Egypt masters; at other times with the Mitannians of "Aram-Naharaim" or the Hittites of Cappadocia. The troops sent by the Egypt Pharaoh were insufficient to suppress the rebellion, and the authority of the Egypt commissioners grew less and less. Eventually the king of the Amorites was compelled to pass openly over to the Hittite king, and Canaan was lost to the Pharaohs.

Gaza and the neighboring towns, however, still remained in their hands, and with the recovery of Egyptian power under the XIXth Dynasty allowed Seti I to march once more into Canaan and reduce it again to subjection. In spite of Hittite attacks the country on both sides of the Jordan acknowledged the rule of Seti and his son Ramses II, and in the 21st year of the latter Pharaoh the long war with the Hittites came to an end, a treaty being made which fixed the Egypt frontier pretty much where the Israelitish frontier afterward ran. A work, known as The Travels of the Mohar, which satirizes the misadventures of a tourist in Canaan, gives a picture of Canaan in the days of Ramses II. With the death of Ramses II Egypt rule in Pal came finally to an end. The Philis drove the Egypt garrisons from the cities which commanded the military road through Canaan, and the long war with the Hittites exhausted the inland towns, so that they made but a feeble resistance to the Israelites who assailed them shortly afterward. The Egyptians, however, never relinquished their claim to be masters of Canaan, and when the Philis power had been overthrown by David we find the Egypt king again marching northward and capturing Gezer (1 K 9 16). Meanwhile the country had become to a large extent Israelite. In the earlier days of the Israelitish invasion the Canaanitish towns had been destroyed and the people massacred; later the two peoples intermarried, and a mixed race was the result. The portraits accompanying the names of the places taken by Shishak in southern Pal have Amorite features, and the modern fellahin of Pal are Canaanite rather than Jewish in type.

Canaanitish culture was based on that of Babylonia, and begins with the introduction of the use of copper and bronze. When Canaan became a Bab province, it naturally shared in the civilization of the ruling power. The religious beliefs and deities of Babylonia were superimposed upon those of the primitive Canaanite. The local Baal or "lord" of the soil made way for the "lord of heaven," the Sun-god of the Babylonians. The "high-place" gradually became a temple built after a Bab fashion. The sacred stone, once the supreme object of Canaanitish worship, was transformed into a Beth-el or shrine of an indwelling god. The gods and goddesses of Babylonia migrated to Canaan; places received their names from Nebo or Nin-ip; Hadad became Amurrû "the Amorite god"; Istar passed into Ashtôreth, and Asirtu, the female counterpart of Asir, the national god of Assyria, became Ashêrah, while her sanctuary, which in Assyria was a temple, was identified in Canaan with the old fetish of an upright stone or log. But human sacrifice, and more esp. the sacrifice of the firstborn son, of which we find few traces in Babylonia, continued to be practised with undiminished frequency until, as we learn from the excavations, the Israelitish conquest brought about its suppression. The human victim is also absent from the later sacrificial tariffs of Carthage and Marseilles, its place being taken in them by the ram. According to these tariffs the sacrifices and offerings were of two kinds, the zau'at or sin offering and the shelem or thank-offering. The sin offering was given wholly to the god; part of the thank-offering would be taken by the offerer. Birds which were not allowed as a sin offering might constitute a thank-offering. Besides the sacrifices, there were also offerings of corn, wine, fruit and oil.

What primitive Canaanitish art was like may be seen from the rude sculptures in the Wadi el-Qana near Tyre. Under Bab influence it

7. Art rapidly developed. Among the Canaanites captured by Thothmes III were tables, chairs and staves of cedar and ebony inlaid with gold or simply gilded, richly embroidered robes, chariots chased with silver, iron tent poles studded with precious stones, "bowls with goats' heads on them, and one with a lion's head, the workmanship of the land of Zahi" (the Phoen coast), iron armor with gold inlay, and rings of gold and silver that were used as money. At Taanach, gold and silver ornaments have been found of high artistic merit. To the Israelites, fresh from the desert, the life of the wealthy Canaanite would have appeared luxurious in the extreme.

The position of Canaan made it the meeting-place of the commercial routes of the ancient world.

The fleets of the Phoen cities are celebrated in the Am Tab, and it is probable that they were already engaged in the purple trade. The inland towns of Canaan depended not only on agriculture but also on a carrying trade: caravans as well as "commercial travelers" (damgari) came to them from Cappadocia, Babylonia and Egypt. Bronze, silver, lead, and painted ware were brought from Asia Minor, together with horses; naphtha was exported to Babylonia in return for embroidered stuffs; copper came from Cyprus, richly chased vessels of the precious metals from Crete and corn from Egypt. Baltic amber has been found at Lachish, where a furnace with iron slag, discovered in the third Amorite city, shows that the native iron was worked before the age of the Israelitish conquest. The manufacture of glass goes back to the same epoch.

5. The Israelitish Invasion

As far back as 2500 BC, alabaster and limestone had been sent to Babylonia from the quarries of the Lebanon.

Long before the age of Abraham the Bab seal-cylinder had become known and been imitated in Syria and Canaan. But it was not until Canaan had been made a Bab province under the Khammu-rabi dynasty that the cuneiform system of writing was introduced together with the Bab language and literature. Henceforward schools were established and libraries or archive-chambers formed where the foreign language and its complicated syllabary could be taught and stored. In the Mosaic age the Taanach tablets show that the inhabitants of a small country town could correspond with one another on local matters in the foreign language and script, and two of the Tell el-Amarna letters are from a Canaanitish lady. The naturally to convey the idea of sluggishness. In the account of the plagues (Ex 7 19), names are used descriptively to designate the different waters of Egypt: n'hārōth, "flowing streams," for the main channels of the river, and y'ōrīm for other streams, which by contrast must mean, as it should according to its use by the Egyptians, "the sluggish streams," i.e. "canals," as it is rendered by the Revisers. This meaning of the word being thus clearly established, it is appropriately used in the RVm in the other instances of its occurrence in like circumstances.

9. Art of Writing

CANALS, ka-nalz' (כְּנָרִים, y'ōrīm): The word "canals" occurs in several places in the RVm (Ex 7 19; 8 5; Isa 19 6; Nah 3 8). y'ōr is an Egypt word, the designation of the Nile (Brugsch, Geogr. I, 8, 78). The proper name of the Nile as a god was Hapi. There were several common designations of the Nile, but the usual one was y'ōr, Heb pl. y'ōrīm. The primary meaning of y'ōr in Egypt is not certain, but its significance in use for the Nile is plain enough. All the waters in Egypt were of the Nile and this word y'ōr was used to denote all of them, the Nile and all its ramifications through the whole irrigating system. Thus y'ōrīm, Niles, came to be used. As only the main channels of the Nile had much current, the y'ōrīm came years by the queens of Ethiopia (vi.29). See ETHIOPIA. Her treasurer, "a eunuch of great authority," was baptized by Philip the Evangelist on his return from worshipping in Jerus.

CANDLE, kan'd'l, CANDLESTICK, kan'd'l-stik (נֵר, nēr; λύχνος, luchnos; מְנֹרָה, m'nōrāh; λυχνία, luchniā):

(1) "Candle" is found in the OT, AV, as the rendering of nēr, and in the NT for luchnos. In all places except Jer 25 10 and Zeph 1 12 (see m) RV gives the more exact rendering "lamp." See LAMP. Candle, in our sense of the term, was unknown to antiquity.

(2) "Candlestick" stands for what was a common and indispensable article of ancient house furniture, a lamp-stand (m'nōrāh). Accordingly we find it mentioned in a case thoroughly representative of the furnishings of an oriental room of the plainer sort, in the account of "the prophet's chamber" given in 2 K 4 10. Here we find that the furniture consisted of a "bed," a "table," a "seat," and a "candlestick," or lamp-stand. The excavations of Petrie and Bliss at Lachish (Tell el-Hesi, 104), not to mention others, help to make it clear that a lamp-stand is meant in passages where the Heb word, m'nōrāh, or its Gr equivalent luchniā, is used. Accordingly throughout the NT, RV has consistently rendered luchniā by "stand" (Mt 5 15; Mk 4 21; Lk 8 16; 11 33).

(3) The "candlestick" of Dnl 5 5 is rather the candelabrum (nebhraštā) of Belshazzar's banqueting-hall. The "golden candlestick" of the tabernacle and the temple requires special treatment. See CANDLESTICK (GOLDEN); TABERNACLE.

(4) Certain figurative uses of "candle" and "candlestick" in the Bible demand attention. The ancient and still common custom of the East of keeping a house lamp burning night and day gave rise to the figure of speech so universally found in oriental languages by which the continued prosperity of the individual or the family is set forth by the perennially burning lamp (see Job 29 3: "when his lamp shined upon my head"; Ps 18 28: "Thou wilt light my lamp"). The converse in usage is seen in many passages—(see Job 18 6: "His lamp above him shall be put out"; 21 17: "How oft is it that the lamp of the wicked is put out"; Prov 24 20: "The lamp of the wicked shall be put out"; Jer 25 10: "Take from them . . . the light of the lamp"). The same metaphor is used in Rev 2 5 to indicate the judgment with which the church of Ephesus was threatened: "I will move thy candlestick out of its place." "The seven golden candlesticks" (Rev 1 20) which John saw were "the seven churches," the appointed light-bearers and dispensers of the religion of the risen Christ. Hence the significance of such a threat.

CANDLESTICK, kan'd'l-stik, THE GOLDEN, gold'n (מִנְיָרָה, m'nōrah, lit. "lamp-stand"): An important part of the furniture of the tabernacle and temples. See TABERNACLE; TEMPLE; LAMP.

The candlestick is first met with in the descriptions of the tabernacle (Ex 25 31-39; 37 17-24).

1. The Tabernacle It was, with the utensils connected with it (snuffers, snuff dishes), to be made of pure beaten gold, of one piece, a talent in weight (Ex 25 39). It consisted of a pedestal or base, of a central stem (the name "candlestick" is specially given to this), of six curving branches—three on each side—and of seven lamps resting on the tops of the branches and stem. Stem and branches were ornamented with cups like almond-blossoms, knops and flowers—four of this series on the stem, and three on each of the branches. Some, however, understand the "cup" to embrace the "knop" and "flower" (calyx and corolla). The shape of the pedestal is uncertain. Jewish tradition suggests three small feet; the representation of the candlestick on the Arch of Titus has a solid, hexagonal base (see Fig. 1).

The position of the candlestick was on the S. side of the holy place (Ex 40 24).

In Solomon's temple the single golden candlestick was multiplied to ten, and the position was altered.

2. Temple The candlesticks were now placed in front of the Holy of Holies, five on one of Solomon side, five on the other (1 K 7 49; 2 Ch 4 7). Further details are not given in the texts, from which it may be presumed that the model of the tabernacle candlestick was followed.

The second temple reverted to the single golden candlestick. When the temple was plundered by Antiochus Epiphanes, the candlestick was taken away (1 Macc 1 21); after the cleansing, a new one was made by Judas Maccabaeus (4 49.50).

3. Temple of Zerubabel The same arrangement of a single golden candlestick, placed on the S. side of the holy place, was continued in Herod's Temple (Jos, BJ, V, v, 5). It was this which, carried away by Titus, was represented on his Arch at Rome.

4. Temple of Herod The immediate object of the candlestick was to give light in the holy place. The lamps were lighted in the evening and burned till the morning.

5. Use and Symbolism (Ex 30 7. 8; Lev 24 3; 1 S 3 3; 2 Ch 13 11), light being admitted into the temple during the day by the upper windows. Jos in his cosmical speculations (BJ, V, v, 5) takes the seven lamps to signify the seven planets. In Zechariah's vision of the golden candlestick (4 2 ff), the seven lamps are fed by two olive trees which are interpreted to be "the two anointed ones," Zerubbabel and Joshua—the civil and spiritual representatives of the theocracy. The candlestick here, like the seven candlesticks in Rev 1 20.21, symbolizes the church of God, then in its OT form, the idea conveyed being that God's church is set to be a light-giver in the world. Cf Christ's words (Mt 5 14.16; Lk 12 35), and Paul's (Phil 2 15).

The oldest known representation of the seven-branched candlestick is on a coin of Antigonus, cir 40 BC (see Madden's Coins of the Jews, 102). For literature see TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

This is the only reference to the place and the site is unknown. Gesenius and others think it is probably the same as Calneh of Am 6 2 or of Gen 10 10, and Calno of Isa 10 9. According to the Tgs, Eusebius, and Jerome, this place is identical with Ctesiphon, which was situated on the Tigris. One codex of De Rossi has made this identification in the passage in Ezk 27 23. Cornill thinks Canneh is the Calneh of Am 6 2, but Cheyne thinks the name is really nonexistent. He says the words rendered "and Canneh and Eden" should rather be "and the sons of Eden."

LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—The problem of how we came by 39 books known as OT "Scripture" is a purely historical investigation. The question involved is, not who wrote the several books, but who made them into a collection, not their origin or contents, but their history; not God's part, but man's. Our present aim, accordingly, must be to trace the process by which the various writings became "Scripture."

The word "canon" is of Christian origin, from the Gr word kanón, kanōn, which in turn is probably borrowed from the Heb word, קָנָן, kāneh, meaning a reed or measuring rod, hence norm or rule. Later it came to mean a rule of faith, and eventually a catalogue or list. In present usage it signifies a collection of religious writings Divinely inspired and hence authoritative, normative, sacred and binding. The term occurs in Gal 6 16; 2 Cor 10 13-16; but it is first employed of the books of Scripture in the technical sense of a standard collection or body of sacred writings, by the church Fathers of the 4th cent.; e.g. in the 59th canon of the Council of Laodicea (363 AD); in the Festal Epistle of Athanasius (365 AD); and by Amphilochius, archbishop of Iconium (395 AD).

1. The Christian Term "Canon"—How the ancient Hebrews expressed the conception of canonicity is not known; but it is safe to say that the idea, as an idea, existed long before there was any special phrase invented to express it. In the NT the word "Scriptures" conveys unquestionably the notion of sacredness (Mt 21 42; Jn 5 39; Acts 18 24). From the 1st cent. AD and following, however, according to the Talm, the Jews employed the phrase "defile the hands." Writings which were suitable to be read in the synagogue were designated as books which "defile the hands." What this very peculiar oriental expression may have originally signified no one definitely knows. Probably Lev 16 24 gives a hint of the true interpretation. According to this passage the high priest on the great Day of Atonement washed not only when he put on the holy garments of his office, but also when he put them off. Quite possibly, therefore, the expression "defile the hands" signified that the hands which had touched the sacred writings must first be washed before touching aught else. The idea expressed, accordingly, was one akin to that of taboo. That is to say, just as certain garments worn by worshippers in encircling the sacred Kaaba at Mecca are taboo to the Mohammedans of today, i.e. cannot be worn outside the mosque, but must be left at the door as the worshippers quit the sanctuary, so the Heb writings which were fit to be read in the synagogue rendered the hands of those who touched them taboo, defiling their hands, as they were wont to say, so that they must first be washed before engaging in any secular business. This seems to be the best explanation of this enigmatical phrase. Various other and somewhat fanciful explanations of it, however, have been given: for example, to prevent profane uses of worn-out synagogue rolls (Buhl); or to prevent placing consecrated grain alongside of the sacred rolls in the synagogues that it might become holy, as the grain would attract the mice and the mice would gnaw the rolls (Strack, Wildeboer and others); or to prevent the sacred, worn-out parchments from being used as coverings for animals (Graetz); or to "declare the hands to be unclean unless previously washed" (Fürst, Green). But no one of these explanations satisfies. The idea of taboo is more likely imbedded in the phrase.

The rabbins invented a special phrase to designate rolls that were worn-out or disputed. These they called g'nūzīm, meaning "hidden away." Cemeteries filled with Heb manuscripts which have long been buried are frequently found today in Egypt in connection with Jewish synagogues. Such rolls might first be placed in the g'nūzāh or rubbish chamber of the sanctuary. They were not, however, apocryphal or uncanonical in the sense of being extraneous or outside the regular collection. For such the Jews had a special term šephārīm hāṣōnīm, "books that are outside." These could not be read in the synagogues. "Hidden books" were rather worn-out parchments, or canonical rolls which might by some be temporarily disputed. See APOCRYPHA.

3. The "Hidden Books" of the Jews—Who had the right to declare a writing canonical? To this question widely divergent answers have been given. According to a certain class of theologians the several books of the OT were composed by authors who were conscious not only of their inspiration but also that their writings were destined to be handed down to the church of future generations as sacred. In other words each writer canonized, as it were, his own writings. For example, Dr. W. H. Green (Canon, 35 f, 106, 110) says: "No formal declaration of their canonicity was needed to give them sanction. . . . They were from the first not only eagerly read by the devout but believed to be Divinely obligatory. . . . Each individual book of an acknowledged prophet of Jeh, or of anyone accredited as inspired by Him to make known His will, was accepted as the word of God immediately upon its appearance. . . . Those books and those only were accepted as the Divine standards of their faith and regulative of their conduct which were written for this definite purpose by those whom they believed to be inspired of God. It was this which made them canonical. The spiritual profit found in them corresponded with and confirmed the belief in their heavenly origin. And the public official action which further attested, though it did not initiate, their canonicity, followed in the wake of the popular recognition of their Divine authority. . . . The writings of the prophets, delivered to the people as a declaration of the Divine will, possessed canonical authority from the moment of their appearance. . . . The canon does not derive its authority from the church, whether Jewish or Christian; the office of the church is merely that of a custodian and a witness." So likewise Dr. J. D. Davis (Pres. and Ref. Review, April, 1902, 182).

4. The Determining Principle in the Formation of the Canon—The OT were composed by authors who were conscious not only of their inspiration but also that their writings were destined to be handed down to the church of future generations as sacred. In other words each writer canonized, as it were, his own writings. For example, Dr. W. H. Green (Canon, 35 f, 106, 110) says: "No formal declaration of their canonicity was needed to give them sanction. . . . They were from the first not only eagerly read by the devout but believed to be Divinely obligatory. . . . Each individual book of an acknowledged prophet of Jeh, or of anyone accredited as inspired by Him to make known His will, was accepted as the word of God immediately upon its appearance. . . . Those books and those only were accepted as the Divine standards of their faith and regulative of their conduct which were written for this definite purpose by those whom they believed to be inspired of God. It was this which made them canonical. The spiritual profit found in them corresponded with and confirmed the belief in their heavenly origin. And the public official action which further attested, though it did not initiate, their canonicity, followed in the wake of the popular recognition of their Divine authority. . . . The writings of the prophets, delivered to the people as a declaration of the Divine will, possessed canonical authority from the moment of their appearance. . . . The canon does not derive its authority from the church, whether Jewish or Christian; the office of the church is merely that of a custodian and a witness." So likewise Dr. J. D. Davis (Pres. and Ref. Review, April, 1902, 182).

On the contrary, Dillmann (Jahrb. für deutsche Theol., III, 420) more scientifically claims that "history knows nothing of the individual books having been designed to be sacred from their origin. . . . These books bore indeed in themselves from the first those characteristics on account of which they were subsequently admitted into the sacred collection, but yet always had first to pass through a shorter or longer period of verification, and make trial of the Divine power resident within them upon the hearts of the church before they were outwardly and formally acknowledged by it as Divine books." As a matter of fact, the books of the OT are still on trial, and ever will be. So far as is known, the great majority of the writers of Holy Scripture did not arbitrarily hand over their productions to the church and expect them to be regarded as canon Scripture. Two parties are involved in the making of canonical Scripture—the original authors and the church—both of whom were inspired by the same Spirit. The authors wrote inspired by the Divine Spirit, and the church ever since—Jewish and Christian alike—has been inspired to recognize the authoritative character of their writings. And so it will be to the end of time. "We cannot be certain that anything comes from God unless it bring us personally something evidently Divine" (Briggs, The Study of Holy Scripture, 162).

The Jews early divided the OT writings into three classes: (1) the Tōrah, or Law; (2) the N'bhī'im, or Prophets; and (3) the K'thūbhīm, or Writings, called in Gr the Hagiographa.

5. The Tripartite Division of the OT

The Tōrah included the 5 books of the Pentateuch (Gen, Ex, Lev, Nu, Dt), which were called "the Five-fifths of the Law." The N'bhī'im embraced (a) the four so-called Former Prophets, Josh, Jgs, 1 and 2 S, counted as one book, 1 and 2 K, also counted as one book; and (b) the four so-called Latter Prophets, Isa, Jer, Ezk, and the Twelve Minor Prophets, counted as one book; a total of 8 books. The K'thūbhīm, or Writings, were 11 in all, including Ps, Prov, and Job, the five M'ghillōth or Rolls (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est), Dnl, Ezr-Neh, counted as one book, and 1 and 2 Ch, also counted as one book; in all 24 books, exactly the same as those of the Protestant canon. This was the original count of the Jews as far as we can trace it back. Later certain Jewish authorities appended Ruth to Jgs, and Lam to Jer, and thereby obtained the number 22, which corresponded to the number of letters in the Heb alphabet; but this manner of counting was secondary and fanciful. Still later others divided S, K, Ch, Ezr-Neh and Jer-Lam into two books each respectively and thereby obtained 27, which they fancifully regarded as equivalent to the 22 letters of the Heb alphabet plus 5, the number of letters having a peculiar final form when standing at the end of a word. Jerome states that 22 is the correct reckoning, but he adds, "Some count both Ruth and Lam among the Hagiographa, and so get 24." 4 Esd, which is the oldest (85–96 AD) witness to the number of books in the OT, gives 24.

The answer to the question of how to account for the tripartite division involves the most careful investigation of the whole process by which the canon actually took shape. If the entire canon of the OT were formed, as some allege, by one man, or by one set of men, in a single age, then it is obvious that the books must have been separated into three groups on the basis of some material differences in their contents. If, on the other hand, the process of canonization was gradual and extended over several generations, then the various books were separated from one another probably because one section of the canon was closed before certain other books of similar character were written. At any rate it is difficult to see why K and Ch are not included in the same division, and especially strange that Dnl does not stand among the prophets. To explain this mystery, mediaeval Jews were wont to say that "the Prophets were inspired by the spirit of prophecy, whereas the Writings by the Holy Spirit," implying different degrees of inspiration. But this is a distinction without a difference, the Holy Spirit and the spirit of prophecy are one and the same. Modern Protestants distinguish between the donum propheticum and the munus propheticum, i.e. between the gift and the office of prophecy. They allow that Daniel possessed the gift of prophecy, but they deny that he was Divinely appointed to the office of prophet. But compare Mt 24 15, which speaks of "Daniel the prophet," and on the other hand, Am 7 14, in which Amos resents being considered a prophet. Oehler modifies this explanation, claiming that the threefold division of the canon corresponds to the three stages of development in the religion of Israel, namely, Mosaism, Prophetism, and Hebraism. According to Oehler, the Law was the foundation of the entire canon. From it there were two lines of development, one objective, the Prophets, the other subjective, the Writings. But Oehler's theory does not satisfactorily account for Ezr and Neh and Ch, being in the third division; for in what sense can they be said to be more subjective than Jgs, S, and K? The LXX version (250–150 BC) takes no notice of the tripartite division. The true solution probably is that the process was gradual. When all the witnesses have been examined, we shall probably discover that the Law was canonized first, the Prophets considerably later, and the Writings last of all. And it may further become evident that the two last divisions were collected synchronously, and hence that the tripartite divisions of the canon are due to material differences in their contents as well as to chronology.

6. How Account for the Tripartite Division?

II. Examination of the Witnesses.—Though the OT does not tell us anything about the processes of its own canonization, it does furnish valuable hints as to how the ancient Hebrews preserved their writings. Thus in Ex 40 20 it is stated that the "testimony," by which is meant the two tables of the Law containing the Ten Commandments, was put into the Ark of the Covenant for safe-keeping. In Dt 31 9.24–26, the laws of Dt are said to have been delivered to the sons of Levi, and by them deposited "by the side of the ark . . . that it may be there for a witness against thee." Such language indicates that the new law-book is regarded "as a standard of faith and action" (Driver, Dt, 343). According to 1 K 8 9, when Solomon brought the Ark up from the city of David to the Temple, the two tables were still its only contents, which continued to be carefully preserved. According to 2 K 11 12, when Joash was crowned king, Jehoiada the high priest is said to have given (lit. "put upon") him "the testimony," which doubtless contained "the substance of the fundamental laws of the covenant," and was regarded as "the fundamental charter of the constitution" (cf H. E. Ryle, Canon of the OT, 45). Likewise in Prov 25 1, it is stated that a large number of proverbs were copied out by Hezekiah's men. Now all these, and still other passages which might be summoned, witness to the preservation of certain portions of the OT. But preservation is not synonymous with canonization. A writing might easily be preserved without being made a standard of faith and conduct. Nevertheless the two ideas are closely related; for, when religious writings are sedulously preserved it is but natural to infer that their intrinsic value was regarded as correspondingly precious.

Two other passages of paramount importance remain to be considered. The first is 2 K 22 8 ff., describing the finding of the "Book of the Law," and how Josiah the king on the basis of it instituted a religious reformation and bound the people to obey its precepts. Here is an instance in which the Law, or some portion of it (how much no one can say), is regarded as of normative and authoritative character. The king and his coadjutors recognize at once that it is ancient and that it contains the words of Jeh (2 K 22 13.18.19). Its authority is undisputed. Yet nothing is said of its "canonicity," or that it would "defile the hands"; consequently there is no real ground for speaking of it as "the beginnings of the canon," for in the same historic sense the beginnings of the canon are to be found in Ex 24 7. The other passage of paramount importance is Neh 8 8 f., according to which Ezra is said to have "read in the book, in the law of God, distinctly." Not only did Ezra read the Law; he accompanied it with an interpretation. This seems to imply, almost beyond question, that in Ezra's time (444 BC) the Law, i.e. the Pent, was regarded as canonical Scripture. This is practically all that the OT says about itself, though other passages, such as Zec 7 12 and Dnl 9 2 might be brought forward to show the deep regard which the later prophets had for the writings of their predecessors. The former of these is the locus classicus in the OT, teaching the inspiration of the Prophets; it is the OT || to 2 Tim 3 16.

Chronologically the OT is of course our most ancient witness. It brings us down to 444 BC.

2. The Samaritan Pentateuch The next in order is the Samaritan Pentateuch. About 432 BC, as we know from Neh 13 28 and Jos (Ant. XI, vii, 2–viii, (cir 432 4), Nehemiah expelled from the Jewish colony in Jerus Manasseh, the polygamous grandson of Eliashib the high priest and son-in-law of Sanballat. Manasseh founded the schismatic community of the Samaritans, and instituted on Mt. Gerizim a rival temple-worship to that at Jerus. Of the Samaritans there still survive today some 170 souls; they reside in Shechem and are known as "the smallest religious sect in the world." It is true that Jos, speaking of this event, confuses chronology somewhat, making Nehemiah and Alexander the Great contemporaries, whereas a cent. separated them, but the time element is of little moment. The bearing of the whole matter upon the history of the formation of the canon is this: the Samaritans possess the Pent only; hence it is inferred that at the time of Manasseh's expulsion the Jewish canon included the Pent and the Pent only. Budde (EB col. 659) says: "If alongside of the Law there had been other sacred writings, it would be inexplicable why these last also did not pass into currency with the Samaritans." Such a conclusion, however, is not fully warranted. It is an argument from silence. There are patent reasons on the other hand why the Samaritans should have rejected the Prophets, even though they were already canonized. For the Samaritans would hardly adopt into their canon books that glorified the temple at Jerus. It cannot, accordingly, be inferred with certainty from the fact that the Samaritans accept the Pent only, that therefore the Pent at the time of Manasseh's expulsion was alone canonical, though it may be considered a reasonable presumption.

The LXX version in Gr is the first tr of the OT ever made; indeed the OT is the first book of any note in all lit. to receive the honor of being tr^d into another tongue. This fact in itself is indicative of the esteem in which it was held at the time. The work of tr was inaugurated by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285–247 BC) and probably continued for well-nigh a cent. (cir 250–150 BC).

Aristeas, a distinguished officer of Ptolemy, records how it came about. It appears that Ptolemy was exceedingly fond of books, and set his heart on adding to his famous collection in Alexandria a tr of the Heb Pent. In order to obtain it, so the story goes, the king set free 198,000 Jewish slaves, and sent them with presents to Jerus to ask Eleazar the high priest for their Law and Jewish scholars capable of translating it. Six learned rabbis from each tribe (6×12=72) were sent. They were royally feasted; 70 questions were asked them to test their wisdom, and after 72 days of coöperation and conference they gave the world the OT in the Gr language, which is known as the LXX version. To this fabulous story, Christian tradition adds that the rabbis did the work of translating in 72 (some say 36) separate cells on the island of Pharos, all working independently of each other, and that it was found at the expiration of their seclusion that each had produced a tr exactly word for word alike, hence supernaturally inspired. Justin Martyr of the 2d cent. AD says that he was actually shown by his Alexandrian guide the ruins of these LXX cells. The story is obviously a fable. The kernel of real truth at the bottom of it is probably that Ptolemy Philadelphus about the middle of the 3d cent. BC succeeded in obtaining a tr of the Law. The other books were tr^d subsequently, perhaps for private use. The lack of unity of plan in the books outside the Law indicates that probably many different hands at different times were engaged upon them. There is a subscription, moreover, at the close of the tr of Est which states that Lysimachus, the son of Ptolemy in Jerus, tr^d it. But the whole was apparently completed before Jesus ben Sirach the younger wrote his Prologue to Eccles (cir 132 BC).

Now the LXX version, which was the Bible of Our Lord and His apostles, is supposed to have included originally many of the Apocryphal books. Furthermore, in our present LXX, the canonical and Apocryphal books stand intermingled and in an order which shows that the translators knew nothing of the tripartite division of later Judaism, or if they did they quite ignored it. The order of the books in our English OT is of course derived from the LXX through the Vulg of St. Jerome. The books in the LXX are arranged as follows: Pent, Josh, Jgs, Ruth, 1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, 1 and 2 Esd, Neh, Tob, Jth, Est, Job, Ps, Prov, Eccl, Wisd, Eccles, Hos, Am, Mic, Joel, Ob, Jon, Nah, Hab, Zeph, Hag, Zec, Mal, Isa, Jer, Bar, Lam, Ep. Jer, Ezk, Dnl, 1, 2 and 3 Macc. On the basis of the LXX, Catholics advocate what is known as the "larger" canon of the Jews in Alexandria; Protestants, on the other hand, deny the existence of an independent canon in Alexandria in view of the "smaller" canon of the Jews in Pal. The actual difference between the Catholic and Protestant OTs is a matter of 7 complete books and portions of two others: viz. Tob, Jth, Wisd, Eccles, Bar, 1 and 2 Macc, together with certain additions to Est (10 4–16 24) and to Dnl (3 24–90; Three; Sus ver 13 and Bel ver 14). These Protestants reject as apocryphal because there is no sufficient evidence that they were ever reckoned as canonical by the Jews anywhere. The fact that the present LXX includes them is far from conclusive that the original LXX did, for the following reasons: (1) The design of the LXX was purely literary; Ptolemy and the Alexandrians were interested in building up a library. (2) All the extant MSS of the LXX are of Christian not Jewish origin. Between the actual tr of the LXX (cir 250-150 BC) and the oldest MSS of the LXX extant (cir 350 AD) there is a chasm of fully 500 years, during which it is highly possible that the so-called Apocryphal books crept in. (3) In the various extant MSS of the LXX, the Apocryphal books vary in number and name. For example, the great Vatican MS, which is probably "the truest representative which remains of the Alexandrian Bible," and which comes down to us from the 4th cent. AD, contains no Book of Macc whatever, but does include 1 Esd, which St. Jerome and Catholics generally treat as apocryphal. On the other hand, the Alexandrian MS, another of the great MSS of the LXX, dating from the 5th cent. AD, contains not only the extra-canonical book of 1 Esd, but 3 and 4 Macc, and in the NT the 1st and 2d Epistles of Clement, none of which, however, is considered canonical by Rome. Likewise the great Sinaitic MS, hardly less important than the Vatican as a witness to the LXX and like it dating from the 4th cent. AD, omits Bar (which Catholics consider canonical), but includes 4 Macc, and in the NT the Epistle of Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas; all of which are excluded from the canon by Catholics. In other MSS, 3 Macc, 3 Esd and Pr Man are occasionally included. The problem as to how many books the original LXX version actually included is a very complicated one. The probability is that it included no one of these variants. (4) Still another reason for thinking that there never existed in Egypt a separate or "larger" canon is the fact that during the 2d cent. AD, the Alexandrian Jews adopted Aquila's Gr version of the OT in lieu of their own, and it is known that Aquila's text excluded all Apocryphal books. Add to all this the fact that Philo, who lived in Alexandria from cir 20 BC till 50 AD, never quotes from one of these Apocryphal books though he often does from the canonical, and that Origen, who also resided in Alexandria (cir 200 AD), never set his imprimatur upon them, and it becomes reasonably convincing that there was no "larger" canon in Alexandria. The value of the evidence derived from the LXX, accordingly, is largely negative. It only indicates that when the tr of the OT into Gr was made in Alexandria, the process of canonization was still incomplete. For had it been actually complete, it is reasonable to suppose that the work of tr would have proceeded according to some well-defined plan, and would have been executed with greater accuracy. As it is, the translators seem to have taken all sorts of liberties with the text, adding to the books of Est and Dnl and omitting fully one-eighth of the text of Jer. Such work also indicates that they were not executing a public or ecclesiastical trust, but rather a private enterprise. Our necessary conclusion, therefore, is that the work of canonization was probably going on in Pal while the work of tr was proceeding in Alexandria.

Our next witness is Jesus ben Sirach who (cir 170 BC) wrote a formidable work entitled Ecclus, otherwise known as Sir. The author lived in Jerus and wrote in Heb. His book is a book of Wisdom resembling Prov; some of his precepts approach the high level of the Gospel. In many respects Ecclus is the most important of all the Apocryphal books; theologically it is the chief monument of primitive Sadduceeism. In chs 44-50, the author sings a "hymn to the Fathers," eulogizing the mighty heroes of Israel from Enoch to Nehemiah, in fact from Adam to Simon, including the most famous men described in the OT, and making explicit mention of the Twelve Prophets. These facts would indicate that the whole or, at least, the most of the OT was known to him, and that already in his day (180 BC) the so-called Minor Prophets were regarded as a special group of writings by themselves. What the value of Ecclus is as a witness, however, depends upon the interpretation one places on 24 33, which reads: "I will yet pour out doctrine as prophecy and leave it unto generations of ages." From this it is inferred by some that he feels himself inspired and capable of adding to the canon already in existence, and that, though he knew the full prophetic canon, he did not draw any very definite line of demarcation between his own work and the inspired writings of the prophets. For example, he passes over from the patriarchs and prophets of Israel to Simon the son of Onias, who was probably the high priest in his own time, making no distinction between them. But this may have been partly due to personal conceit; cf 39 12, "Yet more will I utter, which I have thought upon; and I am filled as the moon at the full." Yet, perhaps, in his day still only the Law and the Prophets were actually canonized, but alongside of these a body of lit. was being gathered and gradually augmented of a nature not foreign to his own writings, and therefore not clearly marked off from literary compositions like his own. Yet to Sirach the Law is everything. He identifies it with the highest wisdom; indeed, all wisdom in his judgment is derived from a study of the Law (cf 19 20-24; 15 1-18; 24 23; 2 16; 39 1).

The Prologue or Preface to Ecclus is our next witness to the formation of the canon. It was written by the grandson of Jesus ben Sirach, who bore his grandfather's name (cir 132 BC). Jesus ben Sirach the younger tr^d in Egypt his grandfather's proverbs into Gr, and in doing so added a Preface or Prologue of his own. In this Prologue, he thrice refers to the tripartite division of the OT. In fact the Prologue to Ecclus is the oldest witness we have to the threefold division of the OT books. He says: "Whereas many and great things have been delivered unto us by the Law and the Prophets, and by others, . . . my grandfather, Jesus, when he had given himself to the reading of the Law, and the Prophets, and other books of our Fathers, and had gotten therein good judgment (RV "having gained great familiarity therein"), was drawn on also himself to write something pertaining to learning and wisdom. . . . For the same things uttered in Heb and tr^d into another tongue, have not the same force in them; and not only these things, but the Law itself, and the Prophets, and the rest of the books, have no small difference, when they are spoken in their own language." These are explicit and definite allusions to the threefold division of the OT writings, yet only the titles of the first and second divisions are the technical names usually employed; the third is especially vague because of his use of the terms, "the other books of the Fathers," and "the rest of the books." However, he evidently refers to writings with religious contents; and, by "the other books of the Fathers," he can hardly be supposed to have meant an indefinite number, though he has not told us which they were or what was their number. From his further statement that his grandfather, having immersed himself in the Law and the Prophets, and other books of the Fathers, felt drawn on also himself to write something for the profit of others, it may be inferred that in his time there was as yet no definite gulf fixed between canonical writings and those of other men, and that the sifting process was still going on (cf W. R. Smith, *OTJC*³, 178-79).

1 Macc was written originally in Heb; 2 Macc in Gr, somewhere between 125 and 70 BC. The author of 1 Macc is acquainted, on the one hand, with the deeds of John Hyrcanus (135 to 105 BC), and knows nothing on the other of the conquest of Pal by Pompey (63 BC). The value of this book as a witness to the history of the canon centers about his allusions to Daniel and the Psalms. In 1 Macc 1 54, he tells how Antiochus Epiphanes "set up the abomination of desolation" upon the altar at Jerus, referring most likely to Dnl 9 24-27; and in 1 Macc 2 59.60 he speaks of Ananias, Azarias and Misael, who by believing were saved from the fiery furnace, and of Daniel, who was delivered from the mouths of the lions (cf Dnl 1 7; 3 26; 6 23). From these allusions, it would seem as though the Book of Dnl was at that time regarded as normative or canonical. This is confirmed by 1 Macc 7 16.17, which introduces a quotation from Ps 79 2, with the solemn formula, "According to the words which he wrote"; which would suggest that the Ps also were already canonical.

2 Macc, written cir 124 BC, also contains a couple of passages of considerable importance to us in this investigation. Both, however, are found in a spurious letter purporting to have been sent by the inhabitants of Judaea to their fellow-countrymen residing in Egypt. The first passage (2 Macc 2 13) tells how Nehemiah, "founding a library, gathered together the acts of the kings, and the prophets, and of David, and the epistles of the kings concerning holy gifts." These words throw no special light upon the formation of the canon, but they do connect with the name of Nehemiah the preservation of public documents and historical records of national interest, and how he, as a lover of books, founded a library. This is in perfect agreement with what we know of Nehemiah's character, for he compiled the genealogy of Neh 7; besides, collection precedes selection. The other passage (2 Macc 2 14) reads: "In like manner also Judas gathered together all things that were lost by reason of the war we had, and they remain with us." Though found in a letter, supposed to be spurious, there is every reason for believing this statement to be true. For when Antiochus, the arch enemy of the nation, sought to stamp out the religion of the Jews by destroying their books (cf 1 Macc 1 56.57), what would have been more natural for a true patriot like Judas than to attempt to re-collect their sacred writings? "This statement, therefore," as Wildeboer says, "may well be worthy of credence" (The Origin of the Canon of the OT, 40). Though it yields nothing definite as to the number of the books recovered, it is obvious that the books collected were the most precious documents which the nation possessed. They were doubtless religious, as was the age.

Philo is our next witness. He flourished in Alexandria between cir 20 BC and 50 AD, leaving behind him a voluminous literature. Unfortunately, he does not yield us much

7. Philo (cir 20 BC-50 AD) of positive value for our present purpose. His evidence is largely negative. True, he nowhere mentions the tripartite division of the OT, which is known to have existed in his day. Nor does he quote from Ezk, the Five Megilloth (Cant, Ruth, Lam, Eccl, Est), Dnl, Ch, or from the Twelve Minor Prophets, except Hos, Jon, and Zec. Moreover he held a loose view of inspiration. According to Philo, inspiration was by no means confined to the sacred Scriptures; all truly wise and virtuous men are inspired and capable of expressing the hidden things of God. But as Dr. Green (Canon, 130) rightfully contends, "Philo's loose views of inspiration cannot be declared irreconcilable with the acceptance of a fixed canon, unless it is first shown that he places others whom he thinks inspired on a level with the writers of Scripture. This he never does." Philo's reverence for the "Law" was unbounded. In this respect he is the type of other Alexandrians. He quotes predominantly from the Law. Moses was to him the source of all wisdom, even the wisdom of the Gentiles. Concerning the laws of Moses, he is reported by Eusebius as saying: "They have not changed so much as a single word in them. They would rather die a thousand deaths than detract anything from these laws and statutes." On the other hand, Philo never quotes any of the Apocryphal books. Hence it may safely be assumed that his canon was essentially ours.

The evidence furnished by the NT is of the highest importance. When summed up, it gives the unmistakable impression that

8. The NT when the NT was written (cir 50-100 AD) there was a definite and fixed canon of OT Scripture, to which authoritative appeal could be made.

And first, too much importance can scarcely be attached to the names or titles ascribed to the OT writings by the authors of the NT: thus, "the scripture" (Jn 10 35; 19 36; 2 Pet 1 20), "the scriptures" (Mt 22 29; Acts 18 24), "holy scriptures" (Rom 1 2), "sacred writings" (2 Tim 3 15), "the law" (Jn 10 34; 12 34; 15 25; 1 Cor 14 21), "law and prophets" (Mt 5 17; 7 12; 22 40; Lk 16 16; 24 44; Acts 13 15; 28 23). Such names or titles, though they do not define the limits of the canon, certainly assume the existence of a complete and sacred collection of Jewish writings which are already marked off from all other lit. as separate and fixed. One passage (Jn 10 35) in which the term "scripture," is employed seems to refer to the OT canon as a whole; "and the scripture cannot be broken." In like manner the expression "law and prophets" is often used in a generic sense, referring to much more than merely the 1st and 2d divisions of the OT; it seems rather to refer to the old dispensation as a whole; but the term "the law" is the most general of all. It is frequently applied to the entire OT, and apparently held in Christ's time among the Jews a place akin to that which the term "the Bible" does with us. For example, in Jn 10 34; 12 34; 15 25, texts from the prophets or even from the Ps are quoted as part of "the Law"; in 1 Cor 14 21 also, Paul speaks of Isa 28 11 as a part of "the law." These names and titles, accordingly, are exceedingly important; they are never applied by NT writers to the Apocrypha.

One passage (Lk 24 44) furnishes clear evidence of the threefold division of the canon. But here again, as in the Prologue of Sir, there is great uncertainty as to the limits of the 3d division. Instead of saying "the law, the prophets and the writings," Luke says, "the law, the prophets and the psalms." But it is obvious enough why the Pss should have been adduced by Jesus in support of His resurrection. It is because they especially testify of Christ; they were, therefore, the most important part of the 3d division for His immediate purpose, and it may be that they are meant to stand a potiori for the whole of the 3d division (cf Budde, EB, col. 669).

Another passage (Mt 23 35; cf Lk 11 51) seems to point to the final order and arrangement of the books in the OT canon. It reads: "That upon you may come all the righteous blood shed on the earth, from the blood of Abel the righteous unto the blood of Zachariah son of Barachiah, whom ye slew between the sanctuary and the altar." Now, in order to grasp the bearing of this ver upon the matter in hand, it must be remembered that in the modern arrangement of the OT books in Heb, Ch stands last; and that the murder of Zachariah is the last recorded instance in this arrangement, being found in 2 Ch 24 20.21. But this murder took place under Joash king of Judah, in the 9th cent. BC. There is another which is chronologically later, namely, that of Uriah son of Shemaiah who was murdered in Jehoiakim's reign in the 7th cent. BC (Jer 26 23). Accordingly, the argument is this, unless Ch already stood last in Christ's OT, why did He not say, "from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Uriah"? He would then have been speaking chronologically and would have included all the martyrs whose martyrdom is recorded in the OT. But He rather says, "from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zachariah," as though He were including the whole range of OT Scripture, just as we would say "from Genesis to Malachi." Hence it is inferred, with some degree of justification also, that Ch stood in Christ's time, as it does today in the Heb Bible of the Massorets, the last book of an already closed canon. Of course, in answer to this, there is the possible objection that in those early days the Scriptures were still written by the Jews on separate rolls.

Another ground for thinking that the OT canon was closed before the NT was written is the numerous citations made in the NT from the OT. Every book is quoted except Est, Eccl, Cant, Ezr, Neh, Ob, Nah, and Zeph. But these exceptions are not serious. The Twelve Minor Prophets were always treated by the Jews en bloc as one canonical work; hence if one of the twelve were quoted all were recognized. And the fact that 2 Ch 24 20.21 is quoted in Mt 23 35 and Lk 11 51 presupposes also the canonicity of Ezr-Neh, as originally these books were one with Ch, though they may possibly have already been divided in Jesus' day. As for Est, Eccl, and Cant, it is easy to see why they are not quoted: they probably failed to furnish NT writers material for quotation. The NT writers simply had no occasion to make citations from them. What is much more noteworthy, they never quote from the Apocryphal books, though they show an acquaintance with them. Professor Gigot, one of the greatest of Roman Catholic authorities, frankly admits this. In his General Introduction to the Study of the Scriptures, 43, he says: "They never quote them explicitly, it is true, but time and again they borrow expressions and ideas from them." As a matter of fact, NT writers felt free to quote from any source; for example, Paul on Mars' Hill cites to the learned Athenians an astronomical work of the Stoic Aratus of Cilicia, or perhaps from a Hymn to Jupiter by Cleanthes of Lycia, when he says, "For we are also his offspring" (Acts 17 28). And Jude vs 14.15 almost undeniably quotes from En (1 9; 60 8)—a work which is not recognized as canonical by any except the church of Abyssinia. But in any case, the mere quoting of a book does not canonize it; nor, on the other hand, does failure to quote a book exclude it. Quotation does not necessarily imply sanction; no more than reference to contemporary lit. is incompatible with strict views of the canon. Everything depends upon the manner in which the quotation is made. In no case is an Apocryphal book cited by NT authors as "Scripture," or as the work of the Holy Spirit. And the force of this statement is not weakened by the fact that the authors of NT writings cited the LXX instead of the original Heb; for, "they are responsible only for the inherent truthfulness of each passage in the form which they actually adopt" (Green, Canon, 145). As a witness, therefore, the NT is of paramount importance. For, though it nowhere tells us the exact number of books contained in the OT canon, it gives abundant evidence of the existence already in the 1st cent. AD of a definite and fixed canon.

4 Esd in Lat (2 Esd in Eng.) is a Jewish apocalypse which was written originally in Greek toward the close of the 1st cent. (cir 81-96

9. 4 Esd AD). The passage of special interest (cir 81-96 to us is 14 19-48 which relates in AD) most fabulous style how Ezra is given spiritual illumination to reproduce the Law which had been burned, and how, at the Divine command, he secludes himself for a period of 40 days, after which he betakes himself with five skilled scribes to the open country. There, a cup of water is offered him; he drinks, and then dictates to his five amanuenses continuously for 40 days and nights, producing 94 books of which 70 are kept secret and 24 published. The section of supreme importance reads as follows: "And it came to pass, when the forty days were fulfilled, that the Most High spake, saying, 'The first that thou hast written, publish openly, that the worthy may read it; but keep the seventy last, that thou mayest deliver them only to such as be wise among the people; for in them is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom, and the stream of knowledge.' And I did so" (4 Esd 14 45-48). The story is obviously pure fiction. No wonder that a new version of it arose in the 16th cent., according to which the canon was completed, not by Ezra alone, but by a company of men known as the Great Synagogue. From the legend of 4 Esd it is commonly inferred that the 24 books which remain after subtracting 70 from 94 are the canonical books of the OT. If so, then this legend is the first witness we have to the number of books contained in the OT canon. This number corresponds exactly with the usual number of sacred books according to Jewish count, as we saw in § 5 above. The legend, accordingly, is not without value. Even as legend it witnesses to a tradition which existed as early as the 1st Christian cent., to the effect that the Jews possessed 24 specially sacred books. It also points to Ezra as the chief factor in the making of Scripture and intimates that the OT canon has long since been virtually closed.

Flavius Josephus, the celebrated Jewish historian, was born 37 AD. He was a priest and a Pharisee. About 100 AD, he wrote

10. Jos' "Contra Apionem" (cir 100 AD) a controversial treatise, known as Contra Apionem, in defence of the Jews against their assailants, of whom Apion is taken as a leading representative. Now Apion was a famous grammarian, who in his life had been hostile to the Jews. He had died some 50 years before Contra Apionem was written. Jos wrote in Gr to Greeks. The important passage in his treatise (I, 8) reads as follows: "For it is not the case with us to have vast numbers of books disagreeing and conflicting with one another. We have but twenty-two, containing the history of all time, books that are justly believed in. And of these, five are the books of Moses, which comprise the laws and the earliest traditions from the creation of mankind down to the time of his (Moses') death. This period falls short but by a little of three thousand years. From the death of Moses to the reign of Artaxerxes, king of Persia, the successor of Xerxes, the prophets who succeeded Moses wrote the history of the events that occurred in their own time; in thirteen books. The remaining four documents comprise hymns to God and practical precepts to men. From the days of Artaxerxes to our own time every event has indeed been recorded. But these recent records have not been deemed worthy of equal credit with those which preceded them, because the exact succession of the prophets ceased. But what faith we have placed in our own writings is evident by our conduct; for though so great an interval of time (i.e. since they were written) has now passed, not a soul has ventured either to add, or to remove, or to alter a syllable. But it is instinctive in all Jews at once from their very birth to regard them as commands of God, and to abide by them, and, if need be, willingly to die for them."

The value of this remarkable passage for our study is obviously very great. In the first place Jos fixes the number of Jewish writings which are recognized as sacred at 22, joining probably Ruth to Jgs and Lam to Jer. He also classifies them according to a threefold division, which is quite peculiar to himself: 5 of Moses, 13 of the prophets, and 4 hymns and maxims for human life. The 5 of Moses were of course the Pent; the 13 of the prophets probably included the 8 regular N'bh'im plus Dnl, Job, Ch, Ezr-Neh, and Est; the "4 hymns and maxims" would most naturally consist of Ps, Prov, Cant and Eccl. There is little doubt that his 22 books are those of our present Heb canon.

Another very remarkable fact about Jos' statement is the standard he gives of canonicity, namely, antiquity; because, as he says, since Artaxerxes' age the succession of prophets had ceased. It was the uniform tradition of Jos' time that prophetic inspiration had ceased with Malachi (cir 445-432 BC). Hence, according to him, the canon was closed in the reign of Artaxerxes (465-425 BC). He does not pause to give any account of the closing of the canon; he simply assumes it, treating it as unnecessary. Prophecy had ceased, and the canon was accordingly closed; the fact did not require to be officially proclaimed. As remarked above, the value of Jos as a witness is very great. But just here an important question arises: How literally must we interpret his language? Was the OT canon actually closed before 425 BC? Were not there books and parts of books composed and added to the canon subsequent to his reign? Dr. Green seems to take Jos literally (Canon, 40, 78). But Jos is not always reliable in his chronology. For example, in his Antiquities (XI, vi, 13) he dates the story of Esther as occurring in the reign of Artaxerxes I (whereas it belongs to Xerxes' reign), while in the same work (XI, v, 1) he puts Ezra and Nehemiah under Xerxes (whereas they belong to the time of Artaxerxes). On the whole, it seems safer on internal grounds to regard Jos' statements concerning the antiquity of the Jewish canon as the language not of a careful historian, but of a partisan in debate. Instead of expressing absolute fact in this case, he was reflecting the popular belief of his age. Reduced to its lowest terms, the element of real truth in what he says was simply this, that he voiced a tradition which was at that time universal and undisputed; one, however, which had required a long period, perhaps hundreds of years, to develop. Hence we conclude that the complete OT canon, numbering 22 books, was no new thing 100 AD.

According to the traditions preserved in the Mish, two councils of Jewish rabbis were held (90 and 118 AD respectively) at Jabne, or Jamnia, not far S. of Joppa, on the Mediterranean coast, at which the books of the OT, notably Eccl and Cant, were discussed and their canonicity ratified. Rabbi Gamaliel II probably presided. Rabbi Akiba was the chief spirit of the council. What was actually determined by these synods has not been preserved to us accurately, but by many authorities it is thought that the great controversy which had been going on for over a cent. between the rival Jewish schools of Hillel and Shammai was now brought to a close, and that the canon was formally restricted to our 39 books. Perhaps it is within reason to say that at Jamnia the limits of the Heb canon were officially and finally determined by Jewish authority. Not that official sanction created public opinion, however, but rather confirmed it.

The Talm consists of two parts: (1) The Mish (compiled cir 200 AD), a collection of systematized tradition; and (2) the Gemara, G'mārā

(completed about 500 AD), a "vast and desultory commentary on the Mish." A Baraita', or unauthorized gloss, known as the Bābhā' Bathrā' 14b, a Talmudic tractate, relates the "order" of the various books of the OT and who "wrote" or edited them. But it says nothing of the formation of the canon. To write is not the same as to canonize; though to the later Jews the two ideas were closely akin. As a witness, therefore, this tractate is of little value, except that it confirms the tripartite division and is a good specimen of rabbinic speculation. For the full text of the passage, see Ryle, Canon of the OT, 273 ff.

During the 2d cent. AD, doubts arose in Jewish minds concerning four books, Prov, Cant, Eccl, and Est. In a certain Talmudic tractate it is related that an attempt was made to withdraw (gānaz, "conceal," "hide") the Book of Prov on account of contradictions which were found in it (cf 26 4.5), but on deeper investigation it was not withdrawn. In another section of the Talmud, Rabbi Akiba is represented as saying concerning Cant: "God forbid that any man of Israel should deny that the Song of Songs defileth the hands, for the whole world is not equal to the day in which the Song of Songs was given to Israel. For all Scriptures are holy, but the Song of Songs is the holiest of the holy." Such extravagant language inclines one to feel that real doubt must have existed in the minds of some concerning the book. But the protestations were much stronger against Eccl. In one tractate it is stated: "The wise men desired to hide it because its language was often self-contradictory (cf Eccl 7 3 and 2 2; 4 2 and 9 4), but they did not hide it because the beginning and the end of it consist of words from the Torah (cf 1 3; 12 13.14)." Likewise Est was vigorously disputed by both the Jerus and Bab Gemaras, because the name of God was not found in it; but a Rabbi Simeon ben Lakkish (cir 300 AD) defended its canonicity, putting Esther on an equality with the Law and above the Prophets and the other Writings. Other books, for example, Ezekiel and Jonah, were discussed in post-Talmudic writings, but no serious objections were ever raised by the Jews against either. Jonah was really never doubted till the 12th cent. AD. In the case of no one of these disputed books were there serious doubts; nor did scholastic controversies affect public opinion.

This brings us to the end of our examination of the witnesses. In our survey we have discovered (1) that the OT says nothing about its canonization, but does emphasize the manner in which the Law was preserved and recognized as authoritative;

(2) that to conclude that the Jews possessed the Law only, when the renegade Manasseh was expelled by Nehemiah from Jerus, because the Samaritans admit of the Law alone

14. Summary and Conclusion as the true canon, is unwarrantable; (3) that the LXX version as we know it from the Christian MSS extant is by no means a sufficient proof that the Alexandrians possessed a "larger" canon which included the Apoc; (4) that Jesus ben Sirach is a witness to the fact that the Prophets in his day (180 BC) were not yet acknowledged as canonical; (5) that his grandson in his Prologue is the first witness to the customary tripartite division of OT writings, but does not speak of the 3d division as though it were already closed; (6) that the Books of Macc seem to indicate that the Ps and Dnl are already included in the canon of the Jews; (7) that Philo's testimony is negative, in that he witnesses against the Apocryphal books as an integral part of Holy Scripture; (8) that the NT is the most explicit witness of the series, because of the names and titles it ascribes to the OT books which it quotes; (9) that 4 Esd is the first witness to the number of books in the OT canon—24; (10) that Jos also fixes the number of books, but in arguing for the antiquity of the canon speaks as an advocate, voicing popular tradition, rather than as a scientific historian; (11) that the Councils of Jamnia may, with some ground, be considered the official occasion on which the Jews pronounced upon the limits of their canon; but that (12) doubts existed in the 2d cent. concerning certain books; which books, however, were not seriously questioned.

From all this we conclude, that the Law was canonized, or as we would better say, was recognized as authoritative, first, cir 444 BC; that the Prophets were set on an even footing with the Law considerably later, cir 200 BC; and that the Writings received authoritative sanction still later, cir 100 BC. There probably never were three separate canons, but there were three separate classes of writings, which between 450 and 100 BC doubtless stood on different bases, and only gradually became authoritative. There is, therefore, ground for thinking, as suggested above (§ 6), that the tripartite division of the OT canon is due to material differences in the contents as well as to chronology.

III. The Canon in the Christian Church.—In making the transition from the Jewish to the

1. In the Eastern or Oriental Church Christian church, we find the same canon cherished by all. Christians of all sects have always been disposed to accept without question the canon of the Jews. For cents. all branches of the Christian church were practically agreed on the limits set by the Jews, but eventually the western church became divided, some alleging that Christ sanctioned the "larger" canon of Alexandria, including the Apocrypha, while others adhered, as the Jews have always done, to the canon of the Jews in Pal. Taking the eastern or oriental church first, the evidence they furnish is as follows: The Pesh, or Syr version, dating from cir 150 AD, omits Ch; Justin Martyr (164 AD) held to a canon identical with that of the Jews; the Canon of Melito, bishop of Sardis, who (cir 170 AD) made a journey to Pal in order carefully to investigate the matter, omits Est. His list, which is the first Christian list we have, has been preserved to us by Eusebius in his Eccl. Hist., IV, 26; Origen (d. 254 AD), who was educated in Alexandria, and was one of the most learned of the Gr Fathers, also set himself the task of knowing the "Heb verity" of the OT text, and gives us a list (also preserved to us by Eusebius, Eccl. Hist., VI, 5) in which he reckons the number of books as 22 (thus agreeing with Jos). Inadvertently he omits the Twelve Minor Prophets, but this is manifestly an oversight on the part of either a scribe or of Eusebius, as he states the number of books is 22 and then names but 21. The so-called Canon of Laodicea (cir 363 AD) included the canonical books only, rejecting the Apocrypha. Athanasius (d. 365 AD) gives a list in which Est is classed as among the non-canonical books, but he elsewhere admits that "Est is considered canonical by the Hebrews." However, he included Bar and the Epistle of Jeremiah with Jeremiah. Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium (cir 380 AD), speaks of Est as received by some only. Cyril, bishop of Jerus (d. 386 AD), gives a list corresponding with the Heb canon, except that he includes Bar and the Epistle of Jeremiah. Gregory of Nazianzus in Cappadocia (d. 390 AD) omits Est. But Anastasius, patriarch of Antioch (560 AD), and Leontius of Byzantium (580 AD) both held to the strict Jewish canon of 22 books. The Nestorians generally doubted Est. This was due doubtless to the influence of Theodore of Mopsuestia (cir 390–457 AD) who disputed the authority of Ch, Ezr, Neh, Est and Job. The oriental churches as a whole, however, never canonized the Apocrypha.

Between 100 and 400 AD, the NT writings became canonical, occupying in the Christian church a place of authority and sacredness equal to those of the OT. The tendency of the period was to receive everything which had been traditionally read in the churches. But the transference of this principle to the OT writings produced great confusion. Usage and theory were often in conflict. A church Father might declare that the Apocryphal books were uninspired and yet quote them as "Scripture," and even introduce them with the accepted formula, "As the Holy Ghost saith." Theologically they held to a strict canon, homiletically they used a larger one. But even usage was not uniform. 3 and 4 Esd and the Book of En are sometimes quoted as "Holy Writ," yet the western church never received these books as canonical. The criterion of usage, therefore, is too broad. The theory of the Fathers was gradually forgotten, and the prevalent use of the LXX and other versions led to the obliteration of the distinction between the undisputed books of the Heb canon and the most popular Apocryphal books; and being often publicly read in the churches they finally received a quasi-canonization.

Tertullian of Carthage (cir 150–230 AD) is the first of the Lat Fathers whose writings have been preserved. He gives the number of OT books as 24, the same as in the Talm. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers in France (350–368 AD), gives a catalogue in which he speaks of "Jeremiah and his epistle," yet his list numbers only 22. Rufinus of Aquileia in Italy (d. 410 AD) likewise gives a complete list of 22 books. Jerome also, the learned monk of Bethlehem (d. 420 AD), gives the number of canonical books as 22, corresponding to the 22 letters of the Heb alphabet, and explains that the five double books (1 and 2 S, 1 and 2 K, 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr-Neh, Jer-Lam) correspond to the five final letters of the Heb alphabet. In his famous Prologus Galeatus or "Helm'd Preface" to the books of S and K, he declares himself for the strict canon of the Jews; rejecting the authority of the deutero-canonical books in the most outspoken manner, even distinguishing carefully the apocryphal additions to Est and to Dnl. As the celebrated Catholic writer, Dr. Gigot, very frankly allows, "Time and again this illustrious doctor [Jerome] of the Lat church rejects the authority of the deutero-canonical books in the most explicit manner" (General Intro, 56).

Contemporaneous with Jerome in Bethlehem lived Augustine in North Africa (353–430 AD). He was the bishop of Hippo; renowned as thinker, theologian and saint. In the three great Councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397 and 419 AD), of which he was the leading spirit, he closed, as it were, the great debate of the previous generations on the subject of how large shall be the Bible. In his essay on Christian Doctrine, he catalogues the books of Scripture, which had been transmitted by the Fathers for public reading in the church, giving their number as 44, with which he says "the authority of the OT is ended." These probably correspond with the present canon of Catholics. But it is not to be supposed that Augustine made no distinction between the proto- and deuterocanonical books. On the contrary, he limited the term "canonical" in its strict sense to the books which are inspired and received by the Jews, and denied that in the support of doctrine the books of Wisd and Ecclus were of unquestioned authority, though long custom had entitled them to respect. And when a passage from 2 Macc was urged by his opponents in defence of suicide, he rejected their proof by showing that the book was not received into the Heb canon to which Christ was witness. At the third Council of Carthage (397 AD), however, a decree was ratified, most probably with his approval, which in effect placed all the canonical and deuterocanonical books on the same level, and in the course of time they actually became considered by some as of equal authority (see DEUTEROCANONICAL BOOKS). A few years later, another council at Carthage (419 AD) took the additional step of voting that their own decision concerning the canon should be confirmed by Boniface, the bishop of Rome; accordingly, thereafter, the question of how large the Bible should be became a matter to be settled by authority rather than by criticism.

From the 4th to the 16th cent. AD the process of gradually widening the limits of the canon continued. Pope Gelasius (492–496 AD) issued a decretal or list in which he included the OT apocrypha. Yet even after this official act of the papacy the sentiment in the western church was divided. Some followed the strict canon of Jerome, while others favored the larger canon of Augustine, without noting his cautions and the distinctions he made between inspired and uninspired writings. Cassiodorus (556 AD) and Isidore of Seville (636 AD) place the lists of Jerome and Augustine side by side without deciding between them. Two bishops of North Africa, Primasius and Junilius (cir 550 AD) reckon 24 books as strictly canonical and explicitly state that the others are not of the same grade. Popular usage, however, was indiscriminate. Outside the Jews there was no sound Heb tradition. Accordingly, at the Council of Florence (1442 AD), "Eugenius IV, with the approval of the Fathers of that assembly, declared all the books found in the Lat Bibles then in use to be inspired by the same Holy Spirit, without distinguishing them into two classes or categories" (cf Gigot, General Intro, 71). Though this bull of Eugenius IV did not deal with the canonicity of the Apocryphal books, it did proclaim their inspiration. Nevertheless, down to the Council of Trent (1546 AD), the Apocryphal books possessed only inferior authority; and when men spoke of canonical Scripture in the strict sense, these were not included.

Luther, the great Saxon Reformer of the 16th cent., marks an epoch in the history of the Christian OT canon. In translating the Scriptures into German, he gave the deuterocanonical books an intermediate position between the OT and the NT. The Lutheran church, also, while it does not expressly define the limits of the canon, yet places the Apocryphal writings by themselves as distinct and separate from Holy Scripture. This indeed was the attitude of all the early Reformers. In the Zürich Bible of 1529, as in the Genevan version in English of 1560, the Apocryphal books were placed apart with special headings by themselves. Thus the early Reformers did not entirely reject the Apocryphal writings, for it was not an easy task to do so in view of the usage and traditions of centuries.

Rome had vacillated long enough. She realized that something must be done. The Reformers had sided with those who stood by Jerome. She therefore resolved to settle the matter in an ecclesiastical and dogmatic manner. Accordingly the Council of Trent decreed at their fourth sitting (April 8, 1546), that the Apocryphal books were equal in authority and canonical value to the other books of sacred Scripture; and to make this decree effective they added: "If, however, anyone receive not as sacred and canonical the said books entire with all their facts, and as they have been used to be read in the Catholic church, and as they are contained in the Old Lat Vulg ed . . . let him be anathema." The decree was the logical outcome of the ever-accumulating snowball tendency in the western church. The historical effect of it upon the church is obvious. It closed forever the field of Bib. study against all free research. Naturally, therefore, the Vatican Council of 1870 not only reiterated the decree but found it easy to take still another step and canonize tradition.

Repeated endeavors were made during the 16th and 17th cents. to have the Apocryphal books removed from the Scriptures. The Synod of Dort (1618–19), Gomarus, Deodatus and others, sought to accomplish it, but failed. The only success achieved was in getting them separated from the truly canonical writings and grouped by themselves, as in the Gallican Confession of 1559, the Anglican Confession of 1562, and the Second Helvetic Confession of 1566. The Puritan Confession went farther, and declared that they were of a purely secular character. The various continental and Eng. versions of the Bible then being made likewise placed them by themselves, apart from the acknowledged books, as a kind of appendix. For example, the Zürich Bible of 1529, the French Bible of 1535, Coverdale's English tr of 1536, Matthew's of 1537, the second ed of the Great Bible, 1540, the Bishops' of 1568, and the AV of 1611. The first Eng. version to omit them altogether was an ed of King James's Version published in 1629; but the custom of printing them by themselves, between the OT and the NT, continued until 1825, when the Edinburgh Committee of the British and Foreign Bible Society protested that the Society should no longer translate these Apocryphal writings and send them to the heathen. The Society finally yielded and decided to exclude them (May 3, 1827). Since then, Protestants in Great Britain and America have given up the practice of publishing the Apoc as a part of sacred Scripture. In Europe, also, since 1850, the tendency has been in the same direction. The Church of England, however, and the American Episcopal church, do not wholly exclude them; certain "readings" being selected from Wisd, Ecclus and Bar, and read on week days between October 27 and November 17. Yet, when the ERV appeared in 1885, though it was a special product of the Church of England, there was not so much as a reference to the Apocryphal writings. The Irish church likewise removed them; and the ARV ignores them altogether.

LITERATURE

I. Two Preliminary Considerations.—The canon is the collection of 27 books which the church (generally) receives as its NT Scriptures. The history of the canon is the history of the process by which these books were brought together and their value as sacred Scriptures officially recognized. That process was gradual, furthered by definite needs, and, though unquestionably continuous, is in its earlier stages difficult to trace. It is always well in turning to the study of it to have in mind two considerations which bear upon the earliest phases of the whole movement. These are:

(1) The early Christians had in their hands what was a Bible to them, viz. the OT Scriptures.

These were used to a surprising extent in Christian instruction. For a whole cent. after the death of Jesus this was the case. These Scriptures were read in the churches, and there could be at first no idea of placing beside them new books which could for a moment rank with them in honor and authority. It has been once and again discussed whether Christianity from the first was a "book-religion." The decision of the matter depends upon what is referred to by the word "book." Christianity certainly did have from the very beginning a book which it revered—the OT—but years passed before it had even the beginnings of a book of its own. What has been called "the wealth of living canonical material," namely, prophets and teachers, made written words of subordinate value. In this very teaching, however, with its oral traditions lay the beginnings of that movement which was ultimately to issue in a canon of writings. (2) When the actual work of writing began no one who sent forth an epistle or framed a gospel had before him the definite purpose of contributing toward the formation of what we call "the Bible." All the NT writers looked for "the end" as near. Their words, therefore, were to meet definite needs in the lives of those with whom they were associated. They had no thought of creating a new sacred lit. And yet these incidental occasional writings have come to be our choicest Scripture. The circumstances and influences which brought about this result are here briefly set forth.

II. Three Stages of the Process.—For convenience of arrangement and definiteness of impression the whole process may be marked off in three stages: (1) that from the time of the apostles until about 170 AD; (2) that of the closing years of the 2d cent. and the opening of the 3d (170-220 AD); (3) that of the 3d and 4th cents. In the first we seek for the evidences of the growth in appreciation of the peculiar value of the NT writings; in the second we discover the clear, full recognition of a large part of these writings as sacred and authoritative; in the third the acceptance of the complete canon in the East and in the West.

(1) The first period extending to 170 AD.—It does not lie within the scope of this art. to recount the origin of the several books of the

1. From the NT. This belongs properly to NT Apostles to Introduction (q.v.). By the end of the 170 AD the 1st cent. all of the books of the NT were in existence. They were, as treasures of given churches, widely separated and honored as containing the word of Jesus or the teaching of the apostles. From the very first the authority of Jesus had full recognition in all the Christian world. The whole work of the apostles was in interpreting Him to the growing church. His sayings and His life were in part for the illumination of the OT; wholly for the understanding of life and its issues. In every assembly of Christians from the earliest days He was taught as well as the OT. In each church to which an epistle was written that epistle was likewise read. Paul asked that his letters be read in this way (1 Thess 5 27; Col 4 16). In this attentive listening to the exposition of some event in the life of Jesus or to the reading of the epistle of an apostle began the "authorization" of the traditions concerning Jesus and the apostolic writings. The widening of the area of the church and the departure of the apostles from earth emphasized increasingly the value of that which the writers of the NT left behind them. Quite early the desire to have the benefit of all possible instruction led to the interchange of Christian writings. Polycarp (110 AD ?) writes to the Philippians, "I have received letters from you and from Ignatius. You recommend me to send on yours to Syria; I shall do so either personally or by some other means. In return I send you the letter of Ignatius as well as others which I have in my hands and for which you made request. I add them to the present one; they will serve to edify your faith and perseverance" (Epistle to Phil, XIII). This is an illustration of what must have happened toward furthering a knowledge of the writings of the apostles. Just when and to what extent "collections" of our NT books began to be made it is impossible to say, but it is fair to infer that a collection of the Pauline epistles existed at the time Polycarp wrote to the Phil and when Ignatius wrote his seven letters to the churches of Asia Minor, i.e. about 115 AD. There is good reason to think also that the four Gospels were brought together in some places as early as this. A clear distinction, however, is to be kept in mind between "collections" and such recognition as we imply in the word "canonical." The gathering of books was one of the steps preliminary to this. Examination of the testimony to the NT in this early time indicates also that it is given with no intention of framing the canonicity of NT books. In numerous instances only "echoes" of the thought of the epistles appear; again quotations are incomplete; both showing that Scripture words are used as the natural expression of Christian thought. In the same way the Apostolic Fathers refer to the teachings and deeds of Jesus. They witness "to the substance and not to the authenticity of the Gospels." That this all may be more evident let us note in more detail the witness of the sub-apostolic age.

Clement of Rome, in 95 AD, wrote a letter in the name of the Christians of Rome to those in Corinth. In this letter he uses material found in Mt, Lk, giving it a free rendering (see chs 46 and 13); he has been much influenced by the Epistle to the He (see chs 9, 10, 17, 19, 36). He knows Rom, Cor, and there are found echoes of 1 Tim, Tit, 1 Pet and Eph.

The Epistles of Ignatius (115 AD) have correspondences with our gospels in several places (Eph 6; Rom 6, 7) and incorporate language from nearly all of the Pauline epistles. The Epistle to Polycarp makes large use of Phil, and besides this cites nine of the other Pauline epistles. Ignatius quotes from Mt, apparently from memory; also from 1 Pet and 1 Jn. In regard to all these three writers—Clement, Polycarp, Ignatius—it is not enough to say that they bring us reminiscences or quotations from this or that book. Their thought is tintured all through with NT truth. As we move a little farther down the years we come to "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" (cir 120 AD in its present form; see DIDACHE); the Epistle of Barnabas (cir 130 AD) and the Shepherd of Hermas (cir 130 AD). These exhibit the same phenomena as appear in the writings of Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp as far as references to the NT are concerned. Some books are quoted, and the thought of the three writings echoes again and again the teachings of the NT. They bear distinct witness to the value of "the gospel" and the doctrine of the apostles, so much so as to place these clearly above their own words. It is in the Epistle of Barnabas that we first come upon the phrase "it is written," referring to a NT book (Mt) (see Epis., iv.14). In this deepening sense of value was enfolded the feeling of authoritativeness, which slowly was to find expression. It is well to add that what we have so far discovered was true in widely separated parts of the Christian world as e.g. Rome and Asia Minor.

The lit. of the period we are examining was not, however, wholly of the kind of which we have been speaking. Two forces were calling out other expressions of the singular value of the writings of the apostles, whether gospels or epistles. These were (a) the attention of the civil government in view of the rapid growth of the Christian church and (b) heresy. The first brought to the defence or commendation of Christianity the Apologists, among whom were Justin Martyr, Aristides, Melito of Sardis and Theophilus of Antioch. By far the most important of these was Justin Martyr, and his work may be taken as representative. He was born about 100 AD at Shechem, and died as a martyr at Rome in 165 AD. His two Apologies and the Dialogue with Trypho are the sources for the study of his testimony. He speaks of the "Memoirs of the Apostles, called Gospels" (Ap., i.66) which were read on Sunday interchangeably with the prophets (i.67). Here emerges that equivalence in value of these "Gospels" with the OT Scriptures which may really mark the beginning of canonization. That these Gospels were our four Gospels as we now have them is yet a disputed question; but the evidence is weighty that they were. (See Purves, Testimony of Justin Martyr to Early Christianity, Lect V.) The fact that Tatian, his pupil, made a harmony of the Gospels, i.e. of our four Gospels, also bears upon our interpretation of Justin's "Memoirs." (See Hemphill, The Diatessaron of Tatian.) The only other NT book which Justin mentions is the Apocalypse; but he appears to have known the Acts, six epistles of Paul, He and 1 Jn, and echoes of still other epistles are perceptible. When he speaks of the apostles it is after this fashion: "By the power of God they proclaimed to every race of men that they were sent by Christ to teach to all the Word of God" (Ap., i.39). It is debatable, however, whether this refers to more than the actual preaching of the apostles. The beginning of the formation of the canon is in the position and authority given to the Gospels.

While the Apologists were busy commending or defending Christianity, heresy in the form of Gnosticism was also compelling attention to the matter of the writings of the apostles. From the beginning gnostic teachers claimed that Jesus had favored chosen ones of His apostles with a body of esoteric truth which had been handed down by secret tradition. This the church denied, and in the controversy that went on through years the question of what were authoritative writings became more and more pronounced. Basilides e.g., who taught in Alexandria during the reign of Hadrian (AD 117–38), had for his secret authority the secret tradition of the apostle Matthias and of Glaucias, an alleged interpreter of Peter, but he bears witness to Mt, Lk, Jn, Rom, 1 Cor, Eph, and Col in the effort to recommend his doctrines, and, what is more, gives them the value of Scripture in order to support more securely his teachings. (See Philosophoumena of Hippolytus, VII, 17). Valentinus, tracing his authority through Theodas to Paul, makes the same general use of NT books, and Tertullian tells us that he appeared to use the whole NT as then known.

The most noted of the Gnostics was Marcion, a native of Pontus. He went to Rome (cir 140 AD), there broke with the church and became a dangerous heretic. In support of his peculiar views, he formed a canon of his own which consisted of Luke's Gospel and ten of the Pauline epistles. He rejected the Pastoral Epistles, He, Mt, Mk, Jn, the Acts, the Catholic epistles and the Apocalypse, and made a recension of both the gospel of Lk and the Pauline epistles which he accepted. His importance, for us, however, is in the fact that he gives us the first clear evidence of the canonization of the Pauline epistles. Such use of the Scriptures inevitably called forth both criticism and a clearer marking off of those books which were to be used in the churches opposed to heresy, and so "in the struggle with Gnosticism the canon was made." We are thus brought to the end of the first period in which we have marked the collection of NT books in greater or smaller compass, the increasing valuation of them as depositions of the truth of Jesus and His apostles, and finally the movement toward the claim of their authoritativeness as over against perverted teaching. No sharp line as to a given year can be drawn between the first stage of the process and the second. Forces working in the first go on into the second, but results are accomplished in the second which give it its right to separate consideration.

(2) The period from 170 AD to 220 AD.—This is the age of a voluminous theological literature busy with the great issues of church canon and creed. It is the period of the great names of Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, representing respectively Asia Minor, Egypt and North Africa. In passing into it we come into the clear light of Christian history. There is no longer any question as to a NT canon; the only difference of judgment is as to its extent. What has been slowly but surely shaping itself in the consciousness of the church now comes to clear expression.

Irenaeus.—That expression we may study in Irenaeus as representative of the period. He was born in Asia Minor, lived and taught in Rome and became afterward bishop of Lyons. He had, therefore, a wide acquaintance with the churches, and was peculiarly competent to speak concerning the general judgment of the Christian world. As a pupil of Polycarp, who was a disciple of John, he is connected with the apostles themselves. An earnest defender of the truth, he makes the NT in great part his authority, and often appeals to it. The four Gospels, the Acts, the epistles of Paul, several of the Catholic epistles and the Apocalypse are to him Scripture in the fullest sense. They are genuine and authoritative, as much so as the OT ever was. He dwells upon the fact that there are four gospels, the very number being prefigured in the four winds and the four quarters of the earth. Every attempt to increase or diminish the number is heresy. Tertullian takes virtually the same position (Adv. Marc., iv.2), while Clement of Alexandria quotes all four gospels as "Scripture." By the end of the 2d cent. the canon of the gospels was settled. The same is true also of the Pauline epistles. Irenaeus makes more than two hundred citations from Paul, and looks upon his epistles as Scripture (Adv. Haer., iii.12, 12). Indeed, at this time it may be said that the new canon was known under the designation "The Gospel and the Apostles" in contradistinction to the old as "the Law and the Prophets." The title "New Testament" appears to have been first used by an unknown writer against Montanism (cir 193 AD). It occurs frequently after this in Origen and later writers. In considering all this testimony two facts should have emphasis: (1) its wide extent: Clement and Irenaeus represent parts of Christendom which are widely separated; (2) the relation of these men to those who have gone before them. Their lives together with those before them spanned nearly the whole time from the apostles. They but voiced the judgment which silently, gradually had been selecting the "Scripture" which they freely and fully acknowledged and to which they made appeal.

The Muratorian Fragment.—Just here we come upon the Muratorian Fragment, so called because discovered in 1740 by the librarian of Milan, Muratori. It dates from some time near the end of the 2d cent., is of vital interest in the study of the history of the canon, since it gives us a list of NT books and is concerned with the question of the canon itself. The document comes from Rome, and Lightfoot assigns it to Hippolytus. Its list contains the Gospels (the first line of the fragment is incomplete, beginning with Mk, but Mt is clearly implied), the Acts, the Pauline epistles, the Apocalypse, 1 and 2 Jn (perhaps by implication the third) and Jude. It does not mention He, 1 and 2 Pet, Jas. In this list we have virtually the real position of the canon at the close of the 2d cent. Complete unanimity had not been attained in reference to all the books which are now between the covers of our NT. Seven books had not yet found a secure place beside the gospel and Paul in all parts of the church. The Palestinian and Syrian churches for a long time rejected the Apocalypse, while some of the Catholic epistles were in Egypt considered doubtful. The history of the final acceptance of these belongs to the third period.

(3) The period included by the 3d and 4th cents.—It has been said that "the question of the canon did not make much progress in the course of the 3d cent." (Reuss, History of the Canon of Holy Scripture, 125).

We have the testimony of a few notable teachers mostly from one center, Alexandria. Their consideration of the question of the disputed book serves just here one purpose. By far the most distinguished name of the 3d cent. is Origen. He was born in Alexandria about 185 AD, and before he was seventeen became an instructor in the school for catechumens. In 203 he was appointed bishop, experienced various fortunes, and died in 254. His fame rests upon his ability as an exegete, though he worked laboriously and successfully in other fields. His testimony is of high value, not simply because of his own studies, but also because of his wide knowledge of what was thought in other Christian centers in the world of his time. Space permits us only to give in summary form his conclusions, esp. in regard to the books still in doubt. The Gospels, the Pauline epistles, the Acts, he accepts without question. He discusses at some length the authorship of He, believes that "God alone knows who wrote it," and accepts it as Scripture. His testimony to the Apocalypse is given in the sentence, "Therefore John the son of Zebedee says in the Revelation." He also gives sure witness to Jude, but wavers in regard to Jas, 2 Pet, 2 and 3 Jn.

Another noted name of this cent. is Dionysius of Alexandria, a pupil of Origen (d. 265). His most interesting discussion is regarding the Apocalypse, which he attributes to an unknown John, but he does not dispute its inspiration. It is a singular fact that the western church accepted this book from the first, while its position in the East was variable. Conversely the Epistle to the He was more insecure in the West than in the East. In regard to the Catholic epistles Dionysius supports Jas, 2 and 3 Jn, but not 2 Pet or Jude.

In the West the name of Cyprian, bishop of Carthage (248-58 AD), was most influential. He was much engaged in controversy, but a man of great personal force. The Apocalypse he highly honored, but he was silent about the Epistle to the He. He refers to only two of the Catholic epistles, 1 Pet and 1 Jn.

These testimonies confirm what was said above, viz. that the end of the 3d cent. leaves the question of the full canon about where it was at the beginning. 1 Pet and 1 Jn seem to have been everywhere known and accepted. In the West the five Catholic epistles gained recognition more slowly than in the East.

In the early part of the 4th cent. Eusebius (270-340 AD), bishop of Caesarea before 315, sets before us in his Church History (III, chs iii-xxv) his estimate of the canon in his time. He does not of course use the word canon, but he "conducts an historical inquiry into the belief and practice of earlier generations." He lived through the last great persecution in the early part of the 4th cent., when not only places of worship were razed to the ground, but also the sacred Scriptures were in the public market-places consigned to the flames (HE, VIII, 2). It was, therefore, no idle question what book a loyal Christian must stand for as his Scripture. The question of the canon had an earnest, practical significance. Despite some obscurity and apparent contradictions, his classification of the NT books was as follows: (1) The acknowledged books. His criteria for each of these was authenticity and apostolicity and he placed in this list the Gospels, Acts, and Paul's epistles, including He. (2) The disputed books, i.e. those which had obtained only partial recognition, to which he assigned Jas, Jude, 2 Pet and 2 Jn. About the Apocalypse also he was not sure. In this testimony there is not much advance over that of the 3d cent. It is virtually the canon of Origen. All this makes evident the fact that as yet no official decision nor uniformity of usage in the church gave a completed canon. The time, however, was drawing on when various forces at work were to bring much nearer this unanimity and enlarge the list of acknowledged books. In the second half of the 4th cent. repeated efforts were made to put an end to uncertainty. Athanasius in one of his pastoral letters in connection with the publishing of the ecclesiastical calendar gives a list of the books comprising Scripture, and in the NT portion are included all the 27 books which we now recognize. "These are the wells of salvation," he writes, "so that he who thirsts may be satisfied with the sayings in these. Let no one add to these. Let nothing be taken away." Gregory of Nazianzen (d. 390 AD) also published a list omitting Rev, as did Cyril of Jerus (d. 386), and quite at the end of the cent. (4th) Isidore of Pelusium speaks of the "canon of truth, the Divine Scriptures." For a considerable time the Apocalypse was not accepted in the Palestinian or Syrian churches. Athanasius helped toward its acceptance in the church of Alexandria. Some differences of opinion, however, continued. The Syrian church did not accept all of the Catholic epistles until much later.

The Council of Carthage in 397, in connection with its decree "that aside from the canonical Scriptures nothing is to be read in church under the name of Divine Scriptures," gives a list of the books of the NT. After this fashion there was an endeavor to secure unanimity, while at the same time differences of judgment and practice continued. The books which had varied treatment through these early cents. were He, the Apocalypse and the five minor Catholic epistles. The advance of Christianity under Constantine had much to do with the reception of the whole group of books in the East. The task which the emperor gave to Eusebius to prepare "fifty copies of the Divine Scriptures" established a standard which in time gave recognition to all doubtful books. In the West, Jerome and Augustine were the controlling factors in its settlement of the canon. The publication of the Vulg virtually determined the matter.

In conclusion let it be noted how much the human element was involved in the whole process of forming our NT. No one would wish to dispute a providential overruling of it all. Also it is well to bear in mind that all the books have not the same clear title to their places in the canon as far as the history of their attestation is concerned. Clear and full and unanimous, however, has been the judgment from the beginning upon the Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline epistles, 1 Pet and 1 Jn.

CANOPY, kan'ô-pi (קַנֹּפִי, huppāh, from a root meaning "to inclose" or "cover"): Isa 4 5 AV has "defence," ERV "canopy," ARV "covering," the last being best, though "canopy" has much in its favor. In Ps 19 5 (He 19 6) huppāh is used of the bridegroom's chamber and in Joel 2 16 of the bride's. Among the Hebrews the huppāh was originally the chamber in which the bride awaited the groom for the marital union. In Jth

10 21; 13 9.15; 16 19 the word canopy occurs as the Eng. equivalent of the Gr κωνοπέδιον, kōnō-peion, which was primarily a mosquito-net and then a canopy over a bed, whether for useful or for decorative purposes. JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

CAPERBERRY, kā'pēr-ber-i (צְבִירִי, ʿabhi-yōnāh; κάππαρις, kápparis; Eccl 12 5 RVm): The tr "the caperberry shall fail" (RV "burst") instead of "desire shall fail" (AV) has the support of the LXX and of some Talmudic writers (see G. F. Moore, JBL, X, 55-64), but it is doubtful.

The caperberry is the fruit of the thorny caper, Capparis spinosa (N.O. Capparidaceae), a common Pal plant with pretty white flowers and brightly colored stamens. Largely on account of its habit of growing out of crevasses in old walls it has been identified by some with the Hyssop (q.v.). The familiar "capers" of commerce are the young buds, but the berries were the parts most used in ancient times; their repute as excitants of sexual desire is ancient and widespread. Various parts of this plant are still used for medical purposes by the modern peasants of Pal.

CAPERNAUM, ka-pēr-na-um (Καπερναούμ [TR], Καφαρναούμ [B&D, etc], Kapernaoum, Kapharnaoum): The woe spoken by the Master against this great city has been fulfilled to the uttermost (Mt 11 23; Lk 10 15). So completely has it perished that the very site is a matter of dispute today. In Scripture Capernaum is not mentioned outside the Gospels. When Jesus finally departed from Nazareth, He dwelt in Capernaum (Mt 4 13) and made it the main center of His activity during a large part of His public ministry. Near by He called the fishermen to follow Him (Mk 1 16), and the publican from the receipt of custom (Mt 9 9, etc). It was the scene of many "mighty works" (Mt 11 23; Mk 1 34). Here Jesus healed the centurion's son (Mt 8 5, etc), the nobleman's son (Jn 4 46), Simon Peter's mother-in-law (Mk 1 31, etc), and the paralytic (Mt 9 1, etc); cast out the unclean spirit (Mk 1 23, etc); and here also, probably, He raised Jairus' daughter to life (Mk 5 22, etc). In Capernaum the little child was used to teach the disciples humility, while in the synagogue Jesus delivered His ever-memorable discourse on the bread of life (Jn 6).

From the notices in the Gospels we gather that Capernaum was a city of considerable importance. Some think that the words "shalt thou be exalted," etc (Mt 11 23; Lk 10 15), mean that it stood on an elevated site. Perhaps more naturally they refer to the excessive pride of the inhabitants in their city. It was a customs station, and the residence of a high officer of the king (Mt 9 9; Jn 4 46, etc). It was occupied by a detachment of Rom soldiers, whose commander thought the good will of the people worth securing at the expense of building for them a synagogue (Mt 8 5; Lk 7 5). It stood by the sea (Mt 4 13) and from Jn 6 17 ff (cf Mt 14 34; Mk 6 53), we see that it was either in or near the plain of Gennesaret.

Jos twice mentions Capernaum. It played no great part in the history of his time, and seems to have declined in importance, as he refers to it as a "village." In battle in el-Bateihah his horse fell into a quagmire, and he suffered injury which disabled him for further fighting. His soldiers carried him to the village of Capernaum (this reference is however doubtful; the name as it stands is Kepharnomōn which Niese corrects to Kepharnōkōn), whence he was removed to Tarichaea (Vita, 72). Again he eulogizes the plain of Gennesaret for its wonderful fruits, and says it is watered by a most fertile fountain which the people of the country call Capharnaum. In the water of this fountain the Coracinus is found (BJ, III, x, 8). Jos therefore corroborates the Bib. data, and adds the information as to the fountain and the Coracinus fish. The fish however is found in other fountains near the lake, and is therefore no help toward identification.

The Fountain at Khān Minyeh.

The two chief rivals for the honor of representing Capernaum are Tell Hūm, a ruined site on the lake shore, nearly $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles W. of the mouth of the Jordan; and Khān Minyeh, fully $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles farther west, at the N.E. corner of the plain of Gennesaret. Dr. Tristram suggested 'Ain El-Madowwerah, a large spring inclosed by a circular wall, on the western edge of the plain. But it stands about a mile from the sea; there are no ruins to indicate that any considerable village ever stood here; and the water is available for only a small part of the plain.

In favor of Tell Hūm is Onom, which places Chorazin 2 miles from Capernaum. If Kerāzeh is Chorazin, this suits Tell Hūm better than Khān Minyeh. To this may be added the testimony of Theodosius (cir 530), Antoninus Martyr (600), and John of Würzburg (1100). Jewish tradition speaks of Tankhum, in which are the graves of Nahum and Rabbi Tankhum. Identifying Kefr Nahum with Tankhum, and then deriving Tell Hūm from Tankhum, some have sought to vindicate the claims of this site. But every link in that chain of argument is extremely precarious. A highway ran through Tell Hūm along which passed the caravans to and from the E.; but the place was not in touch with the great north-and-south traffic.

There is also no fountain near Tell Hūm answering the description of Jos. Of recent advocates of Tell Hūm, it is sufficient to name Schürer (HJP, IV, 71) and Buhl (GAP, 224 f). In this connection it may be interesting to note that the present writer, when visiting the place recently (1911), drew his boatman's attention to a bit of ruined wall rising above the greenery W. of the lagoon, and asked what it was called. Kanīset el Kufry, was the reply, which may be freely rendered, "church of the infidels." This is just the Arab. equivalent of the Jewish "church of the mīnīm."

For Khān Minyeh it may be noted that Gennesaret corresponds to el-Ghuweir, the plain lying on the N.W. shore, and that Khān Minyeh stands at the N.E. extremity of the plain; thus answering, as Tell Hūm cannot do, the description of the Gospels. The copious fountains at et-Tābigħa, half a mile to the E., supplied water which was conducted round the face of the rock toward Khān Minyeh at a height which made it possible to water a large portion of the plain. If it be said that Jos must have been carried to Tell Hūm as being nearer the scene of his accident—see however, the comment above—it does not at all follow that he was taken to the nearest place. Arculf (1670) described Capernaum as on a "narrow piece of ground between the mountain and the lake." This does not apply to Tell Hūm; but it accurately fits Khān Minyeh. Isaac Chelo (1334) says that Capernaum, then in ruins, had been inhabited by Mīnīm, that is, Jewish converts to Christianity. The name Minyeh may have been derived from them. Quaresimus (1620–26) notes a Khān called Menieh which stood by the site of Capernaum. Between the ruined Khān and the sea there are traces of ancient buildings. Here the road from the E. united with that which came down from the N. by way of Khān Jubba Yusif, so that this must have been an important center, alike from the military point of view, and for customs. This is the site favored by, among others, G. A. Smith (HGHL, 456 f; EB, s.v.) and Conder. Sanday argued in favor of Khān Minyeh in his book, The Sacred Sites of the Gospel, but later, owing to what the present writer thinks a mistaken view of the relation between Tell Hūm and the fountain at et-Tābigħa, changed his mind (Expos T, XV, 100 ff). There is no instance of a fountain 2 miles distant being called by the name of a town. Tell Hūm, standing on the sea shore, was independent of this fountain, whose strength also was spent in a westward direction, away from Tell Hūm.

The balance of evidence was therefore heavily in favor of Khān Minyeh until Professor R. A. S. Macalister published the results of his researches. He seems to be wrong in rejecting the name Tell Hūm in favor of Talhūm; and he falls into a curious error regarding the use of the word tell. No one who speaks Arab., he says, "would ever think of applying the word Tell, 'mound,' to this flat widespread ruin." In Egyp Arab., however, tell means "ruin"; and Rev. Asad Mansur, a man of education whose native language is Arab., writes: "I do not understand what the objectors mean by the word 'tell.' In Arab. 'tell' is used for any heap of ruins, or mound. So that the ruins of Tell Hūm themselves are today a 'tell'." (Expos, April, 1907, 370). Professor Macalister is on surer ground in discussing the pottery found on the rival sites. At Khān Minyeh he found nothing older than the Arab. period, while at Tell Hūm pottery of the Rom period abounds—"exactly the period of the glory of Capernaum" (PEFS, April and July, 1907). If this be confirmed by further examination, it disposes of the claim of Khān Minyeh. Important Rom remains have now been found between the ruined Khān and the sea. It is no longer open to doubt that this was the site of a great Rom city. The Rom period however covers a long space. The buildings at Tell Hūm are by many assigned to the days of the Antonines. Is it possible from the remains of pottery to make certain that the city flourished in the time of the Herods? If the city at Tell Hūm had not yet arisen in the days of Christ, those who dispute its claim to be Capernaum are under no obligation to show which city the ruins represent. They are not the only extensive ruins in the country of whose history we are in ignorance.

CAPHARSALAMA, kaf-ar-sal'a-ma, kaf-ar-salā'ma (Χαφάρσαλαμα, Chapharsalamā): The site of an indecisive skirmish between Judas Maccabaeus and Nicanor, an officer of the king of Syria and governor of Judaea. The situation cannot be precisely fixed but it must have been in the neighborhood of Jerus, for Nicanor, after losing 5,000 men, retired with the remainder to "the city of David" (1 Macc 7 26-32). The first part of the word, "Caphar," means village or hamlet; the last part has been identified with Siloam and also with Khirbet Deir Sellām, about 12½ miles W. of Jerus.

CAPHENATHA, ka-fen'a-tha. See CHAPHEN-ATHA.

CAPHIRA, ka-fī'ra (A, Καφίρά, Kaphirá, B, Πειρά, Peirá): A town whose inhabitants returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 19). It corresponds to CHEPHIRAH (Ezr 2 25), which see.

CAPHTHORIM, kaf'thō-rim (כַּפְתּוֹרִים, kaph'thō-rīm). See CAPHTORIM.

CAPHTOR, kaf'tor, CAPHTORIM, kaf'tor-im (כַּפְתּוֹר, kaph'tor, כַּפְתּוֹרִים, kaph'tōrīm; Καππαδοκία, Kappadokía, Γαφτοριεύμ, Gaphtori-eim, Καφτοριεύμ, Kaphtori-eim): The

1. First Theory: country and people whence came the Crete Philis (Gen 10 14=1 Ch 1 12 [here the clause "whence went forth the Philis" should probably come after Caphtorim]; Dt 2 23; Jer 47 4; Am 9 7). Jer (loc. cit.) calls it an "island"; there is evidence of ancient connection between Crete and Philistia; and the Philis are called Cherethites, which may mean Cretans (see CHERETHITES). These considerations have led many to identify Caphtor with the important island of Crete. It should be noted, however, that the word יָם, 'î, used by Jeremiah, denotes not only "isle," but also "coastland."

Ebers (Aegypten und die Bücher Moses, 130 ff) thought that Caphtor represented the Egypt Kaft-ur, holding that Kaft was the Egypt name for the colonies of Phoenicians in the Theory: Delta, extended to cover the Phoenicians in the north and their colonies. Kaft-ur, therefore, would mean "Greater Phoenicia." But the discovery of Kaptar among the names of countries conquered by Ptolemy Auletes in an inscription on the Temple of Kom Ombo is fatal to this theory.

A third theory would identify Caphtor with the Kafto of the Egypt inscriptions. As early as the time of Thotmes III the inhabitants of this land, the Kafti, are mentioned in the records. In the trilingual inscription of Canopus the name is rendered in Gr by Phoinikē, "Phoenicia."

This seems to be an error, as the Kafti portrayed on the monuments have no features in common with the Semites. They certainly represent a western type. It is held that the Egypt Kafto is a district in Asia Minor, probably Cilicia. The sea-pirates, the purasati, whom Rameses III subdued (cir 1200 BC), entered Syria from the north. The r in the name is the Egypt equivalent of the Semitic l. Therefore Purasati=Pilishti, "Philistines." And so it is proposed to identify Caphtor with Cilicia. A serious objection to this theory is the absence of the final "r" in Kafto. McCurdy's suggestion (HDB) that it represents a Heb waw, written as a vowel-letter in an original Kafto, does not carry conviction.

It is impossible to give a certain decision; but the balance of probability seems still inclined to the first theory.

CAPPADOCIA, kap-a-dō'shi-a (ἡ Καππαδοκία, hē Kappadokía): An extensive province in eastern Asia Minor, bounded by the Taurus mountains on the S., the Anti-Taurus and the Euphrates on the E., and, less definitely, by Pontus and Galatia on the N. and W. Highest mountain, Argæus, over 13,000 ft. above sea-level; chief rivers, the Pyramus now Jihan, Sarus now Sihon, and Halys now the Kuzul; most important cities, Caesarea Mazaca, Comana, Miletene now Malatia, and Tyana now Bor. At Malatia the country unrolls itself as a fertile plain; elsewhere the province is for the most part composed of billowy and rather barren uplands, and bleak mountain peaks and pastures.

Coin of Ariarathes V, Philometer, King of Cappadocia, 163-130 BC.

The Gr geographers called Cappodax the son of Ninyas, thereby tracing the origin of Cappadocian culture to Assyria. Cuneiform tablets from Kul Tepe (Kara Eyuk), deciphered by Professors Pinches and Sayce, show that in the era of Khammurabi (see HAMMURABI) this extensive ruin on the ox-bow of the Halys and near Caesarea Mazaca, was an outpost of the Assyrian-Bab Empire. A Hittite civilization followed, from about 2000 BC onward. Malatia, Gurun, Tyana and other old sites contain important and undoubted Hittite remains, while sporadic examples of Hittite art, architecture and inscriptions are found in many places, and the number is being steadily increased by fresh discovery. After the Hittites faded from sight, following the fall of Carchemish, about 718 BC, Cappadocia emerges as a satrapy of Persia. At the time of Alexander the Great it received a top-dressing of Gr culture, and a line of native kings established an independent throne, which lasted until Cappadocia was incorporated in the Rom Empire, 17 AD. Nine rulers bore the name of Ariarathes (RV Arathes) the founder of the dynasty, and two were named Ariobarzanes. One of these kings is referred to in 1 Macc 15 22. The history of this Cappadocian kingdom is involved, obscure and bloody.

Pagan religion had a deep hold upon the population prior to the advent of Christianity. Comana was famous for its worship of the great goddess Ma, who was served, according to Strabo, by 6,000 priestesses, and only second to this was the worship paid to Zeus at Venasa.

Representatives from Cappadocia were present at Pentecost (Acts 2 9), and Peter includes the converts in this province in the address of his letter (1 Pet 1 1). Caesarea became one of the most important early centers of Christianity. Here the Armenian youth of noble blood, Krikore, or Gregory the Illuminator, was instructed in the faith to which he afterward won the formal assent of his whole nation. Here Basil governed the churches of his wide diocese and organized monasticism. His brother, Gregory of Nyssa, and Gregory Nazianzen, lived and labored not far away. Cappadocia passed with the rest of Asia Minor into the Byzantine Empire, but from its exposed position early fell under the domination of the Turks, having been conquered by the Seljukians in 1074.

CAPTAIN, kap'tin: In AV there are no fewer than 13 Heb words, and 4 different Gr words, which are rendered by this one Eng. word. In the RV some of these are rendered by other Eng. words, and so we find for "captain": "marshal" (Jer 51 27; Nah 3 17), "prince" (1 S 9 16), "governor" (Jer 51 23,28), while in the case of one of these Heb words a different construction is found altogether (Jer 13 21).

Of Heb words in the OT rendered by "captain"

(1) the most frequent is שָׂר, sar, which denotes "a military commander," whether of thousands or hundreds or fifties (Nu 31 48; 1 S 8 12 and many other places). Sar is the chief officer of any department, civil and religious, as well as military—captain of the guard AV and RV, chief of the executioners RVm (Gen 37 36); chief butler (Gen 40 9); chief baker (Gen 40 16); chief of a district (Neh 3 15); chiefs of tribes (Naphtali; Zebulun, Ps 68 27); chiefs over gangs of slaves (Ex 1 11); chiefs of the priests and the Levites (Ezr 8 29). (2) רֹבֵּ, rabh, later Heb for chief of the executioners or captain of the guard, a title always given to Nebuzar-adan (2 K 25 8 ff; Jer 39 9 ff) and to Arioch (Dnl 2 14). Compare also Rab-mag, chief of the magicians (Jer 39 13), and Ashpenaz, chief of the eunuchs (Dnl 1 3). (3) רֹאשׁ, rō'sh, "head" over a host (Israel in the wilderness, Nu 14 4), over tribes (Dt 29 10, where RV renders "heads"), over thousands (1 Ch 12 20). Abijah, king of Judah, before joining battle against Jeroboam, claimed "God himself is with us for our captain" AV, "with us at our head" RV (2 Ch 13 12). (4) שָׁלִיֵּשׁ, shālīsh, originally the third man in the chariot, who, when the chief occupant was the king, or commander-in-chief, was of the rank of captain (2 K 7 2; 9 25), the term "third man" being generalized to mean "a captain" in 2 K 10 25; 2 Ch 8 9, where "chief of his captains" combines (1) and (4). (5) נָגִיד, nāghīd, leader by Divine appointment: of Saul (1 S 9 16, "captain," AV, "prince" RV 10 1); of David (2 S 5 2); of Hezekiah (2 K 20 5); with a charge in connection with the temple (2 Ch 31 13). It is the word used of Messiah "the prince" (Dnl 9 25), who is also Prince of the Covenant (11 22). (6) נָשִׂיא, nāsī', rendered "captain" in AV Nu 2 3.5.7 only, there in RV and in other places, both AV and RV, rendered "prince." In 1 Ch 7 40 "chief of the princes" combines (3) and (6). (7) פֶּהָה, pehāh, is found almost entirely in a foreign title denoting "governor," and belongs to the later history of Israel (Neh 2 7.9; Ezr 8 36; Hag 1 1), rendered "captain" in exclusively foreign associations (1 K 20 24; 2 K 18 24; Dnl 3 27 f). (8) קָדִין, kādīn (from root of kadi, Arab. for "judge"), denotes "dictator," almost "usurper," and is found in "rulers of Sodom" AV and RV, "judges of Sodom" RVm (Isa 1 10), used of Jephthah in sense of "captain" AV, "chief" RV (Jgs 11 6), found combined with (3), "head and captain" (AV, "head and chief" RV Jgs 11 11). In Josh 10 24 it denotes commanders of troops, AV "captains of the men of war," RV "chiefs of the men of war." (9) כָּר, kar, in Ezk 21 22 "to set captains" AV, is trd "to set battering rams" RV. (10) בַּעַל, ba'al, only once in "captain of the ward" (Jer 37 13). (11) טִפְסָר, tiphsar, a dignitary belonging to an oriental court, in AV rendered "captain," in RV "marshal" (Nah 3 17; Jer 51 27). (12) שָׁלִיֵּשׁ, shallīsh, in Dnl 2 15 of Arioch, the king's captain; in Eccl 8 8 "having power over," and in 17 19 used of "mighty men" (RV "rulers").

Of Gr words rendered by "captain" in NT there are the following: (1) ἀρχηγός, archēgós, rendered "captain" in He 2 10 AV but relegated to the margin in RV, where "author" (of their salvation) is preferred, this being the rendering of He 12 2 AV and RV, "author" (and finisher of our faith),

"captain" being still retained in RVm. Cf Acts 3 15 and 5 31, where the same Gr word is rendered "Prince," the RVm of the former passage giving "Author." In the Risen and Ascended Christ the various conceptions thus expressed are found to blend. (2) χιλιάρχος, chiliarchos, the Lat tribunus militum of which there were six to a legion, commanding the six cohorts of which it was composed. In its lit. acceptation it would be "commander of a thousand," and it is so used in Acts 22 28 where it designates the commander of the Rom garrison in Jerus, consisting of a cohort, and is rendered "chief captain" (Jn 18 12; Acts 21 31; 22 24; 24 22). It is used more vaguely in the sense of "military officer" in Mk 6 21; Rev 6 15; 19 18. (3) στρατηγός, stratēgós, used only by St. Luke in the NT, and almost exclusively of (a) officials in charge of the Temple (Lk 22 4.52; Acts 4 1; 5 24.26). The captain of the Temple had the superintendence of the Levites and priests who were on guard in and around the Temple, and under him were stratēgoi, who were also captains of the Temple police, although they took their instruction from him as their head. He was not only a priest, but second in dignity only to the high priest himself; (b) the exception to St. Luke's general usage is where the word is used of the chief authorities in civil affairs at Philippi; where "the magistrates," as the word is rendered (Acts 16 20 f), called themselves "praetors" (stratēgoi). In the case of Paul and Silas they placed themselves in peril of removal from their office by ordering them to be beaten, being Romans and uncondemned. (4) στρατοπεδάρχης, stratopedarchēs, the captain of the guard to whom Julius of the Augustan band (according to the TR, Acts 28 16), delivered St. Paul and his fellow-prisoners. The word has disappeared from RV, but the passage in which it occurs has attestation which satisfies Blass, Sir William Ramsay, and other scholars. It was supposed that this was the captain of the Praetorian guard, but Mommsen and Ramsay believe him to be the princeps peregrinorum castrorum. See AUGUSTAN BAND; ARMY, ROMAN. T. NICOL CAPTIVE, kap'tiv (שֶׁבִי, shebhī, גָּלוּהַ, gālāh; αἰχμάλωτος, aichmálōtos and its derivatives): The frequent references in the OT to captives as men forcibly deported (from the Heb root שֶׁבַה, shābhāh) or inhabiting a land foreign to them (from Heb גָּלוּהַ, gālāh) reflect the universal practice of the ancient world. The treatment of captives was sometimes barbarous (2 S 8 2) but not always so (2 K 6 21.22). See further under ASSIR and WAR.

Figurative: Except in Job 42 10 the fig. use of the idea is confined to the NT, where reference is made to the triumphal reign of the Lord Jesus (Lk 4 18; Eph 4 8), or, on the other hand, to the power of the devil (2 Tim 2 26), or of false teachers (3 6); cf also Rom 7 23; 2 Cor 10 5. LITERATURE

1. Of the Northern Kingdom.—The captivity of the Northern Kingdom was the work of the great Assyrian power having its seat at Nineveh on the Tigris. The empire of Assyria, founded nearly 2000 years before Christ, had a long history behind it when its annals begin to take notice of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The reign of Shalmaneser II (860-825 BC) marks the first contact between these powers. This is not the Shalmaneser mentioned in 2 K 17 and 18, who is the fourth of the name and flourished more than a cent. later. Shalmaneser II was contemporary during his long reign with Jehoshaphat, Jehoram, Ahaziah and Joash, kings of Judah; with Ahab, Ahaziah, Jehoram and Jehu, kings of Israel; with Hazael and Benhadad II, kings of Syria at Damascus, and with Mesha, king of Moab. The Assyrian authorities for his reign are an inscription engraved by himself on the rocks of Armenia; the Black Obelisk brought by Layard from Nimroud, now in the British Museum; and the texts engraved on the bronze gates of Balawat, discovered by Hormuzd Rassam in 1878, and recognized as the swinging gates of Shalmaneser's palace. From these authorities we learn that in his 6th year he encountered the combined forces of Damascus, Hamath, Israel, and other states which had united to oppose his progress westward, and completely routed them in the battle of Karkar (854 BC). The danger which threatened the western states in common had brought Syria and Israel together; and this is in accord with the Scripture narrative which tells of a covenant, denounced by God's prophet, between Ahab and Benhadad (1 K 20 34 ff), and mentions a period of three years when there was no war between Syria and Israel. The defeat of the allies seems, however, to have broken up the confederacy, for, soon after, Ahab is found, with the aid of Jehoshaphat of Judah, attempting unsuccessfully, and with fatal result to himself, to recover from the weakened power of Syria the city of Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22). In another campaign to the West, which likewise finds no record in Scripture, Shalmaneser received the tribute of Tyre and Sidon, and of "Yahua of Khumri," that is, of Jehu, of the land of Omri, as Israel is called on the monuments.

The next Assyrian monarch who turned his arms against the West was Rimmon-nirari III (810-781 BC), grandson of Shalmaneser II. Although he is not mentioned by name in Scripture, his presence and activity had their influence upon contemporary events recorded in 2 K. He caused Syria to let go her hold of Israel; and although he brought Israel into subjection, the people of the Northern Kingdom would rather have a ruler exercising a nominal sovereignty over them in distant Nineveh than a king oppressing them in Damascus. Hence Rimmon-nirari has been taken for the saviour whom God gave to Israel, "so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians" (2 K 13 5; cf ver 23).

With the death of Rimmon-nirari in 781 BC, the power of Assyria received a temporary check, and on the other hand the kingdom of Judah under Uzziah and the kingdom of Israel under Jeroboam II reached the zenith of their political prosperity. In 745 BC, however, a usurper, Pul, or Pulu, ascended the throne of Assyria, and reigned as Tiglath-pileser III. It is by the former name that he is first mentioned in the Scripture narrative (2 K 15 19; 1 Ch 5 26), and by the latter that he is mentioned on the monuments. That the two names belong to one man is now held to be certain (Schrader, COT, I, 230 f).

Tiglath-pileser was one of the greatest monarchs of antiquity. He was the first to attempt to consolidate an empire in the manner to which the world has become accustomed since Roman times. He was not content to receive tribute from the kings and rulers of the states which he conquered. The countries which he conquered became subject provinces of his empire, governed by Assyrian satraps and contributing to the imperial treasury. Not long after he had seated himself on the throne, Tiglath-pileser, like his predecessors, turned his attention to the West. After the siege of Arpad, northward of Aleppo, the Assyrian forces made their way into Syria, and putting into operation the Assyrian method of deportation and repopulation, the conqueror annexed Hamath which had sought the alliance and assistance of Azariah, that is Uzziah, king of Judah. Whether he then refrained from molesting Judah, or whether her prestige was broken by this campaign of the Assyrian king, it is not easy to say. In another campaign he certainly subjected Menahem of Israel with other kings to tribute. What is stated in a word or two in the Annals of Tiglath-pileser is recorded at length in the Bible history (2 K 15 19 ff): "There came against the land Pul the king of Assyria; and Menahem gave Pul a thousand talents of silver, that his hand might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand. And Menahem exacted the money of Israel, even of all the mighty men of wealth, of each man 50 shekels of silver, to give to the king of Assyria. So the king of Assyria turned back, and stayed not there in the land." In the reign of Pekah, under his proper name of Tiglath-pileser, he is recorded to have raided the northern parts of Israel, and carried the inhabitants away into the land of Assyria (2 K 15 29). We next hear of Ahaz, king of Judah, appealing to the Assyrians for help against "these two tails of smoking firebrands," Rezin of Syria and Pekah, the son of Remaliah (Isa 7 4). To secure this help he took the silver and gold of the house of the Lord, and sent it as a present to the king of Assyria (2 K 16 8). Meanwhile Tiglath-pileser was setting out on a new campaign to the West. He carried fire and sword through Syria and the neighboring lands as far as Gaza, and on his return he captured Samaria, without, however, razing it to the ground. Pekah having been slain by his own people, the Assyrian monarch left Hoshea, the leader of the conspiracy, on the throne of Israel as the vassal of Assyria.

In 727 BC Tiglath-pileser III died and was succeeded by Shalmaneser IV. His reign was short and no annals of it have come to light. In 2 K 17 and 18, however, we read that Hoshea, relying upon 727-722 BC help from the king of Egypt, thought the death of Tiglath-pileser a good opportunity for striking a blow for independence. It was a vain endeavor, for the end of the kingdom of Israel was at hand. The people were grievously given over to oppression and wickedness, which the prophets Amos and Hosea vigorously denounced. Hosea, in particular, was "the prophet of Israel's decline and fall." Prophecy at this very time he says: "As for Samaria, her king is cut off, as foam upon the water. The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed: the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars; and they shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us" (Hos 10 7,8; cf vs 14,15). No less stern are the predictions by Isaiah and Micah of the doom that is to overtake Samaria: "Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim, and to the fading flower of his glorious beauty, which is on the head of the fat valley of them that are overcome with wine" (Isa 28 1). "For the transgression of Jacob is all this, and for the sins of the house of Israel. What is the transgression of Jacob? is it not Samaria? . . . Therefore I will make Samaria as a heap of the field, and as places for planting vineyards" (Mic 1 5,6). No help came from Egypt. With the unaided and enfeebled resources of his kingdom Hoshea had to face the chastising forces of his sovereign. He was made prisoner outside Samaria and was most likely carried away to Nineveh. Meanwhile the land was overrun and the capital doomed to destruction, as the prophets had declared.

Not without a stubborn resistance on the part of her defenders did "the fortress cease from Ephraim" (Isa 17 3). It was only after a three years' siege that the Assyrians captured the city (2 K 17 5). If we had only the record of the Hebrew historian we should suppose that Shalmaneser was the monarch to whom fell the rewards and honors of the capture. Before the surrender of the city Shalmaneser had abdicated or died, and Sargon, only once mentioned in Scripture (Isa 20 1), but one of the greatest of Assyrian monarchs, had ascended the throne. From his numerous inscriptions, recovered from the ruins of Khorsabad, we learn that he, and not Shalmaneser, was the king who completed the conquest of the revolted kingdom and deported the inhabitants to Assyria. "In the beginning [of my reign]," says Sargon in his Annals, "the city Samaria [I took] with the help of Shamash, who secures victory to me. . . . 27,290 people inhabitants of it [I took away captive; 50 chariots the property of my royalty, which were in it I appropriated. [. . . the city] I restored, and more than before I caused it to be inhabited; people of the lands conquered by my hand in it [I caused to dwell. My governor over them I appointed, and tribute] and imposts just as upon the Assyrians I laid upon them." The Assyrian Annals and the Scripture history support and supplement each other at this point. The sacred historian describes the deportation as follows: "The king of Assyria took Samaria, and carried Israel away into Assyria, and placed them in Halah, and on the Habor, the river of Gozan, and in the cities of the Medes . . . because they obeyed not the voice of Jeh their God, but transgressed his covenant, even all that Moses, the servant of Jeh, commanded, and would not hear it, nor do it" (2 K 17 6,7; 18 11,12). The re-

6. Depopulation and Repopulation of Samaria population of the conquered territory is also described by the sacred historian: "And the king of Assyria brought men from Babylon, and from Cuthah, and from Avva, and from Hamath and Sepharvaim, and placed them in the cities of Samaria instead of the children of Israel; and they possessed Samaria, and dwelt in the cities thereof" (2 K 17 24). The fact that Sargon introduced foreign settlers taken in war into Samaria is attested by inscriptions. That there were various episodes of deportation and repopulation in connection with the captivity of the Northern Kingdom appears to be certain. We have seen already that Tiglath-pileser III deported the population of the northern tribes to Assyria and placed over the depopulated country governors of his own. And at a time considerably later, we learn that Sargon's grandson Esarhaddon, and his great-grandson Ashur-bani-pal, "the great and noble Osnappar," imported to the region of Samaria settlers of nations conquered by them in the East (Ezr 4 2,10). Of the original settlers, whom a priest, carried away by the king of Assyria but brought back to Bethel, taught "the law of the god of the land," it is said that "they feared Jehovah, and served their own gods, after the manner of the nations from among whom they had been carried away" (2 K 17 33). The hybrid stock descended from those settlers is known to us in later history and in the Gospels as the Samaritans.

We must not suppose that a clean sweep was made of the inhabitants of the Northern Kingdom. No doubt, as in the Bab captivity, "the poorest of the land were left to be vine-dressers and husbandmen" (2 K 25 12). The numbers actually deported were but a moiety of the whole population. But the kingdom of the Ten Tribes was now at an end. Israel had become an Assyrian province, with a governor established in Samaria. As regards the Golah—the captives of Israel in the cities of the Medes—it must not be supposed that they became wholly absorbed in the population among whom they were settled. We can well believe that they preserved their Israelitish traditions and usages with sufficient clearness and tenacity, and that they became part of the Jewish dispersion so widespread throughout the East. It is quite possible that at length they blended with the exiles of Judah carried off by Nebuchadnezzar, and that then Judah and Ephraim became one nation as never before. The name Jew, therefore, naturally came to include members of what had earlier been the Northern Confederacy of Israel as well as those of the Southern Kingdom to which it properly belonged, so that in the post-exilic period, Jehudi, or Jew, means an adherent of Judaism without regard to local nationality.

II. Of the Southern Kingdom (Judah).—The captivity of Judah was the work of the great Chaldean power seated at Babylon on the Euphrates. While the Northern Kingdom had new dynasties to rule it in quick succession, Judah and Jerus remained true to the House of David to the end. The Southern Kingdom rested on a firmer foundation, and Jerus with its temple and priesthood secured the throne against the enemies who overthrew Samaria for nearly a cent. and a half longer.

Sargon, who captured Samaria in 722 BC, was followed by monarchs with a great name as conquerors and builders and patrons of lit., Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, Ashurbanipal. When Ashurbanipal died in 625 BC, the dissolution of the Assyrian Empire was not far off. Its hold over the West had greatly slackened, and the tributary peoples were breaking out into revolt. Bands of Scythians,

1. Break-up of Assyria a nomad Aryan race, from the region between the Caucasus and the Caspian, were sweeping through the Assyrian Empire as far as Pal and Egypt, and the prophecies of Jeremiah and Zephaniah reflect their methods of warfare and fierce characteristics. They were driven back, however, at the frontier of Egypt, and appear to have returned to the North without invading Judah.

From the North these hordes were closing in upon Nineveh, and on all sides the Assyrian power was being weakened. In the "Burden

2. Downfall of Nineveh, the prophet Nahum of Nineveh, foreshadows the joy of the kingdom of 606 BC

Judah at the tidings of its approaching downfall: "Behold, upon the mountains the feet of him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace! Keep thy feasts, O Judah, perform thy vows; for the wicked one shall no more pass through thee; he is utterly cut off" (Nah 1 15; cf 3 8-11). The Medes regained their independence and under their king, Cyaxares, formed an alliance with the Chaldeans, who soon afterward revolted under the leadership of Nabopolassar, viceroy of Babylon. Rallying these various elements to his standard Nabopolassar laid siege to the Assyrian capital, and in 606 BC, Nineveh, which had been the capital city of great conquerors, and had "multiplied [her] merchants above the stars of heaven" (Nah 3 16), fell before the combined forces of the Medes and Chaldeans, fell suddenly and finally, to rise no more. Of the new Babylonian Empire upon which the Chaldeans now entered, Nebuchadnezzar, whose father Nabopolassar had associated him with him on the throne, was the first and most eminent ruler.

That the people of Judah should exult in the overthrow of Nineveh and the empire for which it stood we can well understand. Jerus

3. Pharaoh Necoh's himself had by God's mercy remained unconquered when Sennacherib nearly Revolt a cent. before had carried off from the surrounding country 200,150 people and had devastated the towns and fortresses near. But the hateful Assyrian yoke had rested upon Judah to the end, and not upon Judah only but even upon Egypt and the valley of the Nile. In 608 BC Pharaoh Necoh revolted from his Assyrian suzerain and resolved upon an eastern campaign. He had no desire to quarrel with Josiah of Judah, through whose territory he must pass; but in loyalty to his Assyrian suzerain Josiah threw himself across the path of the Egyptian invader and perished in the battle of Megiddo. The Pharaoh seems to have returned to Egypt, taking Jehoahaz the son of Josiah with him, and to have appointed his brother Jehoiakim king of Judah, and to have exacted a heavy tribute from the land.

But he did not desist from his purpose to win an eastern empire. Accordingly he pressed forward

4. Defeat at Carchemish, he was completely routed by the Babylonian army under Nebuchadnezzar in the decisive battle of Carchemish, 604 BC.

604 BC The battle left the Chaldeans undisputed masters of Western Asia, and Judah exchanged the yoke of Assyria for that of Babylon.

So far as cruelty was concerned, there was little to choose between the new tyrants and the old oppressors. Of the Chaldeans Habakkuk, who flourished at the commencement of the new Empire, says: "They are terrible and dreadful. . . . Their horses also are swifter than leopards, and are more fierce than the evening wolves; and their horsemen spread themselves: yea, their horsemen come from far; they fly as an eagle that hasteth to devour" (Hab 1 7,8 ARV).

5. The New Babylonian Empire under Nebuchadnezzar, 604-562 BC Over Western Asia, including Judah, Nebuchadnezzar since the battle of Carchemish was supreme. It was vain for Judah to coquet with Egypt when Nebuchadnezzar had a long and powerful arm with which to inflict chastisement upon his disloyal subjects.

The mission of Jeremiah the prophet in this crisis of the history of Judah was to preach obedience and loyalty to the king of Babylon, and moral reformation as the only means of escaping the Divine vengeance impending upon land and people. He tells them in the name of God of the great judgment that was to come at the hand of the Chaldeans on Jerusalem and surrounding peoples. He even predicts the period of their subjection to Chaldean domination: "And this whole land shall be a desolation, and an astonishment; and these nations shall serve the king of Babylon seventy years" (Jer 25 11). This preaching was unpalatable to the partisans of Egypt and to those who believed in the inviolability of Jerusalem. But with stern rebuke and with symbolic action he proclaims the doom of Jerusalem, and in the face of persecution and at the risk of his life, the prophet fulfils his ministry.

Jehoiakim, who was first the vassal of Pharaoh Necoh, and then of Nebuchadnezzar, was in corruption and wickedness too faithful

6. Revolt and Punishment of Jehoiakim, 608-597 BC a representative of the people. Jeremiah charges him with covetousness, the shedding of innocent blood, oppression and violence (Jer 22 13-19).

The fourth year of Jehoiakim was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, who, fresh from the victory of Carchemish, was making his sovereignty felt in the western world. The despicable king of Judah became Nebuchadnezzar's vassal and continued in his allegiance three years, after which he turned and rebelled against him. But he received neither encouragement nor help from the neighboring peoples. "Jehovah sent against him bands of the Chaldeans, and bands of the Syrians, and bands of the Moabites, and bands of the children of Ammon, and sent them against Judah to destroy it, according to the word of Jehovah, which he spake by his servants the prophets" (2 K 24 2). The history of the latter part of Jehoiakim's reign is obscure. The Hebrew historian says that after a reign of eleven years he slept with his fathers, from which we infer that he died a natural death. From Daniel we learn that in the third year of Jehoiakim, Nebuchadnezzar came up against Jerusalem and besieged it, and carried off, along with vessels of the house of God, members of the seed royal, and of the nobility of Judah, among whom was Daniel the prophet. That Jehoiakim was included in what seems to be a first instalment of the captivity of Judah is expressly affirmed by the Chronicler who says: "Against him [Jehoiakim] came up Nebuchadnezzar . . . and bound him in fetters, to carry him to Babylon" (2 Ch 36 6). However the facts really stand, the historian adds to the record of the death of Jehoiakim and of the succession of Jehoiachin the significant comment: "And the king of Egypt came not again any more out of this land; for the king of Babylon had taken, from the brook of Egypt unto the river Euphrates, all that pertained to the king of Egypt" (2 K 24 7).

Jehoiachin who succeeded Jehoiakim reigned only three months, the same length of time as his unfortunate predecessor Jehoahaz (2 K 23 31). The captivity of Jehoahaz in Egypt and the captivity of Jehoiachin in Babylon are lamented in a striking elegy by Ezekiel, who compares them to young lions, the offspring of the mother lioness Israel, which learned to catch their prey and devoured men, but were taken in the pit of the nations and put in rings, so that their roar was no more heard in the mountains of Israel (Ezk 19 1-9). Nebuchadrezzar came in person while his servants were besieging Jerus, and Jehoiachin surrendered at discretion. So the king and his mother and his servants and his princes and his officers were carried off with the mighty men of valor, even ten thousand captives. 'None remained, save the poorest sort of the people of the land. He carried out thence all the treasures of the house of Jehovah, and the treasures of the king's house, and cut in pieces all the vessels of gold, which Solomon king of Israel had made in the temple of Jehovah, as Jehovah had said. And all the men of might, even seven thousand, and the craftsmen and the smiths a thousand, all of them strong and apt for war, even them the king of Babylon brought captive to Babylon. And the king of Babylon made Mattaniah, Jehoiachin's father's brother, king in his stead, and changed his name to Zedekiah' (2 K 24 10-17). From Jehoiachin dates the carrying away into Babylon, the year being 597 BC. The unfortunate monarch lived in exile in Babylon 38 years, and seems to have retained the respect and loyalty of the exiles among whom he dwelt.

8. First Deportation, 597 BC

It was with reference to the deportation of the princes and craftsmen and smiths that Jeremiah had his vision of the baskets of figs—one containing figs very good, like the first ripe figs; the other very bad, so bad they could not be eaten (Jer 24 1-3). The good figs were the captives of Judah carried away into the land of the Chaldaeans for good; the bad figs were the king Zedekiah and his princes and the residue of Jerus, upon whom severe judgments were yet to fall till they were consumed from off the land (vs 4-10).

Among the captives thus carried to Babylon and placed on the banks of the Chebar was the priest-prophet Ezekiel. Five years after the captivity he began to have his wonderful "visions" of God, and to declare their import to the exiles by the rivers of Babylon. To the desponding captives who were engrossed with thoughts of the kingdom of Judah, not yet dissolved, and of the Holy City, not yet burned up with fire, Ezekiel could only proclaim by symbol and allegory the destruction of city and nation, till the day when the distressing tidings reached them of its complete overthrow. Then to the crushed and despairing captives he utters no lamentations like those of Jeremiah, but rather joyful predictions of a rebuilt city, of a reconstituted kingdom, and of a renovated and glorious temple.

Although the flower of the population had been carried away into Babylon and the Temple had been despoiled of its treasures, Jerus and the Temple still stood. To the inhabitants who were left behind, and to the captives in Babylon, Jeremiah had a message. To the latter he offered counsels of submission and contentment, assured that the hateful and repulsive idolatries around them would throw them back upon the law of their God, and thus promote the work of moral and spiritual regeneration within them. "Thus saith Jeh, I will give them a heart to know me, that I am Jehovah:

and they shall be my people, and I will be their God; for they shall return unto me with their whole heart' (Jer 24 5.7). To "the residue of Jerus" his counsels and predictions were distasteful, and exposed him to the suspicion of disloyalty to his people and his God. None of his warnings was more impressive than that symbolically proclaimed by the bands and bars which the prophet was to put upon his neck to send to the kings of Edom and Moab and Ammon and Tyre and Sidon, who seem to have had ideas of forming an alliance against Nebuchadrezzar. Zedekiah was also urged to submit, but still entertained hopes that the king of Babylon would allow the captives of Judah to return. He even himself went to Babylon, perhaps summoned thither by his suzerain (Jer 51 59). With an Egypt party in Jerus urging an alliance with Egypt, and with a young and warlike Pharaoh on the throne, Hophra (Apries), Zedekiah deemed the opportunity favorable for achieving independence, and entered into an intrigue with the Egypt king. So Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon (2 K 24 20).

It was a bold throw, but Nebuchadrezzar would brook no such disloyalty from his vassals. He marched at once to the West, and committed to Nebuzaradan the task of capturing Jerus, while he himself established his headquarters at Riblah, in Syria, on the Orontes. Meanwhile the Pharaoh with his army crossed the frontier to the help of his allies, and compelled the Chaldaeans to raise the siege of Jerus and meet him in the field (Jer 37 5). But here his courage failed him, and he retired in haste without offering battle. Nebuzaradan now led back his army and the siege became closer than before.

During the breathing-space afforded by the withdrawal of the Chaldaeans, Jeremiah was going out of the city to his native Anathoth, some 4 miles to the N.E. across the ridge, on family business (Jer 37 11-15). His departure was observed, and he was charged with falling away to the Chaldaeans, and cast into an improvised dungeon in the house of Jonathan the scribe. While there the king sent for him and asked, "Is there any word from Jehovah?" And Jeremiah answered fearlessly, "There is. Thou shalt be delivered into the hand of the king of Babylon." For a time Jeremiah, by the favor of Zedekiah, enjoyed after this a greater measure of freedom; but as he continued to urge in hearing of all the people the duty of surrender, his enemies vowed that he should be put to death, and had him cast into a foul empty cistern, where he ran the risk of being choked or starved to death. Once again the king sought an interview with the prophet, giving him private assurance that he would not put him to death nor allow his enemies to do so. Again the prophet counseled surrender, and again he was allowed a measure of freedom.

But the end of the doomed city was at hand. In the 11th year of Zedekiah, 586 BC, in the 4th month, the 9th day of the month, a breach was made in the city (Jer 39 1.2), and the final assault completed Jerusalem, the work that had been done by months of famine and want. Zedekiah and his men of war do not seem to have waited for the delivery of the last assault. They fled from the city by night "by the way of the king's garden, through the gate betwixt the two walls," and made eastward for the Arabah. But the army of the Chaldaeans pursued them, and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho. They took him prisoner and brought him to Nebuchadrezzar at Riblah, where the king of Babylon first slew the son of Zedekiah, and then put out his eyes. With the sons of the captured monarch were slain all the nobles of Judah. This time neither city nor temple nor palace was spared. Nebuzaradan "burnt the house of Jeh, and the king's house; and all the houses of Jerus, even every great house, burnt he with fire" (2 K 25 9). His soldiers, too, broke down the walls of Jerus round about. The treasure and the costly furnishings of the Temple, in so far as they had escaped the former spoliation, were carried away to Babylon. The ruin of Jerus was complete. The Book of Lamentations utters the grief and shame and penitence of an eyewitness of the captures and desolation of the Holy City: "Jehovah hath accomplished his wrath, he hath poured out his fierce anger; and he hath kindled a fire in Zion, which hath devoured the foundations thereof. The kings of the earth believed not, neither all the inhabitants of the world, that the adversary and the enemy would enter into the gates of Jerus. Woe unto us! for we have sinned. For this our heart is faint; for these things our eyes are dim; for the mountain of Zion, which is desolate: the foxes walk upon it" (Lam 4 11.12; 5 16.18).

"So Judah," says the prophet who had been through the siege and the capture (if not rather the editor of his prophecies), "was carried 13. Second away captive out of his land" (Jer Deporta- 52 27). The statements of the num-tion, 581 BC bers carried away are, however, con-586 BC flicting. In Jer (52 28-30) we read of three deportations: that of 597 BC when 3,023 Jews were carried off; that of 586 BC when Nebuchadrezzar carried off 832 persons; and one later than both in 581 BC, when tion, 581 BC In 2 K 24 15.16 it is said that in 597

Nebuchadrezzar carried to Babylon

8,000 men. Dr. George Adam Smith taking all the data together estimates that the very highest figures possible are 62,000 or 70,000 men, women and children, less than half of the whole nation (Jerusalem, II, 268-70). In 597 BC, Nebuchadrezzar carried off the princes and nobles and craftsmen and smiths, leaving behind the poorest sort of the people of the land (2 K 24 14). In 586 BC Nebuzaradan carried off the residue of the people that were left in the city, but he "left of the poorest of the land to be vinedressers and husbandmen" (2 K 25 12). "They were, as the Bib. narratives testify, the poorest of the land, from whom every man of substance and energy had been sifted; mere groups of peasants, without a leader and without a center; disorganized and depressed; bitten by hunger and compassed by enemies; uneducated and an easy prey to the heathenism by which they were surrounded. We can appreciate the silence which reigns in the Bible regarding them, and which has misled us as to their numbers. They were a negligible quantity in the religious future of Israel: without initiative or any influence except that of a dead weight upon the efforts of the rebuilders of the nation, when these at last returned from Babylonia" (Jerusalem, II, 269-70).

Over those who were left behind, Gedaliah was appointed governor, with his residence at Mizpah, where also a Bab contingent remained 15. Geda- on guard. Jeremiah had the choice liah, Gov- of being taken to Babylon or of reernor of maining in Judah. He preferred to Judah remain with the residue of the people under the care of Gedaliah. With the murder of Gedaliah by Ishmael, a traitorous scion of the royal house, who in turn had to flee and made good his escape, it looked as if the last trace of the former kingdom of Judah was wiped out. Against the counsel of Jeremiah, the remnant, led by Johanan the son of Kareah, resolved to take refuge in Egypt and insisted that Jeremiah and his friend Baruch should accompany them. It is in Egypt, amid disappointment and misrepresentation which he had to endure, that we have our last glimpse of the prophet of the downfall of Judah. Of the descendants of those settlers in Egypt remarkable remains have been discovered within the last few years. They consist of Aram. papyri which were found at Assouan, the ancient Syene, and which belong to a time not more than a cent. after the death of Jeremiah. The documents are accounts and contracts and deeds of various kinds, from which we gather that in the 5th cent. BC there were Jews keeping themselves apart as they do still, worshipping Jeh, and no other God, and even having a temple and an altar of sacrifice to which they brought offerings as their fathers did at Jerus before the destruction of the Temple. These papyri give us valuable glimpses of the social condition and religious interest of the settlers. See DISPERSION.

Of the Jewish captives carried off by Nebuchadrezzar and settled by the rivers of Babylon, we learn something from the prophecies

16. The of Daniel which are now generally
Exiles in believed to belong to the Maccabean Babylon period, and much from the prophecies of Ezekiel, from the Psalms of the Captivity, and from the Second Isaiah, whose glowing messages of encouragement and comfort were inspired by the thought of the Return. From Haggai and Zechariah we see how the work of rebuilding the Temple was conceived and carried out. Of the social condition of the Exiles an interesting revelation is given by the excavations at Nippur. From cuneiform tablets, now in the Imperial Ottoman Museum at Constantinople, preserved among the business archives of the wealthy firm of Murashu, sons of Nippur, in the reign of Artaxerxes I and Darius II (464-405 BC), there can be read quite a number of Jewish names. And the remarkable thing is that many of the names are those known to us from the genealogical and other lists of the Books of K and Ch and Ezr and Neh. Professor Hilprecht (The Babylonian Expedition, IX, 13 ff) infers from an examination of these that a considerable number of the Jewish exiles, carried away by Nebuchadrezzar after the destruction of Jerus, were settled in Nippur and its neighborhood. Of this fact there are various proofs. The Talmudic tradition which identifies Nippur with Calneh (Gen 10 10) gains new force in the light of these facts. And "the river Khebar in the land of the Chaldeans," by which Ezekiel saw his vision, is now known from inscriptions to be a large navigable canal not far from Nippur (ib, 27.28).

The influence of the Captivity as a factor in the development of Judaism can hardly be overestimated. "The captivity of Judah," 17. The says Dr. Foakes-Jackson (Biblical Rise and History of the Hebrews, 316) "is one Develop- of the greatest events in the history ment of of religion. . . . With the captivity Judaism the history of Israel ends, and the history of the Jews commences." Placed in the midst of heathen and idolatrous surroundings the Golah recoiled from the abominations of their neighbors and clung to the faith of their fathers in the God of Abraham. Exposed to the taunts and the scorn of nations that despised them, they formed an inner circle of their own, and cultivated that exclusiveness which has marked them ever since. Being without a country, without a ritual system, without any material basis for their life as a people, they learned as never before to prize those spiritual possessions which had come down to them from the past. They built up their nationality in their new surroundings upon the foundation of their religion. Their prophets, Jeremiah and Ezekiel, had encouraged and stimulated them with the assurance of spiritual blessings, and the promise of restoration. For their whole social and domestic and spiritual life there was needed some steady and continuous regulative principle or scheme. The need of this threw their leaders and thinkers back upon the Law of Moses. The rabbi and the scribe took the place of the sacrificing priest. The synagogue and the Sabbath came to occupy a new place in the religious practice of the people. These and other institutions of Judaism only attained to maturity after the Return, but the Captivity and the Exile created the needs they were meant to supply. While the prophets were clear and explicit in setting forth the Captivity, they were not less so in predicting the Return. Isaiah with his doctrine of the Remnant, Micah, Zephaniah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel and others gifted with the vision of God, cheered the nation, each in their day, with the hope of restoration and return, not for Judah only but for Israel as well. Vineyards were to be planted again upon the mountains of Samaria as well as in the valleys of Judah. Jeremiah had even predicted the length of the period of the Exile, when he declared that the inhabitants of the land should serve the king of Babylon for seventy years (Jer 25 12; 29 10).

It was in Cyrus, who brought about the fall of Babylon and ended the New Babylonian Empire

18. The Return by Permission of Cyrus,

in 539 BC, that the hopes of the exiles came to be centered. He was "the battle-axe" with which Jeh was to shatter Babylon (Jer 51 20), and as he proceeded on his path of victory the unknown Seer whom we call the Second Isaiah welcomed him as the liberator of his people. "Thus saith Jehovah . . . of Jerus, She shall be inhabited; and of the cities of Judah, They shall be built, and I will raise up the waste places thereof; that saith to the deep, Be dry, and I will dry up thy rivers; that saith of Cyrus, He is my shepherd, and shall perform all my pleasure, even saying of Jerus, She shall be built; and of the temple, Thy foundation shall be laid" (Isa 44 26-28).

Within a year of the entry of Cyrus into Babylon an edict was issued (2 Ch 36 22,23; Ezr 1 1 ff), granting permission to the exiles to return and build a house for the Lord in Jerus. He also brought forth the vessels of the Temple which Nebuchadrezzar had carried away and handed them over to Sheshbazzar, the prince of Judah; and Sheshbazzar brought them with him when they of the Captivity were brought up from Babylon unto Jerus.

ing of the

Particulars of the Return are given in the Books of Ezr and Neh, and in the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah. Of the exiles 42,360 returned under Sheshbazzar, besides slaves; and under Jeshua the son of Jozadak the priest, and Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, first an altar was built and then the foundations of the Temple were laid. In consequence of the opposition of the Samaritans, who were refused any share in the restoration of the Temple, the work of rebuilding was greatly hindered, and came to a stop. It was then that Haggai and Zechariah urged the resumption of the work and partly by denouncing the niggardliness of the people and partly by foreshadowing the glorious future in store for the Temple, hastened forward the enterprise. At length in the month Adar, in the 6th year of Darius (515 BC) the work was completed and the Passover celebrated within the courts of the restored Sanctuary (Ezr 6 15-18).

For some decades the history is silent, and it was in 458 BC that Ezra set out for Jerus taking 1,800 Jews along with him. He found that forms and

Ezra and Nehemiah

the returned Jews had become allied in marriage with the people of the land and were in danger of losing their racial characteristics by absorption among the heathen (Ezr 9). It was due no doubt to his efforts and those of Nehemiah, supported by the searching and powerful utterances of Malachi, that this peril was averted. Thirteen years later (445 BC) Nehemiah, the cupbearer of Artaxerxes, having heard of the desolate condition of the Holy City, the place of his fathers' sepulchers, obtained leave of his master to visit Jerus. With letters to the governors on the route and to the keeper of the king's forest, he set out, and came safely to Jerus. Having himself inspected the walls he called the people to the work of repairing the ruins, and despite the taunts and calumny and active hostility of the Sam opposition he had the satisfaction of seeing the work completed, the gates set up and the city reepeople. Nehemiah and Ezra then gathered the people together to hear the words of the Law, and at a solemn convocation the Law was read and explained to the assembly. Thereafter a covenant was entered into by the people that they would observe the Law of Moses and not intermarry with the heathen nor traffic on the Sabbath, but would pay a third of a shekel annually for the services of the Temple and would bring first-fruits and tithes (Neh 10 23 ff).

The course of the history as here set forth has been disputed by some modern scholars, who hold that there was no return of the exiles

21. Modern under Cyrus and that the rebuilding of Theories of the Temple was the work of the Jews the Return who remained behind in Judah and Jerus (EB, art. "Ezra-Nehemiah").

This view, held by the late Professor Koster of Leyden and supported by Professor H. P. Smith and other scholars, proceeds largely upon the rejection of the historical character of the Book of Ezr-Neh. The historical difficulties which are found in the book are by no means such as to warrant us in denying the fact of the Return and the work of Ezra in connection with Nehemiah. As regards the Return, the course of the narrative is too well supported by documents which bear upon them the stamp of historical truth to be rashly disputed. Moreover, it seems highly improbable that an enterprise requiring such energy and skill and faith should have been undertaken, without stimulus from without, by the residue of the people. We have already seen how little initiative was to be expected of the poorest of the people; and the silence of Haggai, on the subject of the Return, is no argument against it. That the Judaism of Pal required invigoration by an infusion of the zeal and enthusiasm which grew up in the Judaism of Bab, is manifest from the story of the Captivity.

From the age of Nehemiah and the period immediately preceding it came influences of the utmost moment for the future. "Within these

During this period the Judaea of the days of Our Lord came into being. Within this period the forces which opposed Christ, the forces which rallied to His side, had their origin. This cent. saw the rise of parties, which afterward became sects under the names of Pharisees and Sadducees. It laid the foundation of Rabbinism. CARABASION, kar-a-bā'zi-on (Παράσιων, Rhabastōn, Καπαπασιων, Karabastōn; Marimoth): One of the sons of Baani (1 Esd 9 34) who had married foreign wives, during the captivity. The name is allowed to be corrupt; it seems to be represented by Meremoth in the list of Ezr 10 36.

CARAVAN, kar'a-van, kar-a-van' (אָרָה, 'ōrah): This word is not found in AV, but RV employs it three times, viz. in Job 6 18, 19 ('orhōth), where AV renders "paths" (ver 18) and "troops" (ver 19); in Isa 21 13 ('ōr'hōth), where AV and EV give "travelling companies," and in Ezk 27 25 (shārōth), where AV gives a totally different tr. The Heb text in Ezk is dubious, but in Isa and Job "caravan" is undoubtedly a correct rendering of the Heb (cf also Gen 37 25). The inhabitants of Pal were familiar with the caravans—the goods trains of the Sem world—which traveled between Babylon and Syria on the one hand to Arabia and on the other to Egypt. The main routes between these countries passed through Canaan. Isaiah refers to "caravans of Jedanites"—a trading Arab. tribe who conveyed their wares to Babylon. Job compares his would-be friends to a deceitful brook, full in the rainy season, but dry in summer, which entices caravans to turn aside from the main route in the hope of a plentiful supply of water, but which fails the thirsty travelers when they need it most.

CARCAS, kār'kas (כַּרְכָּס, karkas): One of seven chamberlains, ordered to summon Queen Vashti before King Ahasuerus (Est 1 10). The Targ alle-gorizes the first five of the names.

CARCASS, CARCASE, kār'kas: The dead body of a beast; used sometimes in a contemptuous way of the dead body of a human being. The use of the word as applied to a living body is not found in either OT or NT. (1) It occurs as a tr of the Heb פֶּגֶר, pegher, in Gen 15 11; this Heb word is also tr'd "dead body" in Nu 14 29; 1 S 17 46; Isa 34 3; 66 24; Ezk 6 5; 43 7, 9, and "corpse" in Nah 3 3. (2) The Heb נֶבֶלָה, nbhelāh, is also tr'd "carcass" in Lev 5 2; 11 8, 11; Jer 16 18, but as "dead body" in Dt 28 26 ("body," Josh 8 29; 1 K 13 22, 29; 2 K 9 37); Isa 5 25; Jer 7 33; 16 4; 19 7. (3) In Jgs 14 8 the word מַפְּלָה, mappēlāh, from נָפַל, nāphal, "to incline" or "fall," is also tr'd "carcass." (4) In Mt 24 28 the word "carcase" (not "carcass") is used to render the Gr πτώμα, ptōma, the reference probably being here to the dead body of an animal. For the body of a human being the Gr is tr'd "corpse" (Mt 14 12; Mk 6 29; 15 45), and "dead bodies" (Rev 11 8, 9).

CARCHEMISH, kār'ke-mish (כַּרְכֵּמִישׁ, karkemish; Xappels, Charmels, Καρχαμῆλς, Karchameis): An exceedingly ancient Hittite city on the banks of the Euphrates, identified with Jerablus (Hierapolis) about 23 hours from Aleppo, between Birejik and Membij. The Assyri form of the name is Kargamış or Gargamış, but its meaning is doubtful, the interpretation "Fort of the god Chemosh" having been suggested before it was known that the Assyri-Bab form of Chemosh was not Kamish or Gamish, but Kammusu (Kammusu). Systematic excavations on the site have apparently only just been made, those undertaken by Consul J. Henderson, after the death of G. Smith the Assyriologist, having been mainly devoted to the excavation of sculptures, etc. The site has vast walls and palace-mounds about 8,000 ft. in circumference.

The earliest occurrence of the name is in an adjectival form, namely, Karkamışū, "Carchemishite," applied to a vase or measure of 200 ga, in a list of property at Sippar in the reign of Ammi-šaduga (cir 1900 BC). Later on, the Egypt

1. Evidence poet known as Pentaur refers to the of the people of Carchemish (Qarqameša) as City's Early forming, with the men of Arvad, Existence Aleppo and Gozan, part of "the host of the miserable king of the Hittites" (Ḫattu-šil), who fought against Rameses II at the battle of Kadesh. The first Assyrian king to mention Carchemish is Tiglath-pileser I (cir 1268 BC), who states that he plundered "from the neighborhood of the land of Suhū [the Shuhites] as far as Carchemish of the land of Ḫattu" in one day.

Later, the city attracted the attention of the Assyrian king Aššur-naṣir-āpli, who started on the 8th of Iyyar, about the year 870 BC,

2. Its Later to the conquest of the district, and History received tribute from the son of Bit-Bahiani; and, a little later, from Sangara of Carchemish, who is described as king of the Hittites. This tribute consisted of 20 talents of silver, various objects of gold, 100 talents of copper, 250 talents of iron, furniture, chariots and horses—an enormous treasure. Shalmaneser II, son of Aššur-naṣir-āpli, also took tribute from the king of Carchemish here referred to. On the first occasion when the two monarchs met, Sangara was in alliance with the Sam'alians, Patinians, and Til-Bursip. After the capture of Šazabē (858 BC), a strong city of Sangara of Carchemish, all the opposing princes submitted. The tribute paid by the Hittite king on this occasion is depicted on strip F of the bronze coverings of the gates of Balawāt, which has four representations of the place—two in the upper and two in the lower row of reliefs. The Kurkh monolith states that the tribute consisted of "2 talents of gold, 70 talents of silver, 80 talents of bronze, 100 talents of iron, 30 talents of purple stuff, 500 weapons, his daughter with a dowry, and 100 daughters of his great men, 500 oxen, and 5,000 sheep." A yearly tax was also imposed. The reliefs show two long trains of tribute-bearers, that in the lower row escorting the princess, who, apparently accompanied by her father, goes to meet the Assyrian king. Šamši-Adad, Shalmaneser II's son, merely mentions Carchemish as being on the western limits of his empire.

In the time of Tiglath-pileser IV, the city was ruled by King Pisiri(s), who paid tribute as an Assyrian vassal. On the accession of

3. Tiglath-pileser IV Sargon of Assyria, however, Pisiris Receives tried to throw off the Assyrian yoke, and made alliance with Meta of Moschi (Mesech) and other rulers, but was taken prisoner in the operations which followed. In the subsequent plundering of the city, those who suffered most were the inhabitants of the city who had been most active

Its Tribute, and Sargon of Assyria against Assyria. These were carried captive, and their places filled, as was the custom, by Assyrian settlers. The city's importance under Assyrian rule continued, the "mana of Carchemish" being one of the standard weights in use at Nineveh. After incorporation into the Assyrian empire it was ruled by Assyrian governors, one of whom, Bēl-ēmuranni, was eponym for the year 691 BC (reign of Sen-nacherib). The OT gives later details. In the time of Josiah, Pharaoh Necho marched to fight against the city, and the Jewish king went out to meet him, but lost his life at Megiddo (2 Ch 35 20 ff). Four years later (605 BC), the Egyptian king was himself defeated by Nebuchadnezzar under the walls of the city (Jer 46 2) in the battle which decided the fate of Western Asia.

The art of Carchemish was that of the Hittite nation to which the city belonged, but it was strongly influenced by the style of the Assyrians, and exhibits a mannerism if anything more pronounced. The inscriptions found on the site are in the usual Hittite style—boldly carved natural objects and implements in relief arranged in boustrophedon-bands between division-lines. It is not improbable, however, that cuneiform was also used, and texts in Phoenician characters may, by chance, be found. The patron-deity of the city was the Asiatic goddess Atargatis, whose worship, when the place lost its importance, was removed to the new Hierapolis now represented by the ruins of Membij.

T. G. PINCHES

CARE, kâr, CAREFULNESS, kâr'fool-ness, CAREFUL, kâr'fool: The Eng. word "care" has such a variety of meanings, and so many Heb and Gr words in the Bible are tr'd by this Eng. expression and its compounds, that it is difficult to organize them into a single brief article. We may do so, however, by remembering that into our word are really woven two strands, one Teutonic and one Lat. The former element implies a measure of trouble or sorrow, as the pain from a blow, a throb, a distress in the mind; the latter, from Lat cura, implies a stretching forward, attention to some person or thing. We can often discern these two senses side by side in the Bible, and sometimes they almost run into one another. This is so esp. in the AV. We can treat the subject best by keeping separate, as far as possible, these two senses.

I. In the Sense of Anxiety, Solicitude.—In the OT several words are tr'd "care," in this sense.

1. Sub- "Thy father hath left off caring for the asses," concern about them lit. stantives "matters of the asses" (דִּבְחָרֵי, dibhrê, 1 S 10 2).

"They shall eat bread by weight, and with care" (דִּבְחָרֵי, dibhrê, "carefulness" RV; "fearfulness" ARV, Ezk 4 16). The same word is rendered carefulness (AV and RV; "fearfulness," ARV, Ezk 12 18-19); and "fear" (AV; "carefulness," RV and ARV, Josh 22 24). Again, "heaviness" (AV, RV and ARV), but "care" (RVm and ARVm, Prov 12 25). Once more, "sorrow" (AV, RV and ARV), but "care" (RVm and ARVm, Jer 49 23). There is also the word חָרָה, hārādhāh, "trembling," "fear," "anxiety." It is rendered "trembling" (Gen 27 33 AV). But "thou hast been careful for us with all this care" ("showed us all this reverence," RVm, ARVm, 2 K 4 13).

In the NT care, in the sense of anxiety, is the meaning given to μέριμνα, merimna, the condition of being drawn mentally in different directions, distraction of mind. "Care of the world" (Mt 13 22; Mk 4 19; Lk 8 14, "c. of this life," Lk 21 34); "care of all the churches" (2 Cor 11 28) ("anxiety," RV and ARV); "casting all your care upon him" ("anxiety," RV, ARV, 1 Pet 5 7). Also in the Apoc, "My heart faileth for care" (1 Macc 6 10); "Care bringeth old age before the time" (Sir 30 24). To these may be added the adj. ἀμέριμνος, "I would have you without carefulness" (AV; "free from cares," RV and ARV, 1 Cor 7 32).

In the OT (דָּאָג, dā'agh, "to have concern or anxiety for"). "Not be careful in the year of drought" (Jer 17 8). (שִׁים לֵב, šim lebh, "to set the heart upon"), "If we flee away, they will not care for us" ("set their heart upon us" AVm, 2 S 18 3).

In the NT (μεριμνάω, merimnaō), "Thou art careful and troubled" ("anxious" RV and ARV, Lk 10 41). "He that is unmarried careth for things that belong to the Lord" ("is careful for," RV and ARV, 1 Cor 7 32-34). "Members should have the same care one for another" (1 Cor 12 25). "Who will naturally care [ARV "care truly"] for your state" (Phil 2 20). "Be careful for nothing" ("in nothing be anxious," RV and ARV, Phil 4 6). The Apoc has "careful" (Bar 3 18) and the RV has "be not careful overmuch," where a distinction is plainly made between care in the sense of anxiety and of attention, for a person cannot be too attentive, but he may be too anxious (2 Esd 2 27).

The impersonal vb. (μέλει, mélei), though not quite so strong as merimnaō, always implies a degree of concern higher than is felt in mere attention. "Carest thou not that we perish?" (Mk 4 38). "Carest not for anyone" (AV "no man," Mt 22 16; Mk 12 14). "Dost thou not care that my sister did leave me to serve alone?" (Lk 10 40). "Careth not for the sheep" (Jn 10 13). "Cared for the poor" (Jn 12 6). "Gallio cared for none of these things" (Acts 18 17). "Care not for it" (1 Cor 7 21). "He careth for you" (1 Pet 5 7). "Doth God care for oxen?" (better, "Is it for the oxen that God careth?" RV and ARV, 1 Cor 9 9).

II. In the Sense of Attention.—In the sense of attention, with the flavor of earnestness added from the original Teutonic meaning of the word care, we have the tr of σπουδή, spoudē, "speed," "earnest care." "What carefulness it wrought in you" ("earnest care," RV, ARV, 2 Cor 7 11). "Our care for you in the sight of God" ("earnest care," RV, ARV, 2 Cor 7 12). "Put the same care into the heart of Titus" ("earnest care," RV, ARV, 2 Cor 8 16). We have also φρονεῖν, phronein, the infin. used as a subst. "Your care for me hath flourished" ("thought," RV, ARV, Phil 4 10). Also φροντίς, phrontis, "thought" ("care" ARV, Wisd 6 17; 7 4).

"A land which Jehovah thy God careth for" (דָּרַשׁ, dārash, "seek after") ("seeketh after," RVm, ARVm, Dt 11 12). "No man careth for my soul" ("sought" AVm, Ps 142 4; חָשַׁח, hāshah). "We are not careful to answer" (AV, AVm, ARVm; "We have no need to answer," RV, ARV, Dnl 3 16). In the NT ἐπιμελόμαι, epimelēomai, "Take care of him" (Lk 10 34-35). "How shall he take care of the church of God?" (1 Tim 3 5). φροντίζω, phrontizō, "to be thoughtful or mindful of," "may be careful to maintain good works" (Tit 3 8). G. H. TREVER

In the NT ἐπιμελόμαι, epimelēomai, "Take care of him" (Lk 10 34-35). "How shall he take care of the church of God?" CAREAH, ka-rē'a. See KAREAH.

CAREFUL, CAREFULNESS. See CARE.

CAREFULLY, kār'fōl-i: The same two strands of anxiety and of attention appear in this word as in care. Several words in the Heb and Gr are thus rendered in the Eng. VSS. "Anxiously" is the thought in "The inhabitants of Maroth waited carefully for good" (הָלַח, hālāh, "to be in pain," "was grieved" AVm, "waiteth anxiously" RV, ARV, "is in travail" RVm, ARVm, Mic 1 12).

In the sense of attentively, the Heb emphatic expression, the infinite absolute with the finite vb. is rendered "carefully" in, "Thou shalt carefully hearken" (lit. "hearing, thou shalt hear," "diligently hearken" RV, ARV, Dt 15 5). The same Heb is rendered "diligently hearken" AV; "hearken diligently" RV, ARV (Dt 11 13; 28 1).

In the NT σπουδαιότερος, spoudaiotēros, "I sent him the more carefully" ("diligently" RV, ARV, Phil 2 28). The vb. (ἐκζητέω, ekzēlēō, "I seek out," is tr^d "seek carefully": "though he sought it carefully with tears" ("diligently" RV, ARV, He 12 17).

RV adds others (ἀκριβῶς, akribōs, "I ascertain exactly"), "learned of them carefully" RV ("diligently" AV; "exactly" ARV, Mt 2 7.16). The adv. akribōs, "search out carefully" RV ("diligently" AV; "exactly" ARV, Mt 2 8). "Taught carefully" RV ("diligently" AV; "accurately" ARV, Acts 18 25). "More carefully" RV ("more perfectly" AV, "more accurately" ARV, Acts 18 26). ἑπισκοπέω, episkopēō, "I oversee," is rendered "look carefully" (RV, ARV, "look diligently" AV, He 12 15).

In the Apoc merimnāō is tr^d "carefully" as "We should carefully think of thy goodness" ("ponder" RV, Wisd 12 22). G. H. TREVER CARELESS, kār'les, CARELESSLY, kār'les-li: These words always mean, "without anxiety," the confidence springing from a sense of security. There is both the vb. בָּטַח, bāṭah, "he trusted," and the noun בְּטָחָה, betāh, "Ye careless daughters" (RVm "confident") (Isa 32 9-11). People dwelt careless ("in security" RV, ARV, Jgs 18 7); "careless Ethiopians" (Ezk 30 9). "Thou that dwellest carelessly" ("sittest securely" RV, ARV, Isa 47 8). "Thou that dwellest carelessly" ("securely" RV, ARV, "confidently" AVm, Ezk 39 6). "The city that dwelt carelessly" (Zeph 2 15). ARV and RV add בָּזָא, bāzāh, "he despised," using the participle in "He that is careless of his ways shall die," "despiseth" AV, ARVm, RVm (Prov 19 16).

CAREM, kā'rem (Καρέμ, Karém): A city of Judah interpolated by the LXX (Josh 15 59). Probably BETH-HACCHEREM (q.v.).

CARIA, kā'ri-a (Καρία, Karia): A country in the S.W. of Asia Minor which extended on the N. to Lydia, on the E. to Phrygia, on the S. to Lycia, and the W. to the Aegean Sea. Its borders, however, like those of most of the ancient countries of Asia Minor, were never definitely fixed; hence the difficulty presented by the study of the political divisions. The general surface of the country is rugged, consisting of mountainous ridges running across it, and terminating as promontories jutting into the sea. Its history consists chiefly of that of its practically independent cities of which Miletus (Acts 20 15-20) and Cnidus (Acts 27 7) are the chief. For some time previous to 168 BC it had lost its independence, and belonged to the island of Rhodes, but in that year Rome made it again free. According to 1 Macc 15 23, Caria was one of several places to which the Rom senate in 139-138 BC sent letters in favor of the Jews, a fact showing that its population was mixed. Its coast cities, however, were peopled chiefly by Greeks. In 129 BC Caria became a part of the Rom province of Asia, and from that date its history coincides with that of the province. Though Paul and others of the apostles traversed Caria in their missionary journeys, only its cities are mentioned by name in that connection. E. J. BANKS

CARITES, kar'i-tēz (קָרִי, kārī, "one ready," "life-guardsmen"): A body of troops mentioned in 2 K 11 4.19 (AV "captains"). Instead of CHERITHITES (q.v.), the Kethibh of 2 S 20 23 offers the reading Carites.

CARMANIANS, kār-mā'ni-anz. See CARMONIANS.

CARME, kār'mē. See CHARME.

CARMEL, kār'mel (כַּרְמֶל, or, with art., הַכַּרְמֶל, karmel, "fruit garden," or ha-karmel; Jos, ὁ Κάρμηλος, ho Kármēlos, Καρμήλιον ὄρος, Karmēlion óros):

(1) A beautifully wooded mountain range running for about 13 miles in a south-easterly direction from the promontory which drops on the shore of the Mediterranean near Haifa, at the southern extremity of the plain of Acre, to the height of el-Mahrakah which overlooks the plain of Esdraelon. On the top of the promontory, at a height of 500 ft. the monastery of St. Elias stands. From this point there is a gradual ascent until the greatest height is reached at Esfiyeh (1,742 ft.), the peak at el-Mahrakah being only some 55 ft. lower. The mountain—usually named with the art., "the Carmel"—still justifies its name, "the garden with fruit trees." The steep slopes on the N. and E., indeed, afford little scope for cultivation, although trees and brushwood grow abundantly. But to the S. and W. the mountain falls away to the sea and the plain in a series of long, fertile valleys, where the "excellency" of Carmel finds full illustration today. There are a few springs of good water; but the main supply is furnished by the winter rains, which are caught and stored in great cisterns. The villages on the slopes have a look of prosperity not too often seen in Syria, the rich soil amply rewarding the toil of the husbandmen. Oak and pine, myrtle and honeysuckle, box and laurel flourish; the sheen of fruitful olives fills many a hollow; and in the time of flowers Carmel is beautiful in a garment of many colors. Evidences of the ancient husbandry which made it famous are found in the cisterns, and the oil and wine presses cut in the surface of the rock. There is probably a reference to the vine culture here in 2 Ch 26 10. In the fig. language of Scripture it appears as the symbol of beauty (Cant 7 5), of fruitfulness (Isa 35 2), of majesty (Jer 46 18), of prosperous and happy life (ib, 50 19). The languishing of Carmel betokens the vengeance of God upon the land (Nah 1 4); and her decay, utter desolation (Am 1 2; Isa 33 9).

Roughly triangular in form, with plains stretching from its base on each of the three sides, the mountain, with its majestic form and massive bulk, is visible from afar. Its position deprived it of any great value for military purposes. It commanded none of the great highways followed by armies: the passes between Esdraelon and Sharon, to the E. of Carmel, furnishing the most convenient paths. But the mountain beckoned the fugitive from afar, and in all ages has offered asylum to the hunted in its caves and wooded glens. Also its remote heights with their spacious outlook over land and sea; its sheltered nooks and embowering groves have been scenes of worship from old time. Here stood an ancient altar of Jeh (1 K 18 30). We may assume that there was also a sanctuary of Baal, since the worshippers of these deities chose the place as common ground for the great trial (1 K 18). The scene is traditionally located at el-Mahrakah, "the place of burnt sacrifice," which is still held sacred by the Druzes. A Lat chapel stands near, with a great cistern. A good spring is found lower down the slope. Just below, on the N. bank of the Kishon stands the mound called Tell el-kissīs, "mound of the priest." From the crest of Carmel Elijah descried the coming storm, and, descending the mountain, ran before the chariot of Ahab to the gate of Jezreel (1 K 18 42 ff). Under the monastery on the western promontory is a cave, said to be that of Elijah. An older tradition locates the cave of the prophet at ed-Deir, near 'Ain es-Sih. It may have been the scene of the events narrated in 2 K 1 9 ff. Elisha also was a familiar visitor to Mt. Carmel. It was within the territory allotted to Asher; in later times it passed into the hands of Tyre (BJ, III, iii, 1).

(2) A city of Judah, in the uplands near Hebron, named with Maon and Ziph (Josh 15 55). Here Saul for some reason not stated set up a monument or trophy (1 S 15 12; lit. "hand"). It was the home of Nabal the churlish and drunken flock-master, whose widow Abigail David married (1 S 25); and also of Hezro, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 35; 1 Ch 11 37). It is represented by the modern el-Karmil, about 10 miles to the S.E. of Hebron. Karmil is the pronunciation given me by several natives this spring. There are considerable ruins, the most outstanding feature being a square tower dating from the 12th cent., now going swiftly to ruin. There are also caves, tombs and a large reservoir. W. EWING

CARMELITE, kār'mel-īt (כַּרְמֵלִי, karmēlī; Καρμήλιος, Karmēlios, Καρμηλίτης, Karmēlītēs): A native of the Judean Carmel. Those who are thus named are Nabal, the husband of Abigail (1 S 30 5, etc), and Hezro (AV Hezrai), one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 35). In 2 S 3 3 LXX reads tēs Abigaias tēs Karmēliās, "of Abigail the Carmelites" (1 S 27 3; 1 Ch 3 1). See following art., CARMELITESS.

CARMELITESS, kār'mel-it-es, kār-mel-ī'tes (כַּרְמֵלִית, karmēlīth; Καρμήλια, Karmēlia): A name applied only to Abigail, the wife of Nabal, and subsequently of David, a native of Carmel in Judah (1 S 27 3; 1 Ch 3 1).

CARMI, kār'mī (כַּרְמִי, karmī, "fruitful," "noble"):

(1) A son of Reuben who came to Egypt with Jacob (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14; 1 Ch 5 3). Also the name of a family of which Carmi was the head (Nu 26 6).

(2) A Judahite (1 Ch 2 7), son of Zabdi, according to Josh 7 1, and father of Achar, who is given the name of "Achar" in 1 Ch 2 7. This last form "Achar" is preferred to the usual "Achan" in order to bring out the play on the Heb word for "troubler." The Heb runs קָחָר וְיִשְׂרָאֵל, 'ākhār 'ōkhēr yisrā'el, "Achar, the troubler of Israel." As regards the phrase "the sons of Carmi" (1 Ch 2 7), Carmi is probably to be taken as the son of Zimri (=Zabdi, Josh 7 1). The Tg, however, has "Carmi who is Zimri." The LXX identifies Zimri and Zabdi.

(3) In 1 Ch 4 1, Carmi, elsewhere called son of Zabdi or Zimri, is made son of Judah; but Wellhausen correctly changes "Carmi" to "Chelubai" (cf 1 Ch 2 9). HORACE J. WOLF

CARMONIANS, kār-mō'ni-anz; AV Carmanians: A people mentioned in one of the visions—"an horrible vision" (2 Esd 15 30 ff)—of the "Apocalypse of Esdras." Their country, Carmania, was an extensive province of Asia lying between Parthia and Ariana and the N. side of the Pers Gulf, and extending to Drangiana and Gedrosia on the E. and to the river Bagradas and Persis on the W. It is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers, among others by Strabo and Arrian, who describe the inhabitants as closely resembling the Medians and Persians in manners and customs. In the passage cited they are intended to denote a fierce and warlike people, being described as "raging in wrath as wild boars of the wood" and associated with the "dragons of Arabia." J. HUTCHISON

CARNAIM, kār-nā'im, kār-nā-im (Καρνείν, Karnein, 1 Macc 5 26, Kapvaln, Karnain, vs 43 f, τὸ Κάρνιον, tō Karnion, 2 Macc 12 21.26): One of the strong cities besieged and captured by Judas Maccabaeus in his campaign E. of the Jordan (1 Macc 5 26.43 f). In the temple of Atargatis, which was situated here, those who fled from the city were put to death. It is apparently identical with Ashteroth Karnaim. It is called Carnion in 2 Macc 12 21.

CARNAL, kār'nal: In the OT there is an expression which indicates sexual intercourse (שִׁכְבָּת זָרָה, shikh'bhath zera', "lying of seed," Lev 18 20; 19 20; Nu 5 13). In the NT the words rendered "carnal" are derived from σάρξ, sārks, "flesh." This refers to the flesh as opposed to the pneuma, "spirit," and denotes, in an ethical sense, mere human nature, the lower side of man as apart from the Divine influence, and therefore estranged from God and prone to sin; whatever in the soul is weak and tends toward ungodliness (see FLESH). Thus one may be carnal (σάρκινος, sarkinos), sold under sin (Rom 7 14). Christians may be carnal (sarkinos, 1 Cor 3 1; sarkikos, 1 Cor 3 3); the lower side of their being is dominant and not the spirit, hence they fall into sins of envy and strife. The weapons of the Christian warfare are not carnal, not merely human (of the flesh RV, ARV), but spiritual (2 Cor 10 4); "not after the law of a carnal commandment" (He 7 16); "The carnal mind is enmity against God" ("mind of the flesh" RV, ARV, Rom 8 7). So, "to be carnally minded is death" ("mind of the flesh" RV, ARV, Rom 8 6). There are "carnal ordinances," in contrast to the spiritual ones of the gospel (He 9 10); "Minister unto them in carnal things," those that pertain to the body in contrast to spiritual things (Rom 15 27; 1 Cor 9 11). The same expressions are elsewhere rendered "fleshly" (2 Cor 1 12; 3 3 RV "hearts of flesh"; 1 Pet 2 11).

Is there any difference between sarkinos and sarkikos? The former more definitely denotes the material of which an object is made. It may express with emphasis the idea of sarkikos, the spiritual given up as it were to the flesh. See MAN (THE NATURAL). G. H. TREVER

CARNION, kār'ni-on. See CARNAIM.

CAROUSINGS, ka-rouz'ingz (πότοις, pótois, dative pl. of pótos): This word is found only in ARV and once only (1 Pet 4 3). The AV translates it "banquetings." It is one of the gentile excesses of fleshly indulgence against which the Christians are warned by Peter.

CARPENTER, kār'pen-tēr (חָרָשׁ, hārāsh; τέκτων, téktōn): This word, which is a general word for a graver or craftsman, is tr^d "carpenter" in 2 K 22 6;

2 Ch 24 12; Ezr 3 7; Isa 41 7. The same word is rendered "craftsman" in the ARV of Jer 24 1 and 29 2 and "smith" in the ARV of Zec 1 20. In 2 S 5 11; 2 K 12 11; 1 Ch 14 1; and Isa 44 13, hārāsh occurs with 'ēc (wood), and is more exactly tr^d "carpenter" or "worker in wood." Téktōn, the corresponding Gr word for artificer, is tr^d "carpenter" in Mt 13 55 and Mk 6 3. See CARVING; CRAFTS.

CARPUS, kār'pus (Κάρπος, Kárpos): A name but once mentioned in the NT (2 Tim 4 13), "the cloak that I left at Troas with Carpus." These words were written from the dungeons, where Paul was confined during his second imprisonment. The name, common enough in Paul's day, signifies "fruit" (Young) or "wrist" (Davis). The words indicate that Paul must have been very well acquainted with the family of Carpus. He was presumably one of his converts; and the apostle must have lodged with him and also have had considerable confidence in him, since he committed to his care not only the comparatively valueless "cloak," but esp. the priceless "books and parchments." It is idle to attempt to find out the identity of Carpus, but one cannot help wondering what were the contents of these books and parchments for which the apostle longed in his bitter second imprisonment. HENRY E. DOBKER

CARRIAGE, kar'ij (קָלִי, kālī, כְּבִדָּה, k'bhuddāh, נִשְׂאָה, n'sū'āh; ἐπισκευασάμενοι, episkeuasámenoi; RV "We took up our baggage"; ARV "made ready"): One or the other of the above words occurs in six different places and all have been tr^d in the AV by "carriage" in its obsolete meaning (Jgs 18 21; 1 S 17 22 [twice]; Isa 10 28; 46 1; Acts 21 15). In the RV and ARV these are tr^d by the more modern expressions "goods," "baggage," or "the things that you carried." In 1 S 17 20 AV "place of the carriage" occurs as the equivalent of "trench." The Heb ma'galāh may mean "the place of wagons" as tr^d in RV, as it is not at all improbable that the encampment was surrounded by the baggage train. JAMES A. PATCH

CARRY, kar'i (נָשָׂא, nāsā', נָהַג, nāhagh): The EV rendering of a number of Heb and Gr words, and it has several shades of meaning, of which the following are the most important:

(1) "To take up," "to bear," "to transport from one place to another," as, "to carry away handkerchiefs" (Acts 19 12), "to carry a corpse" (Gen 50 13), and "to be carried away by the wind" (Dnl 2 35).

(2) "To cause to go" or "come," "to lead," "to drive," as, "to be carried away to Babylon" (2 K 20 17), "to be carried away to Pilate" (Mk 15 1), "to carry away cattle" (Gen 31 18), and "to carry away daughters" (Gen 31 26).

(3) "To uphold" or "sustain," "and even to hoar hairs will I carry you" (Isa 46 4).

(4) "To bear," or "endure," as, "to carry sorrows" (Isa 53 4).

(5) "To overwhelm," "to bear away," "to destroy," as, "to carry away as with a flood" (Ps 90 5).

(6) "To influence," "to move," as, "to carry away with dissimulation" (Gal 2 13), "to carry away with error" (2 Pet 3 17), "to be carried away by strange teachings" (He 13 9). A. W. FORTUNE

CARSHENA, kār'shē-na, kar-shē'na (כַּרְשֵׁנָא, karshē'nā): The first named among the "seven princes of Persia and Media" under Ahasuerus (Est 1 14). See PRINCES, THE SEVEN.

CART, kârt (כָּרֶת, 'āghālāh): The Heb word has been tr^d in some passages "cart," and in others "wagon." In one ver only has it been tr^d "chariot." The context of the various passages indicates that a distinction was made between vehicles which were used for carrying baggage or produce and those used for carrying riders (chariots), although in their primitive form of construction they were much the same (cf Eng. "cart" and "carriage").

Egyptian Cart (with Two Wheels).

Carts, like "chariots" (q.v.), were of Assyrian origin. They were early carried to Egypt where the flat nature of the country readily led to their adoption. From Egypt they gradually found their way among the people of the Palestinian plains. In the hills of Judaea and Central Pal, except where highways were built (1 S 6 12), the nature of the country prevented the use of wheeled vehicles. 1 S 6 7.8.10.11.14 show that the people of the plains used carts. The men of Kiriath-jearim found it easier to carry the ark (1 S 7 1). Their attempt to use a cart later (2 S 6 3.6; 1 Ch 13 7) proved disastrous and they abandoned it for a safer way (2 S 6 13).

Modern Cart.

That carts were used at a very early date is indicated by Nu 7 3.7.8. That these vehicles were not the common mode of conveyance in Pal is shown in Gen 45. Pharaoh commanded that Joseph's brethren should return to their father with their beasts of burden (45 21) and take with them Egypt wagons (45 19.21; 46 6) for bringing back their father and their families. The very unusual sight of the wagons was proof to Jacob of Joseph's existence (45 27).

Bible descriptions and ancient Bab and Egypt pictures indicate that the cart was usually two-wheeled and drawn by two oxen.

With the Arabian conquests and subsequent ruin of the roads wheeled vehicles disappeared from Syria and Pal. History is again repeating itself. The Circassians, whom the Turkish government has settled near Caesarea, Jerash (Gerasa) and Ammān (Philadelphia), have introduced a crude cart which must be similar to that used in OT times. The two wheels are of solid wood. A straight shaft is joined to the wooden axle, and to this a yoke of oxen is attached. On the Philistia plains may be seen carts of present-day Egypt origin but of a pattern many cents. old. With the establishment of government roads during the last 50 years, European vehicles of all descriptions are fast coming into the country.

One figurative reference is made to the cart (Isa 5 18), but its meaning is obscure.

CARVING, kār'vīng: Carving, or engraving, was extensively used among the peoples of Bible lands. There were no materials used in the arts which were not subjected to the graver's skill. Carved objects of wood, stone, ivory, clay, bronze, gold, silver and glass discovered today show how skilful the ancient carvers were. Carving was principally done in bas-relief, although Ex 28 11 shows that incised lines were also used. The signets and scarabs are examples of this class of carving. Several Heb words have been tr^d "carved" in the AV. Peṣel or p'eṣil is found in Jgs 18 18; 2 Ch 33 7.22; 34 3.4; hākah in 1 K 6 35. The tr "graven" appears in the RV of all these passages. In 1 K 6 29.32.35, kālā' appears; in 1 K 6 18.32, miklā'ath; in 1 K 6 29 and Ps 74 6, pittū'ah; in Ex 31 5; 35 33, hārō-sheth (see CARPENTER); hātūbhāh in Prov 7 16 is better tr^d "striped" as in the RV. For further notes on carving, see CRAFTS. JAMES A. PATCH

CASDIM, kaz'dim. See CHESD.

CASE, kās: Ordinarily to describe the circumstances or condition of things; sometimes, juridically (aitia, aitia, Mt 19 10; Acts 25 14), as that for which a reckoning has to be given, as frequently the Lat rēs. In Ex 5 19, "they were in evil case," is interpreted by RV as "were set on mischief."

CASEMENT, kās'ment. See HOUSE.

CASIPHIA, ka-sif'-i-a, ka-sif-ē'a (כַּסְפִּיָּה, kāṣiph-yā'): An unidentified place in North Babylonia, near the river Ahava, to which Ezra sent for "ministers for the house of our God" (Ezr 8 17). Some have thought the name to be connected with keṣeph, "silver" or "money." LXX renders argurō tou tōpou, as in 1 Esd 8 45, "the place of the treasury."

CASLUHIM, kas'lū-him, kas-lū'him (כַּסְלִיִּים, kaṣlūhīm; Χασμωνίται, Chasmōniētai): The name of a people mentioned in Gen 10 14; 1 Ch 1 12 as descended from Mizraim. The parenthesis should probably follow Caphtorim. From them, it is said, sprang the PHILISTINES, which see.

CASPION, kas'fon. See CASPHOR.

CASPHOR, kas'for (AV Casphon; Κασφώρα, Kasphōr, 1 Macc 5 26; Χασφών, Chasphōn, Χασφώθ, Chasphōth, ver 36; Κασπεῖν, Kaspein, 2 Macc 12 13): A city E. of the Jordan captured by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 5 36). It is probably identical with Caspis of 2 Macc 12 13. It was a fortress of great strength, with a lake near it. This has led some to think it may be represented by el-Muzērib, an important station on the pilgrim route to Mecca. The ancient name of this city, however, has not been discovered. See ASHTAROTH.

CASPIN, kas'pin, CASPIS, kas'pis. See CASPHOR.

CASSIA, kash'a: Two Heb words, (1) קָדָה, kiddāh, which is mentioned, along with myrrh, cinnamon, calamus and olive oil, as one of the ingredients of the "holy anointing oil" (Ex 30 24); it was, too, one of the wares in which Vedan and Javan traded with Tyre (Ezk 27 19); it is identified in the Pesh and the Tg with (2). (2) קָצִיעוֹת, k'q'i'ōth (plur. only, probably referring to the strips of bark), a word from which is derived the Gr κασία, kasia, and hence cassia (Ps 45 8). It is probable that both (1) and (2) refer to Cassia lignea, the inner bark of Cinnamomum cassia, a plant growing in eastern Asia closely allied to that which yields the cinnamon of commerce. It is a fragrant, aromatic bark and was probably used in a powdered form. Both as an ingredient in unguents and as one of the perfumes at funerals, cassia, like cinnamon, was much used by the Romans. The cassia of Scripture must be clearly distinguished from the entirely distinct Cassia lanceolata and C. obovata which yield the familiar senna. The proper name KEZIAH (q.v.) is the sing. form of k'q'i'ōth.

Cassia—Cinnamomum cassia.

CAST: In general "to throw," with various degrees of violence; usually, with force, but not so necessarily, as e.g. in "cast a net," "cast lots." When applied to molten metal, as in Eng., first, "to let run into molds," with reference to their descent by gravity, and, then, "to form," as in Ex 25 12, etc. Usually in the NT for βάλλω, bállō, but not always. Thus, in Lk 1 29 "cast in her mind" means "considered" (διελογίζετο, dielōgizeto); "cast reproach" for Gr ὀνειδίζον, ōneidizon, "reproached" (Mt 27 44); "casting down" for καθαίρειν, kathairēō, "demolishing" (2 Cor 10 4); "casting all anxiety upon" (1 Pet 5 7), a still stronger term, as in Lk 17 2 AV; Acts 27 19. As a fundamental Gr word, it is compounded with many prepositions, "about," "away," "down," "forth," "in," "into," "off," "out," "up," "upon." "Cast down" in 2 Cor 4 9 AV is used in a military sense of one prostrated, but not killed in battle. Cf Ps 42 5 with RVm. "Castaway" of AV in 1 Cor 9 27, is in RV "rejected" (cf He 6 8), ἀδόκιμος, adōkimos, i.e. what the application of a test shows to be counterfeit, or unfit; tr^d "reprobate" in Rom 1 28; 2 Cor 13 5 6.7, etc.

CASTANETS, kas'ta-nets, kas-ta-nets' (קָצִיעוֹת, m'na'an'im): Are mentioned in 2 S 6 5 among the musical instruments upon which David and the house of Israel played at the time of the bringing up of the ark out of the house of Abinadab. This word is incorrectly tr^d "cornets" in the AV. The castanet was probably about the same kind of instrument as the Egyp sistrum, and the RV has "sistra" in the margin of 2 S 6 5. The sistrum was a loop-shaped metal frame through which were passed loose rods at the ends of which were rings. The instrument was held by a long handle and was rattled during songs and dances. It was used in Egypt in religious worship or to scare away evil influences. There is only the one reference to this instrument in the Bible.

CASTAWAY, kast'a-wā (ἀδόκιμος, adōkimos, from dokimāzō, "I test," "I approve after testing," hence approved after being tested): This word is rendered "castaway" only in AV: "I myself should be a cast-away" ("rejected" RV, ARV, 1 Cor 9 27). But the same word occurs a number of times usually tr^d "reprobate" (Rom 1 28; 2 Cor 13 5-7; 2 Tim 3 8; Tit 1 16); "rejected" (He 6 8).

CASTLE, kas'tl. See FORTIFICATION.

CASTOR, kas'tēr, AND POLLUX, pol'uks. See DIOSCURI; ASTRONOMY.

CAT (αἰλουρος, ailouros): The only mention of this animal is in Bar 6 22. It is not mentioned in the canonical Scriptures, though Bochart (Hieroz., 862) gives "wild cats" as the equivalent of qiyim in Isa 13 21; 34 14; Jer 50 39; Ps 74 19, where EV gives "wild beasts of the desert." Mention is, however, made of cats, cathod, in the Welsh Bible (Isa 34 14). The only mention of the catta in classical Lat writers is in Martial xiii.69. How the cat was regarded in Egypt is described in Herod. ii.66 and Rawlinson's notes. In Bar 6 22 cats are mentioned with "bats, swallows and birds" as sitting with impunity on the images of the heathen gods which are unable to drive them off. See also ZOOLOGY.

CATECHIST, kat'ē-kist, CATECHUMEN, kat'ē-kū'men (κατηχίζειν, katēchizein, "to resound," "to teach," "to instruct"): A catechist is a teacher who instructs his pupils in the elements of his own religion. In the OT he teaches them the rudiments of OT truth; in the NT he teaches the principles of the Christian faith. A catechumen, one whom the catechist instructs or catechizes, in preparation for the ceremony of baptism.

The words are derived from κατηχεῖν, katēchein, meaning "to give a sound," "to answer," "to echo." Classically it was used of the sounding down of rushing water, of the falling of music from a ship to the sea. Then it came to signify the sounding down of words of command or instruction. The preposition katá strengthens the meaning, bringing out more emphatically the back or return sound, the echo, the answer. So it came to mean familiar verbal instruction, a free informal discussion between teacher and pupil. Luke informs Theophilus (Lk 1 4) that he intends to give him a succinct and orderly account of those things which he had previously received by word of mouth (perí hōn katēchēthēs). See also the Gr in Acts 18 25 and 21 21; Rom 2 18; 1 Cor 14 19; Gal 6 6. In all these passages the Gr vb. is "catechised."

We do not find in the NT an organized catechumenate, such as we find in the 3d and 4th cents. The apostles preached mainly to synagogue-instructed Jews who were familiar with the law and the prophets and the Psalms, or to Gentiles who had learned from the Jews and had become "proselytes" (q.v.). The first apostolic preaching and teaching was to convince the hearers that Jesus was the promised Messiah, the Saviour of the world. As believers multiplied, the contrast between them and those who rejected the teaching became more and more marked. Opposition, scorn and persecution became more bold and bitter. The Christians were compelled to set forth and defend their beliefs more clearly. They had to meet and answer keen and persistent objections. And so the necessity for clear, systematic and organized teaching grew more and more into the form of an ordered catechumenate. The Apos Consts, from the latter part of the 3d cent., show the institution in a fair state of development. A Jew, pagan, or heretic of good moral standing, upon application to the deacon, presbyter, or bishop, was admitted into the state of catechumen by the sign of the cross and the imposition of hands (Sch-Herz s.v.).

The basis for the Christian catechumenate was found in the great commission (Mt 28 19,20). The aim of this commission was to make disciples, i.e. believing followers. The means for this discipling are baptizing and teaching. The result of using the means is that those who have become disciples are to observe all things whatsoever Christ has commanded.

Jesus Himself at twelve years of age had become a child of the law, a catechumen. He increased in wisdom and learned obedience. He became the great Catechist instructing His disciples, other private individuals and the multitudes. See an example of His catechizing in Mt 16 13 ff.

Paul was a master in method. See examples of use of the modern pedagogical method of apperception in Acts 14 14 ff; 17 16 ff; 19 8,9. The catechetical method is frequently found in the epistles (see 1 Cor 3 1,2; He 5 11,14; 6 1,2; 1 Pet 2 2; 1 Jn 2 13), and so the idea of religious nurture and instruction is found all through the NT. The catechist and the catechumen are there. It was not something new in the NT. Its roots lie back and run through the OT. The narrative of God's first communication with man, inside the gates of Eden, concerning commandment, law, sin, its consequences, its remedy, takes a catechetical form. The importance of systematic instruction, both public and private, is emphasized throughout the OT and NT, although it might not always take the form of catechizing in the modern pedagogical sense. In the patriarchal age the father was the prophet, the teacher, the catechist, in his house, which often included several families with their servants (see Gen 18 19). Matthew Henry explains thus: "Abraham not only took care of his children, but his whole household, including his servants, were catechized" (see also Ex 12 26; Dt 6 1-9; Josh 4 6,7; 24 15; Ps 34 11). Priests and Levites in addition to their sacerdotal functions were catechists (instructors) among the people (Lev 10 11; Dt 33 10; 2 Ch 15 3; Ezk 44 23). In later times the synagogues had regular instruction in the law and the prophets. See EDUCATION; INSTRUCTION; TEACHER.

CATERPILLAR, kat'ēr-pil-ēr (קַטְרִיל, ḥāṣīl [Ps 78 46; Joel 1 4, etc]; יֵלֶק, yelek [Ps 105 34 AV, ARV "grasshopper"; Jer 51 14,27 AV; elsewhere "canker-worm"]): A name given to a larval stage of the LOCUST (q.v.).

CATHOLIC, kath'ō-lik, EPISTLES (ἐπιστολαὶ καθολικαί, epistolai katholikai): In distinction from the apostolic or Pauline epistles which were addressed to individual churches or persons, the term "catholic," in the sense of universal or general, was applied by Origen and the other church Fathers to the seven epistles written by James, Peter, John and Jude. As early as the 3d cent. it came to be used in the sense of "encyclical," "since," as Theodoret says, "they are not addressed to single churches, but generally [kathólou] to the faithful, whether to the Jews of the Dispersion, as Peter writes, or even to all who are living as Christians under the same faith." Three other explanations of the term have been given, viz. (1) that it was intended to indicate a common apostolic authorship (only a few support this view); (2) that it signifies that the seven epistles were universally received as genuine; (3) that it refers to the catholicity of their doctrine, i.e. orthodox and authoritative versus heretical epistles whose teachings were in harmony with Christian truth. By some misconception of the word "catholic" the Western Church interpreted it as signifying "canonical" and sometimes called these epistles epistolae canonicae. That it was originally used in the sense of "general" epistles is now commonly received.

This is evident from their form of address. St. James wrote to all Jews, "of the Dispersion," who had embraced the Christian faith. In his first epistle St. Peter addressed the same Christians, including also gentile converts, resident in five provinces of Asia Minor: "elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion." His second epistle is to all Christians everywhere. St. John's first letter was evidently written to a cycle of churches and intended for universal use. St. Jude also had in mind all Christians when he said "to them that are called beloved in God," etc. The seeming exceptions are 2 and 3 Jn, addressed to individuals, but included with the catholic epistles as properly belonging with St. John's first epistle and of value to the general reader. The character and contents of these seven epistles are treated under their various heads. The letters of St. James and St. Jude belong to the Judaic school of Christianity; those of St. Peter to a broad and non-partisan type of faith that both includes and mediates between the Judaists and Paulinists. St. John's letters were written after the internal doctrinal controversies of the church had ceased, and the pressure of opposition and error from without tended to unite his "little children" in a new community of love and spiritual life. CATHUA, ka-thū'a (Καθούα, Kathouá; B, Κούα, Kouá): Head of a family of temple-servants who returned from the captivity with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 30); corresponds to Giddel in Ezr 2 47.

CATTLE, kat'l (בְּהֵמָה, b'hēmāh, "a dumb beast"; מִקְנֶה, mīqneh, "a possession," from קָנָה, kānāh, "to acquire" [cf Arab. ḥana, "to acquire," and Gr κτήνος, ktēnos, "beast," and pl. κτήνη, ktēnea, "flocks," from κτάσμαι, ktásmāi, "to acquire," flocks being both with the Homeric peoples and with the patriarchs an important form of property; cf Eng. "fee"]; צֶאֱן, ṣā'ān, "small cattle," "sheep" or goats [cf Arab. ḡa'n, "sheep"]; שֶׂה, seh, a single sheep or goat [cf Arab. shāh]; מְלֶאכָה, mēlā'khāh, "property," from לָאָה, lā'akh, "to minister" [cf Arab. malākah and mulk, "property," from malak, "to possess"]; מְרִירָא, mērī', "fatling," [1 K 1 9]; θρέμμα, thrēmma [Jn 4 12], "cattle," i.e. "that which is nourished," from τρέφω, tréphō, "to nourish"; בָּקָר, bāqār, "kine," "oxen" [cf Arab. baqar, "cattle"]; שֹׂר, shōr, תֹּר, tōr [Dnl 4 25], ταῦρος, tauros [Mt 22 4], "ox" or "bull"; βοῦς, boús, "ox" [Lk 13 15]; אֵלֶפֶת, 'elep, only in pl., אֵלֶפֶיִם, 'ālāphīm, "oxen" [Ps 8 7]): From the foregoing and by examination of the many references to "cattle," "kine" or "oxen," it is apparent that there are important points of contact in derivation and usage in the Heb, Gr and Eng. terms. It is evident that neat cattle were possessed in abundance by the patriarchs and later Israelites, which is far from being the case in Pal at the present day. The Bedawin usually have no cattle. The fellāhīn in most parts of the country keep them in small numbers, mostly for plowing, and but little for milk or for slaughtering. Travelers in the Holy Land realize that goat's milk is in most places easier to obtain than cow's milk. The commonest cattle of the fellāhīn are a small black breed. In the vicinity of Damascus are many large, fine milch cattle which furnish the delicious milk and cream of the Damascus bazaars. For some reason, probably because they are not confined and highly fed, the bulls of Pal are meek creatures as compared with their European or American fellows.

In EV the word "cattle" is more often used in a wide sense to include sheep and goats than to denote merely neat cattle. In fact, bākār, which distinctively denotes neat cattle, is often rendered "herds," as ṣō'n, lit. "sheep," is in a large number of instances tr^d "flocks." A good illustration is found in Gen 32 7: "Then Jacob . . . divided the people ['ām] that were with him, and the flocks [ṣō'n], and the herds [bākār], and the camels [g^mmallīm], into two companies [mahānōth]." For the last word AV has "drove" in Gen 33 8, RV "company."

Cattle.

Next to ṣō'n, the word most commonly rendered "flock" in EV is 'ēdher, from root "to arrange," "to set in order." 'ēdher is rendered "herd" in Prov 27 23, and in Joel 1 18 it occurs twice, being rendered "herds of cattle," 'ēdhrē bākār, and "flocks of sheep," 'ēdhrē ha-ṣō'n. Mikneh is rendered "flock" in Nu 32 26, "herd" in Gen 47 18, and "cattle" in a large number of passages. Other words rendered "flock" are: mar'ith (r. rā'āh [Arab. ra'a], "to pasture"), once in Jer 10 21; ashtērōth ṣō'n, "flocks of thy sheep," RV "young of thy flock," in Dt 7 13, etc., ashtārōth being pl. of ashtōreth, or Ashtoreth; hāsīph, once in 1 K 20 27: "The children of Israel encamped before them [the Syrians] like two little flocks of kids," hāsīph signifying "something stripped off or separated," from root hāsaph, "to strip" or "to peel," like the Arab. kaṭī, "flock," from root kaṭa, "to cut off"; πομνῆ, poimnē (Mt 26 31): "The sheep of the flock shall be scattered," and (Lk 2 8): "keeping watch by night over their flock"; πομνιον, poimnion (Lk 12

32): "Fear not, little flock," and (1 Pet 5 2): "Tend the flock of God which is among you."

Figurative: Not only poimnē and poimnion but also 'ēdher and ṣō'n are used fig. of God's people; e.g. Isa 40 11: "He will feed his flock ['ēdher] like a shepherd"; Zec 10 3: "Jeh of hosts hath visited his flock ['ēdher], the house of Judah"; Isa 65 10: "And Sharon shall be a fold of flocks" (ṣō'n); Jer 23 2: "Ye have scattered my flock" (ṣō'n); Ezk 34 22: "Therefore will I save my flock" (ṣō'n); Mic 7 14: "Feed . . . the flock [ṣō'n] of thy heritage."

The wild ox or wild bull, RV "antelope" (ṭ'ō or ṭō' of Dt 14 5 and Isa 61 20), is considered by the writer to be probably the Arabian oryx, and in this he is in agreement with Tristram (NHB). Tristram however thinks that the unicorn (rēm or rē'em), RV "wild ox," was the aurochs, while the present writer believes that this also may well have been the oryx, which at the present day has at least three names in Arab., one of which, bakar-ul-wahsh, means "wild ox." See ANTELOPE.

Our domestic cattle are believed by some of the best authorities to be of the same species as the ancient European wild ox or aurochs, Bos taurus, which is by others counted as a distinct species under the title of Bos primigenius. The aurochs was widely spread over Europe in Rom times, but is now extinct. Some degenerate wild cattle are preserved in some British parks, but these according to Lydekker in the Royal Natural History are probably feral descendants of early domestic breeds. Tristram cites the occurrence in the Dog River bone breccia of teeth which may be those of the aurochs, but this is a deposit accumulated by prehistoric man of an unknown antiquity to be variously estimated according to the predilections of the geologist at a few thousands or a few score of thousands of years, and is far from proving that this animal existed in Pal in Bible times or at any time.

The European bison (Bos or Bison bonassus) is thought by some to be the wild ox of the Bible. This is a forest-dwelling species and is now confined to the forests of Lithuania and the Caucasus. It was formerly more widely distributed, but there is no certain evidence that it ever lived as far S. as Pal, and there have probably never existed in Pal forests suitable to be the haunts of this animal.

About the Sea of Tiberias and the Jordan valley and in the plain of Coele-Syria there exist today Indian buffaloes (Bos bubalus), some feral and some in a state of domestication, which are believed to have been introduced in comparatively recent times. See BEAST; CALF.

CAUDA, kō'da (Καῦδα, Kaída; also called Κλαῦδα, Klaída; AV Clauda; the modern Gr name Gaudho supports the form Cauda): An island 23 miles W. of Cape Matala. It is a small island, and can never have supported a large population, or have been of any importance. Its elevation to the rank of a bishopric in Byzantine times must have been due to its association with the voyage of St. Paul. The ship with Paul on board was driven under the lee of Cauda (Acts 27 16); in the calm water south of the island the crew succeeded in hauling in the boat, undergirding the ship and slackening sail. W. M. CALDER

CAUL, kōl:

(1) יִתְרָה, yōthereth (Ex 29 13), the large lobe or flap of the liver, which is usually mentioned together with the kidneys and the fat as the special portions set aside for the burnt offering (Lev 3 4.10.15; 4 9; 7 4; 8 16.25; 9 10.19).

(2) סָגֹר, sāghōr (from the root sāghar, "to inclose," "shut up"), Hos 13 8, lit. the inclosure or covering of the heart, the caul or pericardium, or perhaps the chest as surrounding the heart. It must not be forgotten, however, that the expression may be taken in the sense of "mailcoat of the heart," i.e. hardened heart, which is shut to the influence of God's grace. So Luther and many modern translators and commentators.

CAUSE, kôs: In both AV and RV "for this cause" (AV "cause") occurs in Ex 9 16 as the rendering of בְּעִבְרֵי זֹאת, ba'ābhūr zō'th="in order that"; "to the end that"; so also in Dnl 2 12 for כָּל-קֶבֶל, kol-kēbhēl d'nāh, and in 2 Ch 32 20 AV for עַל-זֹאת, 'al-zō'th, where RVS read "because of." In the NT the word is used adverbially in the tr of several Gr phrases: ἐνεκα τούτου, hēneka toutou (Mt 19 5; Mk 10 7); διὰ τοῦτο, diā touto, Jn 12 27; Rom 1 26; 13 6; 15 9 (RV "therefore"); 1 Cor 11 30; 1 Thess 2 13; 2 Thess 2 11; 1 Tim 1 16; He 9 15; εἰς τοῦτο, eis touto, Jn 18 37 (where AV varying the phraseology reads "to this end," "for this cause"); 1 Pet 4 6 AV; τοῦτου χάριν, toutou charin, Eph 3 14. Unusual renderings occur, as "for his cause" (= "because of"), 2 Cor 7 12; as "affair," "thing," obs. in AV 1 K 12 15; 2 Ch 10 15, where the word occurs as a paraphrase of מַסְבָּה, māsibbāh (= "turn of affairs"). In 1 S 25 31 (AV, RV) "causeless" (= without cause ARV) occurs arbitrarily in adv. sense.

CAUSEWAY, kōz'wā (more correctly CAUSEY, kō'zi): This word occurs in 1 Ch 26 16.18 for the Heb מַסְלָה, māsillāh; LXX παστοφοριον τῆς ἀναβάσεως, pastophorion tēs anabáseōs. In 2 Ch 9 11 the word is tr^d "terraces" (LXX ἀναβάσεις, anabáseis). Cf BDB, s.v., where מַסְלֹת, māsillōth, is an error for מַסְעֲרוֹת, mis'adhōth (1 K 10 12). In all the above passages reference is made to a series or flight of steps leading up into the temple. The word also signifies a prepared, traveled road, as in Nu 20 19; Jgs 20 31 f.45; 1 S 6 12; 2 S 20 12 f.; 2 K 18 17 (Isa 36 2); Isa 7 3; 11 16; 19 23; 33 8; 40 3; 49 11; Jer 31 21.

Figurative: In Isa 59 7 the word (māsillāh) occurs in a fig. sense, so also in Jgs 5 20; Prov 16 17.

occurs only in Isa 2 19, where AV has "caves" and translates m'ārōth in the same ver by "holes." In RV these words are very properly changed and not a few of large size are known. Water from the rain and snow, seeping down through cracks, enlarges the passages through which it goes by dissolving away the substance of the rock. Just as upon the surface of the land the trickling streams unite to form brooks and rivers, so many subterranean streams may come together in a spacious channel, and may issue upon the surface as a bold spring. The cave of the Dog River near Beirūt and that of 'Afka (perhaps Aphek [Josh 13 4]) in Lebanon are excellent examples of this. Not infrequently after forming a cave the stream of water may find some lower outlet by a different route, leaving its former course dry. In some cases the hinder part of the roof of the cave may fall in, leaving the front part standing as a natural bridge. Numerous shallow caves, esp. in the faces of cliffs, are formed not by seeping water, but by atmospheric erosion, a portion of a relatively soft stratum of rock being hollowed out, while harder strata above and below it are but little worn away. Many of the hermits' caves originated in this way and were artificially enlarged and walled up at the mouth. The principal caves mentioned in the Bible are those of MACHPELAH, MAKKEDAH and ADULLAM (q.v.). See DEN.

CEASE, sēs: A remarkable array of 20 Heb and 6 Gr words is so tr^d. In the AV 15 of the former and 3 of the latter are used only once with this rendering. The originals most frequently in use are הָדַח, hādhal, "to leave off"; שָׁבַח, shābath, "to rest from" (labor); παύσαι, pauiomai, "to make to cease." Few words illustrate better the fertility of the Heb in expressing limitless shades of meaning, impoverished by the use of one Eng. word. This extensive variety is, however, well expressed by "cease": i.e. stop, come to an end, e.g. ceasing of tears (Jer 14 17); work (Ezr 4 24); grinders (Eccl 12 3); thunder (Ex 9 29); the wicked (Job 3 17); anger (Ps 37 8). The significance of shābath lies in its being the Heb for Sabbath, implying complete cessation: as of manna (Josh 5 12); strife and ignominy (Prov 22 10); occurs with negative to show the ceaseless Providence of God in Nature: "summer and winter . . . shall not c." (Gen 8 22). In the NT it illustrates Christ's power over Nature; wind and raging sea ceased (Lk 8 24); over a sinner's heart: "not ceased to kiss my feet" (διδάσκω, diatēpō) (Lk 7 45); devotion of the early disciples, "ceased not to teach and to preach Jesus as the Christ" (Acts 5 42); the eternity and blessedness of the believer's sabbatic rest (ἀπολείπω, apoleipō) (He 4 10 AV). CEDAR, sē'dar, sē'dēr (צֶדֶר, 'erez, from Heb root meaning "to be firm"; κέδρος, kédros): The 'erez was in almost all the OT references the true cedar, Cedrus libani, but the name may have been applied in a loose way to allied trees, such as junipers and pines. In Nu 24 6—"as cedar-trees beside the waters"—the reference must, as is most probable, be purely poetical (see ALOES) or the 'ārāzīm must signify some other kind of tree which flourishes beside water.

Cedar is twice mentioned as a substance for ritual cleansing. In Lev 14 4 the cleansed leper was sprinkled with the blood of a

1. Cedar for Ritual Cleansing "clean bird" into which had been put "cedar-wood, and scarlet, and hyssop." In Nu 19 6 "cedar-wood, and hyssop, and scarlet" were to be cast into the holocaust of the red heifer. (For the symbolical meaning see CLEAN.) Here it is very generally considered that the cedar could not have been the wood of Cedrus libani, which so far as we know never grew in the wilderness, but that of some species of juniper—according to Post, Juniperis phoenicea, which may still be found in the wilderness of Edom.

Cedar trees are everywhere mentioned with admiration in the OT. Solomon made the cedar the first of trees (1 K 4 33). They are the "glory of Lebanon" (Isa 35 2; 60 13). The most boastful threat of Sennacherib was that he would cut down the tall cedars of Lebanon (Isa 37 24). They were strong, as is implied in—

"The voice of Jeh is powerful;
The voice of Jeh breaketh the cedars;
Yea, Jeh breaketh in pieces the cedars of Lebanon"
(Ps 29 4,5).

The cedars are tall—"whose height was like the height of the cedars"—(Am 2 9; 2 K 19 23); majestic (2 K 14 9), and excellent (Cant 5 15). The Assyrian power is compared to—"a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a forest-like shade, and of high stature; and its top was among the thick boughs . . . its stature was exalted above all the trees of the field; and its boughs were multiplied, and its branches became long" (Ezk 31 3-5). They are in particular God's trees—

"The trees of Jeh are filled with moisture,
The cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted" (Ps 104 16).

Doubtless as a reminiscence of this the Syrians today call the cedar 'ars er rubb, "the cedar of the Lord." The growth of the cedar is typical of that of the righteous man (Ps 92 12).

That cedars were once very abundant in the Lebanon is evident (1 K 6 9-18; 10 27). What they contributed to the glory and beauty of that district may be seen in Zec 11 1-2:

"Open thy doors, O Lebanon, that the fire may devour thy cedars.

Wail, O fir-tree, for the cedar is fallen, because the glorious [RVm] ones are destroyed:

Wail, O ye oaks of Bashan, for the strong forest is come down."

Cedars of Lebanon at the Beshherri Grove.

The wood of the cedar has always been highly prized—much more so than the sycamore (1 K 10 27; Isa 9 10). David had a house

3. Cedar Timber of cedar built for him by Hiram, king of Tyre (2 S 5 11), and he prepared "cedar-trees without number" for the temple which his son was to build (1 Ch 22 4). Cedar timber was very much used in the construction of Solomon's temple and palace, the trees being cut in the Lebanon by Sidonians by orders of the king of Tyre—"Hiram gave Solomon timber of cedar and timber of fir according to all his desire" (1 K 5 6-10). One of Solomon's most important buildings was known as "the house of the forest of Lebanon" (1 K 7 2; 10 17; 2 Ch 9 16), on account of the source of its materials. While cedar was well adapted for beams (1 K 6 9; Cant 1 17), boards (Cant 8 9), pillars (1 K 7 2) and ceilings (Jer 22 14), it was suited as well for carved work, such as idols (Isa 44 14,15). It was also used for ships' masts (Ezk 27 5).

The Cedrus libani still survives in the mountains of Syria and flourishes in much greater numbers in the Taurus mountains. "There are groves of cedars above el-Ma'āsir, in Modern Barāk, 'Ain Zehaltah, Hadith, Beshherri, and Sir" (Post, Flora, 751).

Of these the grove at Beshherri is of world-wide renown. It consists of a group of about 400 trees, among them some magnificent old patriarchs, which lies on the bare slopes of the Lebanon some 6,000 ft. above the sea. Doubtless they are survivors of a forest which here once covered the mountain slopes for miles. The half a dozen highest specimens reach a height of between 70 and 80 ft., and have trunks of a circumference of 40 ft. or more. It is impossible to estimate with any certainty their age, but they may be as much as 800, or even 1,000, years old. Though magnificent, these are by no means the largest of their kind. Some of the cedars of Amanus are quite 100 ft. high and the Himalayan cedar, Cedrus deodara, a variety of Cedrus libani, reaches a height of 150 ft. The impressiveness of the cedar lies, however, not so much in its height and massive trunk, as in the wonderful lateral spread of its branches, which often exceeds its height. The branches grow out horizontally in successive tiers, each horizontal plane presenting, when looked at from above, the appearance of a green sward. The leaves are about an inch long, arranged in clusters; at first they are bright green, but they change with age to a deeper tint with a glaucous hue; the foliage is evergreen, the successive annual growths of leaves each lasting two years. The cones, 4 to 6 in. long, are oval or oblong-ovate, with a depression at times at the apex; they require two years to reach maturity and then, unlike other conifers, they remain attached to the tree, dropping out their scales bearing the seeds.

The wood of the cedar, specially grown under the conditions of its natural habitat, is hard, close grained, and takes a high polish. It is full of resin (Ps 92 14) which preserves it from rot and from worms. Cedar oil, a kind of turpentine extracted from the wood, was used in ancient times as a preservative for parchments and garments.

CEILED, sēld, CEILING, sēl'ing (AV and ERV Cieled, Cieling; the Heb words for "ceiled" are הִפָּאָה, hippāh, פֶּסֶן, sāphan, שְׂהִיפָה, sāhīph; for "ceiling," סִפּוֹן, sippun): Ceiling occurs only in 1 K 6 15. It comes from the root sāphan, meaning "to cover." It has its common meaning of the upper surface of a room; there is, however, some doubt of the text. Ceiled is found in 2 Ch 3 5 ([hippāh]; Jer 22 14; Hag 1 4 [sāphan in both]; Ezk 41 16 [sāhīph]), the text of the last passage being doubtful. In none of these cases does "ceiled" refer to the upper surface of a room, but to the covering or paneling of the inner walls of a house with cedar or other costly wood. This is in accordance with a common early use of the Eng. word, no longer frequent. GEORGE RICKER BERRY

CELEBRATE, sel'ē-brāt: Of the three Heb words so rendered הָלַל, hālal, "to praise," is preeminently significant. It is an onomatopoeic word meaning "to give a clear, sharp sound," as in vocal rejoicing, celebration. Its equivalent in Ethiopic is ellell, Ger. hallen, Eng. halloo, and appears in the great choral word Hallelujah of the Heb religion. Passing into Christian use it has become the term most expressive of majestic praise. Pss 113-118 and 136 are called Hallel psalms. Found in Hezekiah's psalm of praise for his miraculous recovery: "Death cannot celebrate thee" (Isa 38 18). הָלַל, hāghagh, root meaning "to move in a circle," hence "to keep a festival" by sacred leaping and dancing; "celebrate [RV "keep"] a feast" (Lev 23 41); שָׁבַח, shābhath, "to rest," i.e. keep or observe a holy day; "celebrate [RV "keep"] your sabbath" (Lev 23 32).

CELESTIAL, sē-les'chal (ἐπουράνιος, epouránios, "above the sky," "heavenly"): Peculiar to Paul's majestic argument on the resurrection: celestial vs terrestrial bodies (1 Cor 15 40) with reference possibly to sun and moon, etc, but more probably to the bodies of angels in distinction from those of beasts and mortal men (cf Christ's words, Mt 22 30; Lk 20 36); including also doubtless in the apostle's thought the resurrection-body of Jesus and of the saints already taken into glory. Light is thrown on its meaning by the rendering of the same Gr original as "heavenly places" (Eph 1 3,20; 2 6; 3 10); "heavenly" (1 Cor 15 48). Hence "celestial" as used by Paul indicates the soul's continued life beyond the grave, the spiritual body of the redeemed in heaven, who, in Christ, have put on immortality. DWIGHT M. PRATT

CELLAR, sel'ēr, sel'ar (κρύπτη, krúptē; אֲצִי, 'ōṣār): Kruptē is found only in Lk 11 33, and is rendered "cellar" in RV; AV has "secret place." In this passage it doubtless means a cellar beneath a house. Etymologically the Gr word means "a covered place," and in classical Gr its usage includes vaults and crypts as well as cellars. It seems evident that it was only the larger houses in Pal in which cellars were used with any frequency. It is shown by the excavations that in rebuilding a town which was in ruins the old houses were sometimes utilized as cellars for the new. 'ōṣār, is rendered cellar only in 1 Ch 27 27 f. It is an erroneous rendering, the correct meaning being stores, or supplies, of wine and oil. GEORGE RICKER BERRY

CELOSRYIA, sē-lo-sir'i-a. See COELE-SYRIA.

CENCHREAE, sen'krē-ē (Κενχρεαί, Kenchreai, WH Kenchreai; AV incorrectly Cenchrea): A seaport of Corinth on the eastern side of the isthmus (see CORINTH). Here according to Acts 18 18, St. Paul had his hair shorn before sailing for Syria, since he had a vow. A local church must have been established there by St. Paul, since Phoebe, the deaconess of Cenchreae, was intrusted with the Epistle to the Romans, and was commended to them in the highest terms by the apostle, who charged them to "assist her in whatsoever matter she may have need" (Rom 16 1,2).

CENDEBAEUS, sen-de-bē'us (Κενδεβαίος, Kendeбайος; AV Cendebeus): A general of Antiochus VII who was appointed "captain of the seacoast" of Pal (1 Macc 15 38 ff) after the defeat of Tryphon by Antiochus 138 BC. He fortified Kedron and harassed the Jews in various ways. As Simon Maccabaeus was too old to attack C. in person he sent his two eldest sons, Judas and John, who defeated him with great loss at Modin (1 Macc 16 1-10).

CENSER, sen'sēr: In AV censer is used as a tr of two Heb words, viz. מַחְתָּה, mahtāh, and מִקְטֶרֶת, miktereth. The former word is generally rendered "censer," sometimes "firepan," and in three cases (Ex 25 38; 37 23; Nu 4 9) "snuffdish." It denoted a bowl-shaped vessel used for different purposes, viz. (1) a censer, in which incense was burnt (Lev 10 1); (2) a firepan, made of bronze, used in connection with the altar of burnt offering (Ex 27 3); (3) a snuffdish, i.e. a receptacle to hold pieces of burnt lamp-wick removed by the tongs or snuffers (Ex 25 38). Probably in all these cases the same kind of vessel was meant, viz. a bowl-shaped utensil with a handle, not unlike a saucepan. The other Heb word (derived from the same root as the word for "incense") denoted a vessel for conveying incense (Ezk 8 11; 2 Ch 26 19). The Gr word θυμιατήριον, thumiatērion, by which the LXX rendered miktereth, is used also in He 9 4, where AV gives "censer," but ARV is probably more correct, viz. "altar of incense" (see Commentaries s.v.). Cf also Rev 8 3.5, where λιβανωτός, libanōtōs, properly the adj. of "frank-incense," is tr^d "censer." T. LEWIS

CENTURION, sen-tū'ri-un: As the name implies, ἐκατοντάρχης or -os, hekatontárchēs or -os; κεντυρίων, kenturiōn, Lat centurio, was the commander of a hundred men, more or less, in a Rom legion. St. Matthew and St. Luke use the Gr word while St. Mark prefers the Lat form, as he does in the case of other words, seeing that he wrote primarily for Rom readers. The number of centurions in a legion was 60, that being at all epochs the number of centuries, although the number varied in the cohort or speira. The ordinary duties of the centurion were to drill his men, inspect their arms, food and clothing, and to command them in the camp and in the field. Centurions were sometimes employed on detached service the conditions of which in the provinces are somewhat obscure. Men like Cornelius and Julius (Acts 10 1; 27 1) may have been separated from the legion to which they properly belonged for the discharge of special duties. They and other centurions mentioned in the Gospels and the Acts (Mt 8 5; Mk 15 39.44.45; Lk 23 47) are represented by the sacred writers in a favorable light. See AUGUSTAN BAND. T. NICOL

CERAS, sē'ras (Κηράς, Kērās; RV KERAS [q.v.]).

CERTAIN, sēr'tin, CERTAINLY, sēr'tin-li, CERTAINTY, sēr'tin-ti: The rendering of some Heb words and forms expressive of what is definitely settled or determined.

(1) Tr of the Heb נָכֹחַ, nākhōn, "to be established" or "fixed," as in Dt 13 14 (Heb 15); 17 4; 1 S 23 23 (cf Ex 16 4, "a certain rate every day" AV). In the NT it is the rendering of ἀσφαλής, asphalēs, ἀσφάλεια, aspháleia, from "a" privative and sphallein, "to shake" or "move"; as in Lk 1 4, "the certainty of those things"=actual circumstances; Acts 21 34; 22 30; 25 26.

(2) The word "c." is also employed in the OT to bring out the force of the absolute infinitive form used with the finite vb. to express emphasis or to strengthen the idea of the main vb. (Kautzsch-Gesenius, Heb Grammar, tr Collins-Cowley, 357, 3). Such usage occurs in Gen 18 10; Josh 9 24; Lev 5 19; 24 16; 1 S 20 3 AV; 1 K 2 37; Jer 26 15; 36 29; 42 19.22; 44 17.

(3) The word "c." is also made auxiliary to bring out the force of such expressions as the Heb יָצָב, yāṣabh, "to be firm," as in Dan 2 8; also in the NT, of the vb. ἀστατεῖν, astatein, as in 1 Cor 4 11, "have no certain dwelling-place."

(4) Mention might be made also of "c." as the rendering of sundry words, as אָכָה, 'akh, in Lam 2 16; כֵּן, kē, in Ex 3 12; and βεβαιός, bebaiós, in Lk 23 47, all being expressions for what is sure, beyond doubt. W. N. STEARNS

CERTIFY, sēr'ti-fi: Occurs in (1) 2 S 15 28 (הִגִּיד, haggīdh, "to show," "announce," from הָגַד, nāghadh); (2) Ezr 4 14.16; 5 10; 7 24 (הִדָּה, hō-dha, "to make known," from יָדָה, y'dha; Aram. for יָדָה, yādha); (3) Est 2 22 AV (אָמַר, 'amar, "to say," "tell," so RV); and (4) Gal 1 11 AV (γνωρίζω, gnōrízō, "to make to know," so RV). In the EV, accordingly, the word has not the strong, specific sense of "to make certain," but only the broader sense of "to make to know." Cf Ps 39 5 (Prayer Book version), "that I may be certified how long I have to live."

CETAB, sē'tab. See KETAB.

CHABRIS, kā'bris (Ἀβρίς, Abrís, Χαβρίετς, Chabréts): Son of Gothoniel, one of the three rulers of Bethulia in the time of Judith (Jth 6 15; 8 10; 10 6).

CHADIAS, kā'di-as, THEY OF (RV CHADIASAI, kā'di-a-si; A, Χαδάσαι, Chadáσαι; B, οἱ Χαδάσαι, hoi Chadiásai): The inhabitants of the city here referred to returned with Zerubbabel, along with the Ammidioi (1 Est 5 20). The name is not found in Ezr and Neh. The Chadasai have been taken for the people of Kadesh and the Ammidioi for the people of Humtah (Josh 15 54). Possibly the place is identical with Kedesh of Josh 15 23.

CHAREAS, kē'rē-as (Χαρείας, Chairéas; AV Chereas): Brother of Timotheus, the Ammonite leader against Judas Maccabaeus (1 Macc 5 6). He held the fortress of Gazara (the "Jazer" of 1 Macc 5 8) to which Timotheus fled from Judas. The latter pursued him and captured the fortress after a vigorous siege. In the slaughter which followed the two brothers, Ch. and Tim., were killed (2 Macc 10 32.37).

CHAFE, chāf (מָר, mar, "bitter"; hence bitter of soul, deadly, destructive, ferocious, "as a bear robbed of her whelps"): Occurs only in 2 S 17 8; used by Hushai to characterize David's supposedly fierce mood at the time of Absalom's armed rebellion.

CHAFF, chaf: Four different words have been tr^d "chaff" in the OT:

(1) מֹדַע, mōḏe, is found in Job 21 18; Ps 1 4; 35 5; Isa 17 13; 29 5; 41 15; Hos 13 3; Zeph 2 2.

(2) הַשִּׁשׁ, hāshish, occurs in two vs (Isa 5 24 and 33 11). Cf "hashish," an Arab. word which, as commonly used, denotes grass either standing or cut, green or dry, although, strictly speaking, dry or cut grass alone. In RV Isa 5 24 the tr is "dry grass."

(3) תֵּבֶן, tebhen, is tr^d "chaff" in AV (Jer 23 28). The same word is rendered "straw" in RV (cf Arab. tibn).

(4) אֲרִיר, 'ūr, a Chald word, occurs in Dnl 2 35. In the NT ἀχυρον, áchuron, is found in Mt 3 12 and Lk 3 17.

In the process of winnowing, as it has been carried on in the East for thousands of years, the grain is tossed into the air so that the wind may cause a separation of chaff and straw. The light husks from the wheat and fine particles of straw are dispersed by the wind in the form of a fine dust; the heavier straw which has been broken into short pieces by the threshing process falls near at hand on the edge of the threshing-floor, while the grain falls back upon the pile. In Syria and Pal, that which falls near at hand as cut straw is called tibn. This word occurs in the Arab. tr of Mt 3 12 and Lk 3 17. This straw is ordinarily saved and fed as "roughage" to the animals. It could easily be gathered and burned, as indicated in the above-mentioned vs, while the chaff is blown away beyond recovery, a strong figure to depict complete annihilation (Job 21 18; Isa 29 5; 41 16; Hos 13 3, Dnl 2 35). See AGRICULTURE; STRAW; WINNOWING.

CHAIN, chān, CHAINS, chānz: Chains were used by the Hebrews:

(1) As ornaments: אֲזָזִיחַ, 'eṣ'ādhāh, נְטִיפָה, neṭīphāh, צִנֵּק, 'anāk, רַבִּיד, rābhīdh, שַׁרְשָׁרָה, sharsh'rah, רַתּוֹק, rattōk. As ornaments for the person they were worn about the ankles (Nu 31 50; Isa 3 20) and about the neck (Cant 4 9; Ezk 16 11). They were used as ornaments for the ephod and breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28 14; 39 15). These chains were of pure gold. Solomon placed chains before the oracle in the temple (1 K 6 21), and these were also of pure gold. They were used as ornaments for graven images (Isa 40 19) and around the necks of prized animals. This was true of the camels taken from the Midianites by Gideon (Jgs 8 21.26).

(2) As marks of distinction: רַבִּיד, rābhīdh, הַמִּנִּיָּה (הַמִּנִּיָּה) hāmīnīk (hamnīkh): That seems to be true of the chain which Pharaoh placed about the neck of Joseph (Gen 41 42), and of the one which the king of Babylon promised to the wise men (Dnl 5 7).

(3) As means of confining prisoners: קֶשֶׁת, neḥōsheth; αλυσίς, hálysis: A number of passages that were trd "chains" in the AV are trd "fettters" in the RV (see Jgs 16 21; 2 S 3 34). Among the Romans the prisoner was chained to one or two guards (Acts 12 6.7; 21 33; Eph 6 20; 2 Tim 1 16). These chains were perhaps made of copper or an alloy of copper and tin.

(4) As a figurative expression: צִנֵּק, 'anāk. The Psalmist likens pride to a chain about the neck (73 6), and in Prov it is stated that the young man who hears the instruction of his father and forsakes not the law of his mother shall find that they are chains about his neck (1 9). In Rev 20 1 the angel is described as descending with a great chain in his hand. According to the AV Peter speaks of the fallen angels as having been delivered into "chains of darkness" (2 Pet 2 4), σειρά, seirá, and Jude speaks of them as being reserved in "everlasting chains" (Jude ver 6, RV "bonds"), δεσμός, desmós. "Kasdīm," "land of Kasdīm" or "the Chal-deans," is the usual designation, in the OT, for the land and the people (Jer 50 10; 51 24; 24 5; 25 12). The corresponding Gr form with l for s follows the Assy-Bab Kaldu, māt Kaldā, "Chaldean, land of the Chaldeans." Kasdīm is possibly connected with the name of Kesed (Kesedh), nephew of Abraham (Gen 22 22), and may be derived from the Assy-Bab root kašādu, "to capture," suggesting that the Chaldeans were originally tribes of nomadic plunderers (cf Job 1 17).

In its widest acception, Chaldea is the name of the whole of Babylonia, owing to the fact that the Chaldeans had given more than one

1. Geo-graphical Position
king to the country. In the strict sense, however, their domain was the tract at the N.W. end of the Pers Gulf, which was often called by the Assyro-Babylonians māt Tāmīṭ, "the Land of the Sea," a province of unknown extent. When these tribes migrated into Babylonia is uncertain, as is also their original home; but as they are closely related to the Aramaeans, it is possible that their first settle-ments lay in the neighborhood of the Aramaean states bordering on the Holy Land. Tiglath-pileser IV (742 BC) speaks of the ra'asāni or chiefs of the Kaldu, and the mention of numerous Aramaean tribes in Babylonia itself shows that their example of settling there soon found imitators, as did the Anglo-Saxons when they invaded Britain. Among the Chaldean tribes in Babylonia may be mentioned Bīt Amukkāni, whose capital was Sapia; Bīt Yakīn, which furnished the dynasty to which Merodach-baladan II belonged; and probably also Bīt Dakkuri, as all three lay near the Pers Gulf. Sargon of Assyria excludes Bīt-Amukkāni and Bīt-Dakkuri, and speaks of "the whole of the land of Chaldea, as much as there is; the land of Bīt-Yākīni, on the shore of the Salt River [the Pers Gulf], to the border of Tilmun" (the island of Bahrein and the adjacent mainland) (Pavement Inscr., IV, ll. 82, 83, 85, 86). It was probably the influence of the Babylonians among whom they settled which changed these nomads into city-dwellers. Sennacherib refers to 75 (var. 89) strong cities and fortresses of Chaldea, and 420 (var. 800) smaller towns which were around them; and there were also Chaldeans (and Aramaeans) in Erech, Nippur (Calneh), Kis, Hursag-kalama, Cuthah, and probably Babylon.

The "land of the sea" (māt Tāmīṭ) is mentioned in the chronicle of the early Bab kings (rev. 14) as being governed by Ēa-gamil, contem-porary of Samsu-titana (cir 1900 BC), but at that period it was apparently one of the original Sumero-Akkadian states of Babylonia. It is doubtful whether, at that early date, the Chal-deans had entered Babylonia and founded settle-ments there, though the record mentions Aramaeans somewhat later on.

2. Origi-nally Su-mero-Akkadian

One of the earliest references to the Chaldeans is that of Shalmaneser II of Assyria, who, on invading Babylonia in the eponymy of Bēl-

3. History bunaya (851 BC), captured the city of the Chal- Baqāni, which belonged to Adini of dean Tribes the Chaldean tribe of Dakuri. After plundering and destroying the place, Shalmaneser attacked Enzudi, the capital, whereupon Adini submitted and paid tribute. On this occasion Yākīni, of "the Land of the Sea," also paid tribute, as did Mušallim-Marduk, son of Amukkāni (the Bīt-Amukkāni mentioned above). The next Assyrian ruler to mention the country is Adad-nirari III (810 BC), who speaks of all the kings of the Chaldeans, which evidently refers to the various states into which the Chaldean tribes were divided. Later on, Sargon of Assyria, in his 12th year, decided to break the power of Merodach-baladan, who had made himself master of Babylon. To effect this, he first defeated the Gambulians, who were the Chaldean king's supporters, and the Elamites, his allies over the border. The Chaldean, however, did not await the Assyrian king's attack, but escaped to Yabburu in Elam, leaving considerable spoil behind him. Though extensive operations were carried out, and much booty taken, the end of the campaign seems only to have come two years later, when Dūr-Yākīn was destroyed by fire and reduced to ruins. In the "Annals of Hall XIV" Sargon claims to have taken Merodach-baladan prisoner, but this seems doubtful. Merodach-baladan fled, but returned and mounted the throne again on Sargon's death in 705 BC. Six months later Sennacherib, in his turn, attacked him, and he again sought safety in flight. A Chaldean chief named Šūzubu, however, now came forward, and proclaimed himself king of Babylon, but being defeated, he likewise fled.

4. Merodach-baladan and Sargon of Assyria Later on, Sennacherib attacked the Chaldeans at Nagitu and other settlements in Elamite-territory which Merodach-baladan and his followers had founded. After the death of Merodach-baladan, yet another Chaldean, whom Sennacherib calls likewise Šūzubu, but whose full name was Mušēzib-Marduk, mounted the Babylonian throne. This ruler applied for help against Sennacherib of Assyria to Umman-menanu, the king of Elam, who, taking the bribe which was offered, supported him with an armed force, and a battle was fought at Halulē on the Tigris, in which Sennacherib claims the victory—probably rightly. Mušēzib-Marduk reigned 4 years, and was taken prisoner by his whilom ally, Umman-menanu, who sent him to Assyria.

5. Šūzubu In the reign of Esarhaddon, Nabū-zēr-napišti-līšir, one of the sons of Merodach-baladan, gathered an army at Larsa, but was defeated by the Assyrians, and fled to Elam. The king of that country, however, wishing to be on friendly terms with Esarhaddon, captured him and put him to death. This prince had a brother named Na'id-Marduk, who, not feeling himself safe in the country which had acted treacherously toward his house, fled, and made submission to Esarhaddon, who received him favorably, and restored to him the dominion of the "Land of the Sea."

7. Merodach-baladan's Son This moderation secured the fidelity of the Chaldeans, and when the Elamite Urtaku sent inviting them to revolt against their suzerain, they answered to the effect that Na'id-Marduk was their lord, and they were the servants of the king of Assyria. This took place probably about 650 BC, in the reign of Esarhaddon's son Aššur-banī-āpli (see OSNAPPAR).

Hostility to Assyria, however, continued to exist in the tribe, Palia, grandson of Merodach-baladan, being one of the prisoners taken by

9. Palia Aššur-banī-āpli's troops in their operations against the Gambulians (a Babylonian, and perhaps a Chaldean tribe) later on. It was only during the struggle of Šamaš-šum-ukīn (Saosduchimos), king of Babylon, Aššur-banī-āpli's brother, however, that they took sides against Assyria as a nationality. This change was due to the invitation of the Bab king—who may have been regarded, rather than Aššur-banī-āpli, as their overlord. The chief of the Chaldeans was at that time another grandson of Merodach-baladan, Nabū-bēl-šumāti, who seized the As-

10. Nabū-bēl-šumāti syrians in his domain, and placed them in bonds. The Chaldeans suffered, with the rest, in the great defeat of the Bab and allied forces, when Babylon and the chief cities of the land fell. Mannu-ki-Babli of the Dakkurians, Ēa-šum-ikīša of Bīt-Amukkāni, with other Chaldean states, were punished for their complicity in Šamaš-šum-ukīn's revolt, while Nabū-bēl-šumāti fled and found refuge at the court of Indabigaš, king of Elam. Aššur-banī-āpli at once demanded his surrender, but civil war in Elam broke out, in which Indabigaš was slain, and Ummanaldās mounted the throne. This demand was now renewed, and Nabū-bēl-šumāti, fearing that he would be surrendered, decided to end his life. He therefore directed his armor-bearer to dispatch him, and each ran the other through with his sword. The prince's corpse, with the head of his armor-bearer, were then sent, with some of the Chaldean fugitives, to Assyria, and presented to the king. Thus ended, for a time, Chaldean ambition in Babylonia and in the domain of eastern politics.

With the death of Aššur-banī-āpli, which took place about 626 BC, the power of Assyria fell, his successors being probably far less

11. The Chaldeans capable men than he. This gave occasion for many plots against the Assyrian empire, and the Chaldeans probably Forge Ahead took part in the general movement. In the time of Saracus (Sin-sarra-īškun of Assyria, cir 620 BC) Busalossor would seem to have been appointed general of the forces in Babylonia in consequence of an apprehended invasion of barbarians from the sea (the Pers Gulf) (Eusebius, Chronicon, book i). The new general, however, revolted against the Assyrians, and made himself master of Babylonia. As, in other cases, the Assyrians seem to have been exceedingly faithful to their king, it has been thought possible that this general, who was none other than 12. Nabopolassar's Revolt against Assyria Nabopolassar, the father of Nebuchadnezzar, was not really an Assyrian, but a Babylonian, and probably a Chaldean. This theory, if correct, would explain how Babylonia, in its fullest sense, obtained the name of Chaldea, and was no longer known as the land of Shinar (Gen 10 10). The reputation of Merodach-baladan, the contemporary of Hezekiah, may have been partly responsible for the change of name.

It was not in the restricted sense, but as a synonym of Babylonian, that the name Chaldean obtained the signification of "wise man." That the Chaldeans in the restricted and correct sense were more learned than, or even as learned as, the Babylonians in general, is unlikely. Moreover, the native inscriptions give no indication that this was the case. The Babylonians in general, on the other hand, were enthusiastic students from very early times. From their inscriptions, it is certain that

13. The among their centers of learning may be classed Sippar and Larsa, the chief Chaldeans seats of sun-worship; Nippur, identified with the Calneh of Gen 10 10;
Men Babylon, the capital; Borsippa in the neighborhood of Babylon; Ur of the Chaldees; and Erech. There is, also, every probability that this list could be extended, and will be extended, when we know more; for wherever an important temple existed, there was to be found also a priestly school. "The learning of the Chaldeans" (Dnl 1 4; 2 2; 4 7; 5 7.11) comprised the old languages of Babylonia (the two dialects of Sumerian, with a certain knowledge of Kassite, which seems to have been allied to the Hittite; and other languages of the immediate neighborhood); some knowledge of astronomy and astrology; mathematics, which their sexagesimal system of numeration seems to have facilitated; and a certain amount of natural history. To this must be added a store of mythological learning, including legends of the Creation, the Flood (closely resembling in all its main points the account in the Bible), and apparently also the Temptation and the Fall. They had likewise a good knowledge of agriculture, and were no mean architects, as the many celebrated buildings of Babylonia show—compare not only the descriptions of the Temple of Belus (see BABEL, TOWER OF) and the Hanging Gardens, but also the remains of Gudea's great palace at Lagaš (Tel-loh), where that ruler, who lived about 2500 BC, is twice represented as an architect, with plan and with rule and measure. (These statues are now in the Louvre.) That their architecture never attained the elegance which characterized that of the West, is probably due to the absence of stone, necessitating the employment of brick as a substitute (Gen 11 3). See BABYLONIA; SHINAR.

CHALKSTONE, chók'stōn (אֲבִנֵּי-גִיר, 'abhnēghir [cf Eben-ezer, אֶבֶן הָעֶזֶר, 'ebhen hā-'ezer, "stone of the help," 1 S 7 12]): In Isa 27 9 we have: "Therefore by this shall the iniquity of Jacob be forgiven, and this is all the fruit of taking away his sin: that he maketh all the stones of the altar as chalkstones that are beaten in sunder, so that the Asherim and the sun-images shall rise no more." 'Abhnē-ghir is compounded of 'ebhen, "stone," which occurs in many passages, and gīr or gīr, "lime" (cf Arab. jīr, "gypsum" or "quicklime"), which occurs only here and in Dnl 5 5: "wrote . . . upon the plaster [gīr] of the wall of the king's palace." Nearly all the rock of Pal is limestone. When limestone is burned, it is converted into lime, which is easily broken into pieces, and, if allowed to remain open to the air, becomes slaked by the moisture of the atmosphere and crumbles into dust. The reference is to the destruction of the altar. It may mean that the altar will be burned so that the stones will become lime, or, more probably, that the stones of the altar will be broken as chalkstones (i.e. lumps of quicklime) are broken. There is no doubt that lime was known to the Egyptians, Assyrians and Hebrews, though clay, with or without straw, was more commonly used in building. Even bitumen ("slime") appears to have been used for mortar. See CLAY; LIME; SLIME. ALFRED ELY DAY

CHALLENGE, chal'enj: Only in Ex 22 9, where AV has taken Heb 'āmar, "say," in the sense of "claim." RV "whereof one saith, This is it," points more definitely to the idea of identification of the stolen personal property.

CHALPHI, kal'fi (Χαλφί, Chalphi; AV Calphi): Father of Judas, who, along with Mattathias, steadily supported Jonathan at the battle of Geneser when the hosts of Demetrius' princes were routed (1 Mace 11 70).

CHAMBER, chām'bēr (the tr of the following Heb words: חֶדֶר, hedher, חֶפְזָה, huppāh, יָצִיעַ, yāci'a, יָצִיעַ, yāci'a, לִשְׁכָּה, lishkāh, נִשְׁכָּה, nishkāh, עֲלִיָּה, 'āliyāh, צֶלֶל, çelā, and the Aram. word עֲלִיָּה, 'illīth): For the most part the word chamber is the expression of an idea which would be adequately expressed by the Eng. word "room," in accordance with an earlier use of the word, now little employed. For the arrangement of rooms in a Heb house, see HOUSE. Hedher is a word of frequent occurrence, and designates a private room. Huppāh is tr^d "chamber" only in Ps 19 5, where it is used in connection with "bridegroom," and means a bridal chamber. The same Heb word used of the bride in Joel 2 16 is rendered "closet." Yāci'a and yāci'a are found only in 1 K 6 5.6.10 (AV only in all the passages), yāci'a being the reading of Kthibh and yāci'a of K^{re} in each case. Here the meaning is really "story," as given in RV, except in ver 6, where doubtless the text should be changed to read ha-çelā, "the side-chamber." Lishkāh, a frequent word, and the equivalent nishkāh, infrequent, are used ordinarily of a room in the temple utilized for sacred purposes, occasionally of a room in the palace. 'Āliyāh and the equivalent Aram. 'illīth signify "a roof chamber," i.e. a chamber built on the flat roof of a house. Çelā, when used of a chamber, designates a side-chamber of the temple. It is usually rendered "side-chamber," but "chamber" in 1 K 6 5.8 (AV), where RV has "side-chamber."

CHAMBER, ROOF. See CHAMBER.

CHAMBERING, chām'bēr-ing: Illicit intercourse; the rendering in EV since Tyndale of koltrais, kottais (lit. "beds," Rom 13 13). The Gr usage is paralleled in classic authors and the LXX; like the Eng. participle, it denotes repeated or habitual acts. The word is not recorded elsewhere in Eng. lit. as vb. or participle in this sense; in Othello, iii, 3, a chamberer is an intriguer, male wanton, in Byron, Werner, IV, 1, 404, a gallant or carpet knight, and in Chaucer, Clerk's Tale, 766, a concubine.

CHAMBERLAIN, chām'bēr-lin: In the OT the word rendered chamberlain, שָׂרִיס, šāris, is more properly "eunuch," an officer which oriental monarchs placed over their harems (Est 1 10.12.15; 2 3.14.21; 4 4 f; 6 2.14; 7 9; 2 K 23 11). This officer seems also to have had other duties. See under EUNUCH. In the NT (1) οἰκονόμος, oikonomos, lit. manager of the household, apparently the "treasurer" as in RV "Erastus the treasurer of the city saluteth you" (Rom 16 23). Cf adapted use as applied to Christian apostles and teachers, bishops, and even to individual members; in which cases, rendered "stewards" (1 Cor 4 1; Tit 1 7; 1 Pet 4 10). (2) In Acts 12 20, "Blastus the king's chamberlain" (ho epī tou koitōnos tou basilēos, "he who is over the king's bed-chamber"), not treasure-chamber, as above; here praefectus cubiculo, or chief valet de chambre to the royal person, a position involving much honor and intimacy.

CHAMBERS IN THE HEAVENS. See ASTRONOMY; DIAL OF AHAZ.

CHAMBERS IN THE SOUTH. See ASTRONOMY; SOUTH, CHAMBERS OF.

CHAMBERS OF IMAGERY, im'āj-ri, im'ā-jēr-i (מִשְׁכִּית, maskith): The reference (Ezk 8 12) is to chambers in the temple where the elders of Israel were wont to assemble and practise rites of an idolatrous character. What the imagery consisted of, we may gather from ver 10: symbolic representations of beasts and reptiles and "detestable things." It is thought that these symbols were of a zodiacal character. The worship of the planets was in vogue at the time of the prophet among the degenerate Israelites.

CHAMELEON, ka-mē'lē-un (כְּמָה, kōmah, RV LAND CROCODILE [Lev 11 30]; תִּנְשֵׁמֶת, tinshemeth, AV MOLE, RV CHAMELEON [Lev 11 30]): Kōmah, which in the AV is rendered "chameleon" and in the RV "land crocodile," means also "strength" or "power," as in Gen 4 12; 1 S 2 9; Ps 22 15; Isa 40 29, and many other passages. The LXX has χαμαιλέων, chamailēōn, but on account of the ordinary meaning of the word, kōmah, it has been thought that some large lizard should be understood here. The desert monitor, Varanus griseus, one of the largest of lizards, sometime attaining the length of 4 ft., is common in Pal and may be the animal here referred to. The name "monitor" is a tr of the German warnen, "to warn," with which has been confused the Arab. name of this animal, waran or waral, a word of uncertain etymology.

The word tinshemeth in the same verse is rendered in AV "mole" and in RV "chameleon." The LXX has ἀσπίδαξ, aspídaξ (= spálaξ, "mole"). Tinshemeth also occurs in the lists of unclean birds in Lev 11 18 and Dt 14 16, where it is rendered: AV "swan"; RV "horned owl"; LXX πορφυρίων, porphuríōn (i.e. "coot" or, acc. to some, "heron"); Vulg cygnus, "swan." It appears to come from the root nāsham, "to breathe"; cf n'shāmāh, "breath" (Gen 2 7; Job 27 3 AV, etc). It has therefore in Lev 11 30 been referred to the chameleon on account of the chameleon's habit of puffing up its body with air and hissing, and in the other passages to the pelican, on account of the pelican's great pouched bill.

The common chameleon is abundant in Pal, being found also in North Africa and in Spain. The other species of chameleons are found principally in Africa and Madagascar. It is not only a harmless but a decidedly useful creature, since it feeds upon insects, esp. flies. Its mode of capturing its prey is most interesting. It slowly and cautiously advances until its head is from 4 to 6 in. from the insect, which it then secures by darting out its tongue with great rapidity. The pigment cells in its skin enable it to change its color from pale yellow to bright green, dark green and almost black, so that it can harmonize very perfectly with its surroundings. Its peculiar toes and prehensile tail help to fit it for its life in the trees. Its prominent eyes with circular lids, like iris diaphragms, can be moved independently of each other, and add to its striking appearance. See LAND CROCODILE; MOLE; SWAN; HORNED OWL; PELICAN.

ALFRED ELY DAY

CHAMOIS, sham'i, sha-mwā', sha-moi' (צִמְרִי, zemer; καμηλοπάρδαλις, kamēlopárdalis): Occurs only once in the Bible, i.e. in the list of clean animals in Dt 14 5. Gesenius refers to the vb. zamar, "to sing," and suggests the association of dancing or leaping, indicating thereby an active animal. M'Lean in EB cites the rendering of the Tgs dīṣa', or "wild goat." Now there are two wild goats in Pal. The better known is the ibex of the S., which may well be the ya'el (EV "wild goat"; Job 39 1; Ps 104 18; 1 S 24 2), as well as the akēō (EV "wild goat," Dt 14 5). The other is the pasang or Pers wild goat which ranges from the N.E. of Pal and the Syrian desert to Persia, and which may be the zemer (EV "chamois"). The accompanying illustration, which is taken from the Royal Natural History, shows the male and female and young. The male is distinguished by its larger horns and goatee. The horns are in size and curvature very similar to those of the ibex (see GOAT, sec. 2), but the front edge is like a nicked blade instead of being thick and knotty as in the ibex. Like the ibex it is at home among the rocks, and climbs apparently impossible cliffs with marvelous ease.

From Roy. Nat. Hist., by permission.

Chamois: Persian Wild Goat or Pasang—Capra aegagrus. (This may be the zemer, EV chamois, of Dt 14 5.)

Tristram (NHB) who is followed by Post (HDB) suggests that zemer may be the Barbary sheep (Ovis tragelaphus), though the latter is only known to inhabit the Atlas Mountains, from the Atlantic to Tunis. Tristram supports his view by reference to a kebsh ("ram") which the Arabs say lives in the mountains of Sinai, though they have apparently neither horns nor skins to show as trophies, and it is admitted that no European has seen it. The true chamois (Rupicapra tragus) inhabits the high mountains from the Pyrenees to the Caucasus, and there is no reason to suppose that it was ever found in Syria or Pal.

CHAMPAIGN, sham-pān', sham'pān (צֶרְבָה, 'ārābhāh, בִּקְעָה, bik'āh): A champaign is a flat open country, and the word occurs in Dt 11 30 AV (RV "the Arabah") as a tr of 'ārābhāh, for which AV has in most places "the plain," and RV "the Arabah," when it is used with the art. and denotes a definite region, i.e. the valley of the Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea (Dt 2 8; 3 17; 4 49; Josh 3 16; 8 14; 11 16; 12 1.3.8; 2 S 2 29; 4 7; 2 K 14 25; 25 4; Jer 39 4; 52 7), and also the valley running southward from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akabah (Dt 1 1). Ezk 47 8 has for hā-ārābhāh "the desert," AVm "plain," RV "the Arabah." The pl. is used in Josh 5 10; 2 K 25 5, "the plains of Jericho," and in Nu 22 1 and 26 3, "the plains of Moab." Elsewhere ārābhāh is rendered in EV "desert" or "wilderness" (Job 24 5; 39 6; Isa 33 9; 35 1.6; 40 3; 41 19; 51 3; Jer 2 6; 17 6; 50 12). At the present day, the Jordan valley is called the Ghaur (cf Heb ūr, "to dig," mā'ārāh, "cave," and Arab. maghārah, "cave"). This name is also applied to the deltas of streams flowing into the Dead Sea from the E., which are clothed with thickets of thorny trees and shrubs, i.e. Ghaur-ul-Mezra'ah, at the mouths of Wādī-Kerak and Wādī-Beni-Hammād, Ghaur-uš-Sāfiyeh, at the mouth of Wādī-ul-Hisa. The name "Arabah" (Arab. al-'Arabah) is now confined to the valley running southward from the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Akabah, separating the mountains of Edom from Sinai and the plateau of at-Tih. See ARABAH.

Ezk 37 2 AVm has "champaign" for bik'āh, which is elsewhere rendered "vale" or "valley." Bik'āh seems to be applied to wide, open valleys, as: "the valley of Jericho" (Dt 34 3), "the valley of Megiddo" (2 Ch 35 22; Zec 12 11), "the valley of Lebanon" (Josh 11 17). If Baal-Gad be Ba'albek and "the valley of Lebanon" be Coele-syria, the present name of Coele-syria, al-Bikā' (pl. of buk'āh, "a low, wet place or meadow"), may be regarded as a survival of the Heb bik'āh.

ALFRED, ÉLY DAY

CHAMPION, cham'pi-un (אִישׁ-הַבְּנַיִם, ish ha-bēnayim): In 1 S 17 4.23 this unusual expression occurs in the description of Goliath. It means lit. "the man of the two spaces," "spaces," or "space between," and is perhaps to be explained by the fact that there was a brook flowing through the valley separating the two armies. In 1 S 17 51 the word champion is the rendering of the Heb gibbōr, "mighty man."

CHANAAN, kā'nān, kā'nā-an (Χαναάν, Chana-án) Chanaanite, kā'nān-īt, AV in the Apoc (Jth 5 3.16) and NT (Acts 7 11; 13 19) for RV CANAAN, CANAANITE (q.v.).

CHANCE, chans: The idea of chance in the sense of something wholly fortuitous was utterly foreign to the Heb creed. Throughout the whole course of Israel's history, to the Heb mind, law, not chance, ruled the universe, and that law was not something blindly mechanical, but the expression of the personal Jeh. Israel's belief upon this subject may be summed up in the couplet,

"The lot is cast into the lap;
But the whole disposing thereof is of Jeh" (Prov 16 33).

A number of Heb and Gr expressions have been tr'd "chance," or something nearly equivalent, but it is noteworthy that of the classical words for chance, συντυχία, suntuchia, and τύχη, tichē, the former never occurs in the Bible and the latter only twice in the LXX.

The closest approach to the idea of chance is found in the statement of the Philis that if their device for ascertaining the cause of their calamities turned out a certain way they would call them a chance, that is, bad luck (מִקְרֵה, mikreh, 1 S 6 9). But note that it was a heathen people who said this. We have the same Heb noun and the vb.,

from which the noun is taken, a number of times, but variously rendered into Eng.: Uncleaness that "chanceth him by night" (Dt 23 10). "Her hap was to light on the portion of the field" (Ruth 2 3). "Something hath befallen him" (1 S 20 26). "One event happeneth to them all" (Ecl 2 14.15); "that which befalleth the sons of men" ("sons of men are a chance," ERVm) (Ecl 3 19). "There is one event to the righteous and to the wicked" (Ecl 9 2.3). Here the idea certainly is not something independent of the will of God, but something unexpected by man.

There is also קָרָא, kārā', "If a bird's nest chance to be before thee in the way" (Dt 22 6). Both the above Heb words are combined in the statement "As I happened by chance upon Mount Gilboa" (2 S 1 6). "And Absalom chanced to meet the servants of David" ("met the servants," 18 9, AV). "And there happened to be there a base fellow" (2 S 20 1).

We have also פָּגַע, pegha', "Time and chance happeneth to them all" meaning simply occurrence (Ecl 9 11). "Neither adversary, nor evil occurrence" (1 K 5 4).

In the NT we have συγκυρία, sugkuria, "coincidence," a meeting apparently accidental, a coincidence. "By chance a certain priest was going down that way" (Lk 10 31). Also ἐι τύχοι, ei tichoi. "It may chance of wheat, or of some other kind," i.e. we cannot tell which (1 Cor 15 37). "It may be" (1 Cor 14 10).

If we look at the LXX we find tuchē used twice. "And Leah said, [En tuchē] With fortune" ("a troop cometh," AV; "fortunate," RV; "with fortune," RVm, Gen 30 11). Note, it was no Israelite, but Leah who said this. "That prepare a table for Fortune, and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny" ("fate," Isa 65 11). In this passage tuchē stands for the Heb מְנִי, mēnī, the god of destiny, and Fortune is for Gad, the old Sem name for the god of fortune found in inscriptions, private names, etc. Note here, however, also, that the prophet was rebuking idolatrous ones for apostasy to heathen divinities.

We have also in the Apoc, "these things which have chanced," RV "to be opened unto thee" (2 Esd 10 49). See also GAD; MENI.

GEORGE HENRY TREVER

CHANCELLOR, chan'sel-ēr: The rendering in Ezr 4 8.9.17 of the Heb מְסַלֵּם, bē'el tē'em; LXX Βάαλ, Baal (9), Βαλγάμ, Balgām (17), the latter being an incorrect tr of Heb מ. In 1 Esd 2 16.25, Βελλεθμος, Beēlthmos (cf Ezr 4 8) occurs as a corruption, doubtless of מְסַלֵּם, bē'el tē'em. The term in question designates an Assy office, viz. that of the "master or lord of official intelligence," or "postmaster" (Sayce).

CHANGE, chānj: A word which seeks to express the many shades of meaning contained in 13 variations of 9 Heb words and 5 Gr. These signify, in turn, "to change," "to exchange," "to turn," "to put or place," "to make other," i.e. "alter," "to disguise oneself," חָלַף, hālaph, and its derivatives, occurring often, indicates "to pass away," hence alter, renew, e.g. (1) "changes of raiment" (Gen 45 22; Jgs 14 12.13.19); (2) "changed my wages ten times" (Gen 31 7.41); (3) heavens changed "as a vesture" (Ps 102 26); (4) "changes and warfare" (Job 10 17), i.e. relays of soldiers as illustrated in 1 K 5 14 (RVm "host after host is against me"); (5) "till my change come" (RV "release"), i.e. death (Job 14 14); (6) "changed the ordinances" (ARV "violated the statutes"), i.e. disregarded law (Isa 24 5); (7) change of mind (Hab 1 11 AV). Used also of change of character, הִפְּךָ, hāphakh: (1) of leprosy, "changed unto white" (Lev 13 16); (2) fig. of the moral life, "Can the Ethiopian change his skin?" (Jer 13 23); so also מִיר, mūr, and derivatives, "changed their gods" and "their glory," etc (Ps 106 20; Jer 2 11; Hos 4 7). Other words used to indicate change of name (2 K 24 17); of day and night (Job 17 12); of times and seasons (Dnl 2 21); of countenance (Dnl 7 28); of behavior (1 S 21 13); God's unchangeableness, "I, Jeh, change not" (Mal 3 6).

In the NT the word has to do chiefly with spiritual realities: (1) μετατίθημι, metatithēmi, of the necessary change of the priesthood and law under Christ (He 7 12); (2) ἀλλάττω, allattō, of His changing the customs of Moses (Acts 6 14); (3) of moral change, e.g. debasement (Rom 1 23.25.26); (4) of bodily change at the resurrection (1 Cor 15 51.52; μετασχηματίζω, metaschematizō, Phil 3 21 AV); (5) μεταβάλλω, metabállō, of change of mind in presence of a miracle (Acts 28 6); (6) of the change to come over the heavens at the great day of the Lord (He 1 12; cf 2 Pet 3 10.12).

Figurative uses indicated separately in the course of the article. DWIGHT M. PRATT

CHANGE OF RAIMENT, rā'ment. See DRESS.

CHANGER, chān'jēr (κολλυβιστής, kollubistēs, "money-changer," and so rendered Mt 21 12; Mk 11 15): A banker or other person who changes money at a fixed rate. Indignant at the profane traffic in the temple Jesus "poured out the changers' money" (Jn 2 15). So used only here. For fuller treatment see BANK; MONEY-CHANGERS.

CHANNEL, chan'el (אֵפְחַק, 'āphīk [r. אֵפְחַק, 'āphak, "to hold or contain," "to be strong"; cf Arab. 'afak, "to overcome," and 'āfik, "preëminent"]; שִׁבְבוֹלֶת, shibboleth [r. שִׁבְבַל, shābbal, "to go," "to go up or grow," "to flow"; cf Arab. 'asbal, "to flow," "to rain," "to put forth ears"; sabalat, "an ear of grain"; sabīl, "a road," "a public fountain"]): In Job 12 21; 40 18; 41 15 we have 'āphīk in the sense of "strong" (but cf 40 18, RV "tubes" [of brass]). Elsewhere it is trd "river," "brook," "stream," "channel" or "watercourse." Shibboleth (in the dialect of Ephraim shibboleth [Jgs 12 6]) means "an ear of grain" (Gen 41 5 ff; Ruth 2 2; Isa 17 5) or "a flood of water" (Ps 69 2.15; Isa 27 12). In 2 S 22 16 (cf Ps 18 15) we have:

"Then the channels of the sea appeared,
The foundations of the world were laid bare,
By the rebuke of Jeh,
At the blast of the breath of his nostrils."

This is reminiscent of "fountains of the deep" (Gen 7 11; 8 2; Prov 8 28). It is a question how far we should attribute to these ancient writers a share in modern notions of oceanography, but the idea seems to be that of a withdrawal of the water of the ocean, and the laying bare of submarine declivities and channels such as we know to exist as the result of erosion during a previous period of elevation, when the given portion of ocean floor was dry land.

The fact that many streams of Pal flow only during the rainy season seems to be referred to in Job 6 15; and perhaps also in Ps 126 4. See BROOK; RIVER.

ALFRED ELY DAY

CHANT (פָּרָאֵת, pārat): Occurs only once in AV in Am 6 5, and the meaning of the Heb is uncertain. Pārat corresponds to an Arab. root meaning to anticipate. It may therefore signify to improvise, to sing without care or preparation. RV "to sing idle songs" suits the context. See DRIVER, Joel and Amos.

CHANUNEUS, ka-nun'ē-us (Χανοναῖος, Chanounaios; AV Channuneus): A Levite in the list of 1 Esd 8 48, probably corresponding to "Merari" in Ezr 8 19.

CHAPEL, chap'el (מִקְדָּשׁ, mikdash, "a holy place"; RV SANCTUARY, q.v.): "It is the king's chapel" (Am 7 13 AV), an expression indicative of the dependence of this sanctuary on the court.

CHAPHENATHA, ka-fen'a-tha (Χαφενάθα, Chaphenathá; AV Caphenatha): A name apparently given to part of the eastern wall of Jerus or a fort in that neighborhood which is said (1 Macc 12 37) to have been repaired by Jonathan Maccabaeus. The place cannot now be identified. Various speculations have been made as to the origin of the name, but they can hardly be said to throw any light on the passage cited.

CHAPITER, chap'i-tēr. See ARCHITECTURE; JACHIN AND BOAZ; TEMPLE, II, 4.

CHAPMAN, chap'man (pl. אֲנָשֵׁי הַתִּירָם, 'anshē ha-tīrīm): Word used only once in AV (2 Ch 9 14, ARV "the traders"; cf also 1 K 10 15 RV, where the Heb uses the same expression). The Eng. word means "merchant"; cf the vb. "to chaffer," and the Germ. Kaufmann. The Heb means "those who go about" as merchants.

CHAPT (הָתַח, hāthath): The Heb term hāthath means "broken," "terrified" or "dismayed." This term as it occurs in Jer 14 4 is rendered "chapt" in EV, "cracked" in ARV, and "dismayed" in RVm. Inasmuch as the Heb term means "broken," it is not incorrectly rendered "chapt" or "chapped," which means to be cracked open.

CHARAATHALAN, kar-a-ath'a-lan (Χαρααθαλάν, Charaathalan; AV Charaathalar [1 Esd 5 36]): Most probably a corruption of the text. The names "Cherub, Addan, and Immer" in the lists of Ezr 2 59 and Neh 7 61 are presented in the text cited as "Charaathalan leading them, and Allar."

CHARACA, kar'a-ka. See CHARAX.

CHARASHIM, kar'a-shim (הָרָשִׁים, hārāshīm, "craftsmen"). See GE-HARASHIM.

CHARAX, kār'ax (εἰς τὸν Χάρακα, eis tón Cháraka; AV Characa, kar'a-ka; Χάραξ, Chárax): A place mentioned only in 2 Macc 12 17. It lay E. of the Jordan and is said to be 750 stadia from Caspis, and to be inhabited by Jews called Tubieni, that is, of Tobie (Tob) in Gilead (1 Macc 5 9.13; 2 Macc 12 17). There is no clue as to the direction in which Ch. lay from Caspis. Possibly Kerak (Kir-moab), in post-Bib. times called Charamōba and Mōboucharax, may represent the place. It lay about 100 miles S. of el-Mezerib, S.E. of the Dead Sea.

CHARCHEMISH, kār'ke-mish. See CARCHEMISH.

CHARCHUS, kār'kus. See BARCHUS.

CHAREA, kār'ē-a (Χαρεία, Charéa): Head of a family of temple-servants (1 Esd 5 32); called "Harsha" in Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54.

CHARGE, chārj, CHARGEABLE, chār'ja-b'l (from Lat carrus, "a wagon," hence "to lay or put a load on or in," "to burden, or be a burden"):

Figurative: (1) of a special duty (מִשְׁמֶרֶת, mishmereth, "thing to be watched"), "the c. of Jeh"

(Lev 8 35), the injunctions given in Ex 29; "the c. of the tabernacle" (Nu 1 53); "the c. of the sons of Gershon" (3 25); (2) of the burden of expense (כָּבֵד, kābhēdh, "to be, or make heavy"; ἀδάπανος, adāpanos, "without expense"), "lest we be chargeable unto thee" (2 S 13 25 AV, RV "burdensome"); "The former governors . . . were c. unto the people" (Neh 5 15 m "laid burdens upon"); "that . . . I may make the gospel without c." (1 Cor 9 18; see CHARGES); (3) of oversight, care, custody, "Who gave him a c. over the earth?" (Job 34 13); "to have the c. of the gate" (2 K 7 17); "c. of the vessels of service" (1 Ch 9 28); "cause ye them that have c. [פְּקֻדּוֹת, pēkuddōth, "inspectors"] over the city" (Ezk 9 1); "who had the c. of all her treasure" (Acts 8 27 AV, RV "was over"); (4) of a command, injunction, requirement, "He gave him a c." (Gen 28 6); "His father charged the people with the oath" (1 S 14 27); "Jesus strictly [m "sternly"] charged them" (Mt 9 30); "I charge you by the Lord" (1 Thess 5 27 AV, RV "adjure"); "having received such a c." (Acts 16 24, παραγγελία, paraggelia, "private or extra message"); "This c. I commit unto thee" (1 Tim 1 18); (5) of blame, responsibility, reckoning, "Lord, lay not this sin to their c." (Acts 7 60); "nothing laid to his c." (23 29); "Who shall lay anything to the c. of God's elect?" (Rom 8 33).
M. O. EVANS

CHARGER, chār'jēr (ARV "platter"): A word which meant in the older Eng. speech a flat dish or platter. It is used in the Bible as the tr (1) of קֶלְכֶּרֶת, kē'ārāh, which in Nu 7 19 AV (RV "platter") and repeatedly in that chapter denotes one of the gifts made by the several princes at the dedication of the tabernacle; (2) of אֶגְחָל, 'āghartāl, a word of uncertain derivation used in Ezr 1 9 (AV) twice to designate certain temple vessels which might better be called "libation bowls"; (3) of πῖναξ, pīnax, used Mt 14 8.11; Mk 6 25.28 (EV) for the dish in which the head of John the Baptist was presented.
DAVID FOSTER ESTES

CHARGES, chār'jiz (δανάω, dapanāō, "to spend"): "Be at charges for them" (Acts 21 24, AV "with them"), i.e. pay the sacrificial expenses of these poorer Nazirites (cf Jos, Ant, XIX, xvi, 1).

CHARIOT, char'i-ot (מֶרְכָבָה, merkābh, מֶרְכָּבָה, merkābhāh, "riding-chariot," רֶכֶב, rekhebh, "war-chariot"; ἄρμα, hárma):

It is to the chariots of ancient Egypt that reference is first made in Scripture. Joseph was honored by being made to ride in the second

1. Chariots of Egypt Chariot of King Pharaoh (Gen 41 43). Joseph paid honor to his father on his arrival in Goshen by meeting him in his chariot (Gen 46 29). In the state ceremonial with which the remains of Jacob were escorted to Canaan, chariots and horsemen were conspicuous (Gen 50 9). In the narrative of the departure of the Israelites from Egypt and of Pharaoh's futile attempts to detain them the chariots and horsemen of Pharaoh figure largely (Ex 14 17.18.23.25; 15 4. 19). It was with the Hyksos invasion, some cents. before the Exodus, that the horse, and subsequently the chariot, were introduced for purposes of war into Egypt; and it may have been the possession of chariots that enabled those hated shepherd warriors to overpower the native Egyptians. The Egypt chariot was distinguished by its lightness of build. It was so reduced in weight that it was possible for a man to carry his chariot on his shoulders without fatigue. The ordinary chariot was made of wood and leather, and had only two occupants, the fighting man and his shield-bearer. The royal chariots were ornamented with gold and silver, and in the battle of Megiddo Thothmes III is represented as standing in his chariot of electrum like the god of war, brandishing his lance. In the battle the victorious Egyptians captured 2,041 horses and 924 chariots from the Syrian allies.

Egyptian War-Chariot.

The Canaanites had long been possessed of horses and chariots when Joshua houghed their horses and burnt their chariots with fire at

2. Chariots of the Canaanites the waters of Merom (Josh 11 6.9). The chariots of iron which the Canaanites could manoeuvre in the plains and valleys proved a formidable obstacle to the complete conquest of the land (Jgs 1 19). Jabin had 900 chariots of iron, and with them he was able to oppress the children of Israel twenty years (Jgs 4 3). The Philis of the low country and the maritime plain, of whom we read in Jgs and S, were a warlike people, were disciplined and well armed and their possession of chariots gave them a great advantage over the Israelites. In the war of Michmash they put into the field the incredible number of 30,000 chariots and 6,000 horsemen, only in the end to suffer a grievous defeat (1 S 13 5; 14 20). In the battle of Gilboa, however, the chariots and horsemen of the Philis bore down all opposition, and proved the destruction of Saul and his house. Of these chariots there have come down to us no detailed description and no representation. But we cannot be far wrong in turning to the chariot of the Hittites as a type of the Canaanite and Philis chariot. It is not from the monuments of the Hittites themselves, however, but from the representations of the Kheta of the Egypt monuments, that we know what their chariots were like. Their chariotry was their chief arm of offence. The Hittite chariot was used, too, for hunting; but a heavier car with paneled sides was employed for war. The Egypt monuments represent three Hittites in each car, a practice which differed from that of Egypt and attracted attention. Of the three, one guided the chariot, another did the fighting with sword and lance, and the third was the shield-bearer.

The Israelites living in a mountainous country were tardy in adopting the chariot for purposes of war. David houghed all the chariot horses of Hadadezer, king of Zobah, and "reserved of them for a hundred chariots" (2 S 8 4), and Adonijah prepared for himself chariots and horsemen with a view to contest the throne of his father (1 K 1 5). But Solomon was the first in Israel to acquire chariots and horses on a national scale, and to build cities for their accommodation (1 K 9 19). In MT of the OT we read that Solomon had agents who received droves of horses from Egypt, and it is added: "And a chariot came up and went out of Egypt for 600 shekels of silver, and a horse for 150; and so for all the kings of the Hittites, and for the kings of Syria, did they bring them out by their means" (1 K 10 29). On the strength of a warrantable emendation of the text it is now proposed to read the preceding (ver 28): "And Solomon's import of horses was from Musri and from Kuë; the king's traders received them from Kuë at a price"—where Musri and Kuë are North Syria and Cilicia. No doubt it was Egypt out of which the nation was forbidden by the Deuteronomic law to multiply horses (Dt 17 16), but on the other hand the statement of Ezk (27 14) that Israel derived horses, chargers and mules not from Egypt but from Togarmah—North Syria and Asia Minor—agrees with the new rendering (Burney, Notes on Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings, in loc.). From Solomon's time onward chariots were in use in both kingdoms. Zimri, who slew Elah, son of Baasha, king of Israel, was captain of half his chariots (1 K 16 9). It was when sitting in his chariot in disguise beside the driver that Ahab received his fatal wound at Ramoth-gilead (1 K 22 34). The floor of the royal chariot was a pool of blood, and "they washed the chariot by the pool of Samaria" (vs 35.38). It was in his war-chariot that his servants carried Josiah dead from the fatal field of Megiddo (2 K 23 30). The chief pieces of the Heb chariot were (1) the pole to which the two horses were yoked, (2) the axle—resting upon two wheels with six or eight spokes (1 K 7 33)—into which the pole was fixed, (3) a frame or body open behind, standing upon the axle and fitted by a leather band to the pole. The chariots of iron of which we read (Jgs 4 3) were of wood strengthened or studded with iron. Like that of the Hittite, the Heb chariot probably carried three men, although in the chariot of Ahab (1 K 22 34) and in that of Jehu (2 K 9 24 f) we read of only two.

Assyrian Chariot.

In the later days when the Assyrians overran the lands of the West, the Israelites had to face the chariots and the hosts of Sennacherib

4. Chariots of the Assyrians and of the kings (2 K 19 23). And they faced them with chariots of their own. An inscription of Shalmaneser II of Assyria tells how in the battle of Karkar (854 BC) Ahab of the land of Israel had put into the field 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers. But the Assyrian chariotry was too numerous and powerful for Israel. The Assyrian chariot was larger and heavier than the Egyptian or the Hebrew: it had usually three and sometimes four occupants (Maspéro, Life in Ancient Egypt and Assyria, 322). When we read in Nahum's prophecy of "chariots flashing with steel," "rushing to and fro in the broad ways" (Nah 2 3.4), it is of the Assyrian chariots that we are to think being hastily got together for the defence of Nineveh.

In early Bab inscriptions of the 3d millennium before Christ there is evidence of the use of the war-chariots, and Nebuchadrezzar in his campaigns to the West had chariots as part of his victorious host (Jer 47 3). It was the Persians who first employed scythed chariots in war; and we find Antiochus Eupator in the Seleucid period equipping a Gr force against Judaea which had 800 chariots armed with scythes (2 Macc 13 2).

5. Chariots of Chaldeans, Persians, Greeks

In the NT the chariot is only twice mentioned. Besides the chariot in which the Ethiopian eunuch was traveling when Philip the evangelist made up to him (Acts 8 28.29.38), there is only the mention of the din of war-chariots to which the onrush of locusts in Apocalyptic vision is compared (Rev 9 9).

6. In the NT

In the fig. language of Scripture, the chariot has a place. It is a tribute to the powerful influence of Elijah and Elisha when they are separately called "the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof" (2 K 2 12; 13 14). The angelic hosts are declared to be God's chariots, twice ten thousand, thousands upon thousands (Ps 68 17). But chariots and horses themselves are a poor substitute for the might of God (Ps 20 7). God Himself is represented as riding upon His chariots of salvation for the defence of His people (Hab 3 8). In the Book of Zec, the four chariots with their horses of various colors have an apocalyptic significance (Zec 6). In the worship of the host of heaven which prevailed in the later days of the kingdom of Judah, "the chariots of the sun" (see art.) were symbols which led the people into gross idolatry and King Josiah burnt them with fire (2 K 23 11).

CHARIOTS OF THE SUN (מִרְכָּבֹת הַשֶּׁמֶשׁ, mark^bhōth ha-shemesh): These, together with "horses of the sun," are mentioned in 2 K 23 11. They are said to have stood in the temple, a gift of the kings of Judah. Josiah removed the horses from the precincts of the temple and burned the chariots. Among the Greeks, Helios was endowed with horses and chariots. Thus the course of the sun as he sped across the skies was understood by the mythological mind of antiquity. The Bab god Shamash (=Heb Shemesh) likewise had his chariot and horses as well as his charioteer. The cult of the sun and other heavenly bodies which was particularly in vogue during the latter days of the Judaean monarchy (cf 2 K 23 5; Ezk 8 16 f; Dt 17 3; Jer 8 2) seems to have constituted an element of the Canaanitish religion (cf the names of localities like Beth-shemesh and the like). The chariots of the sun are also referred to in En 72 5.37; 75 4, and Gr Apoc of Bar 6.

CHARITABLY, char'i-ta-bli (κατὰ ἀγάπην, katà agápēn): The RV, which substitutes "love" for "charity" regularly, removing the latter word from the vocabulary of Scripture, makes a like change in Rom 14 15, the only occurrence of "charitably" in AV; RV "in love." See CHARITY.

CHARITY, char'i-ti (ἀγάπη, agápē):

1. A New Word
2. A New Ideal
3. An Apostolic Term
4. Latin Equivalents
5. English Translation
6. Inward Motive
7. Character
8. Ultimate Ideal
9. Almsgiving
10. Tolerance

In AV in 26 places from 1 Cor 8 1 onward. The same Gr word, which appears in the NT 115 times, is elsewhere tr^d by "love."

The subst. agapē is mainly, if not exclusively, a Bib. and ecclesiastical word (see Deissmann, Bible Studies, 198 ff), not found in profane

1. A New Word writings, although the vb. agapān, from which it is derived, is used in classical Gr in the sense of "love, founded in admiration, veneration, esteem, like the Lat diligere" (Grimm-Thayer), rather than natural emotion (Lat amare). It is a significant evidence of the sense of a new ideal and principle of life that permeated the Christian consciousness

2. A New Ideal of the earliest communities, that they should have made current a new word to express it, and that they should derive that word, not from the current or philosophical language of Gr morality, but from the LXX.

In the NT the word is apostolic, and appears first and predominantly in the Pauline writings.

3. An Apostolic Term It is found only twice in the Synoptics (Mt 24 12; Lk 11 42), and although it is in both places put in the mouth of the Saviour, it can easily be understood how the language of a later time may have been used by the narrator, when it is considered that these gospels were compiled and reduced to writing many years after the spread of the Pauline epistles. The word is not found in Jas, Mk or Acts, but it appears in Paul 75 times, in Jn 30 times, in Pet 4 times, in Jude twice and in He twice. Jesus Christ gave the thing and the spirit in the church, and the apostles (probably Paul) invented the term to express it. When Jerome came to translate the

4. Latin Equivalents Gr testament into Lat, he found in that language no word to represent agapē. Amor was too gross, and he fell back on dilectio and caritas, words which, however, in their original meanings were too weak and colorless to represent agapē adequately. No principle seems to have guided him in the choice of the one word or the other in particular places. Caritas in Eng. became "charity," and was taken over by the Eng. translators from the

5. English Translation Vulg, though not with any regularity, nor as far as can be judged, according to any definite principle, except that it is used of agapē only in man, never as it denotes a quality or action of God, which is always tr^d by "love." When agapē is tr^d by "charity" it means either (1) a disposition in man which may qualify his own character (1 Cor 8 1) and be ready to go forth to God (1 Cor 8 3) or to men; or (2) an active and actual relation with other men, generally within the church (Col 3 14; 1 Thess 3 6; 2 Thess 1 3; 1 Tim 1 5; 4 12; 1 Pet 4 8; 5 14), but also absolutely and universally (1 Cor 13). In the earlier epistles it stands first and unique as the supreme principle of the Christian life (1 Cor 13), but in the later writings, it is enumerated as one among the Christian virtues (1 Tim 2 15; 2 Tim 2 22; 3 10; Tit 2 2; 2 Pet 1 7; Rev 2 19). In Paul's psalm of love (1 Cor 13) it is set forth as an innermost principle contrasted with prophecy and knowledge,

6. Inward Motive faith and works, as the motive that determines the quality of the whole inner life, and gives value to all its activities. If a man should have all gifts of miracles and intellect, and perform all the works of goodness and devotion, "and have not love, it profiteth nothing," for they would be purely external and legal, and lacking in the quality of moral choice and personal relation which give life its value (vs 1-3). Love itself defines men's relation to men as generous, tolerant and forgiving. "Love suffereth long, and is kind; love envieth not" (ver 4). It determines and defines a man's own character and personality. It is not boastful and

7. Character arrogant, but dignified, pure, holy, courageous and serene. Evil cannot provoke it nor wrong delight it. It bears cheerfully all adversity and follows its course in confident hope (vs 4-7). It is final virtue, the ultimate ideal of life. Many of life's activities cease or change, but "love never faileth."

8. Ultimate Ideal To it all other graces and virtues are subordinated. "Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; and the greatest of these is love" (vs 8-13). In one passage only in the NT (3 Jn ver 6) agapē seems to have a meaning that comes near to the later, ecclesiastical meaning of charity as almsgiving.

9. Alms-giving With the growing legalism of the church and the prevalence of monastic ideals of morality, caritas came to mean the very opposite of Paul's agapē—just "the giving of goods to feed the poor," which "without love profiteth nothing." At present the word means either liberality to the poor, or tolerance in judging the actions of others, both qualities of love, but

10. Tolerance very inadequate to express its totality. The Revisers have therefore accurately dropped the word and substituted

"love" for it in all passages. It is interesting to note that in Welsh the reverse process has occurred: cariad (from Lat caritas) was used throughout to translate agapē, with the result that in both religious and ordinary speech the word has established itself so firmly as almost to oust the native word serch.

CHARM, chärm: Definition.—The word charm is derived from the Latin carmen, "a song," and denotes strictly what is sung; then it comes to mean a magical formula chanted or recited with a view to certain desired results. Charm is distinguished from amulet in this, that the latter is a material object having as such a magical potency, though it is frequently an inscribed formula on it that gives this object its power (see AMULET). The word charm stands primarily for the incantation, though it is often applied to an inscribed amulet.

A charm may be regarded as having a positive or a negative effect. In the first case it is supposed to secure some desired object or result (see AMULET). In the second, it is conceived as having the power of warding off evils, as the evil eye, the inflections of evil spirits and the like. In the last, its negative meaning, the word "countercharm" (German, Gegenzauber) is commonly used.

Charms are divisible into two general classes according as they are written (or printed) or merely spoken:

(1) Written charms.—Of these we have examples in the phylacteries and the m'zūzāh noticed in the art. AMULET. In Acts 19 13-20 we read of written charms used by the Ephesians, such as are elsewhere called ἐφέσια γράμματα (ephēsia grāmματα). Such magical formulae were written generally on leather, though sometimes on papyrus, on lead, and even on gold. Those mentioned in the above passage must have been inscribed on some very valuable material, gold perhaps, or they could not have cost £2,000 (=50,000 drachmas). Charms of the kind have been dug up from the ruins of Ephesus. In modern Egypt drinking-bowls are used, inscribed with passages from the Koran, and it is considered very lucky to drink from such a "lucky bowl," as it is called. Parts of the Koran and often complete miniature copies are worn by Egyptians and esp. by Egypt soldiers during war. These are buried with the dead bodies, just as the ancient Egyptians interred with their dead portions of the Book of the Dead or even the whole book, and as the early Abyssinians buried with dead bodies certain magical texts. Jos (Ant, VIII, ii, 5) says that Solomon composed incantations by which demons were exorcised and diseases healed.

(2) Spoken charms are at least as widespread as those inscribed. Much importance was attached by the ancients (Egypt, Bab, etc) to the manner in which the incantations were recited, as well as to the substance of the formulae. If beautifully uttered, and with sufficient frequency, such incantations possessed unlimited power. The stress laid on the mode of reciting magical charms necessitated the existence of a priestly class and did much to increase the power of such a class. The binding force of the uttered word is implied in many parts of the OT (see Josh 9 20). Though the princes of Israel had promised under false pretences to make a covenant on behalf of Israel with the Gibeonites, they refused to break their promise because the word had been given. The words of blessing and curse were believed to have in themselves the power of self-realization. A curse was a means of destruction, not a mere realization (see Nu 22-24, Balaam's curses; Jgs 5 23; Job 31). In a similar way the word of blessing was believed to insure its own realization. In Gen 48 8-22 the greatness of Ephraim and Manasseh is ascribed to the blessing of Jacob upon them (see further Ex 12 32; Jgs 17 2; 2 S 21 3). It is no doubt to be understood that the witch of Endor raised Samuel from the dead by the recitation of some magical formula (1 S 28 7 ff).

The uttering of the tetragrammaton was at a very early time (at latest 300 BC) believed to be magically potent, and hence its ordinary use was forbidden, so that instead of Jeh, the Jews of the time, when the earliest part of the LXX was tr^d, used for this Divine name the appellative 'ādhōnāi = "Lord." In a similar way among the Jews of post-Bib. and perhaps of even Bib. times, the pronunciation of the Aaronic blessing (Nu 6 24-26) was supposed to possess great efficacy and to be a means of certain good to the person or persons involved. Evil spirits were exorcised by Jews of Paul's day through the use of the name of the Lord Jesus (Acts 19 13). In the Talm (Pesāhim 110a) it is an instruction that if a man meets a witch he should say, "May a pot of boiling dung be stuffed into your mouth, you ugly witch," and her power is gone.

T. WITTON DAVIES

CHARME, kār'mě (so RV; AV Carne; Χαρμή, Charmē): A Gr transliteration of Heb hārim. The name of a priestly family in the list of those who returned from the Exile (1 Esd 5 25=Harim in Ezr 2 39=Neh 7 42).

CHARMIS, kār'mis (Χάρμεις, Chármeis, Χαρμείς, Charméis, A, Χαλμείς, Chalméis): The son of Melchiel, one of the three elders or rulers of the town of Bethulia (Jth 6 15; 8 10; 10 6).

CHARRAN, kar'an (Χαρράν, Charrhán): Gr form of HARAN (q.v.) (Acts 7 24).

CHASE, chās. See HUNTING.

CHASEBA, kas'è-ba (Χασεβά, Chasebá): The name of a family of temple-servants in the list of those who returned from Babylon (1 Esd 5 31). The name is not given in the || passages in Ezr and Neh.

CHASTE, chāst, CHASTITY, chas'ti-ti. See CRIMES; MARRIAGE.

CHASTENING, chās'n-ing, CHASTISEMENT, chas'tiz-ment: These two words corresponding to Heb מִסָּר, mūsār, and Gr paideia, paideia, are distinguished in Eng. use, in that "chastisement" is applied to the infliction of pain, either as a punishment or for recalling to duty, while "chastening" is a wider term, indicating the discipline or training to which one is subjected, without, as in the other term, referring to the means employed to this end. The narrower term occurs in RV but once in the NT and then in its verbal form, Lk 23 16: "I will therefore chastise him." AV uses it also in He 12 8.

The meaning of the word paideia grows with the progress of revelation. Its full significance is unfolded in the NT, when reconciliation through Christ has brought into prominence the true fatherhood of God (He 12 5.10). In the OT, where it occurs about 40 times, the radical meaning is that simply of training, as in Dt 8 5: "As a man chasteneth his son, so Jeh thy God chasteneth thee." But, as in a dispensation where the distinguishing feature is that of the strictest justice, retributive punishment becomes not only an important, but a controlling factor in the training, as in Lev 26 28: "I will chastise you seven times for your sins." In this sense, it is used of chastisements inflicted by man even unjustly: "My father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions" (1 K 12 11). As, therefore, the thought of the suffering inflicted, or that of the end toward which it is directed, preponderates, the Psalmist can pray: "Neither chasten me in thy hot displeasure" (Ps 6 1), and take comfort in the words: "Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest" (Ps 94 12). Hence it is common in both AV and RV to find the Heb mūsār, and Gr paideia tr^d as "instruction." Illustrations are most numerous in Prov.

In the NT the Gr paideia is used with a variety similar to its corresponding Heb in the OT. Examples of the fundamental idea, viz. that of "training," are found in such passages as Acts 7 22; 22 3, where Moses and Paul are said to have been "instructed," and 2 Tim 3 16, where Scripture is said to be "profitable . . . for instruction" (cf 1 Tim 1 20; 2 Tim 2 25; Tit 2 12; Rom 2 20). A similar, but not identical, thought, is found in Eph 6 4: "Nurture them in the chastening and admonition of the Lord." But when paideia is described as bringing pain, the mystery of suffering, which in the OT is most fully treated in the Book of Job, at last finds its explanation. The child of God realizes that he cannot be beneath God's wrath, and hence that the chastening which he endures is not destructive, but corrective (1 Cor 10 13; 11 32; 2 Cor 6 9; Rev 3 19). In He 12 5-11, such consolation is afforded, not, as in the above passages, by incidental allusions, but by a full argument upon the basis of Prov 3 11 f, an OT text that has depth and richness that can be understood and appropriated only by those who through Christ have learned to recognize the Omnipotent Ruler of heaven and earth, as their loving and considerate Father. On the basis of this passage, a distinction is often drawn between punishment and chastisement; the former, as an act of justice, revealing wrath, and the latter, as an act of mercy, love. Since to them that are in Christ Jesus, there is no condemnation (Rom 8 1) they can suffer no punishment, but only chastisement. Where there is guilt, there is punishment; but where guilt has been removed, there can be no punishment. There being no degrees of justification, no one can be forgiven in part, with a partial guilt still set to his account for which he must yet give a reckoning, either here or hereafter. If, then, all the righteousness of Christ belongs to him, and no sin whatever remains to be forgiven, either in whole or in part, all life's sorrows are remedial agencies against danger and to train for the kingdom of heaven. CHATTER, chat'ēr (צָפַף, ṣāphaph): This word, which means to "peep," "twitter," or "chirp," as small birds do, is tr^d "chatter" only in Isa 38 14, "Like a swallow or a crane, so did I chatter." See CHIRP.

CHAVAH, kā'va (LXX Ζωή, Zōē): A transliteration of the Heb חַוְוָה, ḥawwāh or hawwāh, which means "life giver," "living," and appears in our Eng. VSS as Ève (Gen 3 20 AVm).

CHEBAR, kē'bār (כְּבַר, kēbhār, "joining" [Young], "length" [Strong]; Χοβάρ, Chobār): The river by the side of which his first vision was vouchsafed to Ezekiel (1 1). It is described as in "the land of the Chaldaeans," and is not, therefore, to be sought in northern Mesopotamia. This rules out the Habor, the mod. Chabour, with which it is often identified. The two names are radically distinct: כְּבַר could not be derived from כְּבַר. One of the great Bab. canals is doubtless intended. Hilprecht found mention made of (nāru) kabaru, one of these canals large enough to be navigable, to the E. of Nippur, "in the land of the Chaldaeans." This "great canal" he identifies with the mod. shaṭṭ en-Nūl, in which probably we should recognize the ancient Chebar. W. EWING

CHECK (מוֹסֵר, mūsār): Occurs in Job 20 3 AV, "I have heard the check of my reproach" (RV "the reproof which putteth me to shame"), i.e. a check or reproof, such as that which closes the last speech of Job (ch 19), and intended to put Zophar to shame.

CHECKER-WORK, chek'ēr-wûrk (NETWORK) (שִׁבְכָה, sēbhākhāh): This was a kind of ornamentation used on the tops of the pillars of Jachin and Boaz before the porch of the Temple (1 K 7 17). Its exact form is not known. See TEMPLE. For "a brodered coat" (Ex 28 4 AV), RV gives "a coat of checker work." See BRODERED; EMBROIDERY.

The name of the Elamite overlord with whom Amraphel, Arioch and Tidal marched against Sodom and Gomorrah, and the other cities of the plain (Gen 14 1 ff). The Gr (LXX) form of the name is Chodollogomor, implying a different vocalization, the assimilation of r with l, and the pronunciation of 'o as gho (Codorlaghomer). This suggests that the Elamite form, in cuneiform, would be Kudur-lagamar, the second element being the name of a god, and the whole therefore meaning "servant of La'omer" (La-gamar), or the like. A Bab deity worshipped at Dilmu, Lagamal, may be the same as the Elamite Lagamar. This name is not found in the cuneiform inscriptions, unless it be, as is possible, the fancifully-written Kudur-laḡ[gu]mal (or Kodorlaḡgomal) of three late Bab legends, one of which is in poetical form. Besides this Elamite ruler, two of these tablets mention also a certain Eri-Aku or Eri-Akua, son of Durmaḥ-ilāni, and one of them refers to Tudhul[a] or Tidal. See ERI-AKU, 4.

Objections have been made to the identification of Chedorlaomer with the Kudur-laḡ[gu]mal of these texts, some Assyriologists having flatly denied the possibility, while others expressed the opinion that, though these names were respectively those with which they have been identified, they were not the personages referred to in Gen 14, and many have refrained from expressing an opinion at all. The main reason for the identification of Kudur-laḡ[gu]mal with Chedorlaomer is its association with the names Eri-Eaku and Tudhul[a] found on two of the documents. No clear references to the expedition against the Cities of the Plain, however, have been found in these texts.

The longer of the two prose compositions (Brit. Mus., Sp. II, 987) refers to the bond of heaven [extended?] to the four regions, and the fame which he (Merodach?) set for [the Elamites] in Babylon, the city of [his] glory. So [the gods], in their faithful (or everlasting) counsel, decreed to Kudur-laḡgumal, king of Elam, [their favor?]. He came down, and [performed] what was good to them, and exercised dominion in Babylon, the city of Kar-Duniaš (Babylonia). When in power, however, he acted in a way which did not please the Babylonians, for he loved the winged fowl, and favoured the dog which crunched the bone. "What(?) king of Elam was there who had (ever) [shown favor to?] the shrine of Ê-saggil?" (Ê-sagila, the great temple of Belus at Babylon). A letter from Durmah-ilāni son of Eri-Ekua (?Arioch) is at this point quoted, and possibly of Eri-Ekua forms the justification for the sentences which had preceded, giving, as they do, reasons for the intervention of the native ruler. The mutilation of the inscription, however, makes the sense and sequence very difficult to follow.

The less perfect fragment (Sp. III, 2) contains, near the beginning, the word hammu, and if this be, as Professor F. Hommel has suggested, part of the name Hammurabi ilāni, Tudhul(a) and Kudur-laḡmal place the identification of Kudur-laḡgumal(?) with Chedorlaomer beyond a doubt. This inscription states, that Merodach, in the faithfulness of his heart, caused the ruler not supporting [the temples of Babylonia] to be slain with the sword. The name of Durmah-ilāni then occurs, and it seems to be stated of him that he carried off spoil, and Babylon and the temple Ê-saggil were inundated. He, however, was apparently murdered by his son, and old and young [were slain] with the sword. Then came Tudhul[a] or Tidal, son of Gazzā[mi?], who also carried off spoil, and again the waters devastated Babylon and Ê-saggil. But to all appearance Tudhul[a], in his turn, was overtaken by his fate, for "his son shattered his head with the weapon of his hands." At this point there is a reference to Elam, to the city Ahhēa(?), and to the land of Rabbātu^m, which he (? the king of Elam) had spoiled. Whether this refers to some expedition to Palestine or not is uncertain, and probably unlikely, as the next phrase speaks of devastation inflicted in Babylonia. But an untoward fate overtook this ruler likewise.

5. The Fate for Kudur-lahmal (=lahgumal), his of Sinful son, pierced his heart with the steel Rulers sword of his girdle. All these references to violent deaths are apparently cited to show the dreadful end of certain kings, "lords of sin," with whom Merodach, the king of the gods, was angry.

The third text is of a poetical nature, and refers several times to "the enemy, the Elamite"—apparently Kudur-lahgu[mal]. In this

6. The Poetical Legend noteworthy inscription, which, even in its present imperfect state, contains 78 lines of wedge-written text, the destruction wrought by him is related in detail. He cast down the door (of the temple) of Ištar; entered Du-mah, the place where the fates were declared (see BABEL, BABYLON), and told his warriors to take the spoil and the goods of the temple. He was afraid, however, to proceed

7. Kudur-lahgumal's Misdeeds to extremities, as the god of the place "flashed like lightning, and shook the [holy] places." The last two paragraphs state that he set his face to go down to Tiamtu (the seacoast; see CHALDEA), whither Ibi-Tutu, apparently the king of that district, had hastened, and founded a pseudo-capital. But the Elamite seems afterward to have taken his way north again, and after visiting Borsippa near Babylon, traversed "the road of darkness—the road to Mešku" (?Mesech). He destroyed the palace, subdued the princes, carried off the spoil of all the temples and took the goods [of the people] to Elam. At this point the text breaks off.

Where these remarkable inscriptions came from there ought to be more of the same nature, and if these be found, the mystery of Chedor-

8. The Importance of the Series laomer and Kudur-lahgumal will probably be solved. At present it can only be said, that the names all point to the early period of the Elamite rulers called Kudurides, before the land of Tiamtu or Tāmdu was settled by the Chaldaeans. Evidently it was one of the heroic periods of Babylonian history, and some scribe of about 350 BC had collected together a number of texts referring to it. All three tablets were purchased (not excavated) by the British Museum, and reached that institution through the same channel. CHEEK, chēk, CHEEKBONE, chēk'bōn:

(1) לִּיָּהּ, l'hi; σιαγών, siagōn, "the jaw," "jawbone," "side of the face." The Heb word denotes originally freshness and rounded softness of the cheek, a sign of beauty in youth and maiden (Cant 1 10; 5 13). The oriental guards with jealous care his cheek from touch or defilement, therefore a stroke on the cheek was, and is to this day, regarded as an act of extreme rudeness of behavior, a deadly affront. Our Saviour, however, teaches us in Mt 5 39 and Lk 6 29 that even this insult is to be ignored and pardoned.

Jawbones of animals have been frequently used as tools and weapons among primitive people. We see this sufficiently proven from cave deposits in many parts of the world, and from recent ethnological researches, esp. in Australia. In the light of this evidence it is interesting to note that Samson used a jawbone of an ass with success against his enemies the Philis (Jgs 15 15).

(2) מַלְקוֹחַ, mal'kōḥ (Ps 22 15), is a dual form indicative of the two jaws, to which a parched tongue seems to cleave.

(3) מִתְלָאֵה, m'ṭhall'āh (Job 29 17), better "cheek teeth" (q.v.). H. L. E. LUERING

CHEEK TEETH (מִתְלָאֵה, m'ṭhall'āh, transposed from מַלְחָעָה, mal'ḥāḥ [only in Ps 58 6], lit. "the biter," "crusher," "molar," "jaw-teeth," "great teeth" [Job 29 17 m; Joel 1 6]).

Figurative: The word is used as a synonym of reckless strength and cruelty.

CHEER, chēr, CHEERFULNESS, chēr'fōol-nēs: The Eng. word "cheer" meant (1) originally face, countenance (Gr kēpa, kāra, "head," through OFr. chere, "face"), (2) then the expression on the face, esp. (3) the expression of good spirits, and finally (4) good spirits, without any reference to the facial expression. The noun "cheer" in EV is only found with adj. "good" (except 1 Esd 9 54, "great cheer"), the word not having quite lost its earlier neutral character (any face expression, whether joyous or otherwise). In OT, צֶבֶח, ṣēbh, is tr^d "cheer," "let thy heart cheer thee" (see GOOD); שִׂמְחָה, sāmēḥ, "to rejoice" is so tr^d in Dt 24 5, "shall cheer his wife" (AV "cheer up his wife"), and Jgs 9 13, "wine, which cheereth God [ḥēlōhim] and man." The phrase "of good cheer" occurs in OT in Job 9 27 (AV "comfort"); in Apoc, 1 Esd 9 54; Wisd 18 6; Bar 4 5.30; Sir 18 32 AV (RV "luxury"); in NT for Gr euthumēō, eūthumos, in Acts 27 22.25.36, and for tharsēō in Mt 9 2.22 (AV "comfort"); 14 27; Mk 6 50; 10 49 (RV: "comfort" in AV); Jn 16 33; Acts 23 11. "Cheer" as vb. trans. occurs in Eccl 11 9; Deut 24 5; Jgs 9 13.

Cheerful occurs in Prov 15 13.15 (AV "merry"); Zec 8 19; 9 17 AV; Sir 30 25; 2 Cor 9 7.

Cheerfully, Acts 24 10.

Cheerfulness, Rom 12 8. D. MIAL EDWARDS

CHEESE, chēz. See FOOD; MILK.

CHELAL, kē'lal (כִּלְלָל, k'lāl, "perfection"): One of the b'nē Pahath-Mōš'ābh who took "strange wives" (Ezr 10 30).

CHELCIAS, kel'si-as. See HELKIAS; HILKIAH.

CHELLIANS, kel'i-anz: The people of "Chellus" (Jth 2 23) (q.v.).

CHELLUH, kel'ū. See CHELUH.

CHELLUS, kel'us (Χελλοῦς, Chelloús), a place named (Jth 1 9) among those W. of the Jordan to which Nebuchadnezzar sent his summons. It is mentioned along with "Kades," and as it lay N. of the "children of Ishmael" it may with some probability be taken as lying S.W. of Jerus. It has been conjectured that it may be Chalutzah (Reland, Pal, 717), a place under the form Elusa well known to the ancient geographers.

CHELOD, kē'lod (Χελοῦδ, Cheleoud, Χελοῦλ, Cheleoul): In Jth 1 6 it is said that "many nations of the sons of C. assembled themselves to the battle." They are mentioned as obeying the summons of Nebuchadnezzar to his war against Arphaxad. No very probable suggestion has been made as to the meaning of Chelod.

CHELUB, kē'lub:

(1) כְּלִיב, k'lūbh, father of Mehir (1 Ch 4 11); the name is probably a variation of Caleb. Well-hausen (De gentibus et familiis Judaëis) reads כָּלֵב בֶּן הֶזְרֹן, kālēbh ben ḥezrōn.

(2) Father of Ezri (1 Ch 27 26), one of the officers of David. See GENEALOGY.

CHELUBAI, ke-lōō'bī (כְּלֻבַּי, k'lūbhāy): Another form of Caleb used in 1 Ch 2 9; cf 2 18.42. Caleb is here described as the brother of Jerahmeel, and son of Hezron, a remote ancestor, instead of as the son of Jephunneh. See CALEB.

CHELUHI, kel'ōō-hī (כְּלֻחִי, k'lūhī, Kt.; כְּלֻחִי, k'lūhī, Kṛē; RVm Cheluhu; AV Chelluh): Mentioned in the list of persons with foreign wives (Ezr 10 35=1 Esd 9 34).

CHEMARIM, kem'a-rim (כִּמְרִים, k'mārīm, a pl. whose sing. kōmer is not found in the OT): Occurs only once in the text of EV (Zeph 1 4, AV Chemarims), though the Heb word is found also in 2 K 23 5 (EV "idoltrous priests") and Hos 10 5 (EV "priests," EVM, however, having "Chemarim" in both places). Some regard the word as an interpolation in Zeph 1 4, since the LXX omits it and its presence disturbs the parallelism. The word, which is of Aram. origin (kumra, priest), is used in the OT only in an unfavorable sense, its origin and associations naturally suggesting Syr affinities. In the Syr, however, no such connotation is involved. In the Pesh version of the OT it is used indifferently of idoltrous priests and of priests of Jeh, while in the same version of the NT it is used of the Levitical priests and of Our Lord (e.g. He 2 17; 3 1; 4 14.15, and often) and in Acts 19 35 it is the rendering of neōkōros (RV "temple-keeper," AV "worshipper"). The question of the root idea of the word remains unsettled. The traditional supposition, which finds some support even among modern scholars, is that the verbal form means "to be black," the priests being supposed to have been clad in black. But it is doubtful whether the root had this meaning. Another conjecture takes the root to mean "to be sad," the priest being a man of a sad countenance, an ascetic. Cheyne would relate the word to the Assyrian kummaru, having the sense of "a clean vesture." It is at all events probable that the priests, both in Israel and in the surrounding nations, employed white vestments, rather than black, when in the performance of their official functions. According to Mish, Middōth, v.4, a Levitical priest who had become disqualified for service put on black garments and departed, while the others put on white garments and went in and ministered. The reference to the Baal worship in 2 K 10 22 seems more congruous with this view; hence probably black-robed priests (Chemarim) of Baal and the unfaithful priests of Jeh shall be cut off together. G. A. Smith (BTP, II, 56) reads "the priestlings with the priests."

LITERATURE

The national God of the Moabites, as Baal of the Zidonians, or Milcom (Moloch, Malcam) of the Ammonites. The Moabites are apostrophized in an old Heb song as the "people of Chemosh" (Nu 21 29). Jeremiah in his oracle of doom upon Moab has recourse to the same old song and calls the people "the people of Chemosh." The impotence of the god to deliver his people is described by the prophet in figures representing him as going into captivity with the People of Chemosh, his priests and princes together, and Moab is to be ashamed of him as Israel was of the Golden Calf of Bethel, which did not avail to save the Northern Kingdom from the conquering Assyrian power (Jer 48 7.13.46).

For Chemosh, "the abomination of Moab," as for Moloch, "the abomination of the children of Ammon," Solomon, under the influence of his idoltrous wives, built a high place in the mount before Jerus (1 K 11 7). It was natural that they should desire to worship still after the manner of the gods of their native land, but although the effect of all this was seen in the moral and spiritual deterioration of Solomon himself there is no indication that the immoralities and cruelties associated with such worship were then practised in Jerus. In the days of Ahaz and Manasseh, even as early as the days of Abijam of Judah, they were (1 K 15 12.13). Josiah found these abominations of alien worship, which had been introduced by Solomon and added to by Ahaz and Manasseh, flourishing when he came to the throne. Moved by the prohibitions of the Book of the Law (Dt 12 29-31; 18 10), Josiah pulled down and defiled the high places and the altars, and in order to make a clean sweep of the idoltrous figures, "he brake in pieces the pillars," or obelisks, "and cut down the Asherim," or sacred poles, "and filled their places with the bones of men" (2 K 23 1-20).

There is one passage where Chemosh is designated the god of the Ammonites (Jgs 11 24).

Jephthah is disputing the right of the Ammonites to invade territory which belongs to Israel because Jeh has given it to them by conquest. And he asks: 'Shouldst thou not possess the territory of those whom Chemosh, thy god, dispossesses, and we the territory of all whom Jeh, our god, dispossesses?' It may be that he is called here the god of the Ammonites by a mere oversight of the historian; or that Moab and Ammon being kindred nations descended from a common ancestor, Lot, Chemosh may in a sense belong to both. We notice, however, that Jephthah's argument in meeting the claim preferred by the king of Ammon passes on to Israel's relation to the Moabites and makes mention only of well-known Moabite cities. Chemosh is accordingly named because of his association with Moab, the cities of which are being spoken of, although strictly and literally Milcom should have been named in an appeal addressed as a whole to the Ammonites (vs 12-28; cf Moore ad loc.).

The discovery of the Moabite Stone in 1868 at Dibon has thrown light upon Chemosh and the relations of Moab to its national god.

5. Moabite Stone The monument, which is now one of the most precious treasures of the Louvre in Paris, bears an inscription which is the oldest specimen of Sem alphabetic writing extant, commemorating the successful effort made about 860 or 850 BC by Mesha', king of Moab, to throw off the yoke of Israel. We know from the OT record that Moab had been reduced to subjection by David (2 S 8 2); that it paid a heavy tribute to Ahab, king of Israel (2 K 3 4); and that, on the death of Ahab, Mesha' its king rebelled against Israelite rule (2 K 3 5). Not till the reign of Jehoram was any effort made to recover the lost dominion. The king of Israel then allied himself with the kings of Judah and Edom, and marching against Moab by the way of the Red Sea, inflicted upon Mesha' a defeat so decisive that the wrath of his god, Chemosh, could be appeased only by the sacrifice of his son (2 K 3 6ff).

The historical situation described in the OT narrative is fully confirmed by Mesha's inscription.

There are, however, divergences in 6. Mesha's detail. In the Book of K the revolt of Mesha' is said to have taken place after the death of Ahab. The inscription implies that it must have taken place by the middle of Ahab's reign. The inscription implies that the subjection of Moab to Israel had not been continuous from the time of David, and says that 'Omri, the father of Ahab, had reasserted the power of Israel and had occupied at least a part of the land.

It is with what the inscription says of Chemosh that we are chiefly concerned. On the monument the name appears twelve times.

7. Chemosh Mesha' is himself the son of Chemosh, and it was for Chemosh that he built the high place upon which the monument was found. He built it because among other reasons Chemosh had made him to see his desire upon them that hated him. It was because Chemosh was angry with his land that 'Omri afflicted Moab many days. 'Omri had taken possession of the land of Medeba and Israel dwelt in it his days and half his son's days, but Chemosh restored it in Mesha's days. Mesha' took 'Ataroth which the king of Israel had built for himself, slew all the people of the city, and made them a grazing-stock to Chemosh and to Moab. Mesha' brought thence the altar-hearth of Dodo, and dragged it before Chemosh in Keriath. By command of Chemosh, Mesha' attacked Nebo and fought against Israel, and after a fierce struggle he took the place, slaying the inhabitants en masse, 7,000 men and women and maidservants, devoting the city to 'Ashtor-Chemosh and dragging the altar vessels of Jeh before Chemosh. Out of Jahaz, too, which the king of Israel had built, Chemosh drove him before Mesha'. At the instigation of Chemosh, Mesha' fought against Horonaim, and, although the text is defective in the closing paragraph, we may surmise that Chemosh did not fail him but restored it to his dominions.

Naturally enough there is considerable obscurity in local and personal allusions. Dodo may have been a local god worshipped by the

8. Parallels between Israelites E. of the Jordan. Ashtor-Chemosh may be a compound divinity of a kind not unknown to Sem mythology, Ashtor representing possibly the Phoen Ashtoreth. What is of importance is the recurrence of so many phrases and expressions applied to Chemosh which are used of Jeh in the OT narratives. The religious conceptions of the Moabites reflected in the inscription are so strikingly like those of the Israelites that if only the name of Jeh were substituted for that of Chemosh we might think we were reading a chapter of the Books of K. It is not in the inscriptions, however, but in the OT narrative that we find a reference to the demand of Chemosh for human sacrifice. "He took his eldest son," says the Heb annalist, "that should have reigned in his stead, and offered him for a burnt-offering upon the wall. And there was great wrath against Israel: and they departed from him, and returned to their own land" (2 K 3 27). This appears to indicate that the Israelites had to give up their purpose to fasten the yoke of bondage again upon Mesha' and that they returned empty-handed to their own land. But this fortunate result for Moab was due to the favor of Chemosh, and in particular to the human sacrifice by which he was propitiated.

If we find in these representations of Chemosh in the OT narrative and in Mesha's inscription a striking similarity to the Heb concep-

9. Ethical Contrast tion of Jeh, we cannot fail to notice the lack of the higher moral and spiritual elements supplied to the religion of Israel by the prophets and indeed from Moses and Abraham downward. "Chemosh," says W. Baudissin, "is indeed the ruler of his people whom he protects as Yahweh the Israelites, whom he chastises in his indignation, and from whom he accepts horrible propitiatory gifts. But of a God of grace whose long-suffering leads back even the erring to Himself, of a Holy God to whom the offering of a pure and obedient heart is more acceptable than bloody sacrifices, of such a God as is depicted in Israel's prophets and sweet singers there is no trace in the Moabite picture of Chemosh. While Mesha' is represented as offering up his own son in accordance with the stern requirements of his religion, OT law-givers and prophets from the beginning condemned human sacrifice" (*RE*³, art. CHENANAAN, kē-nā'a-na (כְּנַעַן, k'nā'ānāh, fem. form of "Canaan," though others explain it as "toward Canaan"): The name of two men:

(1) The fourth-named of the seven sons of Bilham, son of Jediah, of the tribe of Benjamin, a leading warrior in the time of David (1 Ch 7 10).

(2) Father of the false prophet Zedekiah, who encouraged Ahab against Micaiah (1 K 22 11.24; 2 Ch 18 10.23).

CHENANI, kē-nā'nī (כְּנָנִי, k'nānī, "planted"): One of the names mentioned in Neh 9 4, in connection with the constitution of "congregation." If the names represent houses or families, eight Levitical houses probably sang some well-known psalm on this occasion. If they are names of individual representatives, they were probably deputed to recite or chant some special prayer in order to lead the worship of the people.

CHENANIAH, ken-a-nī'a (כְּנַנְיָהּ, k'nanyāhū, and כְּנַנְיָה, k'nanyāh, lit. "established by God"): Chief of the Levites who was over "the songs," or "the carrying" (viz. "of the ark") from the house of Obed-edom to Jerus (1 Ch 15 22.27; 26 29).

CHEPHAR-AMMONI, kē-fār-am'ō-nī (AV Chephar-haammoni; כְּפַר הָעַמּוֹנִי, k'phar hā'ammonī; B, Κεφειρά καὶ Μονεῖ, Kepheirā kai Monēi; A, Καφραμμὴν, Kaphērammīn, "village of the Ammonites"): A place in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 24). It may be identical with Kefr 'Āna, a ruined site about two miles to the N.E. of Bethel.

CHEPHAR-HAAMONI, kē-fār-ha-am'ō-nī. See CHEPHAR-AMMONI.

CHEPHIRAH, ke-fī'ra (כְּפִירָה, ha-k'phīrāh; B, Καφειρά, Kapheirā [Josh 9]; A has Chepheirā, B has καὶ Φειρά, kai Pheirā [Josh 18]): One of the cities of the Hivites who by guile made alliance with Israel (Josh 9 17). It was in the lot of Benjamin (18 26), and was reoccupied after the return from Babylon (Ezr 2 25; Neh 7 29). It is represented by the modern Kefīreh, to the S.W. of Gibeon, and N. of Karyat el-'Anab. It stands on high ground, with many ancient remains.

CHERAN, kē'ran (כֶּרַן, kēran): A Horite clan-name, occurring in the genealogy of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36 26), and in the || list in 1 Ch 1 41. Dillmann derives it from kar, "a lamb."

CHERETHITES, ker'ê-thīts (כֶּרֶתִּים, kerethim, ha-kerethi; Χελεθί, Chelethi "executioners," "life-guardsmen"): A people in South Pal whose territory bordered upon that of Judah (1 S 30 14). In ver 16 this land is apparently identified with that of the Philis. In Ezk 25 16 the Philis and the Cherethites are threatened together; while in Zeph 2 5 the Cherethites are evidently the dwellers in "the land of the Philis," "the inhabitants of the sea-coast." LXX in both Ezk and Zeph renders the name "Cretans." The translators may have been "guided only by the sound." But Zeus Cretagenes in Gaza suggests a connection with the island of Crete. See, however, CAPHTOR. It may be taken as certain that the Cherethites were a Phili clan. In conjunction with the Pelethites they are frequently named as forming the guard of David (2 S 8 18, etc). It was the custom of many ancient monarchs to have a guard of foreign mercenaries. W. EWING

CHERISH, cher'ish (סָכַן, sākhan; θάλπω, thalpō): Sākhan, "to act the friend," "to be useful," is tr^d "cherish" (1 K 1 24); thalpō, "to warm," "to make warm," "to foster" (Eph 5 29), said of the regard the husband should have for his wife, even as his own flesh which he "nourisheth and cherisheth, even as Christ also the church," and in 1 Thess 2 7, of Paul amongst his converts, "as when a nurse cherisheth her own children."

CHERITH, kē'rith, THE BROOK (נַחַל כְּרִית, nahal kē'rith; Χειμάρριος Χορράθ, Cheimarrhous Chorhath): The place where Elijah hid and was miraculously fed, after announcing the drought to Ahab

(1 K 17 3). It is described as being "before," that is "east," of Jordan. It cannot therefore be identified with Wady el-Kelt, to the W. of Jericho. The retreat must be sought in some recess of the Gilead uplands with which doubtless Elijah had been familiar in his earlier days.

CHERUB, kē'rub (כְּרֻב, kērubh; Χερουβ, Cheroub, Χαρουβ, Charoub): A place in Babylonia from which people whose genealogies had fallen into confusion went up at the return from exile (Ezr 2 59; Neh 7 61); unidentified. In 1 Esd 5 36 we read "Charaathalan leading them, and Allar," a phrase that seems to have arisen through confusion of the names in the passages cited above.

CHERUBIC, che-rōō'bik, FORMS IN THE CONSTELLATIONS. See ASTRONOMY.

CHERUBIM, cher'ū-bim, cher'ōō-bim (כְּרֻבִּים, krūbhīm, pl. of cherub, כְּרֻב, kērubh): Through the influence of the Sept, "cherubim" was used in the earlier Eng. VSS, also as a sing., hence the pl. was made to sound "cherubims." The etymology of the word cannot be ascertained.

In Gen 3 24 the cherubim are placed by God, after the expulsion of Adam from the garden of Eden, at the east thereof, together

1. As with the flaming sword "to keep the Guardians way of the tree of life." In their of Paradise function as guardians of Paradise the cherubim bear an analogy to the winged bulls and lions of Babylonia and Assyria, colossal figures with human faces standing guard at the entrance of temples (and palaces), just as in Egypt the approaches to the sanctuaries are guarded by sphinxes. But the Bab colossi go by the name of lamassu, or shedū; no designation at all approaching the Heb kērubh has so far been found in the Assyrian language. Nor are thus named the winged figures, half human and half animal, which in Bab and Pers art are found on both sides of the "sacred tree." Thus a Bab origin of the Heb cherubim is neither proved nor disproved. If we look for further analogies which, of course, do not indicate a borrowing on the part of the Hebrews, we may mention the fabulous griffins (γρύπες, grūpes), usually represented as having the heads and wings of an eagle and the body and hind quarters of a lion; they were believed by the Greeks to inhabit Scythia, and to keep jealous watch over the gold of that country.

If we read between the lines of the Paradise account in Gen (cf 3 8), the garden of Eden, the primeval abode of man, reveals itself

2. The as more than that: it was apparently Garden as the dwelling-place of God. In the the Abode polytheistic story of the creation of of the Gods the world and early life of man, which, while in several respects analogous (cf 3 22), is devoid of the more spiritual notions of Hebraism, the garden was the abode of the gods who alone had access to the tree of life from the fruit of which they derived their immortality. Adam, before the fall, is conceived as a superhuman being; for while he is forbidden to taste of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, the way to immortality is open to him; for it is only after transgressing the Divine command that he merits death and becomes mortal. The choice of immortal innocence and mortal knowledge lay before him; he elected death with knowledge.

The mythical elements of the Paradise story are still more patent in Ezk 28 13 ff, where the fall of the king of Tyre is likened to that of primeval man. The garden is situated on a holy mountain of Elohim (= God to Ezekiel, but gods in the primitive source), the 'mountain of assembly' of Isa 14 13, high above the stars in the recesses of the North. It is a wonderful place, adorned with all manner of precious stones. There man, perfect from the day he was created, resplendent with beauty, excelling in wisdom, walks

3. The Cherubim as Attendants of the Deity among the fiery stones, like a cherub with outstretched wings. The cherubs are apparently the attendants of the Deity, beauteous angels, of whom man was to be one; but he fell from glory and was hurled from the sanctuary which he had polluted. Some of the angelic attendants of the Deity within are placed in Gen without, to do service as guardians of the unapproachable holy garden.

As attendants of God, they bear the throne upon which He descends from His high abode. Thus in the description of a theophany in Ps 18, we read:

4. As Bearers of the Throne "He bowed the heavens also, and came down; And thick darkness was under his feet. And he rode upon a cherub, and did fly; Yea, he soared upon the wings of the wind" (vs 9 and 10).

Hence the Lord, or, as the fuller title goes, the Lord of Hosts, is repeatedly styled "He that sitteth [throned] above the cherubim" (Ps 80 1; 99 1; 1 S 4 4, and elsewhere). There is certainly no trace here of bull figures: bulls do not fly. The underlying conception is, it seems, rather that of the storm cloud. Cf Ps 104 3:

"Who maketh the clouds his chariot;
Who walketh upon the wings of the wind."

The Heb for "chariot" is רֶכֶב, rekhubh, a sort of inverted k'rubh.

But the function of the cherubim as bearers and movers of the Divine throne is brought out most clearly in the vision of Ezekiel (ch 1, with which cf 10). In ch 1 the prophet designates them as "living creatures" (hayyoth); but upon hearing God's words addressed to the "man clothed in linen" (10 2) he perceives that the living creatures which he saw in the first vision were cherubim (ver 20); hence in 9 3 the chariot or throne, from which the glory of God went up, is spoken of as a cherub. The following is a description in detail of the cherubim as seen by Ezekiel. They are represented as four living creatures, each with four faces, man, lion, ox (replaced in the || ch by cherub), and eagle (1 10; 10 14), having the figure and hands of men (1 5.8), and the feet of calves (ver 7). Each has four wings, two of which are stretched upward (ver 11), meeting above and sustaining the "firmament," that is, the bottom of the Divine throne (1 22; 10 1), while two are stretched downward, conformable the one to the other, so as to cover their bodies (1 11.23). In appearance, the living creatures resemble coals of fire (cf 10 2.6 f, where the "man clothed in linen" is bidden fill both his hands with coals of fire from between the cherubim), burning like torches, the fire flashing up and down among the creatures, a bright fire out of which lightning goes forth (1 13). Thus the creatures run and vanish as the appearance of a flash of lightning (ver 14). The cherubim do not turn as they change direction, but always go straight forward (1 9.17; 10 11), as do the wheels of the cherubic chariot with rings full of eyes round about (1 18; 10 12). The cherubim represent the spirit, or will, in the wheels: at the direction of the spirit, the wheels are lifted up from the bottom and the chariot moves upward (1 19 f; 10 16 f). The cherubim are thus the moving force of the vehicle.

Ezekiel's cherubim are clearly related to the seraphim in Isaiah's inaugural vision (Isa 6). Like the cherubim, the seraphim are the

6. Relation of Cherubim to Seraphim and Other Angels attendants on God as He is seated upon a throne high and exalted; they are also winged creatures: with twain they cover their faces, and with twain they cover their feet, and with twain they fly. Like the Levites in the sanctuary below, they sing a hymn of adoration: "Holy, holy, holy, is Jeh of hosts: the whole earth is full of his glory." In the Book of Enoch, the cherubim, seraphim, and ophanim (wheels), and all the angels of power constitute the "host of God," the guardians of His throne, the singers of praise ascribing blessedness to "the Lord of Spirits," with the archangel Gabriel at their head (see 20 7; 40; 61 10 f; 71 7). And so in the Jewish daily liturgy the seraphim, ophanim, and "living creatures" constitute the heavenly choir who, the elect ministers of the Living God, ready to do the will of their maker with trembling, intone in sweet harmony the Thrice-holy. In the Talm, the cherubim are represented as having the likeness of youths (with a fanciful etymology, כְּרֻבִים, k' r'ubh, "like a youth"; Sukka 5b; Hag 13b), while, according to the Midr, they have no definite shape, but appear indifferently as men or women, or as spirits and angelic beings (Gen rabba' 21).

The "four living creatures" of Rev 4 6 ff are clearly modeled upon Ezekiel, with supplementary touches from Isaiah. Full of eyes

7. In Rev 4 before and behind, they are in the midst of the throne, and round about it. One resembles a lion, the other a calf, and the third a man, and the fourth a flying eagle. Each of the creatures has six wings. "They have no rest day and night, saying, Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord God, the Almighty, who was and who is and who is to come."

In the temple of Solomon, two gigantic cherubic images of olive-wood plated with gold, ten cubits high,

8. Ornamental Cherubim in the Temple of Solomon stood in the innermost sanctuary (the d'bh'r) facing the door, whose wings, five cubits each, extended, two of them meeting in the middle of the room to constitute the throne, while two extended to the walls (1 K 6 23-28; 2 Ch 3 7); also on the bases of the portable lavers, interchanging with lions and oxen (1 K 7 29-36). According to the Chronicler, they were also woven in the veil of the Holy of Holies (2 Ch 3 14).

Ezekiel represents the inner walls of the temple as carved with alternating palm trees and cherubim, each with two faces, the lion looking

In the Tabernacle, there were two cherubim of solid gold upon the golden slab of the "lid," or "mercy-seat," facing each other, with wings outstretched above, so as to constitute a throne on which the glory of

There were also cherubim woven into the texture of the inner curtain of the Tabernacle and the veil (Ex 26 1.31; 36 8.35). There were no cherubim in the temple of Herod, but the walls were painted with figures of them (see Talm Yoma' 54a). In the times of Jos no one knew what the Scriptural cherubim looked like (Ant, VIII, iii, 3).

CHESALON, kes'a-lon (כֶּסֶלֹן, k'salōn; Χασλόν, Chaslōn, Χασαλόν, Chasalōn): One of the cities on the N. boundary of Judah (Josh 15 10). In the 4th cent. it was a "very large village." It is now Keslā, 2,087 ft. above sea-level, a small village perched on a mountain ridge to the S. of Wady el Humār. See PEF, III, 25, 26; Sh XVII.

CHESED, kē'sed, kes'ed (כֶּסֶד, kasdim; Χάσας, Chásas): One of the sons of Nahor and Milcah (Gen 22 22); was probably the father of the Casdim. The early Bab form Kasdu appears in Assy as Kaldu or Kaldû. EV follows the Assy and Gr style of writing the name and uses Chaldees or Chaldaeans instead of Casdim. The Chaldaeans dwelt in the lower valley of the Euphrates, at the head of the Pers Gulf. Abram came from Ur of the Chaldees (Gen 11 28.31; 15 7; Neh 9 7). In Job 1 17 the Casdim are described as invading the land of Uz, the eldest brother of Chesed (Gen 22 21.22). In the days of Nebuchadrezzar the Casdim overran Syria and Pal and carried the people of Judah in successive deportations into captivity (2 K 24 1 f.10 ff; 25 1 ff). In Dnl 2 2.5 the Casdim are named with the magicians and astrologers as a learned class, skilled in interpretations. Casdim is sometimes used in Heb for the land of Chaldaea (Ezk 23 15 f; 11 24). CHESIL, kē'sil, kes'il (כֶּסֶל, kēsīl; A, Χασείρ, Chaseír): A town in the extreme S. of Judah named with Etolad, Hormah and Ziklag (Josh 15 30). The name does not occur again. In Josh 19 4 it is replaced by Bethul (LXX Βαιθὺλ, Baithēl), and in 1 Ch 4 30 by Bethuel. "Chesil" may have arisen from a misreading of the text.

CHESNUT, ches'nut. See CHESTNUT.

CHEST, chest (אָרֹן, 'ārōn, גָּבִיטִים, g'nāzīm; κιβωτός, kibōtós):

(1) The ark of the covenant in OT is invariably denoted by the word 'ārōn, elsewhere rendered AV and RV "chest." See ARK.

(2) 'Arōn is also the word rendered "coffin" (Gen 50 26: "and he was put in a coffin in E."). See COFFIN.

(3) In K and Ch (2 K 12 9.10; 2 Ch 24 8.10.11) 'ārōn stands uniformly for a money chest. It is the "chest" that Jehoiada, the priest, placed in the court "beside the altar" and "bored a hole in the lid of" that the priests might "put therein all the money that was brought into the house of Jeh" (2 K 12 9); and "the chest" that King Joash commanded to be made and set "without at the gate of the house of Jeh" to receive "the tax that Moses the servant of God laid upon Israel" (2 Ch 24 8.10.11). One feature is common to the thing meant in all these applications—the c. was rectangular in shape, and, most probably in every instance, made of wood.

(4) Jos (Ant, VI, 1.2) uses the equivalent of the word to denote the "coffer" (1 S 6 8 ff EV), or small chest, in which the princes of Philistia deposited the gold mice.

(5) In NT times the "chests" that were provided in the court of the women, in the temple of Herod, to receive the various kinds of money gifts had the exceptional shape of a trumpet (if Shēkālīm, vi.5 may be trusted)—wide at the bottom and gradually narrowing toward the top, hence called שֹׁפְרוֹת, shōphārōth. It was into these that the Master was watching the multitude casting in their money when He saw the poor widow cast in her two mites (Mk 12 41.42).

(6) In Ezk 27 24, where the prophet is giving an inventory of the merchandise of Tyre, another word entirely is used (g'nāzīm), and it is rendered in AV and RV "chests" ("chests of rich apparel, bound with cords and made of cedar"). According to Cornill, Davidson, Smend and others this rendering is without sufficient support (see DB and comm. in loc.). GEO. B. EAGER CHESULLOTH, ke-sul'ōth (חֶסְלוֹת, ha-k'sul-lōth; B, Χασαλώθ, Chasalōth, A, 'Αχεσαλώθ, Achesalōth): A town on the border of Zebulun (Josh 19 18), the same as Chisloth-tabor (19 12). It is represented by the modern village Iksāl on the northern edge of Esdraelon, cir 3 miles W. of Mt. Tabor.

CHEW, chōō, chū, CUD (מַעְלֶה גֵּרָה, ma'āleh gērāh, lit. "bringing up" [ARV], i.e. "chewing the cud," from gārar, "to roll," "ruminate"): One of the marks of cleanliness, in the sense of fitness for food, of a quadruped, given in Lev 11 3 and Dt 14 6, is the chewing of the cud. Among the animals considered clean are therefore included the ox, the sheep, the goat, the hart, the gazelle, the roebuck, the wild goat, the pygarg, the antelope and the chamois. Several of the forbidden animals are expressly named in the passages, e.g. the camel, the rock-badger, the hare and the swine. In addition to the distinctions between clean and unclean animals mentioned in the Bible, the Talm points out that the clean animals have no upper teeth, that their horns are either forked, or if not forked they are clear of splinters, notched with scales and round, and that certain portions of the meat of clean animals tear lengthwise as well as across. Many theories have been advanced as to the reasons for the distinctions with regard to the chewing of the cud and the cloven hoof. See Jew Enc, s.v. "Clean." The most obvious is that ruminating animals and animals without claws were apparently cleaner-feeding animals than the others.

CHICKEN, chik'n, chik'in (AS cīcen or cīcen; Lat Gallus ferrugineus; ἀλεκτρούς, alektruōn, masc. and fem.): A barnyard fowl of any age. The record is to be found in the books of the disciples, but Jesus is responsible for the only direct mention of chickens in the Bible. Mt 23 37, contains this: "O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, that killeth the prophets, and stoneth them that are sent unto her! how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" Luke's version of the same scene says: "Even as a hen gathereth her own brood under her wings" (13 34). There is no reference to chickens in the OT sufficiently clear to specify our common domestic bird. The many references to "fatted fowl" in these older records, in accordance with the text and the history of the other nations, were pigeons, guineas, ducks, geese and swans. The importation of peafowl by Solomon is mentioned. The cock and hen are distinctive birds and would have been equally a marvel worth recording had they been introduced at that time. From the history of the bird in other countries it is a safe estimate to place their entrance into Pal between five and six hundred years BC. That would allow sufficient time for them to increase and spread until they would be well known and common enough to be used effectively in the ministry of Jesus Christ. Every historical fact and indication points to the capture and domestication of the red jungle fowl in Burmah. The Chinese records prove that they first secured imported fowl from the West in 1400 BC. Their use for food dated from 1200 to 800 BC, in the Book of Manu, but it was specified that only those that ran wild were to be eaten. From these countries they were imported to Greece and Italy, and from there carried south into Pal. Homer (Δ 10; cf also alektruōn, P 602) names a man Cock, aléktōr, which seems to indicate that he knew the bird. Pindar gives them slight mention; Aristophanes wrote of them as "Pers birds," which indicates that they worked their way westward by importation. I cannot find them in the records of Aristotle, but Aristophanes advanced the idea that not the gods, but the birds were rulers of men in ancient times, and compared the comb of the cock with the crown of a king, and pointed out that when he "merely crows at dawn all jump up to their work" (Aves, 489-90). They were common in Italy in the days of Pliny, who was ten years old at the time of the crucifixion of Christ. Pliny gave many rules for raising chickens, proving that much was known of their habits in his time. Yet so credulous was he and so saturated with superstition, that, mixed with his instructions for preserving eggs, brooding and raising chickens, is the statement that on account of the fighting power of the cocks the lions feared them. He wrote that a man named Galerius in the time of the consuls, Lepidus and Catulus, owned a barnyard fowl that spoke. He names Lenius Strabo as the first man to devise a "coupe" to keep fowl in and "cram" them to fatness. He gave the laws governing the use of fowl at table and recorded that in Egypt eggs were hatched in manure beds, which is conclusive proof that birds had been carried across the Mediterranean several cents. previous. The records of Babylon, 600 BC, contain figures undoubtedly intended for cocks, and they were reproduced in marble in Lycia at that time. In all these reproductions the birds have the drooping tail of the wild, and there is no record of the date at which they erected the tail, lifted the head and assumed the upright bearing of today.

GENE STRATTON-PORTER

CHIDE, chíd: Only in the OT, translating Heb רִיב, ribh, a word which is more frequently rendered "strive." Since in Gen 31 36; Jgs 8 1; Ps 103 9, the strife is one of words, it means in these passages, "scold," or "sharply censure," and is applied either to mutinous protests and reproaches of inferiors to a superior, or, as in the last of these passages, to rebukes administered by a superior to inferiors.

CHIDON, kí'don, THE THRESHING-FLOOR OF (כִּדּוֹן גֹּרֵן, gören kídōn; LXX B, omits; A has Χείλω, Cheilō): The place where Uzza perished because he touched the ark (1 Ch 13 9). In 2 S 6 6 it is called the threshing-floor of Nachon. No name resembling either of these has been discovered.

CHIEF, chēf: The Eng. word is in AV of OT the tr of some 17 different Heb words, most frequently of rō'sh, "head," sar, "prince," and rē'shūth, "beginning." The principal changes made by RV are: (1) Heb bēth 'ābh, "house of a father," being recognized as a technical term denoting a subdivision of a tribe, rō'sh is rendered lit. "head," when it occurs in connection with this phrase, so that "chief fathers" (Num 31 26) and "chief of the fathers" (Ezr 1 5) become "heads of fathers' houses"; (2) Heb nāghīdh and nāsi' are more accurately tr'd "prince" in such passages as 1 Ch 5 2; Nu 3 32; (3) the misinterpretations which brought about the tr "chief" for 'ācīlīm, "corners," Isa 41 9, and for ma'āleh, "ascent," in 2 Ch 32 33, are corrected.

In the NT "chief" is in most of its appearances the tr of Gr prōtos, "first"; the RV reads "first" for AV "chief," "chiefest," in Mt 20 27; Mk 10 44; Acts 16 12. The reading in the latter passage is a difficult one, but the AV "Philippi, which is the chief city of that part of Macedonia," seems to imply a political authority which Philippi did not possess; RV "a city of Macedonia, the first of the district." Gr archōn, "prince," "ruler," is rendered by AV "chief," by RV "prince," in Lk 11 15; AV "chief Pharisees," RV "rulers of the Pharisees," in Lk 14 1.

The original meaning of "chief" having been weakened, the comparative and superlative were admitted into English, the latter only appearing in AV or RV: 1 S 2 29; Cant 5 10; 2 Cor 11 5, etc.

On "chief of Asia" (Acts 19 31 AV) see ASIARCH.

CHIEF SEATS, chēf sēts (πρωτοκαθεδρία, prōtokathedria): It was one of the reproaches urged by Our Lord against the scribes and Pharisees that they loved the chief seats in the synagogues (Mt 23 6; Mk 12 39; Lk 11 43; 20 46). These were special seats set in front of the ark containing the Scriptures and of the reader's platform, and facing the congregation. They were specially reserved for those who were held in the highest honor in the congregation. There were seventy-one such seats in the great synagogue of Alexandria, which were occupied by the members of the great Council in that city (see SYNAGOGUE).

CHILD, child, CHILDREN, chil'dren (בֶּן, bēn, "son," יֶלֶד, yeledh, "child," לֵד, lād, "lad"; τέκνον, téknon, παιδῶν, paidōn): The Hebrews regarded the presence of children in the family as a mark of Divine favor and greatly to be desired (Gen 15 2; 30 1; 1 S 1 11,20; Ps 127 3; Lk 1 7,28). The birth of a male child was esp. a cause for rejoicing (Ps 128 3, Heb); more men, more defenders for the tribe. If there were no sons born to a household, that family or branch became lost. If the wife proved childless, other wife or wives might be added to the family (Gen 16 f). Further, each Jewish mother, at least in later times, hoped that her son might prove to be the Messiah. The custom of Levirate marriage, which was not limited to the Heb people, rested on the principle that if a man died childless his brother should marry his widow, the children of such union being considered as belonging to the brother whose name and line were thus preserved from extinction (Dt 25 5; Gen 38 26; Mt 22 24).

Children were sometimes dedicated to God, even before their birth (1 S 1 11). Names often were significant: Moses (Ex 2 10); Samuel (1 S 1 20); Ichabod (4 21; cf Gen 30) (see PROPER NAMES). The firstborn son belonged to God (Nu 3 44 ff). The ceremony of redeeming the firstborn occurred on the thirtieth day. Friends of the family were invited to a feast, the rabbi also being present. The child was placed in the hands of the priest. The father carried some gold or silver in a cup or vessel. The priest asked the mother whether this was her firstborn, and, on being answered in the affirmative, claimed the child as Jehovah's. The father offered the redemption money, which was accepted in exchange for the child (cf 1 Pet 1 18). See FIRSTBORN. Other stages in the life of the child were celebrated with fitting ceremonies. In the fourth year, in Pal, on the second day of the Passover occurred the ceremony of the first cutting of the boy's hair, the friends sharing the privilege. Sometimes, as in the case of the wealthy, the weight of the child in currency was given as a donation to the poor. In common with the custom of other eastern peoples, male children were circumcised (Gen 17 12), the rite being performed on the eighth day.

Early education was cared for in the home, the children growing up more or less with the mother (Prov 6 20; 31 1; 2 Tim 1 5; 3 14,15), and the girl continuing with her mother until her marriage. In wealthier families tutors were employed (1 Ch 27 32). Schools for children are first mentioned by Jos (Ant. XV, x, 5). According to the Talm the first school for children was established about 100 BC, but in the time of Jesus such schools were common. Children were taught to read and to write even in families of moderate means, these arts being widely diffused as early as 600 BC, if not earlier (Isa 8 1; 10 19). Great stress was laid on the Torah, i.e. the law of Moses. Boys were trained also in farming, the tending of cattle, and in the trades. The religious training of the boy began in his fourth year, as soon as he could speak distinctly. The religious life of the girl also began early. In later times at least children took part in the Sabbath and Passover festivals and boys attended synagogue and school regularly.

Children were subject to the father (Neh 5 5 marks the extreme), who in turn was bound to protect them, though he himself had the power of life and death (Lev 18 21; 20 2 ff). Respect for and obedience to parents were stoutly upheld by public opinion (Ex 20 12; Dt 5 16; cf Prov 6 20; Mic 7 6; Dt 21 18-21; Ex 21 15).

Both the OT and NT afford abundant evidence of the strength of the bond that bound the Heb family together (Gen 21 16; 2 S 18 33; 1 K 3 23 ff; 2 K 4 19; Isa 8 4; Job 29 5; Mt 19 13; 20 20; Mk 9 24; Lk 2 48; Jn 4 47; He 2 13; 11 23). The gift of a son from Jeh was the height of joy; the loss of a child marked the depth of woe. A hint occurs in the custom of naming a man as the father of his firstborn son (HDB, I, 382), or even the use of the father's name as a surname (Bar-jonah, Bartimaeus) and such continues in Syria at the present day. This idea is further instanced in the use, in both OT and NT, of the terms to express the relation between God and men (Ex 4 22; Dt 14 1; 32 6; Jer 3 4; Zec 12 10; Mal 1 6). Figurative: Child is the EV rendering of the Gr τέκνον, téknon. The corresponding Heb words (בֶּן, bēn, and יָלֵד, yēledh, are usually tr'd "son," but they have practically the same significance in the fig. use of the term. Child is used fig. to describe:

(1) An affectionate greeting. Jesus addressed the sick of the palsy as "child" (Mk 2 5 RVm).

(2) The disciples, or followers, of a teacher. Jesus addressed His disciples as children (Mk 10 24). Paul referred to Timothy as his child (1 Tim 1 2), and also to Onesimus (Philem ver 10). John also designated the disciples to whom he was writing as his children (2 Jn ver 4). The same use of "children" or "sons" is common in the OT (see 1 K 20 35; 2 K 2 3,5,7; 4 38). As a term of special endearment, disciples are sometimes called "little children" (τεκνία, tekniá). Jesus thus addressed His disciples when He was speaking about His departure (Jn 13 33). Paul thus addressed the Galatians (Gal 4 19), and that was a favorite expression with John (see 1 Jn 2 1; 4 4; 5 21). A term that was even more endearing was paidia, which means "little ones" or "babes." Jesus used this term once in addressing His disciples after His resurrection (Jn 21 5), and John also used this term occasionally in saluting those to whom he was writing (1 Jn 2 18).

(3) Those who belong to God. Children of God is a common expression in both the OT and the NT. It is based on the relation between parents and children, and in general describes God's affection for His own, and their dependence upon Him, and moral likeness to Him. The term is sometimes used of those who are disloyal to God, and they are designated as "rebellious children" (see Isa 30 1). See CHILDREN OF GOD.

(4) Those who belong to the devil. Those who are like the devil in thought and action are designated as "children of the devil" (1 Jn 3 10).

(5) One's relation to something to which he belongs, or by which he is dominated in his affection for it. Thus we have (a) the children of a city or country (see Jer 2 16; Mt 23 37), and this designates those who belong to that particular city or country; (b) children of wisdom (Mt 11 19 AV; Lk 7 35), and these are the ones whose lives are dominated by wisdom. WH adopted érōn for teknon in Mt 11 19, but this seems to be without any good reason; (c) children of obedience (1 Pet 1 14), and these are the ones who are eager to obey; (d) children of light (Eph 5 8), and this designates those whose souls are illumined by the light.

(6) Those who are liable to some particular fate. Thus we have (a) children of cursing, or those who are exposed to cursing (2 Pet 2 14), and (b) children of wrath or those who are exposed to wrath (Eph 2 3).

(7) Moral likeness or spiritual kinship (Gal 3 7 AV; cf Jn 8 39; "the children of Abraham"). See secs. (3), (4). A. W. FORTUNE

CHILD-BEARING, child'bâr-ing: Only in 1 Tim 2 15: "She shall be saved through her [m "the"] child-bearing" (Σὺ δὲ τῆς τεκνογονίας, diá tēs tek-nogonías). The reference is to the calling of woman as wife and mother, as her ordinary lot in life, and to the anxieties, pains and perils of maternity, as the culmination and representation of the penalties woman has incurred because of the Fall (Gen 3 16). "She shall be saved by keeping faithfully and simply to her allotted sphere as wife and mother" (Dum-melow). The preposition diá is not used here instrumentally, as though child-bearing were a means of her salvation, but locally, as in 1 Cor 3 15, "saved so as through fire," where life is saved by rushing through the flames. The explanation by reference to the incarnation, with an appeal to Gal 4 4, favored by Ellicott and others, seems very mechanical. H. E. JACOBS

CHILDREN OF EDEN, ʿēd'n (בְּנֵי עֵדֶן, bēnē 'ēdhen): In 2 K 19 12; Isa 37 12 "the children of Eden that were in Telassar" are mentioned in connection with "Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph" as having been destroyed by the Assyrians who were before the time of Sennacherib. The expression, "the c. of E. that were in T.," undoubtedly referred to a tribe which inhabited a region of which Telassar was the center. Telassar means "the hill of Asshur" and, according to Schrader, it was a name that might have been given to any place where a temple had been built to Asshur. Inasmuch as Gozan, and Haran, and Rezeph were in Mesopotamia it would seem probable that "the c. of E. that were in T." belonged to the same locality. The "c. of E." is quite probably to be identified with the Bīt 'Adini of the inscriptions and this referred to a district on the middle Euphrates. According to the inscriptions Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, and Bīt 'Adini were destroyed by Sennacherib's forefathers, and this is in accord with the account in 2 K and Isa.

The "Eden" of Ezk 27 23 is usually taken as the name of a place in Mesopotamia with which Tyre had commercial relations, and probably belongs to the region of "the c. of E." discussed above.

Some writers think the "Beth-eden" of Am 1 5 RVm [ARV "Aven"] is to be identified with the Bīt 'Adini of the inscriptions and hence with "the c. of E." but this is doubtful. This was perhaps in Syria in the neighborhood of Damascus.

Children (Sons and Daughters) of God (בְּנֵי וּבָנוֹת אֱלֹהִים, benē and benōth 'ēlōhīm, lit. "sons and daughters of God"; τέκνα θεοῦ, tékna theōū, and υἱοὶ θεοῦ, huiōi theōū): so AV; but RV translates the latter Gr phrase more accurately "sons of God." Tékna contains the idea of origin or descent, but also that of personal relation, and is often used metaphorically of "that intimate and reciprocal relationship formed between men by the bonds of love, friendship, trust, just as between parents and children" (Grimm-Thayer). Huiōi, too, conveys the ideas of origin, and of personal relation, but the latter in the fuller form in which it appears in mature age. "The difference between huiōis and teknōn appears to be that whereas teknōn denotes the natural relationship of child to parent, huiōis implies in addition to this the recognized status and legal privileges reserved for sons" (Sanday and Headlam, on Rom 8 14). This difference obtains, however, only in a very general sense.

The above phrases denote the relation in which men are conceived to stand to God, either as deriving their being from Him and depending upon Him, or as standing in that personal relation of intimate trust and love toward Him which constitutes the psychological fact of sonship. The exact significance of the expression depends upon the conception of God, and particularly of His Fatherhood, to which it corresponds. It therefore attains to its full significance only in the NT, and its meaning in the OT differs considerably, even though it marks stages of development up to the NT idea.

I. OT Teaching.—The most primitive form of the idea appears in Gen 6 1-4, where the sons of God by marrying the fair daughters of

1. Mythological Survivals—men become the fathers of the giants. These were a subordinate order of Divine beings or demi-gods, and the title here may mean no more, although it was probably a survival of an earlier idea of the actual descent of these gods from a higher God. The idea of a heavenly court where the sons of God come to present themselves before Jeh is found in quite late lit. (Job 1 6; 2 1; 38 7; Ps 29 1; 89 6). In all these cases the phrase implies a certain kinship with God and dependence upon Him on the part of the Divine society around Him. But there is no evidence to show whether the idea of descent of gods from God survived to any extent, nor is there any indication of a very close personal relationship. Satan is unsympathetic, if not hostile. In one obviously polytheistic reference, the term implies a similarity of appearance (Dnl 3 25). In a secondary sense the titles "gods," and "sons of the Most High" are given to magistrates, as exercising God's authority (Ps 82 6).

The idea of creation has taken the place of that of procreation in the OT, but without losing the sense of sonship. "Saith Jeh, the Holy One

2. Created Sonship of Israel, and his Maker: Ask me . . . concerning my sons, and concerning the work of my hands" (Isa 45 11).

Israel acknowledges the absolute sovereignty of God as her Father and Maker (Isa 64 8). Israel's Maker is also her Husband, and by inference the Father of her children (Isa 54 5). Since all Israel has one Father, and one God created her, the tribes owe brotherly conduct to one another (Mal 2 10). Jeh upbraids His sons and daughters whom He as their Father bought, made and established. "He forsook God who made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation. . . . Of the Rock that begat thee thou art unmindful, and hast forgotten God that gave thee birth" (Dt 32 6, 15, 18 ff). These passages reveal the transition from the idea of original creation to that of making and establishing Israel as a nation. All things might be described as children of God if creation alone brought it to pass, but Israel stands in a unique relation to God.

The covenant relation of God with Israel as a nation is the chief form in which man's sonship and God's fatherhood appear in the OT. "Israel is my son, my firstborn" (Ex 4 22); "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt" (Hos 11 1). And to be children of God involves the obligation to be a holy people (Dt 14 1, 2). But Israel has proved unworthy of her status: "I . . . have brought up children, and they have rebelled against me" (Isa 1 2, 4; 30 1, 9). Yet He will have pity upon them: "for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn" (Jer 31 9, 20). Israel's unworthiness does not abolish the relation on God's side; she can therefore return to Him again and submit to His will (Isa 63 16; 64 8); and His pity exceeds a mother's love (Isa 49 15). The filial relation of Israel to God is summed up and symbolized in a special way in the Davidic king: "I will be his father, and he shall be my son" (2 S 7 14=1 Ch 17 13; cf 1 Ch 22 10; 28 6; Ps 2 7).

God's fatherhood to collective Israel necessarily tends to develop into a personal relation of father and son between Him and individual members of the nation. The children of Israel, whatever their number, shall be called "the sons of the living God" (Hos 1 10). Jeh's marriage relation with Israel as a nation made individual Israelites His children (Hos 2 19, 20; Jer 3 14, 22; cf Isa 50 1; Ezk 16 20, 21; 23 37), and God's ownership of His children, the individual members of the nation, is asserted (of Ps 127 3). Chastisement and pity alike God deals forth as Father to His children (Dt 1 31; 8 5; Ps 103 13), and these are intimate personal relations which can only obtain between individuals.

3. Israel's Collective Covenant Sonship OT. "Israel is my son, my firstborn" (Ex 4 22); "When Israel was a child, then I loved him, and called my son out of Egypt" (Hos 11 1). And to be children of God involves the obligation to be a holy people (Dt 14 1, 2). But Israel has proved unworthy of her status: "I . . . have brought up children, and they have rebelled against me" (Isa 1 2, 4; 30 1, 9). Yet He will have pity upon them: "for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn" (Jer 31 9, 20). Israel's unworthiness does not abolish the relation on God's side; she can therefore return to Him again and submit to His will (Isa 63 16; 64 8); and His pity exceeds a mother's love (Isa 49 15). The filial relation of Israel to God is summed up and symbolized in a special way in the Davidic king: "I will be his father, and he shall be my son" (2 S 7 14=1 Ch 17 13; cf 1 Ch 22 10; 28 6; Ps 2 7).

4. Individual and Personal Relation God's fatherhood to collective Israel necessarily tends to develop into a personal relation of father and son between Him and individual members of the nation. The children of Israel, whatever their number, shall be called "the sons of the living God" (Hos 1 10). Jeh's marriage relation with Israel as a nation made individual Israelites His children (Hos 2 19, 20; Jer 3 14, 22; cf Isa 50 1; Ezk 16 20, 21; 23 37), and God's ownership of His children, the individual members of the nation, is asserted (of Ps 127 3). Chastisement and pity alike God deals forth as Father to His children (Dt 1 31; 8 5; Ps 103 13), and these are intimate personal relations which can only obtain between individuals.

In another direction the idea of God as the father of Israel tends to be modified by the inclusion of the Gentiles. The word "first-born" (in

5. Universalizing the Idea Ex 4 22 and Jer 31 9.20) may be only an emphatic form of expressing sonship, or it may already suggest the possibility of the adoption of the Gentiles. If that idea is not present in words, it is an easy and legitimate inference from several passages, that Gentiles would be admitted some day into this among the rest of Israel's privileges (Isa 19 25; 65 1; Zec 14 16).

II. NT Teaching.—As the doctrine of Divine fatherhood attains its full spiritual and moral significance in the NT, so does the 1. Physical experience and idea of sonship. All and Limited traces of physical descent have disappeared. Paul's quotation from a heathen poet: "For we are also his offspring" (Acts 17 28), whatever its original significance, is introduced by the apostle for the purpose of enforcing the idea of the spiritual kinship of God and men. The phrase "Son of God" applied to Christ by the Roman centurion (Mt 27 54; Mk 15 39) may or may not, in his mind, have involved the idea of physical descent, but its utterance was the effect of an impression of similarity to the gods, produced by the exhibition of power attending His death. The idea of creation is assumed in the NT, but generally it is not prominent in the idea of sonship. The virgin birth of Jesus, however, may be understood as implying either the creative activity of the Holy Spirit, or the communication of a preëxistent Divine being to form a new human personality, but the latter idea also would involve creative activity in the physical realm (cf Lk 3 38: "Adam [son] of God"). The limitations of the OT conception of sonship as national and collective disappear altogether in the NT; God is father of all men, and of every man. In potentiality at least every man and all men are sons of God. The essence of sonship consists in a personal experience and moral likeness which places man in the most intimate union and communion with God.

(1) The filial consciousness of Jesus.—Divine sonship was first realized and made manifest in the consciousness of Jesus (Mt 11 27). For Him it meant unbroken personal knowledge of God and communion with Him, and the sense of His love for Him and of His satisfaction and delight in Him (Mt 3 17; 17 5; Mk 1 11; 9 7; Lk 3 22; 9 35). Whether the "voice out of the heavens saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" was objective or not, its message always dwelt in the filial consciousness of Jesus. The Father's love was to Him a source of knowledge and power (Jn 5 20), the reward of His self-sacrifice (10 17) and the inspiration of His love for men (15 9).

Sonship meant for Him His Messianic mission (Mt 16 17). It involved His dependence on the Father and His obedience to Him (Jn 5 19.30; 8 29), and a resulting confidence in His mission (5 36; 10 36.37). It filled Him with a sense of dignity, power and glory which the Father gave Him, and would yet give in larger measure (Mt 26 63.64; 16 27; Jn 17 5).

(2) Communicated to men.—Jesus communicated His own experience of God to men (Jn 14 9) that they also might know the Father's love and dwell in it (Jn 17 26). Through Him and through Him alone can they become children of God in fact and in experience (Jn 1 12; 14 6; Mt 11 27). It is therefore a distinctively Christian experience and always involves a relation of faith in Christ and moral harmony with Him. It differs from His experience in one essential fact, at least in most men. It involves an inner change, a change of feeling and motive, of ideal and attitude, that may be compared to a new birth (Jn 3 3). Man must turn and return from disobedience and alienation through repentance to childlike submission (Lk 15 18-20). It is not the submission of slaves, but the submission of sons, in which they have liberty and confidence before God (Gal 4 6), and a heritage from Him for their possession (Gal 4 6.7; Rom 8 17). It is the liberty of self-realization. As sons they recognize their kinship with God, and share his mind and purpose, so that His commands become their pleasure: "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments; and his commandments are not grievous" (1 Jn 5 3). They have boldness and access to God (Eph 2 18; 3 12). With this free union of love with God there comes a sense of power, of independence of circumstances, of mastery over the world, and of the possession of all things necessary which become the heirs of God (Mt 6 26.32; 7 11). "For whatsoever is begotten of God overcometh the world" (1 Jn 5 4). They learn that the whole course and destiny of creation is for the "revealing of the sons of God" (Rom 8 19.21).

Christ's sonship involved His moral harmony with the Father: "I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love" 3. As Moral Condition, or Ethical Fact (Jn 15 10; 8 53). He accomplished the work which the Father gave Him to do (Jn 17 4; 5 19), "becoming obedient even unto death, yea, the death of the cross" (Phil 2 8). And sonship makes the same demand upon men. The peacemakers and those who forgive like God are His children (Mt 5 9.45; Lk 6 35). "For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, these [and these only] are sons of God" (Rom 8 14). God will be Father to the holy (2 Cor 6 18). The test and mark of the children of God is that they do righteousness and love the brethren (1 Jn 3 10). They are blameless and harmless, without blemish, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation (Phil 2 15). Therefore their ideal of life is to be "imitators of God" and to walk in love even as Christ did (Eph 5 1). Sonship grows to its consummation as the life grows in the likeness of Christ, and the final destiny of all sons is to be ever like Him (1 Jn 3 2).

Sonship is properly and primarily a relation, but it may so dominate and transform the whole of a man's life, thought and conduct as to become his essential being, the most comprehensive category under which all that he is may be summed up.

4. As State of Being, or Ontological Fact (1) Essence of sonship in Christ.—It is so that the NT comprehends the person of Christ. Everything that He did, He did as God's son, so that He is the Son, always and ever Son. In the beginning, in the bosom of the Father, He is the ONLY BEGOTTEN (q.v.) Son (Jn 1 1.18). He is born a Son of God (Lk 1 35). He begins life in the things of His Father (Lk 2 49). His whole life is that of the beloved Son (Mt 3 17; 17 5). As Son of God He dies (Mt 26 63; Lk 22 70; Mt 27 40.43; cf Jn 5 18). In His resurrection He was declared to be the Son of God with power (Rom 1 4); as Jesus the Son of God He is our great high priest in heaven (He 4 14), and in the glory of His father He will come to judge in the last day (Mt 16 27).

(2) Men's sonship.—Unlike Him, men's moral sonship is neither eternal nor universal. Are they therefore sons in any sense always and everywhere? All children are heirs of the kingdom of God and objects of the Father's care (Lk 18 16; Mt 18 10). But men may turn away from the Father and become unworthy to be called His sons (Lk 15 13.19). They may become children of the devil (1 Jn 3 10; Jn 8 44), and children of wrath (Eph 2 3). Then they lose the actuality, but not the potentiality, of sonship. They have not the experience or character of sons, but they are still moral and rational beings made in the image of God, open to the appeal and influence of His love, and able to "rise and go to their Father." They are objects of God's love (Jn 15 13; Rom 5 8) and of His gracious search and seeking (Lk 15 4; Jn 11 52). But they are actual sons only when they are led by the Spirit of God (Rom 8 14); and even so their sonship will only be consummated in the resurrection (Rom 8 23; Lk 20 36).

In the relation of father and son, fatherhood is original and creative. That does not necessarily mean priority in time.

5. As Relation to God, or Theological Fact

(1) Eternal generation.—Origen's doctrine of the eternal generation of Christ, by which is meant that God and Christ always stood in the relation of Father and Son to one another, is a just interpretation of the NT idea that the Son "was in the beginning with God" (prōs tōn Theōn). But Jesus was conscious of His dependence upon the Father and that His sonship was derived from Him (Jn 5 19.36). Still more manifest is it that men derive their sonship from God. He made them for Himself, and whatever in human nature qualifies men to become sons of God is the free gift of God. But men in their sin and disobedience could not come to a knowledge of the Father, had He not "sent forth his Son . . . that we might receive the adoption of sons" (Gal 4 4.5): "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called children of God" (1 Jn 3 1); "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son" (q.v.) who gave men "the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on his name" (Jn 3 16; 1 12). It is not the children of the flesh but the children of the promise who are children of God (Rom 9 4). The mere act of birth does not constitute men into children of God, but His covenant of free grace must be added. God being essentially Father made men and the universe, sent His Son and His Spirit, "for the revealing of the sons of God." But they can only know the Father, and realize their sonship when they respond to His manifestation of fatherly love, by faith in God and obedience to Him.

(2) The work of grace.—The question whether sonship is natural and universal or conditional upon grace working through faith, does not admit of a categorical answer. The alternatives are not strict antitheses. God does all things as Father. To endow man with rational and moral nature capable of his becoming a son was an act of love and grace, but its whole purpose can be communicated only in response to faith in Christ. But a natural sonship which is not actual is meaningless. A man's moral condition and his attitude toward God are the most essential elements of his nature, for a man's nature is just the sum total of his thoughts, acts and states. If these are hostile or indifferent to God, there is nothing left that can have the reality or bear the name of son. For if the word son be used of mere creaturehood and potentiality, that is to give it a meaning entirely different from NT usage. All men by nature are potential sons, because God has made them for sonship and does all things to win them into their heritage. Men may be sons of God in a very imperfect and elementary manner. The sharp transitions of Pauline and Johannine theology are rather abstract distinctions for thought than actual descriptions of spiritual processes. But Paul and John also contemplate a growth in sonship, "till we all attain unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a fullgrown man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (Eph 4 13). See Sons of God.

CHILDREN OF ISRAEL, iz'rā-el (בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, bnē yisrā'el): A very common term in both the OT and the NT, and it refers to the Israelites as the descendants of a common ancestor, Jacob, whose name was changed to Israel (see Gen 32 24-32). It was customary to designate the members of the various tribes as the children of the one from whom the tribe originated (see Nu 1 20-43; Ezr 2 3-61), and it was natural that the people who boasted of Israel as their ancestor should be designated as his children. The first reference to the descendants of Jacob is found in the account of the changing of Jacob's name to Israel, and the purpose is to connect them with the experience in Jacob's life which led to the change in his name: "Therefore the children of Israel eat not the sinew of the hip, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew of the hip." At the time when this was written "the c. of I." was a term that was commonly applied to the Israelites. In 2 K 17 34 they are called "the children of Jacob," and this occurs in connection with the account of the changing of Jacob's name to Israel and is intended to connect them closely with their father Jacob, who was favored of God.

After a time, it is quite likely that the term "c. of I." lost its peculiar significance and was simply one of the popular terms designating the inhabitants of Pal, but at first it was intended to connect these people with their ancestor Jacob whose name was changed to Israel. The Jews of the NT times connected themselves with Abraham rather than with Jacob (see Jn 8 39; Rom 9 7; Gal 3 7, tékna, tékna, or viol 'Abraám, huiot Abraám).

CHILDREN OF THE EAST, ēst (בְּנֵי קֶדֶם, bnē qedhem): A term which in a general way designated the inhabitants of the country E. of Pal. The Hebrews thought of their own country as occupying the central place, and of the other parts of the world in relation to this. They spoke of the "queen of the south" (Mt 12 42), and of the "king of the south" (Dnl 11 5.6). They spoke of people coming from "the east and the west" and sitting down with the patriarchs (Mt 8 11).

The term "children of the east" seems to have been applied to the inhabitants of any part of the country E. of Pal. It is stated that Jacob, when he fled from Esau, "came to the land of the children of the east" (Gen 29 1), and the place to which he came was Haran in Mesopotamia. In Jer 49 28 the inhabitants of Kedar are called "the children of the east," and in later Jewish lit. Kedar is identified with the Arabs (see KEDAR). Job was designated as "the greatest of all the children of the east" (Job 1 3), and the land of Uz was mentioned as his home (Job 1 1). While it is impossible absolutely to locate the land of Uz, it must have been on the edge of the desert which was E. of Pal. The children of the east seem to have been famous for their wisdom. It is said that "Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east" (1 K 4 30), and "Wise-men from the east" came to Jerus seeking the one that was born king of the Jews (Mt 2 1).

Many of the inhabitants of the east country were regarded as descending from Abraham (see Gen 25 6), and hence they were related to Israel.

CHILEAB, kil'ē-ab (כִּלְעָב, kil'āb; Δαλουιά, Dalouia, "restraint of father"): A son of David, born to him at Hebron. His mother was Abigail, whom David married after the death of her husband Nabal, the Carmelite (2 S 3 3). In the corresponding account (1 Ch 3 1) he is called "Daniel," the meaning of which name ("God is my judge") points to its having been given in order to commemorate God's judgment upon Nabal (1 S 25 39; cf Gen 30 6). Some suppose that he bore both names, but the LXX reading here Dalouia (1 Ch Damniel), and the identity of the last three letters of the Heb word "Chileab" with the first three of the following word, seems to indicate that the text of Samuel is corrupt.

CHILION, kil'i-on (כִּלְיֹן, kilyōn, "pining," "wasting away"): One of the two sons of Elimelech and Naomi, "Mahlon and Chilion, Ephrathites of Bethlehem-judah" (Ruth 1 2). With his mother and brother he came into Moab and there both married Moabitish women, Orpah being the name of Chilion's wife and Ruth that of the wife of Mahlon (4 9, 10). Both died early and Orpah remained in Moab while Ruth accompanied Naomi back to Bethlehem. When Boaz married Ruth he "bought all that was Elimelech's, and all that was Chilion's, and Mahlon's, of the hand of Naomi" (4 9). W. L. WALKER

CHILMAD, kil'mad (כִּלְמַד, kilmadh; Χαρμάν, Charmán): A city or district mentioned after Sheba and Asshur as supplying merchandise to Tyre (Ezk 27 23). By changing m into w (common in Assyrian-Bab) this has been compared with Kal-wādha near Bagdad (G. Smith, TSBA, I, 61; Delitzsch, Paradies, 206), but the identification seems improbable. Though regarded as the name of a country in the LXX and the Vulg (Charman; Chelmad), there is some doubt whether this view of the word is correct. The Tg substitutes Madhai, "Media," and on this account Mez (Stadt Harran, 24) amends to Kōl Madhai, "all Media." The absence of the copula "and" has caused others to further modify the vocalization, and by reading k'limmūdh instead of Chilmad, the sense "Asshur was as the apprentice of thy trading" (Kimhi, Hitzig, Cornill) is obtained, but is not satisfactory. Probably both text and tr are susceptible of improvement.

CHIMHAM, kim'ham (כִּמְחָם, kimhām [2 S 19 37, 38] or כִּמְחָן, kimhān [2 S 19 40] or כִּמְחָם, k'mōhem [Jer 41 17 Kt.]; this reading, however, may probably be safely ignored): One of the sons of Barzillai the Gileadite, who supported David while the latter was in exile in Mahanaim (2 S 19 37). After the death of Absalom, Barzillai was invited to spend the remainder of his life with the king; but he refused, and sent his son Chimham in his stead. From the mention of "the habitation of Chimham, which is by Beth-lehem" (Jer 41 17 AV), it has been inferred that Chimham received a grant of land from David's patrimony at Bethlehem, which retained his name for at least four cents. It has been suggested that his name was probably Ahinoam (אֲחִינוֹם, 'āhīnō'am).

CHIMNEY, chim'ni. See HOUSE.

CHINNERETH, kin'ē-reth (כִּנְרֶת, kinnereth [Dt 3 17; Josh 19 35, etc]) or CHINNEROTH, kin'ē-roth (כִּנְרֹת, kinārōth; B, Κενερέθ, Kenerēth, A, Χενερόθ, Chenerōth [Josh 11 2]): Taking the order in which the towns are mentioned, this city seems to have lain N. of Rakkath (? Tiberias). It may have occupied the site of el-Mejdel, at the S.W. corner of the plain of Gennesaret. From this city the sea took its OT name (Nu 34 11, etc).

CHIOS, kē'os, kī'os (Χίος, Chios): An island belonging to Turkey in the Aegæan Sea, S. of Lesbos, and very near the mainland of Asia Minor. St. Paul's vessel passed it on his last voyage to Jerus (Acts 20 15). The channel here is very picturesque. From St. Luke's expression, "we came the following day over against Chios," it has been conjectured that they were becalmed; more probably it simply means that, because of the dark moon, they lay at anchor for the night on the Asian coast opposite the island (HDB, s.v.). Herod, when on his way to Agrippa at the Bosphorus, "continued many days at Chios" and conferred many royal benefactions upon the inhabitants (Jos, Ant, XVI, ii, 2).

The soil is sterile (though well cultivated), the climate mild. Earthquakes are frequent. In the mountains (highest 4,000 ft.) beautiful blue marble with white veins, and excellent potter's clay, were quarried in antiquity. In modern times large quantities of ochre are mined. The chief industry is the culture of the silkworm, the cocoons being sent to Lyons. Oranges, lemons, almonds, brandy, anise, mastich and leather are also exported. The inhabitants, who are almost entirely Greeks, number about 60,000. The capital, Castro, has a population of 15,000. The place where Homer is said to have collected his pupils around him is still pointed out to the traveler at the foot of Mt. Epos, near the coast. It is in reality (probably) a very old sanctuary of Cybele, the Mother of the Gods. The tragic poet Ion, the historian Theopompus and the sophist Theocritus were natives of Chios. The Chians were especially famous for their skill in telling stories, and for their levity. A familiar proverb says that "it is easier to find a green horse than a sober-minded Sciot" (Conybeare and Howson, XX, 549).

The oldest inhabitants of the island were Leleges, Cretans and Carians, who were conquered by the Ionians. The latter made Chios one of the most flourishing states in Ionia. When the Persians overran Asia Minor and oppressed the Gr colonies, the Chians showed a Pan-Hellenic spirit. They surrendered, however, to Cyrus in 546 BC. Nevertheless, 46 years later they joined in the rebellion of Aristagoras against the Persians. In the naval engagement off the island Lade they fought with 100 ships and displayed great bravery. Again they fell into the power of Persia; but after the battle of Mycale (479) the Chians joined the Athenian confederacy. In 412 they sided with the Peloponnesians, in the 19th year of the war which Athens had been waging against Sparta and her allies. For this act of treason the Athenians devastated the island. At the end of the war the Chians revolted from Sparta and, after the battle of Naxos (376), became an ally of Athens once more. Oppressed now by Athens, as she had been by Sparta, Chios made an alliance with Thebes in 363 and defended herself successfully against the Athenian general, Chares; and in 355 Athens was forced to recognize the island's independence. Later the Chians became friends of the Romans and in the war with Mithridates were obliged to surrender their ships to the Pontic king and in addition pay him 2,000 talents.

In 1307 AD Turkish pirates subjugated and laid waste the island. The Turks themselves became masters of Chios in 1566. In the war of the Gr revolution the Chians joined the Greeks (Feb. 1821) but were overpowered by the Turks. The Pasha decreed that the island should be utterly devastated; 23,000 Chians were massacred and 47,000 sold into slavery. Only 5,000 escaped. A second attempt to regain their freedom was made in 1827, but met with failure. When the kingdom of Greece was established two years later, Chios was not included. On April 3, 1881, the island was visited by a terrible earthquake, the city of Castro being almost entirely destroyed.

CHIRP, chērp (חִרְפֵּי, chāphaph): "Chirp" occurs in the AVm and RVm of Isa 29 4, "Thy voice shall be as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper [m, "chirp"] out of the dust." The reference is to "the sounds made by wizards and ventriloquists, who imitated the chirping of the bats which was supposed to proceed from the lower world"; hence for "peep" of AV in Isa 8 19 we have "chirp"—"wizards, that chirp and that mutter."

Figurative: We have also in Isa 10 14 RV, in a fig. allusion to young birds, "chirped" instead of "peeped." See CHATTER. W. L. WALKER

CHISLEU, kis'lū, CHISLEV, kis'lev. See KISLEV.

CHISLON, kis'lon, kiz'lon (כִּסְלֹן, kislōn, "strength"): A prince of Benjamin, the father of Elidad (Nu 34 21).

CHISLOTH-TABOR, kis-loth-tā'bor, kiz'lōth-. See CHESULLOTH.

CHITLISH, kit'lish (כִּתְלִישׁ, kithlīsh, "separation"; AV Kithlish, ERV "Chithlish," kith'lish): An unidentified town named with Lahman and Gederoth in the Shephelah of Judah (Josh 15 40).

CHITTIM, kit'im. See KITTIM.

CHIUN, ki'un: Thus Heb כִּיּוּן, kīyūn, is transliterated in Am 5 26 AV. The vowels represent an assimilation to some such word as shikkūc, "detestable thing," or gillūl, "idol" (properly "a filthy thing"), in consonance with the well-known habit of the punctuators (cf מֹלֶכֶת, mōlekh, Molech with the vowels of bōsheth, בֹּשֶׁת, "shame"). The Syr VS has preserved the correct vocalization; apparently also the Sept, albeit the consonants have suffered corruption (so particularly in the Gr MSS of Acts 7 43). There can be no doubt that we should vocalize כִּיּוּן, kīwān=the Assyr Kai(a)-wanu=Kaïamanu by which at least in late Bab Saturn was indicated. The passage in Amos refers to the Saturn worship which appears to have been in vogue in the prophet's days. The Israelites shall carry with them into exile the images of their gods (render with the m of RV: "Yea, ye shall take up," etc). The received vocalization is as old as Aquila and Symmachus. MAX L. MARGOLIS

CHIUN, ki'un (Am 5 26 AV): Called in Acts 7 43 "Rephan" (Ῥεμφάν, Rhemphán), the planet Saturn. See ASTROLOGY.

CHLOE, klō'ē (Χλόη, Chlōē, "a tender shoot"): A woman, presumably a Christian, mentioned only in 1 Cor 1 11. She was a resident either of Corinth or of Ephesus. Paul had been informed by some of her household, probably Christian slaves, of the dissensions in the church at Corinth. Nothing more is known of her.

CHOBA, kō'ba, CHOBAL, kō'bā-i (Χωβά, Chōbá, Jth 4 4; Χωβαί, Chōbaí, 15 4f): A place named along with Jericho, Aesora, and the valley of Salem (Jth 4 4; 15 4f). Reland's (Pal, 721) suggestion of Choabis, which the Peutinger Tables give as 12 Rom miles from Scythopolis, seems probable. It may be identical with el-Mekhubby, about 11 miles from Beisān (Scythopolis), and 3 miles from Tūbās.

CHOENIX, kē'niks (χοίνιξ, choínix): A Gr dry measure, almost equal to one quart. Mentioned in the NT only in Rev 6 6, where RVm would read "choenix" instead of the indefinite tr "measure." The ver is then obviously a threat of famine.

CHOICE, chois. See CHOOSE; WILL.

CHOKE, chōk (πνίγω, pnīgō, and its compounds): Is used in its primary sense of "to strangle," or "to suffocate," in describing the fate of the swine (Lk 8 33 AV). The RV has "drowned," but "choked" is the correct rendering of the Gr word.

Figurative: It is used in the sense of "to strangle" "smother," "suffocate," as if by depriving of breath, in describing the fate of the young grain growing in the midst of thorns (Mt 13 7). The fig. is carried a little farther still in describing the way the word, planted in the heart, is overcome by the care of the world, and the deceitfulness of riches (Mt 13 22). A. W. FORTUNE

CHOLA, kō'la (Χολά, Chōlá; AV Cola): This names occurs only with that of Chobai (see CHOBA) in Jth 15 4. It may be identical with the modern Kā'un, between el-Mekhubby and Beisān.

CHOLER, kol'ēr: Lit. "bile," is used in the sense of a disease (χολέρα, choléra) (Sir 31 20; 37 30), and in the sense of bitter anger (מָרָר, mārār) (Dnl 8 7; 11 11 EV, ARV "anger").

CHOOSE, chōōz, CHOSEN, chō'z'n (בָּחַר, bāḥar, בָּבְחַל, bābhāl, בָּרָא, bārā', בָּרָה, bārāh; ἐκλέγω, eklēgō):

II. IN THE NT

1. Various Meanings
2. Of God's Free Grace
3. Ultimate Antinomies
4. Election Corresponds to Experience

The words denote an act of comparison of two or more objects or persons, the preference and selection of one, or of a few out of a larger number for a certain purpose, function, position or privilege.

I. In the OT.—For bāḥar and its derivatives: men choosing wives (Gen 6 2); Lot choosing the cities of the Plain (Gen 13 11); often

1. Human of kings and generals choosing soldiers Choice for their prowess (e.g. Ex 17 9; Josh 8 3; 1 S 13 2; 2 S 10 9; 17 1). The word bāḥar is often used for "young men," as being choice, in the prime of manhood. The most important uses of bāḥar are these: of Israel choosing a king (1 S 8 18; 12 13); of moral and religious choice: choosing Jeh as God (Josh 24 15, 22), or other gods (Jgs 5 8; 10 14); the way 2. God of truth (Ps 119 30); to refuse the evil Chooses and choose the good (Isa 7 15, 16); cf King of David's choice of evils (2 S 24 12). A Israel leading idea is that of God choosing Moses as leader (Nu 16 5, 7; 17 5); the Levites to the priesthood (1 S 2 28; 2 Ch 29 11); Saul as king (1 S 10 24), David (2 S 6 21; 1 K

11 34), Solomon (1 Ch 28 5). All this follows from the theocratic idea that God rules personally over Israel as His chosen people. A more important, but still subsidiary, idea is that of Jeh choosing Jerus as the place of His habitation and worship (Dt 12 5; and 20 other times, Josh 9 27; 1 K 8

44.48; Ps 132 13; Zec 1 17; 2 12; 3 2). This was the ruling idea of Josiah's reformation which was instrumental in putting down polytheistic ideas and idolatrous practices in Israel, and was therefore an important factor in the development of Heb monotheism; but it was an idea that Heb monotheism had to transcend and reject to attain its full growth. "The hour cometh, when neither in this mountain, nor in Jerusalem, shall ye worship the Father" (Jn 4 21).

But the fundamental idea of choosing, which governs all others in the OT, is that of God choosing Israel to be His peculiar people. He

4. Election chose Abraham, and made a covenant of Israel with him, to give him the land of Canaan (Neh 9 7 ff): "For thou art a holy people unto Jeh thy God: Jeh thy God hath chosen thee to be a people for his own possession, above all peoples that are upon the face of the earth . . . because Jeh loveth you, and because he would keep the oath which he sware unto your fathers" (Dt 7 6-8). Historically this idea originated in the old conception of Jeh as the tribal God of Israel, bound to her by natural and indissoluble ties (see God). But as their conception of Jeh became more moral, and the idea of His righteousness predominated, it was recognized that there was no natural and necessary relation and harmony between Israel and Jeh that accounted for the favor of a righteous God toward her, for Israel was no better than her neighbors (Am 1, 2). Why then was Jeh Israel's God, and Israel His people? It was by an act of free

5. Jeho- choice and sovereign grace on God's vah's part. "You only have I known of all Grace the families of the earth" (Am 3 2). In Hos the relation is described under the

husband: and to realize the force of the figure, it is necessary to recall what ancient and oriental marriage customs were. Choice and favor were almost entirely made by the husband. The idea of the covenant which Jeh out of His free grace made with Israel comes to the forefront in Dt and Jer. Because He loved her, and for no other reason, He has chosen Israel to be His peculiar people. In Isa 40-66 the idea is carried farther in two directions: (1) Jeh's gracious choice of Israel rests ultimately on His absolute sovereignty: "O Jacob my servant, and Israel, whom I have chosen: thus saith Jeh that made thee, and formed thee from the womb" (Isa 44 1.2; cf Isa 29 16; Jer 18 6; Isa 64 8). For Israel's deliverance Cyrus and his world-empire are in Jeh's hands as clay in the potter's hands (Isa 45 9.10). (2) "Israel is elect for the sake of mankind." This is the moral interpretation of a choice that otherwise appears arbitrary and irrational. God's purpose and call of salvation are unto all mankind. "Look unto me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth; for I am God, and there is none else" (Isa 45 22). And Israel is His servant, chosen, the messenger He sends, "to bring forth justice to the Gentiles" (Isa 42 1.19; 43 10.12). The idea is further developed in the conception of the SERVANT OF JEH (q.v.) as the faithful few (or one) formed "from the womb to be his servant, to bring Jacob again to him," "for a light to the Gentiles," God's "salvation unto the end of the earth" (Isa 49 1-6; 52 13-53 12) (cf Isaiah's doctrine of the Remnant: Shearjashub; also, the righteous, the godly, the meek, in Pss; and see Skinner, Isaiah, II, xxx ff). As the conception of personality and of individual relation and responsibility to God developed from Ezk onward, together with the resulting doctrine of personal immortality, the conditions were prepared for the application of the idea of election to individuals (cf Ps 65 4).

Coördinate with the idea of God choosing Israel runs the complementary idea that Israel should prove faithful to the covenant, and worthy of the choice. God has chosen her, not for any merit in her, but of His free grace, and according to His purpose of salvation, but if Israel fails to respond by faithful conduct, fitting her to be His servant and messenger, He may and will cast her off, or such portion of her as proves unworthy. See Oehler, OT Theol., I, 256 ff, 287 f.

Three other Heb words expressing choice in minor matters are: kābhal, for David's choice of evils (1 Ch 21 11); bārā', to mark out a place (Ezk 21 19), to select singers and porters for the temple (1 Ch 9 22; 16 41); bārāh, to choose a man to represent Israel against Goliath (1 S 17 8).

II. In the NT.—The whole conception of God, of His relation to Israel, and of His action in history indicated above, constituted the religious heritage of Jesus Christ and His disciples. The national consciousness had to a considerable extent given place to that of the individual; and salvation extended beyond the present life into a state of blessedness in a future world. But the central ideas remain, and are only modified in the NT in so far as Jesus Christ becomes the Mediator and Agent of God's sovereign grace. Eklegō and its derivatives are the words that generally express the idea in the NT. They are used (1) of the general idea of selecting one out of many (Lk 14 7); (2) of choosing men for a particular purpose, e.g. of the church choosing the seven (Acts 6 5); of the choice of delegates from the Council of Jerus (Acts 15 22.25; cf 2 Cor 8 19), cheirotōnō; choose by vote (RV "appoint") (cf Acts 10 41), procheirotōnō; (3) of moral choice (Mk 13 20): "Mary hath chosen the good part" (Lk 10 42); (4) of Christ as the chosen Messiah of God (Lk 23 35; 1 Pet 2 4 AV); (5) of Christ choosing His apostles (Lk 6 13; Jn 6 70; 13 18; 15 16.19; Acts 1 2.24); Paul (Acts 9 15; cf 22 14 AV), procheirizomai; Rufus (Rom 16 13); and Paul chose Silas (Acts 15 40), epilēgō; (6) of God (a) choosing Israel (Acts 13 17; cf Rom 9 11), (b) choosing the Christian church as the new Israel (1 Pet 2 9 AV), (c) choosing the members of the church from among the poor (Jas 2 5), the foolish, weak and despised (1 Cor 1 27-28), (d) choosing into His favor and salvation a few out of many: "Many are called, but few are chosen" (Mt 20 16 [omitted in RV]; 22 14); God shortens the days of the destruction of Jerus "for the elect's sake, whom he chose" (Mk 13 20).

In Eph 1 4-6 every phrase tells a different phase of the conception: (1) God chose (and fore-ordained) the saints in Christ before the foundation of the world; (2) according to the good pleasure of His will; (3) unto adoption as sons through Jesus Christ unto Himself; (4) to be holy and without blemish before Him in love; (5) to the praise of the glory of His grace; (6) which He freely bestowed on them in the Beloved. And in Rev 17 14, the triumphant church in heaven is described as "called and chosen and faithful." God's sovereign choice governs the experience and testing of the saints at every point from beginning to end.

Thus in the NT as in the OT (1) God's covenant of grace is free and unconditional. It is unto all men, now as individuals rather than nations, and without distinction of race or class. It is no less free and sovereign, because it is a father's grace. (2) Israel is still a chosen race for a special purpose. (3) The church and the saints that constitute it are chosen to the full experience and privileges of sonship. (4) God's purpose of grace is fully revealed and realized through Jesus Christ.

This doctrine raises certain theological and metaphysical difficulties that have never yet been satisfactorily solved. (1) How can

3. Ultimate God be free if all His acts are pre-Antinomies ordained from eternity? This is an antinomy which indeed lies at the root of all personality. It is of the essence of the idea of personality that a person should freely determine himself and yet act in conformity with his own character. Every person in practice and experience solves this antinomy continually, though he may have no intellectual category that can coördinate these two apparently contradictory principles in all personality. (2) How can God be just, if a few are chosen and many are left? And (3) How can man be free if his moral character proceeds out of God's sovereign grace? It is certain that if God chose all or left all He would be neither just nor gracious, nor would man have any vestige of freedom. The doctrine describes accurately (a) the moral fact, that some accept salvation and others reject it; (b) the religious fact that God's sovereign and unconditional love is the beginning and cause

4. Election of salvation. The meeting-point of Corre- the action of grace, and of man's liberty sponds to as a moral and responsible being, it does Experience not define. Nor has the category as yet been discovered wherewith to construe and coördinate these two facts of religious experience together, although it is a fact known in every Christian experience that where God is most sovereign, man is most free.

CHOP (כָּרַץ, pāras):

Figurative: This word, meaning "to cut in pieces," "to distribute," often tr^d "spread," is rendered "chop" in Mic 3 3, they "chop them in pieces, as for the pot," fig. for the destruction of God's people through the cruel exactions of their rulers.

CHORASHAN, kôr-ash'an, kô-rā'shan. See CORASHAN.

CHORAZIN, kô-rā'zin (Χορᾶζιν, Chorazin, Mt 11 21; Χορᾶζιν, Chōrazin, Lk 10 13; WH Χορᾶζιν, Chorazin): A city whose name appears only in the woe pronounced against it by Christ (Mt 11 21; Lk 10 13). Its appearance there, however, shows that it must have been a place of some importance, and highly privileged by the ministry of Jesus. It was already deserted in the time of Eusebius, who places it 2 miles from Capernaum (Onom, s.v.). We can hardly doubt that it is represented by the extensive ruins of Kerāzeh, on the heights to the north of Tell Hām. It is utterly desolate: a few carved stones being seen among the heaps. There are traces of a Rom road which connected the ancient city with the great highway between north and south which touched the lake shore at Khān Mīnyeh. W. EWING CHORBE, kôr'bē (Χορβή, Chorbē; AV Corbe): Head of a family which returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 12). The name apparently corresponds to Zaccai in Ezr 2 9 and Neh 7 14.

CHOSAMAEUS, kos-a-mē'us (A, Σίμων Χοσαμαῖος, Simōn Chosamaios; B, Χοράμαος, Chosamaios): Occurs in 1 Esd 9 32 as the name of one of the sons of Annas. But in the || passage (Ezr 10 31) the name is simply Shimeon, followed by "Benjamin, Malluch, Shemariah," which are omitted in 1 Esd. The LXX of Ezr 10 31 has Σεμεών, Semeōn, followed by the three omitted names. The difference may have arisen from a mistake of a copyist, or from the use of an imperfect MS.

CHOSEN, chō'z'n. See CHOOSE.

CHOZEBA, kô-zē'ba (חֲזֵבָה, kôzēbhā, "deceitful"): Same as ACHZIB and CHEZIB (q.v.).

 1. Reality
 2. Judgment

This term is given to that condition of blessedness, glory and dominion into which Our Lord entered after the completion of His earthly career of humiliation and suffering, and which is to be regarded as the reward of His meritorious obedience, and the issue of His victorious struggle, and at the same time the means of His prosecution and completion of His work as Redeemer and Saviour of the world. The classic passage of Scripture, rich in suggestion, and the source of much controversy in the development of Christian theology, is Phil 2 5-11. The word "exalted" of ver 9, ὑπερυψώσω, hyperupsōō, occurs only in this place in the NT and, like its Lat representative, is limited to ecclesiastical use. Cf Rom 14 9; Eph 1 19-23; 1 Pet 3 21, 22.

Christ's Exaltation includes His Resurrection, Ascension, Session at the right hand of God, and Advent as Judge and Consummator of the world's redemption.

I. The Resurrection.—The historic place and validity of this event will be found under other heads; our concern is with the event

1. Its Glori- as it relates to the glorification of Our fication of Lord. (1) It revealed His power Christ over death. (2) It confirms all His claims to Divine Sonship. (3) It attests His acceptance and that of His work by God. (4) It crowns the process of the redemption of the world. (5) It forms the beginning of that new creation which is life eternal, and over which death can have no power. (6) It is the entrance of the Son of God into the power and glory of the New Kingdom, or the restored Kingdom of the Sovereign Ruler of the Universe. The following Scriptures among many others may be consulted: Rev 1 18; Acts 2 24; Rom 1 4; 1 Cor 15 20; Jn 5 25; Rom 4 25; Rom 6 4, 5; Col 2 12; Phil 3 10; Rom 6 9.

An interesting and important question arises in connection with Christ's exaltation, relating to the nature of the body of the risen Lord.

2. Christ's It was clearly identical with that of Resurrec- His natural life. It was recognized tion Body by the marks which were upon it:
Lk 24 39, 40; Jn 20 24-29. It received food: Lk 24 43 (cf 24 30; Jn 21 12, 13; Acts 10 41). Nevertheless it was changed. After the resurrection, it was not at once recognized: Jn 20 15; 21 7; Lk 24 31. It appeared under apparently new conditions of relation to material substance: Jn 20 19; Lk 24 36. It suddenly became visible, and as suddenly vanished. These facts suggest what reverently may be surmised as to its exalted condition. The apostle's declaration as to the resurrection-body of the redeemed furnishes some hints: 1 Cor 15 35-49; cf Phil 3 21. We may cautiously, from the history of the resurrection and the Pauline doctrine, conclude, that Our Lord still possesses a human body. It is of material substance, with new properties. It occupies space. It was seen by Paul, by Stephen, by the seer of the Apocalypse. It is glorious, incorruptible, spiritual.

By whom was the resurrection effected? It is referred by some Scriptures to God. See Ps 16 10 (cf Acts 2 27-31); and the distinct affirmation by Peter (Acts 2 32). Paul declares that Christ was "raised . . . through the glory of the Father" (Rom 6 4). In Eph 1 19-20, it was the mighty power of God which was wrought in Christ "when he raised him from the dead." Elsewhere it is ascribed to Christ Himself. He declared: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (Jn 2 19). In Jn 10 17-18, Our Lord declares: "I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." The efficient agent is said, according to the generally received reading of Rom 8 2, to have been the Spirit of God, and thus the resurrection is referred to each person of the Godhead. The doctrine of the Lutheran church refers the act to the human power of the Lord Himself, which by incarnation had been endowed with attributes of Deity. This view consists with their teaching of the omnipresence of the body of Jesus (see below on the section "Ascension").

3. The Agent of the Resurrection Christ "when he raised him from the dead." Elsewhere it is ascribed to Christ Himself. He declared: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (Jn 2 19). In Jn 10 17-18, Our Lord declares: "I lay down my life, that I may take it again. No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." The efficient agent is said, according to the generally received reading of Rom 8 2, to have been the Spirit of God, and thus the resurrection is referred to each person of the Godhead. The doctrine of the Lutheran church refers the act to the human power of the Lord Himself, which by incarnation had been endowed with attributes of Deity. This view consists with their teaching of the omnipresence of the body of Jesus (see below on the section "Ascension").

II. The Ascension of Our Lord.—The exaltation of Christ consisted further in His ascension.

1. Its Actuality Some have held that the resurrection and ascension of Jesus ought to be regarded as aspects of the same event.

But Mary saw the risen Lord, though she was forbidden to touch Him, for "I am not yet ascended unto the Father: but go unto my brethren, and say to them, I ascend," etc (Jn 20 17). This, compared with the invitation to Thomas to touch Him, eight days later, suggests something in the ascension added to that which the resurrection implied, and the general thought of the church has consistently regarded the latter as a further step in the exaltation of the Lord. The fact of ascension is recorded in Mk 16 19, and Lk 24 50-51, and with greater detail in Acts 1 9-11. According to these accounts, the ascension was seen by the disciples, and this suggests that heaven is a locality, where are the angels, who are not ubiquitous, and where Christ's disciples will find the place which He declared He was going to prepare for them (Jn 14 2). Heaven is also undoubtedly referred to as a state (Eph 2 6; Phil 3 20), but Christ's body must be in some place, and where He is, there is Heaven.

2. General Doctrine of the Church This is certainly the doctrine of the church in general, and seems to be consistent with the Scriptural teaching. But the Lutherans have maintained that the ascension of the Lord merely involved a change of state in the human nature of Christ. He possessed during His life on earth the Divine attributes of omnipresence, omnipotence and omniscience, but He voluntarily abstained from their exercise. But at His ascension He returned to the full use of these powers. The ascension is Christ's return to immensity. The community of natures gave these Divine qualities to the humanity of Jesus, which Luther declared involved its ubiquity, and that as He was at the right hand of God, and God was everywhere, so Christ in His human personality was in no specific place but everywhere. This omnipresence is not of the infinite extension of the body of the Lord, but He is present as God is everywhere present in knowledge and power.

Another theory of the ascended humanity of the Lord depends upon the conception of the Son of

4. Theory of Laying aside the Existence-Form of God God laying aside at incarnation the "existence-form of God," and while affirming that Christ's body is now in a definite place, it proceeds to hold that at the ascension the accidental and variable qualities of humanity were laid aside, and that He dwells in heaven as a glorified man. Ebrard says:

"He has laid aside forever the existence form of God, and assumed that of man in perpetuity, in which form by His Spirit He governs the church and the world. He is thus dynamically present to all His people." This form of doctrine seems to involve as the result of the incarnation of the Son of God His complete and sole humanity. He is no more than a man. The Logos is no longer God, and as the ascension did not involve the reassumption of the "existence-form of God," Christ in glory is only a glorified man.

The ascension was necessary, in conformity with the spiritual character of the kingdom which Christ founded. Its life is that of faith,

5. Its Necessity not sight. A perpetual life of even the resurrected Christ on earth would have been wholly inconsistent with the spiritual nature of the new order. The return of Christ to the special presence of God was also part of His high-priestly service (see CHRIST, OFFICES OF) and His corporal absence from His people was the condition of that gift of the Spirit by which salvation was to be secured to each believer and promulgated throughout the world, as declared by Himself (Jn 16 7). Finally, the ascension was that physical departure of the Lord to the place which He was to prepare for His people (Jn 14 2-3). The resurrection was this completion of the objective conditions of redemption. The ascension was the initial step in the carrying out of redemptive work in the final salvation of mankind.

III. Exaltation Completed at the Right Hand of God.—The term "the right hand of God" is Scriptural (Acts 7 55-56; Rom 8 34; Eph 1 20; He 1 3; 10 12; 12 2; 1 Pet 3 22) and expresses the final step in the Lord's exaltation. Care must be taken in the use of the expression. It is a figure to express the association of Christ with God in glory and power. It must not be employed as by Luther to denote the relation of the body of Christ to space, neither must it be limited to the Divine nature of the Logos reinstated in the conditions laid aside in incarnation. Christ thus glorified is the God-man, the theanthropic person, Divine and human. This exaltation is based upon the essential glory of the Son of God, who "being the brightness of his glory and the

2. Its Essential Necessity express image of his person . . . sat down on the right hand" (He 1 3 AV). It is the claim which the Lord makes for Himself in His prayer (Jn 17 4-5), and is thus specifically declared in Phil 2 6-11: "God highly exalted Him." But in His glory Christ received the power universal and Divine. In Eph 1 20-22 His supreme dignity and power are affirmed "far above . . . every name," "all things . . . under His feet" (cf He 2 8; 1 Cor 15 27; 1 Pet 3 22). Christ at the "right hand of God" is the highly suggestive picture of His universal dominion asserted by Himself (Mt 28 18): "All authority hath been given unto me in heaven and on earth." It is vain to speculate upon the relation of Christ's nature in this exalted state. We cannot distinguish between the human and Divine. We can only believe in, and trust and submit to the One Glorified Person who thus administers the kingdom in perfect harmony with its Divine laws in all the ages, and His own revelation of the will of God, as given to man in His own earthly career: pitiful, tender, serving, helping, restoring, saving, triumphant. The exaltation is for His mediatorial and finally saving work. He is the Head of His church; He is the Lord of angels and men; He is the Master of the ages.

IV. The Second Advent.—The exaltation of Christ is to be completed by His coming again at the close of the dispensation, to complete His redemptive work and judge the world, and so to establish the final Kingdom of God. This belief has found a place in all the ecumenical symbols. Theology has ever included it in its eschatology. It is clear that the apostles and the early church expected the second coming of the Lord as an immediate event, the significance of which, and especially the effect of the nonfulfilment of which expectation, does not fall within the province of this article to consider. The various theories of the Parousia, the different ideas as to the time and the form of the second Advent, do not concern its relation to the exaltation of the Lord. Whenever and however He may return; whether He is ever coming to the church and to the world, His visible or His spiritual presence, do not affect the fact that He has been exalted to the position of ultimate Lord and final judge of men. We may therefore define this crowning condition of exaltation as:

(1) An advent, real, personal and visible. We must guard against the extremes of limiting this advent on the one side to a final particular event, on the other to those critical and catastrophic movements in world history which have led to the extension of God's kingdom and a virtual judgment of men. The Lord is ever coming, and also He will return. See Acts 1 11; Lk 17 24; Mt 24 30; 25 31; Lk 19 12; Mt 13 40.41.49; Lk 18 8; Jn 5 28.29; 6 40.44; 21 22; Acts 3 20; 2 Thess 1 10; He 9 28; Jas 5 8; Jude ver 14; 1 Jn 2 23; Rev 1 7. The reality and visibility of the advent depend upon the personal and abiding relation of the Lord to the world-redemption. Christianity is not merely a spiritual dynamic drawn from a series of past events. It is the living relation of the complete humanity of the redeemed to the God-man, and must therefore be consummated in a spiritual and material form. The ultimate of Christianity is no more docetic than was its original. A reverent faith will be satisfied with the fact of the glory whenever it shall arrive. The form and time are unrevealed. Preparation and readiness are better than speculation and imaginary description.

(2) The Judgment is clearly taught by Scripture. Our Lord declares that He is appointed Judge (Jn 5 22; 9 39). Paul teaches that we must

2. Judgment "all stand before the judgment-seat of God" (Rom 14 10). Here again there is the suggestion of the judgment which is ever being made by the Lord in His office as Sovereign and Administrator of the kingdom; but there is also the expectation of a definite and final act of separation and discernment. Whatever may be the form of this judgment (and here again a wise and reverent silence as to the unrevealed is a becoming attitude for the believer), we are sure that He who will make it, is the glorified Word incarnate, and it will be the judgment of a wisdom and justice and love that will be the complete glory of the Christ. LITERATURE

This term has been used by theologians to describe the various characters of Our Lord's redemptive work. Many appellative and General metaphorical titles are found in Titles of Scripture for Christ, designative of Our Lord His Divine and human natures and His work: God (Jn 20 28); Lord (Mt 22 43.44); Word (Jn 1 1.14); Son of God (Mt 3 17; Lk 1 35; Col 1 15; 1 Jn 5 20); Firstborn from the dead (Col 1 18); Beginning of the Creation of God (Rev 3 14); Image of God (2 Cor 4 4); Express Image of His Person (He 1 3 AV); Alpha and Omega (Rev 1 8; 22 13); Son of Man (Mt 8 20; Jn 1 51; Acts 7 56); Son of David (Mt 9 27; 21 9); Last Adam (1 Cor 15 45.47); Captain of Salvation (He 2 10 m); Saviour (Lk 2 11; Jn 4 42; Acts 5 31); Redeemer (Isa 59 20; Tit 2 14); Author and Perfector of Faith (He 12 2); Light of the World (Jn 8 12); Lamb of God (Jn 1 29.36); Creator of all things (Jn 1 3.10); Mediator (1 Tim 2 5); Prophet (Dt 18 15; Lk 24 19); Great High Priest (He 4 14); King (Lk 1 33; Rev 17 14; 19 16); Way, Truth and Life (Jn 14 6). These and many others express the mediatorial office of the Lord. As mediator, He stands between God and Man, revealing the Father to man, and expressing the true relation of man to God. The term (Gr μεσσηνς, messtēs), moreover, signifies messenger, interpreter, advocate, surety or pledge in Gal 3 19.20, where a covenant is declared to be assured by the hand of one who intervenes. Thus the covenant is confirmed and fulfilled by Him who secures that its stipulations should be carried out, and harmony is restored where before there had been difference and separation (1 Tim 2 5; He 8 6; 9 15; 12 24). Thus is expressed the purpose of God to redeem mankind by mediation.

I. Christ's Mediation Expressed in the Specific Offices.—In presenting a systematic idea of this Redemptive Work of Christ by Mediation, Christian thought gave to it a harmonious character by choosing the most general and familiar titles of the Lord as the most inclusive categories expressive of the mode of Redemption. These were prophetic, priestly and regal.

The first trace of this division is found in Euseb. HE, I, 3, and his Demonstratio Evangelica, IV, 15.

Historical Review of the Theory It was accepted very largely in the Gr church, and continues to be used by Russian ecclesiastical writers. The Rom church has not so generally followed it, though it is found in the writings of many Rom theologians. The earlier reformers, especially Lutheran, ignored it. But Gerhard employed it and the Lutheran theologians followed his example, although some of these repudiated it, as Ernesti, Döderlein and Knapp. Calvin employed the division in his Institutes, II, 15. It was incorporated in the Heidelberg Catechism and has been adopted by most theologians of the Reformed church and by Eng. and American divines. In Germany most theological writers, such as De Wette, Schleiermacher, Tholuck, Nitzsch, Ebrard, adopt it, affirming it as expressive of the essential quality of the work of redemption, and the most complete presentment of its contents. The justification of this position is found in the important place occupied in the progress of revelation by those to whom were intrusted the duties of teaching and leading men in relation to God in the offices of priest, prophet and king. Even the modern development of Christian thought which extends the view of Divine dealing with man over the entire race and its religious history, not excluding those who would find in the most recent conditions of the world's life the outworking of the will of God in the purposes of human salvation, cannot discover any better form of expressing Christ's relation to man than in terms of the prophetic, the priestly and the governmental offices. The prophet is the instrument of teaching: the priest expresses the ethical relation of man to God; while the king furnishes the typical form of that exercise of sovereign authority and Providential direction which concerns the practical life of the race.

II. The Threefold Office as Presented in the OT.—From the close relation which Jesus in both His person and work bore to the OT dispensation, it is natural to turn to the preparatory history of the early Scriptures for the first notes of these mediatorial offices. That the development of the Jewish people and system ever moved toward Christ as an end and fulfilment is universally acknowledged. The vague and indeterminate conditions of both the religious and national life of Israel manifest a definite movement toward a clearer apprehension of man's relationship to God. Nothing is more clear in Israel's history than the gradual evolution of official service both of church and state, as expressed in the persons and duties of the prophet, the priest and the king. The early patriarch contained in himself the threefold dignity, and discharged the threefold duty. As the family became tribal, and the tribe national, these duties were divided. The order of the household was lost for a while in the chaos of the larger and less homogeneous society. The domestic altar was multiplied in many "high places." Professional interpreters of more or less religious value began to be seers, and here and there, prophets. The leadership of the people was occasional, ephemeral and uncertain. But the men of Divine calling appeared from time to time; the foundation work of Moses was built on; the regular order of the worship of Jeh, notwithstanding many lapses, steadily prevailed. Samuel gave dignity to his post as judge, and he again beheld the open vision of the Lord; he offered the appointed sacrifices; he established the kingly office; and although he was not permitted to see the family of David on the throne, like Moses he beheld afar off the promised land of a Divinely appointed kingdom. With the accession of the Davidic house, the three orders of God's service were completely developed. The king was seated on the throne, the priest was ministering at the one altar of the nation, the prophet with the Divine message was ever at hand to teach, to guide and to rebuke.

Notwithstanding this growth of the special institutions—prophet, priest and king—the religious and national condition was by no means satisfactory. The kingdom was divided; external foes threatened the existence of the nation; idolatry was not extinguished, and the prophets who were true to Jeh were compelled to warn and rebuke the sins of the rulers and the people, and even to testify against the priests for their unfaithfulness to the truth and purity of the religion which they professed. The best hopes of Israel and the Divine promises seem thus to be contradicted by the constant failure of the people to realize their best ideals. Hence slowly arose a vague expectation of reform. The idea of the better condition which was coming grew ever more distinct, and settled down at length to Israel's Messianic hope, expressed in various forms, finally converging to the looking for of one who should in some mysterious way gather into himself the ideas which belonged especially to the three great offices.

III. The Prophet.—In this art. we are concerned only with the offices as they tend to their fulfilment in Christ. For the more general treatment of each office, reference must be made to the special arts.

The first appearance of the idea of the special prophet of Jeh is in Dt 18 15. Moses had been sent by the people to hear the Lord's words on their behalf (Ex 20 19; Dt 5 27); and this incident in the later passage of Dt 18 15-22 is connected with the promise of a prophet, while at the same time reference is made to the general fact of prophecy and the conditions of its validity and acceptance. Here we find the germ of the expectation of the Prophet, which occupied so large a place in the mind of Israel. In the act of the people sending Moses to receive the word, and Jeh's promise to send a prophet whom they would accept, we see also the suggestion of a distinction between the first dispensation and the latter. The Divine promise was to the effect that what was given by Moses God would consummate in a prophetic revelation through a person. The conception of this personality is found in the second part of Isa (40-66). Isaiah's mission was vain, Isa 49 4, but the coming one shall prevail, 49-53 (passim). But the success of this servant of Jeh was not to be only as a prophet, but by taking on himself the penalty of sin (53 5), and by being made an offering for sin; and as Mighty Victor triumphing over all foes (53 10-12), the dignities of whose kingship are set forth in various parts of the prophetic writings. Thus the general effect of the course of the earlier revelation may be summed up in this prophetic ministry with which has been combined a priestly and a royal character. It was an ever-advancing manifestation of the nature and will of God, delivered by inspired men who spake at sundry times and in divers manners, but whose message was perfected and extended by Jesus Christ (He 1 1), who thus became the Prophet of the Lord.

IV. Christ, the Prophet.—Christ's ministry illustrates the prophetic office in the most extensive and exalted sense of the term. He was designed and appointed by the Father (Isa 61 1,2; cf Lk 4 16-21; Mt 17 5). In 1 Cor 1 30, Christ is declared to be made to us wisdom. His intimate knowledge of God (Jn 1 18; Mt 11 27; Jn 16 15), the qualities of His teaching dependent upon His nature, both Divine and human (Jn 3 34); His authority (Jn 1 9,17,18; Lk 4 18-21); His knowledge of God (Mk 12 29; Jn 4 24; Mt 11 25; Jn 17 11,25; Mt 18 35)—these all peculiarly fitted Christ to be the Revealer of God. Besides His doctrine of God, His ministry included the truth concerning Himself, His nature, claims, mission, the doctrine of the Holy Spirit, and the religious life of man. He taught as none other the foundation of religion, the facts on which it was based, the essence of Divine service, the nature of sin, the grace of God, the means of atonement, the laws of the kingdom of God and the future state. By the acknowledgment of even those who have denied His Divine nature and redemptive work, He has been recognized as the Supreme Moral Teacher of the world. His claim to be the Prophet is seen in that He is the source of the ever-extending revelation of the eternal. His own words and works He declared were only part of the fuller knowledge which would be furnished by the system which He established (Lk 9 45; 18 34; Jn 12 16; 14 26; 15 26; 16 12,13,14).

How remarkable was His method of teaching! Parable, proverb, absolute affirmation, suggestion, allusion to simple objects, practical life

1. Christ's —these all made His teaching powerful,
Manner of easily understood, living; sometimes Teaching His action was His word—and all with a commanding dignity and gracious winsomeness, that was felt by His hearers and has ever been recognized (Mt 7 29). So perfect and exalted was the teaching of Jesus that many have supposed that revelation ceased with Him, and the immediate followers whom He especially inspired to be His witnesses and interpreters. Certainly in Him the prophetic ministry culminated.

An important aspect of Christ's prophetic office is that of His relation to the church as the source, through the instrumentality of His

2. Christ as Spirit, of ever-enlarging knowledge of Prophet in Divine truth which it has been able His Church to gain. This is the real significance of the claim which some churches make to be the custodians and interpreters of the tradition of faith, with which has also gone the theory of development—not as a human act but as a ministration of the Lord through His Spirit, which is granted to the church. Even those who hold that all Divine truth is to be found in the sacred Scriptures have yet maintained that God has much truth still to bring out of His word by the leading and direction of the Spirit of Jesus. The Scripture itself declares that Christ was the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world (Jn 1 9). He Himself promised that the Spirit which He would give would guide His followers into all truth (Jn 16 13). The apostles claimed to receive their teaching and direction of the church from the Lord (1 Cor 11 23). The testimony of Jesus is definitely declared to be the spirit of prophecy (Rev 19 10). Indeed, all the apostolic writings in almost every line affirm that what they teach is received from the Spirit, who is the Spirit of the Lord.

V. The Priesthood of Christ.—For the history of the development of the priesthood of Israel on which Our Lord's High-Priesthood is ideally based, reference must be made to the art. esp. dealing with that subject. The bearings of that institution upon the work of Jesus as Redeemer alone fall under this section. Judaism like all

1. Judaic religions developed an extensive sys-
Priesthood tem of priestly service. As the moral sense of the people enlarged and became more distinct, the original simplicity of sacrifice, especially as a commensal act, in which the unity of the celebrants with each other and with God was expressed, was expanded into acts regularly performed by officials, in which worship, thanksgiving, covenant and priestly expiation and atonement were clearly and definitely expressed. The progress of sacrifice may be seen in the history of the OT from Cain and Abel's (Gen 4 3,4), Noah's (Gen 8 20), Abraham's covenant (Gen 15 9-18), etc., to the elaborate services of the Mosaic ritual set forth in Lev, the full development of which is found only in the later days of Israel. When Christ appeared, the entire sacerdotal system had become incorporated in the mind, customs and language of the people. They had learned more or less distinctly the truth of man's relation to God in its natural character, and esp. in that aspect where man by his sin had separated himself from God and laid himself open to the penalty of law. The conception of priesthood had thus grown in the consciousness of Israel, as the necessary instrument of mediation between man and God. Priestly acts were performed on behalf of the worshipper. The priest was to secure for man the Divine favor. This could only be gained by an act of expiation. Something must be done in order to set forth the sin of man, his acknowledgment of guilt, the satisfaction of the law, and the assurance of the Divine forgiveness, the restored favor of God and finally the unity of man and God.

That the work of Christ partook of the nature of priestly service is already indicated by references in the Gospels themselves. He was called "Jesus; for it is he that shall save his people from their sins" (Mt 1 21). Salvation from sin, in the habit of Christ in thought at which the Jew had arrived, the Gospels must have expressed itself most clearly in the symbolic signification of the sacrifices in the temple. Thus in the very name which Our Lord received His priesthood is suggested. The frankincense of the Magi's offering is not without its mystical meaning (Mt 2 11). Some may find in the Baptist's words, "baptize you in the Holy Spirit and in fire" (Mt 3 11), a suggestion of priestly action, for the understanding of John's declaration must be found in the conventional ideas of the Jewish thought of the period, determined as they undoubtedly were by the history of priestly service in the past and the fully developed ritual of the temple. The baptizing of the proselyte was not necessarily a priestly act, as indeed we cannot be certain that the baptism was always necessary at the introduction of a proselyte into the Jewish church. But the association of circumcision with the initiation of the proselyte certainly introduced the priest, and the sprinkling of the congregation by the priest was a familiar part of his official duties. It is quite probable therefore that John's use of the expression carried with it something of the sacerdotal idea.

The spirit of Our Lord's teaching, as seen in the Sermon on the Mount, etc., as it reflects the thought of the Galilean ministry, may be regarded as prophetic rather than priestly.

3. Christ's Still the end of the teaching was Ethical righteousness, and it was impossible
Teaching for a Jew to conceive of the securing of Affected by righteousness without some reference
Sacrificial to priestly administration and influence.
Ideas

The contrast of the effect of Christ's teaching with that of the scribes (Mt 7 29) keeps us in the vicinity of the law as applied through the sacerdotal service of which the scribes were the interpreters and teachers, and surely therefore a hint of Our Lord's relation to priesthood may have found its way into the minds of His immediate hearers. He was careful to recognize the authority of the priest (Mt 8 4).

The doctrine of sacrifice emerges somewhat more distinctly in the reference to the cross, which Our Lord associates with the thought of finding life by losing it (Mt 16 24.25), and when the taking up the cross is interpreted by following Christ, and this hint is soon followed by Christ's distinct reference to His coming sufferings (Mt 17 9.12), more definitely referred to in vs 22.23. Now the object of the work of the Lord takes clearer form. The Son of Man is come to save that which was lost (Mt 18 11 ARVm). As the time of the catastrophe drew nearer, the Lord became still more distinct in His references to His coming death (Mt 20 18.19), and at length declares that "the Son of man came . . . to give his life a ransom for many" (Mt 20 28). Our Lord's quotations (Mt 21 42; 23 39) concerning the rejected "corner stone," and the Blessed One "that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Ps 118 22.26), are drawn from a psalm filled with the spirit of the priestly service of the temple, and in their reference to Himself again illustrate the ever-increasing recognition of His priesthood. He also uses the official term "Christ" (Messiah, the anointed one) more frequently (Mt 24 5.23.24). On the eve of the betrayal and trial the crucifixion is clearly foretold (Mt 26 2); and the death (26 12). The full significance of the death is asserted at the institution of the Lord's Supper. The bread is "my body," the wine is "my blood of the new covenant," and it is declared to be "poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26 26-28 m).

A similar succession of ideas of Our Lord's priestly work may be found in the other gospels (see Mk 1 8.44; 8 29; see below on the significance of the term Christ; 4. Mutual Confirmation of the Synoptics 8 31.34; 9 9.10). The inability of the disciples to understand the life that was to follow death here is indicated—the truth of the gospel of death and resurrection so closely bound up with the conception of sacrifice, where the blood is the life which given becomes the condition of the new union with God, being thus revealed by Christ as the initial doctrine to be continuously enlarged (9 31; 10 21.33.34.45; 11 9; 12 10; 13 21.22; 14 8.22-25.61.62). In Lk the priestly "atmosphere" is introduced in the earliest part of the narrative, the history of Zacharias and Elisabeth giving emphasis to the setting of John's own mission (Lk 1). The name Jesus (Lk 1 31); the special relation of the new kingdom to sin, necessarily connected with sacrifice in the mind of a priest, found in Zacharias' psalm (Lk 1 77.78); the subtle suggestion of the Suffering One in the "also" of 2 35 AV (ARV omits) shows that the third Gospel is quite in line with the two other Synoptics (see also Lk 3 3; 5 14). The claim to forgive sins must have suggested the sacrificial symbol of remission (Lk 5 24; 9 23; 13 35; 14 27; 18 31; 20 14; 22 19.20; 24 7.26.46.47). In the Fourth Gospel, we have the word of the Baptist, "Behold, the Lamb of God" (Jn 1 29.36), where Christ's relation to sin is distinctly expressed (see LAMB OF GOD)—the baptism in the Spirit (1 33). It is highly probable that the apostle John was the "other" of the two disciples, (1 40) and, having heard the Baptist's words, is the only evangelist who records them, thus introducing from his personal knowledge the sacrificial idea earlier into his history than the Synoptics. Christ declares that He will give His life for the life of the world (6 51). The entire passage (vs 47-65) is suffused with the conception of "life for life," one of the elements constituting the conception of the sacrificial act. In 8 28 (cf 3 14; 12 32) Christ predicts His crucifixion. The Good Shepherd gives His life for the sheep (10 15). In vs 17.18, Christ claims the power to lay down His life and to take it again. He is the sacrifice and the Sacrificer.

Here appears for the first time the double relation of Christ to the sacrificial idea, worked out in the later thought of the church into the full significance of Our Lord's priestly office. In 11 25.26 Christ is the source of life, and life after death. It is hardly possible that this conception should not have, even if remotely suggested, some reference to the significance of sacrifice; for in the sacrifices the Divine claim for the blood, as specially to be set apart as the Divine portion, was ever present. God ever claimed the blood as His; for to Him the life was forfeited by sin. And moreover He alone possesses life and gives it. Of that forfeit and that Divine sovereignty of life, sacrifice is the expression. This is fully realized and made actual in Christ's life and death for man, in which man shares by His unity with Christ. Man at once receives the penalty of sin in dying with Christ, and rises again into the new life which Our Lord opened, and of which He is the ceaseless energy and power through the spirit of God. The emergence of this idea is illustrated by the evangelist in the sayings of Caiaphas, where as the high priest of the nation he gives, though unconsciously, a significant expression to the truth that it was "expedient" that Jesus 'should die for the nation and for the children of God everywhere scattered' (11 47-52). Here the symbolic significance of sacrifice is practically realized: death in the place of another and the giving of life to those for whom the sacrifice was offered. The vitalizing power of Christ's death is asserted in the discourse following the visit of the Greeks (12 24-33). The idea of life from the dying seed is associated with the conception of the power of attraction and union by the cross. The natural law of life through death is thus in harmony with the gift of life through sacrifice involving death. That sacrifice may be found much more widely than merely in death, is shown by the law of service illustrated in the washing of the disciples' feet (13 14-17); and this is declared to spring out of love (15 13). For the priestly ideas of Our Lord's prayer (Jn 17) see INTERCESSION; INTERCESSION OF CHRIST; PRAYERS OF CHRIST.

Christ's priestly office finds illustration in the Acts of the Apostles, in the apostolic declaration of Christ's Messianic office, not only Lord, but also Christ the Anointed Priesthood One (Acts 2 36). Peter's reference to the stone which completed the temple, the service of which was essentially sacrificial, as the Symbol of Christ, the Crown of that Spiritual Temple (Acts 4 11); Philip's application of the passage in Isa of the sheep led to the slaughter (Isa 53 7.8) to Our Lord (Acts 8 32.35); Peter's discourse to Cornelius, culminating in the remission of sins through Christ (Acts 10 43)—all indicates the steady growth in the apostolic ministry of the conception of Our Lord's priestly office. The idea takes its most distinct form in Paul's sermon at Antioch (Acts 13 38.39). The necessity of Christ's death and resurrection was the essence of Paul's message (Acts 17 3). And in the address to the elders, the church is declared to have been purchased by God with His own blood (Acts 20 28).

As the epistles express the more elaborated thought of the apostolic ministry, the sacrifice of Our Lord naturally finds more definite exposition, and inasmuch as He was both active and passive in the offering of Himself, the conception of sacrifice branches into the twofold division, the object offered, and the person offering. It must never be forgotten, however, that the thought of Christ's sacrifice even when thus separated into its two great divisions necessarily involves in each conception the suggestion of the other: God setting Him forth as a propitiation through faith in His blood (Rom 3 25). He was delivered for our offences and raised for our justification (Rom 4 25). Through Him we have access to the conditions of justification and peace (Rom 5 2). Christ died for the ungodly, and we are justified by His blood (Rom 5 8,9). The conception of life both as forfeit from man and gift by God, expressed by sacrifice, runs through the reasoning of Rom 8 (see esp. 11.32-34, where Christ who died for man rises from the dead, and becomes the intercessor; the victim and the High Priest are thus united in the Lord, and thus He becomes full expression and supplier of the love of God which is the perfect life). In 1 Cor 1 23 Paul affirms the preaching of the cross as the center of his message. The subject of his teaching was not merely Christ, but Christ and Him crucified (1 Cor 2 2). In 1 Cor 5 7 Christ is declared to be the Passover, and sacrificed for us (1 Cor 10 16-18). The manifestation of the death of the Lord by the bread and wine is given in the account of the institution of the Supper (1 Cor 11 26). In 1 Cor 15 3 Christ is said expressly to have died for our sins. Christ's sacrifice lies at the basis of all the thought of the Galatian epistle (1 4; 2 20; 3 13).

In Eph we have the definite statement of redemption through the blood of Christ (Eph 1 7). Christ's humiliation to the cross is given in Phil 2 8; community with Christ's death, one of the important elements of sacrifice, in Phil 3 10,11. Forgiveness, the essence of redemption, is declared to be through the blood of Christ (Col 1 14). Peace is secured through the blood of the cross, and reconciliation (Col 1 20); the presentation of us in Christ's flesh through death, holy and unblamable and unprovable to God (Col 1 22). The community of sacrifice sets forth the oneness of believers with Christ (Col 3 1-4). Christ is declared to be the one Mediator between God and man, who gave Himself a ransom for all (1 Tim 2 5,6).

The chief source of the priestly conception of Our Lord is the Epistle to the He. Christ is declared to have by Himself purged our sins (He 1 3); to taste of death for every man (He 2 9); that He might be a merciful and faithful High Priest to make reconciliation for the sins of the people (He 2 17; cf He 3 1); the community of sacrifice (He 3 14); our great High Priest has passed into the heavens (He 4 14); His pitifulness (4 15); the authority and power of Christ's priesthood fully set forth (He 5). Christ was made a High Priest after the order of Melchizedek (He 5 6). The priesthood of Christ being of the order of Melchizedek is more excellent than the Aaronic priesthood (He 7). Christ's priesthood being eternal, that of the Aaronic is abolished (He 8). Christ's high-priesthood is made effectual by His own blood; and He entered once for all into the holy place, and has become the Mediator of a New Covenant (He 9 11-15). Christ is forever the representative of man in heaven (He 9 24-28). Christ by the sacrifice of Himself forever takes away sin, and has consecrated the new and living way to God (He 10). He is the Mediator of the New Covenant (He 12 24). The entire Epistle is steeped in the conception of Christ's priesthood.

In 1 Pet 1 2 the sacrificial element appears in the "sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ." The sufferings of the Lord were prophesied, the spirit of the Anointed One signifying what the prophets desired to know (1 11); the redemption by the precious blood of Christ is of "a lamb without blemish and without spot" (1 19); the priesthood of believers was through Christ (2 5), who carried up our sins in his body to the tree (2 24 RVm).

In the Johannine writings we have the cleansing from sin by the blood of Jesus Christ (1 Jn 1 7). Christ is said to have laid down His life for us (1 Jn 3 16). The sacrifice as well as the teaching of Christ is insisted on in the coming by blood as well as by water (5 6).

The appearance of Christ in Rev 1 13 is high-priestly; His robe is the talar, the high-priestly garment. The sacrificial place of Christ is indicated by "a Lamb . . . as though it had been slain" (Rev 5 6,9,12). The repeated title of Christ throughout the Apocalypse is The Lamb.

This review of the Scripture teaching on priesthood clearly indicates the development of thought which led to the affirmation of Our Lord's priestly office. He came to put away sin. The doctrine of sin was intimately associated with the priestly service of the temple. The sacrifices were in some cases sin offerings, and in these there ever appeared, by the function of the blood which is the life, the fatal loss of life by sin, the punishment of which was the withdrawal of the Divine gift of life. The life was always in the sacrifice reserved for God. It was natural therefore when Christ appeared that His work in taking away sin should have been interpreted in the light of sacrificial thought. We find the idea steadily developed in the NT. He was the sacrifice, the Lamb of God. The question as to who offered the sacrifice was answered—Himself. Then He became in the conception of apostolic teaching, esp. emphasized in the Epistle to the He, the priest as well as the sacrifice. This was at length completely defined in the theology of the church, and has generally been accepted as setting forth an important aspect of Our Lord's redemptive work.

VI. Christ's Kingly Office.—The association of rule with the redemption of mankind was early found in Divine revelation. It is in the Protevangelium of Gen 3 15; the covenant with Abraham contains the blessing of it (Gen 22 17,18); the blessing of Jacob reflects it (Gen 49 10). After the successive attempts to establish a visible and earthly monarchy, its settlement in the family of David was associated with Divine premonitions of continued and gracious royalty (2 S 7 18-29; 23 1-7; Pss 2, 45, 72, 110). The failure of the earthly monarchy and the fatal experiences of the kingdom turned the thought of the devout, esp. guided by prophetic testimony, to a coming king who should restore the glory of the Davidic house and the people of Israel. Here and there the conception appears of the more extended reign of the Coming One, and the royal authority finds a growing place in the prophetic Scriptures (Isa 2 1-4; 9 6,7; 11 1-10; 42 1-4; 52 13-15; 53 12; 60; Jer 23 5,6; 30 18-24; Dnl 2 44; 7 9-14,27; Mic 5 1-4; Zec 3). The postexilic conception of the king became one of the supreme and most active ideas in the Jewish mind. The reign of the Messiah was to be earthly, and all nations were to be subject to the Jew. The Jews of Pal seem to have retained the more patriotic and the more material form of the idea (see 1 Macc 14 41), while the Egyptian and dispersed Jews began to regard the more spiritual character of the coming Messiah. References to the future blessedness of Israel under the restored royalty do not appear so largely in the Apoc writings which it must be remembered reflect chiefly their Egypt-Jewish sources. Still there are some passages of interest (Bar 4 21-5; Tob 13; Ecclus 35 18.19; 36 11-16; 47 11.22). In the NT we have references to the strong expectation of the restored royalty and kingdom (Jn 1 49; 6 15; 12 12-15; Acts 1 6). Christ's kingship was speedily recognized by those who saw His works of power, and acknowledged His authority. He Himself clearly claimed this authority (Mt 22 43-45; Jn 18 36.37). It was however not a kingdom based upon material and external power and rule, but on the foundation of truth and righteousness. The Kingdom of Heaven or of God is familiar to every reader of the words of Jesus. It was thus He described the new order which He had come to establish, of which He was to be the Lord and Administrator; not an earthly dominion after the fashion of this world's kingdoms; it was to be the rule of mind and of spirit. It was to be extended by ethical forces, and the principle of its authority was centered in Christ Himself. It was to be developed on earth but perfected in the future and eternal life. Some divines have distinguished Christ's regal power as that of nature, that of grace, that of glory. Many believe that there is to be a personal visible reign of Christ upon the earth. Some hold that this will be produced by His advent prior to an age of millennial glory. Other views regard the advent as the close of earthly conditions and the final judgment.

7. The Crowning Testimony of the Epistle to the Hebrews

VII. The Messianic Basis of the Threefold Office of the Lord.—That the developments of Jewish thought centered round what may conveniently be called the idea of the Messiah is plain to any student of the OT and other Jewish writings. They sprang from the ethical and theological ideas of this people, interpreted by and expressed in their political and religious forms, and continually nurtured by their experiences in the varied course of their national life. The essence of Messianic belief was a personal deliverer. Jewish history had always been marked by the appearance and the exploits of a great man. The capacity of the production of exceptional and creative individuals has been the characteristic of the race in all its ages. A judge, a lawgiver, a teacher, a seer, a king—each had helped, or even saved the people in some critical period. Each had added to the knowledge of God, whether received or rejected by the people. The issues of such service had remained, enshrined in a growing lit., or made permanent in a finally centralized and unified ritual, recorded in chronicle and lyric. The hope of Israel at one time did not take the completely personal form; indeed, it is probably easy to exaggerate the Messianic element as we look back from the perfect realization of it, in the Christian revelation and history. Much that has been called Messianic has been the result of reading into the OT what has been derived from Christian thought and experience. Zeph has been described as a picture of Israel's restoration and triumph. Yet apparently it has no reference to the personal element. Still the "Messiah" begins to appear in the prophetic writings (see above), esp. in the royal elements of His office. It is at this point that the meaning of the term is to be considered. "Jeh's anointed" is found as applied to a king, and is familiar in this use in the OT. But anointing belonged to the priesthood and to the prophetic order, if not actually, at least metaphorically, as setting apart (see 1 K 19 16; Ps 105 15; Isa 61 1). And the word Messiah (Christ) the Anointed, came to be used for that conception of a person, perhaps first employed definitely (Dnl 9 24-26), who should be the Deliverer of the Jews and even still more widely, a Redeemer. In the age immediately preceding the Christian, the idea had taken possession not only of the Jews, but also of the Samaritans (Jn 4 25); and was not altogether unknown in gentile thought; e.g. Sib Or, iii.97; Virgil Ecl. iv. It involves certainly the prophetic and royal offices and, in the idea of a Suffering Servant, was closely allied to the objects of the sacrificial order.

The claim of Jesus to be the Christ, and the recognition of this claim by His followers and apostles, gave a new meaning to the teaching of the OT, and the writings lying outside the canon, but which were familiar to the people. Especially was the suffering and death of the Lord and its relation to sin the occasion of a new understanding of the Mosaic and later-developed sacrificial system. Jesus as the Offerer of Himself perfected the function of the priest, as He became the Lamb of God who taketh away the sins of the world. He thus completed the threefold ministry of the Messiah as the Prophet who reveals, the Priest who offers and intercedes, the King who rules. In Him the offices are commingled. He rules by His sacrifice and His teaching; He reveals by His Kingship and His offering. The offices spring from both His person and His work, and are united in the final issue of the salvation of the world. See also EXALTATION OF CHRIST; INTERCESSION OF CHRIST.

LITERATURE

The word Christian occurs only three times in the NT (Acts 11 26; 26 28; and 1 Pet 4 16). The first passage, Acts 11 26, gives the origin of the term, "The disciples were called Christians first in Antioch." The older generation of critical scholars disputed the historicity of this statement.

It was argued that, had the term originated so early, it must have been found far more frequently in the records of early Christianity; sometimes also that the termination -ianos points to a Lat origin. But there is general agreement now that these objections are groundless. The historicity of the Lukan account is upheld not only by Harnack, but by the more radical Knopf in Die Schriften des NT, edited by Johannes Weiss. In early imperial times, the adjectival termination -ianos was widely diffused throughout the whole empire. Originally applied to the slaves belonging to the great households, it had passed into regular use to denote the adherents of an individual or a party. A Christian is thus simply an adherent of Christ. The name belongs, as Ramsay says, to the popular slang, as indeed sect and party names generally do. It is only after a considerable interval, and very often under protest, that such names are accepted as self-designations.

The name, then, did not originate with the Christians themselves. Nor would the Jews have gan Origin applied it to the followers of Jesus, whose claim to be the Christ they opposed so passionately. They spoke of the Christians as "the sect of the Nazarenes" (Acts 24 5); perhaps also as "Galileans," a term which the emperor Julian attempted later vainly to revive. The word must have been coined by the heathen population of Antioch, as the church emerged from the synagogue, and a Christianity predominantly gentile took its place among the religions of the world.

Perhaps the earliest occurrence of Christian as a self-designation is in Did 12 4. In the Apolo-

3. The Christian Attitude to the Name gists and Ignatius on the other hand the word is in regular use. 1 Pet simply takes it over from the anti-Christian judicial procedure of the law courts, without in any way implying that the Christians used it among themselves.

There is every probability, however, that it was the danger which thus began at an early date to attach to the name which commended it to the Christians themselves as a title of honor. Deissmann (Licht vom Osten, 286) suggests that Christian means slave of Christ, as Caesarian means slave of Caesar. But the word can scarcely have had that fullness of meaning till the Christians themselves had come to be proud of it.

According to tradition, Luke himself belonged to Antioch. In Acts 11 27.28 Codex D reads "There was much rejoicing, and when we had assembled, there stood up," etc. In view of the greater authority now so frequently accorded to the so-called Western text, we cannot summarily dispose of such a reading as an interpolation. If the historian was not only an Antiochene, but a member of the original gentile Christian church, we have the explanation alike of his interest in the origin of the name Christian, and of the detailed precision of his information.

In all three NT passages the uncorrected Codex Σ reads "Chrestian." We know from many

4. Was Christian
the Original
Form? sources that this variant was widely current in the 2d cent. Blass in his ed of Acts not only consistently reads Chrestian, but conjectures that Chrestian is the correct reading in Tacitus (Annals, xv.44), the earliest extra-

Biblical testimony to the word. The Tacitus MS has since been published in facsimile. This has shown, according to Harnack (Mission and Expansion, ET, I, 413, 414), that "Chrestian" actually was the original reading, though the name "Christ" is correctly given. Harnack accordingly thinks that the Lat historian intended to correct the popular appellation of cir 64 AD, in the light of his own more accurate knowledge. "The common people used to call them 'Chrestians,' but the real name of their founder was Christ." Be this as it may, a confusion between "Christos" and the familiar Gr slave name "Chrestos" is more intelligible at an early date than later, when Christianity was better known. There must have been a strong tendency to conform the earlier witnesses to the later, familiar, and etymologically correct, usage. It is all the more remarkable, therefore, that Σ^* retains "Chrestian." On the whole it seems probable that this designation, though bestowed in error, was the original one.

The fuller discussion of this subject more appropriately falls under the arts. dealing with the relation of the church and empire.

5. The Christians and the Empire Suffice it here to say that Paul apparently hoped that by his acquittal the legal position of Christianity as a religio licita would be established throughout the empire, and that 1 Pet belongs to a time when the mere profession of Christianity was a crime in the eyes of the state, but that in all probability this was a new position of affairs.

That early Christianity was essentially a movement among the lower non-literary classes has been rightly emphasized—above all by

6. Social Standing of the Early Christians Deissmann. This is a circumstance of the utmost importance for the correct understanding of the early history of our faith, though probably Deissmann in some degree exaggerates and misplaces the significance. Is it correct to say, for example, that "primitive Christianity was relatively indifferent to politics, not as Christianity, but as a movement of the humbler folks, whose lot on the whole had certainly been lightened by the Empire" (Licht vom Osten, 254)? Very probably however the difficulties of the Pauline gentile mission were appreciably increased by the fact that he touched a lower social stratum than that of the original Jewish Christianity of Pal. No class more resents being associated in any way with the "submerged masses" than the self-respecting peasant or artisan, who seems to have formed the backbone of the Pal church. The apostle had consequently to fight against social, no less than racial and religious, prejudices.

The Christians originally called themselves "Disciples," a term afterward restricted to personal

7. Christian
Self-Designations hearers of the Lord, and regarded as a title of high distinction. The ordinary self-designations of the apostolic age are "believers" (Acts 5 14; 1 Tim

4 12), "saints" (Acts 9 13.32.41; Rom 1 7), "brethren" (Acts 6 3; 10 23, etc.), "the elect" (Col 3 12; 2 Tim 2 10), "the church of God" (Acts 20 28 m), "servants [slaves] to God" (Rom 6 22; 1 Pet 2 16). The apostolic authors refer to themselves as "servants [slaves] of Christ Jesus" (Phil 1 1). Other expressions are occasionally met with, of which perhaps the most significant is: Those "that call upon the name of the Lord" (Acts 9 14; Rom 10 12.13; 1 Cor 1 2). Cf Pliny's report to Trajan (Epistles, X, 97): "They affirmed that . . . they had been wont to assemble and address a hymn to Christ as to a god."

LITERATURE.—The most recent discussion of the names of Christian believers, including "Christian," is in Harnack's Mission and Expansion of Christianity, ET (2d ed. 1908), I, 399 ff. See also EB, HDB, DCG, with the lit. there cited. On the social status of the early Christians, cf Orr's Neglected Factors in the Study of the Early Progress of Christianity; on the religious significance of the name, see CHRISTIANITY.

I. In Principle and Essence.—Unlike "Christian" (AV), the term "Christianity," so far as is known, was first used by the Christians themselves, but does not occur in the NT. Use of It is exactly parallel to Judaism ("the Term Jews' religion"), found not only in Gal 1 13.14, but in 2 Macc 2 21, etc. Our earliest authority for the word "Christianism" is Ignatius of Antioch. Christian is now a title of honor, and the Christian's glory is "to live according to Christianity" (Ignatius, Ad magnes, 10).

While, however, the name is foreign to the NT, the NT is by universal consent our most important source of information regarding the thing. Christianity arose out of the life and work of Jesus of Nazareth, who claimed to be "the Christ." During Jesus' lifetime this claim was admitted by a circle of adherents, in whose view, afterwards, it was triumphantly vindicated by His resurrection from the dead. By resurrection He "was declared to be the Son of God with power" (Rom 1 4). With this was united from the first the recognition of Christ as the God-sent Redeemer, through whom has come to the world forgiveness, reconciliation with God and Divine spiritual power.

Pauline summaries.—One of the oldest summaries of Christianity is that of Paul in 1 Cor 15 3.4: "For I delivered unto you first of all that which also I received: that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures; . . . and that he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures." Of similar purport are the apostle's words in 2 Cor 5 18.19: "God, who reconciled us to himself through Christ, and gave unto us the ministry of reconciliation; to wit, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself, not reckoning unto them their trespasses." From this reconciliation springs the new life of believers (Rom 6; 2 Cor 5 14-17).

More recently some have denied that Jesus advanced any such claim to Messiahship, but always upon purely arbitrary and subjective grounds. On the one hand these writers have been profoundly impressed by the grandeur of Jesus' character; on the other they have looked upon the claim to stand in such a unique relation to God and man as unfounded or meaningless. They have sought, accordingly, to escape the difficulty by denying that Jesus regarded Himself as the Anointed of the Lord (thus, e.g. Wrede). Sometimes they have gone the length even of affirming that Jesus was not so regarded by His personal disciples. Divine honors were accorded Him only gradually, as the memory of what He actually was faded away, and an idealization begotten of Christian faith took its place. The notion of Messiah is merely a piece of Jewish folklore. This position in its distinctively modern form has been answered, it seems to us, with absolute conclusiveness, by Professor James Denney in his Jesus and the Gospel. In a historical point of view, nothing in Jesus' life is more certain than that He regarded Himself as the Christ, the culmination and fulfilment of the Divine revelation given to Israel. This conviction of His is the point round which His whole message revolves. The most recent NT theology, that, e.g. of Dr. Paul Feine (1910), rightly starts from Jesus' Messianic consciousness, and seeks to understand His whole teaching in the light of it. Doubtless, like everything else which Jesus touched, the concept of Messiahship becomes transmuted and glorified in His hands. Our Lord was in no way dependent upon current beliefs and expectations for the content of His Messianic consciousness. But is it likely that His followers, without His authority, would have attributed Messiahship to one so utterly unlike the Messiah of popular fancy?

The NT proves not only that the Christians from the very outset were fully persuaded, on what they regarded as adequate grounds in history and experience, that their Lord had risen from the dead, but also that this conviction mastered them, giving direction and purpose to their whole lives. Historical Christianity was erected on the foundation of a Risen Lord.

Its evidence.—On this point Professor Denney says (Jesus and the Gospel, 111): "The real historical evidence for the resurrection is the fact that it was believed, preached, propagated, and produced its fruit and effect in the new phenomenon of the Christian church, long before any of our gospels were written. . . . Faith in the resurrection was not only prevalent but immensely powerful before any of our NT books were written. Not one of them would ever have been written but for that faith. It is not this or that in the NT—it is not the story of the empty tomb, or of the appearing of Jesus in Jerus or in Galilee—which is the primary evidence for the resurrection: it is the NT itself. The life that throbs in it from beginning to end, the life that always fills us again with wonder, as it beats upon us from its pages, is the life which the Risen Saviour has quickened in Christian souls. The evidence for the resurrection of Jesus is the existence of the church in that extraordinary spiritual vitality which confronts us in the NT. This is its own explanation of its being."

The best Christian thought of our day has no more difficulty than had the apostles in holding and establishing what Principal Forsyth fitly calls "the superhistoric finality of Christ." In the very nature of the case, wherever the problem of Our Lord's person has been seriously faced, there have always been two distinct estimates of His value, that of assured faith, based upon personal experience of His redemptive power, and that of mere externalism.

(1) The latter or non-believing estimate has no more right now to call itself "historical" or "scientific," than it had, nearly nineteen hundred years ago, to crucify the Lord of glory. The priests

3. Did Jesus Claim to Be the Christ?

doubtless thought that they understood Jesus better than the ignorant, deluded Galileans. Yet the boldest champion of "the religio-historic method" would scarcely claim that theirs was the correct judgment. As a matter of fact, the so-called critical school are no more free from presuppositions than is the most thoroughgoing traditionalist. Nor have they a monopoly either of historical knowledge or of critical acumen. No truths are accessible to them which are not equally available for the Christian believer. No proof exists, beyond their own unsupported assertions, that they are better interpreters of the common truth. On the other hand, that whole range of experience and conviction in which the Christian believer finds the supreme assurance of the truth of his religion is to them a sealed book. Surely, then, it is the height of absurdity to maintain that the external, non-believing, estimate of Our Lord's person is likely to be the more correct one. From the standpoint of Christian faith, such an external estimate is necessarily inadequate, whether it finds expression in a mechanical acceptance of the whole ecclesiastical Christology, or in the denial that such a person as Jesus of Nazareth ever lived.

(2) The believing estimate of Our Lord's person is the essence of Christianity as a historical religion. But according to the NT this estimate is itself Divinely wrought and Divinely attested (Mt 16 17; 1 Cor 12 3; 1 Jn 4 2.3). It presupposes the perfect objective self-manifestation of God in Jesus Christ on the one hand, and the subjective appropriation of this revelation by faith on the other. No argument against the reality of the revelation can be built upon the fact, generally acknowledged by Christian theologians nowadays, that the Deity of Our Lord and the supernatural origin of our religion can neither be proved nor disproved independently of one's personal attitude to Christianity. This follows necessarily from the nature of the apprehension of Divine truth. Spiritual things are spiritually discerned. There can be no impersonal knowledge of religious, any more than of ethical and aesthetic, truth. In these realms another's knowledge has no real meaning for anyone till he has felt its power and tested it in his own experience. Evangelical Christians do not accept the Deity of the Lord as the cardinal article of their religious faith on any merely external authority whether of Scripture or of tradition, or even of His own recorded words apart from experience of Christ. They accept it precisely as they accept the authority of Scripture itself, because of the witness of the Spirit with their spirits. The combined testimony of Scripture and tradition is confirmed in their religious life, when by receiving Jesus as Our Lord and Saviour they experience the Christian power. This power is the great experienced reality in the light of which alone the other realities become intelligible. "One thing I know, that, whereas I was blind, now I see" (Jn 9 25). "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life" (Jn 6 68).

The true church of Christ consists of all who have experienced the power of Christ, delivering them from the guilt, the stain, and the dominion of sin and bringing the peace of God into their souls. Nothing less than this is either the gospel of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, or the historic faith of Christendom, or a religion adequate to human need. The Christian doctrine is partly the assertion of the reality of this power, partly its interpretation. Facts of history and theological propositions are vital to our faith, just in proportion as they are vitally related to this power. The Christian essentials are those elements, historical and dogmatic, without which Christianity would lose in whole or in part its living power to reconcile sinful man to the all-righteous, loving God.

Thus Jesus Himself belongs to His gospel. He is the heart and core of it. Christianity is both a rule of life and a doctrine. But in its inmost nature and being it is neither an ethic, nor a theology, but a religion—a new relation to God and man, Divinely mediated through Jesus Christ in His life, death and resurrection. As many as receive Him, to them gives He the right to become children of God, even to them that believe on His name, who are born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God (Jn 1 12). He brings man to God by bringing God to man, and the power of God into man's sin-stained life.

It can scarcely be claimed that NT Christianity was in a theological point of view absolutely homogeneous. Various types can be distinguished with more or less clearness; even the ordinary reader feels a difference of theological atmosphere between e.g. Rom and Jas. This is inevitable, and need occasion no perplexity to Christian faith. All theology is partly interpretation—the relation of universal and eternal reality to personal thought. Hofmann rightly says that genuine Christian faith is one and the same for all, but that everyone must have his own theology, if he is to have any at all. In all genuine serious thought there is a personal element not precisely the same for any two individuals. It is possible to find in the NT foreshadowings of all the great distinctive types of historic Christianity. But the essential purpose of the NT is to make Christ real to us, to proclaim reconciliation to God through Him, and to convey the Christian power to our lives. The NT everywhere exhibits the same Christ, and bears witness to the same redeeming, life-transforming power.

The attempt has often been made to explain Christianity as the natural product of contemporary forces intellectual and religious—most recently by the so-called "religio-historic school." But at most they have only shown that the form in which the religious concepts of primitive Christianity found articulate expression was to some extent influenced ab extra, and that the earliest Christians were in their general intellectual outlook the children of their own time. They have not proved that the distinctive content of Christianity was derived from any external source. They have not even realized what they have to prove, in order to make good their contention. They have done nothing to account for the Christian power on their principles.

II. Historical and Doctrinal.—In its historical and doctrinal relations, developments, and influence, and its connection with the successive phases of human thought, Christianity presents many points of interest, only the more prominent of which can here briefly be touched upon.

A convenient starting-point is the well-known distinction of Lessing (Fragment in Works, XI,

7. Jesus and the Gospel

8. NT Types of Doctrines

242 ff) between "the religion of Christ" and "the Christian religion"—a distinction which still exactly marks the attitude to Christianity of the modern so-called "historical" school. By "the religion of Christ" is meant the religion which Christ Himself acknowledged and practised as man; by "the Christian religion" is meant the view which regards Christ as more than man, and exalts Him as an object of worship. From this standpoint the problem for the historian is to show how the religion of Christ came to develop into the Christian religion—in modern speech, how the "Jesus of history" became the "Christ of faith."

(1) The historical Jesus is supernatural.—It has already been pointed out (under I above) that the view of Jesus on which the assumed contrast rests is not one truly historical. The fallacy lies in regarding the Jesus of history as simply a man among men—holier, diviner in insight, but not essentially distinguished from the race of which He was a member. This is not the Christ of apostolic faith, but as little is it the picture of the historical Jesus as the Gospels actually present it. There, in His relations alike to God and to man, in His sinlessness, in His origin, claims, relation to OT revelation, judgeship of the world, in His resurrection, exaltation, and sending of the Spirit, Jesus appears in a light which it is impossible to confine within natural or purely human limits. He is the Saviour who stands over against the race He came to save. It is the same fallacy which underlies the contrast frequently sought to be drawn between the religious standpoints of Christ and Paul. Paul never for an instant dreamt of putting himself on the same plane with Christ. Paul was sinner; Christ was Saviour. Paul was disciple; Christ was Lord. Paul was weak, struggling man; Christ was Son of God. Jesus achieved redemption; Paul appropriated it. These things involved the widest contrasts in attitude and speech.

(2) Essence of Christianity in redemption.—Though, therefore, Christ, in His relations of love and trust to the Father, and perfection of holy character, necessarily ever remains the Great Exemplar to whose image His people are to be conformed (Rom 8 29), in whose steps they are to follow (1 Pet 2 21), it is not correct to describe Christianity simply as the religion which Christ practised. Christianity takes into account also the work which Christ came to do, the redemption He achieved, the blessings which, through Him, are bestowed on those who accept Him as their Saviour, and acknowledge Him as their Lord. Essentially Christianity is a religion of redemption; not, therefore, a religion practised by Jesus for Himself, but one based on a work He has accomplished for others. Experimentally, it may be described as consisting, above all, in the joyful consciousness of redemption from sin and reconciliation to God through Jesus Christ, and in the possession of a new life of sonship and holiness through Christ's Spirit. Everything in the way of holy obedience is included here. This, at least, reduced to its simplest terms, is undeniably what Christianity meant for its first preachers and teachers, and what historically it has meant for the church ever since.

Definitions of Christianity are as numerous as the writers who treat of the subject; but one or two definitions may be glanced at as illustrative of the positions above assumed.

2. Modern Definitions As modern types, Schleiermacher and Ritschl may be selected in preference to writers of more conspicuous orthodoxy.

(1) Schleiermacher, in his Der Christliche Glaube, has an interesting definition of Christianity. Christianity he speaks of as "a form of monotheistic faith, of the teleological order of religion (i.e. in which the natural is subordinated to the moral), the peculiarity of which, in distinction from other religions of this type, essentially is, that in it everything is referred to the redemption accomplished through Jesus of Nazareth" (sec. 11). As, in general, Schleiermacher's merit is recognized to lie in his bringing back, in a time of religious decay, the person of Christ to a central place in His religion, so here his true religious feeling is manifested in his fixing on the reference to redemption by Christ as the distinctive thing in Christianity.

(2) Ritschl's definition is more complicated, and need not here be cited in full (cf his Justif. and Recon., III; ET, 13). The important point is that, like Schleiermacher, Ritschl gives, together with the idea of the kingdom of God, an essential place to the idea of redemption in the conception of Christianity. "Christianity," he says, "so to speak, resembles not a circle described from a single centre, but an ellipse which is determined by two foci" (Jb., 11). The idea of the kingdom of God furnishes the teleological, the idea of redemption the religious, element in Christianity. There is truth in this; only it is to be remembered that the kingdom of God, as representing the end, can only, in a world of sin, be brought into existence through a redemption. Redemption, therefore, still remains the basal conception.

In the enlarged view of modern knowledge, Christianity can be no longer regarded in isolation, but is seen to take its place in the long

3. Place in series of historical religions. It appears, like these other religions, in a historical context; has, like some of them, a personal founder; claims, as they also do, or did, the allegiance of multitudes of the population of the world; presents in externals (e.g. the possession of Scriptures), sometimes in ideas, analogies to features in these religions. For this reason, an influential modern school is disposed to treat Christianity, as before it, the religion of Israel, as simply one of these historical religions—"nothing less, but also nothing more"—explaining it from the inherent laws of religious development, and rejecting the idea of any special, authoritative revelation. Sacred books are pitted against sacred books; moral codes against moral codes; Jesus against founders of other religions; gospel stories against legends of the Buddha; ideas like those of the virgin birth, the incarnation, the resurrection, against seeming parallels on other soils. For examination of the principal of these alleged resemblances, see COMPARATIVE RELIGION.

(1) This place unique.—Here it is desirable to look at the place of Christianity in the series of historical religions in certain of its wider aspects. The uniqueness of Christ's religion, and justification of its claim to a special, Divine origin, will only appear the more clearly from the comparison. In general, it need only be remarked that no other religion in the world has ever even professed to present a plain, historically developed, progressive revelation, advancing through successive stages in the unfolding of a Divine purpose of grace, till it culminates in the appearance of a person, life, character and work, like that of Jesus Christ; not in one single instance.

(2) Universality of Christianity.—A distinction is commonly made between national and universal religions, and Christianity is classed as one of the three universal religions—the other two being Buddhism and Mohammedanism (cf e.g. Kuenen's Hibbert Lectures on National Religions and Universal Religions). There is certainly agreement in the fact that the two religions named with Christianity are not "national" religions; that they are "universal," in the sense in which Christianity is, may be denied. Neither Buddhism nor Mohammedanism has any fitness to become a religion for the world, nor, with all their remarkable extension, have they succeeded in establishing themselves, as Christianity has done, in East and West, in Old World and in New. Mohammed boasted that he would plant his religion wherever the palm tree grew (Palgrave), and this still marks very nearly the range of its conquests. It is not a revivifying influence, but a blight on all higher civilization. It degrades woman, perpetuates slavery, fosters intolerance, and brings no real healing for the spiritual woes of mankind. Buddhism, again, notwithstanding its wide spread in China and neighboring lands, has in it no real spring of moral progress, and is today withering up at the root. Its system of "salvation"—attainment of Nirvana—is not for the many but the few. It has not a message for all men alike. Buddha does not profess that all can accept his method, or ought to be asked to do so. For the multitude it is impossible of attainment. In practice, therefore, instead of one, he has three codes of duty—one for the laity, who continue to live in the world; one for the monks, who do not aspire to Arahatsip or sainthood; and one for those who would reach the goal of Nirvana. These last are very few; only two cases are specified, besides Buddha himself, of success in this endeavor. In contrast with these Christianity approves itself as a strictly universal religion—the only religion of its kind in the world. In its doctrines of the one God and Father, and of the brotherhood of all mankind; its teaching on universal need through sin, and universal provision for salvation in Christ; its gospel of reconciliation addressed to all; its pure spirituality in worship and morality; its elevating and emancipating tendency in all the relations of human life, it approves itself as a religion for all sections and races of mankind, for all grades of civilization and stages of culture, appealing to that which is deepest in man, capable of being understood and received by all, and renewing and blessing each one who accepts and obeys it. The history of missions, even among the most degraded races, in all parts of the globe, is the demonstration of this truth. (On the universalism of Christianity, cf. Baur, Church Hist of the First Three Cents., I, Pt 1.)

(3) The absolute religion.—It is the custom, even in circles where the full supernatural claims of Christianity are not admitted, to speak of Christ's religion as, in comparison with others, "the absolute religion," meaning by this that in Christianity the true idea of religion, which in other faiths is only striven after, attains to complete and final expression. Hegel, e.g. speaks of Christianity as the "Absolute or Revealed Religion" in the sense that in it the idea is discovered of the essential unity of God and man (thus also T. H. Green, E. Caird, etc.); others (e.g. Pfeleiderer) in the meaning that it expresses the absolute "principle" of religion—a Divine sonship. Christianity also claims for itself, though in a more positive way, to be the absolute religion. It is the final and perfect revelation of God for which not only revelation in Israel, but the whole providential history of the race, was a Divinely ordained preparation (Gal 4 4). It is absolute in the sense that a larger and fuller revelation than Christ has given is not needed, and is not to be looked for. Not only in this religion is all truth of Nature about God's being, attributes and character, with all truth of OT revelation, purely gathered up and preserved, but in the person and work of the incarnate Son a higher and more complete disclosure is made of God's Fatherly love and gracious purposes to mankind, and a redemption is presented as actually accomplished adequate to all the needs of a sinful world. Mankind can never hope to attain to a higher idea of God, a truer idea of man, a profounder conception of the end of life, of sin, of duty, a Diviner provision for salvation, a more perfect satisfaction in fellowship with God, a grander hope of eternal life, than is opened to it in the gospel. In this respect again, Christianity stands alone (cf. W. Douglas Mackenzie, The Final Faith, a Statement of the Nature and Authority of Christianity as the Religion of the World).

(4) Religion of redemption.—A third aspect in which Christianity as a historical religion is sometimes regarded is as a religion of redemption. In this light a comparison is frequently instituted between it and Buddhism, which also in some sort is a religion of redemption. But the comparison brings out only the more conspicuously the unique and original character of the Christian system. Buddhism starts from the conception of the inherent evil and misery of existence, and the salvation it promises as the result of indefinitely prolonged striving through many successive lives is the eternal rest and peace of non-being; Christianity, on the other hand, starts from the conception that everything in its original nature and in the intent of its Creator is good, and that the evil of the world is the result of wrong and perverted development—holds, therefore, that redemption from it is possible by use of appropriate means. And redemption here includes, not merely deliverance from existing evils, but restoration of the Divine likeness which has been lost by man, and ultimate blessedness of the life everlasting. Dr. Boyd Carpenter sums up the contrast thus: "In Buddhism redemption comes from below; in Christianity it is from above; in Buddhism it comes from man; in Christianity it comes from God" (Permanent Elements in Religion, Intro, 34).

Christianity, as an external magnitude, has a long and chequered history, into the details of which it is not the purpose of this art.

4. Development and Influence to enter. Ecclesiastical developments are left untouched. But a little may be said of its outward expansion, of the influences that helped to mould its doctrinal forms, and of the influence which it in turn has exercised on the thought and life of the peoples into whose midst it came.

(1) Expansion of Christianity.—From the first Christianity aimed at being a world-conquering principle. The task it set before itself was stupendous. Its message was not one likely to commend it to either Jew or Greek (1 Cor 1 23). It renounced temporal weapons (in this a contrast with Mohammedanism); had nothing to rely on but the naked truth. Yet from the beginning (Acts 2) it had a remarkable reception. Its universal principle was still partially veiled in the Jewish-Christian communities, but with Paul it freed itself from all limitations, and entered on a period of rapid and wide diffusion.

(a) The apostolic age: It is the peculiarity of the Pauline mission, as Professor W. M. Ramsay points out, that it followed the great lines of Roman communication, and aimed at establishing itself in the large cities—the centers of civilization (Church in Roman Empire, 147, etc.). The Book of Acts and the Epistles show how striking were the results. Churches were planted in all the great cities of Asia Minor and Macedonia. In Rome Tacitus testifies that by the time of Nero's persecution (64 AD) the Christians were a "great multitude" ("ingens multitudo" [Annals xv.44]).

(b) Succeeding period: Our materials for estimating the progress of Christianity in the post-apostolic age are scanty, but they suffice to show us the church pursuing its way, and casting its spell alike on East and West, in centers of civilization and dim regions of barbarism. In the last quarter of the 2d cent. great churches like those of Carthage and Alexandria burst into visibility, and reveal how firm a hold the new religion was taking of the empire. Deadly persecution could not stop this march of the church to victory. From the middle of the 3d cent. there is no question that it was progressing by leaps and bounds. This is the period in which Harnack puts its great expansion (Expansion, II, 455, ET). On the back of the most relentless persecution it had yet endured, the Diocletian, it suddenly found itself raised by the arms of Constantine to a position of acknowledged supremacy. By this time it had penetrated into all ranks of society, and reckoned among its adherents many of noblest birth.

(c) Modern missions: It is unnecessary to trace the subsequent course of Christianity in its conquest of the northern nations. For a time the zeal for expansion slumbered, but, with the revival of the missionary spirit at the close of the 18th cent., a new forward movement began, the effects of which in the various regions of the heathen world are only now beginning to be realized. It is impossible to read without a thrill what was accomplished by the pioneers of Christian missions in the South Seas and other early fields; now the tidings of what is being done in India, China, Japan, Korea, Africa and elsewhere, by Christian preaching and education, awaken even more astonishment. Countries long closed against the gospel are now opened, and the standard of the cross is being carried into all. The church is arousing to its missionary obligations as never before. Still, with all this progress, immense obstacles remain to be overcome. Including all the populations of nominally Christian lands, the adherents of the Christian religion are reckoned to amount only to some 560,000,000, out of a total of over 1,600,000,000 of the population of the world (Hickmann). This looks discouraging, but it is to be remembered that it is the Christian peoples that represent the really progressive portion of the human race.

(2) The doctrinal shaping of Christianity has taken place largely as the result of conflict with opposing errors. First, as was inevitable, its conflict was waged with that narrowest section of the Jewish-Christian community—the Ebionites of early church history—who, cleaving to circumcision, disowned Paul, and insisted that the Gentiles should observe the law (Gal 5 13.14; see EBIONITES). These, as a party of reaction, were soon left behind, and themselves fell under heretical (Essenian) influences.

(a) Gnosticism: A more formidable conflict was that with Gnosticism—the distinctive heresy of the 2d cent., though its beginnings are already within the apostolic age (cf Lightfoot, Colossians). This strange compound of oriental theosophy and ideas borrowed from Christianity (see Gnosticism) would have dissolved Christ's religion into a tissue of phantasies, and all the strength and learning of the Church were needed to combat its influence. Its opposition was overruled for good in leading to a fixing of the earliest creed (see APOSTLES' CREED), the formation of an authoritative NT canon (see BIBLE; CANON), and the firm assertion of the reality of Christ's humanity.

(b) Monarchianism: Christianity had now entered the world of Gr thought, and ere long had contests to sustain within its own borders. First came assaults (3d cent.) on the idea of the Trinity in what are known as the Monarchian heresies—the assertion that the Father Himself was incarnate and suffered in Christ (Patripassianism), or that the Trinity consisted only in "modes" of the Divine self-revelation (Sabellianism).

(c) Arianism: These were hardly repelled when a yet greater danger overtook the church in the outbreak (318 AD) of the violent Arian controversy, the Son Himself being now declared to be a creature, exalted, before all worlds, but not truly of the nature of God. The commotion produced by this controversy led to the summoning of the first ecumenical council—that of Nicaea (325 AD), and the framing of the Nicene Creed, affirming the full deity of the Son. A like controversy about the Spirit (the Macedonian, 4th cent.), led to the confirming of this creed, and adoption of additional clauses, at the Council of Constantinople (381 AD).

(d) Sin and grace: The doctrine of the Trinity was now settled, but new controversies speedily sprang up—in the West on sin and grace (Pelagius and Augustine) (411–18 AD), and in the East in the long series of controversies known as the Christological, bearing on the right apprehension of the person of Christ (4th to 7th cents.): as against Pelagius, who denied original sin, and affirmed man's natural ability to keep the whole law of God, Augustine vindicated the complete dependence of man on the grace of God for his salvation.

(e) Person of Christ: And as against errors successively denying the reality of a human soul in Jesus (Appollinarianism), dissolving the unity of His person (Nestorianism, condemned at Ephesus, 431 AD), or conversely, fusing together the Divine and human into one nature (Eutychianism, Monophysitism), the church maintained, and embodied in a Creed at Chalcedon (451 AD), the integrity of the two natures, Divine and human, in the one Divine person of the Lord. These decisions are upheld by all branches of the church—Gr, Lat, Protestant.

(f) The atonement: The mediaeval scholastic period made one great advance in the attempt of Anselm in his Cur Deus Homo (1089) to lay deep the foundations of a doctrine of atonement in the idea of the necessity of a satisfaction for human sin: Abelard, on the other hand, denied the need of satisfaction, and became the representative of what are known as moral theories of the atonement. It was reserved for the Protestant Reformers, however, to bring this doctrine to its true bearing, as furnishing the ground for man's free justification before God in his union with Christ, who had made full satisfaction for his guilt. There have been many theories of atonement, but the idea that Christ has "satisfied Divine justice" is too firmly imbedded in all the Reformation creeds, and has too profound a Scriptural support, to be removed.

(g) The 16th cent. Reformation, on its outward side, was a revolt against the errors and corruptions of the papacy, but in its positive aspect it may be described as the reassertion of the sole mediatorship of Christ (as against priestly intervention), the sole authority of Scripture (as against tradition), and justification by faith alone (as against salvation by works of merit). The schism meant a separation of the great Protestant communities and nations from the church of Rome, which, by its claim of papal supremacy, had already separated from itself the great Gr communion.

(h) Lutheran and Reformed: Within Protestantism itself a difference of genius between the Swiss and German Reformers, with divergences of view on the sacraments, led to the formation of two main types—the Lutheran (German) and the Reformed (Swiss)—and between these two, as respects theology and church order, later Protestantism has mostly been divided. Luther represented the one; Calvin for long was the chief name in the other. With the rise of Arminianism and other forms of dissent from the peculiarities of Calvinism, the aspect of Protestantism became more variegated. Of the later divisions, producing the numerous modern sects which yet own allegiance to the common head (Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Methodists, Baptists, Congregationalists, etc.), it is not necessary here to speak. The unity of spirit revealed in creed, worship and combined endeavors in Christ's service goes deeper than all outward differences.

(3) Its influence.—Christianity preaches a kingdom of God, or supremacy of God's will in human hearts and human affairs, by which is meant, on its earthly side, nothing less than a complete reconstruction of society on the two great bases of love to God and love to man—"Thy will be done, as in heaven, so on earth" (Mt 6 10). The influence of Christianity is paramount in all the great advances that have been made in the moral and social amelioration of the state of mankind.

(a) The ancient world: It was so undoubtedly in the ancient world. The world into which Christianity came was one fast sinking into dissolution through the weight of its own corruptions. Into that world Christianity brought a totally new idea of man as being of infinite dignity and immortal worth. It restored the well-nigh lost sense of responsibility and accountability to God; breathed into the world a new spirit of love and charity, and created that wealth of charitable and beneficent institutions with which Christian lands are now full (Lecky speaks of it as "covering the globe with countless institutions of mercy, absolutely unknown in the whole pagan world," Hist of Morals, II, 91); set up a new moral ideal and standard of integrity which has acted as an elevating force on moral conceptions till the present hour; restored woman to her rightful place as man's helpmeet and equal; created the Christian home; gave the slave an equal place with his master in the kingdom of God, and struck at the foundations of slavery by its doctrines of the natural brotherhood and dignity of man; created self-respect, and a sense of duty in the use of one's powers for self-support and the benefit of others; urged to honest labors; and in a myriad other ways, by direct teaching, by the protest of holy lives, and by its general spirit, struck at the evils, the malpractices, the cruelties of the time.

(b) The modern world: Despite many failures, and gross backslidings in the church itself, these ideas, implanted in the world, and liberating other forces, have operated ever since in advancing the progress of the race. They exist and operate far beyond the limits of the church. They have been taken up and contended for by men outside the church—by unbelievers even—when the church itself had become unfaithful to them. None the less they are of Christian parentage. They lie at the basis of our modern assertion of equal rights, of justice to the individual in social and state arrangements, of the desire for brotherhood, peace and amity among classes and nations. It is Christian love which is sustaining the best, purest and most self-sacrificing efforts for the raising of the fallen, the rescue of the drunkard, the promotion of enlightenment, virtues, social order and happiness. It is proving itself the grand civilizing agency in other regions of the world. Christian missions, with their benign effects in the spread of education, the checking of social evils and barbarities, the creation of trade and industry, the change in the status of women, the advance in social and civilized life, generally, is the demonstration of it (see Dennis, Christian Missions and Social Progress).

(c) Testimony of Huxley: Professor Huxley will not be regarded as a biased witness on behalf of Christianity. Yet this is what he writes on the influence of the Christian Scriptures, and his words may be a fitting close to this article: "Throughout the history of the western world," he says, "the Scriptures, Jewish, and Christian, have been the great instigators of revolt against the worst forms of clerical and political despotism. The Bible has been the Magna Charta of the poor, and of the oppressed; down to modern times no state has had a constitution in which the interests of the people are so largely taken into account, in which the duties, so much more than the privileges, of rulers are insisted upon, as that drawn up for Israel in Dt and Lev; nowhere is the fundamental truth that the welfare of the State, in the long run, depends upon the uprightness of the citizen so strongly laid down. Assuredly the Bible talks no trash about the rights of man; but it insists upon the equality of duties, on the liberty to bring about that righteousness which is somewhat different from struggling for 'rights'; on the fraternity of taking thought for one's neighbor as for one's self."

CHRISTOLOGY, kris-to'l'o-ji. See PERSON OF CHRIST.

CHRISTS, kristz. See CHRISTS, FALSE; MESIAH.

CHRISTS, FALSE, fôls (ψευδοχριστοί, pseudochristoi): In His discourse on the last things, uttered by Him on the Tuesday of the week of His Passion, Jesus solemnly Warnings forewarned His disciples that many would come in His name, saying "I am the Christ," who would deceive many; that there would arise false Christs and false prophets, who would show great signs and wonders, so as to lead astray, if possible, even the elect; that, therefore, if any man said to them, "Lo, here is the Christ," or "Lo, there," they were not to believe it (Mt 24 5.11.23-25; Mk 13 6.21-23; Lk 21 8).

The warning was needed. De Wette, Meyer, and others have, indeed, pointed out that there is no historical record of anyone expressly claiming to be the Christ prior to the destruction of Jerus. This, however, is probably only in appearance (cf Lange, Comm. on Mt 24 3). Edersheim remarks: "Though in the multitude of impostors, who, in the troubled time between the rule of Pilate and the destruction of Jerus, promised Messianic deliverance to Israel, few names and claims of this kind have been specially recorded, yet the hints in the NT, and the references, however guarded, in the Jewish historian, imply the appearance of many such seducers" (Jesus the Messiah, V, ch vi; in 1906 ed, II, 446). The revolts in this period were generally connected with religious pretensions in the leaders (Jos, BJ, II, xiii, 4—"deceived and deluded the people under pretense of Divine inspiration"), and, in the fevered state of Messianic expectation, can hardly have lacked, in some instances, a Messianic character. Judas of Galilee (Acts 5 37; Jos, Ant, XVIII, i, 1, 6; BJ, II, viii, 1) founded a numerous sect (the Gaulonites) by many of whom, according to Origen (Hom on Lk, 25), he was regarded as the Messiah (cf DB, s.v.). The Theudas of Acts 5 36, "giving himself out to be somebody," may or may not be the same as the Theudas of Jos (Ant, XX, v, 1), but the latter, at least, made prophetic claims and deluded many. He promised to divide the river Jordan by a word. Another instance is the "Egyptian" for whom Paul was mistaken, who had made an "uproar" (Acts 21 38; RV "sedition")—one of a multitude of "impostors and deceivers," Jos tells us, who persuaded multitudes to follow them into the wilderness, pretending that they would exhibit wonders and signs (Ant, XX, viii, 6). This Egyptian was to show them that, at his command, the walls of Jerus would fall down (BJ, II, xiii, 5). Of another class was the Samaritan Dositheus, with whom Simon Magus was said to be connected (see refs to Eusebius, Origen, Hippolytus, Clementine writings, etc, in DB, s.v.). He is alleged to have been regarded as "the prophet like unto Moses," whom God was to raise up.

The most celebrated case of a false Christ is that of Bar-Cochba (to give the name its usual form), the leader of the great insurrection under Hadrian in 132 AD (Eus., HE, IV, 6; for Jewish and other authorities, see the full account in Schürer, HJP, I, 2, pp. 297 ff, ET). The insurrection was on a scale which it required the whole force of the Rom empire to put down (cf Schürer). The leader's own name was Simon, but the title, "Bar-Cochba" ("son of a star"), was given him with reference to the prophecy in Nu 24 17 of the star that should come out of Jacob. Rabbi Akiba, the most celebrated doctor of his time, applied this prophecy, with that in Hag 2 6, 7, to Simon, and announced him as the Messiah. He is commonly known in Jewish lit. as Barcosiba, probably from his birthplace. Immense multitudes flocked to his standard, and the Christians in Pal were severely persecuted. Coins were issued in his name. After tremendous efforts the rebellion was crushed, and Jerus was converted into a Rom colony (Aelia Capitolina), which Jews were forbidden to enter.

Among the Jews themselves, in later times, many pseudo-Messiahs have arisen. An interesting account of some of these is given by Mr. Elkan Adler in his Introduction to the volume, Aspects of the Heb Genius (London, Routledge, 1910). "Such there had been," this writer says, "from time to time ever since the destruction of the Temple." In the 16th and 17th cents., however, the belief in pseudo-Messiahs took new and remarkable shapes. Among the names mentioned is that of David Reubeni, or David of the tribe of Reuben (1524), who ultimately fell a sacrifice to the Inquisition. Under his influence a Portuguese royal secretary, Diego Pires, adopted the Jewish faith, changed his name to Solomon Molko, and finally proclaimed himself the Messiah. In 1529 he published some of his addresses under the title of The Book of Wonder. He was burned at the stake at Mantua. "Other Kabbalists, such as Isaac Luria and Chajim Vital and Abraham Shalom, proclaimed themselves to be Messiahs or forerunners of the Messiah, and their works and MSS are still piously studied by many oriental Jews." The chief of all these false Messiahs was Sabbatai Zevi, born at Smyrna in 1626. "His adventures," it is said, "created a tremendous stir in western Europe." He ultimately became an apostate to Islam; notwithstanding which fact he had a line of successors, in whom the sect of Donmeh, in Salonica, continue to believe. Another mentioned is Jacob Frank, of Podolia, who revealed himself in 1755 as the Holy Lord, in whom there dwelt the same Messiah-soul that had dwelt in David, Elijah, Jesus, Mohammed, Sabbatai Zevi, and his followers. Jewish lit. in the 18th cent. is full of controversial writing connected with Sabbatianism. As a special source of information on modern false Messiahs among the Jews, Lange mentions the serial Dibhrē 'emeth, or Words of Truth (Breslau, 1853–54).

LITERATURE

The analogy of this title to such Eng. words as diary, journal, chronicle, is obvious. The title is one which frequently appears in the Heb of the OT. It is used to denote the records of the Medo-Pers monarchy (Est 2 23; 6 1; 10 2), and to denote public records, either Pers or Jewish, made in late postexilic times (Neh 12 23), and to denote public records of King David (1 Ch 27 24). But its most common use is to denote the Judahite and Israelite records referred to in the Books of K as sources (1 K 14 19; 15 7 and about 30 other places). The references in K are not to our present Books of Ch, for a large proportion of them are to matters not mentioned in these. Either directly or indirectly they refer the reader to public archives.

As applied to our present Books of Ch this title was certainly not intended to indicate that they are strictly copies of public documents, though it may indicate that they have a certain official character distinguishing them from other contemporary or future writings. The Gr title is Paraleipomenōn, "Of Things that have been Left Untold." Some copies add "concerning the kings of Judah," and this is perhaps the original form of the title. That is, the Gr translators thought of Ch as a supplement to the other narrative Scriptural books. Jerome accepted the Gr title, but suggested that the Heb title would be better represented by a derivative from the Gr word chrōnos, and that this would fit the character of the book, which is a chronicle of the whole sacred history. Jerome's suggestion is followed in the title given to the book in the Eng. and other languages.

In most of the VSS, as in the Eng., the Books of Ch are placed after the Books of K, as being a later account of the matters narrated in K; and Ezr and Neh follow Ch as being continuations of the narrative. In the Heb Bibles the Books of Ezr and Neh and 1 and 2 Ch are placed last. By common opinion, based on proof that is entirely sufficient, the three books constitute a single literary work or group of works, by one author or school of authors. It is convenient to use the term "the Chronicler" to designate the author, or the authors if there were more than one.

It is the regulation thing to say that 1 and 2 Ch were originally one book, which has been divided into two. The fact is that Ch is

3. Two Books, or One? counted as one book in the count which regards the OT as 22 or 24 books, and as two books in the count which regards the whole number of books as 39; and that both ways of counting have been in use as far back as the matter can be traced. Both ways of counting appear in the earliest Christian lists, those of Origen and Melito, for example. 1 Ch closes with a summary which may naturally be regarded as the closing of a book.

With respect to their contents the Books of Ch are naturally divided into three parts. The first part is preliminary, consisting mostly of genealogical matters with accompanying facts and incidents (1 Ch 1-9). The second part is an account of the accession and reign of David (1 Ch 10-29). The third part is an account of the events under David's successors in the dynasty (2 Ch).

The genealogies begin with Adam (1 Ch 1 1) and extend to the latest OT times (1 Ch 9; cf Neh 11, and the latest names in the genealogical lines, e.g. 1 Ch 3 19 ff). The events incidentally mentioned in connection with them are more numerous and of more importance than the casual reader would imagine. They are some dozens in number. Some of them are repeated from the parts of the OT from which the Chronicler draws as sources—for example, such statements as that Nimrod was a mighty one, or that in the time of Peleg the earth was divided, or the details concerning the kings of Edom (1 Ch 1 10, 19, 43 ff; cf Gen 10 8, 25; 36 31 ff). Others are instances which the Chronicler has taken from other sources than the OT—for instance, the story of Jabez, or the accounts of the Simeonite conquests of the Meunim and of Amalek (1 Ch 4 9, 10, 38-43).

The account in Ch of the reign of David divides itself into three parts. The first part (1 Ch 10-21) is a series of sections giving a general view, including the death of Saul, the crowning of David over the twelve tribes, his associates, his wars, the bringing of the ark to Jerus, the great Davidic promise, the plague that led to the purchase of the threshing-floor of Ornan the Jebusite. The second part (1 Ch 22-29 22a) deals with one particular event and the preparations for it. The event is the making Solomon king, at a great public assembly (1 Ch 23 1; 28 1 ff). The preparations for it include arrangements for the site and materials and labor for the temple that is to be built, and the organizing of Levites, priests, singers, doorkeepers, captains, for the service of the temple and the kingdom. The third part (1 Ch 29 22b-30) is a brief account of Solomon's being made king "a second time" (cf 1 K 1), with a summary and references for the reign of David.

The history of the successors of David, as given in 2 Ch, need not here be commented upon.

The sources of the Books of Ch classify themselves as Biblical and extra-Biblical. Considerably more than half the contents come from the other OT books, especially Biblical and from S and K. Other sources mentioned in the Books of Ch are the Extra-Biblical following:

5. Sources (1) The Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel (2 Ch 16 11; 25 26; 28 26; 32 32).

(2) The Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah (2 Ch 27 7; 35 27; 36 8).

(3) The Book of the Kings of Israel (2 Ch 20 34).

(4) The Book of the Kings (2 Ch 24 27).

It is possible that these may be four variant forms of the same title. It is also possible that they may be references to our present Books of K, though in that case we must regard the formulas of reference as conventional rather than exact.

(5) The Book of the Kings of Israel (1 Ch 9 1), a genealogical work.

(6) The Midr of the Book of the Kings (2 Ch 24 27).

(7) The Words of the Kings of Israel (2 Ch 33 18), referred to for details concerning Manasseh.

Observe that these seven are books of Kings, and that the contents of the last three do not at all correspond with those of our Biblical books. In the seventh title and in several of the titles that are yet to be mentioned it is commonly understood that "Words" is the equivalent of "acts" or "history"; but it is here preferred to retain the form "Words," as lending itself better than the others to the syntactical adjustments.

(8) The Words of Samuel the Man of Vision and the Words of Nathan the Prophet and the Words of Gad the Seer (1 Ch 29 29) are perhaps to be counted as one work, and identified with our Books of Jgs and S.

(9) The Words of Nathan the Prophet (2 Ch 9 29; cf 1 K 11 41-53). Source concerning Solomon.

(10) The Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite (2 Ch 9 29; cf 1 K 11 29 ff; 14 2 ff, etc). Solomon.

(11) The Visions of Jedo the Seer (2 Ch 9 29; cf 1 K 13). Solomon.

(12) The Words of Shemaiah the Prophet (2 Ch 12 15; cf 1 K 12 22 ff). Rehoboam.

(13) "Shemaiah wrote" (1 Ch 24 6). David.

(14) Iddo the Seer in Reckoning Genealogies (2 Ch 12 15). Rehoboam.

(15) "The Words [The History] of Jehu the son of Hanani, which is inserted in the Book of the Kings of Israel" (2 Ch 20 34; cf 1 K 16 1, 7, 12). Jehoshaphat.

(16) "The rest of the acts of Uzziah, first and last, did Isaiah the Prophet, the son of Amoz, write" (2 Ch 26 22; cf Isa 1 1; 6).

(17) "The Vision of Isaiah . . . in the Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel" (2 Ch 32 32; cf 2 K 18-20; Isa 36-39, etc). Hezekiah.

(18) The Words of the Seers (2 Ch 33 19 m). Manasseh.

(19) References to "Lamentations," and to "Jeremiah," etc (2 Ch 35 25). Josiah.

(20) The Midr of the Prophet Iddo (2 Ch 13 22). Abijah.

These numbers, from 12 to 20, are referred to as works of prophets. At first thought there is plausibility in the idea that the references may be to the sections in S and K where these several prophets are mentioned; but in nearly all the cases this explanation fades out on examination. The Chronicler had access to prophetic writings not now known to be in existence.

(21) Liturgical writings of David and Solomon (2 Ch 35 4; cf Ezr 3 10). Josiah.

(22) Commandments of David and Gad and Nathan (2 Ch 29 25). Hezekiah.

(23) The Commandment of David and Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun (2 Ch 35 15). Josiah.

(24) Chronicles of King David (1 Ch 27 24).

(25) Last Words of David (1 Ch 23 27).

Add to these many mentions of genealogical works, connected with particular times, those for example of David, Jotham, Jeroboam II (1 Ch 9 22; 5 17), and mentions of matters that imply record-keeping, from Samuel and onward (e.g. 1 Ch 26 26-28). Add also the fact that the Chronicler had a habit, exhibited in Ezr and Neh, of using and quoting what he represents to be public documents, for example, letters to and from Cyrus and Artaxerxes and Darius and Artaxerxes Longimanus (Ezr 1 1; 6 3; 4 7.17; 5 6; 6 6; 7 11; Neh 2 7). It is no exaggeration to say that the Chronicler claims to have had a considerable library at his command.

If such a library as this existed we should perhaps expect to find some mention of it somewhere.

6. Nehemiah's Library Such a mention I think there is in the much discussed passage in 2 Macc 2 13-15. It occurs in what purports to be a letter written after 164 BC by the Maccabean leaders in Jerus to Aristobulus in Egypt. The letter has a good deal to say concerning Nehemiah, and among other things this: "And how he, founding a library, gathered together the books about the kings and prophets, and the [books] of David, and letters of kings about sacred gifts." It says that these writings have been scattered by reason of the war, but that Judas has now gathered them again, and that they may be at the service of Aristobulus and his friends.

This alleged letter contains statements that seem fabulous to most modern readers, though they may not have seemed so to Judas and his compatriots. Leaving out of view, however, the intrinsic credibility of the witness, the fitting of the statement into certain other traditions and into the phenomena presented in Chronicles is a thing too remarkable to neglect. In the past, men have cited this passage as an account of the framing of a canon of Scripture—the canon of the Prophets, or of the Prophets and the Hagiographa. But it purports to be an account of a library, not of a body of Scripture; and its list of contents does not appear to be that of either the Prophets or the Hagiographa or both. But it is an exact list of the sources to which the author (or authors) of Ch and Ezr and Neh claim to have access—"books about the kings" (see above, Nos. 1-7), "and prophets" (Nos. 8-20), "and of David" (Nos. 21-25 ff), "and letters of kings about sacred gifts" (those cited in Ezr and Neh). The library attributed to Neh corresponds to the one which the Chronicler claims to have used; and the two independent pieces of evidence strongly confirm each the other.

The method in which the Biblical sources are used in Ch presents certain remarkable features.

7. The Way of Using the Biblical Sources As a typical instance study 1 Ch 10 in comparison with 1 S 31. In verses 1-12 the passage in Chronicles is just a transcription, with slight changes, of the passage in S. A large part of Ch is thus made up of passages transcribed from S and K. The alternative is that the Chronicler transcribed from sources which had earlier been transcribed in S and K, and this alternative may in some cases be the true one.

This phenomenon is interesting for many reasons. It has its bearings on the trustworthiness of the information given; a copy of an ancient document is of higher character as evidence than a mere report of the contents of the document. It has a bearing on questions concerning the text; are the texts in K and Ch to be regarded as two recensions? It is especially interesting as illustrating the literary processes in use among the writers of our Scriptures.

It is sometimes said that they used their sources not by restating the contents as a modern compiler would do, but by just copying. It would be more correct to say that they do this part of the time. In 1 Ch 10 the copying process ceases with the 12th ver. In vs 13 and 14 the Chronicler condenses into a sentence a large part of the contents of 1 S; one clause in particular is a condensation of 1 S 28. So it is with other parts. 1 Ch 1 1-4 is abridged from Gen 5 at the rate of a name for a section; so is 1 Ch 1 24-27 from Gen 11 10-26. In the various parts of Ch we find all the methods that are used by any compiler; the differentiating fact is simply that the method of transcribing is more used than it would be by a modern compiler.

In the transcribed passages, almost without exception, there has been a systematic editorial revision. Words and clauses have been pruned out, and grammatical roughness smoothed away. Regularly the text in Chronicles is somewhat briefer, and is more fluent than in S or K. If we give the matter careful attention we will be sure that this revisional process took place, and that it accounts for most of the textual differences between Ch and the earlier writings, not leaving many to be accounted for as corruptions.

Of course the most significant changes made by the Chronicler are those which consist in additions and omissions. It is a familiar fact

8. Additions by the Chronicler that the added passages in Ch which the bulk largest are those which deal with the temple and its worship and its attendants—its priests, Levites, musicians, singers, doorkeepers. Witness for example the added matter in connection with the bringing of the ark to Jerus, the preparations for the temple, the priests' joining Rehoboam, the war between Abijah and Jeroboam, the reforms under Asa and Jehoshaphat, details concerning Uzziah, Hezekiah's passover, the reform of Manasseh, the passover of Josiah (1 Ch 15-16, 22-29; 2 Ch 11 13-17; 13; 14; 15; 17; 19; 20; 26 16-21; 29-31; 33 10-20; 35). It has been less noticed than it should be that while the Chronicler in these passages magnifies the ceremonial laws of Moses, he magnifies those of David yet more.

Next in bulk comes the added genealogical and statistical matter, for example, the larger part of the preliminary genealogies, details as to David's followers, Rehoboam's fortified cities and family affairs with details concerning the Shishak invasion, Asa's military preparations and the invasion by Zerah, with numbers and dates, Jehoshaphat's military arrangements, with numbers, Jehoram's brothers and other details concerning him, Uzziah's army and his business enterprises (1 Ch 2-9; 12; 27; 2 Ch 11 5-12.18-23; 12 3-9; 14 3-15; 17 1-5.10-19; 21; 26 6-15).

The Chronicler is sometimes spoken of as interested in priestly affairs, and not in the prophets. That is a mistake. He takes particular pains to magnify the prophets (e.g. 2 Ch 20 20; 36 12.16). He uses the word "prophet" 30 times, and the two words for "seer" (hōzeh and rō'eh) respectively 5 and 11 times. He gives us additional information concerning many of the prophets—for example, Samuel, Gad, Nathan, Ahijah, Shemaiah, Hanani, Jehu, Elijah, Isaiah, Jeremiah. He has taken pains to preserve for us a record of many prophets concerning whom we should otherwise be ignorant—Asaph, Heman, Jeduthun, Jedo (2 Ch 9 29), Iddo, the Oded of Asa's time, Jahaziel the son of Zechariah, Eliezer the son of Dodavah, two Zechariahs (2 Ch 24 20; 26 5), unnamed prophets of the time of Amaziah (2 Ch 25 5-10.15.16), Oded of the time of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 9).

In addition, however, to the materials that can be thus classified, it is the method of the Chronicler to preserve interesting incidents of all kinds by working them into his narrative. When he reaches Jair in his genealogical list, he finds himself in possession of a bit of information not contained in the older writings, and he inserts it (1 Ch 2 21 ff). He is interested to keep alive the memory of the "families of scribes which dwelt at Jabez" (1 Ch 2 55). He has found items concerning craftsmen, and concerning a linen industry, and a potters' industry, and he connects these with names in his list (1 Ch 4 14.21.23). He has come across a bit of a hymn in the name of Jabez, and he attaches the hymn to his list of names as an annotation (1 Ch 4 9.10). There are matters concerning the sickness and the burial of Asa, and concerning the bad conduct of Joash after the death of Jehoiada, and concerning constructions by Hezekiah (2 Ch 16 12.13; 24 15-27; 32 27-30), that seem to the Chronicler worth preserving, though they are not recorded in the earlier writings. The fruits of the habit appear, in many scores of instances, in all parts of the Books of Ch.

As the Books of Ch thus add matters not found in the older books, so they leave out much that is contained in the Books of S and K.

9. Omissions by the Chronicler Here, however, the question should rather be as to what the Chronicler has retained from his sources than as to what he has omitted. He writes for readers whom he assumes to be familiar with the earlier books, and he retains so much of the older narrative as seems to him necessary for defining the relations of his new statements of fact to that narrative. From the point where the history of David begins he has omitted everything that is not strictly connected with David or his dynasty—the history of northern Israel as such, the long narratives concerning the prophets, such distressing affairs as those of Amnon and Absalom and Adonijah and the faithlessness of Solomon, and a multitude of minor particulars. We have already noticed his systematic shortening of the passages which he transcribes.

There are two marked phenomena in the parts of Ch which were not taken from the other canonical books. They are written in later

10. The Extra-Biblical Sources Heb of a pretty uniform type; many parts of them are fragmentary. The Heb of the parts that were copied from S and K is of course the classical Heb of those books, generally made more classical by the revision to which it has been subjected. The Heb of the other parts is presumably that of the Chronicler himself. The difference is unmistakable. An obvious way of accounting for it is by supposing that the Chronicler treated his Scriptural sources with especial respect, and his other sources with more freedom. We will presently consider whether this is the true account.

There are indications that some of the non-Biblical sources were in a mutilated or otherwise fragmentary condition when the Chronicler used them. Broken sentences and passages and constructions abound. In the trs these are largely concealed, the translators having guessed the meanings into shape, but the roughnesses are palpable in the Heb. They appear less in the long narratives than in the genealogies and descriptive passages. They are sometimes spoken of as if they were characteristic of the later Heb, but there is no sense in that.

For example, most of the genealogies are incomplete. The priestly genealogies omit some of the names that are most distinguished in the history, such names as those of Jehoiada and two Azariahs (2 K 11 9, etc; 2 Ch 26 17; 31 10). Many of the genealogies are given more than once, and in variant forms, but with their incompleteness still palpable. There are many breaks in the lists. We read the names of one group, and we suddenly find ourselves in the midst of names that belong to another group, and with nothing to call attention to the transition. The same phenomena appear in the sections in 1 Ch 23 2-27. These contain a succession of matters arranged in absolutely systematic order in classes and subclasses, while many of the statements thus arranged are so fragmentary as to be hardly intelligible. The most natural explanation of these phenomena assumes that the writer had a quantity of fragments in writing—clay tablets, perhaps, or pottery or papyrus, or what not, more or less mutilated, and that he copied them as best he could, one after another. A modern writer, doing such work, would indicate the lacunae by dots or dashes or other devices. The ancient copyist simply wrote the bits of text one after another, without such indications. In regard to many of the supposable lacunae in Ch scholars would differ, but there are a large number in regard to which all would agree. If some one would print a text of Ch in which these should be indicated, he would make an important contribution to the intelligibility of the books.

On the basis of these phenomena what judgment can we form as to the purposes for which the books of Ch were written? There are those

11. The Object in Writing the Books of Chronicles who find the answer to this question a very simple one. They say that the interests of the writer were those of the temple priesthood, that it seemed to him that the older histories did not emphasize these interests as they ought, and that he therefore wrote a new history, putting into it the views and facts which he thought should be there. If this statement were modified so as not to impugn the good faith of the Chronicler, it would be nearly correct as a statement of part of his purpose. His purpose was to preserve what he regarded as historical materials that were in danger of being lost, materials concerning the temple-worship, but also concerning a large variety of other matters. He had the historian's instinct for laying hold of all sorts of details, and putting them into permanent form. His inspiration from God (we do not here discuss the nature of that inspiration) led him this way. He wanted to save for the future that which he regarded as historical fact. The contents of the book, determined in part by his enthusiasm for the temple, were also determined in part by the nature of the materials that were providentially at his disposal. There seems also to have been present in his consciousness the idea of bringing to completion the body of sacred writings which had then been accumulating for centuries.

As we have seen, the Gr translators gave to the Books of Ch a title which expressed the idea they had of the work. They regarded it as the presentation of matters which had been omitted in the earlier Scriptures, as written not to supersede the older books, but to supplement them, as being, along with Ezr and Neh, a work that brought the Scriptures up to date, and made them complete.

The text of the Books of Ch has been less carefully preserved than that of some other parts of the 12. The Text OT. Witness for example the numbers 42 and 8 for the ages of Abaziah and Jehoiachin (2 Ch 22 2; cf 2 K 8 26; 2 Ch 36 9; cf 2 K 24 8). There is no proof, however, of important textual corruption. As we have seen, the fragmentary character of certain parts is probably in the main due to exactness in following fragmentary sources, and not to bad text; and the differences between S or K and Ch, in the transcribed passages, are mostly due to intended revision rather than to text variations.

In critical discussions less semblance of fair play has been accorded to Ch than even to most of the other Scriptures. It is not unusual

13. Critical Estimates to assume that the Chronicler's reference to sources is mere make-believe, that he "has cited sources simply to produce the impression that he is writing with authority." Others hurry to the generalization that the Books of K mentioned in Ch (see Nos. 1-7 above) are all one work, which must therefore have been an extensive Midr (commentary, exegetical and anecdotal) on the canonical Books of K; and that the references to prophetic writings are to sections in this Midr; so that practically the Chronicler had only two sources, the canonical books and this midrashic history of Israel; and that "it is impossible to determine" whether he gathered any bits of information from any other sources.

Into the critical theories concerning Ch enters a hypothesis of an earlier Book of K that was more extensive than our present canonical books. And in recent publications of such men as Büchler, Benzinger and Kittel are theories of an analysis of Ch into documents—for example, an earlier writing that made no distinction between priests and Levites, or an earlier writing which dealt freely with the canonical books; and the later writing of the Chronicler proper.

What we know in the matter is that three sets of authors combined in producing the Books of Ch—first, the men who produced the canonical sources, second, the men who produced the other sources, and third, the man or men who directly or indirectly put the contents of these sources together into the book which we have. We have no means of knowing what most of the intermediate processes were, and it is superlatively useless to guess. It is gratuitous to say that the mention of sources in Ch is not made in good faith. It is probable that among the sources were Midrashim that were nearly contemporaneous. It is exceedingly improbable that none of the sources mentioned were genuine and ancient. All probabilities agree to the effect that the returned exiles and their near descendants were likely to study the ancient history of their race, and to gather materials for that purpose. As we have seen, the phenomena of the book indicate the presence of an antiquarian motive which was sure to be interested in genuine items of evidence from the remote past.

The current opinion sixty years ago was that the Books of Ch and the whole OT were completed about 404 BC, near the time when

14. Date and Authorship Artaxerxes Mnemon succeeded Darius Nothus. The statement now fashionable is that the Books of Ch were completed not later than about 250 BC, and this constantly degenerates into the statement that they were written about 250 BC or later. In fact, they were completed within the lifetime of Nehemiah, not later or not much later than 400 BC.

In discussing this we cannot ignore the fact that Ch and Ezr and Neh are one work, or, if you prefer, one series. The closing vs of 2 Ch duplicate the opening vs of Ezr. This is not, probably, an inadvertent repetition. The Books of Ch were written later than the other parts of the series. The closing vs are the Chronicler's notification to his readers that he has brought up the earlier history to the point at which he had previously begun the narrative in Ezr.

The testimony concerning Ezra and the "men of the Great Synagogue" and Nehemiah and their work on the Scriptures does not deserve the contempt with which some persons treat it. We know nothing concerning the Great Synagogue as an organization, but we know much concerning the succession of men, from Daniel to Simon the Just, who are called the men of the Great Synagogue. The old traditions do not say that Ezra was the founder of the succession, but they make him the typical person in it. Two bits of tradition are not necessarily inconsistent if one attributes work to Ezra which the other attributes to the men of the Great Synagogue. The regulation remark that tradition attributes Biblical work to Ezra and not to Nehemiah is untrue. Nehemiah was one of the men of the Great Synagogue, and prominent as such. He is introduced to us as a handsome boy, a king's favorite, coming to Jerus in 444 BC. In 433 BC he returned to the king. After an unknown interval of time he came back to Judaea, and presumably spent the remainder of his long life there, dying some years or some decades after 400 BC.

The placing of the work of the Ch at the close of the Heb Scriptures is in itself of the nature of testimony.

15. Evidence as to Date and Authorship The men who placed it there testify thereby to their belief that these are the latest writings of the OT aggregate. We are familiar with the testimony of Bābhā' Bathrā' to the effect that most of the later books of the OT were due to the men of the Great Synagogue and to Ezra, but that Nehemiah completed the Books of Ch. We cannot avoid including the Ch among the 22 books which Jos says were written before the death of Artaxerxes Longimanus (Cap, I, 8). Of course the limit of time here really intended by Jos is not the death of Artaxerxes, but the lifetime of men who were contemporary with him—that of Nehemiah, for example. We have already noted the testimony concerning Nehemiah's library (2 Macc 2 13–15). The time when the library was being gathered was the most likely time for it to be used as the Chronicler has used it. Add the recapitulation in Ecclus (44–49), which mentions Nehemiah latest in its list of OT worthies.

Internal marks, also, justify the conclusion that the work of the Chronicler was complete before Nehemiah died. The abundant presence of Pers words and facts, with the absence of Gr words and facts, seems conclusive to the effect that the work was done before the conquests of Alexander rendered the Gr influence paramount. In some of the sections (e.g. Ezr 7 28 ff; Neh passim) Ezra and Nehemiah speak in the first person. The whole work makes the impression of being written up to date. The latest situation in Ch is the same with that in Neh (1 Ch 9; cf Neh 11 3–12 26). The latest event mentioned is the differentiating of the Samaritan schism. A certain enrolment was made (Neh 12 22–26) in the reign of Darius, up to the high-priesthood of Johanan (elsewhere called Jonathan and John), but including Jaddua the son of Johanan in the high-priestly succession. Ezra and Nehemiah were still in office (Neh 12 26). This enrolment naturally connects itself with the expulsion of Jaddua's brother Manasseh for marrying into the family of Sanballat (Neh 13 28; Jos, Ant, XI, 7–8). Jaddua belongs to the fifth generation from Jeshua, who was high priest 538 BC. Jos says that Sanballat held a commission from Darius. He mentions a certain Bagoas, "general of another Artaxerxes' army," as in relations with the high priest John.

Arguments for a later date.—Jos, however, apparently regards the Darius who commissioned Sanballat as the last of the kings of that name, and says that Jaddua was contemporary with Alexander the Great, thus dating the Samaritan schism a little before 331 BC. All scholars reject these statements when they are used for dating the Samaritan schism, but some scholars eagerly accept them for the purpose of proving the late date of the last books of the Heb Bible. The argument never was valid, and it is completely exploded by the Aram. papyri recently discovered in Egypt, which show that Bagoas and the high priest Johanan and the sons of Sanballat were contemporaries in 407 BC, the 17th year of Darius Nothus, and for some years earlier.

Dr. Driver (LOT, ed 1897, 518) expresses an opinion very commonly held concerning the Chronicles: "The only positive clue which the book contains as to the date at which it was composed is the genealogy in 1 Ch 3 17-24, . . . carried down to the sixth generation after Zerubbabel. This would imply a date not earlier than about 350 BC." Turn to the passage and do your own arithmetic on it. Jeconiah was born 614 BC (2 K 24 8). If as an average each of the sons in the succession was born when his father was about 25 years old, that would bring the first birth in the 6th generation from Zerubbabel to about 414 BC, and not 350 BC. This is not an improbable showing.

Dr. Driver suggests, however, that in ver 21 we should follow the Gr reading instead of the Heb. This would give us: "And the sons of Hananiah: Pelatiah, and Jeshaiiah his son, Rephaiah his son, Arnan his son, Obadiah his son, Shecaniah his son." The meaning here is ambiguous. It may be understood to be that each of the six men named after Hananiah was the son of the man named before him (cf vs 10-14, or 1 Ch 6 20-30.50-53); or as counting the six as the sons of Hananiah (cf 3 16; 7 20.21, etc). Understanding it in the first of these two ways the number of generations after Zerubbabel would be increased to eleven. So many generations before the early decades of the 4th cent. BC would be exceptional, though not impossible. But the statement that there were 11 generations is weak, being based on a conjectural interpretation of an unproved text emendation, and standing unconfirmed in opposition to credible proof.

"The Books of Ch are a tendency writing of little historical value"; "a distorted picture in the interest of the later institutions of postexilic Judaism"; "some ancient facts, having fullness and trickled down through oral or written Historicity tradition, are doubtless preserved."

. . . . They are few indeed compared with the products of the imagination, and must be sifted like kernels of wheat from a mass of chaff." These statements, taken at random from the book that happens to be handiest, fairly represent the opinion held by many. They regard the Ch as a fabrication made in the interest of a religious party, a fabrication in which the history has been intentionally falsified.

A principal motive for this opinion is to discredit the testimony of Ch against certain critical theories, the said testimony being more full and detailed than that in S and K and the prophets. But on the whole question the testimony of Ch is to the same effect with that of the other books. The testimony of the other books supports that of the Ch. The discrediting of Ch is part of a theory which denies the historical trustworthiness of practically all parts of the OT and NT.

(1) Alleged proofs of untruthfulness.—Against the Ch it is alleged that they sometimes contradict the older books; but nearly all the instances are capable of satisfactory solution. The large numerals in Ch, for example those concerning the armies of David, Abijah, Jeroboam, Asa, Zerah, Jehoshaphat, Amaziah, Uzziah, are adduced as extravagant and incredible. Most of the difficulty in connection with such numbers, whether in Ch or Ex or Nu or Jgs or S, disappears when we observe that they clearly belong to an artificial way of counting. These numbers are given in even thousands or even hundreds (even fifties or tens in a very few instances), which would not be the case if the hundreds and thousands were merely numerical. It is alleged that the Chronicler views the glories of the past as on a larger scale than that in which they are presented in the earlier books, but this is not uniformly the case. On the basis of these allegations the Chronicler is charged with an extravagance that is inconsistent with sober truthfulness, but this charge follows the fate of the others. It is said that the Chronicler lacked trustworthy sources, but that is a thing to be proved, not taken for granted, and we have seen that it is improbable. It is alleged that the text is in such bad shape as to render the contents unreliable. This may be balanced against the counter conjecture that, since the Books of Ch have not been so often copied as the Books of K, their text is in the transcribed passages to be preferred to that of K. In fine, the reasons alleged against the historicity of Ch dwindle on examination, though there remain some problems that cannot be so easily disposed of.

(2) Truthfulness in the various parts.—Different parts of the Ch have their own separate problems of historicity. Take the genealogies, for example. If anyone had fabricated them, he would not have put them into their present fragmentary form, in which they have no story interest, and are of no direct use to anybody. On the other hand it is reasonable to account for their present form by the hypothesis that the writer used such materials as he had. This hypothesis is not derogatory to the inspiration of the writer. Deity saw fit to have these materials placed in the Scriptures, and to this end He influenced men of different generations through providential leadings and through impulses of the Spirit. No one thinks that the Spirit-guided man who put the genealogies in their final form received them as miraculous revelations. He received them as the product of effort in study—his own efforts and those of his predecessors. He is entitled to be counted as truthful if he used good judgment and fidelity in selecting and recording his materials.

Similar statements would be true in regard to the other statistical matter, and in regard to the many incidents that are mentioned in connection with the genealogies and other matters. To think of them as inventions by the Chronicler is not congruous with human experience. They are too brief and broken to have interest by themselves as stories. You can assign no possible reason that one could have for inventing them. They bear the marks of being genuine antiquarian discoveries. The final writer believed that he had come across facts which would be of interest if put into connection with the history as currently narrated. These matters are much more reasonably accounted for as facts than as inventions. And furthermore, a good many of them, first and last, have been corroborated by exploration. Take, for example, Manasseh's being carried to Babylon by the captains of the king of Assyria, or the account of Uzziah's military greatness (2 Ch 33 11; 26 6 ff), or the references to industries in 1 Ch 4 14-23 (cf PEFS, 1905, 243, 328; or Bible Sidelights from Gezer, 150 ff).

Possibly on a different footing is such a passage as the account of Abijah and Jeroboam (2 Ch 13 3-18). It says that Abijah had 400,000 men and Jeroboam 800,000, of whom 500,000 were slain in the battle. One might plausibly argue that these numbers were intended as a notice to the reader that he is to understand the story, not as fact, but as a work of the imagination, a religious parable, a midrashic narrative sermon, taken from the Midr of Iddo (ver 22). Whether or no one finds this argument convincing, anyone can see that it does not accuse the Books of Ch of being untruthful. If the passage is a parable it is true in the sense in which it was intended to be understood. A similar case is the account of Jehoshaphat's peril from the invading nations and his wonderful rescue (2 Ch 20).

On still a different footing are such narratives as those concerning the bringing up of the ark, the first making of Solomon king, the reforms under Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, Josiah. These are sober narratives, with nothing in them to suggest flights of the imagination. Probably no one doubts that the Chronicler intended them to be understood as historical fact. If one is under bondage to the modern tradition which dates Dt from the time of Josiah and the priestly laws from after the exile, he must needs count these parts of Ch as falsified history; but if he is free from that bondage he will see no strong reason for counting them so.

In fine men are correct when they say that the greatest values of the Books of Ch lie in their availability for vividly illustrating the great truths of religion. They are correct when they assign great value to these books as depicting the ideas of the time when they were written. But they are none the less of great value as repeating from the other Scriptures the outline of the history of the religion of Jeh, and presenting additional material for the filling in of that outline.

LITERATURE.—Among the older commentaries on Ch see that of Keil in the Keil-Delitzsch series, published in Eng. in 1872; that of Zöckler in the Lange series, 1876; that of Barker in the Pulpit Commentary, after 1880. Among more recent works, from the point of view which denies the historicity of Ch, see R. Kittel in the Polychrome Bible, 1895, and Curtis and Masden in the International Critical Commentary, 1910. A brilliant characterization from that point of view is that by Torrey, "The Chronicler as Editor and as Independent Narrator" in AJSL, January, 1909, and subsequent numbers. On the other side see Beecher, Reasonable Biblical Criticism, 1911, chs xviii and xxii; "Is the Chronicler a Veracious Historian?" in Bible Student (October, 1899 and subsequent numbers), is a defense of the historicity. All works on OT Introduction discuss the questions concerning Ch. In view of the many proper names in Ch, such a book as Gray, Studies in Heb Proper Names, has its uses. For the chronological facts, especially in connection with the closing of the OT history, see Beecher, Dated Events of the OT, 1907. For the Egypt papyri see Drei Aramäische Papyrusurkunden aus Elephantine, Sachau, Berlin, 1907, or the Appendix to Toffen, Historic Exodus. Also Sprengling's art. in AJSL, April, 1911. LITERATURE

I. Introductory.—For evident reasons the student of Biblical chronology must meet many difficulties, and must always be severely handicapped. First of all, the OT

1. Difficulties of the Subject is not purely nor intentionally a book of history. Nor does it present a formulated system of chronology, its many numbers and dates being used principally with a view to the spiritual facts and truths with which the authors were concerned. We are not, therefore, to expect to find a perfectly arranged order of periods and dates, though happily for us in our investigation we shall indeed find many accurately dated events, frequent consecutions of events, and orderly successions of officials; as, for example, the numerous genealogical tables, the succession of judges and the lists of kings.

Furthermore, there is not to be found in the OT one particular and definitely fixed era, from which all of its events are dated, as is the case in Christian history. The points of departure, or reckoning, are found to vary in different periods of the advancing history; being at one stage the Creation, at another the migration of Abraham, or the Exodus, or again the disruption of the kingdom. Ordinarily dates and all time-allusions are comparative, i.e. they are related to the reign of some contemporary monarch, as the vision of Isaiah "in the year that king Uzziah died" (Isa 6 1), or to some unusual occurrence, historical or natural, as the great earthquake (Am 1 1; Zec 14 5). Only occasional reference is found to some event, which marks an era-beginning; such as the Exodus (Jgs 11 16, 26; 1 K 6 1).

The general lack of uniformity among writers on Bib. chronology contributes further toward increase of the already perplexing confusion. It is almost possible to say that no two writers agree; and proposed harmonies are with each other most inharmonious. The two arts. on OT chronology in a recent work (Murray, Illus. Bible Dictionary, 1908), for example, are several hundred years apart at certain points. Wide diversity of opinion exists about the most prominent events, such as the call of Abraham and the age of his famous contemporary Hammurabi, the year of the Exodus, and the beginning of Solomon's temple. Naturally there is less variance of opinion about later dates, some of which, e.g. the fall of Samaria and the destruction of Jerus, may be considered as fixed. A like wide range of opinion prevails among archaeologists with regard to events in contemporaneous history, the difference between Goodspeed and Hommel in the dates of early Bab history being five hundred years, and the beginning and extent of the Hyksos period in Egypt varying in different "authorities" by hundreds of years. Nor should the difference in the various and total numbers of the Heb, Samaritan and LXX texts of the pre-Abrahamic ages be left out of sight in any statement of the difficulties attending the discussion of this subject.

These difficulties, and others as serious, have determined the plan of this article. The usual method of development has been to begin with the sources of OT history, and to follow its course downward.

While such a system may have its advantages, there is, however, this serious disadvantage connected with it: that the least certain dates are confessedly those at the beginning of the records, and the use of them at the foundation renders the whole structure of the discussion more or less uncertain. Archaeology and comparative history have done much to fix dates from the Exodus downward, bringing these later cents. by discovery and translation almost into the position of attested history. But the ages before the Exodus, and particularly before Abraham, still lie from the very nature of the case in great obscurity. And thus any system beginning with the indistinct early past, with its compacted numbers and their uncertain interpretation, is much like a chain hung on thin air. The writer purposes, therefore, beginning with certain familiar, important and pivotal dates, to gather around and relate to these the events and persons of the OT. Such accepted dates are: the completion of the Second Temple in 516, the fall of Jerusalem in 586, the fall of Samaria in 721, tribute to Shalmaneser II from Jehu in 842, and from a member of Omri's dynasty in 854. Such OT events as mark the beginning of eras are the Disruption, Solomon's temple, the Exodus and Abraham's Call. The material and the plan, then, almost necessarily require that we begin at the end of the history and work logically backward to the earlier stages, at which we may hope to arrive with firm ground under our feet for the disposition of the more uncertain problems. It is hoped that on this plan the system of chronology will not be mere speculation, nor a personal theory, but of some certainty and affording some assurance in days of wild assertion and free manipulation.

It should be remembered that this is a study of Bible chronology, and therefore full value will be given to the explicit and positive statements of the Bible. Surely the Bible to Be time has come, when all fair-minded men should recognize that a clear and straightforward declaration of the Sacred Scriptures is not to be summarily rejected because of its apparent contradiction by some unknown and irresponsible person, who could stamp clay or chisel stone. It has been all too common that archaeological and critical adventurers have doubted and required accurate proof of every Bible statement, but have been ready enough to give credence to any statement from ancient pagan sources. We assume, as we have every reason to do, the trustworthiness of the Bible records, which have been corroborated in countless instances; and we shall follow their guidance in preference to any other. The help of contemporaneous history and the witness of archaeology can be used to advantage, but should not be substituted for the plain facts of the Scriptures, which are full worthy of our trust and regard. The province of a chronology of the Bible is properly to present in system the dates therein given, with an honest effort to harmonize the difficulties, using the external helps, but ever regardful of Scripture authority and rights.

II. The Ages between the Testaments.—Between the coming of Christ and the end of OT history there lie in round numbers four hundred years. But while these were extra-Biblical ages, they were neither barren nor uneventful years; for in them will be found much of the highest value in the development of Jewish life, and in the preparation for the Messiah. And thus they have their proper place in Bible chronology (see BETWEEN THE TESTAMENTS). The birth of Jesus could not have been later than 4 BC, since Herod the Great died in April of that year. Herod became king of Judaea in 37 BC. Pal had been conquered and Jerus entered by the Romans under Pompey in 56 BC, the Jews coming in this way under the power of Rome. The Rom age was preceded by the government of priest-kings, with which the Idumaeen Antipater became identified by marriage, so that Herod, whom Rome made king, was both Jew and alien.

The period of the Maccabees, which ended in 39 BC with the removal of Antigonus by the Romans in favor of Herod, began 168 BC with Judas. Antipater, who had been appointed procurator of Judaea in 47, was assassinated in 43 BC. The period of the Seleucidæ stretches from its close with the regency of Antiochus VII in 128 back to its founder, Seleucus, 312 BC. The most notable of these monarchs from the Jewish point of view was Antiochus Epiphanes, who reigned from 175 to 164, and in 168 gave occasion to the rise of the Maccabees by his many acts of impiety and oppression, particularly the desecration of the Jerus temple. In 203 BC Antiochus the Great, who had become king of Syria in 223, took Jerus, and later, in 198, annexed Judaea to Syria. Previous to this Judaea had been an Egypt dependency, as after the death of Alexander the Great, 323 BC, and the division of his empire, it had been annexed by Ptolemy Soter to Egypt. Ptolemy Philadelphus, becoming king 280 BC, encouraged the tr of the Heb Scriptures into Gr, the result being the LXX version, and all it meant by way of preparation for the spread of Christianity. Alexander's defeat of Darius III, or Codomannus, at Arbela in 331 brought the Pers empire to an end, fulfilling the long-cherished ambition of the Greeks for mastery of Asia. The long reign of the Biblical king of Persia, Artaxerxes Longimanus, extended from 465 to 424 BC, and in reaching his reign we find ourselves in the region of the OT history. Reversing the order of this brief review and setting out from OT point of view, we have the following table for the cents. between the Testaments:

III. The Persian Period.—Entering now the last period of OT history, which may be called the Pers period, we find that the activities of Ezra, Nehemiah and other Jewish leaders are dated by the regnal years of the kings of Persia (e.g. Hag 1 1; Zec 1 1; Ezr 1 1; Neh 2 1); and consequently the difficulties in the chronology of this period are not great. Recently a fanciful effort has been made to place the events narrated in Esther, Ezra and Nehemiah in the time of the Bab Captivity, claiming Scripture warrant from the occurrence of these names, with Mordecai, in Ezr 2 2 and Neh 7 7; but altogether without success (see Prince of Judah, or Days of Nehemiah Redated). These names were doubtless of common occurrence, and their appearance among those returning with Zerubbabel is not sufficient to affect the historical evidence for the accepted dates of Ezra and Nehemiah. The attempt to move back these dates into the 6th cent., to associate Nehemiah with Daniel and Mordecai and to place his work before Zerubbabel may be dismissed as pure fancy and impossible of reconciliation with the OT narrative.

Artaxerxes I began his reign, which gives date to Ezra and Nehemiah, in 465 BC. In his 7th year, 458, Ezra went from Babylon to Jerus by the king's decree (Ezr 7 7), taking back with him the vessels of the Temple and much besides for the worship at Jerus, accompanied also by a great company of returning Jews. Nehemiah followed from Shushan in the 20th year of the king (Neh 1 1), having heard of and being distressed by the partial failure of Ezra's efforts. Under his wise and courageous leadership, the city walls were speedily restored, and many reforms accomplished. He returned after twelve years (433) to the service of the king in Shushan (Neh 13 6), but in a short time, hearing evil tidings from Jerus, went back to complete his reforms, and apparently spent the rest of his life in that work. Although the Bible is silent, such is the testimony of Jos. The Book of Mal, reflecting the difficulties and evils of this time, is evidently to be placed here, but not with exactness, as it might have been written as early as 460 or as late as 420.

The period from the return under Ezra (458) back to the completion of the Temple in the reign of Darius I (516) is, with the exception of incidental references and the assignment of undated books and incidents, practically a blank. Here belong, we believe, the Book of Est, possibly Mal, some of the Pss, and those social and religious tendencies among the returned exiles, which made the vigorous reforms of Ezra and Nehemiah so necessary. But the OT does not draw the curtain from the mystery of that half-century, that we may know the happenings and watch the development. Beyond this blank we come again to explicit dates. The second temple, begun with the Return under Zerubbabel, was completed in the 6th year of Darius, i.e. 516. The building of it, which had been early abandoned for selfish reasons, was resumed in the 2d year of Darius under the exhortation of the prophets Haggai and Zechariah (Hag 1 1; Zec 1 1). Darius the Great began his reign in 521. Cambyes succeeded Cyrus in 527. Babylon was taken by the Persians in 538, and shortly after the Jews, under the edict of Cyrus, began their return to Jerus, reaching their destination by 536 at the latest. Cyrus overthrew Lydia in 545, the Medes five years earlier, and must have come to the Pers throne not later than 555. His conquest of Asia Minor opened the contest between Persia and Greece for supremacy, to be continued by Darius and Xerxes, resulting finally at Arbela (331) in Gr triumph under Alexander, and the inauguration of a new age.

The table for the Pers period of OT history, following the stream upward, is therefore as follows:

IV. Babylonian Period.—Just preceding the Pers is the Bab period of OT chronology, overlapping, of course, the former, and finally superseded by it in Cyrus' conquest of Babylonia. This period may properly be said to begin with the death in 626 BC of Asshurbanipal, the last great ruler of Assyria. At this time Nabopolassar had been made governor of Babylonia, subject to the supremacy of Assyria. With Asshurbanipal's death Nabopolassar became independent sovereign of Babylonia, and shortly entered into league with the Medes to overthrow the rule of Assyria, and then to divide its empire between them. This was accomplished in the fall of Nineveh (606) which brought the end of the mighty Assyrian empire, the last king being Sinsharishkun (the historic Saracus), a son of Asshurbanipal. Some years before his death in 604 Nabopolassar associated with him on the throne of Babylonia his son Nebuchadnezzar, most illustrious ruler of the new Bab empire, and intimately connected with the history of Judah in the last years of that kingdom. His long reign came to an end in 562.

While the conflict, which brought Assyria to its end, and the attendant confusion, were absorbing the attention of Mesopotamian countries, Egypt under a new and virile dynasty was reviving her ambitions and intrigues for dominion in Asia. Pharaoh-necoh II taking advantage of the confusion and helplessness of Assyria invaded Pal in 609, intending to march on through Pal to attack Mesopotamia. King Josiah in loyalty to his Assyrian overlord opposed him, but was defeated and slain at the battle of Megiddo, after a reign of 31 years; apparently an unnecessary and foolish opposition on Josiah's part, as the plan of Necoh's march shows that Judah was not directly affected. After the victory at Megiddo, Necoh continued his march north-eastward, subduing Syria and hoping to have a hand in Mesopotamian affairs. But in 606 or 607 BC he was defeated at Carchemish and driven back to Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar, fresh from victory over Nineveh. In the same year Nebuchadnezzar marched against Egypt, receiving the submission of Jerus as he passed through Pal, and sending noble hostages back to Babylon, among whom were Daniel and his three friends. The death of his father and his endangered succession recalled Nebuchadnezzar suddenly to Babylon, where he became sole ruler in 604. It appears that Necoh must have returned to Egypt after Megiddo and before the battle of Carchemish, as he made Jehoiaquim king in place of Jehoahaz, whom he carried captive to Egypt. Nebuchadnezzar's victory at Carchemish and his march southward brought Judah in close relations with Babylon, and opened up the dramatic chapter of Jerusalem's fall and exile. These historic events fix the dates of the last kings and the closing incidents of the kingdom of Judah, as shown in the following table:

V. Assyrian Period and Judah after Fall of Samaria.—This section, which may for convenience be treated as a division, is the chronology of Judah under Assyria after the fall of the Northern Kingdom in 721. As the Scripture time-references are frequent and explicit, and the contemporaneous Assyrian records are full, and explicit also, the problems of this period are neither many nor insoluble. One difficulty is found in the fact that the aggregate years of the reigns of Hezekiah, Manasseh, Amon and Josiah fall one or two years short of the period between Hezekiah's accession in 726 and Josiah's death in 609. But there is evidence of anarchical conditions at the close of Amon's reign (2 K 21 23.24), and it is probable that at least a year should be counted for the interregnum. The chief difficulty is with the invasions of Sennacherib in Hezekiah's reign. The confusion is caused by the apparent dating of Sennacherib's famous and disastrous invasion of 701 in the 14th year of Hezekiah's reign (2 K 18 13). Various attempts at reconciliation have been made; one attempt has been to place the beginning of Hezekiah's reign in 715, which is out of the question entirely, as it disregards the exact terms in which the beginning of his reign is placed before the fall of Samaria (2 K 18 10). Another suggestion has been that "24th" be read instead of "14th"; but this is pure conjecture. There is a simple and satisfactory solution: in the chapters which contain the record (2 K 18 and Isa 36) it is evident that two invasions are described. Frequently in the Scriptures records are topical rather than chronological, and just so in this instance the topic is Sennacherib's menace of Judah, and the ultimate deliverance by Jeh. The story includes two invasions: the first in the 14th year of Hezekiah (713) when Sennacherib led the armies of his father Sargon, the end of which, so far as Jerus was concerned, was the payment of tribute by Hezekiah, as is accurately stated in 2 K 18 16. The second invasion, the description of which begins with the following ver (17), was the more serious, and is probably identified as that of 701, when Sennacherib had become king. The necessary insertion of a paragraph indicator between vs 16 and 17 satisfies every demand for harmony.

From 609 BC, the year of Josiah's death, we count back 31 years to the beginning of his reign in 639; he attained his majority in the 8th year (632; 2 Ch 34 3); the reformation in his 12th year, at the time of the Scythian irruption, would fall in 628 (2 Ch 34 3); in the following year Jeremiah began to prophesy; and in Josiah's 18th year (621) the temple was cleansed and the Book of the Law found (2 Ch 34 8). Allowing a year of confusion, Amon began his short reign in 642, and Manasseh his long reign of 55 years in 697, Hezekiah's reign of 29 years dating back to 726. Some fixed important dates of contemporaneous history are: death of Assurbanipal, Assyria's last great king, in 626, with the consequent independence of Babylon and beginning of the 2d Bab empire.

Assurbanipal's long reign began in 668 on the death of his father Esarhaddon; who succeeded his father Sennacherib in 681. Sargon usurped the Assyrian throne in 722, and died in 705. Shalmaneser IV, successor of Tiglath-pileser III, reigned for the brief space between 727 and 722. In Egypt the XXVth, or Ethiopian Dynasty, was in power from cir 720 to 667, two of its kings, So and Tirhakah, having mention in the OT (2 K 17 4; 19 9; Isa 37 9), and after this the XXVIth (a native) Dynasty appeared, Pharaoh-necho being one of its kings. The dates of this period we may summarize in the following table:

VI. Period of Divided Kingdom.—The most complex, but most interesting, problems of OT chronology are found in the period of the Divided Kingdom. In the lit. of this period are found a larger number of dates and historical references than in that of any other. We have the assistance of several important sources and factors in arranging these dates: (1) The || records of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah serve as checks to each other, since the accession and death of the kings in each nation are fixed by reference to reigns of those of the other. Many other events are similarly related. (2) The history of the two kingdoms, or parts of it, at least, is given in three || authorities: the Books of K, of Ch, and of the Prophets. (3) The Assyrian records are fullest and are practically continuous in this period, the limu lists extending unbroken from 893 to 650 BC.

But while this apparently should be the most satisfactory field for the chronologist, it has been found impossible to arrive at anything

1. Causes of Variation in Systems approaching certainty, and consequently there is considerable divergence among individuals and schools.

One cause of variation is the difference between the Assyrian royal lists and the total of the OT numbers for this period, the OT aggregate being 51 years greater than the Assyrian lists. Two common methods of harmonizing this difference have been adopted: (1) to accept the OT aggregate as correct and to assume that the 51 years have been omitted from the Assyrian lists (see W. J. Beecher, Dated Events of OT, 18, 19); (2) to harmonize the OT numbers with the Assyrian lists by taking into account the overlapping of reigns of kings who were, for brief periods, associated on the throne. Instances of such overlapping are the co-regency of Uzziah and Jotham in Judah (2 K 15 5), and possibly the reign of Pekah contemporaneously with Menahem and Pekahiah in Israel (2 K 15 23-28). The latter method yields the most satisfactory results, and will be adopted in this article. The chief point of difference will be the age of Solomon and the foundation-laying of the Temple. This may be found according to the former method by adding 51 years to the dates as given below. That the method of following the aggregate of the OT numbers must assume arbitrarily that there have been omissions from the Assyrian lists, and that it also must resort to some overlapping and adjustment of the numbers as they are given in the text, are sufficient reasons against its adoption. And in meeting the difficulties of this period it should always be borne in mind that the OT is not a book of annals merely, and that dates are given not for any special interest in them, but to correlate and emphasize events. Ordinarily dates are given with reference to local situations and contemporary persons, and not as fixed by some great epoch-marking event; e.g. Uzziah's reign is fixed not with reference to the Disruption nor the Temple building, but by relation to his Israelite contemporary, Jeroboam II.

However, there are some fixed dates, which are so by reason of their international significance, and upon these we may rest with reasonable assurance. Such are the fall of Samaria (721 BC); the accession of Tiglath-pileser III (745); tribute paid to Shalmaneser II by Jehu in 842, and by Ahab, or one of his dynasty, in 854; and the invasion of Judah by Pharaoh-shishak in the fifth year of Rehoboam (1 K 14 25). There are also certain coincident dates, fixed with fair accuracy, in the history of the two kingdoms, which serve both as starting-points and as checks upon each other. The most prominent of these are: the beginning of Hezekiah's reign, 5 years before the fall of Samaria (2 K 18 10); the synchronism of the reigns of Jeroboam II and Jotham (1 Ch 5 17), Jotham's accession being used as a basis of calculation for the reigns of Israelite kings (2 K 15 30); the coincidence of the end of the Omri Dynasty and the death of Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 9), Jehu and Athaliah therefore beginning their reigns at the same time; and, primarily, the division of the kingdom and the synchronous beginning of the reigns of Jeroboam I and Rehoboam. Using these fixed dates and coincidences, we must find the summaries of the reigns of Israelite and Jewish kings between 721, the 9th year of Hoshea and the 6th of Hezekiah, and 843, the beginning of the reigns of Jehu and Athaliah, to be 122 years each; and likewise the summaries from 843 back to the Disruption to be the same.

The most serious difficulties are found near the end of the period, when conditions in the Northern Kingdom were becoming anarchical, and, also evident coregencies, the extent of which is not evident, occurred in the Southern Kingdom. Pekah is said to have reigned 20 years (2 K 15 27); and yet Menahem paid tribute to Assyria in 738, and he was succeeded for two years by his son Pekahiah, from whom Pekah seized the kingdom. This would allow Pekah only 6 years of sovereignty. The explanation lies in the context: in the confusion which followed the death of Jeroboam, Pekah established his authority over the section E. of the Jordan, and to that year the numbers in 2 K 15 27-32; 2 K 16 1 refer. Uzziah was leprous the last 16 years of his life, and Jotham his son was over the kingdom (2 K 15 5). The length of Jotham's reign was just 16 years, not additional to the 16 of the coregency, as this would result in the absurdity of making him coregent at the age of 9 years (2 K 15 33). Therefore nearly his whole reign is included in the 52 years of his father. For some reason Ahaz was associated with his father Jotham before the death of the latter, since the 16 years of his reign plus the 5 of Hezekiah before the fall of Samaria bring his accession before the death of Uzziah and Jotham, i.e. in 741. So that for approximately 6 years the three reigns were contemporaneous. That these 6 years may not be accounted for by a coregency with Hezekiah at the other end of Ahaz' reign is evident from the age of Hezekiah at his accession (2 K 18 2), and from the radical difference in the policy of the two kings. Isa 7 1 may suggest that Uzziah and Jotham died about the same time, and that Ahaz was regarded as succeeding both directly.

Another difficulty is found at the beginning of Uzziah's reign, where he is said to have succeeded his father Amaziah at the age of 16, but is also said to have accomplished certain notable things after his father's death (2 K 14 21-22). Evidently, then, he became king before the death of Amaziah. When did this coregency begin? No better time is suggested than Amaziah's ignominious defeat by Jehoash of Israel in the 15th year of his reign, after which the people arose and put Uzziah in his place, Amaziah living on for 15 years (2 K 14 17), so that 15 of Amaziah's 29 years were contemporaneous with Uzziah. Further, in the last years of Joash of Judah there may have been a coregency, since he was "very sick" in those years (2 Ch 24 25). Thus the totals of 146 years for the reigns of the kings of Israel and of 165 for the reigns of the kings of Judah between 721 and 842 are reduced to the actual 121 by the overlappings, which are suggested in the narrative itself.

For the first division of this period, from the rise of Jehu, cir 843, to the division of the kingdom, the totals of the reigns of the kings of

4. Over- Israel is 98 years, and of the kings of lappings Judah is 95. But there must be some overlappings. The interval between Ahab and Jehu, as shown by mention of them in the Assyrian records, is 12 years; but the two sons of Ahab reigned 14 years, Ahaziah 2 and Jehoram 12. Evidently the last year of Ahab, in which came the defeat at Karkar, was the 1st of Ahaziah, and the 2d of Ahaziah, who suffered in that year serious accident (2 K 1 2), was the first of Jehoram. It is probable that the long reign of Asa closed with Jehoshaphat as coregent (1 K 15 23), so the above totals of both kingdoms must be reduced to some extent, probably to 90 years, and the disruption of the kingdom placed about 933 BC. Shishak, founder of the XXII^d Dynasty, invaded Pal in the 5th year of Rehoboam (1 K 14 25), and in, or shortly before, the 21st year of his own reign, so that he must have become sovereign of Egypt about 950 BC. Jeroboam fled to Egypt after Solomon had reigned more than 20 years, as is shown by the connection of Jeroboam with the building of Millo; and so Jeroboam's flight must have been about the beginning of Shishak's reign. This is in accord with the OT records, since the hostile Shishak Dynasty must have arisen in the reign of Solomon, the dynasty which was ruling at the beginning of his reign having been in alliance with him. So we place the accession of Shishak about 950, his invasion of Judah in 929, and the Disruption in 933 BC.

An interesting instance of coregency in this period is that of Jehoshaphat and Jehoram, for while Ahaziah of Israel began to reign in the 17th year of Jehoshaphat (1 K 22 51) and died in the 2d year of Jehoram (2 K 1 17), the year of his death since the precocious Jewish sovereigns attained their majority at 15 years of age (cf 2 Ch 34 3). The coregency for 2 years of Joash and Amaziah (2 Ch 24 25) brings the aggregate years of the reigns of the kings of both kingdoms down to the accession of Jeroboam II, three years before Uzziah's accession, into exact accord. Finally, the difference of three years in the totals of reigns in was also the 18th of Jehoshaphat, so that the father and son reigned together about 5 years. It is evident also that Jehoshaphat ruled before his father's death, as the total of his reign is counted from the coregency's beginning (1 K 22 41), but certain events are dated from his sole reign on the death of Asa (1 K 22 51; 2 K 3 1). It is probable that the 6 years of Athaliah were included in the 40 years of the reign of Joash, the legitimate king. The age of his son, Amaziah, at his accession (2 Ch 25 1) does not operate against this probability, the two kingdoms from Jehu to the Disruption is explained by the fact that in Israel the first year of a king was coincident with the last of his predecessor, whereas in Judah, certainly at the beginning of this period, the first year of a king followed the death of his predecessor; e.g. while Asa began to reign in the 20th year of Jeroboam (1 K 15 9), Jeroboam, who reigned 22 years, died three years later in the second year of Asa (1 K 15 25). Observation of this principle in the accessions of the first three kings after Jeroboam removes the difference, the long numbers of the reign of Asa being found to corroborate. The preceding table will illustrate these facts of the records, as harmonizing the dates of the two contemporaneous kingdoms.

VII. From the Disruption to the Exodus.—The period now to be considered extends from the disruption of the kingdom back to the Exodus. The reasons for combining the Biblical events within these widely separated dates into one period of such length are evident, viz. (1) the regular sequence of the history; (2) the occurrence of comprehensive numbers for the period as a whole, e.g. Jgs 11 26 and 1 K 6 1; the chronological data of the Book of Jgs, which lead directly up to the developments in the time of the united kingdom, e.g. the narrative of Ruth preparing the way for the reign of David. Characteristic of this period is the frequent occurrence of the general numbers 80, 40 and 20, which (Acts 13 21), are given as 40 years each; and here there may be some overlapping, Solomon, e.g. becoming king before David's death (1 K 1 43-48). We are rather surprised to find that there is no statement of the length of Samuel's ministry, such as its important place in the national life would lead us to expect. The probable reason for this is that his life was paralleled largely by the reign of Saul and the administration of Eli. A period of 40 years is assigned to Eli (1 S 4 18); the aggregate of numbers given for the Judges is 410 years; Joshua ruled for 40 years (Jgs 2 8); and finally the wilderness wanderings covered another 40-year period. The sum total of all these numbers is 670—far beyond the comprehensive reckonings of Jgs 11 26; 1 K 6 1, and Acts 13 19. It is evident from Jgs 10 7.8; 13 1 that the periods of Ammonite and Philist oppression were either con-are not necessarily to be taken always as exact, but possibly at times indicating a round, or generation, number. In order to get the time limits of this period, it is necessary to count back 37 years from the end of Solomon's reign in 933 BC, and this brings us to that epoch-marking event, the laying of the foundations of the Temple in 969 or 970, the 4th year of his reign (1 K 6 1); and from this event we are brought by the addition of the comprehensive number 479, given in the same verse, back to the year of the Exodus, approximately 1448 BC, making the total length of the period about 516 years.

But the addition of the numbers given for the various reigns and administrations of the period yields a total which is much greater than 516, and therefore one must seek of Over-lapping in the text indications of overlapping which will bring the narrative into harmony with itself. The reigns of Solomon (1 K 11 42), David (1 K 2 11) and Saul temporaneous or very near together, and therefore that the comprehensive number, 300 years, of Jgs 11 26, reaches from the entrance into Canaan under Joshua down to the age of Samson, as well as of Jephthah. The administrations of Ibzan, Elon and Abdon (Jgs 12 8-13) should then be regarded as practically synchronous with Jephthah and Samson, and the number of their years should, in part at least, be left out of account. The numbers from Samson and Eli to Solomon are approximately fixed, 20 to Samson, 40 to Eli, 40 to Saul and 40 to David; and their total accords with the 300 before Jephthah, and the 40 of wilderness wanderings in making up the grand total (1 K 6 1) from Solomon to the Exodus. This proportion before and after Jephthah, or Samson, and the Philist oppression, approximately 330 and 150 years, is in agreement with the genealogies of Ruth 4 18-22; 1 S 14 3; 22 9; 1 Ch 2 6, 24. The shortening therefore of the excessive aggregate of 670 years must be sought in the records from Samson back to Joshua. Assuming that the oppressions may be synchronous with the administrations of preceding or succeeding judges, that Abimelech's abortive attempt to become king (Jgs 9) should be included in Gideon's 40 years, and that parallelisms are possible in the three judges just after Jephthah (Jgs 12 8-13) and the two just before (Jgs 10 1-5), it is possible to bring the detailed time-references of the Books of Jgs into satisfactory agreement with the comprehensive numbers. That the period of the Judges is shorter than the aggregate of the numbers assigned to each is further indicated by the manner in which the brief narratives at the end of the book—the migration of the Danites, the sin and punishment of Benjamin—and the Book of Ruth, bring the earlier generations into close touch with the later; cf the genealogy of David (Ruth 4 18-22).

The preceding table (p. 641) shows the dates of events according to the longer reckoning, and also according to the suggested shortening by taking into account the possible synchronisms. It should be remembered that these figures are not indisputable, but merely tentative and suggestive.

VIII. From the Exodus to the Birth of Abraham.

—The period of OT chronology now to receive our attention is that which extends from the Exodus in cir 1448 BC back to the call and migration of Abraham. This may be called the period of the patriarchal wanderings, the formative or infancy period of the nation, and therefore of the highest interest historically and religiously. But it is not possible to fix its dates with indisputable accuracy, since, with rare exceptions, the events of the OT record are not related in their narration to eras or definite persons of the contemporary nations; and since also the chronology of these nations is much in dispute among historians and archaeologists, with variations of hundreds of years.

The chief points at issue here for determination of the chronological problems are the time of the

Main

Points at Issue

Exodus, the duration of Israel's sojourn in Egypt and the date of Hammurabi. Considering these in their order: (1) As to the Exodus, opinions have been divided among the XVIIIth, XIXth and XXth dynasties as the time of the Oppression and Exodus of Israel, and there are plausible arguments for, and serious objections to, each of these periods. When all things have been considered it seems best to fix upon the XVIIIth Dynasty as the age of the Oppression and Exodus, Thothmes III as the Pharaoh of the Oppression, and the years immediately following his death as the time of the Exodus, for the following reasons: (a) This is in harmony with the time-reckoning from the Temple of Solomon back to the Exodus (1 K 6 1), and fully satisfies the Biblical numbers for the intervening period, as shown above; while either later dynastic period would necessitate either unnatural cramping or ruthless rejection of the Biblical numbers. To place the Exodus so late as Ramses III, after 1200 BC, is in the light of the Biblical reckoning an evident absurdity. (b) In the XVIIIth Dynasty we can look best for the Pharaoh "that knew not Joseph," as it was the leader of this dynasty, Ahmes I, who conquered and drove out the Hyksos, and left to his followers as a legacy cordial hatred of the Asiatics. (c) Thothmes III was a great builder, and the heavy tasks of the Hebrews would fit well into his reign. He was also the champion of Amon, the god of Thebes, having been a priest of that god; therefore the religious significance of the Exodus and the struggle preceding it were most natural in his age. (d) An inscription of Menephthah, son of Ramses II, indicates that Israel was in Pal in his time, therefore he could not have been the Pharaoh of the Exodus, nor his father the oppressor. (e) The objection that Pharaohs of the XIXth and XXth dynasties invaded and claimed sovereignty over Pal is of little consequence, since these invasions usually involved only the sea-plain, and any city or district might secure immunity and maintain its status quo by payment of tribute. In later cents. many foreign invasions swept through Israel without disturbing the national integrity. As for the objection that the cities Ramses and Pithom indicate the age of Ramses II, it is altogether probable that they were built long before his time, and only restored by him. For these reasons the earlier date is assigned to the Exodus. (2) Whether the duration of the sojourn in Egypt was 430 or 215 years will depend upon the interpretation of the comprehensive 430, or roundly 400, which is of frequent occurrence in the Bible as indicating the extent of the period of the Hebrews' wanderings among, and oppression by, the nations (Gen 15 13; Ex 12 40; Acts 7 6; Gal 3 17). These passages have been, and may properly be, interpreted as indicating the time of the actual sojourn in Egypt, or the time from the entrance of Abraham into Canaan to the Exodus. Modern archaeological discoveries and the logical conclusions from them, our better knowledge of the history and conditions of contemporaneous Egypt, the shortening of the Hyksos period, as by Meyer, Mahler and Breasted, and the acceptance of a later date for Hammurabi, all seem to favor the shorter, or 215-year, view of the sojourn. The remaining 215 years cover the period from Jacob's descent into Egypt back to the migration of Abraham. The shorter period is adopted here for the reasons already given; but by the addition of 215 the dates from the death of Joseph backward may be conformed to the theory of the longer period. (3) Accepting the almost universal and well-grounded judgment that the Amraphel of Gen 14 is the famous Hammurabi of the 1st Bab Dynasty, we should have assistance in determining the date of his Biblical contemporary Abraham, if the opinions of scholars about the age of Hammurabi were not so divergent. Goodspeed (Hist. Bab. and Assyr.) places his reign at 2297-2254 BC; Hommel (art. on "Babylonia," HDB) fixes the probable date at 1772-1717, an astonishing divergence of 500 years, and suggestive of the spendthrift manner in which chronologists are accustomed to dispose of the past ages of man. The difference in this instance is caused by the disposition of the 12d Bab Dynasty, Goodspeed making its more than 360 years follow the Hammurabi Dynasty, and adding the years of the two; Hommel on the other hand regarding the 12d, or Southern, Dynasty as contemporaneous with the 1st, or Northern. But it is more probable that the truth lies between these extremes, since the 12d Dynasty must have had some independent standing, and must have ruled alone for a time, in order to secure consideration as a dynasty. This moderate reckoning is now commonly adopted, Breasted placing Hammurabi at 1900 BC, Davis (in DB) about 1975, and Pinches (in Murray's Illus. B. Dict.) later than 2000 BC. It is in accord with the Bible numbers, as the following table shows, and does not vary materially from the reckoning of Ussher, which was based upon those numbers. Therefore the age of Hammurabi and Abraham may be considered as about 1900 BC, or 2100, if one estimates the sojourn in Egypt at 430 years. The former is more reasonable. The Am Tab, preserving correspondence of the 14th and 15th cents. between the Pharaohs of the XVIIIth Dynasty and Pal and Babylon, by showing the contemporary sovereigns of the empires of the Nile and the Euphrates, contribute confirmation to the Biblical reckoning. It is possible that increased knowledge of the Hittite empire and its dealings with Egypt, Pal and Bab may in the near future contribute further confirmation. The foregoing conclusions may be summarized in the following table:

IX. From Abraham to the Creation.—One other general period of OT chronology remains for consideration: from the age of Abraham back to the creation of the world, about which in the nature of the case there can be no absolute certainty, and in which there is neither reason nor need for inflexible accuracy. The system, or succession, of numbers in the early chapters of Gen (5 and 11 10-26) has given rise, in the effort to explain these numbers, to several theories.

(1) The literal interpretation, the best known advocate of which was Archbishop Ussher (d. 1656), whose literal arrangement was introduced into the margin of the AV after his death. This theory takes the birth- and death-numbers just as they are, and by addition of the time intervals between the birth of the various patriarchs, together with Adam's age at the birth of Seth, shows that 1,656 years elapsed from the Creation to the Flood, and 290 years from the Flood to Abraham's birth, according to the MT. But it must be apparent at the very outset, that, on the most liberal arrangement of the numbers and the most conservative geological and anthropological estimate, this reckoning is not sufficiently long to satisfy the known facts of the age of the earth, of the life of man upon the earth, and of established historic dates. Even the conservative system of Professor Breasted (Anc. Egypt) places the first certain date of Egypt history, viz. the introduction of the Sothic calendar, as early as 4241 BC, which is more than two cents. beyond Ussher's beginning of the world. Moreover, at that time an astronomical basis of reckoning time was in existence, implying an age of culture already gone before. This difficulty was appreciated by the earliest interpreters, as indicated by the variations of the Sam and LXX texts, the latter increasing the total of the age about 1,500 years and inserting a new name into the genealogical list of Gen 11. An interesting commentary on the literal method is that it makes Noah live until Abraham was seventy years old, and prolongs the life of Shem to within the lifetime of Jacob.

(2) A second theory is the dynastic: that the long number of a patriarch's lifetime indicates the era during which his house or dynasty prevailed, to be followed by the long number of the next dynasty; e.g. the 930 years of Adam were followed by the 912 of Seth, and so on until the period is stretched to cover thousands of years. But there are evident objections to this view: it does not account for the invariable origin of each succeeding dynasty so near the beginning of its predecessor, and it disregards the manifest plan of the inspired author to narrate the descent of the human race through families and not by eras or empires.

(3) By others it has been conjectured that the units of time have been different in the ancient ages of man; that originally the time-unit was the lunar cycle, by which the 969 lunar cycles of Methuselah's life really should be reduced to a little more than 80 years of more recent times; and that in the days of Abraham a year measured from equinox to equinox had superseded the lunar time-measurement. It is possible that the LXX variations were based upon this idea, since it increased the age at which every father begat a son to at least 162 in the generations before the Flood. But even this expedient would not remove all difficulties from the physical side; nor have we the slightest indication of the points at which these radical changes of the time-units were made. On the contrary the decrease of man's years seems to have come by somewhat gradual process, and not by sharp and tremendous breaks.

(4) Others have thought to meet the difficulties by suggesting the omission of links in the chain of descent, in accordance with Heb custom of omitting inconsequential names from a genealogical list. The omission by Matthew of certain names from his genealogy of Jesus Christ, in order to preserve his symmetrical scheme of fourteens (Mt 1 8), is an illustration in point. As corroborative of this it might be urged that the LXX does insert a name between Arpachshad and Shelah (Gen 11 12). It may be said confidently that whatever theory of the genealogies before Abraham one may adopt, it is altogether reasonable to suppose that one name, or many, may have been omitted from the line of descent.

The dates resulting from the literal and exact interpretation of the genealogical lists of Gen 5 and 11 may be tabulated as follows:

Death of Eber.....	1716 BC
Death of Shem.....	1745
Death of Shelah.....	1777
Death of Arpachshad.....	1806
Death of Terah.....	1820

Birth of Mahalaleel.....	3506
Birth of Kenan.....	3576
Birth of Enosh.....	3666
Birth of Seth.....	3771
Creation of Adam.....	3901

If the 130 years of Kainan, whom the LXX inserts between Shelah and Arpachshad, be added, the date for Adam's creation is increased to 4031 BC. The exhibit of this table is most interesting and suggestive. Noah, Shem, Arpachshad, Shelah, Eber, Peleg were contemporaries of Abraham. Shem, Shelah and Eber were living after Jacob's birth. Adam, Enoch, Methuselah and Lamech were contemporary; and Methuselah's long life came to an end in the year of the Flood.

These genealogical lists of the early chapters of Gen appear therefore not to have been given as an exact and exclusive system of chronology; but it is more probable that they were written to present a general, compact, or mere outline statement of the origin, early experience and apostasy of the human race, given without the purpose of recording every possible link in the chain of descent, or every incident in the early racial experience. There are many indications, or suggestions at least, that this is the sensible and Divinely intended interpretation, some of which have been stated: the variant items and summaries of the MT, LXX and Sam; the frequent omission in Heb genealogies of one or more generations, the third, or later, descendant being truly regarded as a son; the age of the world; the comparative antiquity of man; and the more ancient dates disclosed by archaeology. It should be noticed further that the inspired writer gives ten generations from Adam to the Flood, and ten also from the Flood to Abraham, as if by the use of the decimal, or representatively human, number he would indicate to us that he is dealing with comprehensively complete numbers and not with those that are minutely complete, arranging in symbolic form the account of man's descent. See ANTEDILUVIAN PATRIARCHS.

But while the age of man may be greater than the mechanical and exact sum of the Gen numbers, we should not be deluded into the belief that it is so great as some anthropologists and geologists, who are prodigal of their numbers, would have us think. The numbers of Gen are much nearer the facts than these dreary stretches and wastes of time. The formation of the Nile and the Euphrates valleys, which furnished historic man's first home, is quite recent, possibly not antedating 7000 BC; the account of the Flood is the record of a great cataclysm which came upon historic man within these millennia; we have the records of the presence of intelligent man in these fertile and recently formed centers without traces of his origin and development in, and movement from, other homes. Archaeology and ancient history bring civilized man upon us with somewhat of suddenness, well established in homelands of recent formation. Whence came these peoples whose great works and thoughts are found near the beginning of an era so clearly limited by history and geography? If they came from elsewhere and developed tediously, why have they left no trail of their movement and no trace of the evolution? So late as the 3d millennium BC Mesopotamia was sparsely settled, and Pal in the first half of the 2d millennium was still thinly settled. It is a legitimate conclusion, then, that intelligent man's life on the earth does not extend far beyond the total of the Bible numbers (see ANTEDILUVIANS; DELUGE). At the same time it is far from necessary to force a literal and exact interpretation on these numbers, which were given rather to trace lineage, keep relationships, show development under the Divine purpose, and fix responsibility, than to mark particular years.

The current Christian era is reckoned from the birth of Jesus and is based upon the calculations of Dionysius (6th cent.). Subsequent investigation has shown that the Dionysian date is at least four years too late. Several eras were in use in the time of Jesus; but of these only the Varronian will be used coordinately with the Dionysian in the discussion of the chronology of the life of Jesus, 753 A.U.C. being synchronous with 1 BC and 754 A.U.C. with 1 AD.

I. Chronology of the Life of Jesus.—Jesus was born before the death of Herod the Great (Mt 2 1 ff) at the time of a census or enrol-

1. Birth of Jesus ment made in the territory of Herod in accordance with a decree of Augustus when Quirinius (RV, Cyrenius AV) was exercising authority in the Rom province of Syria (Lk 2 1 f). At the time of Jesus' birth a star led the Magi of the East to seek in Jerus the infant whom they subsequently found in Bethlehem (Mt 2 1 ff). John the Baptist was six months older than Jesus (Lk 1 36) and he was born in the days of Herod (Lk 1 5; cf 2 1) after his father, Zacharias, of the priestly course of Abijah, had been performing the functions of his office in the temple.

(1) Death of Herod.—The death of Herod the Great occurred in the spring of 750/4.* He ruled from his appointment in Rome 714/40 (Ant, XIV, xiv, 4-5, in the consulship of Caius Domitius Calvinus and Caius Asinius Pollio) 37 years, and from his accession in Jerus after the capture of the city 717/37 (Ant, XIV, xvi, 1-3; BJ, I, xvii, 9; I, xviii, 1-3; Dio Cassius xlix.22; cf. Schürer, GJV³, I, 358, n. 11) 34 years (Ant, XVII, xviii, 1; BJ, I, xxxiii, 7-8; cf Schürer, op. cit., I, 415, n. 167 where it is shown that Jos reckons a year too much, probably counting from Nisan 1 and including partial years). Just before Herod's death there was an eclipse of the moon (Ant, XVII, vi, 4). According to astronomical calculations an eclipse was visible in Pal on March 23 and September 15, 749/5, March 12, 750/4, and January 9, 753/1. Of these the most probable is that of March 12, 750/4. Soon after the eclipse Herod put to death his son Antipater and died five days later (Ant, XVII, vii; BJ, I, xxxiii, 7). Shortly after Herod's death the Passover was near at hand (Ant, XVII, vi, 4-ix, 3). In this year Passover (Nisan 15) fell on April 11; and as Archelaus had observed seven days of mourning for his father before this, Herod's death would fall between March 17 and April 4. But as the 37th (34th) year of his reign was probably reckoned from Nisan 1 or March 28, his death may be dated between March 28 and April 4, 750/4.

This date for Herod's death is confirmed by the evidence for the duration of the reigns of his three sons. Archelaus was deposed in 759/6 (Dio Cassius lv.27 in the consulship of Aemilius Lepidus and Lucius Arruntius) in the 10th year of his reign (Ant, XVII, xiii, 2; cf BJ, II, vii, 3 which gives the year as the 9th). Antipas was deposed most probably in the summer of 792/39 (Ant, XVIII, vii, 1-2; cf XVIII, vi, 11; XIX, viii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 6; Schürer, op. cit., I, 448, n. 46 and 416, n. 167). There are coins of Antipas from his 43d year (Madden, Coins of the Jews, 121 ff). The genuineness of a coin from the 44th year is questioned by Schürer but accepted by Madden. The coin from the 45th year is most probably spurious (Schürer, op. cit., I, 417, n. 167). Philip died after reigning 37 years, in the 20th year of Tiberius—August 19, 786/33-787/34 (Ant, XVIII, iv, 6). There is also a coin of Philip from his 37th year (Madden, op. cit., 126). Thus Archelaus, Antipas and Philip began to reign in 750/4.

(2) Census of Quirinius.—The census or enrolment, which, according to Lk 2 1 f, was the occasion of the journey of Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem where Jesus was born, is connected with a decree of Augustus embracing the Gr-Rom world. This decree must have been carried out in Pal by Herod and probably in accordance with the Jewish method—each going to his own city—rather than the Rom —each going to his own city—rather than the Rom (Dig. 15, 4, 2; Zumpt, Das Geburtsjahr Christi, 195; Kenyon, Greek Papyri in the British Museum, III, * 124 f; Schürer, Theol. Ztg, 1907, 683 f; and on the other hand, Ramsay, Expositor, 1908, I, 19, n.). Certainly there is no intimation of an insurrection such as characterized a later census (Acts 5 37; Ant, XVIII, i, 1; BJ, II, xvii, 7; cf Tac. Ann. vi.41; Livy Epit. cxxxvi, cxxxvii; Dessau, Inscrip. lat. Sel. no. 212, col. ii, 36) and this may have been due in no small measure to a difference in method. Both Jos and Luke mention the later census which was made by Quirinius on the deposition of Archelaus, together with the insurrection of Judas which accompanied it. But while Jos does not mention the Herodian census—although there may be some intimation of it in Ant, XVI, ix, 3; XVII, ii, 4; cf. Sandelemente, De vulg. aerae emend., 438 f; Ramsay, *Was Christ Born at Beth.*¹, 178 ff—Luke carefully distinguishes the two, characterizing the census at the time of Jesus' birth as "first," i.e. first in a series of enrolments connected either with Quirinius or with the imperial policy inaugurated by the decree of Augustus. The Gr-Rom writers of the time do not mention this decree and later writers (Cassiodor, Isidor and Suidas) cannot be relied upon with certainty as independent witnesses (Zumpt, Geburtsjahr, 148 ff). Yet the geographical work of Agrippa and the preparation of a brevarium totius imperii by Augustus (Tac. Ann. i.11; Suet. Aug. 28 and 101; Dio Cassius liii.30; lvi.33; cf Mommsen, Staatsrecht, II, 1025, n. 3), together with the interest of the emperor in the organization and finances of the empire and the attention which he gave to the provinces (Marquardt, Röm. Staatsverwaltung, II, 211 f; cf 217), are indirectly corroborative of Luke's statement. Augustus himself conducted a census in Italy in 726/28, 746/8, 767/14 (Mommsen, Res Ges., 34 ff) and in Gaul in 727/27 (Dio Cassius liii.22, 5; Livy Epit. cxxxiv) and had a census taken in other provinces (Pauly-Wissowa, Realencyc., s.v. "Census," 1918 f; Marquardt, op. cit., II, 213). For Egypt there is evidence of a regular periodic census every 14 years extending back to 773/20 (Ramsay, op. cit., 131 ff; Grenfell and Hunt, Oxy. Papyri, II, 207 ff; Wilcken, Griech. Ostraka, I, 444 ff) and it is not improbable that this procedure was introduced by Augustus (Schürer, op. cit., I, 515). The inference from Egypt to similar conditions in other provinces must indeed be made cautiously (Wilcken, op. cit., 449; Marquardt, op. cit., 441); yet in Syria the regular tributum capitis seems to imply some such preliminary work (Dig. I, 15, 3; Appian, Syr., 50; Marquardt, op. cit., II, 200, n. 2; Pauly-Wissowa, op. cit., 1921; Ramsay, op. cit., 154). The time of the decree is stated only in general terms by Luke, and it may have been as early as 727/27 (Zumpt, op. cit., 159; Marquardt, op. cit., II, 212) or later in 746-8 (Huschke, Census, 34; Ramsay, op. cit., 158 ff), its execution in different provinces and subject kingdoms being carried out at different times. Hence Luke dates the census in the kingdom of Herod specifically by connecting it with the administrative functions of Quirinius in Syria. But as P. Quintilius Varus was the legate of Syria just before and after the death of Herod from 748/6-750/4 (Ant, XVII, v, 2; XVII, ix, 3; XVII, x, 1 and 9; XVII, xi, 1; Tac. Hist. v.9; and coins in Eckhel, Doctr. num. vet., III, 275) and his predecessor was C. Sentius Saturninus from 745/9-748/6 (Ant, XVI, ix, 1; x, 8; xi, 3; XVII, i, 1; ii, 1; iii, 2), there seems to be no place for Quirinius during the closing years of Herod's reign. Tertullian indeed speaks of Saturninus as legate at the time of Jesus' birth (Adv. Marc., iv.9). The interpretation of Luke's statement as indicating a date for the census before Quirinius was legate (Wieseler, Chron. Syn., 116; Lagrange, Revue Biblique, 1911, 80 ff) is inadmissible. It is possible that the connection of the census with Quirinius may be due to his having brought to completion what was begun by one of his predecessors; or Quirinius may have been commissioned especially by the emperor as legatus ad census accipiendos to conduct a census in Syria and this commission may have been connected temporally with his campaign against the Homonadenes in Cilicia (Tac. Ann. iii.48; cf Noris, Cenotaph. Pis., 320 ff; Sanclemente, op. cit., 426 passim; Ramsay, op. cit., 238). It has also been suggested by Bour (L'Inscription de Quirinius, 48 ff) that Quirinius may have been an imperial procurator specially charged with authority in the matter of the Herodian census. The titulus Tiburtinus (CIL, XIV, 3613; Dessau, Inscr. Lat. Sel., 918)—if rightly assigned to him—and there seems to be no sufficient reason for questioning the conclusiveness of Mommsen's defence of this attribution (cf Liebenam, Verwaltungsgesch., 365)—proves that he was twice legate of Syria, and the titulus Venetus (CIL, III, 6687; Dessau, op. cit., 2683) gives evidence of a census conducted by him in Syria. His administration is dated by Ramsay (op. cit., 243) in 747/7; by Mommsen in the end of 750/4 or the beginning of 751/3 (op. cit., 172 ff). Zahn (Neue kirch. Zeitschr., 1893, IV, 633 ff), followed by Spitta (Zeitschr. f. d. neuest. Wiss., 1906, VII, 293 ff), rejects the historicity of the later census connected by Jos with the deposition of Archelaus, basing his view on internal grounds, and assigns the Lucan census to a time shortly after the death of Herod. This view however is rendered improbable by the evidence upon which the birth of Jesus is assigned to a time before the death of Herod (Mt 2 1 ff; Lk 1 5; 2 1 f); by the differentiation of the census in Lk 2 1 f and Acts 5 37; by the definite connection of the census in Jos with Syria and the territory of Archelaus (cf also the tit. Venet.); and by the general imperial policy in the formation of a new province (Marquardt, op. cit., II, 213). Moreover there seems to be no adequate ground for identifying the Sabinus of Jos with Quirinius as urged by Weber, who regards the two accounts (Ant., XVII, viii, 1 ff and XVII, iv, 5; XVIII, i, 2; ii, 1 ff) as due to the separation by Jos of || accounts of the same events in his sources (Zeitschr. f. d. neuest. Wiss., 1909, X, 307 ff)—the census of Sabinus-Quirinius being assigned to 4 BC, just after the death of Herod the Great. The synchronism of the second census of Quirinius with the periodic year of the Egypt census is probably only a coincidence, for it was occasioned by the deposition of Archelaus; but its extension to Syria may be indicative of its connection with the imperial policy inaugurated by Augustus (Tac. Ann. vi.41; Ramsay, op. cit., 161 f).

(3) Star of the Magi.—The identification of the star of the Magi (Mt 2 2; cf 2 7.9.16; Macrobius, Sat., II, 4; Sanclemente, op. cit., 456; Ramsay, op. cit., 215 ff) and the determination of the time of its appearance cannot be made with certainty, although it has been associated with a conjunction in 747/7 and 748/6 of Saturn and Jupiter in the sign of Pisces—a constellation which was thought to stand in close relation with the Jewish nation (Ideler, Handbuch d. math. u. tech. Chron., II, 400 ff). When the Magi came to Jerus, however, Herod was present in the city; and this must have been at least several months before his death, for during that time he was sick and absent from Jerus (Ant., XVII, vi, 1 ff; BJ, I, xxxiii, 1 ff).

(4) Course of Abijah.—The chronological calculations of the time of the service of the priestly course of Abijah in the temple, which are made by reckoning back from the time of the course of Jehoiarib which, according to Jewish tradition, was serving at the time of the destruction of Jerus by Titus, are uncertain (Schürer, op. cit., II, 337, n. 3; cf Lewin, Fasti Sacri, 836).

(5) Day and month.—The day and month of Jesus' birth are also uncertain. December 25 was celebrated by the church in the West as early as the 2d cent.—if the date in Hippolytus on Dan., IV, 23, be genuine (cf Ehrhardt, Aleich. Lit., 1880–1900, 383); but January 6 was celebrated in the East as the anniversary both of the birth and of the baptism. The fact that shepherds were feeding their flocks at night when Jesus was born (Lk 2 8) makes it improbable that the season of the year was winter.

(6) Summary.—The birth of Jesus may therefore be assigned to the period 747/7 to 751/5, before the death of Herod, at the time of a census made by Herod in accordance with a decree of Augustus and when Quirinius was exercising extraordinary authority in Syria—Varus being the regular legate of the province, i.e. probably in 748/6. See JESUS CHRIST.

The Synoptic Gospels begin their description of the public ministry of Jesus with an account of the ministry of John the Baptist. 2. Baptism (Mt 3 1 ff; Mk 1 1 ff; Lk 3 1 ff; of Jesus cf Jn 1 19 ff; 4 24; Jos, Ant., XVIII, iii, 3) and Luke definitely dates the baptism of Jesus by John in the 15th year of Tiberius. Luke also designates this event as the beginning of Jesus' ministry, and by stating Jesus' age approximately brings it into connection with the date of His birth. If Luke reckoned the reign of Tiberius from the death of Augustus, August 19, 767/14, the 15th year would extend from August 19, 781/28 to August 18, 782/29; and if Jesus was about thirty years old at this time, His birth would fall in 751/3 to 752/2—or sometime after the death of Herod, which is inconsistent with Luke's own and Matthew's representation. This indeed was one of the common modes of reckoning the imperial reigns. The mode of reckoning from the assumption of the tribunician power or from the designation as emperor is altogether unlikely in Luke's case and intrinsically improbable, since for Tiberius the one began in 748/6 and the other in 743/11 (Dio Cassius iv.9; liv.33; Vell. ii.99; Suet. Tib. ix.11). But if, as seems likely, the method of reckoning by imperial years rather than by the yearly consuls was not definitely fixed when Luke wrote, it is possible that he may have counted the years of Tiberius from his appointment in 764/11 or 765/12 to equal authority with Augustus in the provinces (Vell. ii 121; Suet. Tib. xx.21; Tac. Ann. i.3). This method seems not to have been employed elsewhere (Lewin, op. cit., 1143 f; cf Ramsay, op. cit., 202 f). The coins of Antioch in which it is found are regarded as spurious (Eckhel, op. cit., III, 276), the genuine coins reckoning the reign of Tiberius from the death of Augustus (ib, III, 278). If Luke reckoned the reign of Tiberius from 764/11 or 765/12, the 15th year would fall in 778/25 or 779/26, probably the latter, and Jesus' birth about thirty years earlier, i.e. about 748/6 or 749/5.

At the time of the first Passover in Jesus' ministry the Herodian temple had been building 46 years (Jn 2 20). Herod began the temple 3. First in the 18th year of his reign (Ant., Passover XV, xi, 1, which probably corrects the statement in BJ, I, xxi, 1 that it was the 15th year; cf Schürer, op. cit., I, 369 f, n. 12). As Jos reckons from the accession of Herod in 717/37, the 18th year would be 734/20 to 735/21 and 46 years later would be 780/27 to 781/28. The interval implied in John between this Passover and the beginning of Jesus' ministry agrees well with the Lucan dating of the baptism in 779/26.

The imprisonment of John the Baptist, which preceded the beginning of Jesus' Galilean work, was continued for a time (Mt 11 2–19; Lk 7 18–35) but was finally terminated by beheading at the order of Herod Antipas. Announcement of the death was made to Jesus while in the midst of His Galilean ministry (Mt 14 3-12; Mk 6 14-29; Lk 9 7-9). Jos reports of John the Baptist that the defeat of Antipas by Aretas, in the summer of 789/36, was popularly regarded as a Divine punishment for the murder of John (Ant, XVIII, v, 2). But although Jos mentions the divorce of Aretas' daughter by Antipas as one of the causes of hostilities, no inference can be drawn from this or from the popular interpretation of Antipas' defeat, by which the interval between John's death and this defeat can be fixed (Schürer, op. cit., I, 443 f).

The Synoptic Gospels mention the Passion Passover at which Jesus' ministry was terminated, but they contain no data by which the

5. Length of Jesus' Ministry interval between the imprisonment of John the Baptist and this Passover can be fixed with certainty. Yet indications are not wanting that the interval consisted of at least two years. The Sabbath controversy broke out in Galilee when the grain was still standing in the fields (Mt 12 1; Mk 2 23; Lk 6 1) and the condition of the grass when the Five Thousand were fed (Mt 14 15; Mk 6 39; Lk 9 12) points to the springtime, the Passion Passover marking the return of still another springtime (cf also Lk 13 7; Mt 23 37). But the Gospel of John mentions explicitly three Passovers (2 23; 6 4; 11 55) and probably implies a fourth (5 1), thus necessitating a ministry of at least two years and making probable a ministry of three years after the first Passover. The Passover of 6 4 cannot be eliminated on textual grounds, for the documentary evidence is conclusive in its favor and the argument against it based on the statements of certain patristic writers is unconvincing (cf Turner, HDB, I, 407 f; Zahn, Kom., IV, 708 ff). The indications of time from 6 4—the Passover when the Five Thousand were fed in Galilee—to 11 55—the Passion Passover—are definite and clear (7 2; 10 22). But the interval between the first Passover (2 23) and the Galilean Passover (6 4) must have been one and may have been two years. The following considerations favor the latter view: Jesus was present in Jerus at a feast (5 1) which is not named but is called simply "a" or "the" feast of the Jews. The best authorities for the text are divided, some supporting the insertion, others the omission of the definite art. before "feast." If the art. formed part of the original text, the feast may have been either Tabernacles—from the Jewish point of view—or Passover—from the Christian point of view. If the art. was wanting in the original text, the identification of the feast must be made on contextual and other grounds. But the note of time in 4 35 indicates the lapse of about nine months since the Passover of 2 23 and it is not likely that the Galilean ministry which preceded the feeding of the Five Thousand lasted only about three months. In fact this is rendered impossible by the condition of the grain in the fields at the time of the Sabbath controversy. The identification of the feast of Jn 5 1 with Purim, even if the art. be not genuine, is extremely improbable; and if so, a Passover must have intervened between 2 23 and 6 4, making the ministry of Jesus extend over a period of three years and the months which preceded the Passover of 2 23. While the identification cannot be made with certainty, if the feast was Passover the subject of the controversy with the Jews in Jerus as well as the season of the year would harmonize with the Synoptic account of the Sabbath controversy in Galilee which probably followed this Passover (cf the variant reading in Lk 6 1).

Jesus was put to death in Jerus at the time of the Passover when Pontius Pilate was procurator of Judaea (Mt 27 2 ff; Mk 15 1 ff;

6. Death of Jesus Lk 23 1 ff; Jn 18 29 ff; 19 1 ff; Acts 3 13; 4 27; 13 28; 1 Tim 6 13; Tac. Ann. xv.44). Caiaphas being the high priest (Mt 26 3.57; Jn 11 49; 18 13 ff) and Herod Antipas the tetrarch of Galilee and Perea (Lk 23 7 ff). Pilate was procurator from 779/26 to 789/36 (Ant, XVIII, iv, 3; v, 3; cf Schürer, op. cit., I, 487, n. 141); Caiaphas was high priest from 771/18 to 789/36 (Ant, XVIII, ii, 2; iv, 3; cf Schürer, op. cit., II, 271) and Antipas was tetrarch from 750/4 to 792/39. If the first Passover of Jesus' ministry was in 780/27, the fourth would fall in 783/30. The gospels name Friday as the day of the crucifixion (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54; Jn 19 14.31.42) and the Synoptic Gospels represent this Friday as Nisan 15—the day following (or according to Jewish reckoning from sunset to sunset, the same day as) the day on which the paschal supper was eaten (Mt 26 17 ff; Mk 14 12 ff; Lk 22 7 ff). But the Fourth Gospel is thought by many to represent the paschal meal as still uneaten when Jesus suffered (18 28; cf 13 29); and it is held that the Synoptic Gospels also contain traces of this view (Mt 26 5; Mk 14 2; 15 21; Lk 23 26). Astronomical calculations show that Friday could have fallen on Nisan 14 or 15 in 783/30 according to different methods of reckoning (von Soden, EB, I, 806; cf Bacon, Journal of Biblical Literature, XXVIII, 2, 1910, 130 ff; Fotheringham, Jour. of Theol. Studies, October, 1910, 120 ff), but the empirical character of the Jewish calendar renders the result of such calculations uncertain (Schürer, op. cit., I, 749 f). In the year 783/30 Friday, Nisan 15, would fall on April 7. There is an early patristic tradition which dates the death of Jesus in the year 782/29, in the consulship of the Gemini (Turner, HDB, I, 413 f), but its origin and trustworthy character are problematical.

II. Chronology of the Apostolic Age.—The chronology of the apostolic age must be based on the data in Acts and the epistolary lit. of the NT which afford contacts with persons or events of the Gr-Rom world. From the fixed points thus secured a general outline of the relative chronology may be established with reasonable probability.

Paul was converted near Damascus (Acts 9 3 ff; 22 5 ff; 26 12 ff; Gal 1 17). After a brief stay in that city (Acts 9 19 ff) he went to

1. Paul's Conversion Arabia and then came again to Damascus (Gal 1 17). When he left Damascus the second time, he returned to Jerus after an absence of three years (Gal 1 18). The flight of Paul from Damascus (Acts 9 24) probably terminated his second visit to the city. At that time the ethnarch of Aretas, the king of the Nabathaeans, acting with the resident Jews (Acts 9 23 f), guarded the city to seize him (2 Cor 11 32). Aretas IV succeeded Obodas about 9 BC, and reigned until about 40 AD. Damascus was taken by the Romans in 62 BC and probably continued under their control until the death of Tiberius (March 37 AD). Rom coins of Damascus exist from the time of Augustus, Tiberius and Nero, but there are no such coins from the time of Caligula and Claudius (Schürer, op. cit., I, 737; II, 153). Moreover the relations of Aretas to Augustus and Tiberius make it extremely improbable that he held Damascus during their reign as part of his kingdom or acquired it by conquest. The statement of Paul however seems to imply Nabathæan control of the city, and this is best explained on the supposition that Damascus was given to Aretas by Caligula, the change in the imperial attitude being due perhaps to the influence primarily of Agrippa and possibly also of Vitellius (Steinmann, Aretas IV, 1909, 34 ff.). But if Paul's escape from Damascus was not earlier than 37 AD, his conversion cannot be placed earlier than 34 or 35 AD, and the journey to Jerus 14 years later (Gal 2 1) not earlier than 50 or 51 AD.

Herod Agrippa I died in Caesarea shortly after a Passover season (Acts 12 23; cf 12 3.19).

Caligula had given him the tetrarchy of Philip and of Lysanias in 37 AD—Herod the latter either at this time or later—Agrippa I with the title of king (Ant, XVIII, vi, 10; BJ, II, ix, 6) and this was increased in 40 AD by the tetrarchy of Antipas (Ant, XVIII, vii, 1 f; BJ, II, ix, 6). Claudius gave him also Judaea and Samaria (Ant, XIX, v, 1; BJ, II, xi, 5) thus making his territory even more extensive than that of his grandfather, Herod the Great. Agrippa reigned over "all Judaea" for three years under Claudius (Ant, XIX, viii, 2; BJ, II, xi, 6), his death falling in the spring of 44 AD, in the 7th year of his reign. The games mentioned by Jos in this connection are probably those that were celebrated in honor of the return of Claudius from Britain in 44 AD. There are coins of Agrippa from his 6th year, but the attribution to him of coins from other years is questioned (Schürer, op. cit., 560, n. 40; Madden, op. cit., 132).

The prophecy of a famine and its fulfilment under Claudius (Acts 11 28) are associated in Acts with the death of Herod Agrippa I (11 30; 12 23). Famines in Rome during the reign of Claudius are mentioned by Claudius Suetonius (Claud. xviii), Dio Cassius (lx.11), Tacitus (Annals xii.43), and Orosius (vii.6). Jos narrates in the time of Fadus the generosity of Helena during a famine in Pal (Ant, XX, ii, 5), but subsequently dates the famine generally in the time of Fadus and Alexander. The famine in Pal would fall therefore at some time between 44 and 48 (Schürer, op. cit., I, 567, n. 8).

When Paul visited Cyprus with Barnabas the island was administered by Sergius Paulus (Acts 13 7 ff), a propraetor with the title 4. Sergius Paulus proconsul (Marquardt, op. cit., I, 391).

There is an inscription from Cyprus (Cagnat, Inscr. graec. ad res rom. pertin., III, 930) dating from the 1st cent., and probably from the year 53 (Zahn, Neue kirch. Zeitschr., 1904, XV, 194) in which an incident in the career of a certain Apollonius is dated in the proconsulship of Paulus (ἐπὶ Παύλου [ἀνθ]υπάτου, ἐπὶ Παύλου [ανθ]υπάτου). From another inscription (CIG, 2632), dated in the 12th year of Claudius, it appears that L. Annius Bassus was proconsul in 52. If the Julius Cordus mentioned by Bassus was his immediate predecessor, the proconsulship of Sergius Paulus may be dated at some time before 51.

When Paul came to Corinth for the first time he met Aquila and Priscilla, who had left Rome because of an edict of Claudius expelling the Jews from the city (Acts 18 2). Suetonius mentions an expulsion of the Jews from Rome by Claudius but gives no date (Claud. xxv; cf Dio

5. Edict of Claudius Cassius lx.6). Orosius however dates the edict in the 9th year of Claudius or 49 AD (Hist. vii.6, 15); and although Jos, from whom he quotes, does not mention this edict but records the favor shown by Claudius to the Jews and to Herod Agrippa I (Ant, XIX, v, 1-3; cf Dio Cassius lx.6, 6, 9, 10; 8, 2), it is not improbable that the date is approximately accurate (Schürer, op. cit., III, 62, n. 92).

During Paul's first sojourn in Corinth the apostle was brought before the proconsul Gallio (Acts 18 12). This could not have been earlier

6. Gallio than the year 44 when Claudius gave Achaia back to the Senate and the province was administered by a propraetor with the title of proconsul (Dio Cassius lx.24; Marquardt, op. cit., I, 331 f; Ramsay, Expos., 1897, I, 207). Moreover the career of Seneca makes it improbable that his brother would be advanced to this position before 49 or 50 (Harnack, Chron., I, 237; Wieseler, Chron. d. apos. Zeitalters, 119). There is a fragmentary inscription from Delphi containing a letter from the emperor Claudius in which mention is made of Gallio. The inscription is dated by the title of the emperor which contains the number 26. This is referred naturally to the acclamatio as "imperator" and dated in the year 52 before August, after which time the number 27 occurs in the title of Claudian inscriptions. Gallio may therefore have been proconsul from the spring or summer of the year 51-52 or 52-53. The latter seems the more probable time (cf Aem. Bourguet, De rebus Delphicis, 1905, 63 f; Ramsay, Expos., 1909, I, 467 f; Princeton Theological Review, 1911, 290 f; 1912, 139 f; Deissmann, Paulus, 1911, 159-177; Lietzmann, Zeitschrift für wissenschaftliche Theologie, 1911, 345-54).

When Paul had been for two years a prisoner in Caesarea Felix was succeeded by Festus as procurator of Judaea (Acts 24 27). The

7. Festus accession of Festus, which is placed by Eusebius in the Church History in the reign of Nero (HE, II, 22, 1), is dated in the Chronicle in the version of Jerome in the 2d year of Nero, 56 AD, and in the Armenian version in the 14th year of Claudius, 54 AD. The excerpts from the Chronicle in Syncellus apparently follow the text underlying the version of Jerome, but state simply that Festus was sent as successor of Felix by Nero (ed. Schoene, II, 154). After his removal from office Felix was tried in Rome, but escaped punishment through the influence of his brother Pallas, who, according to Jos, was in favor with Nero at that time (Ant, XX, viii, 9). Pallas was removed from office before February 13, 55 AD (Tac. Ann. xiii.14, 1; cf 15, 1), but apparently continued to have influence with the emperor; for he fixed the terms of his removal and was permitted to enjoy his fortune for several years (Tac. Ann. xiii.14, 1 f; 23, 1-3). His death occurred in 62 AD (Tac. Ann. xiv.65, 1). The trial of Felix must therefore have occurred before 62; but it is impossible to place it before the removal of Pallas, for this would necessitate the removal of Felix in 54 AD, and this is excluded by the fact that the first summer of Nero's reign fell in 55 AD. But if Eusebius reckoned the imperial years from September 1st after the accession (Turner, Jour. of Theol. Studies, 1902, 120 f; HDB, I, 418 f), the summer of the second year of Nero would fall in 57. In any event the removal and trial of Felix must have fallen after the removal of Pallas. The date of the Eusebian Chronicle is thus without support from Tacitus or Jos, and its value depends on the character of the source from which it was obtained—if there was such a source, for it is at least possible that the definite date owes its origin solely to the necessities imposed on Eusebius by the form of the Chronicle. It is not unlikely that the error of 5 years made by Eusebius in the reign of Agrippa II may be the source of a similar error in regard to Festus in spite of the fact that the framework of the Chronicle is generally furnished not by the years of the Jewish kings but by the imperial years (Erbes in Gebhardt u. Harnack, Texte und Untersuchungen, N.F., IV, 1, 1899; Die Todestage d. Apost. Paulus u. Petrus; Turner, Jour. of Theol. Studies, 1902, III, 120 f; Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 1906, 350 ff). There is evidence however in Acts 21 38 that Paul's arrest could not have been earlier than the spring of 55 AD. For Paul was supposed by the chief captain to be the Egyptian who had led an insurrection that had been suppressed by Felix during the reign of Nero (Ant., XX, viii, 6; BJ, II, 13, 5). Thus the accession of Festus, two years later (Acts 24 27), could not have been earlier than 57 AD.

But if the summer of 57 AD is the earliest date possible for the accession of Festus, the summer of 60 AD is the latest date that is possible. Albinus, the successor of Festus, was present in Jerus in October, 62 AD (Ant., XX, ix, 1 ff), and while the administration of Festus was probably shorter than that of Felix (cf Ant., XX, viii, 9–11; BJ, II, xiv, 1 with Ant., XX, vii, 1–8, 8; BJ, II, 12–13), it is not likely that it lasted less than two years. But as between 57 AD and 60 AD, probability favors the latter. For greater justice is thus done to the words of Paul to Felix: "Forasmuch as I know that thou hast been of many years a judge unto this nation," etc (Acts 24 10). Felix was appointed by Claudius in 52 AD (Tac. Ann. xii. 54; Ant., XX, v, 2) and was continued in office by Nero. Most of the events of his administration are narrated by Jos under Nero (Ant., XX, viii, 5 ff); and although Tacitus mentions an administration of Felix in Samaria when Cumanus was administering Galilee (Ann. xii. 54), the omission of any direct reference to Judaea, the unusual character of such a double administration and the explicit statement of Jos that Claudius sent Felix as successor of Cumanus, make it unlikely that Paul's statement is to be understood of an administration beginning earlier than 52 AD. If Festus succeeded in the summer of 60 AD, Paul's arrest would fall in 58 and the "many years" of Felix' administration would cover a period of 6 years, from 52 AD to 58 AD (cf Schürer, op. cit., I, 577 f, n. 38). Ramsay argues in favor of 57 AD as the year of Paul's arrest and 59 AD as the year of the accession of Festus (Pauline and Other Studies, 1906, 345 ff).

If Festus succeeded Felix in the summer of 60 AD, Paul would reach Rome in the spring of 61 AD, and the narrative in Acts would terminate in 63 AD (28 30). Paul's arrest in Jerus 2 years before the accession of Festus (24 27) would fall in the spring of 58 AD. Previous to this Paul had spent 3 months in Corinth (20 3) and 3 years in Ephesus (20 31; cf 19 10), which would make the beginning of the third missionary journey fall about 54 AD. There was an interval between the second and the third journeys (18 23), and as Paul spent 18 months at Corinth (18 11) the beginning of the second journey would fall about 51 AD. The Apostolic Council preceded the second journey and may be dated about 50 AD—14 years subsequent to Paul's first visit to Jerus (37 AD) in the third year after his conversion in 35 AD. The first missionary journey was made after the visit of Paul and Barnabas to Jerus with the alms from the church at Antioch (11 30; 12 25), about the time of the death of Herod Agrippa I, and would fall between 44 AD and 50 AD. The growth of the early church in Jerus previous to Paul's conversion would thus extend over a period of about 5 years from 30 AD to 35 AD.

Ten of the thirteen Pauline epistles were written during a period of about ten years between Paul's arrival in Corinth and the close of his first Rom imprisonment. These epistles fall into three groups, each possessing certain distinctive characteristics; and although each reflects the difference in time and occasion of its production, they all reveal an essential continuity of thought and a similarity of style which evidences unity of authorship. The earliest group consists of the Thessalonian epistles, both of which were written from Corinth on the second missionary journey about 52 or 53 AD, while Silas (Silvanus) was still in Paul's company and shortly after Paul's visit to Athens (1 Thess 1 1; 3 1.2.6; 2 Thess 1 1). The major epistles belong to the third missionary journey. 1 Cor was written from Ephesus about 55 AD; Gal probably from Ephesus, either before or after 1 Cor, for Paul had been twice in Galatia (Gal 4 13); 2 Cor from Macedonia about 57 AD; and Rom from Corinth about 57 or 58 AD. The imprisonment epistles were written from Rome: Col, Eph and Philem about 62 AD, and Phil about 63 AD.

When Paul wrote to Philemon (Philem ver 22) and to the Philippians (Phil 2 24; cf 1 25), he expected a favorable issue of his trial in Rome and was looking forward to another visit to the East. Before his arrest he had planned a journey to Spain by way of Rome (Rom 15 28), and when he bade farewell to the Ephesian elders at Miletus (Acts 20 25) he must have had in mind not only the dangers of his journey to Jerus, but also his determination to enter another field of labor. 1 Clement 5, the Muratori Canon and the Apocryphal Acts of Peter (Zahn, *Einltg.*³, I, 444 f) witness to the Spanish journey, and the Pastoral Epistles to a journey to the East and to another imprisonment in Rome. The two lines of evidence for Paul's release are independent and neither can be explained as derived merely from the statement of Paul's intention in Rom and in Philem and Phil. The historical situation implied in the Pastoral Epistles can be charged with artificiality only on the hypothesis that Paul was not released from his first Rom imprisonment. The data of these epistles cannot be fitted into any period of Paul's life previous to his imprisonment. But these data are embodied in just those parts of the Pastoral Epistles which are admitted to be Pauline by those who regard the epistles as containing only genuine fragments from Paul but assign the epistles in their present form to a later writer. On any hypothesis of authorship, however, the tradition which these epistles contain cannot be much later than the first quarter of the 2d cent. It is highly probable therefore that Paul was released from his first Rom imprisonment; that he visited Spain and the East; and that he was imprisoned a second time in Rome where he met his death in the closing years of Nero's reign, i.e. in 67 or 68 AD. According to early tradition Paul suffered martyrdom by beheading with the sword (Tert., De praescr. haer., xxxvi), but there is nothing to connect his death with the persecution of the Christians in Rome by Nero in 64 AD.

Little is known of Peter beside what is recorded of him in the NT. The tradition of his bishopric of 20 or 25 years in Rome (cf Harnack, Gesch. d. altchr. Lit., II; Die Chronologie, I, 243 f) accords neither with the implications of Acts and Gal nor with Paul's silence in Rom. But 1 Pet was probably written from Rome (5 13; cf Euseb., HE, ii.15, 2) and the testimony to Peter's

11. Death of Peter martyrdom (implied in Jn 21 18 f) under Nero in Rome by crucifixion (Tert., De praes. haer., xxxvi; cf 1 Clem 5 1 ff) is early and probably trustworthy. Tradition also associates Peter and Paul in their Rom labors and martyrdom (Dionysius in Euseb., HE, ii.25, 8; Iren., Adv. haer., iii.1, 2; iii.3, 1). The mention of the Vatican as the place of Peter's interment (Caius in Euseb., HE, ii.25, 6 f) may indicate a connection of his martyrdom with the Neronian persecution in 64 AD; but this is not certain. Peter's death may therefore be dated with some probability in Rome between 64 and 67 AD. His two epistles were written at some time before his death, probably the First about 64 and the Second at some time afterward and subsequent to the Epistle of Jude which it apparently uses. (The arguments against the Rom sojourn and martyrdom of Peter are stated fully by Schmiedel in the EB, s.v. "Simon Peter," esp. col. 453 ff; on the other hand cf Zahn, *Einleitung*³, II, 17 ff, Eng. tr, II, 158 ff.)

James the Just, the brother of the Lord, was prominent in the church of Jerus at the time of the Apostolic Council (Acts 15 13 ff; Gal 2 9; cf 1 19; 2 12) and later when of James Paul was arrested he seems still to have occupied this position (Acts 21 18 ff), laboring with impressive devotion for the Jewish people until his martyrdom about the year 66 AD (Ant. XX, ix, 1; Euseb., HE, ii.23, 3 ff; *HRE*³, VIII, 581; Zahn, *Einl.*³, I, 76). The Epistle of Jas contains numerous indications of its early origin and equally clear evidence that it was not written during the period when the questions which are discussed in the major epistles of Paul were agitating the church. It is probably the earliest book of the NT, written before the Apostolic Council.

In the decade just preceding the fall of Jerus, the tradition of the life and teaching of Jesus was committed to writing in the Synoptic Gospels. Early tradition dates the composition of Matthew's Gospel in the lifetime of Peter and Paul (Iren., Adv. haer., iii.1, 1; Eusebius, HE, v.8, 2 ff), and that of the Gospel of Mark either just before or after Peter's death (Clement in Euseb., HE, vi.14, 7; cf ii.15; and Irenaeus, Adv. haer., iii.11, 1; Presbyter of Papias in Euseb., HE, iii.39, 15; cf also 2 Pet 1 15). The Lucan writings—both the Gospel and Acts—probably fall also in this period, for the Gospel contains no intimation that Jesus' prophecy of the destruction of Jerus had been fulfilled (cf Lk 21 21; Acts 11 28), and the silence of Acts about the issue of Paul's trial is best explained on the hypothesis of an early date (Jerome, De vir. illustr., vii; Harnack, Neue Untersuch. zur Apostelgesch., 1911; cf also Lk 10 7; 1 Tim 5 18). To this period belong also the Epistle of Jude and the Epistle to the He (if addressed to Jewish Christians of Pal; but later, about 80 AD, if addressed to Jewish Christians of Rome [Zahn, *Einl.*³, II, 152]), the former being used in 2 Pet and the latter in 1 Clem.

Early tradition connects John with Ephesus and mentions his continuing in life until the time of Trajan (Irenaeus, Adv. haer., ii.22, 5 [Eusebius, HE, v.24]; iii.1, 1; v.30, 3; v.33, 4; Clement in Eusebius, HE, iii.23, 5–19; Polycrates in Eusebius, HE, iii.31, 3; v.24, 3; Justin, Dialogue, lxxxii; cf Rev 1 14,9; 22 8; Jn 21 22,23,24; 19 35). He died probably about the end of the 1st cent. There is another but less well-attested tradition of martyrdom based chiefly on the De Boor fragment of Papias (Texte u. Unters., 1888), a Syr Martyrology of the 4th cent. (Wright, Jour. of Sacred Lit., 1865–66, VIII, 56 ff, 423 ff), the Codex Coislinianus 305 of Georgius Hamartolus. This tradition, it is thought, finds confirmation in Mk 10 35–40; Mt 20 20–23 (cf Bousset, Theologische Rundschau, 1905, 225 ff, 277 ff). During the closing years of his life John wrote the Revelation, the Fourth Gospel and the three Epistles.

LITERATURE

The word "church," which is derived from κυριακός, kuriakós, "of or belonging to the Lord," represents in the EV of the NT the Gr ἐκκλησία, ekklēsia, Lat ecclesia. It is with the signification of this word ekklēsia as it meets us in the NT, and with the nature of the society which the word is there used to describe, that the present art. is concerned.

I. Pre-Christian History of the Term.—Although ekklēsia soon became a distinctively Christian word, it has its own pre-Christian history; and to those, whether Jews or Greeks, who first heard it applied to the Christian society it would come with suggestions of familiar things. Throughout the Gr world and right down to NT times (cf Acts 19 39), ekklēsia was the designation of the regular assembly of the whole body of citizens in a free city-state, "called out" (Gr ek, "out," and kalein, "to call") by the herald for the discussion and decision of public business. The LXX translators, again, had used the word to render the Heb kāhāl, which in the OT denotes the "congregation" or community of Israel, esp. in its religious aspect as the people of God. In this OT sense we find ekklēsia employed by Stephen in the Book of Acts, where he describes Moses as "he that was in the church [RVm "congregation"] in the wilderness" (Acts 7 38). The word thus came into Christian history with associations alike for the Greek and the Jew. To the Greek it would suggest a self-governing democratic society; to the Jew a theocratic society whose members were the subjects of the Heavenly King. The pre-Christian history of the word had a direct bearing upon its Christian meaning, for the ekklēsia of the NT is a "theocratic democracy" (Lindsay, Church and Ministry in the Early Centis., 4), a society of those who are free, but are always conscious that their freedom springs from obedience to their King.

II. Its Adoption by Jesus.—According to Mt 16 18 the name ekklēsia was first applied to the Christian society by Jesus Himself, the occasion being that of His benediction of Peter at Caesarea Philippi. The authenticity of the utterance has been called in question by certain critics, but on grounds that have no textual support and are made up of quite arbitrary presuppositions as to the composition of the First Gospel. It is true that Jesus had hitherto described the society He came to found as the "kingdom of God" or the "kingdom of heaven," a designation which had its roots in OT teaching and which the Messianic expectations of Israel had already made familiar. But now when it was clear that He was to be rejected by the Jewish people (cf ver 21), and that His society must move on independent lines of its own, it was natural that He should employ a new name for this new body which He was about to create, and thus should say to Peter, on the ground of the apostle's believing confession, "Upon this rock I will build my church." The adoption of this name, however, did not imply any abandonment of the ideas suggested by the conception of the kingdom. In this very passage (ver 19) "the kingdom of heaven" is employed in a manner which, if it does not make the two expressions church and kingdom perfectly synonymous, at least compels us to regard them as closely correlative and as capable of translation into each other's terms. And the comparative disuse by the apostolic writers of the name "kingdom," together with their emphasis on the church, so far from showing that Christ's disciples had failed to understand His doctrine of the kingdom, and had substituted for it the more formal notion of the church, only shows that they had followed their Master's guidance in substituting for a name and a conception that were peculiarly Jewish, another name whose associations would enable them to commend their message more readily to the world at large.

III. Its Use in the NT.—Apart from the passage just referred to, the word ekklēsia occurs in the Gospels on one other occasion only

1. In the (Mt 18 17). Here, moreover, it may
Gospels be questioned whether Our Lord is referring to the Christian church, or to Jewish congregations commonly known as synagogues (see RVm) The latter view is more in keeping with the situation, but the promise immediately given to the disciples of a power to bind and loose (ver 18) and the assurance "Where two or three are gathered together in my name, there am I in the midst of them" (ver 20) are evidently meant for the people of Christ. If, as is probable, the ekklēsia of ver 17 is the Christian ekklēsia of which Christ had already spoken to Peter, the words show that He conceived of the church as a society possessing powers of self-government, in which questions of discipline were to be decided by the collective judgment of the members.

In Acts the ekklēsia has come to be the regular designation for the society of Christian believers, but is employed in two distinct senses.

2. In Acts First in a local sense, to denote the body of Christians in a particular place or district, as in Jerus (5 11; 8 1), in Antioch (13 1; 15 22), in Caesarea (18 22)—a usage which reappears in the Apocalypse in the letters to the Seven Churches. Then in a wider and what may be called a universal sense, to denote the sum total of existing local churches (9 31 RV), which are thus regarded as forming one body.

In the Pauline Epistles both of these usages are frequent. Thus the apostle writes of "the church of the Thessalonians" (1 Thess 1 1),

3. In the "the church of God which is at Cor-Pauline inth" (1 Cor 1 2; 2 Cor 1 1). In-
Epistles deed he localizes and particularizes the word yet further by applying it to a single Christian household or to little groups of believers who were accustomed to assemble in private houses for worship and fellowship (Rom 16 5; 1 Cor 16 19; Col 4 15; Philem ver 2)—an employment of the word which recalls the saying of Jesus in Mt 18 20. The universal use, again, may be illustrated by the contrast he draws between Jews and Greeks on the one hand and the church of God on the other (1 Cor 10 32), and by the declaration that God has set in the church apostles, prophets, and teachers (12 28).

But Paul in his later epistles has another use of ekklēsia peculiar to himself, which may be described as the ideal use. The church, now, is the body of which Christ is the head (Eph 1 22 f; Col 1 18.24). It is the medium through which God's manifold wisdom and eternal purpose are to be made known not only to all men, but to the principalities and powers in the heavenly places (Eph 3 9-11). It is the bride of whom He is the heavenly Bridegroom, the bride for whom in His love He gave Himself up, that He might cleanse and sanctify her and might present her to Himself a glorious church, a church without blemish, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing (5 25 ff). This church clearly is not the actual church as we know it on earth, with its divisions, its blemishes, its shortcomings in faith and love and obedience. It is the holy and catholic church that is to be when the Bridegroom has completed the process of lustration, having fully "cleansed it by the washing of water with the word." It is the ideal which the actual church must keep before it and strive after, the ideal up to which it shall finally be guided by that Divine in-working power which is able to conform the body to the head, to make the bride worthy of the Bridegroom, so that God may receive in the church the glory that is His (Eph 3 21).

IV. The Notes of the Church.—Although a systematic doctrine of the church is neither to be found nor to be looked for in the

1. Faith NT, certain characteristic notes or features of the Christian society are brought before us from which we can form some conception as to its nature. The fundamental note is faith. It was to Peter confessing his faith in Christ that the promise came, "Upon this rock I will build my church" (Mt 16 18). Until Jesus found a man full of faith He could not begin to build His church; and unless Peter had been the prototype of others whose faith was like his own, the walls of the church would never have risen into the air. Primarily the church is a society not of thinkers or workers or even of worshippers, but of believers. Hence we find that "believers" or "they that believed" is constantly used as a synonym for the members of the Christian society (e.g. Acts 2 44; 4 32; 5 14; 1 Tim 4 12). Hence, too, the rite of baptism, which from the first was the condition of entrance into the apostolic church and the seal of membership in it, was recognized as preeminently the sacrament of faith and of confession (Acts 2 41; 8 12,36; Rom 6 4; 1 Cor 12 13). This church-founding and church-building faith, of which baptism was the seal, was much more than an act of intellectual assent. It was a personal laying hold of the personal Saviour, the bond of a vital union between Christ and the believer which resulted in nothing less than a new creation (Rom 6 4; 8 1,2; 2 Cor 5 17).

If faith in Christ is the fundamental note of the Christian society, the next is fellowship among the members. This follows from the very nature of faith as just described; for if each believer is vitally joined to

2. Fellowship Christ, all believers must stand in a living relation to one another. In Paul's favorite figure, Christians are members one of another because they are members in particular of the body of Christ (Rom 12 5; 1 Cor 12 27). That the Christian society was recognized from the first as a fellowship appears from the name "the brethren," which is so commonly applied to those who belong to it. In Acts the name is of very frequent occurrence (9 30, etc.), and it is employed by Paul in the epistles of every period of his career (1 Thess 4 10, etc.). Similar testimony lies in the fact that "the koinōnia" (EV "fellowship") takes its place in the earliest meetings of the church side by side with the apostles' teaching and the breaking of bread and prayers (Acts 2 42). See COMMUNION. The koinōnia at first carried with it a community of goods (Acts 2 44; 4 32), but afterward found expression in the fellowship of ministration (2 Cor 8 4) and in such acts of Christian charity as are inspired by Christian faith (He 13 16). In the Lord's Supper, the other sacrament of the primitive church, the fellowship of Christians received its most striking and most sacred expression. For if baptism was esp. the sacrament of faith, the Supper was distinctively the sacrament of love and fellowship—a communion or common participation in Christ's death and its fruits which carried with it a communion of hearts and spirits between the participants themselves.

Although local congregations sprang up wherever the gospel was preached, and each of these enjoyed an independent life of its own, the

3. Unity unity of the church was clearly recognized from the first. The intercourse between Jerus and Antioch (Acts 11 22; 15 2), the conference held in the former city (15 6 ff), the right hand of fellowship given by the elder apostles to Paul and Barnabas (Gal 2 9), the untiring efforts made by Paul himself to forge strong links of love and mutual service between gentile and Jewish Christians (2 Cor 8)—all these things serve to show how fully it was realized that though there were many churches, there was but one church. This truth comes to its complete expression in the epistles of Paul's imprisonment, with their vision of the church as a body of which Christ is the head, a body animated by one spirit, and having one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one God and Father of all (Eph 4 4 ff; Col 1 18; 3 11). And this unity, it is to be noticed, is conceived of as a visible unity. Jesus Himself evidently conceived it so when He prayed for His disciples that they all might be one, so that the world might believe (Jn 17 21). And the unity of which Paul writes and for which he strove is a unity that finds visible expression. Not, it is true, in any uniformity of outward polity, but through the manifestation of a common faith in acts of mutual love (Eph 4 3,13; 2 Cor 9).

Another dominant note of the NT church lay in the consecration of its members. "Saints" is one of the most frequently recurring designations for them that we find. 4. Consecration As thus employed, the word has in the first place an objective meaning; the sainthood of the Christian society consisted in its separation from the world by God's electing grace; in this respect it has succeeded to the prerogatives of Israel under the old covenant. The members of the church, as Peter said, are "an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people for God's own possession" (1 Pet 2 9). But side by side with this sense of an outward and priestly consecration, the name "saints" carried within it the thought of an ethical holiness—a holiness consisting, not merely in a status determined by relation to Christ, but in an actual and practical saintliness, a consecration to God that finds expression in character and conduct. No doubt the members of the church are called saints even when the living evidences of sainthood are sadly lacking. Writing to the Corinthian church in which he found so much to blame, Paul addresses its members by this title (1 Cor 1 2; cf 6 11). But he does so for other than formal reasons—not only because consecration to God is their outward calling and status as believers, but also because he is assured that a work of real sanctification is going on, and must continue to go on, in their bodies and their spirits which are His. For those who are in Christ are a new creation (2 Cor 5 17), and those to whom has come the separating and consecrating call (2 Cor 6 17) must cleanse themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God (7 1). Paul looks upon the members of the church, just as he looks upon the church itself, with a prophetic eye; he sees them not as they are, but as they are to be. And in his view it is "by the washing of water with the word," in other words by the progressive sanctification of its members, that the church itself is to be sanctified and cleansed, until Christ can present it to Himself a glorious church, not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing (Eph 5 26,27).

Yet another note of the church was spiritual power. When the name ekklesia was given by Jesus to the society He came to found, 5. Power His promise to Peter included the bestowal of the gift of power (Mt 16 18,19). The apostle was to receive the "power of the keys," i.e. he was to exercise the privilege of opening the doors of the kingdom of heaven to the Jew (Acts 2 41) and to the Gentile (10 34-38; 15 7). He was further to have the power of binding and loosing, i.e. of forbidding and permitting; in other words he was to possess the functions of a legislator within the spiritual sphere of the church. The legislative powers then bestowed upon Peter personally as the reward of his believing confession were afterward conferred upon the disciples generally (Mt 18 18; cf ver 1 and also vs 19,20), and at the conference in Jerus were exercised by the church as a whole (Acts 15 4,22). The power to open the gates of the kingdom of heaven was expanded into the great missionary commission, "Go ye therefore, and make disciples of all the nations" (Mt 28 19)—a commission that was understood by the apostolic church to be addressed not to the eleven apostles only, but to all Christ's followers without distinction (Acts 8 4, etc). To the Christian society there thus belonged the double power of legislating for its own members and of opening the kingdom of heaven to all believers. But these double functions of teaching and government were clearly recognized as delegated gifts. The church taught the nations because Christ had bid her go and do it. She laid down laws for her own members because He had conferred upon her authority to bind and to loose. But in every exercise of her authority she relied upon Him from whom she derived it. She believed that Christ was with her always, even unto the end of the world (Mt 28 20), and that the power with which she was endued was power from on high (Lk 24 49).

V. The Organization of the Church.—It seems evident from the NT that Jesus gave His disciples no formal prescriptions for the organization of the church. In the first days after Pentecost they had no thought of separating themselves from the religious life of Israel, and would not realize the need of any distinct organization of their own. The temple-worship was still adhered to (Acts 2 46; 3 1), though it was supplemented by apostolic teaching, by prayer and fellowship, and by the breaking of bread (2 42,46). Organization was a thing of gradual growth suggested by emerging needs, and the differentiation of function among those who were drawn into the service of the church was due to the difference in the gifts bestowed by God upon the church members (1 Cor 12 28). At first the Twelve themselves, as the immediate companions of Jesus throughout His ministry and the prime witnesses of the Christian facts and esp. of the resurrection (cf Acts 1 21,22), were the natural leaders and teachers of the community. Apart from this, the earliest evidence of anything like organization is found in the distinction drawn by the Twelve themselves between the ministry of the word and the ministry of tables (Acts 6 2,4)—a distinction which was fully recognized by Paul (Rom 12 6,8; 1 Cor 1 17; 9 14; 12 28), though he enlarged the latter type of ministry so as to include much more than the care of the poor. The two kinds of ministry, as they meet us at the first, may broadly be distinguished as the general and prophetic on the one hand, the local and practical on the other.

From Acts 6 1 ff we see that the Twelve recognized that they were Divinely called as apostles to proclaim the gospel; and Paul

1. The General and Prophetic Ministry repeatedly makes the same claim for himself (1 Cor 1 17; 9 16; 2 Cor 3 6; 4 1; Col 1 23). But apostleship was by no means confined to the Twelve (Acts 14 14; Rom 16 7; cf Did 11 4 ff); and an itinerant ministry of the word was exercised in differing ways by prophets, evangelists, and teachers, as well as by apostles (1 Cor 12 28,29; Eph 4 11). The fact that Paul himself is variously described as an apostle, a prophet, a teacher (Acts 13 1; 14 14; 1 Tim 2 7; 2 Tim 1 11) appears to show that the prophetic ministry was not a ministry of stated office, but one of special gifts and functions. The apostle carried the good tidings of salvation to the ignorant and unbelieving (Gal 2 7,8), the prophet (in the more specific sense of the word) was a messenger to the church (1 Cor 14 4,22); and while the teacher explained and applied truth that was already possessed (He 5 12), the prophet was recognized by those who had spiritual discernment (1 Cor 2 15; 14 29; 1 Jn 4 1) as the Divinely employed medium of fresh revelations (1 Cor 14 25,30,31; Eph 3 5; cf Did 4 1).

The earliest examples of this are the Seven of Jerus who were intrusted with the care of the "daily ministration" (Acts 6 1 ff). With the

2. The Local and Practical Ministry growth of the church, however, other needs arose, and the local ministry is seen developing in two distinct directions. First there is the presbyter or elder, otherwise known as the bishop or overseer, whose duties, while still local, are chiefly of a spiritual kind (Acts 20 17,28,35; 1 Tim 3 2,5; Jas 5 14; 1 Pet 5 2). See BISHOP. Next there are the deacon and the deaconess (Phil 1 1; 1 Tim 3 8-13), whose work appears to have lain largely in house to house visitation and a practical ministry to the poor and needy (1 Tim 5 8-11). The necessities of government, of discipline, and of regular and stated instruction had thus brought it to pass that within NT times some of the functions of the general ministry of apostles and prophets were discharged by a local ministry. The general ministry, however, was still recognized to be the higher of the two. Paul addresses the presbyter-bishops of Ephesus in a tone of lofty spiritual authority (Acts 20 17 ff). And according to the Did, a true prophet when he visits a church is to take precedence over the resident bishops and deacons (Did 10 7; 13 3). See CHURCH GOVERNMENT.

LITERATURE

The object here sought is to discover what kind of church government is mirrored in the NT. To do this with perfect definiteness is, no doubt, quite impossible. Certain general features, however, may clearly be seen.

1. Approach to the Subject.—The subject is best approached through the Gr word ekklesia, τὴ ἐκκλησία. Passing by the history of this word, and its connection with the Heb words ‘edah and kāhāl (which the LXX sometimes renders by ἐκκλησία, ekklesia), we come at once to the NT usage. Two perfectly distinct senses are found, viz. a general and a local.

Christ is "head over all things to the church, which is his body" (Eph 1 22); "the general assembly and church of the firstborn who are enrolled in heaven" (He 12 23). Here we have "church" in the broadest sense, including all the redeemed in earth and heaven, and in all ages (see also Eph 1 22; 3 10; 5 22-27; Col 1 24; He 12 23).

1. The General Sense

Here the Scripture passages are very numerous. In some cases, the word is used in the sing., and in others the pl.; in some it is used with reference to a specified church, and in others without such specification. In all cases the sense is local. In Acts 11 26, it is said that Paul and Barnabas were "gathered together with the church," where the church at Antioch is meant. In Acts 14 23, Paul and Barnabas are said to have "appointed elders in every church," that is, churches which they had planted. In Rev 2 and 3 the seven churches of Asia Minor are addressed. In Acts 16 5 we are told that the churches "were strengthened in the faith." On the local sense see, further, Acts 8 1; 15 4; 16 5; 20 17; Rom 16 4; 1 Cor 1 2; 6 4; 11 16; Gal 1 2,22, and many other places.

2. The Local Sense

There are a few passages that do not seem exactly to fit into either of the above categories. Such, for example, are Mt 18 17 and 1 Cor 12 28, where it seems best to understand a generic sense. Such, also, are passages like Acts 9 31, and 1 Cor 10 32, where a collective sense best suits the cases.

Church government in the NT applies only to the local bodies.

II. Internal Order.—With respect to the constitution and life of these NT churches, several points may be made out beyond reasonable doubt.

They were composed of persons who professed faith in Christ, and who were believed to have been regenerated, and who had been bap-

1. Subjects of Admission

tized. See Acts 2 41,44,47 (RV "ad-ded to them"); 8 12; Rom 1 8; 6 4; 10 9,10; 1 Cor 1 2; Col 1 2,4; 1 Tim 6 12, and others, where they are called "saints," "sons of God," "faithful brethren," "sanctified in Christ Jesus."

They are definitely and permanently organized bodies, and not temporary and loose aggregations of individuals. It is quite impossible, for example, to regard the church at Antioch as a loose aggregation of people for a passing purpose. The letters of Paul to the churches at Rome, Corinth, Philippi, Thessalonica, cannot be regarded as addressed to other than permanent and definitely organized bodies.

They were served by two classes of ministers—one general, the other local.

(1) General.

At the head of these is the "apostle" (1 Cor 12 28; Eph 4 11). His official relation to the churches was general. He did not necessarily belong to the group of the original Eleven. Besides Matthias (Acts 1 26), Paul and Barnabas (1 Cor 9 5,6), James, the Lord's brother (Gal 1 19), Andronicus and Junias (Rom 16 7) are reckoned as "apostles." The one invariable and necessary qualification of an apostle was that he should have seen the Lord after the Resurrection (Acts 1 22; 1 Cor 9 1). Another qualification was to have wrought "the signs of an apostle" (2 Cor 12 12; cf 1 Cor 9 2). He was to bear witness to what he had seen and heard, to preach the gospel of the kingdom (Acts 1 8; 1 Cor 1 17), to found churches and have a general care of them (2 Cor 11 28). From the nature of his chief qualification, his office was temporary.

Next comes the "prophet." His relation to the churches, also, was general. It was not necessary that he should have seen the Lord, but it appertained to his spiritual function that he should have revelations (Eph 3 5). There is no indication that his office was in any sense administrative.

After the "prophet" come the "evangelist" and "teacher," the first, a traveling preacher, the second, one who had special aptitude for giving instruction.

After the "teacher" and "evangelist" follow a group of special gifts of "healing," "helps," "governments," "tongues." It may be that "helps" and "governments" are to be identified with "deacons" and "bishops," to be spoken of later. The other items in this part of Paul's list seem to refer to special charismata.

(2) Local.—There were two clearly distinct offices of a local and permanent kind in the NT churches. Paul (Phil 1 1) addresses "all the saints in Christ Jesus that are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons." See BISHOP; DEACON.

The most common designation of the first of these officers is "elder" (πρεσβύτερος, presbúteros). In one passage (Eph 4 11) he is called "pastor" (ποιμήν, poimēn). In Acts 20 17-28, it becomes clear that the office of elder, bishop, and pastor was one; for there the apostle charges the elders of the church at Ephesus to feed (pastor) the church in which the Holy Spirit has made them bishops (cf Titus 1 5,7; 1 Pet 5 1,2).

The function of the elders was, in general, spiritual, but involved an oversight of all the affairs of the church (1 Tim 3 2; 5 17).

As to the second of the local church officers, it has to be said that little is given us in the NT. That the office of deacon originated with the appointment of the Seven in Acts 6 is not certain. If we compare the qualifications there given by the apostles with those given by Paul in 1 Tim 3 8-13, it seems quite probable that the necessity which arose at Jerus, and which led to the appointment of the Seven was really the occasion for originating the office of deacon in the churches. The work assigned the Seven was secular, that is to say, the "service of tables." They were to relieve the apostles of that part of the work. A similar relation to the work of the elders seems to have been borne by that of the deacons.

Again, they exercised the highest ecclesiastical functions.

(1) They had control of membership.—In Mt 18 17, Our Lord, by anticipation, lodges final action, in the sphere of church discipline,

4. Ecclesiastical Functions with the church. When the church has taken action, the matter is ended. There is no direction to take it to a higher court. In the church at Corinth, there was a man who was guilty of an infamous offence against purity. With regard to the case, Paul urged the most summary discipline (1 Cor 5 5). If the church should act upon the judgment which he communicated to them, they would act when "gathered together"; that is to say, action would be taken in conference of the church. In 2 Cor 2, a reference to the case shows that they had acted upon his advice, and that the action was taken by the majority ("the many," the more, 2 Cor 2 6). In 2 Cor 2 he counsels restoration of this excluded member now repentant. Exclusion and restoration of members were to be effected by a church. This, of course, carried with it the reception of members in the first instance.

(2) They selected their officers and other servants.—This was true in case of the Seven (Acts 6 3-13; see other cases in Acts 15 22; 1 Cor 16 3; 2 Cor 8 1 ff; Phil 2 25). Acts 14 23 and Titus 1 5 seem, at first, to offset the passages just given. In one of these, Paul and Barnabas are said to have "appointed" (χειροτονήσαντες, cheirotônēsantes) elders in the churches which they had planted. But scholars of first quality, though themselves adhering to Presbyterian or Episcopal forms of church government, maintain that Paul and Barnabas ordained the elders whom the churches selected—that they "appointed" them in the usual way, by the suffrages of the members of the churches concerned. The word rendered "appoint" in Tit 1 5 (καταστήσας, katastēsēs) is more easily understood as referring to ordination instead of selection.

(3) They observed the ordinances.—Paul gives direction (1 Cor 11 20-34) to the church at Corinth about the observance of the Lord's Supper. These directions are given, not to any officer or set of officers, but to the church. Ecclesiastically, of course, the two ordinances are on the same level; and, if one of them had been committed to the custody, so to say, of the churches, so must the other.

The management of their business was in their own hands. Paul wrote the church at Corinth:

5. Independent (Autonomous) Organizations

"Let all things be done decently and in order" (1 Cor 14 40). In that comprehensive injunction, given to a church, is implied control of its affairs by the church.

III. External Authority.—The investigation up to this point places us in position to see that there is in the NT no warrant for ecclesiastical grades in the ministry of the churches, by which there may be created an ascending series of rulers who shall govern the churches merged into one vast ecclesiastical organization called "the church." So, also, we are in position to see that there is no warrant for an ascending series of courts which may review any "case" that originates in a local church. We may see, on the contrary, that to each local church has been committed by Christ the management of its own affairs; and that He had endowed every such church with ecclesiastical competency to perform every function that any ecclesiastical body has a right to perform.

As the churches are not to be dominated by any external ecclesiastical authority, so they are not to be interfered with, in their church life, by civil government. Jesus taught that Christians should be good citizens (Mt 22 15-22); so did the apostles (Rom 13 1-7; 1 Pet 2 13-16). Jesus also taught the spirituality of His Kingdom: "My kingdom is not of this world" (Jn 18 36). It follows that only where the life of a church touches the civic life of the community has the civil authority any right to interfere.

IV. Coöperative Relations.—While each local church, according to the NT, is independent of every other in the sense that no other has jurisdiction over it, yet coöperative relations were entered into by NT churches. Examples and indications of that may be found in Rom 15 26, 27; 2 Cor 8, 9; Gal 2 10; Rom 15 1; 3 Jn ver 8. The principle of coöperation effective in those cases is susceptible of indefinite expansion. Churches may properly coöperate in matters of discipline, by seeking and giving counsel, and by respecting each other's disciplinary measures. In the great, paramount business of evangelizing and teaching the nations, they may coöperate in a multitude of ways. There is no sphere of general Christian activity in which the churches may not voluntarily and freely coöperate for the betterment of the world, the salvation of humanity.

CHURCHES, church'iz, ROBBERS OF. See ROBBERS OF TEMPLES.

CHURCHES, SEVEN. See ANGELS OF THE SEVEN CHURCHES.

CHURL, chūrl (כִּילָי or כִּלָּי, kīlay or kēlay): The Heb word occurs only in Isa 32 5, 7, in the latter ver in a form slightly modified so as to produce a pleasing assonance with the word immediately following. The word probably means "crafty" or "miserly," both ideas being suitable to the context, though "miserly" accords with the setting in Isa somewhat better.

In 1 S 25 3 the Heb kāsheh which means "hard," "severe," "rough," is rendered "churlish." In Saxon, churl, as the name for the lowest order of freemen, came to be used of persons boorish in manner. The rough and ill-mannered Nabal is aptly described as churlish. JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

CHUSHAN-RISHATHAIM, kū-shan-rish-at'hā'im. See CUSHAN-RISHATHAIM.

CHUSI, kū'sī, kū'si (Χούσι, Chousis): A place only named in Jth 7 18, as near Ekrebel on the brook Mochmur. It was in central Pal, and has with some probability been identified with Qūzah, a village 5½ miles S. of Nablus and 5 miles W. of Agrabeh (Ekrebel).

CHUZAS, kū'zas, chū'zas (Χουζάς, Chouzás; AV Chuzā): The steward of Herod Antipas. In Lk 8 3 we read that his wife Joanna, "and Susanna, and many others," ministered to Christ and His disciples. See JOANNA (Lk 24 10).

CICCAR, sik'ār (כִּכָּר, kikkār, "circle"): Used of the circle of the Jordan (Gen 13 10, Heb). See PLAIN; CITIES OF THE PLAIN.

CIeled, sēld, CIELING, sē'ing. See CEILED, CEILING.

CILICIA, si-lish'i-a (ἡ Κιλικία, hē Kilikia): An important province at the S.E. angle of Asia Minor, corresponding nearly with the modern Turkish vīlayet of Adana; enfolded between the Taurus mountains and the Mediterranean Sea, with the Amanus range on the E. and Pamphylia on the W.; chief rivers, the Pyramus, Sarus, Cydnus and Calycadnus. The character of Cilician history has been largely determined by the physical features of the province. It is divided by nature into a mountainous part to the W., called Tracheia, and a broad, alluvial plain, hot and fertile, toward the E., termed Campestris or Pedias. Cilicia has always been isolated from its neighbors by land by its encircling mountains, save for its two famous mountain passes, the "Syrian Gates," which offer an easy road to Antioch and the S., and the wonderful "Cilician Gates," which open a road to central and western Asia Minor. Through these passes the armies and the pilgrims, the trade and the travel of the cents. have made their way. Alexander was one of the most renowned leaders of such expeditions, and at Issus he met and shattered the power of the Pers empire.

The early settlers of Cilicia are held to have been Sem Syrians and Phoenicians, but in the still earlier days the inhabitants must have been Hittites. While few Hittite remains have been brought to light in Cilicia proper, the province was so surrounded by Hittites, and such important works of Hittite art and industry remain on the outskirts of the province, as at Ivriz, Marash, Sinjirli and Sakche Geuzi, that the intervening territory could hardly fail to be overspread with the same civilization and imperial power. See Professor John Garstang's The Land of the Hittites.

Cilicia appears as independent under Syennesis, a contemporary of Alyattes of Lydia, 610 BC. Later it passed under the Pers sway, but retained its separate line of kings. After Alexander the Seleucid rulers governed Cilicia from Antioch. The disturbances of the times enabled the pirates so to multiply and establish themselves in their home base, in Cilicia, Tracheia, that they became the scourge of the Mediterranean until their power was broken by Pompey (67-66 BC). Cilicia was by degrees incorporated in the Rom administration, and Cicero, the orator, was governor (51-50 BC).

The foremost citizen of the province was Saul of Tarsus (Acts 21 39; 22 3; 23 34). Students or pilgrims from Cilicia like himself disputed with Stephen (Acts 6 9). Some of the earliest labors of the great apostle were near his home, in Syria and Cilicia (Gal 1 21; Acts 15 23, 41). On his voyage to Rome he sailed across the sea which is off Cilicia (Acts 27 5). Constantinople and Antioch may be regarded as the front and back door of Asia Minor, and as the former was not founded till the 4th cent., Asia Minor may be regarded as fronting during apostolic days on Antioch. Cilicia was intimately connected with its neighbor province on the S. The first Christian apostles and evangelists followed the great highways, through the famous mountain passes, and carried the religion of Jesus to Asia Minor from Antioch as a base.

Armenians migrating from the N. founded a kingdom in Cilicia under Roupen which was terminated by the overthrow of King Levon, or Leo, by the conquering Turks in 1393. A remnant of this kingdom survives in the separate Armenian catholicate of Sis, which has jurisdiction over a few bishoprics, and Armenians are among the most virile of the present inhabitants of the province.

CINNAMON, sin'a-mun (קִינָמֹן, kinnāmōn; κιννάμωμον, kinnāmōmon): Mentioned, like cassia, as a perfume. In Ex 30 23 it is one of the ingredients of the "holy anointing oil"; in Prov 7 17 it is, along with myrrh and aloes, a perfume for a bed; in Cant 4 14 it is a very precious spice. Cinnamon is (Rev 18 13) part of the merchandise of "Babylon the great."

Cinnamon is the product of Cinnamomum zeylanicum, a laurel-like plant widely cultivated in Ceylon and Java. It has a profuse white blossom, succeeded by a nut from which the fragrant oil is obtained. The wood is the inner bark from branches which have reached a diameter of from 2 to 3 inches; the epidermis and pulpy matter are carefully scraped off before drying. In commerce the cheaper Cassia ligna of China is sometimes substituted for true cinnamon, and it is thought by some authorities that this was the true cinnamon of the ancients. See, however, CASSIA.

CIRAMA, si-rā'ma, sir'a-ma. See KIRAMA.

CIRCLE, sūr'k'l: Is used with reference to the vault of the heavens (חֹגֶה, hūgh) in Isa 40 22, and in a similar sense in Wisd 13 2 (RVm), "circle of stars" (κύκλος ἀστρων, kúkklos ástrōn). It is also used in the sense of surrounding territory, as in the expression "circle of Jordan" (Gen 13 10 RVm). See also CICCAR; ASTRONOMY, III, 1.

CIRCUIT, sūr'kit, "a going around": Used to represent several Heb words in several senses, e.g. the sun's orbit (מְסִיפָה, tēkūphāh), Ps 19 6; the vault of the heavens (חֹגֶה, hūgh), Job 22 14 AV; the circuit of the winds (מְסִיבִי, šābhībī), Eccl 1 6 (see ASTRONOMY); Samuel's visiting of communities (מְסָב, šābhābh), 1 S 7 16. In the RV the idea of encircling or "fetching a compass" (AV) is expressed by the phrase "to make a circuit" (הָסֵב, hāšēbh), 2 S 5 23; 2 K 3 9; and in the RVm it indicates a plain (הַכִּקָּר, ha-kikkār), Neh 3 22. The Gr perielhōnes is tr'd in the same way (Acts 28 13), but RVm reads "cast loose," following the WH reading perielōnes.

CIRCUMCISION, sūr-kum-sizh'un (בִּרְיָה, mūl, מִילֹת, mūlōth; περιτομή, peritomē): The removal of the foreskin is a custom that has prevailed, and prevails, among many races in different parts of the world—in America, Africa and Australia. It was in vogue among the western Semites—Hebrews, Arabians, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, Egyptians, but was unknown among the Semites of the Euphrates. In Canaan the Philis were an exception, for the term "uncircumcised" is constantly used in connection with them. Generally speaking, the rite of circumcision was a precondition of the enjoyment of certain political and religious privileges (Ex 12 48; Ezk 44 9); and in view of the fact that in the ancient world religion played such an important rôle in life, it may be assumed that circumcision, like many other strange customs whose original significance is no longer known, originated in connection with religion. Before enumerating the different theories which have been advanced with regard to the origin and original significance of circumcision, it may be of advantage to consider some of the principal references to the rite in the OT.

In the account of the institution of the covenant between Yahweh and Abraham which P gives (Gen 17), circumcision is looked upon

1. Circum- as the ratification of the agreement.
cision in Yahweh undertook to be the God
the OT of Abraham and of his descendants.

Abraham was to be the father of a multitude of nations and the founder of a line of kings. He and his descendants were to inherit Canaan. The agreement thus formed was permanent; Abraham's posterity should come within the scope of it. But it was necessary to inclusion in the covenant that every male child should be circumcised on the 8th day. A foreigner who had attached himself as a slave to a Heb household had to undergo the rite—the punishment for its non-fulfilment being death or perhaps excommunication. According to Ex 12 48 (also P) no stranger could take part in the celebration of the Passover unless he had been circumcised. In the Book of Josh (5 2-9) we read that the Israelites were circumcised at Gilgal ("Rolling"), and thus the "reproach of Egypt" was "rolled away." Apparently circumcision in the case of the Hebrews was prohibited during the Egypt period—circumcision being a distinctive mark of the ruling race. It is noticeable that flint knives were used for the purpose. This use of an obsolete instrument is one of many proofs of conservatism in religion. According to the strange and obscure account of the circumcision by Zipporah of her eldest son (Ex 4 25) the performance of the rite in the case of the son apparently possesses a vicarious value, for thereby Moses becomes a "bridegroom of blood." The marriage bond is ratified by the rite of blood (see 4 below). But it is possible that the author's meaning is that owing to the fact that Moses had not been circumcised (the "reproach of Egypt") he was not fit to enter the matrimonial estate (see 3 below).

The different theories with regard to the origin of circumcision may be arranged under four heads:

(1) Herodotus (ii.37), in dealing with circumcision among the Egyptians, suggests that it was a sanitary operation. But all suggestions of a secular, i.e. non-religious, origin to the rite, fail to do justice to the place and importance of religion in the life of primitive man.

(2) It was a tribal mark. Tattooed marks frequently answered the purpose, although they may have been originally charms. The tribal mark enabled one member of the tribe to recognize another and thus avoid injuring or slaying a fellow-tribesman. It also enabled the tribal deity to recognize a member of the tribe which was under his special protection. A mark was placed on Cain to indicate that he was under the special protection of Yahweh (Gen 4 15). It has been suggested, in the light of Isa 44 5 RVm, that the employer's mark was engraved (tattooed) on the slave's hand. The prophet represents Jews as inscribing on their hands that they belong to Yahweh. The walls of Jerus are engraved on Yahweh's palms (Isa 49 16). On the other hand "cuttings in the flesh" are prohibited in Lev 19 28 because they were common in the case of the non-Jewish religions. Such tattooed marks might be made in conspicuous places when it was necessary that they should be easily seen, but there might be reason for secrecy so that the marks might be known only to the members of the tribe in question.

(3) It was a rite which celebrated the coming of age of the person. It signified the attainment of puberty and of the right to marry and to enjoy full civic privileges.

(4) As human sacrifices began to be done away with, the sacrifice of the most easily removed portion of the anatomy provided a vicarious offering.

(5) It was a sacramental operation. "The shedding of blood" was necessary to the validity of any covenant between tribes or individuals. The rite of blood signifies the exchange of blood on the part of the contracting parties, and therefore the establishment of physical affinity between them. An alliance based on blood-relationship was inviolable. In the same way the tribal god was supposed to share in the blood of the sacrificed animal, and a sacred bond was established between him and the tribe. It is not quite obvious why circumcision should be necessary in connection with such a ceremony. But it may be pointed out that the process of generation excited the wonder and awe of primitive man. The prosperity of the tribe depended on the successful issue of the marriage bond, and a part of the body which had so much to do with the continuation and numerical strength of the tribe would naturally be fixed upon in connection with the covenant of blood. In confirmation of the last explanation it is urged that in the case of the covenant between Jeh and Abraham circumcision was the rite that ratified the agreement. In opposition to (3) it has been urged that among the Hebrews circumcision was performed in infancy—when the child was 8 days old. But this might have been an innovation among the Hebrews, due to ignorance of the original significance of the rite. If circumcision conferred upon the person circumcised the right to the enjoyment of the blessings connected with membership in the tribe it was natural that parents should be anxious that such an initiatory act should be performed early in life. The question of adult and infant baptism is capable of similar explanation. When we examine explanations (2), (3), (4), (5), we find that they are really different forms of the same theory. There can be no doubt that circumcision was originally a religious act. Membership in the tribe, entrance upon the rights of citizenship, participation in the religious practices of the tribe—these privileges are interdependent. Anyone who had experienced the rite of blood stood within the scope of the covenant which existed between the tribe and the tribal god, and enjoyed all the privileges of tribal society. It is easily understood why the historian carefully relates the circumcision of the Israelites by Joshua on their arrival in Canaan. It was necessary, in view of the possible intermingling of the conquerors and the conquered, that the distinctive marks of the Abrahamic covenant should be preserved (Josh 5 3).

In Jer 9 25 and Dt 30 6 we find the spiritual significance of circumcision. A prophet like Jeremiah was not likely to attach much

3. Spiritual Significance importance to an external act like circumcision. He bluntly tells his countrymen that they are no better than Egyptians, Edomites, Moabites and Ammonites. They are uncircumcised in heart. Paul uses the term circision for this outward circumcision unaccompanied by any spiritual change (Phil 3 2). The question of circumcision occasioned a protracted strife among the early Christians. Judaizing Christians argued for the necessity of circumcision. It was a reminiscence of the unrelenting particularism which had sprung up during the prolonged oppression of the Gr and Rom period. According to their view salvation was of the Jews and for the Jews. It was necessary to become a Jew in order to become a Christian. Paul consented to circumcision in the case of Timothy "because of the Jews" (Acts 16 3). But he saw that a principle was at stake and in most of his epistles he points out the sheer futility of the contention of the Judaizers. (See commentaries on Rom and Gal.)

In a few suggestive passages we find a fig. application of the term. For three years after the settlement in Canaan the "fruit of the land"

4. Figurative Uses was to be considered as "uncircumcised" (Lev 19 23), i.e. it was the property of the Baalim, the gods of Pal. The fruit of the fourth year belonged to Yahweh. Moses with characteristic humility describes himself as a man of "uncircumcised lips" (Ex 6 30). Jeremiah charges his contemporaries with having their ear uncircumcised (Jer 6 10) and their heart (9 26). "An uncircumcised heart is one which is, as it were, closed in, and so impervious to good influences and good impressions, just as an uncircumcised ear (Jer 6 10) is an ear which, from the same cause, hears imperfectly; and uncircumcised lips (cf Ex 6 12,30) are lips which open and speak with difficulty" (Driver on Dt 10 16).

Several words are rendered by "cistern," "well," "pool," the relations of which in AV and RV are as follows:

"Cistern," בֹּרֶךְ, bō'r (Jer 2 13, etc), or בֹּרֶךְ, bō'r (2 K 18 31). The latter word is frequently in AV trd "well." RV in these cases changes to "cistern" in text (Dt 6 11; 2 Ch 26 10; Neh 9 25) or m (1 S 19 22, etc).

The words גִּבְהָה, gebhe' (Isa 30 14), גִּבְהָה, gebhe' (Jer 14 3), rendered "pit" in AV are changed to "cistern" RV (the latter in ARV only).

The proper Heb word for "well" is בְּעֵר, be'er (seen in Beer-sheba, "well of the oath," Gen 21 31), but other terms are thus rendered in AV, as עֵינַן, 'ayin (Gen 24 13, 16, etc, and frequently), מַעְיָן, ma'yān (Josh 15 15), מַקְוֶה, māqōr (Prov 10 11). In these cases RV usually changes to "fountain"; in Ex 15 27, however, it renders 'ayin by "springs," and in Ps 84 6, ma'yān by "place of springs."

"Pool," אֲגָם, 'āgham (Isa 14 23, etc; in AV, Ex 7 19; 8 5, rendered "ponds"); more frequently בְּרֵכָה, berēkhāh (2 S 2 13; 4 12, etc). In Ps 84 6 the cognate בְּרֵכָה, berākḥāh, is changed to "blessing."

In the NT "well" represents the two words: πηγή, pēgē (Jn 4 6, 14; in RVm "spring"; 2 Pet 2 17; RV renders "springs"), and φερέα, phréar (Jn 4 11, 12). "Pool" is κολυμβήθρα, kolumbēthra, in Jn 5 2, 4, 7, 9, 11.

The efforts made to supplement the natural water supply, both in agricultural and in populated areas, before as well as after the Conquest, are clearly seen in the innumerable cisterns, wells and pools which abound throughout Pal. The rainy season, upon which the various storage systems depend, commences at the end of October and ends in the beginning of May. In Jerus, the mean rainfall in 41 years up to 1901 was 25.81 in., falling in a mean number of 56 days (see Glaisher, Meteorological Observations, 24). Toward the end of summer, springs and wells, where they have not actually dried up, diminish very considerably, and cisterns and open reservoirs become at times the only sources of supply. Cisterns are fed from surface and roof drainage. Except in the rare instances where springs occur, wells depend upon percolation. The great open reservoirs or pools are fed from surface drainage and, in some cases, by aqueducts from springs or from more distant collecting pools. In the case of private cisterns, it is the custom of the country today to close up the inlets during the early days of the rain, so as to permit of a general wash down of gathering surfaces, before admitting the water. Cisterns, belonging to the common natives, are rarely cleansed, and the inevitable scum which collects is dispersed by plunging the pitcher several times before drawing water. When the water is considered to be bad, a somewhat primitive cure is applied by dropping earth into the cistern, so as to sink all impurities with it, to the bottom. The accumulation often found in ancient cisterns probably owes some of its presence to this same habit.

It is necessary to include wells under the head of cisterns, as there appears to be some confusion in the use of the two terms. Wells, so called,

2. Wells were more often deep cylindrical reservoirs, the lower part of which was sunk in the rock and cemented, the upper part being built with open joints, to receive the surface percolation. They were often of great depth. Job's well at Jerus, which is certainly of great antiquity, is 125 ft. deep (see PEF, "Jerus," 371).

FIG. 2.—Reservoir at Gezer.

The discovery of "living water" when digging a well, recorded in Gen 26 19 m, appears to have been an unusual incident. Uzziah hewed out many cisterns in the valley for his cattle (2 Ch 26 9, 10 RV), and he built towers, presumably to keep watch over both cattle and cisterns. Isaac "dug again the wells" which had been filled in by the Philis (Gen 26 18). Wells were frequently dug in the plain, far from villages, for flocks and herds, and rude stone troughs were provided nearby. The well was usually covered with a stone, through which a hole was pierced sufficiently large to allow of free access for the pitchers. A stone was placed over this hole (Gen 29 10) when the well was not in use. The great amount of pottery found in ancient cisterns suggests that clay pots were used for drawing water (see Bible Sidelights, 88). Jos (Ant, IV, viii, 37) elucidates the passage in Ex 21 33 requiring the mouth of a "pit" or "well" to be covered with planks against accidents. This would seem to apply to wide-mouthed wells which had not been narrowed over to receive a stone cover. It may have been a well or cistern similar to these into which Joseph was cast (Gen 37 24). In fact, dry-wells and cisterns formed such effective dungeons, that it is very probable they were often used for purposes of detention. From earliest times, wells have been the cause of much strife. The covenant between Abimelech and Abraham at Beersheba (Gen 21 32) was a necessity, no less pressing then than it is now. The well, today, is a center of life in the East. Women gather around it in pursuit of their daily duties, and travelers, man and beast, divert their course thereto, if needs be, for refreshment; and news of the outer world is carried to and from the well. It is, in fact, an all-important center, and daily presents a series of characteristic Bible scenes. The scene between Rebekah and the servant of Abraham (Gen 24 11 ff) is one with frequent parallels. The well lies usually at some little distance from the village or city. Abraham's servant made his "camels to kneel down without the city by the well of water at the time of the evening, the time that women go out to draw water." Saul and his servant found young maidens going out of the city to draw water (1 S 9 11). Moses helped the daughters of the priest of Midian at the well, which was evidently at some distance from habitation (Ex 2 16 ff).

Private cisterns must be distinguished from public cisterns or wells. They were smaller and were sunk in the rocks within private boundaries, each owner having his own cistern

3. Private Cisterns (2 K 18 31; Prov 5 15). Ancient sites are honeycombed with these cisterns. A common type in Jerus seems to have been bottle-shaped in section, the extended bottom part being in the softer rock, and the narrow neck in the hard upper stratum. Many irregularly shaped cisterns occur with rock vaults supported by rock or masonry piers. Macalister tells of the discovery at Gezer of a small silt catch-pit attached to a private cistern, and provided with an overflow channel leading to the cistern. It is an early instance of a now well-known method of purification. The universal use of cement rendering to the walls of the cisterns was most necessary to seal up the fissures of the rock. The "broken cisterns" (Jer 2 13) probably refer to insufficiently sealed cisterns.

Besides private cisterns there were huge public rock-cut cisterns within the city walls. The great

4. Public Cisterns Jerus show a most extensive system of water storage (see Recovery of Jerus, ch vii). There are 37 of these described in PEF, "Jerus," 217 ff, and the greatest is an immense rock-cut cavern the roof of which is partly rock and partly stone, supported by rock piers (see Fig. 1, PEF). It is 43 ft. deep with a storage capacity of over two million gallons and there are numerous access manholes. This cistern is fed by an aqueduct from Solomon's Pools about 10 miles distant by road, and is locally known as Bahar el Kebir, the "Great Sea." One of the most recent and one of the most interesting rock-cut reservoirs yet discovered is that at Gezer. (See PEFS, 1908, 96 ff.) In this example, the pool of spring water is reached by a great rock-tunnel staircase which descends 94 ft. 6 in. from the surface. The staircase diminishes in size as it descends, and at its greatest, it is 23 ft. high and 12 ft. 10 in. wide (see section Fig. 2). These proportions may seem unnecessarily large, but may be accounted for by the necessity for providing light at the water level. As a matter of fact, the brink of the pool receives the light from above. The work dates back to pre-Israelite times.

Open pools were common in every city. They were cut out of the rock and were built and cemented at points where occasion

5. Pools and Aqueducts demanded. They were often of great size. The pool outside Jerus known as Birket es Sultan measures 555 ft. \times 220 ft. \times 36 ft. deep, and the so-called Hezekiah's Pool within the walls, is 240 ft. \times 144 ft. \times about 20 ft. deep. The latter probably owes its surface drainage, and in some cases by aqueducts from springs at some distance away. They seem to have been at the public service, freely accessible to both man and beast. Pools situated outside the city walls were sometimes connected by aqueducts with pools within the city, so that the water could be drawn within the walls in time of siege. The so-called Pools of Solomon, three in number (see Fig. 3), situated about 10 miles by road from Jerus, are of large proportions and are fed by surface water and by aqueducts from springs. The water from these pools is conveyed in a wonderfully engineered course, known as the lower-level aqueduct, which searches the winding contours of the Judaeen hills for a distance of about 15 miles, before reaching its destination in "the great sea" under the Temple area (Fig. 1). This aqueduct is still in use, but its date is uncertain (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, 131, where the author finds reason for ascribing it to the period of Herod). The course and destination of another aqueduct known as the high-level aqueduct is less definite. These aqueducts are of varying dimensions. The low-level aqueduct at a point just before it enters the Temple area was found to measure 3 ft. high \times 2 ft. 3 in. wide, partly rock-cut and partly built, and rendered in smooth-troweled cement, with well-squared stone covers (see PEF, Excavations at Jerus, 53 ff). There are many remains of rock-cut aqueducts throughout Pal (see Fig. 4) which seem to indicate their use in early Heb times, but the lack of OT references to these works is difficult to account for, unless it is argued that in some cases they date back to pre-Israelite times. The great tunnel and pool at Gezer lends a measure of support to this hypothesis. On the other hand, a plea for a Heb origin is also in a measure strengthened by the very slight reference in the OT to such a great engineering feat as the cutting of the Siloam tunnel, which is doubtless the work of Hezekiah. The pool of Siloam was originally a simple rock-cut reservoir within the walls, and was constructed by Hezekiah (2 Ch 32 30). It measures 75 ft. \times 71 ft. It is the upper pool of Isa 7 3. A lower overflow pool existed immediately beyond, contained by the city wall across the Tyropeon valley. The aqueduct which supplies the upper pool takes a tortuous course of about 1,700 ft. through the solid rock from the Virgin's origin to the rock-cut fosse of early Jewish date. The Birket es Sultan, on the other hand, probably dates from the time of the Turkish occupation.

fountain, an intermittent spring on the E. slope of the hill. The water reaches the pool on the S.W. of the spur of Ophel, and it was in the rock walls of this aqueduct that the famous Siloam inscription recording the completion of the work was discovered.

Herod embellished the upper pool, lining it with stone and building arches around its four sides (see PEF, Excavations at Jerus, 154 ff), and the pool was most likely in this condition in the time of Christ (Jn 9 6.7). There are numerous other pools, cisterns and aqueducts in and around Jerus, which provide abundant evidence of the continual struggle after water, made by its occupants of all times (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, ch v, vol I). See also PIT; WELL, etc.

Good wives are described as cisterns (Prov 5 15 ff). "The left ventricle of the heart, which retains the blood till it be redispersed through the body, is called a cistern" (Eccl 12 6). Figurative Uses 6). Idols, armies and material objects in which Israel trusted were "broken cisterns" (Jer 2 13, see above) "soon emptied of all the aid and comfort which they possess, and cannot fill themselves again."

CITHERN, sith'ērñ (κithára, kithára; 1 Macc 4 54 AV, kithárais kai kinúrais is tr^d "citherns and harps"; RV "harps and lutes"; cf guitar, zither): As 1 Macc was originally written in Heb, it is natural to suppose that these two Gr words stand for Heb nəbhālīm and kinnōrōth; but to this it may be objected that kithara and kinura are not used elsewhere together to represent two different instruments. On the contrary we have either kinura kai nablá or kithara kai psalterion. The most probable explanation of the unusual collocation of these two words in 1 Macc is that kithara was a gloss meant to explain the obsolescent kinura. See MUSIC.

CITIES, LEVITICAL. See LEVITICAL CITIES; CITY.

CITIES OF REFUGE. See REFUGE, CITIES OF.

CITIES, sit'iz, OF THE PLAIN, plān, CICCAR (קִכְכָּר הַיָּרְדֵּן, kikkar ha-yardēn): Included Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim and Zoar. The locality is first referred to in Gen 13 10, where it is said that Lot "lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the Plain of the Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before Jeh destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, like the garden of Jeh, like the land of Egypt, as thou goest unto Zoar." The word tr^d plain is kikkār, "circle." In this ver, and in the 11th, as well as in 1 K 7 46 and Mt 3 5, we have the full phrase "circle of the Jordan." Elsewhere (Gen 13 12; 19 17.29; Dt 34 3; 2 S 18 23) the word for "circle" is used alone with the art. Until recently the traditional view that this circle of the Jordan was at the south end of the Dead Sea was universally maintained. The arguments in favor of this view are: (1) The name of Sodom is preserved in Jebel Usdum—Usdum having the same consonants with Sodom; moreover, the name is known to have referred to a place in that region as early as the days of Galen (De Simpl. medic. Facult., 4.19) who describes certain "salts of Sodom" from the mountains surrounding the lake which are called Sodom. (2) Zoar seems to have been represented in the Middle Ages by a place which the Crusaders called Segore, and Arab. writers Zoghar. Under the name Zughar or Sughar the place is often referred to by mediaeval Arabian geographers as situated 1° S. of Jericho "at the end of the Dead Sea" and as a station on the route between the Gulf of Akabah and Jericho, two days' journey from Jericho. Ptolemy (v.17.5) reckons Zoar as belonging to Arabia Petrea. Eusebius (Onom, 261) describes the Dead Sea as lying between Jericho and Zoar. Jos (Ant, I, xi, 4) makes the Dead Sea extend 580 stadia "as far as Zoar of Arabia" (Wars, IV, viii, 4). These references would locate Zoar at the base of the mountains just S.E. of the Dead Sea, and, as it was within easy reach of Sodom, from which Lot fled, would fix the Cities of the Plain in that locality. Jerome (Comm. on Isa 15 5) says that Zoar was in the borders of Moab.

On the other hand, it is maintained that the "kikkar of the Jordan" lay N. of the Dead Sea for the following reasons: (1) That is the region which is visible from the heights of Bethel whence Abraham and Lot looked down upon it (Gen 13 10), while the south end of the lake is not visible. But it may be answered that the phrase need not be limited to the actual region in sight, but may have included the whole known extension of the valley. (2) Zoar was said to be in range of Moses' vision from the top of Pisgah (Dt 34 1-3), whereas the south end of the Dead Sea is invisible from that point, on account of intervening mountains. But this description in Dt evidently is not intended to be limited to the points which are actually visible, but should be understood as describing the extreme limits of the land some points of which are visible in their near vicinity. Certainly the vision did not comprehend all portions of Dan or Judah "unto the hinder sea." The phrase from Jericho to Zoar is like "from Dan to Beersheba." The mountain heights overlooking Zoar were certainly visible. (3) In Gen 14 the four kings coming up from Kadesh attacked the Amorites "that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar" before reaching Sodom, and Hazezon-tamar is to be identified with Engedi. On the other hand, it is possible that it is to be identified with the Tamar of Ezk 47 19; 48 28, and that this place lay S.W. of the Dead Sea. Or, if that explanation is not accepted, it is proper to note that the course of this expedition led at first a considerable distance S. of the Dead Sea through Mt. Seir to El-paran, when "they smote all the country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites." In accomplishing this they would naturally be led along the highland to Hebron from which they could easily descend to Engedi, whence they could proceed without difficulty to the south end of the Dead Sea. Besides, it is by no means certain that there was not an easy passage along the whole western shore of the Dead Sea at that time. See DEAD SEA. (4) It is argued that the region at the south end of the Dead Sea could not be described "as the garden of the Lord," etc. Neither, for that matter, could the region around the north end be so described in its present condition. But, on the other hand, the region S. of the sea is by no means as devoid of vegetation as is sometimes represented, while there are convincing arguments to prove that formerly it was much more extensive and fertile than now. To the fertility of this area there is no more capable witness than Professor Hull, though he is an ardent advocate of the location of these cities at the north end of the lake. This appears both in his original diary, and in his more mature and condensed account contained in his article on the Dead Sea in HDB, where he writes, "When, in December, 1883, the writer found himself standing on the edge of the terrace overlooking the Ghôr, he beheld at his feet a wide plain stretching away northward toward the margin of the Dead Sea, and to a large extent green with vegetation and thickets of small trees. To the right in an open space were seen several large Bedāwin camps, from which the shouts of wild men, the barking of dogs, and the bellowing of camels ascended. Numerous flocks of black goats and white sheep were being tended by women in long blue cloaks; and on the party of travelers being observed, groups of merry children came tripping up toward the path accompanied by a few of the elders, and, ranging themselves in a line, courteously returned salutations. Here the Arabs remain enjoying the warmth of the plain till the increasing heat of the summer's sun calls them away to their high pasture grounds on the table-land of Edom and Moab. At a short distance farther toward the shore of the lake is the village of Es-Safieh, inhabited by a tribe of fellāhin called the Ghawarneh, who by means of irrigation from the Wady el-Hessi cultivate with success fields of wheat, maize, dhurah, indigo and cotton, while they rear herds of camels and flocks of sheep and goats. On the produce of these fields the Arabs largely depend for their supplies of food and raiment, which they obtain by a kind of rude, often compulsory, barter."

CITIES, STORE, stōr. See CITY.

CITIMS, sit'imz. See CHITTIM (1 Macc 8 5 AV).

CITIZENSHIP, sit'i-zen-ship: All the words in use connected with this subject are derived from πόλις, pólis, "city." These words, with the meanings which they have in the Bible, are the nouns, πολίτης, polítēs, "citizen"; πολιτεία, politéia, "citizenship"; πολιτεύμα, políteuma, "commonwealth"; συμπολίτης, sumpolítēs, "fellow-citizen"; and the verb, πολιτεύω, políteuō, "to behave as a citizen." Each will be considered more fully in its proper place.

(1) The word for citizen is sometimes used to indicate little if anything more than the inhabitant of a city or country. "The citizens of that country" (Lk 15 15); "His citizens hated him" (Lk 19 14). Also the quotation from the LXX, "They shall not teach every man his fellow-citizen" (He 8 11; cf Jer 31 34). So also in the Apoc (2 Macc 4 50; 5 6; 9 19).

(2) Roman citizenship.—This is of especial interest to the Bible student because of the apostle Paul's relation to it. It was one of his qualifications as the apostle to the Gentiles. Luke shows him in Acts as a Rom citizen, who, though a Jew and a Christian, receives, for the most part, justice and courtesy from the Rom officials, and more than once successfully claims its privileges. He himself declares that he was a citizen of Tarsus (Acts 21 39). He was not only born in that city but had a citizen's rights in it. See PAUL; TARSUS.

But this citizenship in Tarsus did not of itself confer upon Paul the higher dignity of Rom citizenship. Had it done so, Claudius Lysias would not have ordered him to be scourged, as he did, after having learned that he was a citizen of Tarsus (Acts 21 39; cf 22 25). So, over and above this Tarsian citizenship, was the Rom one, which availed for him not in one city only, but throughout the Rom world and secured for him everywhere certain great immunities and rights. Precisely what all of these were we are not certain, but we know that, by the Valerian and Porcian laws, exemption from shameful punishments, such as scourging with rods or whips, and esp. crucifixion, was secured to every Rom citizen; also the right of appeal to the emperor with certain limitations. This sanctity of person had become almost a part of their religion, so that any violation was esteemed a sacrilege. Cicero's oration against Verres indicates the almost fanatical extreme to which this feeling had been carried. Yet Paul had been thrice beaten with rods, and five times received from the Jews forty stripes save one (2 Cor 11 24,25). Perhaps it was as at Philippi before he made known his citizenship (Acts 16 22,23), or the Jews had the right to whip those who came before their own tribunals. Rom citizenship included also the right of appeal to the emperor in all cases, after sentence had been passed, and no needless impediment must be interposed against a trial. Furthermore, the citizen had the right to be sent to Rome for trial before the emperor himself, when charged with capital offences (Acts 16 37; 22 25-29; 25 11).

How then had Paul, a Jew, acquired this valued dignity? He himself tells us. In contrast to the parvenu citizenship of the chief captain, who seems to have thought that Paul also must have purchased it, though apparently too poor, Paul quietly says, "But I was free born" (AV; "a Roman born" RV, Acts 22 28). Thus either Paul's father or some other ancestor had acquired the right and had transmitted it to the son.

What more natural than that Paul should sometimes use this civic privilege to illustrate spiritual truths? He does so a number of times.

3. Meta- Before the Sanhedrin he says, in the phorical and words of our Eng. VSS, "I have lived Spiritual before God in all good conscience" (Acts 23 1). But this tr does not bring out the sense. Paul uses a noticeable word, políteuō, "to live as a citizen." He adds, "to God" (τῷ Θεῷ, tō Theō). That is to say, he had lived conscientiously as God's citizen, as a member of God's commonwealth. The day before, by appealing to his Rom citizenship, he had saved himself from ignominious whipping, and now what more natural than that he should declare that he had been true to his citizenship in a higher state? What was this higher commonwealth in which he has enjoyed the rights and performed the duties of a citizen? What but the theocracy of his fathers, the ancient church, of which the Sanhedrin was still the ostensible representative, but which was really continued in the kingdom of Christ without the national restrictions of the older one? Thus Paul does not mean to say simply, "I have lived conscientiously before God," but "I have lived as a citizen to God, of the body of which He is the immediate Sovereign." He had lived theocratically as a faithful member of the Jewish church, from which his enemies claimed he was an apostate. Thus Paul's conception was a kind of blending of two ideas or feelings, one of which came from the old theocracy, and the other from his Rom citizenship.

Later, writing from Rome itself to the Philippians, who were proud of their own citizenship as members of a colonia, a reproduction on a small scale of the parent commonwealth, where he had once successfully maintained his own Rom rights, Paul forcibly brings out the idea that Christians are citizens of a heavenly commonwealth, urging them to live worthy of such honor (Phil 1 27 m).

A similar thought is brought out when he says, "For our commonwealth [políteuma] is in heaven" (Phil 3 20 m). The state to which we belong is heaven. Though absent in body from the heavenly commonwealth, as was Paul from Rome when he asserted his rights, believers still enjoy its civic privileges and protections; sojourners upon earth, citizens of heaven. The OT conception, as in Isa 60-62, would easily lend itself to this idea, which appears in He 11 10.16; 12 22-24; 13 14; Gal 4 26, and possibly in Rev 21. See also ROME.

Later Sem intruders occupied the site, stone houses were built, and high stone defence walls were substituted for the earthen stone-cased ramparts. These later walls were much higher and stronger

LITERATURE

I. Canaanite City.—The development of the Can. city has been traced by Macalister in his report on the excavation at Gezer (PEFS, 1904, 108 ff). It originated on the slopes of a bare rocky spur, in which the Neolithic Troglodytes quarried their habitations out of the solid rock, the stones therefrom being used to than those of the Neolithic occupation and were the walls seen by the Israelites when they viewed the country of their promise.

"The people that dwell in the land are strong, and the cities are fortified, and very great" (Nu 13 28) was the report of the spies sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan, to see "what cities they are that they dwell in, whether in camps, or in strongholds" (Nu 13 19.20). The difficulties of the task set before the advancing Israelites and their appreciation of the strength of the cities, is here recorded, and also in Dt 1 28: "The people are greater and taller than we; the cities are great and fortified up to heaven; and moreover we have seen the sons of the Anakim there." This assessment of greatness was based upon comparative ignorance of such fortifications and the want of war experience and the necessary implements of assault. It need not, therefore, be supposed that the cities were "great" except by comparison in the eyes of a tent-dwelling and pastoral people. On the contrary, most recent exploration has proved that they were small (see Père Vincent, Canaan, 27, n. 3, and Pl. I, where comparative measurements of the areas of ancient cities show that, in nine cities compared, Tell Sandahannah [barely 6 acres] is the smallest). Gezer measures approximately 22½ acres and Tell el-Hesi somewhat greater. By way of illustration, it is interesting to note that the Acropolis at Athens, roughly computed, measures 7½ acres, while the Castle Rock at Edinburgh is about 6 acres, or the same as the whole Seleucid city of Tell Sandahannah (see Fig. 1). The Acropolis at Tell Zakariya measures about 2 acres or nearly one-fourth of the area of the whole city (about 8½ acres). It is unlikely that Jebus (Jerusalem) itself was an exception, although in Solomonian and later times it extended to a far greater area.

Besides the walled cities there were "unwalled [country] towns a great many" (Dt 3 5), "villages," unfortified suburbs, lying near to and

3. Villages under the protection of the walled cities and occupied by the surplus population.

The almost incredible number of cities and their villages mentioned in the OT, while proving the clannishness of their occupants, proves,

4. Sites at the same time, their comparatively small scale. Traces of similar populations that rise and fall are seen in China and Japan today. As a little poem says of Karakura:

"Where were palaces and merchants and the blades of warriors, Now are only the cicadas and waving blades of grass."

"Cities that stood on their mounds" (Josh 11 13; Jer 30 18) as at Lachish and Taanach are distinguished from those built on natural hills or spurs of hills, such as Jebus, Gezer, Tell es Safi (Gath?), Bethshemesh (see Vincent, Canaan, 26 ff). The Arab. name "Tell" is applied to all mounds of ancient cities, whether situated on a natural eminence or on a plain, and the word is common in the geographical nomenclature of Pal. Sites were chosen near a water supply, which was ever the most essential qualification. For purposes of defence, the nearest knoll or spur was selected. Sometimes these knolls were of no great height and their subsequent elevation is accounted for by the gradual accumulation of debris from town refuse and from frequent demolitions; restoration being effected after a leveling up of the ruins of the razed city (see Fig. 2: Tell el-Hesi, PEF, which shows a section of the Tell from which the levels of the successive cities in distinct stratification were recovered). Closely packed houses, in narrow alleys, with low, rude mud, brick, or stone and mud walls, with timber and mud roofs, burned readily and were easily razed to the ground (Josh 8 1 ff; 11 11).

It would seem that, viewed from the outside, these cities had the appearance of isolated forts, the surrounding walls being strengthened at frequent intervals, with towers. The gates were approached by narrow roads, which mounted the slopes of the mound at the meeting-point of the meandering paths on the plain below (see Fig. 3). The walls of Tell el-

Judeideh were strengthened by towers building within the walls was visible, except possibly the inner tower or stronghold. The whole of the interior of the early Jerus (Jebus) was visible from the hills to the E., but this peculiarity of position is uncommon. Strong and high walls, garrisoned by men-at-arms seen only through the battlements, showed no weakness, and the gates, with their narrow and steep approaches and projecting defence towers, looked uninviting traps (Fig. 5). The mystery of these unseen interiors could therefore be easily conjured into an exaggeration of strength.

The inhabitants of the villages (בָּנוֹת, bānōth, "daughters," Nu 32 42m) held feudal occupation and gave service to their lord of the

6. General city (עִיר, 'ēm, "mother," 2 S 20 19), in defence of their own or in attacks on their neighbor's property. Such were the cities of the truculent, marauding kings of Canaan, whose broken territories lent themselves to the upkeep of a condition, of the weakness of which, the Israelites, in their solid advance, took ready advantage.

II. Jewish Occupation.—After the conquest, and the abandonment of the pastoral life for that of agriculture and general trade, the condition of the cities varied but little, except that they were, from time to time, enlarged and strengthened. Solomon's work at Jerus was a step forward, but there is little evidence that, in the other cities which he is credited with having put his hands to, there was any embellishment. Megiddo and Gezer at least show nothing worthy of the name. Greek influence brought with it the first real improvements in city building; and the later work of Herod raised cities to a grandeur which was previously undreamt of among the Jews. Within the walls, the main points considered in the "layout" were, the Tower or Stronghold, the High Place, the Broad Place by the Gate, and the Market-Place.

The Tower or Stronghold was an inner fort which held a garrison and commander, and was provisioned with "victuals, and oil and

1. The wine" (2 Ch 11 11), to which the Tower or defenders of the city when hard Stronghold pressed betook themselves, as a last resource. The men of the tower of Shechem held out against Abimelech (Jgs 9 49) who was afterward killed by a stone thrown by a woman from the Tower of Thebez "within the city" (Jgs 9 51.53). David took the stronghold of Zion, "the same is the city of David" (2 S 5 7), which name (Zion) was afterward applied to the whole city. It is not unlikely that the king's house was included in the stronghold. Macalister (PEFS, 1907, 192 ff) reports the discovery of a Canaanite castle with enormously thick walls abutting against the inside of the city wall. The strongholds at Taanach and Tell el-Hesi are similarly placed; and the Acropolis at Tell Zakariya lies close to, but independent of, the city wall.

gate, the Broad Place had a defensive value, in that it admitted of concentration against the forcing of the gate. There does not seem to have been any plan of either a Can. or early Jewish city, in which this question of defence did not predominate. Open areas within the city were "waste places" (Isa 58 12) and were not an integral part of the plan.

FIG. 4.—WALLS OF TELL EL-JUDEIDEH.

The High Place was an important feature in all Can. cities and retained its importance long after the conquest (1 S 9 12 ff; 1 K 3 2; 2. The Am 7 9). It was a sanctuary, where High Place sacrifices were offered and feasts were held, and men did "eat before Jeh" (Dt 14 26). The priests, as was their custom, received their portion of the flesh (1 S 2 12 ff). The High Place discovered at Gezer (Bible Side-lights, ch iii) is at a lower level than the city surrounding it, and lies N. and S. It is about 100 ft. in length, and when complete consisted of a row of ten rude undressed standing stones, of which eight are still remaining, the largest being 10 ft. 6 in. high, and the others varying to much smaller sizes. See HIGH PLACE.

The Broad Place (Neh 8 1.3.16; Jer 5 1) seems to have been, usually, immediately inside the city gate. It was not, in early Jewish cities, an extensive open area, but Broad Place simply a widening of the street, and was designated "broad" by comparison with the neighboring alleys, dignified by the name of street. It took the place of a general exchange. Justice was dispensed (Ruth 4 2) and punishment was administered. Jeremiah was put in "the stocks that were in the upper gate of Benjamin" (Jer 20 2), proclamations were read, business was transacted, and the news and gossip of the day were exchanged. It was a place for all classes to congregate (Job 29 7 m; Prov 31 23), and was also a market-place (2 K 7 1). In later times, the market-place became more typically a market square of the Gr agora plan, with an open area surrounded by covered shelters. The present market-place at Haifa resembles this. Probably it was this type of market-place referred to in Mt 11 16; 20 3 and Lk 7 32; 11 43. The street inside the Damascus gate of Jerus today is, in many ways, similar to the Broad Place, and retains many of its ancient uses. Here, Bedouin and Fellahin meet from the outlying districts to barter, to arbitrate, to find debtors and to learn the news of the day. Lying as it did immediately inside the

The streets serving these quarters were not laid out on any fixed plan. They were, in fact, narrow, unpaved alleys, all seeming of equal importance, gathering themselves crookedly to the various centers. Having ingfixed the positions of the City Gates, the Stronghold and the High Place, the inhabitants appear to have been allowed to situate themselves the best way they could, without restriction of line or frontage. Houses were of modest proportions and were poorly built; planned, most often, in utter disregard of the square, and presenting to the street more or less dead walls, which were either topped by parapets or covered with projecting wood and mud roofs (see ARCHITECTURE, Fig. 1; HOUSE).

FIG. 5.—City Gate.

The streets, as in the present day in Pal, were allocated to separate trades: "bakers' street" (Jer 37 21), place "of the merchants" (Neh 3 31.32 AV), "goldsmiths," etc. The Valley of the Cheese-makers was a street in the Tyropoeon Valley at Jerus.

king's lands were farmed by his subjects for his own benefit, and considerable tracts of lands belonged to the aristocracy. The most of the lands, however, belonged to the cities and villages, and were allotted among the free husbandmen. Various cereals were raised, wheat and barley being most commonly cultivated. The soil was tilled and the crops reaped and threshed in much the same manner and with much the same implements as are now used in Syria. Cities lying in main trade routes developed various industries more quickly than those whose positions were out of touch with foreign traffic. Crafts and trades, unknown to the early Jews, were at first monopolized by foreigners who, as a matter of course, were elbowed out as time progressed. Cities on the seaboard of Phoenicia depended chiefly on maritime trade. Money, in the form of ingots and bars of precious metals, "weighed out" (2 K 12 11), was current in preëxilic times, and continued in use after foreign coinage had been introduced. The first native coinage dates from the Maccabean period (see Madden, Jewish Coinage, ch iv). Slavery was freely trafficked in, and a certain number of slaves were attached to the households of the more wealthy. Although they were the absolute property of their masters, they enjoyed certain religious privileges not extended to the "sojourners" or "strangers" who sought the protection of the cities, often in considerable numbers.

The king's private property, from which he drew full revenue, lay partly within the city, but to a greater extent beyond it (1 S 8 15, 16). In addition to his private property, he received tithes of fields and flocks, "the tenth part of your seed." He also drew a tax in the shape of certain "king's mowings" (Am 7 1). Vassal kings paid tribute; Mesha, king of Moab, rendered wool "unto the king of Israel" (2 K 3 4).

See G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, I, chs v-x, for detailed account of the conditions of Jewish city life. For details of government, see ELDER; JUDGES; SANDERIN.

III. Store Cities.—These were selected by Solomon and set aside for stores of victuals, chariots, horsemen, etc (1 K 9 19). Jehoshaphat "built in Judah castles and cities of store" (2 Ch 17 12). Twelve officers were appointed by Solomon to provision his household, each officer being responsible for the supply in one month in the year (1 K 4 7). There were also "storehouses in the fields, in the cities, and in the villages" (1 Ch 27 25 AV).

IV. The Levitical Cities.—These were apportioned 13 to the children of Aaron, 10 to Kohath, 13 to Gershon, 12 to Merari, 48 cities in all (Josh 21 13 ff), 6 of which were cities of Refuge (Nu 35 6); see REFUGE, CITIES OF. For further details see ARCHITECTURE; HOUSE.

The name 'ir ha-heres, "the city of overthrow," is evidently a play upon 'ir ha-heres, "city of the sun," a designation of Heliopolis (same meaning; cf the name for this city, Beth-shemesh, Jer 43 13), in Egyptian, On (Gen 41 45), which last name Ezekiel, by a similar play on sound, changes into Aven. CITY, RULERS, rōol'ērzh, OF: The EV rendering of the πολιτάρχαι, politárchai, of Thessalonica, before whom Jason and the other Christians were dragged by the mob (Acts 17 6, 8). The term distinguishes the magistrates of a free Gr city from the ordinary Rom officials. It primarily denotes "rulers of the citizens," and hence was used only of magistrates of free cities. The term seems to have been confined largely to Macedonia, although there have been found a few inscriptions elsewhere in which it is used. The use of this term well illustrates the accuracy of the author of the Book of Acts, for while politarchai is not used by classical authors, this form is attested by a number of Macedonian inscriptions. Much work has been done in this field in recent years and the results throw light on the reference in Acts. Of the inscriptions that have been found at least five belong to Thessalonica (see art. by Professor Burton, in the AJT of 1898, "The Politarchs").

"The rulers" of Philippi, before whom Paul and Silas were brought, is the EV rendering of ἀρχοντες, archontes, which is commonly used in the NT (Acts 16 19). This is the ordinary term for "rulers" and is not the same as "rulers of the city."

A. W. FORTUNE

CLAP: An emphatic expression of joy, "They clapped their hands [nākhāh], and said, Long live [AV "God save"] the king" (2 K 11 12); "Oh clap your hands [tāka], all ye peoples" (Ps 47 1); or exultation (sāphak, Lam 2 15; māhā, Ezk 26 6; tāka, Nah 3 19); or repudiation (sāphak, Job 27 23; 34 37).

Figurative: To denote Nature's "sympathy" with God's people. "Let the floods clap [māhā] their hands" (Ps 98 8); "All the trees of the field shall clap their hands" (Isa 55 12; cf Jgs 5 20).

CLASPS, klasps (קָרָס, keres): The word occurs nine times in Ex 26, 36, and 39, which record the specifications for the erection of the tabernacle and their subsequent carrying out. In each of these passages the AV renders "taches"—an early Eng. word of French origin now embodied in our "attachment." 50 clasps or taches of gold were ordered to be used in connecting together the two sets of inner tapestry curtains (10 in number) of the tabernacle (Ex 26 6), and 50 clasps of brass (bronze) were similarly to be used in joining the two sets of goats' hair curtains (11 in number) which formed the outer covering (26 11). See TABERNACLE. As to the nature of the clasp itself, it seems to have belonged to a double set of loops, opposite to each other, to one of which in each set, required to be of blue cord, a gold or brass button or pin was attached, which, being inserted into the loop opposite, kept the curtain in position (26 4-6).

A difficulty arises from the direction in Ex 26 33 that the veil which divided the "dwelling" into two parts—the holy place and the most holy—was to be suspended "under the clasps." If the clasps are supposed to be midway in the total length of the tabernacle, this would make the two holy places to be of equal size, contrary to the usual assumption that the outer was twice the length of the inner. The term "under" must therefore be used with some latitude, or the ordinary conception of the arrangement of the curtains, or of the size of the holy places will have to be revised (the dimensions are not actually given in the description).

W. SHAW CALDECOTT

CLAUDA, kl'ō'da. See CAUDA.

CLAUDIA, kl'ō'di-a (Κλαυδία, Klaudía): A member of the Christian congregation at Rome, who, with other members of that church, sends her greetings, through Paul, to Timothy (2 Tim 4 21). More than this concerning her cannot be said with certainty. The Apostolical Constitutions (VII, 21) name her as the mother of Linus, mentioned subsequently by Irenaeus and Eusebius as bishop of Rome. An ingenious theory has been proposed, upon the basis of the mention of Claudia and Pudens as husband and wife in an epigram of Martial, that they are identical with the persons of the same name here mentioned. A passage in the Agricola of Tacitus and an inscription found in Chichester, England, have been used in favor of the further statement that this Claudia was a daughter of a British king, Cogidubnus. See argument by Alford in the Prolegomena to 2 Tim in his Gr Testament. It is an example of how a very few data may be used to construct a plausible theory. If it be true, the contrast between their two friends, the apostle Paul, on the one hand, and the licentious poet, Martial, on the other, is certainly unusual. If in 2 Tim 4 21, Pudens and Claudia be husband and wife, it is difficult to explain how Linus occurs between them. See argument against this in Lightfoot, The Apostolic Fathers. H. E. JACOBS CLAUDIUS, kl'ō'di-us (Κλαύδιος, Klaúdios): Fourth Rom emperor. He reigned for over 13 years (41-54 AD), having succeeded Caius (Caligula) who had seriously altered the conciliatory policy of his predecessors regarding the Jews and, considering himself a real and corporeal god, had deeply offended the Jews by ordering a statue of himself to be placed in the temple of Jerus, as Antiochus Epiphanes had done with the statue of Zeus in the days of the Maccabees (2 Macc 6 2). Claudius reverted to the policy of Augustus and Tiberius and marked the opening year of his reign by issuing edicts in favor of the Jews (Ant, XIX, 5), who were permitted in all parts of the empire to observe their laws and customs in a free and peaceable manner, special consideration being given to the Jews of Alexandria who were to enjoy without molestation all their ancient rights and privileges. The Jews of Rome, however, who had become very numerous, were not allowed to hold assemblages there (Dio LX, vi, 6), an enactment in full correspondence with the general policy of Augustus regarding Judaism in the West. The edicts mentioned were largely due to the intimacy of Claudius with Herod Agrippa, grandson of Herod the Great, who had been living in Rome and had been in some measure instrumental in securing the succession for Claudius. As a reward for this service, the Holy Land had a king once more. Judaea was added to the tetrarchies of Philip and Antipas; and Herod Agrippa I was made ruler over the wide territory which had been governed by his grandfather. The Jews' own troubles during the reign of Caligula had given "rest" (ARV "peace") to the churches "throughout all Judaea and Galilee and Samaria" (Acts 9 31). But after the settlement of these troubles, "Herod the king put forth his hands to afflict certain of the church" (Acts 12 1). He slew one apostle and "when he saw that it pleased the Jews, he proceeded to seize" another (Acts 12 3). His miserable death is recorded in Acts 12 20-23, and in Ant, XIX, 8. This event which took place in the year 44 AD is held to have been coincident with one of the visits of Paul to Jerus. It has proved one of the chronological pivots of the apostolic history.

Whatever concessions to the Jews Claudius may have been induced out of friendship for Herod Agrippa to make at the beginning of his reign, Suetonius records (Claud. ch 25) "Judaeos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Roma expulit," an event assigned by some to the year 50 AD, though others suppose it to have taken place somewhat later. Among the Jews thus banished from Rome were Aquila and Priscilla with whom Paul became associated at Corinth (Acts 18 2). With the reign of Claudius is also associated the famine which was foretold by Agabus (Acts 11 28). Classical writers also report that the reign of Claudius was, from bad harvest or other causes, a period of general distress and scarcity over the whole world (Dio LX, 11; Suet. Claud. xviii; Tac. Ann. xi. 4; xiii.43; see Mommsen, Provinces of the Rom Empire, ch ix; and Conybeare and Howson, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, I). J. HUTCHISON

CLAUDIUS LYSIAS, kl'ō'di-us lis'i-as (Κλαύδιος Λυσίας, Klaúdios Lysias): A chief captain who intervened when the Jews sought to do violence to Paul at Jerus (Acts 21 31; 22 22). Lysias, who was probably a Greek by birth (cf 21 37), and who had probably assumed the Rom forename Claudius (23 26) when he purchased the citizenship (22 28), was a military tribune or chiliarch (i.e. leader of 1,000 men) in command of the garrison stationed in the castle overlooking the temple at Jerus. Upon learning of the riot instigated by the Asiatic Jews, he hastened down with his soldiers, and succeeded in rescuing Paul from the hands of the mob. As Paul was the apparent malefactor, Lysias bound him with two chains, and demanded to know who he was, and what was the cause of the disturbance. Failing amid the general tumult to get any satisfactory reply, he conducted Paul to the castle, and there questioned him as to whether he was the "Egyptian," an impostor that had lately been defeated by Felix (Jos, BJ, II, xiii, 5; Ant, XX, viii, 6). Upon receiving the answer of Paul that he was a "Jew of Tarsus," he gave him permission to address the people from the stairs which connected the castle and the temple. As the speech of Paul had no pacifying effect, Lysias purposed examining him by scourging; but on learning that his prisoner was a Rom citizen, he desisted from the attempt and released him from his bonds. The meeting of the Sanhedrin which Lysias then summoned also ended in an uproar, and having rescued Paul with difficulty he conducted him back to the castle. The news of the plot against the life of one whom he now knew to be a Rom citizen decided for Lysias that he could not hope to cope alone with so grave a situation. He therefore dispatched Paul under the protection of a bodyguard to Felix at Caesarea, along with a letter explaining the circumstances (23 26-30. The genuineness of this letter has been questioned by some, but without sufficient reason.) In this letter he took care to safeguard his own conduct, and to shield his hastiness in binding Paul. There is evidence (cf Acts 24 22) that Lysias was also summoned to Caesarea at a later date to give his testimony, but no mention is made of his arrival there. It is probable, however, that he was among the chief captains who attended the trial of Paul before King Agrippa and Festus (cf 25 22). For the reference to him in the speech of Tertullus (see 24 7 RVm), see TERTULLUS. C. M. KERR

CLAW, klō (פָּרָסָה, paršāh, lit. "hoof"): One of the marks of a "clean" animal is stated thus: "Every beast that parteth the hoof, and cleaveth the cleft into two claws, ye shall eat" (Dt 14 6 AV; RV "hath the hoof cloven in two"). See CHEW; CUD. AV uses the word "claws" where RV supplies "hoofs" in Zec 11 16, "and will tear their hoofs in pieces," as the sheep are being overdriven. In the only other passage containing the word (Dnl 4 33) there is no Heb equivalent in the original—"his nails like birds' [claws]."

CLAY, klā (חֹמֶר, hōmer, חֶסֶם, hāṣaph, טִיט, tīt, מֶלֶט, melet, עֲבִיר, ʾəbhī, מַצְבֵּה, ma'ābheh, עֲבָרִיט, ʾəbhūt; πηλός, pēlōs, "wet clay," "mud"): True clay, which is a highly aluminous soil, is found in certain localities in Pal, and is used in making pottery. The Heb and Gr words, as well as the Eng. "clay," are, however, used loosely for any sticky mud. In making mud bricks, true clay is not always used, but ordinary soil is worked up with water and mixed with straw, molded and left to dry in the sun. Hōmer (cf hēmār, "slime" or "bitumen") is rendered both "clay" and "mortar." Tīt is rendered "clay" or "mire." In Isa 41 25 we have: "He shall come upon rulers as upon mortar [hōmer], and as the potter treadeth clay" (tīt). In Nah 3 14, "Go into the clay [tīt], and tread the mortar [hōmer]; make strong the brickkiln" (i.e. make the walls ready to withstand a siege). Hāṣaph is the clay of the image in Nebuchadnezzar's dream (Dnl 2 33 ff). Melet occurs only in Jer 43 9, where we find: AV, "Take great stones . . . and hide them in the clay in the brickkiln"; RV, "hide them in mortar in the brickwork"; RVm, "lay them with mortar in the pavement." In Hab 2 6, ʾəbhūt (found only here) is rendered in AV "thick clay," as if from ʾəbhī and tīt, but RV has "pledges," referring the word to r. ʾābha, "to give a pledge." In 1 K 7 46, ma'ābheh hā-ʾādhāmāh (cf 2 Ch 4 17, ʾābhī hā-ʾādhāmāh) is the compact or clayey soil in the plain of Jordan between Succoth and Zarethan, in which Hiram cast the vessels of brass for Solomon's temple. In Jn 9 6.11.14, Thayer gives "made mud of the spittle"; in Rom 9 21, "wet clay." ALFRED ELY DAY

CLEAN, klēn (Anglo-Saxon clæne, "clear," "pure"): Rendering four Heb roots: בָּר, bar, etc, "purify," "select," "make shining"; זָךְ, zakh, etc, "bright," "clean," "pure"; נָקִי, nāqī, "free from," "exempt"; טָהֵר, tāhēr, "clean," "pure," "empty," "bright" (?) the principal root, rendered "clean" 80 times (AV); occurring in all its forms in various renderings about 200 times; also one Gr root, katharōs, katharōs, etc, akin to castus, "chaste," "free from admixture or adhesion of anything that soils, adulterates, corrupts" (Thayer's Lexicon). The physical, ritual, ethical, spiritual, figurative uses continually overlap, esp. the last four.

The physical use is infrequent: "Wash . . . with snow water, and make my hands never so clean"

(zākhakh, Job 9 30; figurative also); "clean provender" (hāmīc, RV "savory"; RVm "salted"); "Cleanse . . . inside of the cup and

1. Physical Physical cleansing, often figuratively used: "Stripes that wound cleanse away [tamrīk] evil" (Prov 20 30); "A hot wind

The principal use was the ceremonial; applied to persons, places or things, "undefiled," "not causing defilement," or "from which defilement has just been removed"; 2. Cere- tāhēr, almost exclusively ceremonial, being the chief Heb root. Katharos (NT), or derivatives, has this use clearly in Mk 1 44; Lk 5 14: "Offer for thy cleansing the things which Moses," etc; He 9 13.22.23: "the cleanness of the flesh," etc. "Clean" is applied to animals and birds: "of every clean beast" (Gen 7 2); "of all clean birds" (Dt 14 11); (for list of unclean creatures see Lev 1 4-20); to places: "Carry forth . . . unto a clean place" (4 12); to buildings: "Make atonement for the house; and it shall be clean" (14 53); to persons: "A clean person shall take hyssop" (Nu 19 18); to clothing: "garment . . . washed the second time, and shall be clean" (Lev 13 58); and to objects of all sorts, free or freed from defilement.

The ethical or spiritual meaning, either directly or figuratively, is found in the OT chiefly in Job, Ps, the Prophets, whose interest is

3. Ethical ethico-religious, rather than ritual, but or Spiritual the predominant uses are found in the NT: "Cleanse yourselves [bārar], ye that bear the vessels of Jeh" (Isa 52 11); "How can he be clean [zākhāh] that is born of a woman?" (Job 25 4) (principally moral, perhaps with allusion to the ceremonial defilement of childbirth); "The fear of Jeh is clean" (Ps 19 9), that is, the religion of Jeh is morally undefiled, in contrast to heathen religions; "He that hath clean [nāqī] hands, and a pure heart" (Ps 24 4); "Purify me with hyssop, and I shall be clean" (tāhēr, Ps 51 7); "Therefore said he, Ye are not all clean" (katharos, Jn 13 11). Here, as in Ps 51 7 and many others, the ritual furnishes a figure for the spiritual, illustrating the Divine purpose in the ritual, to impress, prefigure and prepare for the spiritual. A somewhat similar figurative moral use is found in Acts 18 6: "Your blood be upon your own heads; I am clean" (katharos, "guiltless," "unstained"). See also UNCLEAN; PURIFICATION; DEFILEMENT.

Clean.—Adverb (in one case adj.): "utterly," "wholly"; usually rendering an intensive use of the Heb vb. as Joel 1 7: "He hath made it clean bare" (lit. "stripping he will strip"); Zec 11 17: "Arm . . . clean dried up"; Isa 24 19 AV: "Earth is clean dissolved." Twice it renders a principal vb.: Josh 3 17: "Passed clean over the Jordan" (lit. "finished with regard to J."); Lev 23 22 AV: "Shall not make a clean riddance" (lit. "shall not finish the corners"; ARV "shalt not wholly reap"). Once it renders a noun: Ps 77 8: "Is his lovingkindness clean gone for ever?" ("end," he-ʾāphēs, "has his lovingkindness come to an end?"); and once an adverb, "clean [ōrtos, ōrtos, "actually," "really"] escaped" (2 Pet 2 18); but ARV, following the reading "oligōs," "a little," "scarcely," renders "just escaping." PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

CLEANSE, klēnz: "Make clean," "purify" being a frequent rendering of the original. It is found often (ARV) instead of "purge," "purify" (AV), renders nearly the same roots, and has the same overlapping phases, as "clean."

1. Physical Physical cleansing, often figuratively used: "Stripes that wound cleanse away [tamrīk] evil" (Prov 20 30); "A hot wind

... not to winnow, nor to cleanse" (bārar, Jer 4 11); "Straightway his leprosy was cleansed" (katharizō, Mt 8 3).

In the ceremonial sense: (1) With a very strong religious aspect: to purify from sin by making atonement (hātā); e.g. the altar, by the sin offering (Ex 29 36); the leprous house (Lev 14 48-53); the people, by the offering of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16 30); the sanctuary, by the blood of the sin offering (Ezk 45 18 ff.). (2) To expiate (kāphar, "cover," "hide"); sin (in this case blood-guiltiness): "The land cannot be cleansed of the blood" (AV Nu 35 33; ARV "no expiation can be made for the land"). (3) To remove ceremonial defilement, the principal use, for which the chief root is tāhēr: "Take the Levites . . . and cleanse them" (Nu 8 6); "and she shall be cleansed [after childbirth] from the fountain of her blood" (Lev 12 7); "Cleanse it, and hallow it [the altar] from the uncleanness of the children of Israel" (16 19), etc. This use is infrequent in the NT, except figuratively. Clear instances are Mk 1 44: "Offer for thy cleansing [katharismós] . . . for a testimony unto them" (also Lk 5 14); He 9 22.23: "necessary therefore that the copies of the things in the heavens should be cleansed with these." Physical, ritual, and figurative uses are combined in Mt 23 25: "Ye cleanse the outside of the cup and of the platter." Acts 10.15: "What God hath cleansed, make not thou common" uses the figure of the ritual to declare the complete abolition of ceremonial defilement and hence of ceremonial cleansing. For the elaborate system of ceremonial cleansing see esp. Lev 12-17, also arts. UNCLEAN; PURIFICATION. Its principal agencies were water, alone, as in minor or indirect defilements, like those produced by contact with the unclean (Lev 15 5-18, etc); or combined with a sin offering and burnt offering, as with a woman after childbirth (12 6-8); fire, as with gentile booty (Nu 31 23; by water, when it would not endure the fire); the ashes of a red heifer without spot, mingled with running water, for those defiled by contact with the dead (Nu 19 2 ff.). For the complex ceremonial in cases of leprosy, combining water, cedar, hyssop, crimson thread, the blood and flight of birds, the trespass offering, sin offering, burnt offering, see Lev 14. Blood, the vehicle and emblem of life, plays a large part in the major cleansings, in which propitiation for sin, as well as the removal of ceremonial defilement, is prominent, as of the temple, altar, etc: "According to the law, I may almost say, all things are cleansed with blood" (He 9 22).

In the ethical and spiritual sense, using the symbolism chiefly of 2. This embodies two phases: (1) the actual removal of sin by the person's own activity, "Wherewith and shall a young man cleanse [zākhāh] his way?" (Ps 119 9); "Cleanse your hands, ye sinners" (Jas 4 8); "Let us cleanse ourselves from all defilement" (2 Cor 7 1); (2) God's removal of the guilt and power of sin, as by discipline or punishment: "He cleanseth it" (Jn 15 2, AV "purgeth"); "I have cleansed thee" (Ezk 24 13); or in forgiveness, justification, sanctification. In these latter cases the exculpatory idea is sometimes the prominent, although the other is not absent: "I will cleanse [tāhēr] them from all their iniquity, whereby they have sinned against me; and I will pardon all their iniquities" (Jer 33 8); "Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse [tāhēr, "declare me clean"] me from my sin" (Ps 51 2). "Cleanse [nakkeh; ARV "clear"] thou me from hidden faults" (Ps 19 12), while formally to be understood "hold innocent," really connotes forgiveness. In Eph 5 26, it is hard to determine whether pardon or God-given holiness is predominant: "That he might sanctify it [the church], having cleansed it by the washing of water with the word." In 1 Jn 1 7, the sanctificatory meaning seems almost wholly to absorb the other: "The blood of Jesus his Son cleanseth us ["is purifying, sanctifying"] from all sin"; but in ver 9 it is again hard to determine the predominance: "He is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sin, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness." The uncertainty lies in that the second clause may not, as in our speech, add a distinct idea, but may be Heb synonymous parallelism. Perhaps it is not wise to seek too curiously to disentangle the two ideas, since they cannot be separated. God never "clears" where he has not begun to "cleanse," and never "cleanses" by the Spirit without "clearing" through the blood.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

CLEAR, klēr, CLEARNESS, klēr'nes (קָרַר, bar; διαβλέπω, diablēpō): Equivalent of several Heb and Gr words for bright, unclouded, shining without obstruction, distinct, brilliant; "clearer than the noon-day" (Job 11 17); "clear as the sun" (Cant 6 10); "clear shining after rain" (2 S 23 4); "clear heat in sunshine" (Isa 18 4); "clear as crystal" (Rev 21 11). Advb. "clearly," for distinctly (Mt 7 5; Mk 3 25; Rom 1 20). Noun, "clearness," for brilliancy, in Ex 24 10, "as the very heaven for clearness."

From this physical, it is applied, in a moral sense, to character, as spotless and free from guilt, or charge, or obligation, "from oath" (Gen 24 8); "from transgression" (Ps 19 13). Hence the vb. "to clear" means juridically to declare or prove innocent, to vindicate (Gen 44 16; Ex 34 7; Nu 14 18; cf hāgnos, 2 Cor 7 11, RV "pure"). "Be clear when thou judgest" (Ps 51 4) refers to the proof and vindication of the righteousness of God.

CLEAVE, klēv: Is used in the Bible in two different senses:

(1) פָּצַץ, bāka', "to split," or "to rend." We are told that Abraham "clave the wood for the burnt-offering" (Gen 22 3), and that "they clave the wood of the cart" (1 S 6 14). The Psalmist speaks of Jeh cleaving fountain and flood (74 15), and the plowman cleaving the earth (141 7). For other examples see Jgs 15 19; Eccl 10 9; Ps 78 15; Hab 3 9.

(2) דָּבַק, dābhaq; κολλάω, kollāō, "to adhere to," or "to join one's self to." This meaning is the reverse of the preceding. The Psalmist speaks of his tongue cleaving to the roof of his mouth (137 6). We are told that a man should cleave unto his wife (Gen 2 24; Mt 19 5). It is said that Ruth clave unto her mother-in-law (Ruth 1 14), and that certain men clave unto Paul (Acts 17 34; cf 4 23; 11 23 m).

"Cleave" is also used in this sense to describe one's adherence to principles. Paul admonished the Romans to cleave to that which is good (Rom 12 9).

A. W. FORTUNE

CLEFT, kleft, CLIFF, klif, CLIFT, klift: The first of these words, from cleave, "to split," is a crevice or narrow opening, as "of the ragged rocks" (Isa 2 21); "under the clefts of the rocks" (Isa 57 5). "Clift" is an obsolete form of cleft, found in AV Ex 33 22; Isa 57 5, but not in RV. "Cliff" an abrupt, precipitous, towering rock, is not in RV, but is found in AV 2 Ch 20 16, RV "ascent," Job 30 6.

CLEMENCY, klem'en-si (ἐπιείκεια, epieikeia, "fairness," "sweet reasonableness," Acts 24 4): The Gr word is rendered elsewhere "gentleness," 2 Cor 10 1; Tit 3 2, "meekness"; Jas 3 17; 1 Pet 2 18.
